Polyorates, a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which attended him. He became very powerful, and made himself master, not only of the neighbouring islands, but also of some cities on the coast of Asia. He had a fleet of 200 ships of war, and was so universally respected, that Amasis the king of Egypt made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continued prosperity, advised him to chequer his enjoyments, by relinquishing some of his most favourite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into the sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels. The voluntary loss of so precious a seal afflicted him for some time, but in a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found. Amasis no sooner heard this, than be rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos, and observed, that sooner or later his good fortune would vanish. Some time after Polyocrates visited Magnesia on the Mæander, where he had been invited by Orontes the governor. He was shamefully put to death, 522 years before Christ, merely because the governor wished to terminate the prosperity of Polyocrates. The daughter of Polyocrates had dissuaded her father from going to the house of Orontes, on account of the bad dreams which she had had, but her advice was disregarded. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Strab.—Herodot. 3, c. 22, &c.—A sophist of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Busiris and Clytemnestra. Quintil. 2, c. 17.—An ancient statuary.

Polycræta, or Polyerita, a young woman of Naxos, who became the wife of Diognetus the general of the Erythreans, &c. Polyen. 8.—Another woman of Naxos, who died through the excess of joy. Plut. de Clar. Mul.

Polycritus, a man who wrote the life of Dionysius the tyrant of Sicily.—Diog.

Polyctor, the husband of Stygna, one of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—The father of Pisanor, one of Penelope's suitors.—An athlete of Elis. It is said that he obtained a victory at Olympia by bribing his adversary Sosander, who was superior to him in strength and courage. Paus. 5, c. 22.

Polydæmon, an Assyrian prince killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

Polydamas, a Trojan, son of Antenor by Theano the sister of Hecuba. He married Lycaste, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accused by some of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares Phry.—A son of Panthous, born the same night as Hector. He was inferior in valour to none of the Trojans, except Hector, and his prudence, the wisdom of his counsels, and the firmness of his mind, claimed equal admiration, and proved most salutary to his unfortunate and misguided countrymen. He was at last killed by Ajax, after he had slaughtered a great number of the enemy. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 12, &c.—A celebrated athlete, son of Nicias, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fist, and it is said that he could stop with his hand a chariot in its most rapid course. He was one day with some of his friends in a cave, when on a sudden a large piece of rock came tumbling down; and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the fallen fragment in his arms. His prodigious strength, however, was insufficient, and he was instantly crushed to pieces under the rock. Paus. 6, c. 5.—One of Alexander's officers, intimate with Parmenio. Curt. 4, c. 17.

Polydamna, a wife of Thonis king of Egypt. It is said that she gave Helen a certain powder, which had the wonderful power of driving away care and melancholy. Homer. Od. 4, v. 228.

Polydectes, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidae. He was son of Eunomus. Paus. 3, c. 7.—A son of Magnes, king of the island of Seriphos. He received with great kindness Danae and her son Perseus, who had been exposed on the sea by Acrisius. Virg. Perseus. He took particular care of the education of Perseus; but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehensive of his resentment. Some time after he paid his addresses to Danae, and when she rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys the brother of Polydectes, who had himself saved her from the sea-waters, opposed her ravisher and armed himself in her defence. At this critical moment, Perseus arrived, and with Medusa's head he turned into stones Polydectes, with the associates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys, who had shown himself so active in the cause of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242.—Hygin. fab. 63, &c.—A sculptor of Greece. Plin.

Polydæmonia, a fountain of Laconia, near Therapne. Strab. 9.

Polydora, a daughter of Pelæus king of Thesaly, by Antigone the daughter of Eurytion. She married the river Sperchius, by whom she had Mnesteus. Apollod.—One of the Oceanides. Hesiod.—A daughter of Melicæger king of Calydon, who married Proteusilus. She killed herself when she heard that her husband was dead. The wife of Proteusilus is more commonly called Lædamia. Virg. Proteusilus. Paus. 4, c. 2.—A daughter of Perieres.—An island of the Propontis near Cyzicus.

Polydorus, a son of Alcamenes king of Sparta. He put an end to the war which had been carried on during 20 years, between Messenia and his subjects; and during his reign, the Lacedæmonians planted two colonies, one at Crotona, and the other at Locri. He was universally respected. He was assassinated by a nobleman, called Polemarchus. His son Eurycrates succeeded him 724 years before Christ. Paus. 3.—Herodot. 7, c. 204.—A celebrated carver of Rhodes, who with one stone made the famous statue of Laocoon and his children. Plin. 34, c. 8.—A son of Hippomedon, who went with the Epigoni to the second Theban war. Paus. 2.—A son of Cadmus and Hermione, who married Nyeitis, by whom he had Labdacus the father of Laius. He had succeeded to the throne of Thebes, when his father had gone to Italy.

Apollod. 3.—A brother of Jason of Phææ, who killed his brother and seized upon his possessions. Diad. 15.—A son of Priam killed by Achilles.—Another son of Priam by Hecuba, or, according to others, by Læthoe the daughter of Altes king of Pedasus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was besieged by the Greeks, his father removed him to the court of Polymnestor king of Thrace, and also entrusted to the care of the monarch a large sum of money, and the greatest part of his treasures, till his country was freed from foreign invasion. No sooner was the death of Priam known in Thrace, than Polymnestor made himself master of the riches which were in his possession; and to ensure them the better, he assassinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the sea, where it was found by Hecuba. Virg. Hecuba. According to Virgil, the body of Polydorus was buried near the shore by his assassin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whose boughs dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. Virg. Polymnestor. Virg. Æn. 3, 21, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 432.—Homer. Il. 20.—Dictys Cret. 2, c. 18.

Polygnôtus, a celebrated painter of Thasos, about 423 years before the christian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned one of the public porticoes of Athens with his paintings, in which he had represented the most striking events of the Trojan war. He particularly excelled in giving grace, liveliness, and expression to his pieces. The Athenians were so pleased with him, that they offered to reward his labours with whatever he pleased to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was composed of the representatives of the principal cities of Greece, ordered that Polygnostus should be maintained at the public expense wherever he went. Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plin. 33 & 34.—Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 10, c. 25, &c.—*A satmary. Polygonus and Telegonus, sons of Proteus and Coronis, were killed by Hercules. Apollod.

Polyhymnia and Polymnia, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over singing and rhetoric, and was deemed the inventress of harmony. She was represented veiled in white, holding a sceptre in her left hand, and with her right raised up, as if ready to harangue. She had a crown of jewels on her head. Herod. Theog. 75 & 915.—Plut. in Symp.—Horat. 1, od. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 9 & 53.

Polydus, a physician who brought back to life Glaucus the son of Minos, by applying to his body a certain herb, with which he had seen a serpent restore life to another which was dead. Vid. Glaucus. Apollod. 3, c. 3.—Paus. 7, c. 43.

—A son of Hercules by one of the daughters of Theseus. Apollod.—A Corinthian soothsayer, called also Polybius.—A dithyrambic poet, painter, and musician.

Polyklus, a son of Hercules and Crathea daughter of Thespius.

Polymenes, an officer appointed to take care of Egypt after it had been conquered by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 8.

Polyneide, a daughter of Autochlys, who married Eson, by whom she had Jason. She survived her husband only a few days. Apollod. 1, c. 13.

Polymedon, one of Priam's illegitimate children.

Polymla, one of Diana's companions. She was daughter of Phylas, and had a son by Mercury. Homer. Il. 16.—A daughter of Eolus, seduced by Ulysses.—A daughter of Actor. She was the first wife of Pelcus the father of Achilles.

Polymnestes, a Greek poet of Colophon. Paus. 1, c. 14.—A native of Thera, father of Battus, or Aristotle, by Phronima the daughter of Etearchus king of Oaxus. Herodot. 4, c. 150.

Polymnestor, a king of the Thracian Chersonesus, who married Ilione, the eldest of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks besieged Troy, Priam sent the greatest part of his treasures, together with Polydorus, the youngest of his sons, to Thrace, where they were entrusted to the care of Polymnestor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law; but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become master of the riches which were in his possession. At that time, the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy, followed by all the captives, among whom was Hecuba the mother of Polydorus. The fleet stopped on the coast of Thrace, where one of the female captives discovered on the shore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymnestor had thrown into the sea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, and Hecuba, who recollecting the frightful dreams which she had had on the preceding night, did not doubt but Polymnestor was the cruel assassin. She resolved to revenge her son's death, and immediately she called out Polymnestor, as if wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymnestor to be banished into a distant island for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and observes, that when Polydorus was sent to Thrace, Ilione his sister took him instead of her son Deiphilus, who was of the same age, apprehensive of her husband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the imposition; he looked upon Polydorus as his own son, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the destruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wished the house and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra the daughter of Agamemnon to Polymnestor, if he would destroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately despatched his own son Deiphilus, whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who passed as the son of Polymnestor, consulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead, his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the answer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the measures she had pursued to save his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymnestor by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Hecub.—Hygin. Fab. 102.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 45, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 430, &c.—A king of Arcadia, succeeded on the throne by Ecmis. Paus. 8.—A young Milesian who took a hare in running, and afterwards obtained a prize at the Olympic games.

Polynceas, a son of Edipus king of Thebes by Jocasta. He inherited his father's throne with his brother Eteocles, and it was mutually agreed between the two brothers, that they should reign each a year alternately. Eteocles first ascended the throne by right of seniority; but when the year was expired, he refused to resign the crown to his brother. Polynceas, upon this, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Adrastus the king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched to Thebes. The command of this army was divided among seven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the seven gates of the city of Thebes. The battle was decided by a single combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. Vid. Eteocles. Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Eurip. Phœnix.—Senec. in Theb.—Diod. 4.—*Hygin. Polynee, one of the Nereides. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Polyperchon, a famous thief, called also Procrustes, who plundered all the travellers about the Cephissus, and near Eleusis in Attica. He was killed by Theseus. Ovid calls him father of Procrustes, and Apollodorus of Sinus. Vid. Procrustes. Paus. 1, c. 38.—Ovid. in Ib. 409.—Diod. 4.—Plut. in Theb.

Polyperchon, or Polyperchon, one of the officers of Alexander. Antipater, at his death, appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia, in preference to his own son Cassander. Polyperchon, though old, and a man of experience, showed great ignorance in the administration of his government. He became cruel, not only to the Greeks, or such as opposed his ambitious views, Peloponnesus.—A town of Thessaly. Paus. 7, c. 27.—A mountain with a lake of the same name in Macedonia.

Piſtas, a virtue which denotes veneration for the deity, and love and tenderness to our friends. It received divine honours among the Romans, and was made one of their gods. Aelius Glabrio first erected a temple to this new divinity, on the spot where a woman had fed with her own milk her aged father, who had been imprisoned by the order of the senate, and deprived of all aliments. Cic. de Div. 1.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Plin. 7, c. 36.

Pigres and Matyas, two brothers, &c. Herodot.—The name of three rivers.

Pigrum mare, a name applied to the Northern sea, from its being frozen. The word Pigna is applied to the Palus Mœoticus. Ovid. 4, Pont. 10, v. 67.—Plin. 4, c. 13.—Tacit. G. 45.

Pilumnus, the god of bakers at Rome. Vid. Picumnus.

Pinarius and Pottitius, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy. They were instructed by Hercules, who visited the court of Evander, how they were to offer sacrifices to his divinity, in the morning, and in the evening, immediately at sunset. The morning sacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening Pottitius was obliged to offer the sacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time. This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered that for the future Pinarius and his descendants should preside over the sacrifices, but that Pottitius, with his posterity, should wait upon the priests as servants, when the sacrifices were annually offered to him on mount Aventine. This was religiously observed till the age of Appius Claudius, who persuaded the Pottitii, by a large bribe, to discontinue their sacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by slaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors observe, the Pottitii were deprived of sight, and the family became a little time after totally extinct. Liv. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 269, &c.—Victor. de Orig. 8.

M. Pinarius Bœuca, a pretor, who conquered Sardinia, and defeated the Corsicans. Cic. de Orat. 2.

Pinarus, or Pindus, now Delifou, a river falling into the sea near Issus, after flowing between Cilicia and Syria. Dionys. Per.

Pinoum, a town of Mœsia Superior, now Gradina.

Pindarus, a celebrated lyric poet of Thebes. He was carefully trained from his earliest years to the study of music and poetry, and he was taught how to compose verses with elegance and simplicity, by Myrtis and Corinna. When he was young, it is said that a swarm of bees settled on his lips, and there left some honeycombs as he reposed on the grass. This was universally explained as a prognostic of his future greatness and celebrity, and indeed he seemed entitled to notice when he had conquered Myrtis in a musical conquest. He was not, however, so successful against Corinna, who obtained five times, while he was competitor, a poetical prize, which, according to some, was adjudged rather to the charms of her person, than to the brilliancy of her genius, or the superiority of her composition. In the public assemblies of Greece, where females were not permitted to contend, Pindar was rewarded with the prize, in preference to every other competitor; and as the conquerors at Olympia were the subject of his compositions, the poet was courted by statesmen and princes. His hymns and pœans were repeated before the most crowded assemblies in the temples of Greece; and the priestess of Delphi declared that it was the will of Apollo that Pindar should receive the half of all the first fruit offerings that were annually heaped on his altars. This was not the only public honour which he received; after his death, he was honoured with every mark of respect, even to adoration. His statue was erected at Thebes in the public place where the games were exhibited, and six centuries after it was viewed with pleasure and admiration by the geographer Pausanias. The honours which had been paid to him while alive, were also shared by his posterity; and at the celebration of one of the festivals of the Greeks, a portion of the victim which had been offered in sacrifice, was reserved for the descendants of the poet. Even the most inveterate enemies of the Thebans showed regard for his memory, and the Spartans spared the house which the prince of Lycia had inhabited, when they destroyed the houses and the walls of Thebes. The same respect was also paid him by Alexander the Great when Thebes was reduced to ashes. It is said that Pindar died at the advanced age of 86, B.C. 435. The greatest part of his works have perished. He had written some hymns to the gods, poems in honour of Apollo, dithyrambics to Bacchus, and odes on several victories obtained at the four greatest festivals of the Greeks, the Olympic, Isthmian, Pythian, and Nemean games. Of all these, the odes are the only compositions extant, admired for sublimity of sentiments, grandeur of expression, energy and magnificence of style, boldness of metaphors, harmony of numbers, and elegance of diction. In these odes, which were repeated with the aid of musical instruments, and accompanied by the various inflections of the voice, with suitable attitudes and proper motions of the body, the poet has not merely celebrated the place where the victory was won, but has introduced beautiful episodes, and by unfolding the greatness of his heroes, the dignity of their characters, and the glory of the several republics where they flourished, he has rendered the whole truly beautiful and in the highest degree interesting. Horace has not hesitated to call Pindar inimitable, and this panegyric will not perhaps appear too offensive when we recollect that succeeding critics have agreed in extolling his beauties, his excellence, the fire, animation, and enthusiasm of his genius. He has been censured for his affectation in composing an ode from which the letter S was excluded. The best editions of Pindar are those of Heyne, 4to, Gottingen, 1773; of Glasgow, 12mo, 1774; and of Schmidius, 4to, Witteberg, 1616. Athen. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Horat. 4, od. 2.—Ælian. V. Pion, one of the descendants of Hercules, who built Pionia, near the Caycus in Mysia. It is said that smoke issued from his tomb as often as sacrifices were offered to him. Paus. 9, c. 18.

Piræus, or Pyreæus, a celebrated harbour at Athens, at the mouth of the Cephissus, about three miles distant from the city. It was joined to the town by two walls, in circumference seven miles and a half, and 60 feet high, which Themistocles wished to raise in a double proportion. One of these was built by Pericles, and the other by Themistocles. The towers which were raised on the walls to serve as a defence, were turned into dwelling-houses, as the population of Athens gradually increased. It was the most capacious of all the harbours of the Athenians, and was naturally divided into three large basins called Cantharos, Aphrodisium, and Zea, improved by the labours of Themistocles, and made sufficiently commodious for the reception of a fleet of 400 ships, in the greatest security. The walls which joined it to Athens, with all the fortifications, were totally demolished when Lysander put an end to the Peloponnesian war by the reduction of Attica. Paus. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9.—*C. Piranthus, a son of Argus and Evadne, brother to Jasus, Epidaurus, and Pegasus. Paus. 2, c. 16 & 17.—Apollod. 2.

Piræno, a daughter of Danaus.—A daughter of Egebalus, or, according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two sons, called Leches and Cenchrus, who gave their names to two of the harbours of Coriuth. Piræno was so disconsolate at the death of her son Cenchrus, who had been killed by Diana, that she pined away, and was dissolved, by her continual weeping, into a fountain of the same name, which was still seen at Coriuth in the age of Pausanias. The fountain Piræno was sacred to the Muses, and, according to some, the horse Pegasus was then drinking some of its waters, when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Paus. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

Pirithous, a son of Ixion and the cloud, or, according to others, of Dia the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him son of Dia by Jupiter, who assumed the shape of a horse whenever he paid his addresses to his mistress. He was king of the Lapithæ, and, as an ambitious prince, he wished to become acquainted with Theseus, king of Athens, of whose fame and exploits he had heard so many reports. To see him, and at the same time to be a witness of his valour, he resolved to invade his territories with an army. Theseus immediately met him on the borders of Attica, but at the sight of one another the two enemies did not begin the engagement, but, struck with the appearance of each other, they stepped between the hostile armies. Their meeting was like that of the most cordial friends, and Pirithous, by giving Theseus his hand as a pledge of his sincerity, promised to repair all the damages which his hostilities in Attica might have occasioned. From that time, therefore, the two monarchs became the most intimate and the most attached of friends, so much, that their friendship, like that of Orestes and Pylades, is become proverbial. Pirithous some time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only the heroes of his age, but also the gods themselves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only one of the gods who was not invited, and to punish this neglect, the god of war was determined to raise a quarrel among the guests, and to disturb the festivity of the entertainment. Eurythion, captivated with the beauty of Hippodamia, and intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride, but he was prevented by Theseus, and immediately killed. This irritated the rest of the Centaurs; the contest became general, but the valour of Theseus, Pirithous, Hercules, and the rest of the Lapithæ, triumphed over their enemies. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and the rest saved their lives by flight. Vid. Lapithus. The death of Hippodamia left Pirithous very disconsolate, and he resolved with his friend Theseus, who had likewise lost his wife, never to marry again, except to a goddess, or one of the daughters of the gods. This determination occasioned the rape of Helen by the two friends; the lot was drawn, and it fell to the share of Theseus to have the beautiful prize. Pirithous upon this undertook with his friend to carry away Proserpine and to marry her. They descended into the infernal regions, but Pluto, who was apprised of their machinations to disturb his conjugal peace, stopped the two friends and confined them there. Pirithous was tied to his father's wheel, or, according to Hyginus, he was delivered to the furies to be continually tormented. His punishment, however, was short, and when Hercules visited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained from Proserpine the pardon of Pirithous, and brought him back to his kingdom safe and unhurt. Some suppose that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus. Vid. Theseus. Ovid. Met. 12, Jab. 4 & 5.—Hesiod. in Scut. Her.—*Homer. Pirus, a captain of the Thracians during the Trojan war, killed by Thoas king of Ætolia. Homer. Il. 4.

Pirustæ, a people of Illyricum. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Pisa, a town of Elis, on the Alpheus at the west of the Peloponnesus, founded by Pisis the son of Perieres, and grandson of Æolus. Its inhabitants accompanied Nestor to the Trojan war, and they enjoyed long the privilege of presiding at the Olympic games, which were celebrated near their city. This honourable appointment was envious by the people of Elis, who made war against the Pisæans, and after many bloody battles took their city and totally demolished it. It was at Pisa that (Enomaus murdered the suitors of his daughter, and that he himself was conquered by Pelops. The inhabitants were called Pisier. Some have doubted the existence of such a place as Pisa; but this doubt originates from Pisa's having been destroyed in so remote an age. The horses of Pisa were famous. The year on which the Olympic games were celebrated, was often called Pisæus annus, and the victory which was obtained there was called Pisæus ramus olivæ. Vid. Olympia. Strab. 8.—*Ovid. Pisæe, a town of Etruria, built by a colony from Pisa in the Peloponnesus. The inhabitants were called Pisæi. Dionysius of Halicarnassus affirms that it existed before the Trojan war, but others support that it was built by a colony of Pisæans, who were shipwrecked on the coast of Etruria at their return from the Trojan war. Pisæe was once a very powerful and flourishing city, which conquered the Baleares, together with Sardinia and Corsica. The sea on the neighbouring coast was called the bay of Pisæe. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 179.—Strab. 5.—Lucan. 2, v. 401.—Liv. 39, c. 2. l. 45, c. 13.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

Pisæus, a surname of Jupiter at Pisa.

Pisander, a son of Heliophon, killed by the Solymi.—A Trojan chief, killed by Menelaus. Homer. Il. 13, v. 601.—One of Penelope's suitors, son of Polyctor. Ovid. Heroid. 1.—A son of Antimachus, killed by Agamemnon during the Trojan war. He had had recourse to entreaties and promises, but in vain, as the Grecian wished to resent the advice of Antimachus, who opposed the restoration of Helen. Homer. Il. 11, v. 123.—An admiral of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He abolished the democracy at Athens, and established the aristocratical government of the 400 tyrants. He was killed in a naval battle by Conon the Athenian general near Cnidus, in which the Spartans lost 50 galleys, B.C. 394. Diod.—A poet of Rhodes, who composed a poem called Herculeæ, in which he gave an account of all the labours and all the exploits of Hercules. He was the first who ever represented his hero armed with a club. Paus. 8, c. 23.

Pisætes, or Pisæi, the inhabitants of Pisa in the Peloponnesus.

Pisaurum, now Poggia, a river of Picenum, with a town called Pisaurum, now Pesaro, which became a Roman colony in the consulship of Claudius Pulcher. The town was destroyed by an earthquake in the beginning of the reign of Augustus. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Catull. 82.—Plin. 3.—Liv. 39, c. 44. l. 41, c. 27.

Pisænor, a son of Ixion and the cloud.—One of the ancestor of the nurse of Ulysses. Homer. Od. 1.

Pisæus, a king of Etruria, about 260 years before the foundation of Rome. Plin. 7, c. 26.

Pisias, a general of the Argives in the age of Epaminondas.—A statutory at Athens, celebrated for his pieces. Paus.

Pisidia, an inland country of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, Pamphylia, Galatia, and Isauria. It was rich and fertile. The inhabitants were called Pisidae. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 2.—Strab. 12.—Liv. 37, c. 54 & 56.

Pisidice, a daughter of Æolus, who married Myrmidon.—A daughter of Nestor.—A daughter of Pelias.—The daughter of a king of Methymna in Lesbos. She became enamoured of Achilles when he invaded her father's kingdom, and she promised to deliver the city into his hands if he would marry her. Achilles agreed to the proposal, but when he became master of Methymna, he ordered Pisidice to be stoned to death for her perfidy. Parthen. Erot. 21.

Pisæe, a native of Thespiæ, who gained uncommon influence among the Thebans, and behaved with great courage in the defence of their liberties. He was taken prisoner by Demetrius, who made him governor of Thespiæ.

Pisistratidæ, the descendants of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens. Vid. Pisistratus.

Pisistratides, a man sent as ambassador to the satraps of the king of Persia, by the Spartans.

Pisistratus, an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, who early distinguished himself by his valour in the field, and by his address and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himself the favourite of the populace by his liberality, and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he resolved to make himself master of his country. Everything seemed favourable to his views; but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs, and who had lately instituted his celebrated laws, opposed him, and discovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public assembly. Pisistratus was not disheartened by the measures of his relation Solon, but he had recourse to artifice. In returning from his country house, he cut himself in various places, and after he had exposed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accused his enemies of attempts upon his life, because he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppressed; he claimed a chosen body of 50 men from the populace to defend his person in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unsuspecting people unanimously granted his request, though Solon opposed it with all his influence; and Pisistratus had no sooner received an armed band, on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he seized the citadel of Athens, and made himself absolute. The people too late perceived their credulity; yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conspired together against him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His house and all his effects were exposed to sale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private dissensions of the friends of liberty proved favourable to the expelled tyrant, and Megacles, who was jealous of Lycurgus, secretly promised to restore Pisistratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens, if he would marry his daughter. Pisistratus consented, and, by the assistance of his father-in-law, he was soon enabled to expel Lycurgus, and to re-establish himself. By means of a woman called Phya, whose shape was tall, and whose features were noble and commanding, he imposed upon the people, and created himself adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the streets of the city, and, showing herself subservient to the artifice of Pisistratus, she was announced as Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and the patroness of Athens, who was come down from heaven to re-establish her favourite Pisistratus, in a power which was sanctioned by the will of the gods, and favoured by the affection of the people. In the midst of his triumph, however, Pisistratus felt himself unsupported, and some time after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops, were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens, where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after, he was drawn from his obscure retreat, by means of his son Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their master and sovereign. Upon this he sacrificed to his resentment the friends of Megacles, but he did not lose sight of the public good; and while he sought the aggrandizement of his family, he did not neglect the dignity and the honour of the Athenian name. He died about 57 years before the christian era, after he had enjoyed the sovereign power at Athens for 33 years, including the years of his banishment, and he was succeeded by his son Hipparchus. Pisistratus claims our admiration for his justice, his liberality, and his moderation. If he was dreaded and detested as a tyrant, the Athenians loved and respected his private virtues and his patriotism as a fellow-citizen; and the opprobrium which generally falls on his head may be attributed not to the severity of his administration, but to the republican principles of the Athenians, who hated and exclaimed against the moderation and equity of the mildest sovereign, while they flattered the pride and gratified the guilty desires of the most tyrannical of their fellow-subjects. Pisistratus often refused to punish the insolence of his enemies; and when he had one day been violently accused of murder, rather than inflict immediate punishment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the Areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accusations of his enemies were groundless, and that his life was irrefragable. It is to his labours that we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of Homer, and he was the first, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens, in the order in which they now stand. He also established a public library at Athens; and the valuable books which he had diligently collected, were carried into Persia when Xerxes made himself master of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias, the sons of Pisistratus, who have received the name of Pisistratidæ, rendered themselves as illustrious as their father; but the flames of liberty were too powerful to be extinguished. The Pisistratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of tyrant or sovereign was insupportable to the Athenians. Two of the most respectable of the citizens, called Harmodius and Aristogiton, conspired against them, and Hipparchus was dispatched in a public assembly. This murder was not, however, attended with any advantage, and though the two leaders of the conspiracy, who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotism, were supported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmness and prudence, and for a while preserved that peace in Athens which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue, Hippias was at last expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponnesus; and he left Attica, when he found himself unable to maintain his power and independence. The rest of the family of Pisistratus followed him in his banishment, and after they had refused to accept the liberal offers of the princes of Thessaly, and the king of Macedonia, who wished them to settle in their respective territories, the Pisistratidæ retired to Sigœum, which their father had, in the summit of his power, conquered and bequeathed to his posterity. After the banishment of the Pisistratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often sacrificed the most powerful of their citizens, apprehensive of the influence which popularity and a well-directed liberality might gain among the fickle and unsettled populace. The Pisistratidæ were banished from Athens about 18 years after the death of Pisistratus, B.C. 510. *Æliam. V. H. 13, c. 14.—Paus. 7, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, c. 59. l. 6, §. 103.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Val. Max. 1, c. 2.—A son of Nestor. Apollod.—A king of Orchomenos, who rendered himself odious by his cruelty towards his nobles. He was put to death by them; and they carried away his body from the public assembly, by hiding each a piece of his flesh under their garments, to prevent a discovery from the people, of whom he was a great favourite. Plut. in Par.—A Theban attached to the Roman interest while the consul Flaminius was in Greece. He assassinated the pretor of Bœotia, for which he was put to death, &c.*

Piso, a celebrated family at Rome, which was a branch of the Calpurnians, descended from Calpus the son of Numa. Before the death of Augustus, 11 of this family had obtained the consulship, and many had been honoured with triumphs, on account of their victories in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family the most famous were—Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people about 149 years before Christ, and afterwards consul. His frugality procured him the surname of Frugeti, and he gained the greatest honours as an orator, a lawyer, a statesman, and an historian. He made a successful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his son, who had behaved with great valour during the war, with a crown of gold, which weighed 30 pounds. He composed some annals and harangues, which were lost in the age of Cicero. His style was obscure and inelegant.—Gaius, a Roman consul, A.U.C. 687 who supported the consular dignity against the tumults of the tribunes, and the clamours of the people. He made a law to restrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magistrates.—Cneus, another consul under Augustus. He was one of the favourites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty. He was accused of having poisoned Germanicus; and when he saw that he was shunned and despised by his friends, he destroyed himself, A.D. 20.—Lucius, a governor of Spain, who was assassinated by a peasant, as he was travelling through the country; the murderer was seized and tortured, but he refused to confess the causes of the murder.—Lucius, a private man accused of having uttered seditious words against the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death saved him from the hands of the executioner.—Lucius, a governor of Rome for 20 years, an office which he discharged with the greatest justice and credit. He was greatly honoured by the friendship of Augustus, as well as of his successor, a distinction he deserved, both as a faithful citizen and a man of learning. Some, however, say that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, because he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem, De Arte Poetica, to his two sons, whose partiality for literature had distinguished them among the rest of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leisure hours. Plut. in Cæs.—Plin. 18, c. 3.—Cneus, a factious and turbulent youth, who conspired against his country with Catiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæsar.—Caius, a Roman who was at the head of a celebrated conspiracy against the emperor Nero. He had rendered himself a favourite of the people by his private as well as public virtues, by the generosity of his behaviour, his fondness of pleasure with the voluptuous, and his austerity with the grave and the reserved. He had been marked by some as a proper person to succeed the emperor; but the discovery of the plot by a freedman who was among the conspirators, soon cut him off, with all his partisans. He refused to court the affections of the people and of the army, when the whole had been made public; and instead of taking proper measures for his preservation, either by proclaiming himself emperor, as his friends advised, or by seeking a retreat in the distant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own house, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death.—Lucius, a senator who followed the emperor Valerian into Persia. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A.D. 261, by Valens, &c.—Icimanus, a senator adopted by the emperor Galba. He was put to death by Otho's orders.—A son-in-law of Cicero.—A patrician, whose daughter married Julius Cæsar. Horat.—Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Val. Max.—Liv.—Sueton.—Cic. de Offic., &c.—Plut. in Cæs., &c.—One of the 30 tyrants appointed over Athens by Ly-sander.

Pisirus, a town of Thrace, near the river Nestus. Herod. 7, c. 109.

Pistor, a surname given to Jupiter by the Romans, signifying baker, because when their city was taken by the Gauls, the god persuaded them to throw down leaves from the Tarpeian hill where they were besieged, that the enemy might from thence suppose that they were not in want of provisions, though in reality they were near surrendering through famine. This deceived the Gauls, and they soon after raised the siege. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 350, 394, &c.

Pistoria, now Pistoja, a town of Etruria, at the foot of the Apennines, near Florence, where Cataline was defeated. Sallust. Cat. 47.—Plin. 3, c. 4.

Pisus, a son of Aphareus, or, according to others, of Perieres. Apollod. 3.—Paus. 5.

Pisuthnes, a Persian satrap of Lydia, who revolted from Darius Nottus. His father's name was Hystaspes. Plut. in Art.

Pitæno, a town of Æolia in Asia Minor. The inhabitants made bricks which swam on the surface of the water. Lucan. 3, v. 305.—Strab. 13.—Vitruv. 2, c. 3.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 357.—A town of Laconia. Pindar. Od. 6, v. 46.

Pitaræus, an Athenian archon, during whose magistracy Epicurus died. Cic. Fal. 9.

Pithecula, a small island on the coast of Etruria, anciently called Enaria and Enarina, with a town of the same name, on the top of a mountain. The frequent earthquakes to which it was subject obliged the inhabitants to leave it. There was a volcano in the middle of the island, which has given occasion to the ancients to say that the giant Typhon was buried there. Some suppose that it received its name from πυθοί, monkeys, into which the inhabitants were changed by Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 90.—Plin. 3, c. 6.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Strab. 1.

Pithens. Vid. Pitheus.

Pitho, called also Swada, the goddess of persuasion among the Greeks and Romans supposed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. She was represented with a diadem on her head, to intimate her influence over the hearts of men. One of her arms appears raised, as in the attitude of an orator haranguing in a public assembly, and with the other she holds a thunderbolt, and fetters made with flowers, to signify the powers of reasoning and the attractions of eloquence. A caduceus, as a symbol of persuasion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demosthenes and Cicero, the two most celebrated among the ancients, who understood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouse and animate their various passions.—A Roman courtesan. She received this name on account of the allurements which her charms possessed, and of her winning expressions.

Pitholæus and Lycophon, seized upon the sovereign power of Phœzæ, by killing Alexander. They were ejected by Philip of Macedonia. Diod. 16.

Pitholeon, an insignificant poet of Rhodes, who mingled Greek and Latin in his compositions. He wrote some epigrams against J. Cæsar, and drew upon himself the ridicule of Horace, on account of the inelegance of his style. Sueton. de cl. Rh.—Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 21.—Macrob. 2, sat. 2.

Pithon, one of the body-guards of Alexander, put to death by Antiochus.

Pithys, a nymph beloved by Pan. Boreas was also fond of her, but she slighted his addresses, upon which he dashed her against a rock, and she was changed into a pine tree.

Pittacus, a native of Mitylene in Lesbos, was one of the seven wise men of Greece. His father's name was Cynhadus. With the assistance of the sons of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppression of the tyrant Melanchrus, and in the war which the Athenians waged against Lesbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to single combat Phrynon, the enemy's general. As the event of the war seemed to depend upon this combat, Pittacus had recourse to artifice, and when he engaged, he entangled his adversary in a net, which he had concealed under his shield, and easily despatched him. He was amply rewarded for his victory, and his countrymen, sensible of his merit, unanimously appointed him governor of their city with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence, and after he had governed his fellow-citizens with the strictest justice, and after he had established and enforced the most salutary laws, he voluntarily resigned the sovereign power after he had enjoyed it for 10 years, observing that the virtues and innocence of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a sovereign. His disinterestedness gained him many admirers, and when the Mityleneans wished to reward his public services by presenting him with an immense tract of territory, he refused to accept more land than what should be contained within the distance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the 82nd year of his age, about 570 years before Christ, after he had spent the last 10 years of his life in literary ease, and peaceful retirement. One of his favourite maxims was, that man ought to provide against misfortunes to avoid them; but that if they ever happened he ought to support them with patience and resignation. In prosperity friends were to be acquired, and in the hour of adversity their faithfulness was to be tried. He also observed, that in our actions it was imprudent to make others acquainted with our designs, for if we failed we had exposed ourselves to censure and to ridicule. Many of his maxims were inscribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to show the world how great an opinion the Mytileneans entertained of his abilities as a philosopher, a moralist, and a man. By one of his laws, every fault committed by a man when intoxicated, deserved double punishment. The titles of some of his writings are preserved by Laertius, among which are mentioned elegiac verses, some laws in prose, addressed to his countrymen, epistles, and moral precepts called Adomena. Diog.—Aristot. Polit.—Plut. in Symp.—Paus. 10. c. 24.—Elian. V. H. 2. &c.—Val. Max. 6. 2. 5.—A grandson of Porus king of India.

Pitheas, a town near Trozene. Hence the epithet of Pitheus in Ovid. Met. 15. v. 206.

Pithæus, a king of Trozene in Argolis, son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was universally admired for his learning, wisdom, and application; he publicly taught in a school at Trozene, and even composed a book, which was seen by Pausanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus king of Athens, and he himself took particular care of the youth and education of his grandson Theseus. He was buried at Trozene, which he had founded, and on his tomb were seen, for many ages, three seats of white marble, on which he sat, with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his subjects or settled their disputes. Paus. 1 & 2.—Plut. in These.—Strab. 8.

Pitulani, a people of Umbria. Their chief town was called Pitulum.

Pitynes, a town of Asia Minor. Apollon.

Pityus (untis), now Pitshinda, a town of Colchis. Plin. 6. c. 5.

Pityusa, a small island on the coast of Argolis. Plin. 4. c. 12.—A name of Chios.—Two small islands in the Mediterranean, near the coast of Spain, of which the larger was called Edusus, and the smaller Ophiusa. Mela, 2. c. 7.—Strab.—Plin. 3. c. 5.

Pius, a surname given to the emperor Antoninus, on account of his piety and virtue.—A surname given to a son of Metellus, because he interested himself so warmly to have his father recalled from banishment.

Piacentia, now called Placenza, an ancient town and colony of Italy, at the confluence of the Trebia and Po. Liv. 21. c. 25 & 56. l. 37. c. 10.—Another, near Lusitania, in Spain.

Plaideianus, a gladiator in Horace's age, 2. sat. 7.

Placidia, a daughter of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus king of the Goths, and afterwards Constantine, by whom she had Valentinian III. She died A. D. 449.

Placidius Julius, a tribune of a cohort, who imprisoned the emperor Vitellius, &c. Tacit. H. 3. c. 85.

Planasia, a small island of the Tyrrhene sea.

—Another, on the coast of Gaul, where Tiberius ordered Agrippa the grandson of Augustus to be put to death. Tacit. Ann. 1. c. 3.—A town on the Rhone.

Plancina, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piso, and was accused with him of having murdered Germanicus, in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the empress Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her person. She had long supported the spirits of her husband, during his confinement, but when she saw herself freed from the accusation, she totally abandoned him to his fate. Subservient in everything to the will of Livia, she, at her instigation, became guilty of the greatest crimes, to injure the character of Agrippina. After the death of Agrippina, Plancina was accused of the most atrocious villainies, and, as she knew she could not elude justice, she put herself to death, A. D. 33. Tacit. Ann. 6. c. 26. &c.

L. Plancus Munatius, a Roman, who rendered himself ridiculous by his follies and his extravagance. He had been consul, and had presided over a province in the capacity of governor; but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the most servile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meanest stage dancer, and in a comedy he personated Glaucus, and painted his body of a green colour, dancing on a public stage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had tied behind his back the tail of a large sea fish. This exposed him to the public derision, and when Antony had joined the rest of his friends in censuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deserted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendship and attention. It was he who proposed, in the Roman senate, that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated 1. od. 7. to him; and he certainly deserved the honour, from the elegance of his letters, which are still extant, written to Cicero. He founded a town in Gaul, which he called Lugdunum. Plut. in Anton.—A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it, rather than to expose their persons to danger.

Phangon, a courtesan of Miletus, in Ionia.

Plataea, a daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia. Paus. 9. c. 1. &c.—An island on the coast of Africa in the Mediterranean. It belonged to the Cyreneans. Herodot. 4. c. 157.

Plataea, and æ (arum), a town of Bœotia, near mount Cithæron, on the confines of Megaris and Attica, celebrated for a battle fought there between Mardonius the commander of Xerxes king of Persia, and Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, and the Athenians. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men, 3000 of which scarce escaped with their lives by flight. The Grecian army, which was greatly inferior, lost but few men, and among these 9 Spartans, 52 Athenians, and 16 Tegeans, were the only soldiers found in the number of the slain. The plunder which the Greeks obtained in the Persian camp was immense. Pausanias received the tenth of all the spoils, on account of his uncommon valour during the engagement, and the rest were rewarded each according to their respective merit. This battle was fought on the 22d September, the same day as the battle of Mycale, 479 B.C., and by it Greece was totally delivered for ever from the continual alarms to which she was exposed on account of the Persian invasions, and from that time none of the princes of Persia dared to appear with a hostile force beyond the Hellespont. The Plataeans were naturally attached to the interest of the Athenians, and they furnished them with 1000 soldiers when Greece was attacked by Datis the general of Darius. Plataea was taken by the Thebans, after a famous siege, in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and destroyed by the Spartans, B.C. 427. Alexander rebuilt it, and paid great encomiums to the inhabitants, on account of their ancestors, who had so bravely fought against the Persians at the battle of Marathon, and under Pausanias. Herodot. 8, c. 50. — Paus. 9, c. 1. — Plut. in Alex. Sec. — C. Nep. 8c. — Cic. de Offic. 1, c. 18. — Strab. — Justin.

Platanus, a river of Boeotia. Paus. 9, c. 24.
Plato, a celebrated philosopher at Athens, son of Ariston and Perictiona. His original name was Aristocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeness of his shoulders. As one of the descendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illustrious, and opulent family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnastic exercises, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the study of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteness of judgment and warmth of imagination which have stamped his character as the most subtle and flowery writer of antiquity. He first began his literary career by writing poems and tragedies; but he was soon disgusted with his own productions, when, at the age of 20, he was introduced into the presence of Socrates, and when he was enabled to compare and examine, with critical accuracy, the merit of his compositions with those of his poetical predecessors. He therefore committed to the flames these productions of his early years, which could not command the attention or gain the applause of a maturer age. During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and if he was prevented by a momentary indisposition from attending the philosopher's last moments, yet he collected from the conversation of those that were present, and from his own accurate observations, the minutest and most circumstantial accounts, which can exhibit, in its truest colours, the concern and sensibility of the pupil, and the firmness, virtues, and moral sentiments of the dying philosopher. After the death of Socrates, Plato retired from Athens, and to acquire that information which the accurate observer can derive in foreign countries, he began to travel over Greece. He visited Megara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindest reception from his fellow-disciples, whom the violent death of their master had likewise removed from Attica. He afterwards visited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philosophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation of its professors, Philolaus, Archytas, and Eurytus. He afterwards passed into Sicily, and examined the eruptions and fires of the volcano of that island. He also visited Egypt, where then the mathematician Theodorus flourished, and where he knew that the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy and metempsychosis had been fostered and cherished. When he had finished his travels, Plato retired to the groves of Academus, in the neighbourhood of Athens, where his lectures were soon attended by a crowd of learned, noble, and illustrious pupils; and the philosopher, by refusing to have a share in the administration of affairs, rendered his name more famous, and his school more frequented. During forty years he presided at the head of the academy, and there he devoted his time to the instruction of his pupils, and composed those dialogues which have been the admiration of every age and country. His studies, however, were interrupted for a while, whilst he obeyed the pressing calls and invitations of Dionysius, and whilst he persuaded the tyrant to become a man, the father of his people, and the friend of liberty. Vid. Dionysius II. In his dress the philosopher was not ostentatious; his manners were elegant but modest, simple without affectation; and the great honours which his learning deserved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato resided, during the celebration, in a family who were totally strangers to him. He ate and drank with them, he partook of their innocent pleasures and amusements; but though he told them his name was Plato, yet he never spoke of the employment which he pursued at Athens, and never introduced the name of that philosopher whose doctrines he followed, and whose death and virtues were favourite topics of conversation in every part of Greece. When he returned home, he was attended by the family which had so kindly entertained him; and, as being a native of Athens, he was desired to show them the great philosopher whose name he bore: their surprise was great when he told them that he himself was the Plato whom they wished to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and, indeed, to sobriety and temperance in the use of food, and to the want of those pleasures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, some have attributed his preservation during the tremendous pestilence which raged at Athens with so much fury at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Plato was never subject to any long or lingering indisposition, and though change of climate had enfeebled a constitution naturally strong and healthy, the philosopher lived to an advanced age, and was often heard to say, when his physicians advised him to leave his residence at Athens, where the air was impregnated by the pestilence, that he would not advance one single step to gain the top of mount Atoos, were he assured to attain the great longevity which the inhabitants of that mountain were said to enjoy above the rest of mankind. Plato died on his birthday, in the 81st year of his age, about 348 years before the christian era. His last moments were easy and without pain, and, according to some, he expired in the midst of an entertainment, or, according to Cicero, as he was writing. The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of a dialogue, except 12 letters. He speaks always by the mouth of others, and the philosopher has nowhere made mention of himself except once in his dialogue intitled Phædon, and another time in his apology for Socrates. His writings were so celebrated, and, his opinion so respected, that he was called divine; and for the elegance, melody, and sweetness of his expressions, he was distinguished by the appellation of the Athenian bee. Cicero had such an esteem for him, that in the warmth of panegyric, he exclaimed, Errare mehercule malo cum Platone quam cum istis vera sentire; and Quintilian said that, when he read Plato, he seemed to hear not a man, but a divinity speaking. His style, however, though admired and commended by the best and most refined of critics among the ancients, has not escaped the censure of some of the moderns; and the philosopher has been blamed, who supports that fire is a pyramid tied to the earth by numbers, that the world is a figure consisting of 12 pentagons, and who, to prove the metempsychosis and the immortality of the soul, asserts that the dead are born from the living, and the living from the dead. The speculative mind of Plato was employed in examining things divine and human, and he attempted to fix and ascertain, not only the practical doctrine of morals and politics, but the more subtle and abstruse theory of mystical theogony. His philosophy was universally received and adopted, and it has not only governed the opinions of the speculative part of mankind, but it continues still to influence the reasoning, and to divide the sentiments, of the moderns. In his system of philosophy he followed the physics of Heraclitus, the metaphysical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. He maintained the existence of two beings, one self-existent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-existent creature, god and man. The world was created by that self-existent cause, from the rude undigested mass of matter which had existed from all eternity, and which had even been animated by an irregular principle of motion. The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a stubborn intractability and wildness congenial to matter, and from these, consequently, could be demonstrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant passions and appetites of men. From materials like these were formed the four elements, and the beautiful structure of the heavens and the earth; and into the active but irrational principle of matter, the divinity infused a rational soul. The souls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational soul of the world, which had previously given existence to the invisible gods and demons. The philosopher, therefore, supported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-existence of the human mind, which he considered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain satisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive, with their corporeal senses, the types of immutable things and the fluctuating objects of the material world; but the sudden changes to which these are continually obnoxious, create innumerable disorders, and hence arise deception, and, in short, all the errors and miseries of human life. Yet, in whatever situation man may be, he is still an object of divine concern; and, to recommend himself to the favour of the pre-existent cause, he must comply with the purposes of his creation, and, by proper care and diligence, he can recover those immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All science the philosopher made to consist in reminiscence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions of those perfect and immutable essences with which the human mind had been conversant. From observations like these, the summit of felicity might be attained by removing from the material, and approaching nearer to the intellectual world, by curbing and governing the passions which were ever agitated and inflamed by real and imaginary objects. The passions were divided into two classes: the first consisted of the irascible passions, which originated in pride or resentment, and were seated in the breast; the other, founded on the love of pleasure, was the concupiscible part of the soul seated in the belly, and inferior parts of the body. These different orders induced the philosopher to compare the soul to a small republic, of which the reasoning and judging powers were stationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the senses were its guards and servants. By the irascible part of the soul men asserted their dignity, repelled injuries, and scorned danger; and the concupiscible part provided for the support and the necessities of the body, and when governed with propriety, it gave rise to temperance. Justice was produced by the regular dominion of reason, and by the submission of the passions; and prudence arose from the strength, acuteness, and perfection of the soul, without which all other virtues could not exist. But, amidst all this, wisdom was not easily attained; at their creation all minds were not endowed with the same excellence, the bodies which they animated on earth were not always in harmony with the divine emanation; some might be too weak, others too strong, and on the first years of a man's life depended his future consequence; as an effeminate and licentious education seemed calculated to destroy the purposes of the divinity, while the contrary produced different effects, and tended to cultivate and improve the reasoning and judging faculty, and to produce wisdom and virtue. Plato was the first who supported the immortality of the soul upon arguments solid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. He did not imagine that the diseases, and the death of the body, could injure the principle of life and destroy the soul, which, of itself, was of divine origin, and of an uncorrupted and immutable essence, which, though inherent for a while in matter, could not lose that power which was the emanation of God. From doctrines like these, the great founder of Platonism concluded that there might exist in the world a community of men, whose passions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miseries which arise from ill conduct, might aspire to excellence, and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exercise of the rational and moral powers. To illustrate this more fully, the philosopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains with acuteness, judgment, and elegance the rise and revolution of civil society; and so respected was his opinion as a legislator, that his scholars were employed in regulating the republics of Arcadia, Elis, and Cnidus, at the desire of those states, and Xenocrates gave political rules for good and impartial government to the conqueror of the east. Plavis, a river of Venetia, in Italy.

Plautia lex, was enacted by M. Plautius the tribune, A.U.C. 664. It required every tribe annually to choose 15 persons of their body, to serve as judges, making the honour common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe.—Another, called also Plautia, A.U.C. 675. It punished with the interdictio ignis Et aquæ, all persons who were found guilty of attempts upon the state, or the senators or magistrates, or such as appeared in public, armed with an evil design, or such as forcibly expelled any person from his legal possessions.

Plautianus Fulvius, an African of mean birth, who was banished for his seditious behaviour in the years of his obscurity. In his banishment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus, who, some years after, ascended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his prosperity; Severus paid the greatest attention to him, and, if we believe some authors, their familiarity and intercourse were carried beyond the bounds of modesty and propriety. Plautianus shared the favours of Severus on the throne as well as in obscurity. He was invested with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces; and, indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. His table was served with more delicate meats than that of the emperor; when he walked in the public streets he received the most distinguishing honour, and a number of criers ordered the most noble citizens, as well as the meanest beggars, to make way for the favourite of the emperor, and not to fix their eyes upon him. He was concerned in all the rapine and destruction which were committed through the empire, and he enriched himself with the possessions of those who had been sacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himself still greater, Plautianus married his favourite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla the son of the emperor, and so eager was the emperor to indulge his inclinations in this and in every other respect, that he declared he loved Plautianus so much that he would even wish to die before him. The marriage of Caracalla with Plautilla was attended with serious consequences. The son of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable in her manners, commanding in aspect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to punish her haughty and imperious behaviour as soon as he succeeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and to save his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conspired against the emperor and his son. The conspiracy was discovered, and Severus forgot his attachment to Plautianus, and the favours he had heaped upon him, when he heard of his perfidy. The wicked minister was immediately put to death, and Plautilla banished to the island of Lipari, with her brother Plautus, where, seven years after, she was put to death by order of Caracalla, A.D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a son who died in his childhood, and a daughter, whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dion. Cass.

He dissuaded him from killing himself.—Lateranus, an adulterer of Messalina, who conspired against Nero, and was capitally condemned.—Aulus, a general who defeated the Umbrians and the Etrurians.—Caius, another general, defeated in Lusitania.—A man put to death by order of Caracalla.—M. Sylvanus, a tribune, who made a law to prevent seditions in the public assemblies.—Rubbilius, a man accused before Nero, and sent to Asia, where he was assassinated.

M. Accius Plautus, a comic poet, born at Sarsina, in Umbria. Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meanest poverty, by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himself, he entered into the family of a baker as a common servant, and while he was employed in grinding corn, he sometimes dedicated a few moments to the comic muse. Some, however, confute this account as false, and support that Plautus was never obliged to the laborious employments of a bakehouse for his maintenance. He wrote 25 comedies, of which only 20 are extant. He died about 184 years before the christian era; and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this stanza, which deserved to be engraven on his tomb:

Comedia luget, scena est deserta;
Deinde risus, ludus, jocusque, & numeri
Innumeri simul omnes collacrymarunt.*

The plays of Plautus were universally esteemed at Rome, and the purity, the energy, and the elegance of his language were, by other writers, considered as objects of imitation; and Varro, whose judgment is great, and generally decisive, declares, that if the Muses were willing to speak Latin, they would speak in the language of Plautus. In the Augustan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expressions of a Terence, was censured for his negligence in versification, his low wit, execrable puns, and disgusting obscenities. Yet, however censured as to language or sentiments, Plautus continued to be a favourite on the stage. If his expressions were not choice or delicate, it was universally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures; the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more interesting, the characters more truly displayed, and the catastrophe more natural. In the reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were still acted on the public theatres; and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater censure can be passed upon his successors in dramatic composition, than to observe, that for 500 years, with all the disadvantages of obsolete language and diction, in spite of the change of manners, and the revolutions of government, he commanded and received that applause which no other writer dared to dispute with him. The best editions of Plautus are that of Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1664; that of Barbou, 12mo, in 3 vols. Paris, 1759; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1760; and that of Glasgow, 3 vols. 12mo, 1763. *Varro. apud. Pléiades, or Vergilios, a name given to seven of the daughters of Atlas by Pleione or Æthra, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a constellation called Pleiades, near the back of the bull in the Zodiac. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married Sisyphus king of Corinth, had some of the immortal gods for their suitors. On that account, therefore,

Merope's star is dim and obscure among the rest of her sisters, because she married a mortal. The name of the Pleiades is derived from the Greek word πλειειν, to sail, because that constellation shows the time most favourable to navigators, which is in the spring. The name of Vergiliz they derive from ver, the spring. They are sometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Hesperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas. Hygin. fab. 192. P. A. 2. c. 21.—Ovid. G. 1. v. 138. l. 4. 233.—Seven poets, who, from their number, have received the name of Pleiades, near the age of Philadelphus Ptolemy king of Egypt. Their names were Lycophron, Theocritus, Aratus, Nicander, Apollonius, Philicus, and Homer the younger.

Pleione, one of the Oceanides, who married Atlas king of Mauritania, by whom she had 12 daughters, and a son called Hyas. Seven of the daughters were changed into a constellation called Pleiades, and the rest into another called Hyades. Ud. Fast. 5. v. 84.

His children always died as soon as born, till Ceres, pitying his misfortune, offered herself as a nurse to his wife as she was going to be brought to bed. The child lived by the care and protection of the goddess, and Plemneus was no sooner acquainted with the dignity of his nurse, than he raised her a temple. Paus. 2. c. 5 & 11.

Pleuratus, a king of Illyricum. Liv. 26. c. 24.

C. Plinius Secundus, surnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He distinguished himself in the field, and, after he had been made one of the aurgars at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleasures of literature; the day was employed in the administration of the affairs of his province, and the night was dedicated to study. Every moment of time was precious to him; at his meals one of his servants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts, in a memorandum book. Even while he dressed himself after bathing, his attention was called away from surrounding objects, and he was either employed in listening to another, or in dictating himself. To a mind so earnestly dedicated to learning, nothing appeared too laborious, no undertaking too troublesome. He deemed every moment lost which was not devoted to study, and from these reasons he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and wherever he went, he was always accompanied by his amanuensis. He even censured his nephew, Pliny the younger, because he had indulged himself with a walk, and sternly observed, that he might have employed those moments to better advantage. But if his literary pursuits made him forget the public affairs, his prudence, his abilities, and the purity and innocence of his character, made him known and respected. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Vespasian, and he received from them all the favours which a virtuous prince could offer, and an honest subject receive. As he was at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet, which was then stationed there, Pliny was surprised at the sudden appearance of a cloud of dust and ashes. He was then ignorant of the cause which produced it, and he immediately set sail in a small vessel for mount Vesuvius, which he at last discovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The sight of a number of boats that fled from the coast to avoid the danger, might have deterred another, but the curiosity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldness, and though his vessel was often covered with stones and ashes, that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coast. The place was deserted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night, the better to observe the mountain, which, during the obscurity, appeared to be one continual blaze. He was soon disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow prevented him from returning to Misenum. The eruption of the volcano increased, and at last the fire approached the place where the philosopher made his observations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but though he was supported by two of his servants, he was unable to escape. He soon fell down, suffocated by the thick vapours that surrounded him, and the insupportable stench of sulphureous matter. His body was found three days after, and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Misenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the christian era, and the philosopher who perished by the eruptions of the volcano, has been called by some the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he composed, none are extant but his natural history in 37 books. It is a work, as Pliny the younger says, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itself. It treats of the stars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, minerals, trees, flowers, and plants, besides an account of all living animals, birds, fishes, and beasts; a geographical description of every place on the globe, and a history of every art and science, of commerce and navigation, with their rise, progress, and several improvements. He is happy in his descriptions as a naturalist; he writes with force and energy, and though many of his ideas and conjectures are sometimes ill-founded, yet he possesses that fecundity of imagination, and vivacity of expression, which are requisite to treat a subject with propriety, and to render a history of nature pleasing, interesting, and, above all, instructive. His style possesses not the graces of the Augustan age; he has neither its purity and elegance, nor its simplicity, but it is rather cramped, obscure, and sometimes unintelligible. Yet for all this it has ever been admired and esteemed, and it may be called a compilation of everything which had been written before his age on the various subjects which he treats, and a judicious collection from the most excellent treatises which had been composed on the various productions of nature. Pliny was not ashamed to mention the authors which he quoted; he speaks of them with admiration, and while he pays the greatest compliment to their abilities, his eponyms show, in the strongest light, the goodness, the sensibility, and the ingenuousness of his own mind. He had written 760 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read, and so great was the opinion in his contemporaries of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Lutinus offered to buy his notes and observations for the enormous sum of about 324*l.* English money. The philosopher, who was himself rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The best editions of Pliny are that of Harduin, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1723; that of Frantzius, 10 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1728; that of Brotier, 6 vols. 12mo, Paris, 1779; and the Variorum 8vo, in 8 vols. Lips. 1778 to 1789. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 69. l. 23, c. 20. l. 15, c. 53.—Plin. ep., &c.—C. Cæcilius Secundus, surnamed the Younger, was son of L. Cæcilius by the sister of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his uncle, whose name he assumed, and whose estates and effects he inherited. He received the greatest part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he distinguished himself so much by his eloquence, that he and Tacitus were reckoned the two greatest orators of their age. He did not make his profession an object of gain like the rest of the Roman orators, but he refused fees from the rich as well as from the poorest of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himself for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He published many of his harangues and orations, which have been lost. When Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Pliny was created consul by the emperor. This honour the consul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric, which, at the request of the Roman senate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. Some time after he presided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office and with the power of proconsul, and by his humanity and philanthropy the subject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the persecution which had been begun against the christians of his province was stopped, when Pliny solemnly declared to the emperor that the followers of Christ were a meek and inoffensive sect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themselves by the most solemn oaths to abstain from vice, and to relinquish every sinful pursuit. If he rendered himself popular in his province, he was not less respected at Rome. He was there the friend of the poor, the patron of learning, great without arrogance, affable in his behaviour, and an example of good breeding, sobriety, temperance, and modesty. As a father and a husband his character was amiable; as a subject he was faithful to his prince; and as a magistrate he was candid, open, and compassionate. His native country shared, among the rest, his unbounded benevolence; and Comum, a small town of Insubria, which gave him birth, boasted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books which he collected there. He also contributed towards the expenses which attended the education of his countrymen, and liberally spent part of his estate for the advancement of literature, and for the instruction of those whom poverty otherwise deprived of the advantages of a public education. He made his preceptor Quintilian and the poet Martial objects of his benevolence, and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility; and while he observed that he was rich in the possession of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowry for his beloved daughter, 50,000 sesterces, about 300*l.* "I would not," continued he, "be so moderate, were I not assured, from your modesty and disinterestedness, that the smallness of the present will render it acceptable." He died in the 56th year of his age, A. D. 113. He had written a history of his own times, which is lost. It is said that Tacitus did not begin his history till he had found it impossible to persuade Pliny to undertake that laborious task; and, indeed, what could not have been expected from the panegyrist of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himself inferior to him in delineating the character of the times? Some suppose, but falsely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illustrious men, universally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos. He also wrote poetry, but his verses have all perished, and nothing of his learned work remains, but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and 10 books of letters, which he himself collected and prepared for the public, from a numerous and respectable correspondence. These letters contain many curious and interesting facts; they abound with many anecdotes of the generosity and the humane sentiments of the writer. They are written with elegance and great purity, and the reader everywhere discovers that affability, that condescension and philanthropy, which so egregiously marked the advocate of the christians. These letters are esteemed by some equal to the voluminous epistles of Cicero. In his panegyric, Pliny's style is florid and brilliant; he has used, to the greatest advantage, the liberties of the panegyrist, and the eloquence of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is distinguished by that affectation and pomposity which marked the reign of Trajan. The best editions of Pliny are those of Gesner, 8vo, Lips. 1770, and of Lallemand, 12mo, Paris apud Barbou; and of the panegyric separate, that of Schwartz, 4to, 1746, and of the epistles, the Variorum, l. Bat. 1669, 8vo. Plin. Ep.—Vossius.—Sidonius.

Plisthènes, a son of Atreus king of Argos, father of Menelaus and Agamemnon, according to Hesiod and others. Homer, however, calls Menelaus and Agamemnon sons of Atreus, though they were in reality the children of Plisthènes. The father died very young, and the two children were left in the house of their grandfather, who took care of them and instructed them. From his attention to them, therefore, it seems probable that Atreus was universally acknowledged their protector and father, and thence their surname of Atridae. Ovid. Rem. An. v. 778.—*Dioclyt. Plitinus, a brother of Faustulus the shepherd, who saved the life of Romulus and Remus. He was killed in a scuffle which happened between the two brothers.

Plistonax and Plistonax, son of Pausanias, was general of the Lacedæmonian armies in the Peloponnesian war. He was banished from his kingdom of Sparta for 19 years, and was afterwards recalled by order of the oracle of Delphi. He reigned 58 years. He had succeeded Plistarchus.

Plotas, small islands on the coast of Ætolia, called also Strophades.

Plotina Pompeia, a Roman lady who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the procession with her husband when he was saluted emperor, and distinguished herself by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendless. She accompanied Trajan in the east, and at his death she brought back his ashes to Rome, and still enjoyed all the honours and titles of a Roman empress under Adrian, who by her means had succeeded to the vacant throne. At her death, A.D. 122, she was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours, which, according to the superstition of the times, she seemed to deserve, from her regard for the good and prosperity of the Roman empire, and for her private virtues. Dion.

Plotinopolis, a town of Thracia, built by the emperor Trajan, and called after Plotina, the founder's wife.—Another in Dacia.

Plotinus, a Platonic philosopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, and after he had profited by all the instructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge, and to visit the territories of India and Persia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the east, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor, nearly terminated the life of the philosopher. He saved himself by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philosophy. His school was frequented by people of every sex, age, and quality; by senators as well as plebeians, and so great was the opinion of the public of his honesty and candour, that many, on their death-bed, left all their possessions to his care, and entrusted their children to him, as a superior being. He was the favourite of all the Romans; and while he charmed the populace by the force of his eloquence, and the senate by his doctrines, the emperor Gallienus courted him, and admired the extent of his learning. It is even said that the emperor and the empress Salonina intended to rebuild a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philosopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he presided over a colony of philosophers, the validity and the use of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed, through the envy and malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philosopher, at last become helpless and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for a while maintained him. He died A.D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his last and most violent efforts to give up what there was most divine in him and in the rest of the universe. Amidst the great qualities of the philosopher, we discover some ridiculous singularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he observed, that to see a painting of himself in the following age, was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. These reasons also induced him to conceal the day, the hour, and the place of his birth. He never made use of medicines, and though his body was often debilitated by abstinence or too much study, he despised to have recourse to a physician, and thought that it would degrade the gravity of a philosopher. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They consist of 54 different treatises divided into six equal parts, written with great spirit and vivacity; but the reasonings are abstruse, and the subjects metaphysical. The best edition is that of Picinus, folio, Basil, 1580.

Plotius Crispinus, a stoic philosopher and poet, whose verses were very elegant, and whose disposition was morose, for which he has been ridiculed by Horace, and called Arctologus. Horat. 1, sat. 1, v. 4.—Gallus, a native of Lugdunum, who taught grammar at Rome, and had Cicero among his pupils. Cic. de Orat.—Griffus, a man made senator by Vespasian. Tacit. Hist. 3.—A centurion in Cæsar's army. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 19.—Tuca, a friend of Horace and of Virgil, who made him his heir. He was selected by Augustus, with Varius, to review the Æneid of Virgil. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 40.—Lucius, a poet in the age of the great Marius, whose exploits he celebrated in his verses.

Plutarchus, a native of Chæronea, descended of a respectable family. His father, whose name is unknown, was distinguished for his learning and virtue, and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was also as conspicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. Under Ammonius, a reputable teacher at Delphi, Plutarch was made acquainted with philosophy and mathematics, and so well established was his character, that he was appointed by his countrymen, while yet very young, to go to the Roman proconsul, in their name, upon an affair of the most important nature. This commission he executed with honour to himself, and with success for his country. He afterwards travelled in quest of knowledge, and after he had visited, like a philosopher and an historian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he retired to Rome, where he opened a school. His reputation made his school frequented. The emperor Trajan admired his abilities, and honoured him with the office of consul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greatest tranquillity, respected by his fellow-citizens, and raised to all the honours which his native town could bestow. In this peaceful and solitary retreat, Plutarch closely applied himself to study, and wrote the greatest part of his works, and particularly his Lives. He died in an advanced age at Chæronea, about the 120th year of the christian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife, called Timoxena, four sons and one daughter. Two of the sons and the daughter died when young, and those that survived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honour to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character, the historian of Chæronea was the friend of discipline. He boldly asserted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and submissive deference to magistrates, as necessary to preserve the peace of society. He supported that the most violent and dangerous public factions arose too often from private disputes and from misunderstanding. To render himself more intelligent, he always carried a commonplace book with him, and he preserved with the greatest care whatever judicious observations fell in the course of conversation. The most esteemed of his works are his lives of illustrious men, of whom he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful skill and impartiality. He neither misrepresents the virtues, nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with precision and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many descriptions he is inferior to no historian. In some of his narrations, however, he is often too circumstantial, his remarks are often injudicious; and when he compares the heroes of Greece with those of Rome, the candid reader can easily remember which side of the Adriatic gave the historian birth. Some have accused him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have censured him for his superstition; yet for all this, he is the most entertaining, the most instructive, and interesting of all the writers of ancient history; and were a man of true taste and judgment asked what book he wished to save from destruction, of all the profane compositions of antiquity, he would perhaps without hesitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatises, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his misguided philosophy and erroneous doctrines render some of these inferior compositions puerile and disgusting. They, however, contain many useful lessons and curious facts, and though they are composed without connection, compiled without judgment, and often abound with improbable stories and false reasonings, yet they contain much information and many useful reflections. The best editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. folio, 1599; that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo, 1572; the Lives by Reiske, 12 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1775; and the Moralia, &c., by Wyttenbach. Plut.—A native of Eretria, during the Peloponnesian war. He was defeated by the Macedonians. Plut. in Phoc.

Pluta, a town of Sicily. Cic. in Verr.

Pluto, a son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as such he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis, Hades, or Ades, Clytopolom, Agelastus, Orcus, &c. As the place of his residence was obscure and gloomy, all the goddesses refused to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his solicitations. As he once visited the island of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he saw Proserpine the daughter of Ceres gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horses. To make his retreat more unknown, he opened himself a passage through the earth, by striking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephissus in Attica. Proserpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and she became the wife of her ravisher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally represented as holding a sceptre with two teeth; he has also keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and dismal countenance, and for that reason no temples were raised to his honour, as to the rest of the superior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not sprinkled on the altars, or received in vessels, as at other sacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracusans yearly sacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had disappeared with Proserpine. Among plants, the cypress, the narcissus, and the maiden-hair were sacred to him, as also everything which was deemed inauspicious, particularly the number two. According to some of the ancients, Pluto sat on a throne of sulphur, from which issued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the Harpies hovered round him, Proserpine sat on his left hand, and near to the goddess stood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with snakes. The Paræ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the symbols of their office, the distaff, the spindle, and the scissors. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet which rendered the bearer invisible, and gave it to Pluto. Perseus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. Hesiod. Theog.—Homer. Il.—Apollod. 1. 8c.—Hygin. fab. 155. P. A. 2.—Stat. Theb. 8.—Diod. 5.—Ovid. Met. 5. fab. 6.—Paus. 2. c. 36.—Orpheus, Hymn. 17. 8c.—*Cic. de Nat. Plutonion, a temple of Pluto in Lydia. Cic. de Div. 1. c. 36.

Plutus, a son of Jasion, or Jasius, by Ceres the goddess of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologists with Pluto, though plainly distinguished from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddess of peace, and on that account, Pax was represented at Athens as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks spoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They represented him as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately; he was lame, because he came slow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity than he approached mankind. Lucian. in Tim.—Paus. 9. c. 16 & 26.—Hygin. P. A.—Aristoph. in Plut.—Diod. 5.—Hesiod. Th. 970.—Dionys. Hal. 1. c. 53.

Pluvius, a surname of Jupiter as god of rain. He was invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up with continual heat, and was in want of refreshing showers. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol. Tibull. 1. el. 7. v. 26.

Plynteria, a festival among the Greeks, in honour of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word seems to be derived from πλυννω, lavare, because, during the solemnity, they undressed the statue of the goddess and washed it. The day on which it was observed was universally looked upon as unfortunate and inauspicious, and on that account no person was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purposely surrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day, was deemed very unfortunate; but, however, the success that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwise. It was customary at this festival to bear in procession a cluster of figs, which intimated the progress of civilization among the first inhabitants of the earth, as figs served them for food after they had found a dislike for acorns. Pollux.

Poligeus, a village of Egypt, near Phœnicia. Strab. 16.

Poliz, a place of Athens, set apart by Solon for holding assemblies. C. Nep. Att. 3.—Plut. in Thes. & Them.

Podalirius, a lieutenant of Pompey in Spain. Podalirius, a son of Æsculapius and Epione.

He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himself under him such a master of medicine, that, during the Trojan war, the Greeks invited him to their camp, to stop a pestilence which had baffled the skill of all their physicians. Some, however, suppose that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a physician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machaon, in 30 ships, with soldiers from Cœthalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was shipwrecked on the coast of Caria, where he cared of the falling sickness and married a daughter of Damocetus the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honours. Dictys Cret.—Q. Smyrn. 6 & 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2. Triat. el. 6.—Paus. 3.—A Rutulian engaged in the wars of Æneas and Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 304.

Podarce, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.

Podarces, a son of Iphiclus of Thessaly, who went to the Trojan war.—The first name of Priam. When Troy was taken by Hercules, he was redeemed from slavery by his sister Hesione, and from thence received the name of Priam. Vid. Priamus.

Podarès, a general of Mantinea, in the age of Epaminondas. Paus. 8, c. 9.

Podarge, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horses of Achilles by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the swiftness of her feet.

Podargus, a charioteer of Hector. Homer.

Pœas, son of Thaumacus, was among the Argonauts.—The father of Philoctetes. The son is often called Pœantia pœas, on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 45.

Pœcile, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικιλος) of paintings which it contained. It was there that Zeno kept his school, and the stoics also received their lessons there, whence their name (ἀ στωα, a porch). The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others were those of the siege and sacking of Troy, the battle of Theseus against the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Ægœ in Argolis, and of Articus the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon, was to have his picture drawn more conspicuous than that of the rest of the officers that fought with him, in the representation which was made of the engagement, which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. C. Nep. in Mill. & in Attic. 3.—Paus. 1.—Plin. 35.

Pœni, a name given to the Carthaginians. It seems to be a corruption of the word Phœni or Phœnices, as the Carthaginians were of Phœnician origin. Servius. ad Virg. 1, v. 302.

Pœon. Vid. Pœon.

Pœonia, a part of Macedonia. Vid. Pœonia. Pœon, a part of mount Pindus.

Pœgon, a harbour of the Trœzenians on the coast of the Peloponnesus. It received this name on account of its appearing to come forward before the town of Trœzene, as the beard (πρωγων) does from the chin. Strab. 1.—Mela. 2.

Pola, a city of Istria, founded by the Colchians, and afterwards made a Roman colony, and called Pietas Julia. Plin. 3, c. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Strab. 1 & 5.

Polemarchus. Vid. Archon.—The assassin of Polydorus king of Sparta. Paus. 3, c. 3.

Polemocrates, a queen of Thrace, who fled to Brutus after the murder of Cæsar. She retired from her kingdom because her subjects had lately murdered her husband.

Pôlœmon, a youth of Athens, son of Philostratus. He was much given to debauchery and extravagance, and spent the greatest part of his life in riot and drunkenness. He once, when intoxicated, entered the school of Xenocrates, while the philosopher was giving his pupils a lecture upon the effects of intemperance, and he was so struck with the eloquence of the academician, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the dissipated life he had led, and applied himself totally to the study of philosophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time he never drank any other liquor but water; and after the death of Xenocrates he succeeded in the school where his reformation had been affected. He died about 370 years before Christ, in an extreme old age. Diog. in Vita.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 254.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.—A son of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition against Parthia. After the battle of Actium, he was received into favour by Augustus, though he had fought in the cause of Antony. He was killed some time after by the barbarians near the Palus Mœotis, against whom he had made war. Strab.—Dion.—His son, of the same name, was confirmed on his father's throne by Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was also added to his kingdom by Claudius.—An officer in the army of Alexander, intimate with Philotas, &c. Curt. 7, c. 1, &c.—A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures still extant. He was master to Perseus the celebrated satirist, and died in the age of Nero.—A sophist of Laodice in Asia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was often sent to the emperor with an embassy by his countrymen, which he executed with great success. He was greatly favoured by Adrian, from whom he extracted much money. In the 56th year of his age he buried himself alive, as he laboured with the gout. He wrote declamations in Greek.

Polemonium, now Vatija, a town of Pontus, at the east of the mouth of the Theœmondon.

Polias, a surname of Minerva, as protectress of cities.

Poliochna, a town of Troas on Ida. Herodot. 6, c. 28.—Another of Crete. Thucyd. 2, c. 85.

Polia, a festival at Thebes in honour of Apollo, who was represented there with grey hair (πολιος), contrary to the practice of all other places. The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and sacrificed. From that time the sacrifice of labouring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

Poliorcetes (destroyer of cities), a surname given to Demetrius son of Antigonus. Plut. in Demet.

Polissma, a town of Troas, on the Simois. Strab. 13.

Polistrātus, an Epicurean philosopher born the same day as Hippocides, with whom he always lived to the greatest intimacy. They both died at the same hour. Diog.—Val. Max. 1.

Polites, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Pyrrhus in his father's presence. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 526, &c. His son, who bore the same name, followed Æneas into Italy, and was one of the friends of young Ascanius. Id. 5, v. 564.

Politorium, a city of the Latins destroyed by the Romans, before Christ 639. Liv. 1, c. 33.

Polinea, a prostitute, &c. Juv. 2, v. 68.

Polla Argentaria, the wife of the poet Lucan. She assisted her husband in correcting the three first books of his Pharsalia. Stat. Sylv. 1 & 2.

Pollentia, now Polezza, a town of Liguria in Italy, famous for wool. There was a celebrated battle fought there between the Romans and Alaric king of the Huns, about the 403rd year of the christian era, in which the former, according to some, obtained the victory. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 48.—Suet. Tib. 37.—Sill. 8, v. 508.—Cic. 21, Fam. 12.—A town of Majorca. Plin. & Mela.
—Of Picenum. Liv. 39, c. 44. l. 47, c. 27.

Polles, a Greek poet whose writings were so obscure and unintelligible that his name became proverbial. Suidas.

Pollio C. Asinius, a Roman consul under the reign of Augustus, who distinguished himself as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favoured the cause of Antony against Augustus. He patronized, with great liberality, the poets Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the first who raised a public library at Rome, and indeed his example was afterwards followed by many of the emperors. In his library were placed the statues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only person who was honoured there during his lifetime. He was with J. Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon. He was greatly esteemed by Augustus, when he had become one of his adherents, after the ruin of Antony. Pollio wrote some tragedies, orations, and a history, which was divided into 17 books. All those compositions are lost, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the 60th year of his age, A.D. 4. He is the person in whose honour Virgil has inscribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Augustus and Antony during his consulship. The poet, it is supposed by some, makes mention of a son of the consul born about this time, and is lavish in his excursions into futurity, and his predictions of approaching prosperity. Paterc. 2, c. 86.—Horat. 2, ed. 1, sat. 10, l. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 3 & 4.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Quint. 10.—Annus, a man accused of sedition before Tiberius, and acquitted. He afterwards conspired against Nero, &c. Tacit. 6, c. 9. l. 15, c. 56.—Vedius, one of the friends of Augustus, who used to feed his fishes with human flesh. This cruelty was discovered when one of his servants broke a glass in the presence of Augustus, who had been invited to a feast. The master ordered the servant to be seized; but he threw himself at the feet of the emperor, and begged him to interfere, and not to suffer him to be devoured by fishes.

Upon this the causes of his apprehension were examined, and Augustus, astonished at the barbarity of his favourite, caused his servant to be dismissed, all the fish-ponds to be filled up, and the crystal glasses of Pollio to be broken to pieces.—A man who poisoned Britannicus, at the instigation of Nero.—An historian in the age of Constantine the Great.—A sophist in the age of Pompey the Great.—A friend of the emperor Vespasian.

Pollus Felix, a friend of the poet Statius, to whom he dedicated his second Sylva.

Pollupex, now Final, a town of Genoa.

Pollutia, a daughter of L. Verus, put to death after her husband Rubellius Plautus, by order of Nero, &c. Tacit. 16. Ann. c. 10 & 11.

Pollux, a son of Jupiter by Leda the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Castor. Vid. Castor.—A Greek writer, who flourished A.D. 186, in the reign of Commodus, and died in the 58th year of his age. He was born at Naucratis, and taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote a useful work called Onomasticon, of which the best edition is that of Hemsterhusius, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1706.

Poltis, a king of Thrace, in the time of the Trojan war.

Polus, a celebrated Grecian actor.—A sophist of Agrigentum.

Polusca, a town of Latium, formerly the capital of the Volsci. The inhabitants were called Pollustini. Liv. 2, c. 39.

Polyænus, a native of Macedonia, who wrote eight books in Greek of stratagems, which he dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, while they were making war against the Parthians. He wrote also other books which have been lost, among which was a history, with a description of the city of Thebes. The best editions of his stratagems are those of Masvicius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1690, and of Murisima, 12mo, Berlin. 1756.—A friend of Philopœmen.—An orator in the age of Julius Cæsar. He wrote in three books an account of Antony's expedition in Parthia, and likewise published orations.—A mathematician, who afterwards followed the tenets of Epicurus, and disregarded geometry as a false and useless study. Cic. in Acad. Quart. 4.

Polybides, a general after the death of Agesipolis the Lacedæmonian. He reduced Olynthus.

Polybius, or Polybus, a king of Corinth, who married Peribœa, whom some have called Merope. He was son of Mercury by Chthonophyle, the daughter of Sicyon king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children, to adopt and educate as her own son, (Edipus, who had been found by his shepherds exposed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talauus son of Bias king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adrastus, who had been banished from his throne, and who had fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66.—Pans. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Seneca, in Edip. 812.

Polybius, a native of Megalopolis in Peloponnesus, son of Lycortas. He was early initiated in the duties, and made acquainted with the qualifications, of a statesman, by his father, who was a strong supporter of the Achaean league, and under him Philopœmen was taught the art of war. In Macedonia he distinguished himself by his valour against the Romans, and when Perseus had been conquered, he was carried to the capital of Italy as a prisoner of war. But he was not long buried in the obscurity of a dungeon. Scipio and Fabius were acquainted with his uncommon abilities as a warrior and as a man of learning, and they made him their friend by kindness and attention. Polybius was not insensible to their merit; he accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and was present at the taking of Carthage and Numantia. In the midst of his prosperity, however, he felt the distresses of his country, which had been reduced into a Roman province, and, like a true patriot, he relieved its wants, and eased its servitude by making use of the influence which he had acquired by his acquaintance with the most powerful Romans. After the death of his friend and benefactor Scipio, he retired from Rome, and passed the rest of his days at Megalopolis, where he enjoyed the comforts and honours which every good man can receive from the gratitude of his citizens, and from the self-satisfaction which attends a humane and benevolent heart. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 124 years before Christ, of a wound which he had received by a fall from his horse. He wrote a universal history in Greek, divided into 40 books, which began with the wars of Rome with the Carthaginians, and finished with the conquest of Macedonia by Paulus. The greatest part of this valuable history is lost; the five first books are extant, and of the 12 following the fragments are numerous. The history of Polybius is admired for its authenticity, and he is, perhaps, the only historian among the Greeks who was experimentally and professedly acquainted with the military operations and the political measures of which he makes mention. He has been recommended in every age and country as the best master in the art of war, and nothing can more effectually prove the esteem in which he was held among the Romans, than to mention that Brutus the murderer of Cæsar perused his history with the greatest attention, epitomized it, and often retired from the field where he had drawn his sword against Octavius and Antony, to read the instructive pages which describe the great actions of his ancestors. Polybius, however great and entertaining, is sometimes censured for his unnecessary digressions, for his uncouth and ill-digested narrations, for his negligence, and the inaccurate arrangement of his words. But everywhere there is instruction to be found, information to be collected, and curious facts to be obtained, and it reflects not much honour upon Livy for calling the historian, from whom he has copied whole books almost word for word, without gratitude or acknowledgment, audacissimum spernendus auctor. Dionysius also, of Halicarnassus, is one of his most violent accusers; but the historian has rather exposed his ignorance of true criticism, than discovered inaccuracy or inelegance. The best editions of Polybius are those of Gronovius, 3 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1670; of Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo, 1764; and of Schweighæuser, 7 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1785. Plut. in Phil. in præc.—Liv. 30, c. 45.—Paus. 8, c. 30.—A freedman of Augustus. Suet.—A physician, disciple, and successor of Hippocrates.—A soothsayer of Corinth, who foretold to his sons the fate that attended them in the Trojan war.

Polybos, a daughter of Amyclas and Diomedes, sister to Hyacinthus. Paus. 3, c. 19.

Polybotes. Vid. Polyperetes.

Polybotes, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who crushed him under a part of the island of Cos, as he was walking across the Ægean. Paus. 1, c. 2. Hygin. in præc. fab.

Polybus, a king of Thebes in Egypt in the time of the Trojan war. Hom. Od. 22, v. 284.—

One of Penelope's sisters. Ovid. Heroid. 1.—A king of Sicily.—A king of Corinth. Vid. Polybius.

Polyceon, a son of Lelex, who succeeded his brother Myles. He received divine honours after death, with his wife Messene, at Lacedæmon, where he had reigned. Paus. 4, c. 1, &c.—A son of Brutus, who married a daughter of Hyllus.

Polycarpus, a famous Greek writer, born at Smyrna, and educated at the expense of a rich but pious lady. Some suppose that he was St. John's disciple. He became bishop of Smyrna, and went to Rome to settle the festival of Easter, but to no purpose. He was condemned to be burnt at Smyrna, A.D. 167. His epistle to the Philipians is simple and modest, yet replete with useful precepts and rules for the conduct of life. The best edition of Polycarp's epistle is that of Oxon, 8vo, 1708, being annexed to the works of Ignatius.

Polycaste, the youngest of the daughters of Nestor. According to some authors she married Telemachus, when he visited her father's court in quest of Ulysses.

Polychares, a rich Messenian, said to have been the cause of the war which was kindled between the Spartans and his countrymen, which was called the first Messenian war.

Polydora, the mother of Thessalus, &c.

Polydorus, an Athenian in the time of Demetrius, &c. Polyæm. 5.—A famous athlete, often crowned at the four solemn games of the Greeks. He had a statue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 1.

Polydorus, a celebrated statuary of Sicily, about 232 years before Christ. He was universally reckoned the most skillful artist of his profession among the ancients, and the second rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had represented a body-guard of the king of Persia, was so happily executed, and so nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a most perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was acquainted with architecture. Paus. 2 & 6.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Another who lived about 30 years after.—A favourite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.

Polydorus, an historian of Larissa. Athen. 12.—Ælian. 16, c. 41.

Polydotes, a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which attended him. He became very powerful, and made himself master, not only of the neighbouring islands, but also of some cities on the coast of Asia. He had a fleet of 100 ships of war, and was so universally respected, that Amasis the king of Egypt made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continued prosperity, advised him to chequer his enjoyments, by relinquishing some of his most favourite objects. Polydotes complied, and threw into the sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels. The voluntary loss of so precious a seal afflicted him for some time, but in a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found. Amasis no sooner heard this, than he rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos, and observed, that sooner or later his good fortune would vanish. Some time after Polycrates visited Magnesia on the Mæander, where he had been invited by Orontes the governor. He was shamefully put to death, 522 years before Christ, merely because the governor wished to terminate the prosperity of Polycrates. The daughter of Polycrates had dissuaded her father from going to the house of Orontes, on account of the bad dreams which she had had, but her advice was disregarded. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 3, c. 22, &c.

—A sophist of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Busiris and Clytemnestra. Quintil. 2, c. 17.—An ancient statuary.

Polycræta, or Polyorita, a young woman of Naxos, who became the wife of Diognetus the general of the Erythreans, &c. Polyæn. 8.—Another woman of Naxos, who died through the excess of joy. Plut. de Clar. Mul.

Polyoritus, a man who wrote the life of Dionysius the tyrant of Sicily.—Diog.

Polytor, the husband of Stygna, one of the Danaïdes. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—The father of Pisander, one of Penelope's suitors.—An athlete of Elis. It is said that he obtained a victory at Olympia by bribing his adversary Sosander, who was superior to him in strength and courage. Paus. 5, c. 21.

Polydæmon, an Assyrian prince killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met. 5, Jab. 3.

Polydæmas, a Trojan, son of Antenor by Theano the sister of Hecuba. He married Lycaste, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accused by some of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares Phry.—A son of Panthous, born the same night as Hector. He was inferior in valour to none of the Trojans, except Hector, and his prudence, the wisdom of his counsels, and the firmness of his mind, claimed equal admiration, and proved most salutary to his unfortunate and misguided countrymen. He was at last killed by Ajax, after he had slaughtered a great number of the enemy. Diclys Cræ. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 22, &c.—A celebrated athlete, son of Nicias, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fist, and it is said that he could stop with his hand a chariot in its most rapid course. He was one day with some of his friends in a cave, when on a sudden a large piece of rock came tumbling down; and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the fallen fragment in his arms. His prodigious strength, however, was insufficient, and he was instantly crushed to pieces under the rock. Paus. 6, c. 5.—One of Alexander's officers, intimate with Parmenio. Curt. 4, c. 15.

Polydama, a wife of Thonis king of Egypt. It is said that she gave Helen a certain powder, which had the wonderful power of driving away care and melancholy. Homer. Od. 4, v. 228.

Polydeutes, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclides. He was son of Eunomus. Paus. 3, c. 7.—A son of Magnes, king of the island of Seriphos. He received with great kindness Danae and her son Perseus, who had been exposed on the sea by Acrisius. Virg. Persæus. He took particular care of the education of Perseus; but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehensive of his resentment. Some time after he paid his addresses to Danae, and when she rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys the brother of Polydeutes, who had himself saved her from the sea-waters, opposed her ravisher and armed himself in her defence. At this critical moment, Perseus arrived, and with Medusa's head he turned into stones Polydeutes, with the associates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys, who had shown himself so active in the cause of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242.—Hygin. Fab. 63, &c.—A sculptor of Greece. Plin.

Polydœcæa, a fountain of Laconia, near Therapne. Strab. 9.

Polydôra, a daughter of Peleus king of Thessaly, by Antigone the daughter of Eurtyon. She married the river Sperchius, by whom she had Mnesteus. Apollod.—One of the Oceanides. Hesiod.—A daughter of Meleager king of Calydon, who married Protesilaus. She killed herself when she heard that her husband was dead. The wife of Protesilaus is more commonly called Læodamia. Virg. Protesilaus. Paus. 4, c. 2.—A daughter of Perieres.—An island of the Propontis near Cyzicus.

Polydôrnus, a son of Alcamenes king of Sparta. He put an end to the war which had been carried on during 20 years, between Messenia and his subjects; and during his reign, the Lacedæmonians planted two colonies, one at Crotona, and the other at Locri. He was universally respected. He was assassinated by a nobleman, called Polemarchus. His son Eurycrates succeeded him 724 years before Christ. Paus. 3.—Herodot. 7, c. 204.—A celebrated carver of Rhodes, who with one stone made the famous statue of Laocoon and his children. Plin. 34, c. 8.—A son of Hippomedon, who went with the Epigoni to the second Theban war. Paus. 2.—A son of Cadmus and Hermione, who married Nycteis, by whom he had Labdacus the father of Laius. He had succeeded to the throne of Thebes, when his father had gone to Illyricum. Apollod. 3.—A brother of Jason of Phœzæ, who killed his brother and seized upon his possessions. Diad. 15.—A son of Priam killed by Achilles.

—Another son of Priam by Hecuba, or, according to others, by Laothoe the daughter of Altes king of Pedasus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was besieged by the Greeks, his father removed him to the court of Polymnestor king of Thrace, and also entrusted to the care of the monarch a large sum of money, and the greatest part of his treasures, till his country was freed from foreign invasion. No sooner was the death of Priam known in Thrace, than Polymnestor made himself master of the riches which were in his possession; and to ensure them the better, he assassinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the sea, where it was found by Hecuba. Virg. Hecuba. According to Virgil, the body of Polydorus was buried near the shore by his assassin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whose boughs dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. Virg. Polymnestor. Virg. Æn. 3, 21, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 432.—Homer. Il. 20.—Dictys Cræ. 2, c. 18.

Polygnôtus, a celebrated painter of Thasos, about 422 years before the christian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned one of the public porticoes of Athens with his paintings, in which he had represented the most striking events of the Trojan war. He particularly excelled in giving grace, liveliness, and expression to his pieces. The Athenians were so pleased with him, that they offered to reward his labours with whatever he pleased to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was composed of the representatives of the principal cities of Greece, ordered that Polynotus should be maintained at the public expense wherever he went.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plin. 33 & 34.—Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 10, c. 25, &c.—A statutory. Plin. 34.

Polygónus and Telegonus, sons of Proteus and Coronis, were killed by Hercules. Apollod.

Polyhymnia and Polymnia, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over singing and rhetoric, and was deemed the inventress of harmony. She was represented veiled in white, holding a sceptre in her left hand, and with her right raised up, as if ready to harangue. She had a crown of jewels on her head. Herod. Theog. 75 & 97.—Plut. in Symp.—Horat. 1, od. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 9 & 53.

Polydus, a physician who brought back to life Glaucus the son of Minos, by applying to his body a certain herb, with which he had seen a serpent restore life to another which was dead. Vid. Glaucus. Apollod. 3, c. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 43.

—A son of Hercules by one of the daughters of Thesius. Apollod.—A Corinthian soothsayer, called also Polybius.—A dithyrambic poet, painter, and musician.

Polydāus, a son of Hercules and Cratæ daughter of Thespius.

Polydames, an officer appointed to take care of Egypt after it had been conquered by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 8.

Polydæda, a daughter of Antolycus, who married Eson, by whom she had Jason. She survived her husband only a few days. Apollod. 1, c. 13.

Polymedon, one of Priam's illegitimate children.

Polyphœla, one of Diana's companions. She was daughter of Phylas, and had a son by Mercury. Homer. Il. 16.—A daughter of Æolus, seduced by Ulysses.—A daughter of Actor. She was the first wife of Peleus the father of Achilles.

Polymanestes, a Greek poet of Colophon. Paus. 1, c. 14.—A native of Thera, father of Battus, or Aristotle, by Phronima the daughter of Etearchus king of Oaxus. Herodot. 4, c. 150.

Polymerstor, a king of the Thracian Chersonesus, who married Ilione, the eldest of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks besieged Troy, Priam sent the greatest part of his treasures, together with Polydorus, the youngest of his sons, to Thrace, where they were entrusted to the care of Polymerstor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law; but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become master of the riches which were in his possession. At that time, the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy, followed by all the captives, among whom was Hecuba the mother of Polydorus. The fleet stopped on the coast of Thrace, where one of the female captives discovered on the shore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymerstor had thrown into the sea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, and Hecuba, who recollected the frightful dreams which she had had on the preceding night, did not doubt but Polymerstor was the cruel assassin. She resolved to revenge her son's death, and immediately she called out Polymerstor, as if wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymerstor to be banished into a distant island for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and observes, that when Polydorus was sent to Thrace, Ilione his sister took him instead of her son Deiphilus, who was of the same age, apprehensive of her husband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the imposition; he looked upon Polydorus as his own son, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the destruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wished the house and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra the daughter of Agamemnon to Polymerstor, if he would destroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately despatched his own son Deiphilus, whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who passed as the son of Polymerstor, consulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead, his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the answer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the measures she had pursued to save his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymerstor by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Hecub.—Hygin. fab. 102.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 45, &c.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 430, &c.—A king of Arcadia, succeeded on the throne by Ecmis. Paus. 8.—A young Milesian who took a hare in running, and afterwards obtained a prize at the Olympic games.

Polyneices, a son of Œdipus king of Thebes by Jocasta. He inherited his father's throne with his brother Eteocles, and it was mutually agreed between the two brothers, that they should reign each a year alternately. Eteocles first ascended the throne by right of seniority; but when the year was expired, he refused to resign the crown to his brother. Polyneices, upon this, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Admetus the king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched to Thebes. The command of this army was divided among seven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the seven gates of the city of Thebes. The battle was decided by a single combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. Vid. Eteocles. Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Eurip. Phœnix.—Senec. in Theb.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 68, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 20. l. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.

Polyperchon, a famous thief, called also Procrustes, who plundered all the travellers about the Cephissus, and near Eleusis in Attica. He was killed by Theseus. Ovid calls him father of Procrustes, and Apollodorus of Sinus. Vid. Procrustes. Paus. 1, c. 38.—Ovid. in Ib. 409.—Diod. 4.—Plut. in Theb.

Polyperchon, or Polyasperchon, one of the officers of Alexander. Antipater, at his death, appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia, in preference to his own son Cassander. Polyperchon, though old, and a man of experience, showed great ignorance in the administration of the government. He became cruel, not only to the Greeks, or such as opposed his ambitious views, but even to the helpless and innocent children and friends of Alexander, to whom he was indebted for his rise and military reputation. He was killed in a battle 309 B.C. Curt.—Diod. 17, &c.—Justin. 13.

Polyphēmus, a celebrated Cyclops, king of all the Cyclops in Sicily, and son of Neptune and Thoosa the daughter of Phorcys. He is represented as a monster of strength, of tall stature, and one eye in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human flesh, and kept his flocks on the coasts of Sicily, when Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, with 12 of his companions, visited the coast, and were seized by the Cyclops, who confined them in his cave, and daily devoured two of them. Ulysses would have shared the fate of his companions, had he not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while he was asleep. Polyphēmus was awakened by the sudden pain; he stopped the entrance of his cave, but Ulysses made his escape by creeping between the legs of the rams of the Cyclops, as they were led out to feed on the mountains. Polyphēmus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addresses were disregarded, and the nymph shunned his presence. The Cyclops was more earnest, and when he saw Galatæa surrender herself to the pleasures of Acis, he crushed his rival with a piece of a broken rock. *Theocrit. 1.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 772.—Homer. Polyphonta, one of Diana's nymphs, daughter of Hipponus and Thraosa.

Polyposes, a son of Pirithous and Hippodamia, at the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—Paus. 10, v. 26.—A son of Apollo by Pythia.—One of the Trojans whom Æneas saw when he visited the infernal regions. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 484.

Polyperchon. Vid. Polyperchon.

Polystratus, a Macedonian soldier, who found Darius after he had been stabbed by Bessus, and gave him water to drink, and carried the last injunctions of the dying monarch to Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 13.—An epicurean philosopher who flourished B.C. 238.

Polyteonius, an artist of Colophon, who married Ædon the daughter of Pandarus.

Polytion, a friend of Alcibiades, with whom he profaned the mysteries of Ceres. Paus. 1, c. 2.

Polytimætus, a river of Sogdiana. Curt. 6, c. 4.

Polyphron, a prince killed by his nephew Alexander the tyrant of Phææ.

Polytrōpus, a man sent by the Lacedæmonians with an army against the Arcadians. He was killed at Orchomenus. Diod. 15.

Polyxēna, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Achilles became enamoured of her, and solicited her hand, and their marriage would have been consummated, had not Hector her brother opposed it. Polyxēna, according to some authors, accompanied her father when he went to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his son Hector. Some time after, the Grecian hero came into the temple of Apollo to obtain a sight of the Trojan princess, but he was murdered there by Paris; and Polyxēna, who had returned his affection, was so afflicted at his death, that she went and sacrificed herself on his tomb. Some, however, suppose that this sacrifice was not voluntary, but that the maids of Achilles appeared to the Greeks as they were going to embark, and demanded of them the sacrifice of Polyxēna. The princess, who was in the number of the captives, was upon this dragged to her lover's tomb, and there immolated by Neoptolemus the son of Achilles. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 5, &c.—Dionys. Cret. 3 & 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 321.—Catul. ep. 65.—Hygin. fab. 90.

Polyxenidas, a Syrian general, who flourished B.C. 102.

Polyxēnus, one of the Greek princes during the Trojan war. His father's name was Agasthenes. Homer. Il. 2.—Paus. 5, c. 3.—A son of Medea by Jason.—A young Athenian who became blind, &c. Plut. in Parall.—A general of Dionysius, from whom he revolted.

Polyxo, a priestess of Apollo's temple in Lemnos. She was also nurse to queen Hyppisyle. It was by her advice that the Lemnian women murdered all their husbands. *Apollon. 1.—Flacc. 2.—Hygin. fab. 15.—One of the Atlantides.—A native of Argos, who married Tiepolemus son of Hercules. She followed him to Rhodes, after the murder of his uncle Lycimnius, and when he departed for the Trojan war with the rest of the Greek princes, she became the sole mistress of the kingdom. After the Trojan war, Helen fled from Peloponnesus to Rhodes, where Polyxo reigned. Polyxo detained her, and to punish her as being the cause of a war, in which Tiepolemus had perished, she ordered her to be hanged on a tree by her female servants, disguised in the habit of Furies. Vid. Helena. *Paus. 5, c. 19.—The wife of Nycteus.—One of the wives of Danaus.

Polyzēus, a Greek poet of Rhodes. He had written a poem on the origin and birth of Bacchus, Venus, the Muses, &c. Some of his verses are quoted by Athenæus. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 14.—An Athenian archon.

Pomaxæthres, a Parthian soldier, who killed Crassus, according to some. Plut.

Pometia, Pometil, Pometia Suesasa, a town of the Volsci in Latium, totally destroyed by the Romans, because it had revolted. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.—Liv. 2, c. 17.

Pometina, one of the tribes of the people at Rome.

Pomōna, a nymph at Rome, who was supposed to preside over gardens and to be the goddess of all sorts of fruit trees. She had a temple at Rome, and a regular priest called Flamen Pomonialis, who offered sacrifices to her divinity, for the preservation of fruit. She was generally represented as sitting on a basket full of flowers and fruit, and holding a bough in one hand, and apples in the other. Pomona was particularly delighted with the cultivation of the earth; she disdainful the toils of the field, and the fatigues of hunting. Many of the gods of the country endeavoured to gain her affection, but she received their addresses with coldness. Vertumnus was the only one who, by assuming different shapes, and introducing himself into her company, under the form of an old woman, prevailed upon her to break her vow of celibacy and to marry him. This deity was unknown among the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 628, &c.—Festus. de V. Sig.

Pompela, a daughter of Sextus Pompey 13

Scribonia. She was promised to Marcellus, as a means of procuring a reconciliation between her father and the triumvirs, but she married Scribonius Libo.—A daughter of Pompey the Great, Julius Cæsar's third wife. She was accused of incontinence, because Clodius had introduced himself in women's clothes into the room where she was celebrating the mysteries of Cybele. Cæsar repudiated her upon this accusation. Plut.—The wife of Annæus Seneca, was the daughter of Pompeius Paullinus.—There was a portico at Rome, called Pompæia, much frequented by all orders of people. Ovid. Art. Am. v. 67.—Mart. xi. ep. 48.

Pompæia lex, by Pompey the Great, de ambitu, A.U.C. 701. It ordained that whatever person had been convicted of the crime of ambitus, should be pardoned, provided he could impeach two others of the same crime, and occasion the condemnation of one of them.—Another by the same, A.U.C. 702, which forbade the use of laudatores in trials, or persons who gave a good character of the prisoner then impeached.—Another by the same, A.U.C. 683. It restored to the tribunes their original power and authority, of which they had been deprived by the Cornelian law.—Another by the same, A.U.C. 701. It shortened the forms of trials, and enacted that the three first days of a trial should be employed in examining witnesses, and it allowed only one day to the parties to make their accusation and defence. The plaintiff was confined to two hours, and the defendant to three. This law had for its object the riots, which happened from the quarrels of Clodius and Milo.—Another by the same, A.U.C. 698. It required that the judges should be the richest of every century, contrary to the usual form. It was, however, requisite that they should be such as the Aurelian law prescribed.—Another of the same, A.U.C. 701. Pompey was by this empowered to continue in the government of Spain five years longer.

Pompæianus Jupiter, a large statue of Jupiter, near Pompey's theatre, whence it received its name. Plin. 34, c. 7.

Pompæianus, a Roman knight of Antioch, raised to offices of the greatest trust, under the emperor Aurelius, whose daughter Lucilla he married. He lived in great popularity at Rome, and retired from the court when Commodus succeeded to the imperial crown. He ought, according to Julian's opinion, to have been chosen and adopted as successor by M. Aurelius.—A general of Maxentius, killed by Constantine.—A Roman put to death by Caracalla.

Pompæii, or Pompæium, a town of Campania, built, as some suppose, by Hercules, and so called because the hero there exhibited the long procession (pompa) of the herds of Ceryon, which he had obtained by conquest. It was partly demolished by an earthquake, A.D. 63, and afterwards rebuilt. Sixteen years after it was swallowed up by another earthquake, which accompanied one of the eruptions of mount Vesuvius. Herculaneum, in its neighbourhood, shared the same fate. The people of the town were then assembled in a theatre, where public spectacles were exhibited. Vid. Herculaneum. Liv. 9, c. 38.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Dionys. 1.—Seneca. Quæst. 4.—Solin. 8.

Pompæiopolis, a town of Cilicia, formerly called Sola. Mela, 1, c. 12.—Another in Paphlagonia, originally called Eupatoria, which name was exchanged when Pompey conquered Mithridates.

Q. Pompeius, a consul who carried on war against the Numantines, and made a shameful treaty. He is the first of that noble family, of whom mention is made. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Cneus, a Roman general, who made war against the Marsi, and triumphed over the Piceni. He declared himself against Cæna and Marius, and supported the interest of the republic. He was surnamed Strabo, because he squinted. While he was marching against Marius, a plague broke out in his army, and raged with such violence, that it carried away 11,000 men in a few days. He was killed by a flash of lightning, and as he had behaved with cruelty while in power, the people dragged his body through the streets of Rome with an iron hook, and threw it into the Tiber. Patere, 2.—Plut. in Pomp.—Rufus, a Roman consul with Sylla. He was sent to finish the Marsian war, but the army mutinied at the instigation of Pompeius Strabo, whom he was to succeed in command, and he was assassinated by some of the soldiers. Appian. Civ. 1.—A general who succeeded Metellus in Spain, and was the occasion of a war with Numantia.—Another general, taken prisoner by Mithridates.—Sextus, a governor of Spain, who cured himself of the gout by placing himself in corn above the knee. Plin. 22, c. 25.—Rufus, a grandson of Sylla.—A tribune of the soldiers in Nero's reign, deprived of his office when Piso's conspiracy was discovered. Tacit.—A consul praised for his learning and abilities. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 1.—A son of Theophanes of Mitylene, famous for his intimacy with Pompey the Great, and for his writings. Tacit. Ann. 6.—A tribune of a pretorian cohort under Galba.—A Roman knight, put to death by the emperor Claudius for his adultery with Messalina. Tacit. 11, Ann.—Cneus, surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits, was son of Pompeius Strabo and Lucilla. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and fought with success and bravery under his father, whose courage and military prudence he imitated. He began his career with great popularity; the beauty and elegance of his person gained him admirers, and by pleading at the bar he displayed his eloquence, and received the most unbounded applause. In the disturbances which agitated Rome, by the ambition and avarice of Marius and Sylla, Pompey followed the interest of the latter, and by levying three legions for his service he gained his friendship and his protection. In the 26th year of his age, he conquered Sicily, which was in the power of Marius and his adherents, and in 40 days he regained all the territories of Africa, which had forsaken the interest of Sylla. This rapid success astonished the Romans, and Sylla, who admired and dreaded the rising power of Pompey, recalled him to Rome. Pompey immediately obeyed, and the dictator, by saluting him with the appellation of the Great, showed to the world what expectations he formed from the mature age of his victorious lieutenant. This sounding title was not sufficient to gratify the ambition of Pompey; he demanded a triumph, and when Sylla refused to grant it, he emphatically exclaimed, that the sun shone with more ardour at his rising than at his setting. His assurance gained what petitions and entreaties could not obtain, and he was the first Roman knight who, without an office under the appointment of the senate, marched in triumphal procession through the streets of Rome. He now appeared, not as a dependant, but as a rival of the dictator, and his opposition to his measures finally excluded him from his will. After the death of Sylla, Pompey supported himself against the remains of the Marian faction, which was headed by Lepidus. He defeated them, put an end to the war which the revolt of Sertorius in Spain had occasioned, and obtained a second triumph, though still a private citizen, about 73 years before the christian era. He was soon after made consul, and in that office he restored the tribunitial power to its original dignity, and in 40 days removed the pirates from the Mediterranean, where they had reigned for many years, and by their continual plunder and audacity, almost destroyed the whole naval power of Rome. While he prosecuted the piratical war, and extirpated these maritime robbers in their obscure retreat in Cilicia, Pompey was called to greater undertakings, and by the influence of his friends at Rome, and of the tribune Manilius, he was empowered to finish the war against two of the most powerful monarchs of Asia—Mithridates king of Pontus, and Tigranes king of Armenia. In this expedition Pompey showed himself no ways inferior to Lucullus, who was then at the head of the Roman armies, and who resigned with reluctance an office which would have made him the conqueror of Mithridates and the master of all Asia. His operations against the king of Pontus were bold and vigorous, and in a general engagement the Romans so totally defeated the enemy; that the Asiatic monarch escaped with difficulty from the field of battle. Viz. Mithridaticum bellum. Pompey did not lose sight of the advantages which despatch would ensure; he entered Armenia, received the submission of king Tigranes, and after he had conquered the Albanians and Iberians, visited countries which were scarce known to the Romans, and, like a master of the world, disposed of kingdoms and provinces, and received homage from 12 crowned heads at once; he entered Syria, and pushed his conquests as far as the Red sea. Part of Arabia was subdued, Judea became a Roman province, and when he had now nothing to fear from Mithridates, who had voluntarily destroyed himself, Pompey returned to Italy with all the pomp and majesty of an eastern conqueror. The Romans dreaded his approach; they knew his power and his influence among his troops, and they feared the return of another tyrannical Sylla. Pompey, however, banished their fears; he disbanded his army, and the conqueror of Asia entered Rome like a private citizen. This modest and prudent behaviour gained him more friends and adherents than the most unbounded power, aided with profusion and liberality. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, for three successive days, gazed with astonishment on the riches and the spoils which their conquests had acquired in the east, and expressed their raptures at the sight of the different nations, habits, and treasures which preceded the conqueror's chariot. But it was not this alone which gratified the ambition, and flattered the pride of the Romans; the advantages of their conquests were more lasting than an empty show, and when 20,000 talents were brought into the public treasury, and when the revenues of the republic were raised from 50 to 85 millions of drachmas, Pompey became more powerful, more flattered, and more envied. To strengthen himself, and to triumph over his enemies, Pompey soon after united his interests with that of Caesar and Crassus, and formed the first triumvirate, by solemnly swearing that their attachment should be mutual, their cause common, and their union permanent. The agreement was completed by the marriage of Pompey with Julia the daughter of Caesar, and the provinces of the republic were arbitrarily divided among the triumvirs. Pompey was allotted Africa and the two Spains, while Crassus repaired to Syria, to add Parthia to the empire of Rome, and Caesar remained satisfied with the rest, and the continuation of his power as governor of Gaul for five additional years. But this powerful confederacy was soon broken; the sudden death of Julia, and the total defeat of Crassus in Syria, shattered the political bands which held the jarring interest of Caesar and Pompey united. Pompey dreaded his father-in-law, and yet he affected to despise him; and by suffering anarchy to prevail in Rome, he convinced his fellow-citizens of the necessity of investing him with dictatorial power. But while the conqueror of Mithridates was as a sovereign at Rome, the adherents of Caesar were not silent. They demanded that either the consulship should be given to him, or that he should be continued in the government of Gaul. This just demand would perhaps have been granted, but Cato opposed it, and when Pompey sent for the two legions which he had lent to Caesar, the breach became more wide, and a civil war inevitable. Caesar was privately preparing to meet his enemies, while Pompey remained indolent, and gratified his pride in seeing all Italy celebrate his recovery from an indisposition by universal rejoicings. But he was soon roused from his inactivity, and it was now time to find his friends, if anything could be obtained from the caprice and the fickleness of a people which he had once delighted and amused, by the exhibition of games and spectacles in a theatre which could contain 20,000 spectators. Caesar was now near Rome, he had crossed the Rubicon, which was a declaration of hostilities, and Pompey, who had once boasted that he could raise legions to his assistance by stamping on the ground with his foot, fled from the city with precipitation, and retired to Brundisium with the consuls and part of the senators. His cause, indeed, was popular; he had been invested with discretionary power, the senate had entreated him to protect the republic against the usurpation and tyranny of Caesar, and Cato, by embracing his cause, and appearing in his camp, seemed to indicate that he was the friend of the republic, and the assertor of Roman liberty and independence. But Caesar was now master of Rome, and in 60 days all Italy acknowledged his power, and the conqueror hastened to Spain, there to defeat the interest of Pompey, and to alienate the hearts of his soldiers. He was too successful, and when he had gained to his cause the western parts of the Roman empire, Caesar crossed Italy and arrived in Greece, where Pompey had retired, supported by all the power of the east, the wishes of the republican Romans, and a numerous and well-disciplined army. Though superior in numbers, he refused to give the enemy battle, while Caesar continually harassed him, and even attacked his camp. Pompey repelled him with great success, and he might have decided the war, if he had continued to pursue the enemy, while their confusion was great, and their escape almost impossible. Want of provisions obliged Caesar to advance towards Thessaly; Pompey pursued him, and in the plains of Pharsalia the two armies engaged. The whole was conducted against the advice and approbation of Pompey; and by suffering his troops to wait for the approach of the enemy, he deprived his soldiers of that advantage which the army of Caesar obtained by running to the charge with spirit, vigour, and animation. The cavalry of Pompey soon gave way, and the general retired to his camp, overwhelmed with grief and shame. But here there was no safety; the conqueror pushed on every side, and Pompey disguised himself, and fled to the sea-coast, whence he passed to Egypt, where he hoped to find a safe asylum, till better and more favourable moments returned, in the court of Ptolemy, a prince whom he had once protected and ensured on his throne. When Ptolemy was told that Pompey claimed his protection, he consulted his ministers, and had the baseness to betray and to deceive him. A boat was sent to fetch him on shore, and the Roman general left his galley, after an affectionate and tender parting with his wife Cornelia. The Egyptian sailors sat in sullen silence in the boat, and when Pompey disembarked, Achilles and Septimius assassinated him. His wife, who had followed him with her eyes to the shore, was a spectator of the bloody scene, and she hastened away from the bay of Alexandria, not to share his miserable fate. He died B.C. 48, in the 58th or 59th year of his age, the day after his birthday. His head was cut off and sent to Cæsar, who turned away from it with horror, and shed a flood of tears. The body was left for some time naked on the sea-shore, till the humanity of Philip, one of his freedmen, and an old soldier who had often followed his standard to victory, raised a burning pile, and deposited his ashes under a mound of earth. Cæsar erected a monument on his remains, and the emperor Adrian, two centuries after, when he visited Egypt, ordered it to be repaired at his own expense, and paid particular honour to the memory of a great and good man. The character of Pompey is that of an intriguing and artful general, and the oris probi and animo inverecundo of Sallust, short and laconic as it may appear, is the best and most descriptive picture of his character. He wished it to appear that he obtained all his honours and dignity from merit alone, and as the free and unprejudiced favour of the Romans, while he secretly claimed them by faction and intrigue; and he who wished to appear the patron and an example of true discipline and ancient simplicity, was not ashamed publicly to bribe the populace to gain an election, or support his favourites. Yet amidst all this dissimulation, which was perhaps but congenial with the age, we perceive many other striking features; Pompey was kind and clement to the conquered, and generous to his captives, and he buried at his own expense Mithridates, with all the pomp and solemnity which the greatness of his power and the extent of his dominions seemed to claim. He was an enemy to flattery, and when his character was impeached by the malevolence of party, he condescended, though consul, to appear before the censorial tribunal, and to show that his actions and measures were not subversive of the peace and the independence of the people. In his private character he was as remarkable; he lived with great temperance and moderation, and his house was small, and not ostentatiously furnished. He destroyed with great prudence the papers which were found in the camp of Sertorius, lest mischievous curiosity should find causes to accuse the innocent, and to meditate their destruction. With great disinterestedness he refused the presents which princes and monarchs offered to him, and he ordered them to be added to the public revenue. He might have seen a better fate, and terminated his days with more glory, if he had not acted with such imprudence when the flames of civil war were first kindled; and he reflected with remorse, after the battle of Pharsalia, upon his want of usual sagacity and military prudence, in fighting at such a distance from the sea, and in leaving the fortified places of Dyrrachium, to meet in the open plain an enemy, without provisions, without friends, and without resources. The misfortunes which attended him after the conquest of Mithridates, are attributed by christian writers to his impiety in profaning the temple of the Jews, and in entering with the insolence of a conqueror the Holy of Holies, where even the sacred person of the high priest of the nation was not admitted but upon the most solemn occasions. His duplicity of behaviour in regard to Cicero is deservedly censured, and he should not have violently sacrificed to party and sedition a Roman whom he had ever found his firmest friend and adherent. In his meeting with Lucullus he cannot but be taxed with pride, and he might have paid more deference and more honour to a general who was as able and more entitled than himself to finish the Mithridatic war. Pompey married four different times. His first matrimonial connection was with Antistia the daughter of the pretor Antistius, whom he divorced, with great reluctance, to marry Æmylia the daughter-in-law of Sylla. Æmylia died in child-bed; and Pompey's marriage with Julia the daughter of Cæsar was a step more of policy than affection. Yet Julia loved Pompey with great tenderness, and her death in child-bed was the signal of war between her husband and her father. He afterwards married Cornelia the daughter of Metellus Scipio, a woman commended for her virtues, beauty, and accomplishments. *Plut. in Vita. Flor. 4. Paterc. 2, c. 29. Dio. Cass. Lucan. Appian. Cos. Bell. Civ. Cic. Orat. 68, ad Attic. 7, ep. 25. Ad Fam. 13, ep. 19. Eutrop. —*The two sons of Pompey the Great, called Cneus and Sextus, were masters of a powerful army, when the death of their father was known. They prepared to oppose the conqueror, but Cæsar pursued them with his usual vigour and success, and at the battle of Munda they were defeated, and Cneus was left among the slain. Sextus fled to Sicily, where he for some time supported himself; but the murder of Cæsar gave rise to new events, and if Pompey had been as prudent and as sagacious as his father, he might have become, perhaps, as great and as formidable. He treated with the triumvirs as an equal, and when Augustus and Antony had the imprudence to trust themselves without arms and without attendants in his ship, Pompey, by following the advice of his friend Menas, who wished him to cut off the illustrious persons who were masters of the world, and now in his power, might have made himself as absolute as Cæsar; but he refused, and observed it was unbecoming the son of Pompey to act with such duplicity. This friendly meeting of Pompey with two of the triumvirs was not productive of advantages to him; he wished to have no superior, and hostilities began. Pompey was at the head of 350 ships, and appeared so formidable to his enemies, and so confident of success in himself, that he called himself the son of Neptune, and the lord of the sea. He was, however, soon defeated in a naval engagement by Octavius and Lepidus, and of all his numerous fleet, only 17 sail accompanied his flight into Asia. Here for a moment he raised seditions, but Antony ordered him to be seized and put to death about 35 years before the christian era. *Plut. in Anton. &c. Paterc. 2, c. 55, &c. Flor. 4, c. 2, &c. Festus, a Latin grammarian, of whose treatise de verborum significatiōe, the best edition is in 4to, Amst. 1699.

Pompelōn, a town of Spain, now Pompeluna, the capital of Navarre. Plin. 3, c. 3.

Pompiilius Numa, the second king of Rome. Vid. Numa. The descendants of the monarch were called Pompiilius Sanguis, an expression applied by Horace to the Pisos. Art. Poet. v. 292.—Andronicus, a grammarian of Syria, who opened a school at Rome, and had Cicero and Cæsar among his pupils. Sueton.

Pompilia, a daughter of Numa Pompiilius. She married Numa Martius, by whom she had Ancus Martius the fourth king of Rome.

Pompius, a fisherman of Ionia. He carried into Miletus Ocyroe the daughter of Chæstias, of whom Apollo was enamoured; but before he had reached the shore, the god changed the boat into a rock, Pompius into a fish of the same name, and carried away Ocyroe. Plin. 6, c. 29, l. 9, c. 15, l. 32, c. 12.

Pompius, an Arcadian. Polyæn. 5.

Pomponia, the wife of Q. Cicero, sister to Pomponius Atticus. She punished with the greatest cruelty Philologus, the slave who had betrayed her husband to Antony, and she ordered him to cut his flesh by piecemeal, and afterwards to boil it and eat it in her presence.—A daughter of Pomponius Græcinus, in the age of Augustus, &c.—Another matron, banished from Rome by Domitian, and recalled by Nerva.

Pomponius, the father of Numa, advised his son to accept the regal dignity which the Roman ambassadors offered to him.—A celebrated Roman intimate with Cicero. He was surnamed Atticus from his long residence at Athens. Vid. Atticus.—Flaccus, a man appointed governor of Mœsia and Syria by Tiberius, because he had continued drinking and eating with him for two days without intermission. Suet. in Tib. 42.—A tribune of the people in the time of Servilius Ahala the consul.—Labco, a governor of Mœsia, accused of ill management in his province. He destroyed himself by opening his veins. Tacit. Ann. 6, v. 29.

—Mela, a Spaniard, who wrote a book on geography. Vid. Mela.—A proconsul of Africa, accused by the inhabitants of his province, and acquitted, &c.—A Roman who accused Manlius the dictator of cruelty. He triumphed over Sardinia, of which he was made governor. He escaped from Rome, and the tyranny of the triumvirs, by assuming the habit of a pretor, and by travelling with his servants disguised in the dress of victors with their faces.—Secundus, an officer in Germany in the age of Nero. He was honoured with a triumph for a victory over the barbarians of Germany. He wrote some poems greatly celebrated by the ancients for their beauty and elegance. They are lost.—A friend of C. Gracchus. He was killed in attempting to defend him. Plut. in Grac.—An officer taken prisoner by Mithridates.—A dissolute youth, &c. Horat. 1, sat. 4, v. 52.—Sextus, a lawyer, disciple to Papinian, &c.

Pomposianus, a Roman put to death by Domitian. He had before been made consul by Vespasian.

Pomptina. Vid. Pontina.

C. Pomptinus, a Roman officer, who conquered the Allobroges after the defeat of Catiine. Cic. 4, Att. 16, l. 6, ep. 3.

Pompus, a king of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 5.

Pons Ælius was built by the emperor Adrian at Rome. It was the second bridge of Rome in following the current of the Tiber. It is still to be seen, the largest and most beautiful in Rome.—

Æmylius, an ancient bridge at Rome, originally called Sublucius, because built with wood (sublucis). It was raised by Ancus Martius, and dedicated with great pomp and solemnity by the Roman priests. It was rebuilt with stones by Æmylius Lepidus, whose name it assumed. It was much injured by the overflowing of the river, and the emperor Antoninus, who repaired it, made it all with white marble. It was the last of all the bridges of Rome, in following the course of the river, and some vestiges of it may still be seen.—Anienis was built across the river Anio, about three miles from Rome. It was rebuilt by the eunuch Narses, and called after him when destroyed by the Goths.—Cestus was built in the reign of Tiberius, by a Roman called Cestius Gallus, from whom it received its name, and carried back from an island of the Tiber, to which the Fabricius conducted.—Aurelianus was built with marble by the emperor Antoninus.—Armeniensis was built by Augustus, to join the Flaminian to the Æmylian road.—Bajanus was built at Baia in the sea by Caligula. It was supported by boats, and measured about six miles in length.—Janicularis received its name from its vicinity to mount Janiculum. It is still standing.—Milvius was about one mile from Rome. It was built by the censor Ælius Scaurus. It was near it that Constantine defeated Maxentius.—Fabricius was built by Fabricius, and carried to an island of the Tiber.—Gardius was built by Agrippa.—Palatinus, near mount Palatine, was also called Senatoriū, because the senators walked over it in procession when they went to consult the Sibylline books. It was begun by M. Fulvius, and finished in the censorship of L. Mummius, and some remains of it are still visible.—Trajani was built by Trajan across the Danube, celebrated for its bigness and magnificence. The emperor built it to assist more expeditiously the provinces against the barbarians, but his successor destroyed it, as he supposed that it would be rather an inducement for the barbarians to invade the empire. It was raised on 20 piers of hewn stones, 150 feet from the foundation, 60 feet broad, and 170 feet distant one from the other, extending in length above a mile. Some of the pillars are still standing.—Another was built by Trajan over the Tagus, part of which still remains. Of temporary bridges, that of Cæsar over the Rhine was the most famous.—The largest single-arched bridge known is over the river Elaver in France, called Pons Veteris Brivatensis. The pillars stand on two rocks, at the distance of 195 feet. The arch is 84 feet high above the water.—Suffragiorum was built in the Campus Martius, and received its name, because the populace were obliged to pass over it whenever they delivered their suffrages at the elections of magistrates and officers of the state.—Tirensis, a bridge of Latium between Arpinum and Minturnæ.—Triumphalis was on the way to the capitol, and passed over by those who triumphed.—Narniensis joined two mountains near Narnia, built by Augustus, of stupendous height, 60 miles from Rome; one arch of it remains, about 100 feet high.

Pontia, a Roman matron who committed adultery with Sagitta, &c. Tacit. Ann. 12.—A mother infamous for her cruelty. Martial. 1, ep. 34.—A surname of Venus at Hermione. Paus. 9, c. 34.—A woman condemned by Nero as guilty of a conspiracy. She killed herself by opening her veins. She was daughter of Petronius and wife of Bolanus. Juv. 6, v. 637.—An island in the Tyrrhene sea, where Pilate, surnamed Pontius, is supposed to have lived. Plin. 3, c. 6.—Ptol. 3, c. 1. Vid. Euxinides.

Ponticum mare, the sea of Pontus, generally called the Euxine.

Ponticus, a poet of Rome, contemporary with Propertius, by whom he is compared to Homer. He wrote an account of the Theban war in heroic verse. Propert. 1, el. 7.—A man in Juvenal's age, fond of boasting of the antiquity and great actions of his family, yet without possessing himself one single virtue.

Pontina, or Pomptina lacus, a lake in the country of the Volsci, through which the great Appian road passed. Travellers were sometimes conveyed in a boat, drawn by a mule, in the canal that ran along the road from Forum Appii to Tarracina. This lake is now become so dangerous, from the exhalations of its stagnant water, that travellers avoid passing near it. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 9.—Lucan. 3, v. 85.

Pontinus, a friend of Cicero.—A tribune of the people, who refused to rise up when Cæsar passed in triumphal procession. He was one of Cæsar's murderers, and was killed at the battle of Mutina. Sueton. in Cæsar. 78.—Cic. 10, ad Fam.—A mountain of Argolis, with a river of the same name. Paus. 2, c. 73.

Pontius Audidianus, a Roman citizen, who, upon hearing that violence had been offered to his daughter, punished her and her ravisher with death. Val. Max. 6, c. 1.—Herennius, a general of the Samnites, who surrounded the Roman army under the consuls T. Veturius and P. Posthumus. As there was no possibility of escaping for the Romans, Pontius consulted his father what he could do with an army that were prisoners in his hands. The old man advised him either to let them go untouched, or put them all to the sword. Pontius rejected his father's advice, and spared the lives of the enemy, after he had obliged them to pass under the yoke with the greatest ignominy. He was afterwards conquered, and obliged, in his turn, to pass under the yoke. Fabius Maximus defeated him, when he appeared again at the head of another army, and he was afterwards shamefully put to death by the Romans, after he had adorned the triumph of the conqueror. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.—Cominius, a Roman who gave information to his countrymen who were besieged in the capitol, that Camillus had obtained a victory over the Gauls. Plut.—A Roman slave who told Sylla, in a prophetic strain, that he brought him success from Bellona.—One of the favourites of Albuclia. He was degraded from the rank of a senator. Tacit.—Titus, a Roman centurion, whom Cicero de Senect. mentions as possessed of uncommon strength.

Pontus, a kingdom of Asia Minor, bounded on the east by Colchis, west by the Halys, north by the Euxine sea, and south by part of Armenia. It was divided into three parts, according to Ptolemy; Pontus Galaticus, of which Amasia was the capital, Pontus Polemoniacus, with its chief town Polemonium, and Pontus Cappadocius, of which Trepezus was the capital. It was governed by kings, the first of whom was Artabazes, either one of the seven Persian noblemen who murdered the usurper Smerdis, or one of their descendants. The kingdom of Pontus was in its most flourishing state under Mithridates the Great. When J. Cæsar had conquered it, it became a Roman province, though it was often governed by monarchs who were tributary to the power of Rome. Under the emperors a regular governor was always appointed over it. Pontus produced castors, whose testicles were highly valued among the ancients for their salutary qualities in medicinal processes. Verg. G. 1, v. 58.—Mela, 1, c. 1 & 19.—Strab. 12.—Cic. pro Leg.—Man.—Appian.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.—A part of Mysia in Europe, on the borders of the Euxine sea, where Ovid was banished, and from whence he wrote his four books of epistles de Ponto, and his six books of Tristibus. Ovid. de Pont.—An ancient deity, father of Phorcys, Thaumas, Nereus, Eurybia, and Ceto by Terra. He is the same as Oceanus. Apollon. 1, c. 2.

Pontus Euxinus, a celebrated sea, situate at the west of Colchis between Asia and Europe, at the north of Asia Minor. It is called the Black sea by the moderns. Vid. Euxinus.

M. Popilius, a consul who was informed, as he was offering a sacrifice, that a sedition was raised in the city against the senate. Upon this he immediately went to the populace in his sacerdotal robes, and quieted the multitude with a speech. He lived about the year of Rome 404. Liv. 9, c. 21.—Val. Max. 7, c. 8.—Caius, a consul, who, when besieged by the Gauls, abandoned his baggage to save his army. Cic. ad Heren. 1, c. 15.—Lænas, a Roman ambassador to Antiochus king of Syria. He was commissioned to order the monarch to abstain from hostilities against Ptolemy king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus wished to evade him by his answers, but Popilius, with a stick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the sand, and bade him, in the name of the Roman senate and people, not to go beyond it before he spoke decisively. This boldness intimidated Antiochus; he withdrew his garrisons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war against Ptolemy. Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 45, c. 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 10.—A tribune of the people who murdered Cicero, to whose eloquence he was indebted for his life when he was accused of perdition. Plut.—A pretor who banished the friends of Tiberius Gracchus from Italy.—A Roman consul who made war against the people of Numantia, on pretence that the peace had not been firmly established. He was defeated by them.—A senator who alarmed the conspirators against Cæsar, by telling them that the whole plot was discovered.—A Roman emperor. Vid. Neptorianus.

Poppæa Sabina, a celebrated Roman matron, daughter of Titus Ollius. She married a Roman knight called Rufus Crispinus, by whom she had a son. Her personal charms, and the elegance of her figure, captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favourites. He carried her away and married her; but Nero, who had seen her, and had often heard her accomplishments extolled, soon deprived him of her company, and sent him out of Italy, on pretence of presiding over one of the Roman provinces. After he had taken this step, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, on pretence of barrenness, and married Poppæa. The cruelty and avarice of the emperor did not long permit Poppæa to share the imperial dignity, and though she had already made him father of a son, he began to despise her, and even to use her with barbarity. She died of a blow which she received from his foot when many months advanced in her pregnancy, about the 6th year of the christian era. Her funeral was performed with great pomp and solemnity, and statues were raised to her memory. It is said that she was so anxious to preserve her beauty and the elegance of her person, that 500 asses were kept on purpose to afford her milk in which she used daily to bathe. Even in her banishment she was attended by 50 of these animals for the same purpose, and from their milk she invented a kind of ointment or pomatum, to preserve beauty, called poppeanum from her. Plin. 11, c. 42.—Dio. 65.—Juv. 6.—Sueton. in Ner. & Oth.—Tacit. 13 & 14.—A beautiful woman at the court of Nero. She was mother to the preceding. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 1, &c.

Poppeus Sabinus, a Roman of obscure origin, who was made governor of some of the Roman provinces. He destroyed himself, &c. Tacit. 6, Ann. 39.—Sylvanus, a man of consular dignity, who brought to Vespasian a body of 500 Dalmatians.—A friend of Otho.

Populonia, or Populanium, a town of Etruria, near Pisa, destroyed in the civil wars of Sylla. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 172.—Mela, 2, c. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Porata, a river of Dacia, now Pruth, falling into the Danube a little below Axiopolis.

Porcia, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly commended by Cicero.—A daughter of Cato of Utica, who married Bibulus, and after his death, Brutus. She was remarkable for her prudence, philosophy, courage, and conjugal tenderness. She gave herself a heavy wound in the thigh, to see with what fortitude she could bear pain; and when her husband asked her the reason of it, she said that she wished to try whether she had courage enough to share not only his bed, but to partake of his most hidden secrets. Brutus was astonished at her constancy, and no longer detained from her knowledge the conspiracy which he and many other illustrious Romans had formed against J. Cæsar. Porcia wished them success, and though she betrayed fear, and fell into a swoon the day that her husband was gone to assassinate the dictator, yet she was faithful to her promise, and dropped nothing which might affect the situation of the conspirators. When Brutus was dead, she refused to survive him, and attempted to end her life as a daughter of Cato. Her friends attempted to terrify her; but when she saw that every weapon was removed from her reach, she swallowed burning coals and died, about 42 years before the christian era. Valerius Maximus says that she was acquainted with her husband's conspiracy against Cæsar when she gave herself the wound. Val. Max. 3, c. 2, l. 4, c. 6.—Plut. in Brut., &c.

Porcia lex, de civitate, by M. Porcius the tribune, A.U.C. 453. It ordained that no magistrate should punish with death, or scourge with rods, a Roman citizen when condemned, but only permit him to go into exile. Sallust. in Cat.—Liv. 30.—Cic. pro Rab.

Porcina, a surname of the orator M. Æ. Lepidus, who lived a little before Cicero's age, and was distinguished for his abilities. Cic. ad Her. 4, c. 5.

M. Porcius Latro, a celebrated orator who killed himself when labouring under a quartan ague, A.U.C. 750.—Licinius, a Latin poet during the time of the third Punic war, commended for the elegance, the graceful ease, and happy wit of his epigrams.—A Roman senator who joined the conspiracy of Catiline.—A son of Cato of Utica, given much to drinking.

Porcedorax, one of the 40 Gauls whom Mithridates ordered to be put to death, and to remain unburied for conspiring against him. His mistress at Pergamus buried him against the orders of the monarch. Plut. de Virt. Mul.

Porina, a river of Peloponnesus. Paus. 1, c. 85.

Poroselone, an island near Lesbos. Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

Porphyron, a son of Cælius and Terra, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was so formidable, that Jupiter, to conquer him, inspired him with love for Juno, and while the giant endeavoured to obtain his wishes, he, with the assistance of Hercules, overpowered him. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Mart. 13, ep. 78.—Apollod. 1, c. 6.

Porphyris, a name of the island Cythera.

Porphyrius, a Platonic philosopher of Tyre. He studied eloquence at Athens under Longinus, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he perfected himself under Plotinus. Porphyry was a man of universal information, and, according to the testimony of the ancients, he excelled his contemporaries in the knowledge of history, mathematics, music, and philosophy. He expressed his sentiments with elegance and with dignity, and while other philosophers studied obscurity in their language, his style was remarkable for its simplicity and grace. He applied himself to the study of magic, which he called a theurgic or divine operation. The books that he wrote were numerous, and some of his smaller treatises are still extant. His most celebrated work, which is now lost, was against the religion of Christ, and in this theological contest he appeared so formidable, that most of the fathers of the church have been employed in confuting his arguments, and developing the falsehood of his assertions. He has been universally called the greatest enemy which the christian religion had, and, indeed, his doctrines were so pernicious, that a copy of his book was publicly burnt by order of Theodosius, A.D. 388. Porphyry resided for some time in Sicily, and died at the advanced age of 71, A.D. 304. The best edition of his life of Pythagoras is that of Kuster, 4to, Amst. 1707; that of his treatise, De Abstinentiâ, is De Rhoer. Traj. ad Rhen. 8vo, 1767, and that De Antro Nympharum, in 8vo, Traj. ad Rhen. 1765.—A Latin poet in the reign of Constantine the Great.

Porrima, one of the attendants of Caramente when she came from Arcadia. Ovid. 1, Fast. v. 632.

Porsenna, or Porsenna, a king of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne, and to his royal privileges. He was at first successful; the Romans were defeated, and Porsenna would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Cocles stood at the head of a bridge, and supported the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. This act of bravery astonished Porsenna; but when he had seen Mutius Scævola enter his camp with an intention to murder him, and when he had seen him burn his hand without emotion to convince him of his fortitude and intrepidity, he no longer dared to make head against a people so brave, and so generous. He made a peace with the Romans, and never after supported Porsenna's behaviour to the captives was admired by the Romans, and to reward his humanity they raised a brazen statue to his honour. Liv. 2, c. 9, &c.—Plut. in Public.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Horat. ep. 16.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 646.

Porta Capena, a gate at Rome, which leads to the Appian road. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 192.—Aurelia, a gate at Rome, which received its name from Aurelius, a consul who made a road which led to Pisa, all along the coast of Etruria.—Asinaria led to mount Cœlius. It received its name from the family of the Asinii.—Carmentalis was at the foot of the capitol, built by Romulus. It was afterwards called Scelerata, because the 300 Fabii marched through when they went to fight an enemy, and were killed near the river Cremera.—Janualis was near the temple of Janus.—Esquilina was also called Melia, Taurica, or Libitinensis, and all criminals who were going to be executed generally passed through, as also dead bodies which were carried to be burnt on mount Esquilinus.—Flaminia, called also Flumentana, was situated between the capitol and mount Quirinalis, and through it the Flaminian road passed.—Fontinalis led to the Campus Martius. It received its name from the great number of fountains that were near it.—Navalis was situated near the place where the ships came from Ostia.—Viminalis was near mount Viminalis.—Trigemina, called also Ostiensis, led to the town of Ostia.—Catularia was near the Carmentalis Porta, at the foot of mount Viminalis.—Collatina received its name from its leading to Collatia.—Collina, called also Quirinalis, Agonensis, and Salaria, was near Quirinalis Mons. Annibal rode up to this gate and threw a spear into the city. It is to be observed, that at the death of Romulus there were only three or four gates at Rome, but the number was increased, and in the time of Pliny there were 37, when the circumference of the walls was 13 miles and 200 paces.

Portia and Portius. Vid. Portia and Portius.

Portmos, a town of Eubœa. Demosth.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Portumnalia, festivals of Portumnus at Rome, celebrated on the 17th of August, in a very solemn and lugubrious manner, on the borders of the Tiber. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 547.—Varro, de L. L. 5, c. 3.

Portumnus, a sea deity. Vid. Melicerta.

Porus, the god of plenty at Rome. He was son of Metis or Prudence. Plato.—A king of India, when Alexander invaded Asia. The conqueror of Darius ordered him to come and pay homage to him, as a dependent prince. Porus scorned his commands, and declared he would go and meet him on the frontiers of his kingdom sword in hand, and immediately he marched a large army to the banks of the Hydaspes. The stream of the river was rapid; but Alexander crossed it in the obscurity of the night, and defeated one of the sons of the Indian monarch. Porus himself renewed the battle, but the valour of the Macedonians prevailed, and the Indian prince retired covered with wounds, on the back of one of his elephants. Alexander sent one of the kings of India to demand him to surrender, but Porus killed the messenger, exclaiming, "Is not this the voice of the wretch who has abandoned his country?" and when he at last was prevailed upon to come before the conqueror, he approached him as an equal. Alexander demanded of him how he wished to be treated. "Like a king," replied the Indian monarch. This magnanimous answer so pleased the Macedonian conqueror, that he not only restored him his dominions, but he increased his kingdom by the conquest of new provinces; and Porus, in acknowledgment of such generosity and benevolence, became one of the most faithful and attached friends of Alexander, and never violated the assurances of peace which he had given him. Porus is represented as a man of uncommon stature, great strength, and proportionable dignity. Plut. in Alex.—Philostr. 2, c. 10.—Curt. 8, c. 8, &c.—Claud. Cons. Honor. 4.—Another king of India in the reign of Alexander.—A king of Babylon.

Pœsides, a eunuch and freedman of the emperor Claudius, who rose to honours by the favour of his master. Juv. 14, v. 94.

Posidonia, a town of Lucania, better known by the name of Pæstum. Vid. Pæstum.

Posidonium, a town or temple of Neptune, near Genoa in Italy, where the straits of Sicily are narrowest, and scarce a mile distant from the opposite shore.

Posidonius, a philosopher of Apamea. He lived at Rhodes for some time, and afterwards came to Rome, where, after cultivating the friendship of Pompey and Cicero, he died in his 84th year. He wrote a treatise on the nature of the gods, and also attempted to measure the circumference of the earth; he accounted for the tides from the motion of the moon, and calculated the height of the atmosphere to be 400 stadia, nearly agreeing with the ideas of the moderns. Cic. Turc. 5, c. 37.—Strab. 14.—Another philosopher, born at Alexandria in Egypt.

Posio, a native of Magnesia, who wrote a history of the Amazons.

Posthumia, a vestal virgin, accused of adultery and acquitted.—The wife of Servius Sulpicius. Cic. ep.—A daughter of Sylla.

Posthumius Albinus, a man who suffered himself to be bribed by Jugurtha, against whom he had been sent with an army.—A writer at Rome whom Cato ridiculed for composing a history in Greek, and afterwards offering apologies for the inaccuracy and inelegance of his expressions.—Tubero, a master of horse to the dictator Æmilius MamerCUS. He was himself made dictator in the war which the Romans waged against the Volsci, and he punished his son with death for fighting against his orders. A. U. C. 312. Liv. 4, c. 23.—Spurius, a consul sent against the Sannites. He was taken in an ambush by Pontius, the enemy's general, and obliged to pass under the yoke with all his army. He saved his life by a shameful treaty, and when he returned to Rome he persuaded the Romans not to reckon as valid the engagements he had made with the enemy, as it was without their advice. He was given up to the enemy because he could not perform his engagements; but he was released by Pontius for his generous and patriotic behaviour.—Aulus, a dictator who defeated the Latins and the Volsci.—Tubertus, another dictator, who defeated the Æqui and Volsci.—Lucius, a consul sent against the Sannites.—A general who defeated the Sabines, and who was the first who obtained an ovation.—A man poisoned by his wife.—A general who conquered the Æqui, and who was stoned by the army, because he refused to divide the promised spoils. Flor. 22.—Lucius, a Roman consul who was defeated by the Eoli. He was left among the slain, and his head was cut off from his body, and carried in triumph by the barbarians into their temples, where they made with the skull a sacred vessel to offer libations to their gods.—Marcus Crassus Latinus, an officer proclaimed emperor in Gaul, A.D. 260. He reigned with great popularity, and gained the affection of his subjects by his humanity and moderation. He took his son of the same name as a colleague on the throne. They were both assassinated by their soldiers, after a reign of six years.—Megillus, a consul against the Samnites and Tarantines.—Quintus, a man put to death by Antony.—A soothsayer in the age of Sylla.—Spurius, an enemy of Tib. Gracchus.—Albus, a Roman decemvir, sent to Athens to collect the most salutary laws of Solon, &c. Liv. 3, c. 31.—Sylvius, a son of Æneas and Sylvia.

Postverta, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the painful travails of women. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 633.

Postumia via, a Roman road about the town of Hostilia.

Postumius. Vid. Posthumus.

Potamides, nymphs who presided over rivers and fountains, as their name (ποταμος, αυτιος) implies.

Potamon, a philosopher of Alexandria, in the age of Augustus. He wrote several treatises, and confined himself to the doctrines of no particular sect of philosophers.

Potamos, a town of Attica, near Sunium. Strab. 9.

Potentia, a town of Picenum. Liv. 39, c. 44.

Potinus, a eunuch, tutor to Ptolemy king of Egypt. He advised the monarch to murder Pompey, when he claimed his protection after the battle of Pharsalia. He stirred up commotions in Alexandria, when Caesar came there, upon which the conqueror ordered him to be put to death. Lucan. 8, v. 483, l. 10, v. 95.

Pothos, one of the deities of the Samothracians. Plin. 36, c. 5.

Potidæa, a town of Macedonia, situate in the peninsula of Pallene. It was founded by a Corinthian colony, and became tributary to the Athenians, from whom Philip of Macedonia took it. The conqueror gave it to the Olynthians, to render them more attached to his interest. Cassander repaired and enlarged it, and called it Cassandria, a name which it still preserves, and which has given occasion to Livy to say, that Cassander was the original founder of that city. Liv. 44, c. 11.—Demosth. Olynth.—Strab. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 23.—Mela. 2, c. 9.

Potidania, a town of Ætolia. Liv. 28, c. 8.

Potina, a goddess at Rome, who presided over children's potions. Varr.

Potitius. Vid. Pinaris.

Potnia, a town of Bœotia, where Bacchus had a temple. The Potnians, having once murdered the priest of the god, were ordered by the oracle, to appease his resentment, yearly to offer on his altars a young man. This unnatural sacrifice was continued for some years, till Bacchus himself substituted a goat, from which circumstance he received the appellation of Ægoceros and Ægophagus. There was here a fountain whose waters made horses run mad as soon as they were touched. There were also here certain goddesses called Pot- niades, on whose altars, in a grove sacred to Ceres and Proserpine, victims were sacrificed. It was also usual, at a certain season of the year, to conduct into the grove young pigs, which were found the following year in the groves of Dodona. The mares of Potnia destroyed their master Glaucus son of Sisyphus. Vid. Glaucus. Paus. 9, c. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 267.—Ælian. V. H. 15, c. 25.—A town of Magnesia, whose pastures gave madness to asses, according to Pliny.

Præctum, a town and a small river of Asia Minor, on the Hellespont.

Præcia, a courtesan at Rome, who influenced Cethegus, and procured Asia as a consular province for Lucullus. Plut. in Luc.

Præneste, a town of Latium, about 21 miles from Rome, built by Telegonus son of Ulysses and Circe, or, according to others, by Cæculus the son of Vulcan. There was a celebrated temple of Fortune there, with two famous images, as also an oracle, which was long in great repute. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 47.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 680.—Horat. 3, od. 4.—Stat. 1, Syll. 3, v. 80.

Præsos, a small town of Crete, destroyed in a civil war by one of the neighbouring cities.

Præsti, a nation of India. Curt. 9, c. 8.

Præstoria, a town of Dacia, now Cronstadt.—Another, now Aoust, in Piedmont.

Prætorius, a name ironically applied to As. Sempronius Rufus, because he was disappointed in his solicitations for the pretorship, as being too dissolute and luxurious in his manners. He was the first who had a stork brought to his table. Horat. 2, sat. 2, v. 50.

Prætotium, a town of Picenum. Ital. 15, v. 568.—Liv. 22, c. 9, l. 27, c. 43.

Præsiæ, now Verdant, a large island at the mouth of the Indus. Plin. 5, c. 20.

Præsiæ, a lake between Macedonia and Thrace, where were silver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 17.

Præsi, a nation of India in Alexander's age. Curt. 9, c. 2.

Prætellicia lex, was enacted by Prætellicus the tribune, A.U.C. 398, to curb and check the ambitious views of men who were lately advanced in the state. Liv. 7, c. 15.

Prætinus, a Greek poet of Philius, contemporary with Æschylus. He was the first among the Greeks who composed satires, which were represented as farces. Of these 32 were acted, as also 18 of his tragedies, one of which only obtained the poetical prize. Some of his verses are extant, quoted by Athenæus. Paus. 2, c. 13.

Præxagoras, an Athenian writer, who published a history of the kings of his own country. He was then only 19 years old, and, three years after, he wrote the life of Constantine the Great. He had also written the life of Alexander, all now lost.

Præxias, a celebrated statuary of Athens. Paus. 10, c. 18.

Præxidamas, a famous athlete of Ægina. Paus. 6, c. 18.

Præxidoa, a goddess among the Greeks, who presided over the execution of enterprises, and who punished all evil actions. Paus. 9, c. 33.

Præxia, a lyric poetess of Sicily, who flourished about 492 years before Christ. Paus. 3, c. 13.

Præxiphænes, a Rhodian, who wrote a learned commentary on the obscure passages of Sophocles.—An historian. Diog.

Praxis, a surname of Venus at Megara. Paus. 1, c. 43.

Praxiteles, a famous sculptor of Magna Græcia, who flourished about 324 years before the Christian era. He chiefly worked on Parian marble, on account of its beautiful whiteness. He carried his art to the greatest perfection, and was so happy in copying nature, that his statues seemed to be animated. The most famous of his pieces was a Cupid which he gave to Phryne. This celebrated courtesan, who wished to have the best of all the statues of Praxiteles, and who could not depend upon her own judgment in the choice, alarmed the sculptor, by telling him his house was on fire. Praxiteles upon this showed his eagerness to save his Cupid from the flames, above all his other pieces; but Phryne restrained his fears, and, by discovering her artifice, obtained the favourite statue. The sculptor employed his chisel in making a statue of this beautiful courtesan, which was dedicated in the temple of Delphi, and placed between the statues of Archidamus king of Sparta, and Philip king of Macedon. He also made a statue of Venus, at the request of the people of Cos, and gave them their choice of the goddess, either naked or veiled. The former was superior to the other in beauty and perfection, but the inhabitants of Cos preferred the latter. The Cnidians, who did not wish to patronize modesty and decorum with the same eagerness as the people of Cos, bought the naked Venus, and it was so universally esteemed, that Nicomedes king of Bithynia offered the Cnidians to pay an enormous debt under which they laboured, if they would give him their favourite statue. This offer was not accepted. The famous Cupid was bought of the Thespians by Caius Cæsar and carried to Rome, but Claudius restored it to them, and Nero afterwards obtained possession of it. Paus. 1, c. 40. l. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 34 & 36.

Praxithea, a daughter of Phrasimus and Diogenes. She married Erechtheus king of Athens, by whom she had Cecrops, Pandarus, and Metion, and four daughters, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A daughter of Thestius, mother of some children by Hercules. Id. 2, c. 7.—A daughter of Erechtheus, sacrificed by order of the oracle.

Prælius, a lake of Tuscany, now Castiglione. Cic. Mil. 21.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Præson, a son of Phryxus, father of Clymenus. —A son of Clytodoræ and Minyas also bore the same name. Paus. 9, c. 34 & 37.

Pretor, one of the chief magistrates at Rome. The office of pretor was first instituted A.U.C. 388, by the senators, who wished by some new honour to compensate for the loss of the consulship, of which the plebeians had claimed a share. The pretor received his name a prætoribus. Only one was originally elected, and another A.U.C. 501. One of them was totally employed in administering justice among the citizens, whence he was called pretor urbanus; and the other appointed judges in all causes which related to foreigners. In the year of Rome 520, two more pretors were created to assist the consul in the government of the provinces of Sicily and Sardinia, which had been lately conquered, and two more when Spain was reduced into the form of a Roman province, A.U.C. 521. Sylla the dictator added two more, and Julius Cæsar increased the number to 10, and afterwards to 16, and the second triumvirate to 64. After this their numbers fluctuated, being sometimes 18, 16, or 12, till, in the decline of the empire, their dignity decreased, and their numbers were reduced to three. In his public capacity the pretor administered justice, protected the rights of widows and orphans, presided at the celebration of public festivals, and in the absence of the consul assembled or prorogued the senate as he pleased. He also exhibited shows to the people, and in the festivals of the Bona Dea, where no males were permitted to appear, his wife presided over the rest of the Roman matrons. Feasts were announced and proclaimed by him, and he had the power to make and repeal laws, if it met with the approbation of the senate and people. The questors were subject to him, and in the absence of the consuls, he appeared at the head of the armies, and in the city he kept a register of all the freedmen of Rome, with the reasons for which they had received their freedom. In the provinces the pretors appeared with great pomp; six lictors with the fasces walked before them, and when the empire was increased by conquests, they divided, like the consuls, their government, and provinces were given them by lot. When the year of their pretorship was elapsed, they were called prætoribus, if they still continued at the head of their province. At Rome the pretors appeared also with much pomp; two lictors preceded them, they wore the prætexta, or the white robe with purple borders, they sat in curule chairs, and their tribunal was distinguished by a sword and a spear, while they administered justice. The tribunal was called prætorium. When they rode they appeared on white horses at Rome, as a mark of distinction. The pretor who appointed judges to try foreign causes, was called pretor peregrinus. The pretors Cereales, appointed by Julius Cæsar, were employed in providing corn and provision for the city. They were on that account often called frumentarii.

Prægnos, a son of Agenor. Paus. 3, c. 2. l. 7, c. 18 & 20.

Præxapes, a Persian who put Smerdis to death, by order of king Cambyses. Herodot. 3, c. 30.

Priamides, a patronymic applied to Paris, as being son of Priam. It is also given to Hector, Deiphobus, and all the other children of the Trojan monarch. Ovid. Heroid. —Virg. Æn. 3, v. 235.

Priamus, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon by Strymon, called Placia by some. When Hercules took the city of Troy (Vid. Laomedon), Priam was in the number of his prisoners, but his sister Hecione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name of Podarces for that of Priam, which signifies bought or ransomed. Vid. Podarces. He was also placed on his father's throne by Hercules, and he employed himself with well-directed diligence in repairing, fortifying, and embellishing the city of Troy. He had married, by his father's orders, Arisba, whom now he divorced for Hecuba the daughter of Dianas, or Cisseus, a neighbouring prince. He had by Hecuba 17 children, according to Cicero, or, according to Homer, 19; the most celebrated of whom are Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphon, Hippobon, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Besides these he had many others by concubines. Their names, according to Apollodorus, are Melampus, Gorgythion, Philæmon, Glaucus, Agathon, Ewagoras, Hippothous, Chersidamas, Hippodamas, Mestor, Atas, Dorcyllus, Dryops, Lycaon, Astygonus, Bias, Evander, Chromius, Telestas, Melius, Cebnon, Laodocus, Idomeneus, Archemachus, Echephron, Hyperion, Ascanius, Arrhetus, Democoon, Deijptes, Echemon, Clowis, Agioneus, Hypirychus, Lysithous, Polymedon, Medusa, Lysinache, Medicasante, and Aristoceme. After he had reigned for some time in the greatest prosperity, Priam expressed a desire to recover his sister Hesione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece, and married to Telamon his friend. To carry this plan into execution, Priam manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his son Paris, with orders to bring back Hesione. Paris, to whom the goddess of beauty had promised the fairest woman in the world (Vid. Paris), neglected in some measure his father's injunctions, and as if to make reprisals upon the Greeks, he carried away Helen the wife of Menelaus king of Sparta, during the absence of her husband. Priam beheld this with satisfaction, and he countenanced his son by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This rape kindled the flames of war; all the suitors of Helen, at the request of Menelaus (Vid. Menelaus), assembled to revenge the violence offered to his bed, and a fleet, according to some, of 140 ships under the command of the 69 chiefs that furnished them, set sail for Troy. Priam might have averted the impending blow by the restoration of Helen; but this he refused to do, when the ambassadors of the Greeks came to him, and he immediately raised an army to defend himself. Troy was soon besieged; frequent skirmishes took place, in which the success was various, and the advantages on both sides inconsiderable. The siege was continued for 10 successive years, and Priam had the misfortune to see the greatest part of his children massacred by the enemy. Hector, the eldest of these, was the only one upon whom now the Trojans looked for protection and support; but he soon fell a sacrifice to his own courage, and was killed by Achilles. Priam severely felt his loss, and as he loved him with the greatest tenderness, he wished to ransom his body, which was in the enemy's camp. The gods, according to Homer, interested themselves in favour of old Priam. Achilles was prevailed upon by his mother, the goddess Thetis, to restore Hector to Priam, and the king of Troy passed through the Grecian camp conducted by Mercury the messenger of the gods, who with his rod had made him invisible. The meeting of Priam and Achilles was solemn and affecting; the conqueror paid to the Trojan monarch that attention and reverence which was due to his dignity, his years, and his misfortunes, and Priam in a suppliant manner addressed the prince whose favours he claimed, and kissed the hands that had robbed him of the greatest and the best of his children. Achilles was moved by his tears and entreaties; he restored Hector, and permitted Priam a truce of 12 days for the funeral of his son. Some time after Troy was betrayed into the hands of the Greeks by Antenor and Aeneas, and Priam upon this resolved to die in defence of his country. He put on his armour and advanced to meet the Greeks, but Hecuba by her tears and entreaties detained him near an altar of Jupiter, whither she had fled for protection. While Priam yielded to the prayers of his wife, Polites, one of his sons, fled also to the altar before Neoptolemus, who pursued him with fury. Polites, wounded and overcome, fell dead at the feet of his parents, and the aged father, fired with indignation, ventured the most bitter invectives against the Greek, who paid no regard to the sanctity of altars and temples, and raising his spear darted it upon him. The spear hurled by the feeble hand of Priam touched the buckler of Neoptolemus, and fell to the ground. This irritated the son of Achilles; he seized Priam by his grey hairs, and without compassion or reverence for the sanctity of the place, he plunged his dagger into his breast. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of slain. Ditys Crat. 1, &c.—Dares Phryg.—Herodot. 2, c. 120.—Paus. 10, c. 25.—Homer. Il. 22, &c.—Virg. in Troad.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 35.—*Q. Priapus, a deity among the ancients, who presided over gardens, and the parts of generation in the sexes. He was son of Venus by Mercury or Adonis, or, according to the more received opinion, by Bacchus. The goddess of beauty, who was enamoured of Bacchus, went to meet him as he returned victorious from his Indian expedition, and by him she had Priapus, who was born at Lampsacus. Priapus was so deformed in all his limbs, particularly the genitals, by means of Juno, who had assisted at the delivery of Venus, that the mother, ashamed to have given birth to such a monster, ordered him to be exposed on the mountains. His life, however, was preserved by the shepherds, and he received the name of Priapus propter deformitatem & membri virilitis magnitudinem. He soon became a favourite of the people of Lampsacus, but he was expelled by the inhabitants on account of the freedom which he took with their wives. This violence was punished by the son of Venus, and when the Lampsaceniens had been afflicted with a disease in the genitals, Priapus was recalled, and temples erected to his honour. Festivals were also celebrated, and the people, naturally idle and indolent, gave themselves up to every lasciviousness and impurity during the celebration. His worship was also introduced in Rome; but the Romans revered him more as a god of orchards and gardens, than as the patron of licentiousness. A crown painted with different colours was offered to him in the spring, and in the summer a garland of ears of corn. An ass was generally sacrificed to him, because that animal, by its braying, awoke the nymph Lotis, to whom Priapus was going to offer violence. He is generally represented with a human face and the ears of a goat; he holds a stick in his hand, with which he terrifies birds, as also a club to drive away thieves, and a scythe to prune the trees and cut down corn. He was crowned with the leaves of the vine, and sometimes with laurel or rocket. The last of these plants was sacred to him, as it is said to raise the passions and excite love. Priapus is often distinguished by the epithet of phallus, fascinus, Ictyphallus, or ruber, or rubicundus, which are all expressive of his deformity. Catull. ep. 19 & 20.—Colum. 2, de cult. hort.—Horat. 1, sat. 1.—Tibull. 1, el. 1, v. 18.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 415. l. 6, v. 319.—Virg. Æc. 7, v. 33. Priapus was the chief deity of the place, and from him the town received its name, because he had taken refuge there when banished from Lampsacus. Strab. 12.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Mela. 1, c. 19.—An island near Ephesus. Plin. 5, c. 31.

Priene, a maritime town of Asia Minor, at the foot of mount Mycale, one of the 12 independent cities of Ionia. It gave birth to Bias, one of the seven wise men of Greece. It had been built by an Athenian colony. Paus. 7, c. 2. l. 8, c. 14.—Synob. 12.

Prima, a daughter of Romulus and Hersilia.

Prion, a place at Carthage.

Priscianus, a celebrated grammarian at Athens, in the age of the emperor Justinian.

Priscilla, a woman praised for her conjugal affection by Statius, 5, Sylv. 1.

Priscus Sevillus, a dictator at Rome who defeated the Veientes and the Fidenates.—A surname of the elder Tarquin king of Rome. Vid. Tarquinius.—A governor of Syria, brother to the emperor Philip. He proclaimed himself emperor in Macedonia when he was informed of his brother's death, but he was soon after conquered and put to death by Decius, Philip's murderer.—A friend of the emperor Severus.—A friend of the emperor Julian, almost murdered by the populace.—Helvidius, a questor in Achaia during the reign of Nero, remarkable for his independent spirit. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 6.—Juvenal.—An officer under Vitellius.—One of the emperor Adrian's friends.—A friend of Domitian.—An orator, whose dissipated and luxurious manners Horace ridicules, 1, sat. 7, v. 9.

Pristis, the name of one of the ships that engaged in the naval combat which was exhibited by Æneas at the anniversary of his father's death. She was commanded by Mætheus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 116.

Privernus, a Rutulian killed by Cypus in the wars between Æneas and Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 576.

Privernum, now Piperno Vecchio, a town of the Volsci in Italy, whose inhabitants were called Privernates. It became a Roman colony. Liv. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 540.—Cic. 1, Div. 43.

Proba, the wife of the emperor Probus.—A woman who opened the gates of Rome to the Goths.

Probus M. Aurelius Severus, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His father was originally a gardener, who, by entering the army, rose to the rank of a military tribune. His son obtained the same office in the 22nd year of his age, and he distinguished himself so much by his probity, his valour, his intrepidity, moderation, and clemency, that, at the death of the emperor Tacitus, he was invested with the imperial purple by the voluntary and uninfluenced choice of his soldiers. His election was universally approved by the Roman senate and the people; and Probus, strengthened on his throne by the affection and attachment of his subjects, marched against the enemies of Rome, in Gaul and Germany. Several battles were fought, and after he had left 400,000 barbarians dead in the field, Probus turned his arms against the Sarmatians. The same success attended him, and after he had quelled and terrified to peace the numerous barbarians of the north, he marched through Syria against the Blemmyes in the neighbourhood of Egypt. The Blemmyes were defeated with great slaughter, and the military character of the emperor was so well established, that the king of Persia sued for peace by his ambassadors, and attempted to buy the conqueror's favour with the most splendid presents. Probus was then feasting upon the most common food when the ambassadors were introduced; but without even casting his eyes upon them, he said, that if their master did not give proper satisfaction to the Romans, he would lay his territories desolate, and as naked as the crown of his head. As he spoke, the emperor took off his cap, and showed the baldness of his head to the ambassadors. The conditions were gladly accepted by the Persian monarch, and Probus retired to Rome to convince his subjects of the greatness of his conquests, and to claim from them the applause which their ancestors had given to the conqueror of Mædonia or the destroyer of Carthage, as he passed along the streets of Rome. His triumph lasted several days, and the Roman populace were long entertained with shows and combats. But the Roman empire, delivered from its foreign enemies, was torn by civil discord; and peace was not re-established till three usurpers had been severally defeated. While his subjects enjoyed tranquillity, Probus encouraged the liberal arts; he permitted the inhabitants of Gaul and Illyricum to plant vines in their territories, and he himself repaired 70 cities in different parts of the empire which had been reduced to ruins. He also attempted to drain the waters which were stagnated in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, by conveying them to the sea by artificial canals. His armies were employed in this laborious undertaking; but as they were unaccustomed to such toils, they soon mutinied, and fell upon the emperor as he was passing into one of the towns of Illyricum. He fled into an iron tower which he himself had built to observe the marshes, but as he was alone, and without arms, he was soon overpowered and murdered, in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of six years and four months, on the second of November, after Christ 282. The news of his death was received with the greatest consternation; not only his friends, but his very enemies, deplored his fate, and even the army, which had been concerned in his fall, erected a monument over his body, and placed upon it this inscription: Hic Probus imperator, vere probus, situs est, victor omnium gentium barbararum, victor etiam tyrannorum. He was then preparing in a few days to march against the Persians that had revolted, and his victories there might have been as great as those he obtained in the two other quarters of the globe. He was succeeded by Carus, and his family, who had shared his greatness, immediately retired from Rome, not to become objects either of private or public malice. Zos.—Prob.—Saturn.—Æmilius, a grammarian in the age of Theodosius. The lives of excellent commanders, written by Cornelius Nepos, have been falsely attributed to him by some authors.—An oppressive prefect of the pretorian guards, in the reign of Valentinian.

Proca, a king of Alba after his father Aventinus. He was father of Amulius and Numitor. Liv. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 622.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 167.

Prochyta, an island of Campania in the bay of Puteoli, now Procida. It was situated near Inarima, from which it was said that it had been separated by an earthquake. It received its name, according to Dionysius, from the nurse of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 715.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Dionys. Hal. 2.

Procilla Julia, a woman of uncommon virtue, killed by the soldiers of Otho. Tacit. Agric. 4.

C. Valerius Procillus, a prince of Gaul, intimate with Cæsar.

Proclæa, a daughter of Clitius, who married Cycnus, a son of Neptune. Paus. 10, c. 14.

Procles, a son of Aristodemus and Argia, born at the same birth as Eurysthenes. There were continual dissensions between the two brothers, who both sat on the Spartan throne. Vid. Eurysthenes and Lacedæmon.—A native of Andros in the Aegean sea, who was crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 14.—A man who headed the Ionians when they took Samos. Id. 7, c. 4.—A Carthaginian writer, son of Eucrates. He wrote some historical treatises, of which Pausanias has preserved some fragments. Id. 4, c. 35.—A tyrant of Epidaurus, put to death and thrown into the sea. Plut. de Orac.—A general of the Naxians in Sicily, who betrayed his country to Dionysius the tyrant for a sum of money.

Proclides, the descendants of Procles, who sat on the throne of Sparta, together with the Eurysthenidae. Vid. Lacedæmon and Eurysthenes.

Procone. Vid. Progne.

Proconnessus, now Marmora, an island of the Propontis, at the north-east of Cyzicus; also called Elaphonnesus and Neuris. It was famous for its fine marble. Plin. 5, c. 32.—Strab. 13.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Procopius, a celebrated officer of a noble family in Cilicia, related to the emperor Julian, with whom he lived in great intimacy. He was universally admired for his integrity, but he was not destitute of ambition or pride. After he had signalized himself under Julian and his successor, he retired from the Roman provinces among the barbarians in the Thracian Chersonesus, and some time after he suddenly made his appearance at Constantinople, when the emperor Valens had marched into the east, and he proclaimed himself master of the eastern empire. His usurpation was universally acknowledged, and his victories were so rapid, that Valens would have resigned the imperial purple, had not his friends intervened. But now fortune changed; Procopius was defeated in Phrygia, and abandoned by his army. His head was cut off, and carried to Valentinian in Gaul, A.D. 366. Procopius was slain in the 42nd year of his age, and he had usurped the title of emperor for above eight months. Ammian. Marcell. 25 & 26.—A Greek historian of Caesarea in Palestine, secretary to the celebrated Belisarius, A.D. 534. He wrote the history of the reign of Justinian, and greatly celebrated the hero, whose favours and patronage he enjoyed. This history is divided into eight books, two of which give an account of the Persian war, two of the Vandals, and four of the Goths, to the year 553, which was afterwards continued in five books by Agathias till 559. Of this performance the character is great, though perhaps the historian is often too severe on the emperor. The works of Procopius were edited in 2 vols. folio, Paris, 1662.

Procris, a daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens. She married Cephalus. Vid. Cephalus. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—A daughter of Theseus.

Procrustes, a famous robber of Attica, killed by Theseus near the Cephissus. He tied travellers on a bed, and if their length exceeded that of the bed, he used to cut it off, but if they were shorter, he had them stretched to make their length equal to it. He is called by some Damastes and Polypepon. Ovid. Heroid. 2, v. 69. Met. 9, v. 43.—Plut. in These.

Proclia, a prostitute in Juvenal's age, 2, v. 68.

Proclivius, a Roman knight, very intimate with Augustus. He is celebrated for his humanity and paternal kindness to his brothers Murana and Scipio, with whom he divided his possessions, after they had forfeited their estates, and incurred the displeasure of Augustus for siding with young Pompey. He was sent by Augustus to Cleopatra, to endeavour to bring her alive into his presence, but to no purpose. He destroyed himself when labouring under a heavy disease. Horat. 2, od. 2.—Plut. in Anton.—Plin. 36, c. 24.—A debauchee in Nero's reign. Juv. 1, v. 40.

Proculus Julius, a Roman who, after the death of Romulus, declared that he had seen him in his appearance more than human, and that he had ordered him to bid the Romans to offer him sacrifices under the name of Quirinus, and to rest assured that Rome was destined by the gods to become the capital of the world. Plut. in Rom.—Liv. 1, c. 16.—Geganius, a Roman consul.—Placitius, a Roman who conquered the Hermici.—A friend of Vitellius.—A consul under Nerva.—A man accused of extortion.—An African in the age of Aurelius. He published a book entitled de regionibus, or religioibus, on foreign countries, &c.—An officer who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, in the reign of Probus. He was soon after defeated, and exposed on a gibbet. He was very debauched and licentious in his manners, and had acquired riches by piratical excursions.

Procyon, a star near Sirius, or the dog-star, before which it generally rises in July. Cicero calls it Anticanis, which is of the same signification (pro avo). Horat. 3, od. 29.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 44.

Prodicus, a sophist and rhetorician of Cos, about 396 years before Christ. He was sent as ambassador by his countrymen to Athens, where he publicly taught, and had among his pupils Euripides, Socrates, Theramenes, and Isocrates. He travelled from town to town in Greece, to procure admirers and get money. He made his auditors pay to hear him harangue, which has given occasion to some of the ancients to speak of the orations of Prodicus for 50 drachmas. In his writings, which were numerous, he composed a beautiful episode, in which virtue and pleasure were introduced, as attempting to make Hercules one of their votaries. The hero at last yielded to the charms of virtue and rejected pleasure. This has been imitated by Lucian. Prodicus was at last put to death by the Athenians on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Xenophon. Memor.

Proerna, a town of Phthiotis. Liv. 63, c. 14.

Proerosia, a surname of Ceres. Her festivals, celebrated at Athens and Eleusis before the sowing of corn, bore the same name. Meurs. de Myst. El.

Proetides, the daughters of Proetus king of Argolis, were three in number, Lysippe, Iphinoe, and Iphianassa. They became insane for neglecting the worship of Bacchus, or, according to others, for preferring themselves to Juno, and they ran about the fields, believing themselves to be cows, and flying away not to be harnessed to the plough or to the chariot. Proetus applied to Melampus to cure his daughters of their insanity, but he refused to employ him when he demanded the third part of his kingdom as a reward. This neglect of Proetus was punished, the insanity became contagious, and the monarch at last promised Melampus two parts of his kingdom and one of his daughters, if he would restore them and the Argian women to their senses. Melampus consented, and after he had wrought the cure, he married the most beautiful of the Proetides. Some have called them Lysippe, Ipponee, and Cyrianassa. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 48.—Ovid. Met. 15.—Lactant. ad Stat. Theb. 1 & 3.

Proetus, a king of Argos, son of Abas and Ocalea. He was twin brother to Acrisius, with whom he quarrelled even before their birth. This disension between the two brothers increased with their years. After their father's death, they both tried to obtain the kingdom of Argos; but the claims of Acrisius prevailed, and Proetus left Peloponnesus and retired to the court of Jofates king of Lycia, where he married Stenobœa, called by some Antea or Antiope. He afterwards returned to Argolis, and by means of his father-in-law he made himself master of Thyrtus. Stenobœa had accompanied her husband to Greece, and she came by him mother of the Proetides, and of a son called Megapenthes, who after his father's death succeeded on the throne of Thyrtus. Vid. Stenobœa. Homer. Il. 6, v. 160.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.

Progne, a daughter of Pandion king of Athens by Zeuxippe. She married Tereus king of Thrace, by whom she had a son called Itylus or Irys. Vid. Philomela.

Prolæus, a native of Elis, father to Philanthus and Lampus by Lysippe. Paus. 5, c. 2.

Promæchus, one of the Epigoni, son of Parthenopus. Paus. 2, c. 20.—A son of Psophis daughter of Eryx king of Sicily. Id. 8, c. 34.—An athlete of Pallene.—A son of Æson, killed by Pelias. Apollod.

Promathidas, an historian of Heracles.

Promathion, a man who wrote a history of Italy. Plut. in Rom.

Promædon, a native of the island of Naxos, &c.

Promenæa, one of the priestesses of the temple of Dodona. It was from her that Herodotus received the tradition that two doves had flown from Thebes in Egypt, one to Dodona, and the other to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, where they gave oracles.—Herodot. 2, c. 55.

Promethæ fugum and antrum, a place on the top of mount Caucasus, in Albania.

Prométhæus, a son of Iapetus by Clymenc, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Atlas, Menætius, and Epimethæus, and surpassed all mankind in cunning and fraud. He ridiculed the gods, and deceived Jupiter himself. He sacrificed two bulls, and filled their skins, one with the flesh and the other with the bones, and asked the father of the gods which of the two he preferred as an offering. Jupiter became the dupe of his artifice, and chose the bones, and from that time the priests of the temples were ever after ordered to burn the whole victims on the altars, the flesh and the bones altogether. To punish Prométhæus and the rest of mankind, Jupiter took fire away from the earth, but the son of Iapetus outwitted the father of the gods. He climbed the heavens by the assistance of Minerva, and stole fire from the chariot of the sun, which he brought down upon the earth at the end of a ferula. This provoked Jupiter the more; he ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and after he had given her life, he sent her to Prométhæus, with a box of the richest and most valuable presents which she had received from the gods. Vid. Pandora. Prométhæus, who suspected Jupiter, took no notice of Pandora or her box, but he made his brother Epimethæus marry her, and the god, now more irritated, ordered Mercury, or Vulcan, according to Æschylus, to carry this artful mortal to mount Caucasus, and there tie him to a rock, where for 30,000 years a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never diminished, though continually devoured. He was delivered from this painful confinement about 30 years afterwards by Hercules, who killed the bird of prey. The vulture, or, according to others, the eagle which devoured the liver of Prométhæus, was born from Typhon and Echidna. According to Apollodorus, Prométhæus made the first man and woman that ever were upon the earth with clay, which he animated by means of the fire which he had stolen from heaven. On this account, therefore, the Athenians raised him an altar in the grove of Academus, where they yearly celebrated games to his honour. During these games there was a race, and he who carried a burning torch in his hand without extinguishing it obtained the prize. Prométhæus, as it is universally credited, had received the gift of prophecy; and all the gods, and even Jupiter himself, consulted him as a most infallible oracle. To him mankind are indebted for the invention of many of the useful arts; he taught them the use of plants, with their physical power, and from him they received the knowledge of taming horses and different animals, either to cultivate the ground, or for the purposes of luxury. Hesiod. Theog. 510 & 550.—Apollod. 1 & 2.—Paus. 1, c. 30. l. 5, c. 11.—Hygin. fab. 144.—Æschyl. in Prom.—Virg. Eccl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 82.—Horat. 1, od. 3.—Seneca, in Met. 823.

Prométhis and Prométhides, a patronymic applied to the children of Prométhæus, as to Deucalion, &c. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 390.

Prométhus and Damascithon, two sons of Codrus, who conducted colonies into Asia Minor. Paus. 1, c. 3.

Proméus, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

Pronapides, an ancient Greek poet of Athens, who was, according to some, preceptor to Homer. It is said that he first taught the Greeks how to write from the left to the right, contrary to the custom of writing from the right to the left, which is still observed by some of the eastern nations. Diod. 3.

Pronax, a brother of Adrastus king of Argos, son of Talauus and Lysimache. Paus. 3, c. 18.

Pronoe, a daughter of Phorbas, mother of Pleuron and Calydon by Æolus.

Pronômus, a Theban who played so skilfully on the lute, that the invention of that musical instrument is attributed to him. Paus. 9, c. 12.—Athen. 14, c. 7.

Pronous, a son of Phlegæas, killed by the sons of Alcæon.

Pronôba, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriages. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 166.

Propertius Sextus Aurelius, a Latin poet born at Mevania, in Umbria. His father was a Roman knight, whom Augustus proscribed, because he had followed the interest of Antony. He came to Rome, where his genius and poetical talents soon recommended him to the notice of the great and powerful. Mæcenas, Gallus, and Virgil became his friends, and Augustus his patron. Mæcenas wished him to attempt an epic poem, of which he proposed the emperor for hero; but Propertius refused, observing that his abilities were unequal to the task. He died about 19 years before Christ, in the 40th year of his age. His works consist of four books of elegies, which are written with so much spirit, vivacity, and energy, that many authors call him the prince of the elegiac poets among the Latins. His poetry, though elegant, is not free from faults, and the many lascivious expressions which he uses deservedly expose him to censure. Cynthia, who is the heroine of all his elegies, was a Roman lady, whose real name was Hostia, or Hostilia, of whom the poet was deeply enamoured. Though Mevania is more generally supposed to be the place of his birth, yet four other cities of Umbria have disputed the honour of it; Hespillus, Ameria, Perugia, and Assisium. The best edition is that of Santenius, 4to, Traj. ad Rh. 1780; and when published together with Catullus and Tibullus, those of Grævius, 8vo, Utr. 1680, and of Vulpinus, 4 vols. Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755, and the edition of Barboiu, 12mo, Paris, 1754.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 405. l. 4, et. 10, v. 55. De Art. Am. 3, v. 333.—Martial. 8, ep. 73. l. 14, ep. 189.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 6, ep. l. 9, ep. 22.

Propeëtides, some women of Cyprus, severely punished by Venus, whose divinity they had despised. They sent their daughters to the sea-shore, where they prostituted themselves to strangers. The poets have feigned that they were changed into stones, on account of their insensibility to every virtuous sentiment. Justin. 18, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 238.

Propontis, a sea which has a communication with the Euxine, by the Thracian Bosphorus, and with the Ægean by the Hellespont, now called the sea of Marmora. It is about 175 miles long and 62 broad, and it received its name from its vicinity to Pontus. Mela, 2, c. 19.—Strab. 2.—Ovid. 1, Trist. 9, v. 29.—Proper. 3, et. 22.

Propylea, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Eleusis in Attica.

Prosclystius, a surname of Neptune among the Greeks. Paus. 2.

Proserpina, a daughter of Ceres by Jupiter, called by the Greeks Persephone. She was so beautiful, that the father of the gods himself became enamoured of her, and deceived her by changing himself into a serpent, and folding her in his wreaths. Proserpine made Sicily the place of her residence, and delighted herself with the beautiful views, the flowery meadows, and limpid streams, which surrounded the plains of Enna. In this solitary retreat, as she amused herself with her female attendants in gathering flowers, Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which she became the queen. Vid. Pluto. Ceres was so disconsolate at the loss of her daughter, that she travelled all over the world, but her inquiries were in vain, and she never could have discovered whether she had been carried, had not she found the girdle of Proserpine on the surface of the waters of the fountain Cyane, near which the ravisher had opened himself a passage to his kingdom by striking the earth with his trident. Ceres soon learned from the nymph Arethusa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto, and immediately she repaired to Jupiter, and demanded of him to punish the ravisher. Jupiter in vain attempted to persuade the mother that Pluto was not unworthy of her daughter, and when he saw that she was inflexible for the restitution of Proserpine, he said that she might return on earth, if she had not taken any aliments in the infernal regions. Her return, however, was impossible. Proserpine, as she walked in the Elysian fields, had gathered a pomegranate from a tree and eaten it, and Ascalaphus was the only one who saw it, and for his discovery the goddess instantly turned him into an owl. Jupiter, to appease the resentment of Ceres, and soothe her grief, permitted that Proserpine should remain six months with Pluto in the infernal regions, and that she should spend the rest of the year with her mother on earth. As queen of hell, and wife of Pluto, Proserpine presided over the death of mankind, and, according to the opinion of the ancients, no one could die, if the goddess herself, or Atropos her minister, did not cut off one of the hairs from the head. From this superstitious belief, it was usual to cut off some of the hair of the deceased, and to strew it at the door of the house, as an offering for Proserpine. The Sicilians were very particular in their worship to Proserpine, and as they believed that the fountain Cyane had risen from the earth at the very place where Pluto had opened himself a passage, they annually sacrificed there a bull, of which they suffered the blood to run into the water. Proserpine was universally worshipped by the ancients, and she was known by the different names of Core, Theogamia, Libitina, Hecate, Juno inferna, Anthesphoria, Cotyio, Deois, Libera, &c. Plut. in Luc.—Paus. 8, c. 37. l. 9, c. 31.—*Ovid. Prosoptis, an island in one of the mouths of the Nile. Herodot. 2, c. 4.

Prosper, one of the fathers who died A.D. 466. His works have been edited by Mangeant, fol. Paris, 1711.

Prosymna, a part of Argolis, where Juno was worshipped. It received its name from a nymph of the same name, daughter of Asterion, who nursed Juno. Paus. 2.

Protagoras, a Greek philosopher of Abdera in Thrace, who was originally a porter. He became one of the disciples of Democritus, when that philosopher had seen him carrying faggots on his head, poised in a proper equilibrium. He soon rendered himself ridiculous by his doctrines, and in a book which he published, he denied the existence of a Supreme Being. This doctrine he supported by observing, that his doubts arose from the uncertainty of the existence of a Supreme Power, and from the shortness of human life. This book was publicly burnt at Athens, and the philosopher banished from the city, as a worthless and contemptible being. Protagoras visited from Athens different islands in the Mediterranean, and died in Sicily in a very advanced age, about 400 years before the christian era. He generally reasoned by dilemmas, and always left the mind in suspense about all the questions which he proposed. Some suppose that he was drowned. Diog. 9.—Plut. in Protag.—A king of Cyprus, tributary to the court of Persia.—Another.

Protagorides, an historian of Cyricus, who wrote a treatise on the games of Daphne, celebrated at Antioch.

Protei columnæ, a place in the remotest parts of Egypt. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 262.

Protosil turris, the monument of Protesilaus, on the Hellespont. Plin. 4, c. 11.—Mela, 2, c. 2.

Prôtêsillæus, a king of part of Thessaly, son of Iphiclus, originally called Iolæus, grandson of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimedæ the mother of Jason. He married Laodamia the daughter of Acastus, and some time after he departed with the rest of the Greeks for the Trojan war with 40 sail. He was the first of the Greeks who set foot on the Trojan shore, and as such he was doomed by the oracle to perish, therefore he was killed as soon as he had leaped from his ship, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the person who killed him. His wife Laodamia destroyed herself when she heard of his death. Vid. Laodamia. Protesilaus has received the patronymic of Phylaciades either because he was descended from Phylax, or because he was a native of Phylax. He was buried on the Trojan shore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which, as soon as they could be discovered and seen from Troy, immediately withered and decayed, and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and suffered the same vicissitude. Homer. Il. 2, v. 205.—Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 1. Heroid. 12, v. 27.—Propert. 2, el. 19.—Hygin. fab. 103, &c.

Proteus, a sea deity, son of Oceanus and Tethys, or, according to some, of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune because he had tamed the monsters of the sea, and from his knowledge of futurity mankind received the greatest services. He usually resided in the Carpathian sea, and, like the rest of the gods, he reposed himself on the sea-shore, where such as wished to consult him generally resorted. He was difficult of access, and when consulted he refused to give answers, by immediately assuming different shapes, and if not properly secured in letters, eluding the grasp in the form of a tiger, or a lion, or disappearing in a flame of fire, a whirlwind, or a rushing stream. Aristæus and Menelaus were in the number of those who consulted him, as also Hercules. Some suppose that he was originally king of Egypt, known among his subjects by the name of Cetes, and they assert that he had two sons, Telegonus and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had also some daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. Homer. Od. 4, v. 360.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 10. Am. el. 12, v. 36.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 243.—Virg. G. 4, v. 387.—Hygin. fab. 118.—Herodot. 2, c. 112.—Diod. 1.

Protheus, a Greek at the Trojan war.—A Spartan who endeavoured to prevent a war with the Thebans.

Prothous, a son of Lycaon of Arcadia. Apollod. 1.—A son of Agrius.

Protogenêa, a daughter of Calydon, by Æolia the daughter of Amythaon. She had a son called Orylus by Mars. Apollod. 1.

Protogènes, a painter of Rhodes, who flourished about 328 years before Christ. He was originally so poor that he painted ships to maintain himself. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes, and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians; they became sensible of the merit of their countryman, and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for seven years in finishing a picture of Jalyus, a celebrated huntsman, supposed to have been the son of Apollo, and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived upon lupines and water, thinking that such aliments would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not seem to make him more successful in the perfection of his picture. He was to represent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with satisfaction to himself; and when all his labours seemed to be without success, he threw his sponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the utmost labours of art could not do; the fall of the sponge upon the picture represented the froth of the mouth of the dog in the most perfect and natural manner, and the piece was universally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his representations, and copied nature with the greatest nicety, but this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius besieged Rhodes he refused to set fire to a part of the city which might have made him master of the whole, because he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found closely employed in a garden in finishing a picture; and when the conqueror asked him why he showed not more concern at the general calamity, he replied, that Demetrius made war against the Rhodians, and not against the fine arts. Paus. 1, c. 3.—Plin. 35, c. 10.—Ælian. V. H. 12.—Suet. 3, v. 120.—Plut. in Dem.—One of Calligula's favourites, famous for his cruelty and extravagance.

Protogenia, a daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom she had Ethlius the father of Endymion. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 155.—Another. Vid. Protogenea.

Protomedusa, one of the Nereides, called Protomela by Hesiod. Th. 245.

Proxenus, a Boeotian of great authority at Thebes, in the age of Xenophon. Polyen.—A writer who published historical accounts of Sparta. Athen.

Prudentius Aurelius Clemens, a Latin poet who flourished A. D. 392, and was successively a soldier, an advocate, and a judge. His poems are numerous, and all theological, devoid of the elegance and purity of the Augustan age, and yet greatly valued. The best editions are the Delphin, 4to, Paris, 1687; that of Cellarius, 12mo, Hatz, 1703; and that of Parma, 2 vols. 4to, 1788.

Prumnides, a king of Corinth.

Prusa, a town of Bithynia, built by king Prusias, from whom it received its name. Strab. 12.—Plin. 10, ep. 16.

Prusius Dion, flourished A. D. 105.

Prusias, a king of Bithynia, who flourished 221 B. C.—Another, surnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war against Eumenes king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Prusias, complained before the Romans of the hostilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was sent from Rome to settle the disputes of the two monarchs, and he was no sooner arrived in Bithynia, than Prusias, to gain his favour, prepared to deliver to him, at his request, the celebrated Carthaginian, to whom he was indebted for all the advantages which he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. Prusias was obliged by the Roman ambassador to make a restitution of the provinces he had conquered, and by his meanness he continued to enjoy the favours of the Romans. When some time after he visited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted slave, calling himself the freedman of the Romans; and when he was introduced into the senate-house, he saluted the senators by the name of visible deities, of saviours and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his subjects, and when he returned home the Bithynians revolted, and placed his son Nicomedes on the throne. The banished monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was assassinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Christ. Some say that his son became his murderer. Prusias, according to Polybius, was the meanest of monarchs, without honesty, without morals, virtue, or principle; he was cruel and cowardly, intemperate and voluptuous, and an enemy to all learning. He was naturally deformed, and he often appeared in public in the habit of a woman, to render his deformities more visible. Polyb.—Liv.—Justin. 31, &c.—C. Nep. in Annib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

Prymno, one of the Oceanides.
Prytanes, certain magistrates at Athens who presided over the senate, and had the privilege of assembling it when they pleased, festivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered sacrifices, and feasted together with all those who had rendered signal service to their country. The Prytanes were elected from the senators which were in number 500, 50 of which were chosen from each tribe. When they were elected, the names of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one vessel, and in another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whose name was drawn with the white bean, presided the first, and the rest in the order in which they were drawn. They presided each for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe presided the rest of those days which were supernumerary. When the number of tribes was increased to 12, each of the Prytanes presided one full month.—Some of the principal magistrates of Corinth were also called Prytanes.

Prytanis, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidae. Paus. 2, c. 36.—One of the friends of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

Psamathe, one of the Nereides, mother of Phocus by Æacus king of Ægina. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 398.—Flacc. v. 364.—A daughter of Crotopus king of Argos. She became mother of Linus by Apollo, and to conceal her shame from her father, she exposed her child, which was found by dogs and torn to pieces. Paus. 1, c. 43.—A fountain and town of Thebes. Flacc. 1, v. 364.

Psamathos, a town and port of Laconia. Paus. 5, c. 25.

Psammenitus, succeeded his father Amasis on the throne of Egypt. Cambyses made war against him, and as he knew that the Egyptians paid the greatest veneration to cats, the Persian monarch placed some of these animals at the head of his army, and the enemy, unable to defend themselves, and unwilling to kill those objects of adoration, were easily conquered. Psammenitus was twice beaten at Pelusium and in Memphis, and became one of the prisoners of Cambyses, who treated him with great humanity. Psammenitus, however, raised seditions against the Persian monarch; and attempted to make the Egyptians rebel, for which he was put to death by drinking his blood. He had reigned about six months. He flourished about 525 years before the christian era. Herodot. 3, c. 10, &c.

Psammetichus, a king of Egypt. He was one of the 12 princes who shared the kingdom among themselves; but as he was more popular than the rest, he was banished from his dominions, and retired into the marshes near the sea-shore. A descent of some of the Greeks upon Egypt proved favourable to his cause; he joined the enemy, and defeated the 11 princes who had expelled him from the country. He rewarded the Greeks, by whose valour he had recovered Egypt, he allotted them some territory on the sea-coast, patronized the liberal arts, and encouraged commerce among his subjects. He made useless inquiries to find the sources of the Nile, and he stopped, by bribes and money, a large army of Scythians that were marching against him. He died 617 years before the christian era, and was buried in Minerva's temple at Sais. During his reign there was a contention among some of the neighbouring nations about the antiquity of their language. Psammetichus took a part in the contest. He confined two young children and fed them with milk; the shepherd to whose care they were entrusted was ordered never to speak to them, but to watch diligently their articulations. After some time the shepherd observed, that whenever he entered the place of their confinement they repeatedly exclaimed Beccos, and he gave information of this to the monarch. Psammetichus made inquiries, and found that the word Beccos signified bread in the Phœnician language, and from that circumstance, therefore, it was universally concluded that the language of Phœnicia was of the greatest antiquity. Herodot. 2, c. 28, &c.—Polyan. 8.—Strab. 16.—A son of Gordius, brother to Periander, who held the tyranny at Corinth for three years, B.C. 584. Aristot. Polit. 5, c. 12.

Psammis, or Psammuthis, a king of Egypt, B.C. 376.

Psaphis, a town on the confines of Attica and Bœotia. There was there an oracle of Amphiaraus.

Psapho, a Libyan who taught a number of birds which he kept to say, "Psapho is a god," and afterwards gave them their liberty. The birds did not forget the words which they had been taught, and the Africans paid divine honours to Psapho. Ælian.

Psæcas, one of Diana's attendant nymphs. Ovid. Met. 3.

Psophis, a town of Arcadia near the river Erymanthus, whose name it originally bore, and afterwards that of Phœgia. Stat. Th. 4, v. 296.—Paus. 8, c. 24.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 607.—A river and town of Elis.—A daughter of Eryx.—A town of Acarnania.—Another of Libya.

Psyche, a nymph whom Cupid married and carried into a place of bliss, where he long enjoyed her company. Venus put her to death because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter, at the request of Cupid, granted immortality to Psyche. The word signifies the soul, and this personification of Psyche first mentioned by Apuleius is posterior to the Augustan age, though still it is connected with ancient mythology. Psyche is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly, to intimate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol, and on that account, among the ancients, when a man had just expired, a butterfly appeared fluttering above, as if rising from the mouth of the deceased.

Psychrus, a river of Thrace. When sheep drank of its waters they were said always to bring forth black lambs. Aristot.

Psylli, a people of Libya near the Syrtis, very expert in curing the venomous bite of serpents, which had no fatal effect upon them. Strab. 17.—Dio. 51, c. 14.—Lucan. 9, v. 894, 937.—Herodot. 4, c. 173.—Paus. 9, c. 28.

Pteleum, a town of Thessaly on the borders of Bœotia. Lucan. 6, v. 852.—Liv. 35, c. 43.

Pterelaus, a son of Taphius, presented with immortality from Neptune, provided he kept on his head a yellow lock. His daughter cut it off and he died. He reigned at Taphos in Argos, &c. Apolod. 2, c. 4.

Pteria, a well-fortified town of Cappadocia. It was in the neighbourhood, according to some, that Cressus was defeated by Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 76.

Ptoleiderma, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 27.

Ptolemaeum, a certain place at Athens dedicated to exercise and study. Cic. 5, de fin.

Ptolemaeus I., surnamed Lagus, a king of Egypt, son of Arsinoe, who, when pregnant by Philip of Macedonia, married Lagus, a man of mean extraction. Vid. Lagus. Ptolemy was educated in the court of the king of Macedonia; he became one of the friends and associates of Alexander, and when that monarch invaded Asia, the son of Arsinoe attended him as one of his generals. During the expedition, he behaved with uncommon valour; he killed one of the Indian monarchs in single combat, and it was to his prudence and courage that Alexander was indebted for the reduction of the rock Aornus. After the conqueror's death, in the general division of the Macedonian empire, Ptolemy obtained as his share the government of Egypt, with Libya, and part of the neighbouring territories of Arabia. In this appointment the governor soon gained the esteem of the people by acts of kindness, by benevolence, and clemency; and though he did not assume the title of independent monarch till 19 years after, yet he was so firmly established, that the attempts of Perdiccas to drive him away from his possessions proved abortive; and Ptolemy, after the murder of his rival by Grecian soldiers, might have added the kingdom of Macedonia to his Egyptian territories. He made himself master of Cœlosyria, Phœnicia, and the neighbouring coast of Syria, and when he had reduced Jerusalem, he carried about 100,000 prisoners to Egypt, to people the extensive city of Alexandria, which became the capital of his dominions. After he had rendered these prisoners the most attached and faithful of his subjects by his liberality and the grant of privileges, Ptolemy assumed the title of king of Egypt, and soon after reduced Cyprus under his power. He made war with success against Demetrius and Antigonus, who disputed his right to the provinces of Syria, and from the assistance he gave to the people of Rhodes against their common enemies, he received the name of Soter. While he extended his dominions, Ptolemy was not negligent of the advantages of his people. The bay of Alexandria being dangerous of access, he built a tower to conduct the sailors in the obscurity of the night [Vid. Pharos], and that his subjects might be acquainted with literature, he laid the foundation of a library, which, under the succeeding reigns, became the most celebrated in the world. He also established in the capital of his dominions a society called musæum, of which the members, maintained at the public expense, were employed in philosophical researches, and in the advancement of science and the liberal arts. Ptolemy died in the 84th year of his age, after a reign of 39 years, about 284 years before Christ. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had been his partner on the throne the last 10 years of his reign. Ptolemy Lagus has been commended for his abilities, not only as a sovereign, but as a writer, and among the many valuable compositions which have been lost, we are to lament a history of Alexander the Great, by the king of Egypt, greatly admired and valued for elegance and authenticity. All his successors were called Ptolemies from him. Paus. 10, c. 7.—Justin. 13, &c.—Polyb. 2.—Arrian.—Curt.—Plut. in Alex.

Ptolemaeus II., son of Ptolemy I., succeeded his father on the Egyptian throne, and was called Philadelphus by antiphrasis, because he killed two of his brothers. He showed himself worthy in every respect to succeed his great father, and, conscious of the advantages which arise from an alliance with powerful nations, he sent ambassadors to Italy to solicit the friendship of the Romans, whose name and military reputation had become universally known for the victories which they had just obtained over Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. His ambassadors were received with marks of the greatest attention, and immediately after four Roman senators came to Alexandria, where they gained the admiration of the monarch and of his subjects, and, by refusing the crowns of gold and the rich presents which were offered to them, convinced the world of the virtue and of the disinterestedness of their nation. But while Ptolemy strengthened himself by alliance with foreign powers, the internal peace of his kingdom was disturbed by the revolt of Magas his brother, king of Cyrene. The sedition, however, was stopped, though kindled by Antiochus king of Syria, and the death of the rebellious prince re-established peace for some time in the family of Philadelphus. Antiochus the Syrian king married Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and the father, though old and infirm, conducted his daughter to her husband's kingdom, and assisted at the nuptials. Philadelphus died in the 64th year of his age, 246 years before the christian era. He left two sons and a daughter by Arsinoe the daughter of Lysimachus. He had afterwards married his sister Arsinoe, whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, and to whose memory he began to erect a celebrated monument. Vid. Dinocrates. During the whole of his reign, Philadelphus was employed in exciting industry, and in encouraging the liberal arts and useful knowledge among his subjects. The inhabitants of the adjacent countries were allured by promises and presents to increase the number of the Egyptian subjects, and Ptolemy could boast of reigning over 33,339 well-peopled cities. He gave every possible encouragement to commerce, and by keeping two powerful fleets, one in the Mediterranean, and the other in the Red sea, he made Egypt the mart of the world. His army consisted of 200,000 foot, 40,000 horse, besides 300 elephants and 2000 armed chariots. With justice, therefore, he has been called the richest of all the princes and monarchs of his age, and, indeed, the remark is not false when it is observed, that at his death he left in his treasury 750,000 Egyptian talents, a sum equivalent to two hundred millions sterling. His palace was the asylum of learned men, whom he admired and patronized. He paid particular attention to Euclid, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron, and by increasing the library which his father had founded, he showed his taste for learning, and his wish to encourage genius. This celebrated library at his death contained 200,000 volumes of the best and choicest books, and it was afterwards increased to 700,000 volumes. Part of it was burnt by the flames of Cæsar's fleet when he set it on fire to save himself, a circumstance, however, not mentioned by the general, and the whole was again magnificently repaired by Cleopatra, who added to the Egyptian library that of the kings of Pergamus. It is said that the Old Testament was translated into Greek during his reign, a translation which has been called Septuagint, because translated by the labours of 70 different persons. Eutrop.—Justin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut.—Theocrit.—Athen. 12.—Plin. 13, c. 12.—Dio. 42.—Gellius, 6, c. 17.

Ptolemæus III., succeeded his father Philadelphus on the Egyptian throne. He early engaged in a war against Antiochus Theus, for his unkindness to Berenice, the Egyptian king's sister, whom he had married with the consent of Philadelphus. With the most rapid success he conquered Syria and Cilicia, and advanced as far as the Tigris, but a sedition at home stopped his progress, and he returned to Egypt loaded with the spoils of conquered nations. Among the immense riches which he brought, he had above 2500 statues of the Egyptian gods, which Cambyses had carried away into Persia when he conquered Egypt. These were restored to the temples, and the Egyptians called their sovereign Evergetes, in acknowledgment of his attention, beneficence, and religious zeal for the gods of his country. The last years of Ptolemy's reign were passed in peace, if we except the refusal of the Jews to pay the tribute of 20 silver talents which their ancestors had always paid to the Egyptian monarchs. He also interested himself in the affairs of Greece, and assisted Cleomeas the Spartan king against the leaders of the Achaean league; but he had the mortification to see his ally defeated, and even a fugitive in Egypt. Evergetes died 22 years before Christ, after a reign of 25 years, and, like his two illustrious predecessors, he was the patron of learning, and, indeed, he is the last of the Lagides who gained popularity among his subjects by clemency, moderation and humanity, and who commanded respect even from his enemies, by valour, prudence, and reputation. It is said that he deposited 15 talents in the hands of the Athenians to be permitted to translate the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. Plut. in Cleom., &c.—Polyb. 2.—Justin. 20, &c.

Ptolemæus IV., succeeded his father Evergetes on the throne of Egypt, and received the surname of Philopater by antiphrasis, because, according to some historians, he destroyed his father by poison. He began his reign with acts of the greatest cruelty, and he successively sacrificed to his avarice his own mother, his wife, his sister, and his brother. He received the name of Tiphon from his extravagance and debauchery, and that of Gallus, because he appeared in the streets of Alexandria like one of the bacchanals, and with all the gestures of the priests of Cybele. In the midst of his pleasures, Philopater was called to war against Antiochus king of Syria, and at the head of a powerful army he soon invaded his enemies' territories, and might have added the kingdom of Syria to Egypt, if he had made a prudent use of the victories which attended his arms. In his return he visited Jerusalem, but the Jews prevented him forcibly from entering their temple, for which insolence to his majesty the monarch determined to extirpate the whole nation. He ordered an immense number of Jews to be exposed in a plain, and trodden under the feet of elephants, but, by a supernatural instinct, the generous animals turned their fury not on those that had been devoted to death, but upon the Egyptian spectators. This circumstance terrified Philopater, and he behaved with more than common kindness to a nation which he had so lately devoted to destruction. In the latter part of his reign, the Romans, whom a dangerous war with Carthage had weakened, but at the same time roused to superior activity, renewed, for political reasons, the treaty of alliance which had been made with the Egyptian monarchs. Philopater at last, weakened and enervated by intemperance and continual debauchery, died in the 37th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years, 204 years before the Christian era. His death was immediately followed by the murder of the companions of his voluptuousness and extravagance, and their carcasses were dragged with the greatest ignominy through the streets of Alexandria. Polyb.—Justin. 30, &c.—Plut. in Cleom.

Ptolemæus V., succeeded his father Philopater as king of Egypt, though only in the fourth year of his age. During the years of his minority he was under the protection of Sosibius and of Aristomenes, by whose prudent administration Antiochus was dispossessed of the provinces of Coelosyria and Palestine, which he had conquered by war. The Romans also renewed their alliance with him after their victories over Annibal, and the conclusion of the second Punic war. This flattering embassy induced Aristomenes to offer the care of the patronage of the young monarch to the Romans, but the regent was confirmed in his honourable office, and by making a treaty of alliance with the people of Achaia, he convinced the Egyptians that he was qualified to wield the sceptre and to govern the nation. But now that Ptolemy had reached his 14th year, according to the laws and customs of Egypt, the years of his minority had expired. He received the surname of Epiphanes, or Illustrious, and was crowned at Alexandria with the greatest solemnity, and the faithful Aristomenes resigned into his hands an empire which he had governed with honour to himself and with credit to his sovereign. Young Ptolemy was no sooner delivered from the shackles of a superior, than he betrayed the same vices which had characterized his father; the counsels of Aristomenes were despised, and the minister who for 10 years had governed the kingdom with equity and moderation, was sacrificed to the caprice of the sovereign, who abhorred him for the salutary advice which his own vicious inclinations did not permit him to follow. His cruelties raised seditions among his subjects, but these were twice quelled by the prudence and the moderation of one Polycrates, the most faithful of his corrupt ministers. In the midst of his extravagance, Epiphanes did not forget his alliance with the Romans; above all others he showed himself eager to cultivate friendship with a nation from whom he could derive so many advantages, and during their war against Antiochus he offered to assist them with money against a monarch whose daughter Cleopatra he had married, but whom he hated on account of the seditions he raised in the very heart of Egypt. After a reign of 24 years, 180 years before Christ, Ptolemy was poisoned by his ministers, whom he had threatened to rob of their possessions, to carry on a war against Seleucus king of Syria. Liv. 35, c. 13, &c.—Justin., &c.

Ptolemæus VI., succeeded his father Epiphanes on the Egyptian throne, and received the surname of Philometor, on account of his hatred against his mother Cleopatra. He was in the sixth year of his age when he ascended the throne, and during his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, and at her death by a eunuch, who was one of his favourites. He made war against Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, to recover the provinces of Palestine and Coelosyria, which were part of the Egyptian dominions, and after several successes he fell into the hands of his enemy, who detained him in confinement. During the captivity of Philometor, the Egyptians raised to the throne his younger brother Ptolemy Evergetes, or Physcon, also son of Epiphanes, but he was no sooner established in his power than Antiochus turned his arms against Egypt, drove the usurper, and restored Philometor to all his rights and privileges as king of Egypt. This artful behaviour of Antiochus was soon comprehended by Philometor, and when he saw that Pelusium, the key of Egypt, had remained in the hands of his Syrian ally, he recalled his brother Physcon, and made him partner on the throne, and concerted with him how to repel their common enemy. This union of interest in the two royal brothers incensed Antiochus; he entered Egypt with a large army, but the Romans checked his progress and obliged him to retire. No sooner were they delivered from the impending war, than Philometor and Physcon, whom the fear of danger had united, began with mutual jealousy to oppose each other's views. Physcon was at last banished by the superior power of his brother, and as he could find no support in Egypt, he immediately repaired to Rome. To excite more effectually the compassion of the Romans, and to gain their assistance, he appeared in the meanest dress, and took his residence in the most obscure corner of the city. He received an audience from the senate, and the Romans settled the dispute between the two royal brothers, by making them independent of one another, and giving the government of Libya and Cyrene to Physcon, and confirming Philometor in the possession of Egypt, and the island of Cyprus. These terms of accommodation were gladly accepted, but Physcon soon claimed the dominion of Cyprus, and in this he was supported by the Romans, who wished to aggrandize themselves by the diminution of the Egyptian power. Philometor refused to deliver up the island of Cyprus, and to call away his brother's attention, he fomented the seeds of rebellion in Cyrene. But the death of Philometor, 145 years before the christian era, left Physcon master of Egypt and all the dependent provinces. Philometor has been commended by some historians for his clemency and moderation. Diod.—Liv.—Polyb.

Ptolemaeus VII., surnamed Physcon, on account of the prominence of his belly, ascended the throne of Egypt after the death of his brother Philometor, and as he had reigned for some time conjointly with him [vid. Ptolemaeus VI.], his succession was approved, though the wife and the son of the deceased monarch laid claim to the crown. Cleopatra was supported in her claims by the Jews, and it was at last agreed that Physcon should marry the queen, and that her son should succeed on the throne at his death. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but on that very day the tyrant murdered Cleopatra's son in her arms. He ordered himself to be called Evergetes, but the Alexandrians refused to do it, and stigmatized him with the appellation of Kakergetes, or evil-doer, a surname which he deserved by his tyranny and oppression. A series of barbarity rendered him odious, but as no one attempted to rid Egypt of her tyranny, the Alexandrians abandoned their habitations, and fled from a place which continually streamed with the blood of their massacred fellow-citizens. If their migration proved fatal to the commerce and prosperity of Alexandria, it was of the most essential service to the countries where they retired; and the numbers of Egyptians that sought a safer asylum in Greece and Asia, introduced among the inhabitants of those countries the different professions that were practised with success in the capital of Egypt. Physcon endeavoured to repeople the city which his cruelty had laid desolate; but the fear of sharing the fate of the former inhabitants, prevailed more than the promise of riches, rights, and immunities. The king at last, disgusted with Cleopatra, repudiated her, and married her daughter by Philometor, called also Cleopatra. He still continued to exercise the greatest cruelty upon his subjects, but the prudence and vigilance of his ministers kept the people in tranquillity, till all Egypt revolted when the king had basely murdered all the young men of Alexandria. Without friends or support in Egypt he fled to Cyprus, and Cleopatra the divorced queen ascended the throne. In his banishment Physcon dreaded lest the Alexandrians should also place the crown on the head of his son, by his sister Cleopatra, who was then governor of Cyrene, and under these apprehensions he sent for the young prince, called Memphitis, to Cyprus, and murdered him as soon as he reached the shore. To make the barbarity more complete he sent the limbs of Memphitis to Cleopatra, and they were received as the queen was going to celebrate her birthday. Soon after this he invaded Egypt with an army, and obtained a victory over the forces of Cleopatra, who, being left without friends or assistance, fled to her eldest daughter Cleopatra, who had married Demetrius king of Syria. This decisive blow restored Physcon to his throne, where he continued to reign for some time, hated by his subjects, and feared by his enemies. He died at Alexandria in the 67th year of his age, after a reign of 29 years, about 116 years before Christ. Some authors have extolled Physcon for his fondness for literature; they have observed, that from his extensive knowledge he was called the philologist, and that he wrote a comment upon Homer, besides a history in 24 books, admired for its elegance, and often quoted by succeeding authors who pen was employed on the same subject. Diod.—Justin. 38, sec.—Athen. 2.—Porphy.

Ptolemaeus VIII., surnamed Lathyrus, from an excrescence like a pea on the nose, succeeded his father Physcon as king of Egypt. He had no sooner ascended the throne, than his mother Cleopatra, who reigned conjointly with him, expelled him to Cyprus, and placed the crown on the head of his brother Ptolemy Alexander, her favourite son. Lathyrus, banished from Egypt, became king of Cyprus; and soon after he appeared at the head of a large army, to make war against Alexander Janneus king of Judæa, through whose assistance and intrigue he had been expelled by Cleopatra. The Jewish monarch was conquered, and 50,000 of his men were left on the field of battle. Lathyrus, after he had exercised the greatest cruelty upon the Jews, and made vain attempts to recover the kingdom of Egypt, retired to Cyprus till the death of his brother Alexander restored him to his native dominions. Some of the cities of Egypt refused to acknowledge him as their sovereign; and Thebes, for its obstinacy, was closely besieged for three successive years, and from a powerful and populous city, it was reduced to ruins. In the latter part of his reign Lathyrus was called upon to assist the Romans with a navy for the conquest of Athens; but Lucullus, who had been sent to obtain the wanted supply, though received with kingly honours, was dismissed with evasive and unsatisfactory answers, and the monarch refused to part with troops which he deemed necessary to preserve the peace of his kingdom. Lathyrus died 83 years before the christian era, after a reign of 36 years since the death of his father Physcon, 15 of which he had passed with his mother Cleopatra on the Egyptian throne, 18 in Cyprus, and seven after his mother's death. He was succeeded by his only daughter Cleopatra, whom Alexander the son of Ptolemy Alexander, by means of the dictator Sylla, soon after married and murdered. *Joseph. Ptolemæus XII., the illegitimate son of Lathyrus, ascended the throne of Egypt at the death of Alexander III. He received the surname of Auletes, because he played skillfully on the flute. His rise showed great marks of prudence and circumspection; and as his predecessor by his will had left the kingdom of Egypt to the Romans, Auletes knew that he could not be firmly established on his throne without the approbation of the Roman senate. He was successful in his applications, and Cæsar, who was then consul, and in want of money, established his succession, and granted him the alliance of the Romans, after he had received the enormous sum of about 1,762,500*l.* sterling. But these measures rendered him unpopular at home, and when he had suffered the Romans quietly to take possession of Cyprus, the Egyptians revolted, and Auletes was obliged to fly from his kingdom, and seek protection among the most powerful of his allies. His complaints were heard at Rome, at first with indifference, and the murder of 100 noblemen of Alexandria, whom the Egyptians had sent to justify their proceedings before the Roman senate, rendered him unpopular and suspected. Pompey, however, supported his cause, and the senators decreed to re-establish Auletes on his throne; but as they proceeded slowly in the execution of their plans, the monarch retired from Rome to Ephesus, where he lay concealed for some time in the temple of Diana. During his absence from Alexandria, his daughter Berenice had made herself absolute, and established herself on the throne by a marriage with Archelaus, a priest of Beilona's temple at Comana; but she was soon driven from Egypt, when Gabinus, at the head of a Roman army, approached to replace Auletes on his throne. Auletes was no sooner restored to power, than he sacrificed to his ambition his daughter Berenice, and behaved with the greatest ingratitude and perfidy to Rabirius, a Roman who had supplied him with money when expelled from his kingdom. Auletes died four years after his restoration, about 51 years before the christian era. He left two sons and two daughters; and by his will ordered the eldest of his sons to marry the eldest of his sisters, and to ascend with her the vacant throne. As these children were young, the dying monarch recommended them to the protection and paternal care of the Romans, and accordingly Pompey the Great was appointed by the senate to be their patron and their guardian. Their reign was as turbulent as that of their predecessors, and it is remarkable for no uncommon events, only we may observe that the young queen was the Cleopatra who soon after became so celebrated as being the mistress of J. Cæsar, the wife of M. Antony, and the last of the Egyptian monarchs of the family of Lagus. Cic. pro Rabir.—Strab. 17.—Dion. 39.—Appian. de Civ.

Ptolemæus XIII., surnamed Dionysius or Bacchus, ascended the throne of Egypt conjointly with his sister Cleopatra, whom he had married, according to the directions of his father Auletes. He was under the care and protection of Pompey the Great (Vid. Ptolemæus XII.), but the wickedness and avarice of his ministers soon obliged him to reign independent. He was then in the 13th year of his age, when his guardian, after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, came to the shores of Egypt, and claimed his protection. He refused to grant the required assistance, and by the advice of his ministers he basely murdered Pompey, after he had brought him to shore under the mask of friendship and cordiality. To curry the favour of the conqueror of Pharsalia, Ptolemy cut off the head of Pompey; but Cæsar turned with indignation from such perfidy, and when he arrived at Alexandria, he found the king of Egypt as faithless to his cause as to that of his fallen enemy. Cæsar sat as judge to hear the various claims of the brother and sister to the throne; and to satisfy the people, he ordered the will of Auletes to be read, and confirmed Ptolemy and Cleopatra in the possession of Egypt, and appointed the two younger children masters of the island of Cyprus. This fair and candid decision might have left no room for dissatisfaction, but Ptolemy was governed by cruel and avaricious ministers, and therefore he refused to acknowledge Cæsar as a judge or a mediator. The Roman enforced his authority by arms, and three victories were obtained over the Egyptian forces. Ptolemy, who had been for some time a prisoner in the hands of Cæsar, now headed his armies; but a defeat was fatal, and as he attempted to save his life by flight, he was drowned in the Nile, about 46 years before Christ, and three years and eight months after the death of Auletes. Cleopatra, at the death of her brother, became sole mistress of Egypt; but as the Egyptians were no friends to female government, Cæsar obliged her to marry her younger brother Ptolemy, who was then in the 11th year of his age. Appian. Civ.—Cæsar. in Alex.—Strab. 17.—Joseph. Ant.—Dion.—Plut. in Ant., &c.—Sueton. in Cæsar.

Ptolemæus Apion, king of Cyrene, was the illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon. After a reign of 20 years he died; and as he had no children, he made the Romans heirs of his dominions. The Romans presented his subjects with their independence. Liv. 70.—Ceraunus, a son of Ptolemy Soter by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater. Unable to succeed to the throne of Egypt, Ceraunus fled to the court of Seleucus, where he was received with friendly marks of attention. Seleucus was then king of Macedonia, an empire which he had lately acquired by the death of Lysimachus in a battle in Phrygia; but his reign was short, and Ceraunus perfidiously murdered him and ascended his throne, 280 B.C. The murderer, however, could not be firmly established in Macedonia, as long as Arsinoe the widow and the children of Lysimachus were alive, and entitled to claim his kingdom as the lawful possession of their father. To remove these obstacles, Ceraunus made offers of marriage to Arsinoe, who was his own sister. The queen at first refused, but the protestations and solemn promises of the usurper at last prevailed upon her to consent. The nuptials, however, were no sooner celebrated, than Ceraunus murdered the two young princes, and confirmed his usurpation by rapine and cruelty. But now three powerful princes claimed the kingdom of Macedonia as their own: Antiochus the son of Seleucus; Antigonus the son of Demetrius; and Pyrrhus the king of Epirus. These enemies, however, were soon removed; Ceranus conquered Antigonus in the field of battle, and stopped the hostilities of his two other rivals by promises and money. He did not long remain inactive; a barbarian army of Gauls claimed a tribute from him, and the monarch immediately marched to meet them in the field. The battle was long and bloody. The Macedonians might have obtained the victory, if Ceranus had shown more prudence. He was thrown down from his elephant, and taken prisoner by the enemy, who immediately tore his body to pieces. Ptolemy had been king of Macedonia only 18 months. Justin. 24, &c.—Paus. 10, c. 10.—An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus king of Cyprus, of which he was tyrannically dispossessed by the Romans. Cato was at the head of the forces which were sent against Ptolemy by the senate, and the Roman general proposed to the monarch to retire from the throne, and to pass the rest of his days in the obscure office of high priest in the temple of Venus at Paphos. This offer was rejected with the indignation which it merited, and the monarch poisoned himself at the approach of the enemy. The treasures found in the island amounted to the enormous sum of 1,356,250*l.* sterling, which were carried to Rome by the conquerors. Plut. in Cat.—Val. Max. 9.—Flor. 3.—A man who attempted to make himself king of Macedonia, in opposition to Perdiccas. He was expelled by Pelopidas.—A son of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, by Antigone the daughter of Berenice. He was left governor of Epirus, when Pyrrhus went to Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, where he presided with great prudence and moderation. He was killed, bravely fighting in the expedition which Pyrrhus undertook against Sparta and Argos.—A eunuch, by whose friendly assistance Mithridates the Great saved his life after a battle with Lucullus.—A king of Epirus, who died very young as he was marching an army against the Ætolians, who had seized part of his dominions. Justin. 28.—A king of Chalcidica in Syria, about 30 years before Christ. He was seized and imprisoned for his treachery, and the Egyptian monarch at last ordered him to drink hemlock.—A son of Seleucus, killed in the celebrated battle which was fought at Issus, between Darius and Alexander the Great.—A son of Juba, made king of Mauritania. He was son of Cleopatra Selene the daughter of M. Antony, and the celebrated Cleopatra. He was put to death by Caius Caligula. *Dio.—Tacit. He was for some time governor of Jericho, about 135 years before Christ.—A powerful Jew during the troubles which disturbed the peace of Judæa, in the reign of Augustus.—A son of Antony by Cleopatra, surnamed Philadelphus by his father, and made master of Phœnicia, Syria, and all the territories of Asia Minor, which were situated between the Ægean and the Euphrates. Plut. in Anton.—A general of Herod king of Judæa.—A son of Chrysermus, who visited Cleomenes king of Sparta, when imprisoned in Egypt.—A governor of Alexandria, put to death by Cleomenes.—Claudius, a celebrated geographer and astrologer in the reign of Adrian and Antoninus. He was a native of Alexandria, or, according to others, of Pelusium, and on account of his great learning, he received the name of most wise, and most divine, among the Greeks. In his system of the world, he places the earth in the centre of the universe, a doctrine universally believed and adopted till the 16th century, when it was confuted and rejected by Copernicus. His geography is valued for its learning, and the very useful information which he gives. Besides his system and his geography Ptolemy wrote other books, in one of which he gives an account of the fixed stars, of 1022 of which he mentions the certain and definite longitude and latitude. The best edition of Ptolemy's geography is that of Bertius, fol. Amst. 1618, and that of his treatise de Judicis Astrologia by Camerac. 4to, 1555; and of the Harmonica, 4to, Wallis, Oxon. 1683.

Ptolemais, a town of Thebais in Egypt, called after the Ptolemies, who beautified it. There was also another city of the same name in the territories of Cyrene. It was situate on the sea-coast, and according to some, it was the same as Harce. *Vid. Publicia lex, was made by Publicius Philo the dictator, A.U.C. 445. It permitted one of the censors to be elected from the plebeians, since one of the consuls was chosen from that body. Liv. 8, c. 12.—Another, by which it was ordained, that all laws should be previously approved by the senators, before they were proposed by the people.

Publius Syrus, a Syrian mimic poet, who flourished about 44 years before Christ. He was originally a slave sold to a Roman patrician, called Domitius, who brought him up with great attention, and gave him his freedom when of age. He gained the esteem of the most powerful at Rome, and reckoned J. Cæsar among his patrons. He soon eclipsed the poet Laberius, whose burlesque compositions were in general esteem. There remains of Publius a collection of moral sentences, written in iambics, and placed in alphabetical order; the newest edition of which is that of Patav. Comin. 1740.

Publius, a prænomen common among the Romans.—Caius, a man who conspired with Brutus against J. Cæsar.—A pretor who conquered Palæopolis. He was only a plebeian, and though neither consul nor dictator, he obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senators. He was the first who was honoured with a triumph during a pretorship.—A Roman consul who defeated the Latins, and was made dictator.—A Roman flatterer in the court of Tiberius.—A tribune who accused Manlius, &c.

Pudicitia, a goddess who, as her name implies, presided over chastity. She had two temples at Rome. Festus de V. Sig.—Liv. 10, c. 7.

Pulchëria, a daughter of the emperor Theodosius the Great, famous for her piety, moderation, and virtues.—A daughter of Arcadius, who held the government of the Roman empire for many years. She was mother of Valentinian. Her piety, and her private as well as public virtues, have been universally admired. She died A.D. 452, and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is still to be seen.—A sister of Theodosius, who reigned absolute for some time in the Roman empire.

Pulchrum, a promontory near Carthage, now Rasa/raas. Liv. 29, c. 27.

Pullus, a surname of Numinorius.

Punicum bellum. The first Punic war was undertaken by the Romans against Carthage, B.C. 264. The ambition of Rome was the origin of this war. For upwards of 240 years, the two nations had beheld with secret jealousy each other's power, but they had totally eradicated every cause of contention, by settling, in three different treaties, the boundaries of their respective territories, the number of their allies, and how far one nation might sail in the Mediterranean without giving offence to the other. Sicily, an island of the highest consequence to the Carthaginians as a commercial nation, was the seat of the first dissensions. The Mamertini, a body of Italian mercenaries, were appointed by the king of Syracuse to guard the town of Messina, but this tumultuous tribe, instead of protecting the citizens, basely massacred them, and seized their possessions. This act of cruelty raised the indignation of all the Sicilians, and Hiero king of Syracuse, who had employed them, prepared to punish their perfidy; and the Mamertini, besieged in Messina, and without friends or resources, resolved to throw themselves for protection into the hands of the first power that could relieve them. They were, however, divided in their sentiments, and while some implored the assistance of Carthage, others called upon the Romans for protection. Without hesitation or delay, the Carthaginians entered Messina, and the Romans also hastened to give to the Mamertini that aid which had been claimed from them with as much eagerness as from the Carthaginians. At the approach of the Roman troops, the Mamertini, who had implored their assistance, took up arms, and forced the Carthaginians to evacuate Messina. Fresh forces were poured in on every side, and though Carthage seemed superior in arms and in resources, yet the valour and intrepidity of the Romans daily appeared more formidable, and Hiero, the Syracusan king, who hitherto had embraced the interest of the Carthaginians, became the most faithful ally of the republic. From a private quarrel the war became general. The Romans obtained a victory in Sicily, but as their enemies were masters at sea, the advantages which they gained were small and inconsiderable. To make themselves equal to their adversaries, they aspired to the dominion of the sea, and in 60 days timber was cut down, and a fleet of 120 galleys completely manned and provisioned. The successes they met with at sea were trivial, and little advantages could be gained over an enemy that were sailors by actual practice and long experience. Duilius at last obtained a victory, and he was the first Roman who ever received a triumph after a naval battle. The losses which they had already sustained induced the Carthaginians to sue for peace, and the Romans, whom an unsuccessful descent upon Africa, under Regulus [Vid. Regulus], had rendered diffident, listened to the proposal, and the first Punic war was concluded B.C. 241, on the following terms:—The Carthaginians pledged themselves to pay to the Romans, within 20 years, the sum of 3000 Eubœic talents; they promised to release all the Roman captives without ransom, to evacuate Sicily, and the other islands in the Mediterranean, and not to molest Hiero king of Syracuse, or his allies. After this treaty, the Carthaginians, who had lost the dominion of Sardinia and Sicily, made new conquests in Spain, and soon began to repair their losses by industry and labour. They planted colonies, and secretly prepared to revenge themselves upon their powerful rivals. The Romans were not insensible of their successes in Spain, and to stop their progress towards Italy, they made stipulations with the Carthaginians, by which they were not permitted to cross the Iberus, or to molest the cities of their allies the Saguntines. This was for some time observed, but when Annibal succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian armies in Spain, he spurned the boundaries which the jealousy of Rome had set to his arms, and he immediately formed the siege of Saguntum. The Romans were apprised of the hostilities which had been begun against their allies, but Saguntum was in the hands of the active enemy before they had taken any steps to oppose him. Complaints were carried to Carthage, and war was determined on by the influence of Annibal in the Carthaginian senate. Without delay or diffidence, B.C. 218, Annibal marched a numerous army of 90,000 foot and 12,000 horse towards Italy, resolved to carry on the war to the gates of Rome. He crossed the Rhone, the Alps, and the Apennines, with uncommon celerity, and the Roman consuls who were stationed to stop his progress were severally defeated. The battles of Trebia, of Ticinus, and of the lake of Thrasymenus, threw Rome into the greatest apprehensions, but the prudence and the dilatory measures of the dictator Fabius soon taught them to hope for better times. Yet the conduct of Fabius was universally censured as cowardice, and the two consuls who succeeded him in the command, by pursuing a different plan of operations, soon brought on a decisive action at Cannæ, in which 45,000 Romans were left in the field of battle. This bloody victory caused so much consternation at Rome, that some authors have declared that if Annibal had immediately marched from the plains of Cannæ to the city, he would have met with no resistance, but would have terminated a long and dangerous war with glory to himself, and the most inestimable advantages to his country. This celebrated victory at Cannæ left the conqueror master of two camps, and of an immense booty; and the cities which had hitherto observed a neutrality, no sooner saw the defeat of the Romans, than they eagerly embraced the interest of Carthage. The news of this victory was carried to Carthage by Mago, and the Carthaginians refused to believe it till three bushels of golden rings were spread before them, which had been taken from the Roman knights in the field of battle. After this Annibal called his brother Asdrubal from Spain with a large reinforcement; but the march of Asdrubal was intercepted by the Romans, his army was defeated, and himself slain.

Affairs now had taken a different turn, and Marcellus, who had the command of the Roman legions in Italy, soon taught his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible in the field. In different parts of the world the Romans were making very rapid conquests, and if the sudden arrival of a Carthaginian army in Italy at first raised fears and apprehensions, they were soon enabled to dispute with their enemies for the sovereignty of Spain and the dominion of the sea. Annibal no longer appeared formidable in Italy; if he conquered towns in Campania or Magna Græcia, he remained master of them only while his army hovered in the neighbourhood, and if he marched towards Rome the alarm he occasioned was but momentary; the Romans were prepared to oppose him, and his retreat was therefore the more dishonourable. The conquests of young Scipio in Spain had now raised the expectations of the Romans, and he had no sooner returned to Rome than he proposed to remove Annibal from the capital of Italy by carrying the war to the gates of Carthage. This was a bold and hazardous enterprise, but though Fabius opposed it, it was universally approved by the Roman senate, and young Scipio was empowered to sail to Africa. The conquests of the young Roman were as rapid in Africa as in Spain, and the Carthaginians, apprehensive for the fate of their capital, recalled Annibal from Italy, and preferred their safety at home to the maintaining of a long and expensive war in another quarter of the globe. Annibal received their orders with indignation, and with tears in his eyes he left Italy, where for 16 years he had known no superior in the field of battle. At his arrival in Africa, the Carthaginian general soon collected a large army, and met his exulting adversary in the plains of Zama. The battle was long and bloody, and though one nation fought for glory, and the other for the dearer sake of liberty, the Romans obtained the victory, and Annibal, who had sworn eternal enmity to the gods of Rome, fled from Carthage after he had advised his countrymen to accept the terms of the conqueror. This battle of Zama was decisive, the Carthaginians sued for peace, which the haughty conquerors granted with difficulty. The conditions were these: Carthage was permitted to hold all the possessions which she had in Africa before the war, and to be governed by her own laws and institutions. She was ordered to make restitution of all the ships and other effects which had been taken in violation of a truce that had been agreed upon by both nations. She was to surrender the whole of her fleet, except to galleys; she was to release and deliver up all the captives, deserters, or fugitives, taken or received during the war; to indemnify Masinissa for all the losses which he had sustained; to deliver up all her elephants, and for the future never more to tame or break any more of these animals. She was not to make war upon any nation whatever without the consent of the Romans, and she was to reimburse the Romans, to pay the sum of 10,000 talents, at the rate of 200 talents a year for 50 years, and she was to give up hostages from the noblest families for the performance of these several articles; and till the ratification of the treaty, to supply the Roman forces with money and provisions. These humiliating conditions were accepted 201 B.C., and immediately 4000 Roman captives were released, 500 galleys were delivered and burnt on the spot, but the immediate exaction of 200 talents was more severely felt, and many of the Carthaginian senators burst into tears.

During the 50 years which followed the conclusion of the second Punic war, the Carthaginians were employed in repairing their losses by unwearied application and industry; but they found still in the Romans a jealous rival and a haughty conqueror, and in Masinissa the ally of Rome an intriguing and ambitious monarch. The king of Numidia made himself master of one of their provinces; but as they were unable to make war without the consent of Rome, the Carthaginians sought relief by embassies, and made continual complaints in the Roman senate of the tyranny and oppression of Masinissa. Commissioners were appointed to examine the cause of their complaints; but as Masinissa was the ally of Rome, the interest of the Carthaginians was neglected, and whatever seemed to depress their republic was agreeable to the Romans. Cato, who was in the number of the commissioners, examined the capital of Africa with a jealous eye; he saw it with concern, rising as it were from its ruins; and when he returned to Rome he declared, in full senate, that the peace of Italy would never be established while Carthage was in being. The senators, however, were not guided by his opinion, and the delenda est Carthago of Cato did not prevent the Romans from acting with moderation. But while the senate were debating about the existence of Carthage, and while they considered it as a dependent power, and not as an ally, the wrongs of Africa were without redress, and Masinissa continued his depredations. Upon this the Carthaginians resolved to do their cause that justice which the Romans had denied them; they entered the field against the Numidians, but they were defeated in a bloody battle by Masinissa, who was then 90 years old. In this bold measure they had broken the peace; and as their late defeat had rendered them desperate, they hastened with all possible speed to the capital of Italy to justify their proceedings, and to implore the forgiveness of the Roman senate. The news of Masinissa's victory had already reached Italy, and immediately some forces were sent to Sicily, and from thence ordered to pass into Africa. The ambassadors of Carthage received evasive and unsatisfactory answers from the senate; and when they saw the Romans landed at Utica, they resolved to purchase peace by the most submissive terms which even the most abject slaves could offer. The Romans acted with the deepest policy; no declaration of war had been made, though hostilities appeared inevitable; and in answer to the submissive offers of Carthage, the consuls replied, that to prevent every cause of quarrel, the Carthaginians must deliver into their hands 300 hostages, all children of senators, and of the most noble and respectable families. The demand was great and alarming, but it was no sooner granted, than the Romans made another demand, and the Carthaginians were told that peace could not continue, if they refused to deliver up all their ships, their arms, engines of war, with all their naval and military stores. The Carthaginians complied, and immediately 40,000 suits of armour, 20,000 large engines of war, with a plentiful store of ammunition and missile weapons, were surrendered. After this duplicity had succeeded, the Romans laid open the final resolutions of the senate, and the Carthaginians were then told that, to avoid hostilities, they must leave their ancient habitations and retire into the inland parts of Africa, and found another city, at the distance of not less than 20 miles from the sea. This was heard with horror and indignation; the Romans were fixed and inexorable, and Carthage was filled with tears and lamentations. But the spirit of liberty and independence was not yet extinguished in the capital of Africa, and the Carthaginians determined to sacrifice their lives for the protection of their gods, the tombs of their forefathers, and the place which had given them birth. Before the Roman army approached the city, preparations to support a siege were made, and the ramparts of Carthage were covered with stones, to compensate for the weapons and instruments of war which they had ignorantly betrayed to the duplicity of their enemies. Asdrubal, whom the despair of his countrymen had banished on account of the unsuccessful expedition against Masinissa, was immediately recalled; and, in the moment of danger, Carthage seemed to have possessed more spirit and more vigour than when Hannibal was victorious at the gates of Rome. The town was blocked up by the Romans, and a regular siege begun. Two years were spent in useless operations, and Carthage seemed still able to rise from its ruins, to dispute for the empire of the world; when Scipio, the descendant of the great Scipio, who finished the second Punic war, was sent to conduct the siege. The vigour of his operations soon baffled the efforts and the bold resistance of the besieged; the communications which they had with the land were cut off, and the city, which was 20 miles in circumference, was completely surrounded on all sides by the enemy. Despair and famine now raged in the city, and Scipio gained access to the city walls, where the battlements were low and unguarded. His entrance into the streets was disputed with uncommon fury, the houses as he advanced were set on fire to stop his progress; but when a body of 50,000 persons of either sex had claimed quarter, the rest of the inhabitants were disheartened, and such as disdained to be prisoners of war perished in the flames, which gradually destroyed their habitations, 147 B.C., after a continuation of hostilities for three years. During 17 days Carthage was in flames; and the soldiers were permitted to redeem from the fire whatever possession they could. But while others profited from the destruction of Carthage, the philosophic general, struck by the melancholy aspect of the scene, repeated two lines from Homer, which contained a prophecy concerning the fall of Troy. He was asked by the historian Polybius to what he then applied his prediction. "To my country," replied Scipio; "for her too I dread the vicissitude of human affairs, and in her turn she may exhibit another flaming Carthage." This remarkable event happened about the year of Rome 606. The news of this victory caused the greatest rejoicings at Rome; and immediately commissioners were appointed by the Roman senate, not only to raze the walls of Carthage, but even to demolish and burn the very materials with which they were made: and in a few days, that city which had been once the seat of commerce, the model of magnificence, the common store of the wealth of nations, and one of the most powerful states of the world, left behind no traces of its splendour, of its power, or even of its existence. Polyb.—Orosius.—Appian. de Punic., &c.—Flor.—Hist. in Cat., &c.—Strab.—Liv. Epit.—Diod.

Pupia lex, de senatu, required that the senate should not be assembled from the 18th of the calends of February to the calends of the same month, and that before the embassies were either accepted or rejected, the senate should be held on no account.

Pupienus Marcus Claudius Maximus, a man of an obscure family, who raised himself by his merit to the highest offices in the Roman armies, and gradually became a pretor, consul, prefect of Rome, and a governor of the provinces. His father was a blacksmith. After the death of the Gordians, Pupienus was elected with Balbinus to the imperial throne, and to rid the world of the usurpation and tyranny of the Maximini, he immediately marched against these tyrants; but he was soon informed that they had been sacrificed to the fury and resentment of their own soldiers; and therefore he retired to Rome to enjoy the tranquillity which his merit claimed. He soon after prepared to make war against the Persians, who insulted the majesty of Rome, but in this he was prevented, and massacred A.D. 236, by the pretorian guards. Balbinus shared his fate. Pupienus is sometimes called Maximus. In his private character he appeared always grave and serious; he was the constant friend of justice, moderation, and clemency, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his virtues than to say that he was invested with the purple without soliciting for it, and that the Roman senate said that they had selected him from thousands because they knew no person more worthy or better qualified to support the dignity of an emperor.

Puppius, a tragic poet in the age of J. Cæsar. His tragedies were so pathetic, that when they were represented on the Roman stage, the audience melted into tears, from which circumstance Horace calls them lacrymosa, 1, ep. 1, v. 67.

Purpurarias, two islands of the Atlantic on the African coast, now Lancarota and Fortaventura. Plin. 6, c. 31. l. 35, c. 6.

Puteoli, a maritime town of Campania, between Baim and Naples, founded by a colony from Cumæ. It was originally called Dicaarchia, and afterwards Puteoli, from the great number of wells that were in the neighbourhood. It was much frequented by the Romans, on account of its mineral waters and hot baths, and near it Cicero had a villa called Puteolanum. It is now called Puesoli, and contains, instead of its ancient magnificence, not more than 10,000 inhabitants. Sil. 13, v. 385.—Strab. 5.—Varro, L. 4, c. 5.—Cic. Phil. 8, c. 3, Jam. 15, ep. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Paus. 8, c. 7.

Puteolæ, a place near the Esquiline gate, where the meanest of the Roman populace were buried. Part of it was converted into a garden by Mæcenas, who received it as a present from Augustus. Horat. 1, sat. 8, v. 8.—Varro, L. 4, c. 5.

Pyanepsia, an Athenian festival celebrated in honour of Theseus and his companions; who, after their return from Crete, were entertained with all manner of fruits, and particularly pulse. From this circumstance, the Pyanepsia was ever after commemorated by the boiling of pulse, ἀπο τοῦ ἕβου ἕσθαι. Some, however, suppose that it was observed in commemoration of the Heraclides, who were entertained with pulse by the Athenians.

Pydna, a town of Macedonia, originally called Citron, situate between the mouth of the rivers Aliacmon and Lydius. It was in this city that Cassander massacred Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, his wife Roxane, and his son Alexander. Pydna is famous for a battle which was fought there, on the 22nd of June, B.C. 168, between the Romans under Paulus, and king Perseus, in which the latter was conquered, and Macedonia soon after reduced to the form of a Roman province. Justin. 14, c. 6.—Flor.—Plut. in Paul.—Liv. 44, c. 10.

Pygela, a seaport town of Ionia. Liv. 37, c. 17.
Pygmaei, a nation of dwarfs, in the extremest parts of India, or, according to others, in Æthiopia. Some authors affirm that they were no more than one foot high, and that they built their houses with egg-shells. Aristotle says that they lived in holes under the earth, and that they came out in the harvest time with hatchets to cut down the corn as if to fell a forest. They went on goats and lambs of proportionable stature to themselves, to make war against certain birds, whom some call cranes, which came there yearly from Scythia to plunder them. They were originally governed by Gerana, a princess who was changed into a crane, for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 90.—Homer. Il. 3.—Strab. 7.—Arist. Anim. 8, c. 12.—Juv. 13, v. 186.—Plin. 4, &c.—Mela. 3, c. 8.—Suet. in Aug. 83. Philostr. Icon. 2, c. 22, mentions that Hercules once fell asleep in the deserts of Africa, after he had conquered Anteus, and that he was suddenly awakened by an attack which had been made upon his body by an army of these Liliputians, who discharged their arrows with great fury upon his arms and legs. The hero, pleased with their courage, wrapped the greatest number of them in the skin of the Nemean lion, and carried them to Eurystheus.

Pygmeion, a surname of Adonis in Cyprus. Hesych.

Pygmalion, a king of Tyre, son of Belus, and brother to the celebrated Dido, who founded Carthage. At the death of his father, he ascended the vacant throne, and soon became odious by his cruelty and avarice. He sacrificed everything to the gratification of his predominant passions, and he did not even spare the life of Sicheus, Dido's husband, because he was the most powerful and opulent of all the Phœnicians. This murder he committed in a temple, of which Sicheus was the priest; but instead of obtaining the riches which he desired, Pygmalion was shunned by his subjects, and Dido, to avoid further acts of cruelty, fled away with her husband's treasures, and a large colony, to the coast of Africa, where she founded a city. Pygmalion died in the 56th year of his age, and in the 47th of his reign. *Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347. &c.—Justin. 18, c. 3.—Apollod. 3.—Ital. 1.—A celebrated statue of the island of Cyprus. The debauchery of the females of Amathus, to which he was a witness, created in him such an aversion for the fair sex, that he resolved never to marry. The affection which he had denied to the other sex, he liberally bestowed upon the works of his own hands. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue of marble which he had made, and at his earnest request and prayers, according to the mythologists, the goddess of beauty changed the favourite statue into a woman, whom the artist married, and by whom he had a son called Paphus, who founded the city of that name in Cyprus. *Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.

Pylades, a son of Strophius king of Phocis, by one of the sisters of Agamemnon. He was educated, together with his cousin Orestes, with whom he formed the most inviolable friendship, and whom he assisted to revenge the murder of Agamemnon, by assassinating Clytemnestra and Ægisthus. He also accompanied him to Taurica Chersonesus, and for his services Orestes rewarded him by giving him his sister Electra in marriage. Pylades had by her two sons, Medon and Strophius. The friendship of Orestes and Pylades became proverbial. *Vid. Orestes. Eurip. in Iphig.—Æschyl. in Ag. &c.—Paus. 1, c. 28.—A celebrated Greek musician, in the age of Philopæmen. *Plut. in Phil.—A mimic in the reign of Augustus, banished, and afterwards recalled.

Pylæa, a town of Asia, between Cappadocia and Cilicia. Cic. 5, ad Att. The word Pylæa, which signifies gate, was often applied by the Greeks to any straits or passages which opened a communication between one country and another, such as the straits of Thermopylæ, of Persia, Hyrcania, &c.

Pylæonides, a Paphlagonian, son of Melius, who came to the Trojan war, and was killed by Menelaus. His son, called Harpation, was killed by Meriones. *Dicty. Cret. 2, c. 34.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 358.—A king of Mæonia, who sent his sons, Mestes and Antiphus, to the Trojan war.—Another, son of Nicomedes, banished from Paphlagonia by Mithridates, and restored by Pompey. *Entrop. 5 & 6.

Pylagoræ, a name given to the Amphictyonic council, because they always assembled at Pyæn, near the temple of Delphi.

Pylæon, a son of Neleus and Chloris, killed by Hercules with his brothers. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Pylarge, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.
Pylartes, a Trojan killed by Patroclus. Homer. Il. 16, v. 695.

Pylas, a king of Megara. He had the misfortune accidentally to kill his uncle Bias, for which he fled away, leaving his kingdom to Pandion his son-in-law, who had been driven from Athens. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 39.

Pylæus, a town of Ætolia. Homer. Il. 2.
Pylæus, a Trojan chief, killed by Achilles.—A son of Clymenus king of Orchomenos.

Pylæon, a town of Thessaly. Liv. 42, c. 42.
Pylæa, a daughter of Thespius, mother of Hippotas. Apollod.

Pylæos, now Nataris, a town of Messenia, situate on the western coast of the Peloponnesus, opposite the island Sphacteria in the Ionian sea. It was also called Coryphasion, from the promontory on which it was erected. It was built by Pylæus, at the head of a colony from Megara. The founder was dispossessed of it by Neleus, and fled into Elis, where he dwelt in a small town, which he also called Pylæos.—A town of Elis, at the mouth of the river Alpheus, between the Peneus and the Selleis.—Another town of Elis, called Triphylia, from Triphylia, a province of Elis, where it was situate. These three cities, which bore the name of Pylæos, disputed their respective right to the honour of having given birth to the celebrated Nestor son of Neleus. The Pylæos which is situate near the Alpheus seems to win the palm, as it had in its neighbourhood a small village called Geranus, and a river called Geron, of which Homer makes mention. Pindar, however, calls Nestor king of Messenia, and therefore gives the preference to the first-mentioned of these three cities. Apollod. 1, c. 19, l. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 39.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 2, Od. 3.

Pylus, a town. Vid. Pylæos. A son of Mars by Demonicæ the daughter of Agenor. He was present at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1.

Pyra, part of mount Ceta, on which the body of Hercules was burnt. Liv. 36, c. 30.

Pyraemon, one of Vulcan's workmen in the forges of mount Ætna. The name is derived from two Greek words which signify fire and an anvil. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Pyramos, a man killed by Caneus. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 460.

Pyrrhæus, a king of Eubœa.—A king of Pœonia during the Trojan war.

Pyramus, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin who dwelt in the neighbourhood. The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbade to marry, regularly received each other's addresses through the chink of a wall, which separated their houses. After the most solemn vows of sincerity they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away; and as she fled into a neighbouring cave she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and besmeared with blood. Pyramus soon arrived; he found Thisbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that she had been torn to pieces by the wild beasts of the place, he stabbed himself with his sword. Thisbe, when her fears were vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, she fell upon the sword which still reeked with his blood. This tragical scene happened under a white mulberry tree, which, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit of the colour of blood. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 55, &c.—Hygin. Fab. 243.—A river of Cilicia, rising in mount Taurus, and falling into the Pamphylia sea. Cic. 3, Jam. 11.—Dionys. Perieg.

Pyrenæa Venus, a town of Gallia Narbonensis.

Pyrenæi, a mountain, or a long ridge of high mountains, which separate Gaul from Spain, and extend from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean sea. They receive their name from Pyrene the daughter of Bebrycius (Virg. Pyrene), or from the fire (sup.) which once raged there for several days. This fire was originally kindled by shepherds, and so intense was the heat which it occasioned, that all the silver mines of the mountains were melted, and ran down in large rivulets. This account is deemed fabulous by Strabo and others. Diad. 5.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Ital. 3, v. 415.—Liv. 21, c. 60.—Plut. 4, c. 20.

Pyrenæus, a king of Thrace, who, during a shower of rain, gave shelter in his house to the nine muses, and attempted to offer them violence. The goddesses upon this took to their wings and flew away. Pyrenæus, who attempted to follow them, as if he had wings, threw himself down from the top of a tower and was killed. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 274.

Pyrenæo, a daughter of Bebrycius king of the southern parts of Spain. Hercules offered violence to her before he went to attack Geryon, and she brought into the world a serpent, which so terrified her, that she fled into the woods, where she was torn to pieces by wild beasts.—A nymph, mother of Cycnus by Mars. Apollod.—A fountain near Corinth.—A small village in Celtic Gaul, near which, according to some, the river Ister took its rise.

Pyrgi, an ancient town of Etruria, on the sea coast. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 184.—Liv. 36, c. 3.

Pyrgion, an historian who wrote on the laws of Crete. Athen.

Pyrgo, the nurse of Priam's children, who followed Æneas in his flight from Troy. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 645.

Pyrgotiles, a celebrated engraver on gems in the age of Alexander the Great. He had the exclusive privilege of engraving the conqueror, as Lysippus was the only sculptor who was permitted to make statues of him. Plin. 37, c. 1.

Pyrgus, a fortified place of Elis in the Peloponnus.

Pyrippe, a daughter of Thespius.

Pyrodes, a son of Citix, said to be the first who discovered and applied to human purposes the fire concealed in flints. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Pyrois, one of the horses of the sun. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 153.

Pyronia, a surname of Diana. Paus. 8, c. 16.

Pyrrha, a daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, who married Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who reigned in Thessaly. In her age all mankind were destroyed by a deluge, and she alone, with her husband, escaped from the general destruction, by saving themselves in a boat which Deucalion had made by his father's advice. When the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Pyrrha, with her husband, went to the oracle of Themis, where they were directed, to repair the loss of mankind, to throw stones behind their backs. They obeyed, and the stones which Pyrrha threw were changed into women, and those of Deucalion into men. Virg. Deucalion. Pyrrha became mother of Amphictyon, Hellen, and Protegea by Deucalion. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 350, &c.—Hygin. Fab. 153.—Apollon. Rhod. 3, v. 1085.—A daughter of Creon king of Thebes. Paus. 9, c. 10.—The name which Achilles bore when he disguised himself in women's clothes, at the court of Lycomedes. Hygin. Fab. 96.—A town of Eubœa. Mela. 2, c. 7.—A promontory of Phthiotis, on the bay of Malia. A town of Lesbos.—A beautiful courtesan at Rome, of whom Horace was long an admirer. Horat. 1, od. 5.

Pyrrheus, a place in the city of Ambracia. Liv. 38, c. 5.

Pyrrhi castra, a place of Lucania. Liv. 35, c. 27.

Pyrrhias, a boatman of Ithaca, remarkable for his humanity. He delivered from slavery an old man who had been taken by pirates, and robbed of some pots full of pitch. The old man was so grateful for his kindness, that he gave the pots to his deliverer, after he had told him that they contained gold under the pitch. Pyrrhias, upon this, offered the sacrifice of a bull to the old man, and retained him in his house, with every act of kindness and attention, till the time of his death. Plut. in Quest. G.—A general of the Ætolians, defeated by Philip, king of Macedonia.

Pyrrhicha, a kind of dance, said to be invented and introduced into Greece by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles. The dancers were generally armed. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Pyrrhicus, a free town of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 21.—Athen. 14.

Pyrrhidae, a patronymic given to the successors of Neoptolemus in Epirus.

Pyrrho, a philosopher of Elis, disciple to Anaxarchus, and originally a painter. His father's name was Plistarchus, or Pistocrates. He was in continual suspense of judgment; he doubted of everything, never made any conclusions, and when he had carefully examined a subject, and investigated all its parts, he concluded by still doubting of its evidence. This manner of doubting in the philosopher has been called Pyrrhonism, and his disciples have received the appellation of sceptics, inquisitors, examiners, &c. He pretended to have acquired an uncommon dominion over opinion and passions. The former of these virtues he called ataraxia, and the latter apatheia, and so far did he carry his want of common feeling and sympathy, that he passed with unconcern near a ditch in which his master Anaxarchus had fallen, and where he nearly perished. He was once in a storm, and when all hopes were vanished, and destruction certain, the philosopher remained unconcerned; and while the rest of the crew were lost in lamentations, he plainly told them to look at a pig which was then feeding himself on board the vessel, exclaiming, "This is a true model for a wise man." As he showed so much indifference in everything, and declared that life and death were the same thing, some of his disciples asked him why he did not hurry himself out of the world, "Because," says he, "there is no difference between life and death." When he walked in the streets he never looked behind, or moved from the road for a chariot, even in its most rapid course; and, indeed, as some authors remark, this indifference for his safety often exposed him to the greatest and most imminent dangers, from which he was saved by the interference of his friends who followed him. He flourished B.C. 304, and died at the advanced age of 90. He left no writings behind him. His countrymen were so partial to him that they raised statues to his memory, and exempted all the philosophers of Elis from taxes. Diog. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 17.—Aul. Gel. 11, c. 5.—Paus. 6, c. 24.

Pyrrhus, a son of Achilles and Deidamia the daughter of king Lycomedes, who received this name from the yellowness of his hair. He was also called Neoptolemus, or new warrior, because he came to the Trojan war in the last year of the celebrated siege of the capital of Troas. Vid. Neoptolemus.—A king of Epirus, descended from Achilles by the side of his mother, and from Hercules by that of his father, and son of Æacides and Phthia. He was saved when an infant, by the fidelity of his servants, from the pursuits of the enemies of his father, who had been banished from his kingdom, and he was carried to the court of Glautias king of Illyricum, who educated him with great tenderness. Cassander king of Macedonia wished to despatch him, as he had so much to dread from him; but Glautias not only refused to deliver him up into the hands of his enemy, but he even went with an army and placed him on the throne of Epirus, though only 12 years of age. About five years after, the absence of Pyrrhus, to attend the nuptials of one of the daughters of Glautias, raised new commotions. The monarch was expelled from his throne by Neoptolemus, who had usurped it after the death of Æacides; and being still without resources, he applied to his brother-in-law Demetrius for assistance. He accompanied Demetrius at the battle of Ipsus, and fought there with all the prudence and intrepidity of an experienced general. He afterwards passed into Egypt, where, by his marriage with Antigone the daughter of Berenice, he soon obtained a sufficient force to attempt the recovery of his throne. He was successful in the undertaking, but to remove all causes of quarrel, he took the usurper to share with him the royalty, and some time after he put him to death under pretence that he had attempted to poison him. In the subsequent years of his reign, Pyrrhus engaged in the quarrels which disturbed the peace of the Macedonian monarchy; he marched against Demetrius, and gave the Macedonian soldiers fresh proofs of his valour and activity. By dissimulation he ingratiated himself in the minds of his enemy's subjects, and when Demetrius laboured under a momentary illness, Pyrrhus made an attempt upon the crown of Macedonia, which, if not then successful, soon after rendered him master of the kingdom. This he shared with Lysimachus for seven months, till the jealousy of the Macedonians, and the ambition of his colleague, obliged him to retire. Pyrrhus was meditating new conquests, when the Tarentines invited him to Italy to assist them against the encroaching power of Rome. He gladly accepted the invitation, but his passage across the Adriatic proved nearly fatal, and he reached the shores of Italy, after the loss of the greatest part of his troops in a storm. At his entrance into Tarentum, B.C. 280, he began to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and by introducing the strictest discipline among their troops, to accustom them to bear fatigue and to despise dangers. In the first battle which he fought with the Romans, he obtained the victory, but for this he was more particularly indebted to his elephants, whose bulk and uncommon appearance astonished the Romans and terrified their cavalry. The number of the slain was equal on both sides, and the conqueror said that such another victory would totally ruin him. He also sent Cineas, his chief minister, to Rome, and though victorious, he sued for peace. These offers of peace were refused, and when Pyrrhus questioned Cineas about the manners and the character of the Romans, the sagacious minister replied, that their senate was a venerable assembly of kings, and that to fight against them, was to attack another Hydra. A second battle was fought near Asculum, but the slaughter was so great, and the valour so conspicuous on both sides, that the Romans and their enemies reciprocally claimed the victory as their own. Pyrrhus still continued the war in favour of the Tarentines, when he was invited into Sicily by the inhabitants, who laboured under the yoke of Carthage, and the cruelty of their own petty tyrants. His fondness of novelty soon determined him to quit Italy; he left a garrison at Tarentum, and crossed over to Sicily, where he obtained two victories over the Carthaginians, and took many of their towns. He was for a while successful, and formed the project of invading Africa; but soon his popularity vanished, his troops became insolent, and he behaved with haughtiness, and showed himself oppressive, so that his return to Italy was deemed a fortunate event for all Sicily. He had no sooner arrived at Tarentum than he renewed hostilities with the Romans with great acrimony, but when his army of 80,000 men had been defeated by 20,000 of the enemy, under Curius, he left Italy with precipitation, B.C. 274, ashamed of the enterprise, and mortified by the victories which had been obtained over one of the descendants of Achilles. In Epirus he began to repair his military character by attacking Antigonus, who was then on the Macedonian throne. He gained some advantages over his enemy, and was at last restored to the throne of Macedonia. He afterwards marched against Sparta, at the request of Cleonymus, but when all his vigorous operations were insufficient to take the capital of Laconia, he retired to Argos, where the treachery of Aristueinvited him. The Argives desired him to retire, and not to interfere in the affairs of their republic, which were confounded by the ambition of two of their nobles. He complied with their wishes, but in the night he marched his forces into the town, and might have made himself master of the place had he not retarded his progress by entering it with his elephants. The combat that ensued was obstinate and bloody, and the monarch, to fight with more boldness, and to encounter dangers with more facility, exchanged his dress. He was attacked by one of the enemy, but as he was going to run him through in his own defence, the mother of the Argive, who saw her son's danger from the top of a house, threw down a tile and brought Pyrrhus to the ground. His head was cut off, and carried to Antigonus, who gave his remains a magnificent funeral, and presented his ashes to his son Helenus, 272 years before the christian era. Pyrrhus has been deservedly commended for his talents as a general; and not only his friends, but also his enemies, have been warm in extolling him; and Annibal declared, that for experience and sagacity the king of Epirus was the first of commanders. He had chosen Alexander the Great for a model, and in everything he wished not only to imitate, but to surpass him. In the art of war none were superior to him; he not only made it his study as a general, but even he wrote many books on encampments, and the different ways of training up an army, and whatever he did was by principle and rule. His uncommon understanding and his penetration are also admired; but the general is severely censured, who has no sooner conquered a country, than he looks for other victories, without regarding or securing what he has already obtained, by measures and regulations honourable to himself, and advantageous to his subjects. The Romans passed great encomiums upon him, and Pyrrhus was no less struck with their magnanimity and valour; so much indeed, that he exclaimed that if he had soldiers like the Romans, or if the Romans had him for a general, he would leave no corner of the earth unseen, and no nation unconquered. Pyrrhus married many wives, and all for political reasons; besides Antigone, he had Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as also a daughter of Autoleon king of Paonia. His children, as his biographer observes, derived a warlike spirit from their father, and when he was asked by one to which of them he should leave the kingdom of Epirus, he replied, to him who has the sharpest sword. Ælian. Hist. An. 10.—Plut. in Vitâ.—Justin. 17, &c.—Liv. 13 & 14.—Horat. 3, od. 6.—A king of Epirus, son of Ptolemy, murdered by the people of Ambracia. His daughter, called Laudamia, or Deidamia, succeeded him. Paus.—A son of Dædalus.

Pythagoras, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. His father Mnesarchus was a person of distinction, and therefore the son received that education which was most calculated to enlighten his mind and invigorate his body. Like his contemporaries, he was early made acquainted with poetry and music; eloquence and astronomy became his private studies, and in gymnastic exercises he often bore the palm for strength and dexterity. He first made himself known in Greece, at the Olympic games, where he obtained, in the 18th year of his age, the prize for wrestling; and, after he had been admired for the elegance and the dignity of his person, and the brilliancy of his understanding, he retired into the east. In Egypt and Chaldæa he gained the confidence of the priests, and learned from them the artful policy, and the symbolic writings, by which they governed the prince as well as the people, and, after he had spent many years in gathering all the information which could be collected from antique tradition concerning the nature of the gods and the immortality of the soul, Pythagoras revisited his native island. The tyranny of Polyocrates at Samos disgusted the philosopher, who was a great advocate for national independence; and though he was the favourite of the tyrant, he retired from the island, and a second time assisted at the Olympic games. His fame was too well known to escape notice; he was saluted in the public assembly by the name of Sophist, or wise man; but he refused the appellation, and was satisfied with that of philosopher, or, the friend of wisdom. "At the Olympic games," said he, in explanation of this new appellation he wished to assume, "some are attracted with the desire of obtaining crowns and honours, others come to expose their different commodities to sale, while curiosity draws a third class, and the desire of contemplating whatever deserves notice in that celebrated assembly; thus, on the more extensive theatre of the world, while many struggle for the glory of a name, and many pant for the advantages of fortune, a few, and indeed but a few, who are neither desirous of money nor ambitious of fame, are sufficiently gratified to be spectators of the wonder, the hurry, and the magnificence of the scene." From Olympia, the philosopher visited the republics of Elis and Sparta, and retired to Magna Græcia, where he fixed his habitation in the town of Crotona, about the 40th year of his age. Here he founded a sect which has received the name of the Italian, and he soon saw himself surrounded by a great number of pupils, which the recommendation of his mental as well as his personal accomplishments had procured. His skill in music and medicine, and his knowledge of mathematics and of natural philosophy, gained him friends and admirers, and amidst the voluptuousness that prevailed among the inhabitants of Crotona, the Samian sage found his instructions respected and his approbation courted; the most debauched and effeminate were pleased with the eloquence and the graceful delivery of the philosopher, who boldly upbraided them for their vices, and called them to more virtuous and manly pursuits. These animated harangues were attended with rapid success, and a reformation soon took place in the morals and the life of the people of Crotona. The females were exhorted to become modest, and they left off their gaudy ornaments; the youths were called away from their pursuits of pleasure, and instantly they forgot their intemperance, and paid to their parents that submissive attention and deference which the precepts of Pythagoras required. As to the old, they were directed no longer to spend their time in amassing money, but to improve their understanding, and to seek that peace and those comforts of mind which frugality, benevolence, and philanthropy alone can produce. The sober and religious behaviour of the philosopher strongly recommended the necessity and importance of these precepts. Pythagoras was admired for his venerable aspect; his voice was harmonious, his eloquence persuasive, and the reputation he had acquired by his distant travels, and by being crowned at the Olympic games, was great and important. He regularly frequented the temples of the gods, and paid his devotion to the divinity at an early hour; he lived upon the purest and most innocent food, he clothed himself like the priests of the Egyptian gods, and by his continual purifications and regular offerings, he seemed to be superior to the rest of mankind in sanctity. These artful measures united to render him an object not only of reverence, but of imitation. To set himself at a greater distance from his pupils, a number of years was required to try their various dispositions; the most talkative were not permitted to speak in the presence of their master before they had been his auditors for five years, and those who possessed a natural taciturnity were allowed to speak after a probation of two years. When they were capable of receiving the secret instructions of the philosopher, they were taught the use of cyphers and hieroglyphic writings, and Pythagoras might boast that his pupils could correspond together, though in the most distant regions, in unknown characters; and by the signs and words which they had received, they could discover, though strangers and barbarians, those that had been educated in the Pythagorean school. So great was his authority among his pupils, that to dispute his word was deemed a crime, and the most stubborn were drawn to coincide with the opinions of their opponent, when they helped their arguments by the words of the master said to, an expression which became proverbial in jurare in verba magistri. The great influence which the philosopher possessed in his school was transferred to the world: the pupils divided the applause and the approbation of the people with their venerable master, and in a short time the rulers and the legislators of all the principal towns of Greece, Sicily, and Italy, boasted in being the disciples of Pythagoras. The Samian philosopher was the first who supported the doctrine of metempsychosis, or transmigration of the soul into different bodies, and those notions he seemed to have imbibed among the priests of Egypt, or in the solitary retreats of the Brachmans. More strenuously to support his chimerical system, he declared he recollected the different bodies which his soul had animated before that of the son of Mnesarchus. He remembered to have been Æthalides the son of Mercury, to have assisted the Greeks during the Trojan war in the character of Euphorbus [vid. Euphorbus], to have been Herminotus, afterwards a fisherman, and last of all Pythagoras. He forbade his disciples to eat flesh, as also beans, because he supposed them to have been produced from the same putrefied matter from which, at the creation of the world, man was formed. In his theological system Pythagoras supported that the universe was created from a shapeless heap of passive matter by the hands of a powerful being, who himself was the mover and soul of the world, and of whose substance the souls of mankind were a portion. He considered numbers as the principles of everything, and perceived in the universe regularity, correspondence, beauty, proportion, and harmony, as intentionally produced by the Creator. In his doctrines of morality, he perceived in the human mind propensities common to us with the brute creation; but besides these, and the passions of avarice and ambition, he discovered the nobler seeds of virtue, and supported that the most ample and perfect gratification was to be found in the enjoyment of moral and intellectual pleasures. The thoughts of the past he considered as always present to us, and he believed that no enjoyment could be had where the mind was disturbed by consciousness of guilt, or fears about futurity. This opinion induced the philosopher to recommend to his followers a particular mode of education. The tender years of the Pythagoreans were employed in continual labour, in study, in exercise, and repose; and the philosopher maintained his well-known and important maxim, that many things, especially love, are best learnt late. In a more advanced age, the adult was desired to behave with caution, spirit, and patriotism, and to remember that the community and civil society demanded his exertions, and that the good of the public, and not his own private enjoyments, were the ends of his creation. From lessons like these, the Pythagoreans were strictly enjoined to call to mind, and carefully to review, the actions, not only of the present, but of the preceding days. In their acts of devotion, they early repaired to the most solitary places of the mountains, and after they had examined their private and public conduct, and conversed with themselves, they joined in the company of their friends, and early refreshed their body with light and frugal aliments. Their conversation was of the most innocent nature; political or philosophic subjects were discussed with propriety, but without warmth, and after the conduct of the following day was regulated, the evening was spent with the same religious ceremony as the morning, in a strict and partial self-examination. From such regularity nothing but the most salutary consequences could arise, and it will not appear wonderful that the disciples of Pythagoras were so much respected and admired as legislators, and imitated for their constancy, friendship, and humanity. The authors that lived in, and after, the age of Alexander, have rather tarnished than brightened the glory of the founder of the Pythagorean school, and they have obscured his fame by attributing to him actions which were dissonant with his character as a man and a moralist. To give more weight to his exhortations, as some writers mention, Pythagoras retired into a subterraneous cave, where his mother sent him intelligence of everything which happened during his absence. After a certain number of months he again reappeared on the earth, with a grim and ghastly countenance, and declared, in the assembly of the people, that he was returned from hell. From similar exaggerations, it has been asserted that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, and that he could write in letters of blood whatever he pleased on a looking-glass, and that, by setting it opposite to the moon, when full, all the characters which were on the glass became legible on the moon's disc. They also suppose that, by some magical words, he tamed a bear, stopped the flight of an eagle, and appeared on the same day and at the same instant in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, &c. The time and the place of the death of this great philosopher are unknown; yet many suppose that he died at Metapontum about 497 years before Christ; and so great was the veneration of the people of Magna Græcia for him, that he received the same honours as were paid to the immortal gods, and his house became a sacred temple. Succeeding ages likewise acknowledged his merits, and when the Romans, A. U. C. 411, were commanded by the oracle of Delphi to erect a statue to the bravest and wisest of the Greeks, the distinguished honour was conferred on Alcibiades and Pythagoras. Pythagoras had a daughter, called Damo. There is now extant a poetical composition ascribed to the philosopher, and called the golden verses of Pythagoras, which contain the greatest part of his doctrines and moral precepts; but many support that it is a supposititious composition, and that the true name of the writer was Lysis. Pythagoras distinguished himself also by his discoveries in geometry, astronomy, and mathematics, and it is to him that the world is indebted for the demonstration of the 47th proposition of the first book of Euclid's elements, about the square of the hypotenuse. It is said that he was so elated after making the discovery, that he made an offering of a hecatomb to the gods; but the sacrifice was undoubtedly of small oxen, made with wax, as the philosopher was ever an enemy to shedding the blood of all animals. His system of the universe, in which he placed the sun in the centre, and all the planets moving in elliptical orbits round it, was deemed chimerical and improbable, till the deep inquiries and the philosophy of the 16th century proved it, by the most accurate calculations, to be true and incontestable. Diogenes, Porphyry, Iamblicus, and others, have written an account of his life, but with more erudition, perhaps, than veracity. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 5. Tusc. 4, c. 1. Diog., &c., 8. Hygin. fab. 112. Quint. Met. 15, v. 60, &c. Plato.—Plin. 34, c. 6. Cell. 9.—Iamblic.—Porphyry.—Plut.—A soothsayer of Babylon, who foretold the death of Alexander and of Hephaestion, by consulting the entrails of victims.—A tyrant of Ephesus.—One of Nero's wicked favourites.

Pytheas, an archon at Athens.—A native of Massilia, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, mathematics, philosophy, and geography. He also distinguished himself by his travels, and, with a mind that wished to seek information in every corner of the earth, he advanced far into the northern seas, and discovered the island of Thule, and entered that then unknown sea, which is now called the Baltic. His discoveries in astronomy and geography were ingenious, and, indeed, modern navigators have found it expedient to justify and accede to his conclusions. He was the first who established a distinction of climate by the length of days and nights. He wrote different treatises in Greek, which have been lost, though some of them were extant in the beginning of the fifth century. Pytheas lived, according to some, in the age of Aristotle. Strab. 2, &c.—Plin. 37.—An Athenian rhetorician, in the age of Demosthenes, who distinguished himself by his intrigues, rapacity, and his opposition to the measures of Demosthenes, of whom he observed that his orations smelt of the lamp. Pytheas joined Antipater after the death of Alexander the Great. His orations were devoid of elegance, harsh, unconnected, and diffuse, and from this circumstance he has not been ranked among the orators of Athens. Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 7.—Plut. in Dem. & Polit. Pr.

Pythes, a native of Abdera, in Thrace, son of Andromache, who obtained a crown at the Olympian games. Plin. 34, c. 7.—Paus. 6, c. 14.

Pytheus, a Lydian in the age of Xerxes, famous for his riches. He kindly entertained the monarch and all his army, when he was marching on his expedition against Greece, and offered him to defray the expenses of the whole war. Xerxes thanked him with much gratitude, and promised to give him whatever he should require. Pytheus asked him to dismiss his son from the expedition; upon which the monarch ordered the young man to be cut in two, and one half of the body to be placed on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that his army might march between them. Plut. de Mul. Vir.—Herodot.

Pythia, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi. She delivered the answer of the god to such as came to consult the oracle, and was supposed to be suddenly inspired by the sulphureous vapours which issued from the hole of a subterraneous cavity within the temple, over which she sat bare on a three-legged stool, called a tripod. In this stool was a small aperture, through which the vapour was inhaled by the priestess, and, at this divine inspiration, her eyes suddenly sparkled, her hair stood on end, and a shivering ran over all her body. In this convulsive state she spoke the oracles of the god, often with loud howlings and cries, and her articulations were taken down by the priest, and set in order. Sometimes the spirit of inspiration was more gentle, and not always violent; yet Plutarch mentions one of the priestesses who was thrown into such an excessive fury, that not only those that consulted the oracle, but also the priest that conducted her to the sacred tripod, and attended her during the inspiration, were terrified and forsook the temple; and so violent was the fit, that she continued for some days in the most agonizing situation, and at last died. The Pythia, before she placed herself on the tripod, used to wash her whole body, and particularly her hair, in the waters of the fountain Castalis, at the foot of mount Parnassus. She also shook a laurel tree that grew near the place, and sometimes ate the leaves with which she crowned herself. The priestess was originally a virgin, but the institution was changed when Echeocrates, a Thesalian, had offered violence to one of them, and none but women who were above the age of 50 were permitted to enter upon that sacred office. They always appeared dressed in the garments of virgins, to intimate their purity and modesty, and they were solemnly bound to observe the strictest laws of temperance and chastity, that neither fantastical dresses nor lascivious behaviour might bring the office, the religion, or the sanctity of the place into contempt. There was originally but one Pythia, besides subordinate priests, and afterwards two were chosen, and sometimes more. The most celebrated of all these is Pheemonoe, who is supposed by some to have been the first who gave oracles at Delphi. The oracles were always delivered in hexameter verses, a custom which was some time after discontinued. The Pythia was consulted only one month in the year, about the spring. It was always required that those who consulted the oracle should make large presents to Apollo, and from thence arose the opulence, splendour, and the magnificence of that celebrated temple of Delphi. Sacrifices were also offered to the divinity, and if the omens proved unfavourable, the priestess refused to give an answer. There were generally five priests who assisted at the offering of the sacrifices, and there was also another who attended the Pythia, and assisted her in receiving the oracle. Vid. Delphia, Oraculum. Paus. 10, c. 5.—Diod. 16.—Strab. 6 & 9.—Justin. 24, c. 5.—Plut. de Orat. Def. Eurip. in Ion.—Chryssost.—Games celebrated in honour of Apollo, near the temple of Delphi. They were at first instituted, according to the more received opinion, by Apollo himself, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over the serpent Python, from which they received their name; though others maintain that they were first established by Agamemnon, or Diomedes, or by Amphictyon, or, lastly, by the council of Amphictyons,

B.C. 1263. They were originally celebrated once in nine years, but afterwards every fifth year, or the second year of every olympiad, according to the number of the Parnassian nymphs who congratulated Apollo after his victory. The gods themselves were originally among the combatants, and, according to some authors, the first prize was won by Polix, in boxing; by Castor, in horse-races; by Hercules, in the pancration; by Zetes, in fighting with the armour; by Calais, in running; by Telamon, in wrestling; and by Peleus in throwing the quail. These illustrious conquerors were rewarded by Apollo himself, who was present, with crowns and laurels. Some, however, observe that it was nothing but a musical contention, in which he who sung best the praises of Apollo obtained the prize, which was presents of gold or silver, which were afterwards exchanged for a garland of the palm tree, or of beech leaves. It is said that Hesiod was refused admission to these games because he was not able to play upon the harp, which was required of all such as entered the lists. The songs which were sung were called Pythian songs, the Pythian modes, divided into five parts, which contained a representation of the fight and victory of Apollo over Python; ἀναπόσις, the preparation for the fight; πρῶτη, the first attempt; κατασθένους, taking breath and collecting courage; ἰουφοῖ καὶ δαυροῖ, the insulting vociferous of the god over his vanquished enemy; ἐπιπύγης, an imitation of the hisses of the serpent, just as he expired under the blows of Apollo. A dance was also introduced; and in the 48th Olympiad, the Amphictyons, who presided over the games, increased the number of musical instruments by the addition of a flute; but, as it was more peculiarly used in funeral songs and lamentations, it was soon rejected as unfit for merriment, and the festivals which represented the triumph of Apollo over the conquered serpent. The Romans, according to some, introduced them into their city, and called them Apollinæ ludii. Paus. 10, c. 13 & 37.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 447.—Plin. 7.—Liv. 25.

Pythias, a Pythagorean philosopher, intimate with Damon. Vid. Pythias.—A road which led from Thessaly to Tempe. Ælian.—A comic character, &c.

Python, an Athenian killed, with 420 soldiers, when he attempted to drive the garrison of Demetrius from Athens, &c. Polyæn. 5.

Pythium, a town of Thessaly. Liv. 42, c. 53. l. 44, c. 2.

Pythius, a Syracusan, who defrauded Canius, a Roman knight, to whom he had sold his gardens, &c. Cic. de Off. 3, c. 14.—A surname of Apollo, which he had received for his having conquered the serpent Python, or because he was worshipped at Delphi; called also Pytho. Macrobi. 1, Sat. 17.—Propert. 2, el. 33, v. 16.

Pytho, the ancient name of the town of Delphi, which it received ἀπὸ τοῦ πύθωνος, because the serpent which Apollo killed, rotted there. It was also called Parnassia Nape. Vid. Delphi.

Pythochæris, a musician, who assuaged the fury of some wolves by playing on a musical instrument, &c. Ælian.

Pythocles, an Athenian descended from Aratus. It is said, that on his account, and for his instruction, Plutarch wrote the life of Aratus.—A man put to death with Phocion.—A man who wrote on Italy.

Pythodorus, an Athenian archon in the age of Themistocles.

Pytholæus, the brother of Theba, the wife of Alexander tyrant of Phœnæ. He assisted his sister in despatching her husband. Plut.

Python, a native of Byzantium, in the age of Philip of Macedonia. He was a great favourite of the monarch who sent him to the Thebes, when that city, at the instigation of Demosthenes, was going to take arms against Philip. Plut. in Dem.—Diod.

—One of the friends of Alexander, put to death by Ptolemy Lagus.—A man who killed Cotys king of Thracæ at the instigation of the Athenians.

—A celebrated serpent sprung from the mud and stagnated waters which remained on the surface of the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. Some, however, suppose that it was produced from the earth by Juno, and sent by the goddess to persecute Latona, who was then pregnant by Jupiter. Latona escaped his fury by means of her lover, who changed her into a quail during the remaining months of her pregnancy, and afterwards restored her to her original shape in the island of Delos, where she gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Apollo, as soon as he was born, attacked the monster and killed him with his arrows, and in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained, he instituted the celebrated Pythian games. Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 7. l. 10, c. 6.—Hygin.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 438, &c.—Lucan. 5, v. 134.

Pythonisæ, an Athenian prostitute greatly honoured by Harpalus, whom Alexander some time before had entrusted with the treasures of Babylon. He married her; and according to some, she died at the very moment that the nuptials were going to be celebrated. He raised her a splendid monument on the road which led from Athens to Eleusis, which cost him 30 talents. Diod. 17.—Paus. 1.—Athen. 13, &c.

Pythonissa, a name given to the priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi. She is more generally called Pythia. Vid. Pythia. The word Pythonissa was commonly applied to women who attempted to explain futurity.

Pytna, a part of mount Ida.

Pyttæus, a celebrated athlete, son of Lampis of Elis, who obtained a prize at the Olympic games. Paus. 9, c. 26.

QUADERNA, a town of Italy.

Quadi, an ancient nation of Germany, near the country of the Marcomanni, on the borders of the Danube, in modern Moravia. They rendered themselves celebrated by their opposition to the Romans, by whom they were often defeated, though not totally subdued. Tacit. in Germ. 42 & 43. Ann. 2, c. 63.

Quadratus, a surname given to Mercury, because some of his statues were square. The number 4, according to Plutarch, was sacred to Mercury, because he was born on the 4th day of the month. Plut. in Sympos. 9.—A governor of Syria in the age of Nero.

Quadrifrons, or Quadriceps, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with four heads. He had a temple on the Tarpeian rock, raised by L. Catulus.

Quæstōres, two officers at Rome, first created A.U.C. 269. They received their name a quærendo, because they collected the revenues of the state, and had the total management of the public treasury. The questorship was the first office which could be had in the state. It was requisite that the candidates should be 24 or 25 years of age, or, according to some, 27. In the year 339, A.U.C., two more were added to the others, to attend the consuls, to take care of the pay of the armies abroad, and sell the plunder and booty which had been acquired by conquest. These were called Peregrini, whilst the others, whose employment was in the city, received the name of Urbanis. When the Romans were masters of all Italy, four more were created, A.U.C. 439, to attend the proconsuls and propretors in their provinces, and to collect all the taxes and customs which each particular district owed to the republic. They were called Provinciales. Sylla the dictator created 20 questors, and J. Cæsar 40, to fill up the vacant seats in the senate; from whence it is evident that the questors ranked as senators in the senate. The questors were always appointed by the senate at Rome, and if any person was appointed to the questorship without their permission, he was only called proquestor. The questores urbani were apparently of more consequence than the rest, the treasury was entrusted to their care, they kept an account of all the receipts and disbursements, and the Roman eagles or ensigns were always in their possession when the armies were not on an expedition. They required every general before he triumphed to tell them, upon his oath, that he had given a just account of the number of the slain on both sides, and that he had been saluted imperator by the soldiers, a title which every commander generally received from his army after he had obtained a victory, and which was afterwards confirmed and approved by the senate. The city questors had also the care of the ambassadors; they lodged and received them, and some time after, when Augustus was declared emperor, they kept the decrees of the senate, which had been before entrusted with the ediles and the tribunes. This gave rise to two new offices of trust and honour, one of which was questor palatii, and the other questor principis, or augusti, sometimes called candidatus principis. The tent of the questor in the camp was called questorium. It stood near that of the general. Varro, de L. L. 4. — Liv. 4, c. 43. — Dio. 43.

Quari, a people of Gaul.

Quarius, a river of Bœotia.

Quercens, a Rutulian who fought against the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 684.

Quercetulanus, a name given to mount Cælius at Rome, from the oaks which grew there. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 65.

Quiritis fanum, a temple without the walls of the city of Rome. Quiritis was the goddess of rest. Her temple was situate near the Colline gate. Liv. 4, c. 4. — August. de Civ. D. 4, c. 16.

Q. Quirinus, an officer under the emperor Trajan, who behaved with great valour in the expeditions which were undertaken by the army which he commanded. He was put to death by Adrian.

Quinctia prata. Vid. Quinta.

Quinctianus, a man who conspired against Nero, for which he was put to death.

Quinctilia, a comedian who refused to betray a conspiracy which had been formed against Caligula.

Quinctius T., a Roman consul who gained some victories over the Ætoli and the Volsci, and obtained a triumph for subduing Præneste.

Cæso, a man accused before the Roman people, and vindicated by his father Cincinnatus.—A Roman celebrated for his frugality. Vid. Cincinnatus.—A master of horse.—A Roman consul when Annibal invaded Italy.—A brother of Flaminius, banished from the senate by Cato, for killing a Gaul.—An officer killed by the Carthaginians.—An officer under Dolabella.—Another who defeated the Latins.—A consul who obtained a victory over the Volsci.—Hirpinus. Vid. Hirpinus.

Quinda, a town of Cilicia.

Quindecimviri, an order of priests whom Tarquin the Proud appointed to take care of the Sibylline books. They were originally two, but afterwards the number was increased to 15, to whom Sylla added five more, whence their name. Vid. Decemviri and Duumviri.

Quinquatria, a festival in honour of Minerva at Rome, which continued during five days. The beginning of the celebration was the 18th of March. The first day sacrifices and oblations were presented, but, however, without the effusion of blood. On the second, third, and fourth days, shows of gladiators were exhibited, and on the fifth day there was a solemn procession through the streets of the city. On the days of the celebration, scholars obtained holidays, and it was usual for them to offer prayers to Minerva for learning and wisdom, which the goddess patronized; and on their return to school they presented their master with a gift which has received the name of Minerval. They were much the same as the Panathænae of the Greeks. Plays were also acted, and disputations were held on subjects of literature. They received their name from the five days which were devoted for the celebration.

Quinquennales ludi, games celebrated by the Chians in honour of Homer every fifth year. There were also some games among the Romans which bore this name. They are the same as the Acian games. Vid. Actia.

Quintia Prata, a place on the borders of the Tiber near Rome, which had been cultivated by the great Cincinnatus. Liv. 3, c. 26.

Quintilianus Marcus Fabius, a celebrated rhetorician born in Spain. He opened a school of rhetoric at Rome, and was the first who obtained a salary from the state as being a public teacher. After he had remained 20 years in this laborious employment, and obtained the merited applause of the most illustrious Romans, not only as a preceptor, but as a pleader at the bar, Quintilian, by the permission of the emperor Domitian, retired to enjoy the fruits of his labours and industry. In his retirement he assiduously dedicated his time to the study of literature, and wrote a treatise on the causes of the corruption of eloquence. Some time after, at the pressing solicitations of his friends, he wrote his institutiones oratoricæ, the most perfect and complete system of oratory extant. It is divided into 12 books, in which the author explains from observation, as well as from experience, what can constitute a good and perfect orator, and in this he not only mentions the pursuits and the employments of the rhetorician, but he also speaks of his education, and begins with the attention which ought to be shown him even in his cradle. He was appointed preceptor to the two young princes whom Domitian destined for his successors on the throne, but the pleasures which the rhetorician received from the favours and the attention of the emperor and from the success which his writings met in the world, were embittered by the loss of his wife, and of his two sons. It is said that Quintilian was poor in his retirement, and that his indulgence was relieved by the liberality of his pupil Pliny the younger. He died A.D. 95. His Institutions were discovered in the 1415th year of the christian era, in an old tower of a monastery at St. Gal, by Poggio Bracciolini, a native of Florence. The best editions of Quintilian are those of Gesner, 4to, Gotting, 1738; of L. Bat. 8vo, cum notis variorum, 1665; of Gibson, 4to, Oxon, 1693; and that of Rollin, republished in 8vo, London, 1792.

Quintilius Varus, a Roman governor of Syria. Virg. Varus.—A friend of the emperor Alexander.—A man put to death by the emperor Severus.

Quintilla, a courtesan at Rome, &c. Juv. 7, v. 75.

Quintillus M. Aurelius Claudius, a brother of Claudius, who proclaimed himself emperor, and 17 days after destroyed himself by opening his veins in a bath, when he heard that Aurelian was marching against him, about the 270th year of the christian era.

Quintus, or Quintinius, one of the names of Cincinnatus. Pers. 1, v. 73.—Pedius, a painter. Virg. Pedius.

Quintus Curtius Rufus, a Latin historian, who flourished, as some suppose, in the reign of Vespasian or Trajan. He has rendered himself known by his history of the reign of Alexander the Great. This history was divided into 20 books, of which the two first, the end of the fifth, and the beginning of the sixth, are lost. This work is admired for the elegance, the purity, and the floridness of its style. It is, however, blamed for great anachronisms and glaring mistakes in geography as well as history. Freinshemius has written a supplement to Curtius, in which he seems to have made some very satisfactory amends for the loss of which the history had suffered, by a learned collection of facts and circumstances from all the different authors who have employed their pen in writing an account of Alexander, and of his Asiatic conquests. Some suppose that the historian is the same with that Curtius Rufus who lived in the age of Claudius, under whom he was made consul. This Rufus was born of an obscure family, and he attended a Roman questor in Africa, when he was met at Adrumetum by a woman above a human shape, as he was walking under the porticoes in the middle of the day. This extraordinary character addressed the indigent Roman, and told him that the day should come in which he should govern Africa with consular power. This strange prophecy animated Rufus; he repaired to Rome, where he gained the favours of the emperor, obtained consular honours, and at last retired as proconsul to Africa, where he died. The best editions of Curtius are those of Elzevir, 8vo, Amst. 1673; of Snakenburg, 4to, L. Bat. 1724; and of Barbon, 12mo, Paris, 1757. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 23, &c.

Quintus Veranius, a governor of Cappadocia.—Cicero, the brother of Cicero.—Catalus, a Roman consul.—A friend of Caesar.

Quirinalis, festivals in honour of Romulus, surnamed Quirinus, celebrated on the 13th of the calends of March.

Quirinalis, a hill at Rome, originally called Agonius, and afterwards Collinus. The name of Quirinalis is obtained from the inhabitants of Cures, who settled there under their king Tullius. It was also called Cabalinus, from two marble statues of a horse, one of which was the work of Phidias, and the other of Praxiteles. Liv. 1, c. 44.—Ovid. Fast. 375. Mt. 14, v. 843.—One of the gates of Rome near mount Quirinalis.

Quirinus, a surname of Mars among the Romans. This name was also given to Romulus when he had been made a god by his superstitious subjects. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 475.—Also a surname of the god Janus.—Sulpitius, a Roman consul, born at Lanuvium. Though descended of an obscure family, he was raised to the greatest honours by Augustus. He was appointed governor of Syria, and was afterwards made preceptor to Caius the grandson of the emperor. He married Æmilia Lepida the granddaughter of Sylla and Pompey, but some time after he shamefully repudiated her. He died A.D. 22. Tacit. Ann. 3, &c.

Quirites, a name given to the Roman citizens, because they inhabited the town of Cures, and who on that account were called Quirites. After this union, the two nations were indiscriminately and promiscuously called by that name. It is, however, to be observed that the word was confined to Rome, and not used in the armies, as we find some of the generals applying it only to such of their soldiers as they dismissed or disgraced. Even some of the emperors appeased a sedition, by calling their rebellious soldiers by the degrading appellation of Quirites. Sueton. Cos. 170.—Lamprid. 53.—Lucan. 5, v. 558.—Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 1.—Varro, de L. L. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 479.

RABIRIUS C., a Roman knight, who lent an immense sum of money to Ptolemy Auletes king of Egypt. The monarch afterwards not only refused to repay him, but even confined him, and endangered his life. Rabirius escaped from Egypt with difficulty, but at his return to Rome, he was accused by the senate of having lent money to an African prince, for unlawful purposes. He was ably defended by Cicero, and acquitted with difficulty. Cic. pro Rab.—A Latin poet in the age of Augustus, who wrote, besides satires and epigrams, a poem on the victory which the emperor had gained over Antony at Actium. Seneca has compared him to Virgil for elegance and majesty, but Quintilian is not so favourable to his poetry.—An architect in the reign of Domitian, who built a celebrated palace for the emperor, of which the ruins are still seen at Rome.

Racilla, the wife of Cincinnatus. Liv. 3, c. 26.

Racilius, a tribune who complained in the senate of the faction of Clodius. Cic. in Ver. 2, c. 12. Ad Q. fr. 2, c. 1.

Rasaces, an officer of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his master, and fled to Athens.

Ramesis, a king of Egypt. Virg. Rhames.

Rames, or Rhamnenses, one of the three centuries instituted by Romulus. After the Roman people had been divided into three tribes, the monarch elected out of each 100 young men of the best and noblest families, with which he formed three companies of horse. One of them was called Rammes, either from the tribe of which it was chosen, or from Romulus. Another was called Tatian, and the third Lucressa. Varr. de L. L. 4, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Horat. de Art. Poet. 304.—Plut. in Rom.

Banda, a village of Persia, where 3000 rebellious Persians were slain by Chiles. Polyan. 7.

Bapo, a Rutulian chief, &c. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 748.

Bascepollis, a Macedonian sent to the assistance of Pompey. Cæsar. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 4.

Bavenna, a town of Italy on the Adriatic, which became celebrated under the Roman emperors for its capacious harbour, which could contain 250 ships, and for being for some time the seat of the western empire. It was difficult of access by land, as it stood on a small peninsula; and so ill supplied with water, that it was sold at a higher price than wine, according to Martial. The emperors kept one of their fleets there, and the other at Misenum, on the other side of Italy. It was founded by a colony of Thessalians, or, according to others, of Sabines. It is now fallen from its former grandeur, and is a wretched town situate at the distance of about four miles from the sea, and surrounded with swamps and marshes. Strab. 5.—Suet. in Aug. 49.—Plin. 36, c. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Martial. 3, ep. 93, v. 8, &c.

Bauraci, a people of Gaul, whose chief town is now August on the Rhine. Cæs. G. 1, c. 5.

Boâte, a pleasant town of Umbria, built, as some suppose, before the Trojan war, about 15 miles from Fanum Vacunæ, near the lake Velinus. Cybele was the chief deity of the place. It was famous for its asses. Strab. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Varro, de R. R. 1.—Liv. 25, c. 7, l. 26, c. 11, l. 28, c. 45.—Cic. Cat. 3, c. 2. N. D. 2, c. 2.

Bediollus, a deity whose name is derived from the word redire (to return). The Romans raised a temple to this imaginary deity on the spot where Annibal had retired when he approached Rome, as if to besiege it. Pestus de V. Sig.

Bedōnes, a nation among the Armorici, now the people of Rennes and St. Maloes, in Brittany. Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 41.

Begillæ, or Begillum, a town in the country of the Sabines in Italy, about 20 miles from Rome, celebrated for a battle which was fought there, A.U.C. 258, between 24,000 Romans and 40,000 Etrurians, who were headed by the Tarquins. The Romans obtained the victory, and scarce 20,000 of the enemy escaped from the field of battle. Castor and Pollux, according to some accounts, were seen mounted on white horses, and fighting at the head of the Roman army. Liv. 2, c. 16.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Plut. in Cor.—Vul. Max. 1.—Flor. 1.—Suet. Tib. 1.

Begillænus Q. Nonius, a Dacian who entered the Roman armies, and was raised to the greatest honours under Valerian. He was elected emperor by the populace, who were dissatisfied with Gallienus, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers, A.D. 262.

Begillus, a small lake of Latium, whose waters fall into the Anio, at the east of Rome. The dictator Posthumius defeated the Latin army near it. Liv. 9, c. 19.

Beginum, a town of Germany, now supposed Rasthoun of Regensburg.

Begium Lepidum, a town of Modena, now Regio, at the south of the Po. Plin. 3, c. 15.—Cic. 12, Fam. 5, l. 13, ep. 7.

M. Attillius Begulus, a consul during the first Punic war. He reduced Brundisium, and in his second consulship he took 64, and sunk 30 galleys of the Carthaginian fleet, on the coast of Sicily. Afterwards he landed in Africa, and so rapid was his success, that in a short time he defeated three generals, and made himself master of about 200 places of consequence on the coast. The Carthaginians sued for peace, but the conqueror refused to grant it, and soon after he was defeated in a battle by Xanthippus, and 30,000 of his men were left on the field of battle, and 15,000 taken prisoners. Regulus was in the number of the captives, and he was carried in triumph to Carthage. He was afterwards sent by the enemy to Rome, to propose an accommodation, and an exchange of prisoners; and if his commission was unsuccessful, he was bound by the most solemn oaths to return to Carthage without delay. When he came to Rome, Regulus dissuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms which the enemy proposed, and when his opinion had had due influence on the senate, he then retired to Carthage agreeable to his engagements. The Carthaginians were told that their offers of peace had been rejected at Rome by the means of Regulus, and therefore they prepared to punish him with the greatest severity. His eyebrows were cut, and he was exposed for some days to the excessive heat of the meridian sun, and afterwards confined in a barrel, whose sides were everywhere filled with large iron spikes, till he died in the greatest agonies. His sufferings were heard at Rome, and the senate permitted his widow to inflict whatever punishments she pleased on some of the most illustrious captives of Carthage, who were in their hands. She confined them also in presses filled with sharp iron points, and was so exquisite in her cruelty, that the senate at last interferred, and stopped the barbarity of her punishments. Regulus died about 251 years before Christ. Sil. 6, v. 319.—Flor. 2, c. 3.—Herat. 3, ed. 5.—Cic. de Off. 1, c. 13.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 2.—Liv. ep. 16.—Memmius, a Roman made governor of Greece by Caligula. While Regulus was in this province, the emperor wished to bring the celebrated statue of Jupiter Olympius, by Phidias, to Rome; but this was supernaturally prevented, and according to ancient authors, the ship which was to convey it was destroyed by lightning, and the workmen who attempted to remove the statue were terrified away by sudden noises. Dioc. Cas.—A man who condemned Sejanus.—Roscius, a man who held the consulship but for one day, in the reign of Vitellius.

Bemi, a nation of Gaul, whose principal town, Duricortorium, is now Rheims, in the north of Champagne. Plin. 4, c. 17.—Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 5.

Bemmis lex, de judicis, was enacted to punish all calumniators. The letter K was marked on their forehead. This law was abolished by Constantine the Great. Cic. pro Ros.

Bemulus, a chief of Tibur, whose arms were seized by the Rutulians, and afterwards became part of the plunder which Euryalus obtained. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 360.—A friend of Turnus, trampled to death by his horse, which Orsilochnus had wounded. Id. 11, v. 616, &c.

Bemulus Sylvius, a king of Alba, destroyed by lightning on account of his impiety. Ovid. Trist. 4, v. 50.

Bemuria, festivals established at Rome by Romulus, to appease the manes of his brother Remus. They were afterwards called Lemuria, and celebrated yearly.

Remus, the brother of Romulus, was exposed, together with him, by the cruelty of his grandfather. In the contest which happened between the two brothers about building a city, Romulus obtained the preference, and Remus, for ridiculing the rising walls, was put to death by his brother's orders, or by Romulus himself. Vid. Romulus. The Romans were afflicted with a plague after this murder, upon which the oracle was consulted, and the manes of Remus appeased by the institution of the Remuria. Ovid.—One of the auxiliaries of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 330.

Romona, a town of Mesopotamia, famous for the defeat of Sapor by Gordian.

Rosus, a small river of Asia Minor, falling into the Meander.

Rotina, a village near Misenum. Plin. 6, 4p. 16.

Roudigni, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 40.

Rha, a large river, now the Volga, of Russia. A medicinal root which grew on its bank was called Rha barbarum, Khandarb.

Rhacia, a promontory in the Mediterranean sea, projecting from the Pyrenean mountains.

Rhacius, a Cretan prince, the first of that nation who entered Ionia with a colony. He seized Claros, of which he became the sovereign. He married Manto the daughter of Tiresias, who had been seized on his coasts. Paus. 7, c. 3.

Rhacotis, an ancient name of Alexandria the capital of Egypt. Strab.—Paus. 5, c. 21.

Rhadamanthus, a son of Jupiter and Europa. He was born in Crete, which he abandoned about the 30th year of his age. He passed into some of the Cyclades, where he reigned with so much justice and impartiality, that the ancients have said he became one of the judges of hell, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confess their crimes, and in punishing them for their offences. Rhadamanthus reigned not only over some of the Cyclades, but over many of the Greek cities of Asia. Paus. 8, c. 53.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 435.—Diod. 5.—Plato.—Homer. Il. 4, v. 564.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 566.

Rhadamistus, a son of Pharnasmanes king of Iberia. He married Zenobia, the daughter of his uncle Mithridates king of Armenia, and some time after put him to death. He was put to death by his father for his cruelties, about the year 52 of the christian era. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 37.

Rhadius, a son of Neleus.

Rhetoum, a city of Phrygia.

Rhæti, or Ræti, an ancient and warlike nation of Etruria. They were driven from their native country by the Gauls, and went to settle on the other side of the Alps. Vid. Rætia. Plin. 3, c. 10.—Justin. 20, c. 5.

Rhætia, a country at the north of Italy, between the Alps and the Danube, which now forms the territories of the Grisons, of the Tyrol, and part of Italy. It was divided into two parts, Rhætia prima and Rhætia secunda. The first extended from the sources of the Rhine to those of the Licus or Lek, a small river which falls into the Danube. The other, called also Vindelicia, extended from the Licus to another small river called Cenus, or Inn, towards the east. The principal towns of Rhætia were called Curia, Tridentum, Belunum, Feltria. The Rhetians rendered themselves formidable by the frequent invasions which they made upon the Roman empire, and were at last conquered by Drusus the brother of Tiberius, and others under the Roman emperors. Virg. G. 2, v. 96.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 3, c. 20. l. 14, c. 2, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4 & 14.

Rhameus, a king and augur, who assisted Turnus against Æneas. He was killed in the night by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 325.

Rhamnus, a town of Attica, famous for a temple of Amphiaræus, and a statue of the goddess Nemesis, who was from thence called Rhamnusia. This statue was made by Phidias, out of a block of Parian marble, which the Persians intended as a pillar to be erected to commemorate their expected victory over Greece. Paus. 1.—Plin. 36.

Rhamnusia, a name of Nemesis. Vid. Rhamnus.

Rhampsinitus, an opulent king of Egypt, who succeeded Proteus. He built a large tower with stones at Memphis, where his riches were deposited, and of which he was robbed by the artifice of the architect, who had left a stone in the wall easily movable, so as to admit a plunderer. Herodot. 2, c. 121, &c.

Rhameses, or Ramises, a powerful king of Egypt, who, with an army of 700,000 men, conquered Æthiopia, Libya, Persia, and other eastern nations. In his reign, according to Pliny, Troy was taken. Some authors consider him to be the same as Sesostris. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 60.—Plin. 36, c. 3.

Rhanis, one of Diana's attendant nymphs. Ovid. Met. 3.

Rharos, or Rharium, a plain of Attica, where corn was first sown by Ixioleus. It received its name from the sower's father, who was called Rharos. Paus. 1, c. 14 & 38.

Rhaacopöris, a king of Thrace, who invaded the possessions of Cotys, and was put to death by order of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 64.

Rhea, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Saturn, by whom she had Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, &c. Her husband, however, devoured them all as soon as born, as he had succeeded to the throne with the solemn promise that he would raise no male children, or, according to others, because he had been informed by an oracle that one of his sons would dethrone him. To stop the cruelty of her husband, Rhea consulted her parents, and was advised to impose upon him, or perhaps to fly into Crete. Accordingly, when she brought forth, the child was immediately concealed, and Saturn devoured up a stone which his wife had given him as her own child. The fears of Saturn were soon proved to be well founded. A year after, the child, whose name was Jupiter, became so strong and powerful, that he drove his father from his throne. Rhea has been confounded by the mythologists with some of the other goddesses, and many have supposed that she was the same divinity that received adoration under the various names of Bona Dea, Cybele, Dindymena, Magna Mater, Ceres, Vesta, Titæa, and Terra, Tellus, and Ops. Vid. Cybele, Ceres, Vesta, &c. Rhea, after the expulsion of her husband from his throne, followed him to Italy, where he established a kingdom. Her benevolence in this part of Europe was so great, that the golden age of Saturn is often called the age of Rhea. Hesiod. Theog.—Orpheus, in Hymn.—Homer. Ib.—Æschyl. Prom.—Euripid. Bacc. & Elect.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 197.—Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.—Sylvia, the mother of Romulus and Remus. She is also called Iliæ. Vid. Iliæ.—A nymph of Italy, who is said to have borne a son called Aventinus to Hercules. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 659.

Rhebas, or Rhebus, a river of Bithynia, flowing from mount Olympus into the Euxine sea. Plac. 7, v. 698.

Rhedōnes. Vid. Redones.

Rhegium, now Rheggio, a town of Italy, in the country of the Brutii, opposite Messina in Sicily, where a colony of Messenians under Alcida-nidas settled, B.C. 723. It was originally called Rhegium, and afterwards Rhegium Julium, to distinguish it from Rhegium Lepidi, a town of Cis-alpine Gaul. Some suppose that it received its name from the Greek word ῥήγνυμι, to break, because it is situate on the straits of Charybdis, which were broken when the island of Sicily, as it were, was formed and separated from the continent of Italy. This town has always been subject to great earthquakes, by which it has often been destroyed. The neighbourhood is remarkable for its great fertility, and for its delightful views. Sil. 13, v. 94.—Cic. pro Arch. 3.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 5 & 48.—Justin. 4, c. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 6.

Rhegusci, a people of the Alps.

Rhemi. Vid. Remi.

Rhene, a small island of the Ægean, about 200 yards from Delos, 18 miles in circumference. The inhabitants of Delos always buried their dead there, and their women also retired there during their labour, as their own island was consecrated to Apollo, where Latona had brought forth, and where no dead bodies were to be inhumated. Strabo says that it was uninhabited, though it was once as populous and flourishing as the rest of the Cyc-lades. Polycrates conquered it, and consecrated it to Apollo, after he had tied it to Delos, by means of a long chain. Rhene was sometimes called the small Delos, and the island of Delos the great Delos. Thucyd. 3.—Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Rheni, a people on the borders of the Rhine.

Rhenus, one of the largest rivers of Europe, which divides Germany from Gaul. It rises in the Rhaetian Alps, and falls into the German ocean. Virgil has called it bicornis, because it divides itself into two streams. The river Rhine was a long time a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, and on that account its banks were covered with strong castles. J. Cæsar was the first Roman who crossed it to invade Germany. The waters of that river were held in great veneration, and were supposed by the ancient Germans to have some peculiar virtue, as they threw their children into it, either to try the fidelity of the mothers, or to brace and invigorate their limbs. If the child swam on the surface, the mother was acquitted of suspicion, but if it sunk to the bottom, its origin was deemed illegitimate. In modern geography the Rhine is known as dividing itself into four large branches; the Waal, Lech, Issel, and the Rhine. That branch which still retains the name of Rhine loses itself in the sands above modern Leyden, and is afterwards no longer known by its ancient appellation, since the year 860, A.D., when inundations of the sea destroyed the regularity of its mouth. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258.—Strab. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 3, l. 5, c. 2.—Cæsar, de Bell. G. 4, c. 10.—Fasti. Ann. 2, c. 6.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 727.—A small river of Italy, falling into the Po on the south, now Rheuo. Sil. 8, v. 600.—Plin. 3, c. 16, l. 16, c. 36.

Rheomitres, a Persian who revolted from Artaxerxes, &c. Diod. 15.—A Persian officer killed at the battle of Issus. Curt. 2, c. 5.

Rhesus, a king of Thrace, son of the Strymon and Terpsichore, or, according to others, of Eioneus by Euterpe. After many warlike exploits and conquests in Europe, he marched to the assistance of Priam king of Troy, against the Greeks. He was expected with great impatience, as an ancient oracle had declared that Troy should never be taken if the horses of Rhesus drank the waters of the Xan-thus, and fed upon the grass of the Trojan plains. This oracle was well known to the Greeks, and therefore two of their best generals, Diomedes and Ulysses, were commissioned by the rest to intercept the Thracian prince. The Greeks entered his camp in the night, slew him, and carried away his horses to their camp. Homer. Il. 10.—Dicys Cret. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 473.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 98.

Rhetogōnes, a prince of Spain, who surrendered to the Romans, and was treated with great humanity.

Rheticus, a mountain of Rhaetia.

Rheunus, a place in Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 23.

Rhexenor, a son of Nausithous king of Phæacia. Homer. Od. 7.—The father of Chalciope, the wife of Ægeus king of Athens.—A musician who accompanied Antony in Asia.

Rhexibius, an athlete of Opus, who obtained a prize in the Olympic games, and had a statue in the grove of Jupiter. Paus. 6, c. 18.

Rhiānus, a Greek poet of Thrace, originally a slave. He wrote an account of the war between Sparta and Messenia, which continued for 20 years, as also a history of the principal revolutions and events which had taken place in Thessaly. Of this poetical composition nothing but a few verses are extant. He flourished about 200 years before the christian era. Paus. 4, c. 6.

Rhidago, a river of Hircania falling into the Caspian sea. Curt. 6, c. 4.

Rhimotacles, a king of Thrace, who revolted from Antony to Augustus. He boasted of his attachment to the emperor's person at an entertainment, upon which Augustus said, proditiouem amo, proditores vero odi.

Rhinocolura, a town on the borders of Palestine and Egypt. Liv. 45, c. 11.

Rhion, a promontory of Achaia, opposite to Antirrhium in Ætolia, at the mouth of the Corinthian gulf, called also the Dardanelles of Lepanto. The strait between Naupactum and Patrae bore also the same name. The tomb of Hesiod was at the top of the promontory. Liv. 27, c. 30, l. 38, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 2.—Paus. 7, c. 22.

Rhipa, or Rhiphe, a town of Arcadia. Stat. 4.—Theb. v. 286.

Rhiphæi, large mountains at the north of Scythia, where, as some suppose, the Gorgons had fixed their residence. The name of Rhiphæan was applied to any cold mountain in a northern country, and indeed these mountains seem to have existed only in the imagination of the poets, though some make the Tanais rise there. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 3, v. 272, l. 3, v. 282, l. 4, v. 418.—Virg. G. 1, v. 240, l. 4, v. 518.

Rhithon, a Greek poet of Tarentum, in the age of Alexander. Cic. ad Att. ep. 20.

Rhipheus, one of the Centaurs. Ovid. Met. —A Trojan praised for his justice, &c. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 426. Vid. Rhipheus.

Rhion. Vid. Rhion.

Rhizonites, a people of Illyricum, whose chief town was called Rhizonium. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Rhoda, now Roses, a seaport town of Spain. Liv. 34, c. 8.—A town on the Rhone, from which the river received its name. It was ruined in Pliny's age. Plin. 3, c. 4.

Rhodanus, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, arising in the Rhætian Alps, and falling into the Mediterranean sea, near Marseilles. It is one of the largest and most rapid rivers of Europe, now known by the name of the Rhone. Mela, 2, c. 5. l. 3, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258.—Sil. 3, v. 477.—Marcell. 15, &c.—Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 433. l. 6, v. 475.

Rhodogune, a daughter of Phraates king of Parthia, who married Demetrius, when he was in banishment at her father's court. Polyæn. 8.

Rhódope, or Rhodópis, a celebrated courtesan of Greece, who was fellow-servant with Æsop, at the court of a king of Samos. She was carried to Egypt by Xanthus, and her liberty was at last bought by Charaxes of Mitylene, the brother of Sappho, who was enamoured of her, and who married her. She sold her favours at Naucratis, where she collected so much money, that, to render her name immortal, she consecrated a number of spits in the temple of Apollo at Delphi; or, according to others, erected one of the pyramids of Egypt. Ælian says that, as Rhodope was one day bathing herself, an eagle carried away one of her sandals, and dropped it near Psammetichus king of Egypt, at Memphis. The monarch was struck with the beauty of the sandal, strict inquiry was made to find the owner, and Rhodope, when discovered, married Psammetichus. Herodot. 2, c. 134, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 15.—Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 33. Perizonius supposes there were two persons of that name.

Rhódope, a high mountain of Thrace, extending as far as the Euxine sea, all across the country, nearly in an eastern direction. Rhodope, according to the poets, was the wife of Hæmus king of Thrace, who was changed into this mountain, because she preferred herself to Juno in beauty. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 87, &c.—Virg. Æd. 8. G. 3, v. 351.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 7.—Ital. 2, v. 73.—Senec. in Herc. Oct.

Rhodopæus, is used in the same signification as Thracian, because Rhodope was a mountain of that country. Ovid. A. A. 3, v. 321. Heroid. 2.—Virg. G. 4, v. 461.

Rhodunia, the top of mount Ceta. Liv. 36, c. 16.

Rhodus, a celebrated island in the Carpathian sea, 120 miles in circumference, at the south of Caria, from which it is distant about 20 miles. Its principal cities were Rhodes, founded about 408 years before the christian era, Lindus, Camisus, Jalyus. Rhodes was famous for the siege which it supported against Demetrius, and for a celebrated statue of Apollo. Vid. Colossus. The Rhodians were originally governed by kings, and were independent, but this government was at last exchanged for a democracy and an aristocracy. They were naturally given up to commerce, and, during many ages, they were the most powerful nation by sea. Their authority was respected, and their laws were so universally approved, that every country made use of them to decide disputes concerning maritime affairs, and they were at last adopted by other commercial nations, and introduced into the Roman codes, from whence they have been extracted to form the basis of the maritime regulations of modern Europe. When Alexander made himself master of Asia, the Rhodians lost their independence, but they soon after asserted their natural privileges under his cruel successors, and continued to hold that influence among nations to which their maritime power and consequence entitled them. They assisted Pompey against Caesar, and were defeated by Cassius, and became dependent upon the Romans. The island of Rhodes has been known by the several names of Ophiusia, Stadia, Telchimus, Corymbia, Trinacria, Æthra, Asteria, Poessa, Atabyria, Oloessa, Marcia, and Pelagia. It received the name of Rhodes, either on account of Rhode, a beautiful nymph who dwelt there, and who was one of the favourites of Apollo, or because roses (ροδοί) grew in great abundance all over the island. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 62 & 87. l. 5, c. 31.—Flor. 2, c. 7.—Pindar. Olymp. 7.—Lucan. 8, v. 248.—Cic. pro Man. Leg. in Brut. 13.—Liv. 27, c. 30. l. 31, c. 2.

Rhœbus, a horse of Mezentius, whom his master addressed with the determination to conquer or to die, when he saw his son Lausus brought lifeless from the battle. This beautiful address is copied from Homer, where likewise Achilles addresses his horses. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 861.

Rhœus, one of the Centaurs who attempted to offer violence to Atalanta. He was killed at the nuptials of Pirithous by Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 301.—Virg. G. 2.—One of the giants killed by Bacchus, under the form of a lion, in the war which these sons of the earth waged against Jupiter and the gods. Horat. 2, od. 19, v. 23.

Rhœo, a nymph beloved by Apollo. Diod. 5.

Rhœstium, or Rhœtia, a promontory of Troas, on the Hellespont, near which the body of Ajax was buried. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 197. 4 Fast. v. 279.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 505. l. 2, v. 456.

Rhœtius, a mountain of Corsica, now Rosso.
Rhœtus, a king of the Marubii, who married a woman called Casperia, to whom Archemorus, his son by a former wife, offered violence. After this incestuous attempt, Archemorus fled to Turnus king of the Rutuli. *Virg. Rome, a city of Italy, the capital of the Roman empire, situate on the banks of the river Tiber, at the distance of about 16 miles from the sea. The name of its founder, and the manner of its foundation, are not precisely known. Romulus, however, is universally supposed to have laid the foundations of that celebrated city, on the 20th of April, according to Varro, in the year 3961 of the Julian period, 351 years after the creation of the world, 753 before the birth of Christ, and 431 years after the Trojan war, and in the fourth year of the sixth Olympiad. In its original state, Rome was but a small castle on the summit of mount Palatine; and the founder, to give his followers the appearance of a nation or a barbarian horde, was obliged to erect a standard as a common asylum, for every criminal, debtor, or murderer, who fled from their native country to avoid the punishment which attended them. From such an assemblage a numerous body was soon collected, and before the death of the founder, the Romans had covered with their habitations the Palatine, Capitoline, Aventine, Esquiline hills, with mount Cælius and Quirinalis. After many successful wars against the neighbouring states, the views of Romulus were directed to regulate a nation naturally fierce, warlike, and uncivilized. The people were divided into classes, the interests of the whole were linked in a common chain, and the labours of the subject, as well as those of his patron, tended to the same end, the aggrandizement of the state. Under the successors of Romulus, the power of Rome was increased, and the boundaries of her dominions extended; while one was employed in regulating the forms of worship, and inculcating in the minds of his subjects a reverence for the deity, the other was engaged in enforcing discipline among the army, and raising the consequence of the soldiers in the government of the state; and a third made the object of his administration consist in adorning his capital, in beautifying its edifices, and in fortifying it with towers and walls. During 244 years the Romans were governed by kings, but the tyranny, the oppression, and the violence of the last of these monarchs and of his family, became so atrocious, that a revolution was effected in the state, and the democratical government was established. The monarchical government existed under seven princes, who began to reign in the following order: Romulus, B.C. 753; and after one year's interregnum, Numa, 715; Tullus Hostilius, 672; Ancus Martius, 640; Tarquin Priscus, 616; Servius Tullius, 578; and Tarquin the Proud, 534, expelled 25 years after, B.C. 509; and this regal administration has been properly denominated the infancy of the Roman empire. After the expulsion of the Tarquins from the throne, the Romans became more sensible of their consequence; with their liberty they acquired a spirit of faction, and they became so jealous of their independence, that the first of their consuls who had been the most zealous and animated in the assertion of their freedom, was banished from the city because he bore the name, and was of the family, of the tyrants; and another, to stop their suspicions, was obliged to pull down his house, whose staretiness and magnificence above the rest seemed incompatible with the duties and the rank of a private citizen. They knew more effectually their power when they had fought with success against Porsenna the king of Etruria, and some of the neighbouring states, who supported the claim of the tyrant, and attempted to replace him on his throne by force of arms. A government which is entrusted into the hands of two of the most distinguished of its members, for the limited space of one year, cannot but give rise to great men, glorious exploits, and tremendous seditions. The general who is placed at the head of an army during a campaign, must be active and diligent, when he knows that his power is terminated with the year, and if he has a becoming ambition, he will distinguish his consulship by some uncommon act of valour, before he descends from the dignity of an absolute magistrate to the dependence of a fellow-citizen. Yet these attempts for the attainment of glory often failed of success; and though the Romans could once boast that every individual in their armies could discharge with fidelity and honour the superior offices of magistrate and consul, there are to be found in their annals many years marked by overthrows, or disgraced by the ill conduct, the oppression, and the wantonness of their generals. Vid. Consul. To the fame which their conquests and daily successes had gained abroad, the Romans were not a little indebted for their gradual rise to superiority; and to this may be added the policy of the census, which every fifth year told them their actual strength, and how many citizens were able to bear arms. And indeed it was no small satisfaction to a people who were continually making war, to see that, in spite of all the losses which they might sustain in the field, the increase of the inhabitants of the city was prodigious, and almost incredible; and had Romulus lived after the battle of Actium, he would have been persuaded with difficulty that above 4,000,000 of inhabitants were contained within those walls, which in the most flourishing period of his reign could scarce muster an army of 3000 infantry and 300 horse. But when Rome had flourished under the consular government for about 120 years, and had beheld with pleasure the conquests of her citizens over the neighbouring states and cities, which, according to a Roman historian, she was ashamed to recollect in the summit of her power, an irruption of the barbarians of Gaul rendered her very existence precarious, and her name was nearly extinguished. The valour of an injured individual [Vid. Camillus] saved it from destruction, yet not before its buildings and temples were reduced to ashes. This celebrated event, which gave the appellation of another founder of Rome to Camillus, has been looked upon as a glorious era to the Romans. The huts and cottages which Romulus had erected, and all his successors repaired, were totally consumed, and when the city arose again from its ruins, the streets were enlarged, convenience as well as order was observed, taste and regularity were consulted, and the poverty, ignorance, and rusticity of the Romans seemed to be extinguished with their old habitations. But no sooner were they freed from the fears of their barbarian invaders, than they turned their arms against those states which refused to acknowledge their superiority, or yield their independence. Their wars with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines displayed their character in a different view: if they before had fought for freedom and independence, they now drew their sword for glory; and here we may see them conquered in the field, and yet refusing to grant that peace for which their conqueror himself had sued. The advantages they gained from their battles with Pyrrhus were many. The Roman name became known in Greece, Sicily, and Africa, and in losing or gaining a victory, the Romans were enabled to examine the manoeuvres, observe the discipline, and contemplate the order and the encampments of those soldiers whose friends and ancestors had accompanied Alexander the Great in the conquest of Asia. Italy became subjected to the Romans at the end of the war with the Tarentines, and that period of time has been called the second age, or the adolescence of the Roman empire. After this memorable era they tried their strength not only with distant nations, but also upon a new element; and in the long wars which they waged against Carthage, they acquired territory, and obtained the sovereignty of the sea; and though Annibal for 16 years kept them in continual alarms, hovered round their gates, and destroyed their armies almost before their walls, yet they were doomed to conquer (Vid. Punicum bellum), and soon to add the kingdom of Macedonia (Vid. Macedonicum bellum) and the provinces of Asia (Vid. Mithridaticum bellum) to their empire. But while we consider the Romans as a nation subduing their neighbours by war, their manners, their counsels, and their pursuits at home are not to be forgotten. To be warriors was their profession; their assemblies in the Campus Martius were a meeting of armed men, and very properly denominated an army. Yet while their conquests were so extensive abroad, we find them torn by factions at home; and so far was the resentment of the poorer citizens carried, that we see the enemy at the gates of the city, while all are unwilling to take up arms and to unite in the defence of their common liberty. The senators and nobles were ambitious of power, and endeavoured to retain in their hands that influence which had been exercised with so much success, and such cruelty, by their monarchs. This was the continual occasion of tumults and sedition. The people were jealous of their liberty. The oppression of the nobles irritated them, and the stripes to which they were too often exposed without mercy, was often productive of revolutions. The plebeians, though originally the poorest and most contemptible citizens of an indigent nation, whose food in the first ages of the empire was only bread and salt, and whose drink was water, soon gained rights and privileges by their opposition. Though really slaves, they became powerful in the state; one concession from the patricians produced another, and when their independence was boldly asserted by their tribunes, they were admitted to share in the highest offices of the state, and the laws which forbade the intermarriage of plebeian and patrician families were repealed, and the meanest peasant could by valour and fortitude be raised to the dignity of dictator and consul. It was not till these privileges were obtained by the people from the senate, that Rome began to enjoy internal peace and tranquility; her battles were then fought with more vigour, her soldiers were more animated, and her sovereignty was more universally established. But supreme power lodged in the hands of a factious and ambitious citizen, becomes too often dangerous. The greatest oppression and tyranny took place of subordination and obedience; and from those causes proceeded the unparalleled slaughter and effusion of blood under a Sylla and a Marius. It has been justly observed, that the first Romans conquered their enemies by valour, temperance, and fortitude; their moderation also and their justice were well known among their neighbours, and not only private possessions, but even mighty kingdoms and empires, were left in their power, to be distributed among a family or to be ensured in the hands of a successor. They were also chosen umpires to decide quarrels, but in this honourable office they consulted their own interest; they artfully supported the weaker side, that the more powerful might be reduced, and gradually become their prey. Under J. Cæsar and Pompey, the rage of civil war was carried to unprecedented excess: it was not merely to avenge a private injury, but it was a contest for the sovereignty; and though each of the adversaries wore the mask of pretended sincerity, and professed himself to be the supporter of the republic, no less than the abolition of freedom and the public liberty was the aim. What Julius began, his adopted son achieved: the ancient spirit of national independence was extinguished at Rome; and after the battle of Actium, the Romans seemed unable to govern themselves without the assistance of a chief, who, under the title of imperator, an appellation given to every commander by his army after some signal victory, reigned with as much power and as much sovereignty as another Tarquin. Under their emperors, the Romans lived a luxurious and indolent life; they had long forgot to appear in the field, and their wars were left to be waged by mercenary troops, who fought without spirit or animosity, and who were ever ready to yield to him who bought their allegiance and fidelity with the greatest sums of money. Their leaders themselves were not the most prudent or the most humane; the power which they had acquired by bribery was indeed precarious, and among a people where not only the highest offices of the state, but even the imperial purple itself, are exposed to sale, there cannot be expected much happiness or tranquillity in the palace of the emperor. The reigns of the successors of Augustus were distinguished by variety; one was the most abandoned and profligate of men, whom his own vices and extravagance hurried out of the world, while his successor, perhaps the most clement, just, and popular of princes, was sacrificed in the midst of his guards and attendants by the dagger of some offended favourite or disappointed eunuch. Few indeed were the emperors of Rome whose days were not shortened by poison, or the sword of an assassin. If one for some time had the imprudence to trust himself in the midst of a multitude, at last to perish by his own credulity, the other consulted his safety, but with no better success, in the innumerable chambers of his palace, and changed every day, to elude discovery, the place of his retirement. After they had been governed by a race of princes, remarkable for the variety of their characters, the Roman possessions were divided into two distinct empires, by the enterprising Constantine, A. D. 328. Constantinople became the seat of the eastern empire, and Rome remained in the possession of the western emperors, and continued to be the capital of their dominions. In the year 800 of the christian era, Rome with Italy was delivered by Charlemagne, the then emperor of the west, into the hands of the Pope, who still continues to hold the sovereignty, and to maintain his independence under the name of the Ecclesiastical States. The original poverty of the Romans has often been disguised by their poets and historians, who wished it to appear that a nation who were masters of the world, had had better beginning than to be a race of shepherds and robbers. Yet it was to this simplicity they were indebted for their successes. Their houses were originally destitute of every ornament, they were made with unequal boards, and covered with mud, and these served them rather as a shelter against the inclemency of the seasons than for relaxation and ease. Till the age of Pyrrhus, they despised riches, and many salutary laws were enacted to restrain luxury and to punish indolence. They observed great temperance in their meals; young men were not permitted to drink wine till they had attained their 30th year, and it was totally forbidden to women. Their national spirit was supported by policy; the triumphal procession of a conqueror along the streets amidst the applause of thousands, was well calculated to promote emulation, and the number of gladiators who were regularly introduced not only in public games and spectacles, but also at private meetings, served to cherish their fondness for war, whilst it steeled their hearts against the calls of compassion; and when they could gaze with pleasure upon wretches whom they forcibly obliged to murder one another, they were not inactive in the destruction of those whom they considered as inveterate foes or formidable rivals in the field. In their punishments, civil as well as military, the Romans were strict and rigorous; a deserter was severely whipped and sold as a slave, and the degradation from the rank of a soldier and dignity of a citizen was the most ignominious stigma which could be affixed upon a seditious mutineer. The transmarine victories of the Romans proved at last the ruin of their innocence and bravery. They grew fond of the luxury of the Asiatics; and, conquered by the vices and indolence of those nations whom they had subdued, they became as effeminate and as dissolute as their captives. Marcellus was the first who introduced a taste for the fine arts among his countrymen. The spoils and treasures that were obtained in the plunder of Syracuse and Corinth, rendered the Romans partial to elegant refinement and ornamental equipage. Though Cato had despised philosophy [Vid. Carneades], and declared that war was the only profession of his countrymen, the Romans, by their intercourse with the Greeks, soon became fond of literature; and though they had once banished the sophists of Athens from their city, yet they beheld with rapture their settlement among them in the principal towns of Italy, after the conquest of Achaia. They soon after began to imitate their polished captives, and to cultivate poetry with success. From the valour of their heroes and conquerors, indeed, the sublimest subjects were offered to the genius of their poets; but of the little that remains to celebrate the early victories of Rome, nothing can be compared to the nobler effusions of the Augustan age. Virgil has done so much for the Latin name that the splendour and the triumphs of his country are forgotten for a while, when we are transported in the admiration of the majesty of his numbers, the elegant delicacy of his expressions, and the fire of his muse; and the applauses given to the lyric powers of Horace, the softness of Tibullus, the vivacity of Ovid, and to the superior compositions of other respectable poets, shall be unceasing so long as the name of Rome excites our reverence and our praises, and so long as genius, virtue, and abilities are honoured amongst mankind. Though they originally rejected with horror a law which proposed the building of a public theatre, and the exhibition of plays, like the Greeks, yet the Romans soon proved favourable to the compositions of their countrymen. Livius was the first dramatic writer of consequence at Rome, whose plays began to be exhibited A.U.C. 514. After him Naevius and Ennius wrote for the stage; and in a more polished period Plautus, Terence, Cæcilius, and Afranius claimed the public attention and gained the most unbounded applause. Satire did not make its appearance at Rome till 100 years after the introduction of comedy, and so celebrated was Lucilius in this kind of writing, that he was called the inventor of it. In historical writing the progress of the Romans was slow and inconsiderable, and for many years they employed the pen of foreigners to compile their annals, till the superior abilities of a Livy were made known. In their worship and sacrifices the Romans were uncommonly superstitious; the will of the gods was consulted on every occasion, and no general marched to an expedition without the previous assurance from the augurs that the omens were propitious, and his success almost indubitable. Their sanctuaries were numerous; they raised altars not only to the gods, who, as they supposed, presided over their city, but also to the deities of conquered nations, as well as to the different passions and virtues. There were no less than 400 temples at Rome, crowded with statues; the priests were numerous, and each divinity had a particular college of sacerdotal servants. Their wars were declared in the most awful and solemn manner, and prayers were always offered in the temples for the prosperity of Rome, when a defeat had been sustained or a victory won. The power of fathers over their children was very extensive, and indeed unlimited; they could sell them or put them to death at pleasure, without the forms of a trial, or the interference of the civil magistrate. Many of their ancient families were celebrated for the great men whom they had produced, but the vigorous and interested part they took in the government of the republic exposed them often to danger; and some have observed that the Romans sunk into indolence and luxury when the Cornelli, the Fabii, the Æmiliii, the Marcelli, &c., who had so often supported their spirit and led them to victory, had been extinguished in the bloody wars of Marius and of the two triumvirates. When Rome was become powerful, she was distinguished from other cities by the flattery of her neighbours and citizens; a form of worship was established to her as a deity, and temples were raised in her honour, not only in the city but in the provinces. The goddess Roma was represented like Minerva, all armed and sitting on a rock, holding a pike in her hand, with her head covered with a helmet, and a trophy at her feet. *Liv. 1, &c.—Cato de R. Romūlidas, a patronymic given to the Roman people from Romulus their first king, and the founder of their city. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 638.

Romulus, a son of Mars and Ilia, grandson of Numitor king of Alba, was born at the same birth with Remus. These two children were thrown into the Tiber by order of Amulius, who usurped the crown of his brother Numitor; but they were preserved, and, according to Florus, the river stopped its course, and a she-wolf came and fed them with her milk, till they were found by Faustulus, one of the king's shepherds, who educated them as his own children. When they knew their real origin, the twins, called Romulus and Remus, put Amulius to death, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor. They afterwards undertook to build a city, and to determine which of the two brothers should have the management of it, they had recourse to omens and the flight of birds. Remus went to mount Aventine, and Romulus to mount Palatine. Remus saw first a flight of six vultures, and soon after, Romulus 12; and therefore, as his number was greater, he began to lay the foundations of the city, hoping that it would become a warlike and powerful nation, as the birds from which he had received the omen were fond of prey and slaughter. Romulus marked with a furrow the place where he wished to erect the walls; but their slenderness was ridiculed by Remus, who leaped over them with the greatest contempt. This irritated Romulus, and Remus was immediately put to death, either by the hand of his brother or one of the workmen. When the walls were built, the city was without inhabitants; but Romulus, by making an asylum of a sacred grove, soon collected a number of fugitives, foreigners, and criminals, whom he received as his lawful subjects. Yet, however numerous these might be, they were despised by the neighbouring inhabitants, and none were willing to form matrimonial connections with them. But Romulus obtained by force what was denied to his petitions. The Romans celebrated games in honour of the god Consus, and forcibly carried away all the females who had assembled there to be spectators of these unusual exhibitions. These violent measures offended the neighbouring nations; they made war against the ravishers with various success, till at last they entered Rome, which had been betrayed to them by one of the stolen virgins. A violent engagement was begun in the middle of the Roman forum; but the Sabines were conquered, or, according to Ovid, the two enemies laid down their arms when the women had rushed between the two armies, and by their tears and entreaties raised compassion in the bosoms of their parents and husbands. The Sabines left their original possessions and came to live in Rome, where Tatius their king shared the sovereign power with Romulus. The introduction of the Sabines into the city of Rome was attended with the most salutary consequences, and the Romans, by pursuing this plan, and admitting the conquered nations among their citizens, rendered themselves more powerful and more formidable. Afterwards Romulus divided the lands which he had obtained by conquest; one part was reserved for religious uses, to maintain the priests, to erect temples, and to consecrate altars; the other was appropriated for the expenses of the state; and the third part was equally distributed among his subjects, who were divided into three classes or tribes. The most aged and experienced, to the number of 100, were also chosen, whom the monarch might consult in matters of the highest importance, and from their age they were called senators, and from their authority patres. The whole body of the people were also distinguished by the name of patricians and plebeians, patron and client, who by mutual interest were induced to preserve the peace of the state, and to promote the public good. Some time after Romulus disappeared as he was giving instructions to the senators, and the eclipse of the sun, which happened at that time, was favourable to the rumour which asserted that the king had been taken up to heaven, 714 B.C., after a reign of 30 years. This was further confirmed by J. Proculus, one of the senators, who solemnly declared, that as he returned from Alba, he had seen Romulus in a form above human, and that he had directed him to tell the Romans to pay him divine honours under the name of Quirinus, and to assure them that their city was doomed one day to become the capital of the world. This report was immediately credited, and the more so as the senators dreaded the resentment of the people, who suspected them of having offered him violence. A temple was raised to him, and a regular priest, called Flamen Quirinalis, was appointed to offer him sacrifices. Romulus was ranked by the Romans among the 12 great gods, and it is not to be wondered that he received such distinguished honours, when the Romans considered him as the founder of their city and empire, and the son of the god of war. He is generally represented like his father, so much that it is difficult to distinguish them. The fable of the two children of Rhea Sylvia being nourished by a she-wolf, arose from Lupa, Faustulus's wife, having brought them up. *Virg. Roscia lex, de theatris, by L. Roscius Otho the tribune, A.D. C. 685. It required that none should sit in the first 14 seats of the theatre, if they were not in possession of 400 sestertia, which was the fortune required to be a Roman knight.

Roscianum, the port of Thurri, now Rossano.
Q. Roscius, a Roman actor, born at Lanuvium, so celebrated on the stage that every comedian of excellence and merit has received his name. His eyes were naturally distorted, and he always appeared on the stage with a mask, but the Romans obliged him to act his characters without, and they overlooked the deformities of his face, that they might the better hear his elegant pronunciation, and be delighted with the sweetness of his voice. He was accused on suspicion of dishonourable practices; but Cicero, who had been one of his pupils, undertook his defence, and cleared him of the malevolent aspersions of his enemies, in an elegant oration still extant. Roscius wrote a treatise, in which he compared with great success and much learning the profession of the orator with that of the comedian. Ruscino, a town of Gaul at the foot of the Pyrenees. Liv. 21, c. 24.—A seaport town of Africa. Id. 30, c. 10.

Ruscus, a town of Gaul.

Rusconia, a town of Mauritania. Liv. 21, c. 24.

Rusellia, an inland town of Etruria destroyed by the Romans. Liv. 28, c. 45.

Ruspina, a town of Africa near Adrumetum. Sil. It. 3, v. 260.—Hirt. Af. 640.

Rusticus L. Jun. Aruleus, a man put to death by Domitian. He was the friend and preceptor of Pliny the younger, who praises his abilities, and he is likewise commended by Tacitus, 26, H. c. 26.—Plin. 1, ep. 14.—Suet. in Dom.—A friend of M. Aurelius.

Rusucorum, a town of Mauritania, believed to be modern Algiers.

Rutilla, a deformed old woman, who lived near 100 years, &c. Plin. 7, c. 48.—Juv. 10, v. 294.

P. Rutillus Rufus, a Roman consul in the age of Sylla, celebrated for his virtues and writings. He refused to comply with the requests of his friends because they were unjust. When Sylla had banished him from Rome he retired to Smyrna, amidst the acclamations and praises of the people; and when some of his friends wished him to be recalled home by means of a civil war, he severely reprimanded them, and said, that he wished rather to see his country blush at his exile, than to plunge it into distress by his return. He was the first who taught the Roman soldiers the principles of fencing, and by thus mixing dexterity with valour, rendered their attacks more certain, and more irresistible. During his banishment he employed his time in study, and wrote a history of Rome in Greek, and an account of his own life in Latin, besides many other works. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 503.—Seneca, de Benef.—Cic. in Brut. De Orat. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 2, c. 3, l. 6, c. 4.—Patric. 2, c. 9.—A Roman proconsul, who is supposed to have encouraged Mithridates to murder all the Romans who were in his province.—Lupus, a pretor, who fled away with three cohorts from Tarracina.—A rhetorician. Quintill. 3, c. 1.—A man who went against Jugurtha.—A friend of Nero.—Claud. Numanianus, a poet of Gaul, in the reign of Honorius. According to some he wrote a poem on mount Ætna. He wrote also an itinerary, published by Burman in the Poetæ Latini Minores, L. Bat. 4to, 1737.

Rutilus, a rich man reduced to beggary by his extravagance. Juv. 11, v. 2.

Rutuba, a river of Liguria, falling from the Apennines into the Mediterranean. Lucan. 2, v. 422.—Of Latium, falling into the Tiber. Lucan. 2, v. 422.

Rutubus, a gladiator, &c. Horat. 2, sat. 7, v. 96.

Rutuli, a people of Latium, known as well as the Latins, by the name of Aborigines. When Æneas came into Italy, Turnus was their king, and they supported him in the war which he waged against this foreign prince. The capital of their dominions was called Ardea. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 883. Met. 14, v. 455, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Rutupæ, a seaport town on the southern coasts of Britain, abounding in excellent oysters, whence the epithet of Rutupinus. Some suppose that it is the modern town of Dover, but others Richborough or Sandwich. Lucan. 6, v. 67.—Juv. 4, v. 141.

Ruphæi montes. Vid. Rhipæi.

SABA, a town of Arabia, famous for frankincense, myrrh, and aromatic plants. The inhabitants were called Sabæi. Strab. 16.—Diod. 3.—Virg. G. 1, v. 57. Æn. 1, v. 420.

Sabachus, or Sabacon, a king of Æthiopia, who invaded Egypt and reigned there, after the expulsion of king Amasis. After a reign of 50 years he was terrified by a dream, and retired into his own kingdom. Herodot. 2, c. 137, &c.

Sabæi, a people of Arabia. Vid. Saba.

Sabæta, a town of Liguria with a safe and beautiful harbour, supposed to be the modern Savona. Sil. 8, v. 461.—Strab. 4.—A town of Assyria.

Sabatha, a town of Arabia, now Sanaa.

Sabatra, a town of Syria. Sil. 3, v. 256.

Sabatini, a people of Samnium, living on the banks of the Sabarus, a river which falls into the Vulturinus. Liv. 26, c. 33.

Sabarius, a surname of Bacchus, as also of Jupiter. Cic. de N. D. 3, c. 23.—Arnob. 4.

Sabbas, a king of India.

Sabella, the nurse of the poet Horace, 1, sat. 9, v. 29.

Sabelli, a people of Italy, descended from the Sabines, or, according to some, from the Samnites. They inhabited that part of the country which lies between the Sabines and the Marsi. Hence the epithet of Sabellicus. Horat. 3, od. 6.—Virg. G. 3, v. 255.

Sabellus, a Latin poet in the reign of Domitian and Nerva.

Julia Sabina, a Roman matron, who married Adrian by means of Plotina the wife of Trajan. She is celebrated for her private as well as public virtues. Adrian treated her with the greatest asperity, though he had received from her the imperial purple; and the empress was so sensible of his unkindness, that she boasted in his presence that she had disdained to make him a father, lest his children should become more odious or more tyrannical than he himself was. The behaviour of Sabina at last so exasperated Adrian that he poisoned her, or, according to some, obliged her to destroy herself. The emperor at that time laboured under a mortal disease, and therefore he was the more encouraged to sacrifice Sabina to his resentment, that she might not survive him. Divine honours were paid to her memory. She died after she had been married 38 years to Adrian, A.D. 138.

Sabini, an ancient people of Italy, reckoned among the Aborigines, or those inhabitants whose origin was not known. Some suppose that they were originally a Lacedæmonian colony, who settled in that part of the country. The possessions of the Sabines were situated in the neighbourhood of Rome, between the river Nar and the Anio, and bounded on the north by the Apennines and Umbria, south by Latium, east by the Æqui, and Etruria on the west. The greatest part of the contiguous nations were descended from them, such as the Umbrians, the Campanians, the Sabelli, the Osci, Samnites, Hemicæ, Æqui, Marsi, Brutii, &c. The Sabines are celebrated in ancient history as being the first who took up arms against the Romans, to avenge the rape of their females at a spectacle where they had been invited. After some engagements, the greatest part of the Sabines left their ancient possessions, and migrated to Rome, where they settled with their new allies. They were at last totally subdued, about the year of Rome 373, and ranked as Roman citizens. Their chief cities were Cures, Fidene, Reate, Crustumium, Corniculum, Nomentum, Collatia, &c. The character of the nation for chastity, for purity of morals, and for the knowledge of herbs and incantations, was very great. Horat. 17, ep. v. 28.—Cic. Vat. 15.—Plin. 3, c. 12.—Liv. 1, c. 9 & 18.—Dionys. 2, c. 51.—Strab. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 1. l. 3, c. 18.—Ital. 8, v. 424.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 775 & 797. Am. 1, v. 101. l. 3, v. 61.—Juv. 10, v. 197.

Sabinianus, a general who revolted in Africa, in the reign of Gordian, and was defeated soon after, A.D. 240.—A general of the eastern empire, &c.

Sabinus Aulus, a Latin poet intimate with Ovid. He wrote some epistles and elegies, in the number of which were mentioned, an epistle from Æneas to Dido, from Hippolytus to Phædra, and from Jason to Hippisyle, from Demophoon to Phyllis, from Paris to Æneme, from Ulysses to Penelope; the three last of which, though said to be his composition, are spurious. Ovid. Am. 2, el. 13, v. 27.—A man from whom the Sabines received their name. He received divine honours after death, and was one of those deities whom Æneas invoked when he entered Italy. He was supposed to be of Lacedæmonian origin. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 171.—An officer of Cæsar's army defeated by the Gauls.—Julius, an officer who proclaimed himself emperor in the beginning of Vespasian's reign. He was soon after defeated in a battle; and, to escape from the conqueror, he hid himself in a subterraneous cave, with two faithful domestics, where he continued unseen for nine successive years. His wife found out his retreat, and spent her time with him, till her frequent visits to the cave discovered the place of his concealment. He was dragged before Vespasian, and by his orders put to death, though his friends interested themselves in his cause, and his wife endeavoured to raise the emperor's pity, by showing him the twins whom she had brought forth in their subterraneous retreat.—Corn., a man who conspired against Caligula, and afterwards destroyed himself.—Titius, a Roman senator, shamefully accused and condemned by Sejanus. His body, after execution, was dragged through the streets of Rome, and treated with the greatest indignities. His dog constantly followed the body, and when it was thrown into the Tiber, the faithful animal plunged in after it, and was drowned. Plin. 8, c. 40.—Poppæus, a Roman consul, who presided above 24 years over Mœsia, and obtained a triumph for his victories over the barbarians. He was a great favourite of Augustus and Tiberius. Tacit. Ann.—Flavius, a brother of Hieronymus, killed by the populace. He was well known for his fidelity to Vitellius. He commanded in the Roman armies 35 years, and was governor of Rome for 12.—A friend of Domitian.—A Roman who attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews.—A friend of the emperor Alexander.—A lawyer.

Sabis, now Sambre, a river of Belgic Gaul, falling into the Maese at Namur. Cæs. 2, c. 16 & 18.

Sabota, the same as Sabatha.

Sabrasso, a powerful nation of India. Curt. 9, c. 8.

Sabrâta, a maritime town of Africa, near the Syrtis. It was a Roman colony, about 70 miles from the modern Tripoli. Ital. 3, v. 256.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

Sabrina, the Stern in England.

Sabûra, a general of Juba king of Numidia, defeated and killed in a battle. Lucan. 4, v. 722.

Saburinus, an officer of the pretorian guards. When he was appointed to this office by the emperor Trajan, the prince presented him with a sword, saying, "Use this weapon in my service as long as my commands are just; but turn it against my own breast, whenever I become cruel or malevolent."

Sabus, one of the ancient kings of the Sabines; the same as Sabinus. Vid. Sabinus.—A king of Arabia.

Sacadas, a musician and poet of Argos, who obtained three several times the prize at the Pythian games. Plut. de Mus.—Paus. 6, c. 14.

Sacæ, a people of Scythia, who inhabited the country that lies at the east of Bactriana and Sogdiana, and towards the north of mount Imaus. The name of Sacæ was given in general to all the Scythians, by the Persians. They had no towns, according to some writers, but lived in tents. Plin. 6, c. 13.—Herodot. 3, c. 93. l. 7, c. 63.—Plin. 6, c. 27.—Solin. 62.

Sacer mons, a mountain near Rome. Vid. Mons sacer.

Sacer lucus, a wood of Campania, on the Liris.

Sacer portus, or Sacri portus, a place of Italy, near Præneste, famous for a battle that was fought there between Sylla and Marius, in which the former obtained the victory. Pater. 2, c. 26.—Lucan. 2, v. 134.

Sacranî, a people of Latium, who assisted Turbus against Æneas. They were descended from the Pelasgians, or from a priest of Cybele. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 796.

Sacrator, one of the friends of Turbus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 747.

Sacra via, a celebrated street of Rome, where a treaty of peace and alliance was made between Romulus and Tatis. It led from the amphitheatre to the capitol, by the temple of the goddess of peace, and the temple of Cæsar. The triumphal processions passed through it to go to the capitol. Horat. 4, od. 2. l. 1, sat. 9.—Liv. 2, c. 13.—Cic. Planc. 7, Att. 4, ep. 4.

Sacrata lex, militaris, A.U.C. 411, by the dictator Valerius Corvus, as some suppose, enacted that the name of no soldier which had been entered in the muster roll should be struck out but by his consent, and that no person who had been a military tribune should execute the office of ductor ordinum.

M. Sacerdotivir, a friend of Cæsar, killed at Dyrrachium. Cæs. Bell. G.

Vid. Sacer portus.

Sacrum bellum, a name given to the wars carried on concerning the temple of Delphi. The first began B.C. 448, and in it the Athenians and Lacedæmonians were auxiliaries on opposite sides. The second war began 357 B.C., and finished nine years after by Philip of Macedonia, who destroyed all the cities of the Phocians. Vid. Phocis.—Promontorium, a promontory of Spain, near Cape St. Vincent, called by Strabo the most westerly part of the earth.

Sadales, a son of Cotys king of Thrace, who assisted Pompey with a body of 500 horsemen. Cæs. Bell. C. 3.—Cic. Verr. 1.

Sadus, a river of India.

Sadyâtes, one of the Mermnades, who reigned in Lydia 19 years after his father Gyges. He made war against the Milesians for six years. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.

Saetabis, a town of Spain near the Lucro, on a rising hill, famous for its fine linen. Sil. 3, v. 373.

Sagalassus, a town of Pisidia on the borders of Phrygia, now Sadyaklu. Liv. 38, c. 15.

Sagana, a woman acquainted with magic and enchantments. Horat. epod. 5, v. 25.

Sagaria, a river of Asia, rising from mount Dindymus in Phrygia, and falling into the Euxine. Virg. Sangaris. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 10, v. 47.

One of the companions of Aeneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Aen. 5, v. 263. l. 9, v. 575.

C. Sagitta, an officer who encouraged Piso to rebel against the emperor Nero, &c. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 49.

Sagra, a small river of Italy in the country of the Brutii, where 130,000 Crotonians were routed by 10,000 Locrians and Rhegians. Cic. Nat. D. 2, c. 2.—Strab. 6.

Saguntum, or Saguntus, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis at the west of the Iberus, about one mile from the sea-shore, now called Murvedro. It had been founded by a colony of Zacynthians, and by some of the Rutuli of Ardea. Saguntum is celebrated for the clay in its neighbourhood, with which cups, pelucula Saguntina, were made, but more particularly it is famous as being the cause of the second Punic war, and for the attachment of its inhabitants to the interest of Rome. Hannibal took it after a siege of about eight months; and the inhabitants, not to fall into the enemy's hands, burnt themselves with their houses, and with all their effects. The conqueror afterwards rebuilt it, and placed a garrison there, with all the noblemen whom he detained as hostages from the several neighbouring nations of Spain. Some suppose that he called it Spartagena. Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv. 21, c. 2, 7, 9.—Sil. 1, v. 271.—Lucan. 3, v. 150.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.

Sais, now Sa, a town in the Delta of Egypt, situate between the Canopic and Sebennytican mouths of the Nile, and anciently the capital of Lower Egypt. There was there a celebrated temple dedicated to Minerva, with a room cut out of one stone, which had been conveyed by water from Elephantis by the labours of 3000 men in three years. The stone measured on the outside 21 cubits long, 24 broad, and eight high. Osiris was also buried near the town of Sais. The inhabitants were called Saita. One of the mouths of the Nile, which is adjoining to the town, has received the name of Saiticum. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, &c.

Sala, a town of Thrace, near the mouths of the Hebrus.—A town of Mauritania.—Of Phrygia.—A river of Germany falling into the Elbe, near which are salt-pits. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 57.—Another falling into the Rhine, now the Issel.

Salsoon, a poor man who pretended to be uncommonly rich, &c. Cic. ad Div. 7, c. 24.

Salaminia, a name given to a ship at Athens, which was employed by the republic in conveying the officers of state to their different administrations abroad, &c.—A name given to the island of Cyprus, on account of Salamis, one of its capital cities.

Salmia, a daughter of the river Asopus by Methone. Neptune became enamoured of her, and carried her to an island of the Aegean, which afterwards bore her name, and where she gave birth to a son called Cenchreus. Diod. 4.

Salmia, Salamina, or Salamina, now Colouri, an island in the Saronicus sinus, on the southern coast of Attica, opposite Eleusis, at the distance of about a league, with a town and harbour of the same name. It is about 50 miles in circumference. It was originally peopled by a colony of Ionians, and afterwards by some of the Greeks from the adjacent islands and countries. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the fleet of the Greeks and that of the Persians, when Xerxes invaded Attica. The enemy's ships amounted to above 3000, and those of the Peloponnesians to about 380 sail. In this engagement, which was fought on the 20th of October, B. C. 480, the Greeks lost 40 ships, and the Persians about 200, besides an immense number which were taken, with all the ammunition they contained. The island of Salamis was anciently called Sciras, Cychria, or Cenchria, and its bay the gulf of Engia. It is said that Xerxes attempted to join it to the continent. Teucer and Ajax, who went to the Trojan war, were natives of Salamis. Strab. 2.—Herodot. 8, c. 56, &c.—Plut. & C. Nep. in Them., &c.—Diod. 4.—Val. Max. 5, c. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 35, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Lucan. 5, v. 109.—Sil. 14, v. 283.

Salmia, or Salmia, a town at the east of the island of Cyprus. It was built by Teucer, who gave it the name of the island Salamis, from which he had been banished about 1270 years before the christian era; and from this circumstance the epithets of ambigua and of altera were applied to it, as the mother country was also called vera, for the sake of distinction. His descendants continued masters of the town for above 800 years. It was destroyed by an earthquake, and rebuilt in the fourth century, and called Constantia. Strab. 9.—Herodot. 8, c. 94, &c.—Horat. 1, ad. 7, v. 21.—Patere. 1, c. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 183.

Salsapia, or Salsapia, now Salpe, a town of Apulia, where Annibal retired after the battle of Canxæ, and where he devoted himself to licentious pleasure, forgetful of his fame, and of the interests of his country. It was taken from the Carthaginian general by Marcellus. Some remains of this place may be traced near a lake called Salapia Palus, now used for making salt, which, from the situation near the sea, is easily conveyed by small boats to ships of superior burden. Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Val. Max. 3, c. 8.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

Salara, a town of Africa propria, taken by Scipio. Liv. 29, c. 34, &c.

Salaria, a street and gate at Rome which led towards the country of the Sabines. It received the name of Salaria, because salt (sal) was generally conveyed to Rome that way. Mart. 4, ep. 64.—A bridge called Salarius, was built four miles from Rome through the Salarian gate on the river Anio.

Salasii, a people of Cisalpine Gaul who were in continual war with the Romans. They cut off 10,000 Romans under Appius Claudius, A. U. C. 610, and were soon after defeated, and at last totally subdued and sold as slaves by Augustus. Their country, now called Val de Aonsta, after a colony settled there, and called Augusta Pratoria, was situate in a valley between the Alps Graia and Pennina, or Great and Little St. Bernard. Liv. 21, c. 38.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Strab. 4.

Saleus, a poet of great merit in the age of Domitian, yet pinched by poverty, though born of illustrious parents, and distinguished by purity of manners and integrity of mind. Juv. 7, v. 80.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

Saleni, a people of Spain. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Salentini, a people of Italy, near Apulia, on the southern coast of Calabria. Their chief towns were Brundisium, Tarentum, and Hydruntum. Ital. 8, v. 579.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 400.—Varro, de R. R. 1, c. 24.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Salernum, now Salerno, a town of the Picentini, on the shores of the Tyrrhene sea, south of Campania, and famous for a medical school in the lower ages. Plin. 13, c. 3.—Liv. 34, c. 45.—Lucan. 2, v. 425.—Falerc. 1, c. 15.—Horat. 1, ep. 15.

Salganeus, or Salganea, a town of Bœotia, on the Euripus. Liv. 35, c. 37, &c.

Salia, a town of Spain, where Prudentius was born. Mela.

Salica, a town of Spain.

Salii, a college of priests at Rome, instituted in honour of Mars, and appointed by Numa to take care of the sacred shields called Ancylia, B.C. 709. Virg. Ancyl. They were 12 in number, the three elders among them had the superintendance of all the rest; the first was called præsul, the second vates, and the third magister. Their number was afterwards doubled by Tullius Hostilius, after he had obtained a victory over the Fidenates, in consequence of a vow which he had made to Mars. The Salii were all of patrician families, and the office was very honourable. The 1st of March was the day on which the Salii observed their festivals in honour of Mars. They were generally dressed in a short scarlet tunic, of which only the edges were seen; they wore a large purple-coloured belt about the waist, which was fastened with brass buckles. They had on their heads round bonnets with two corners standing up, and they wore in their right hand a small rod, and in their left a small buckler. In the observation of their solemnity they first offered sacrifices, and afterwards went through the streets dancing in measured motions, sometimes all together, or at other times separately, while musical instruments were playing before them. They placed their body in different attitudes, and struck with their rods the shields which they held in their hands. They also sung hymns in honour of the gods, particularly of Mars, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, and they were accompanied in the chorus by a certain number of virgins, habited like themselves, and called Salivæ. The Salii instituted by Numa were called Palatini, in contradistinction from the others, because they lived on mount Palatine, and offered their sacrifices there. Those that were added by Tullius were called Collini, Agonales, or Quirinales, from a mountain of the same name, where they had fixed their residence. Their name seems to have been derived a saliendo, or saltando, because during their festivals it was particularly requisite that they should leap and dance. Their feasts and entertainments were uncommonly rich and sumptuous, whence dapes salivares is proverbially applied to such repasts as are most splendid and costly. It was usual among the Romans when they declared war, for the Salii to shake their shields with great violence, as if to call upon the god Mars to come to their assistance. Liv. 1, c. 20.—Varro, de L. L. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 387.—Dionys. 3.—Flor. 1, c. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 285.—A nation of Germany who invaded Gaul, and were conquered by the emperor Julian. Amm. Mar. 17.

Salinctor, a surname common to the family of the Livii and others.

Sallust, an Acarnanian at the games exhibited by Æneas in Sicily, and killed in the wars with Turnus. It is said by some that he taught the Latins those ceremonies, accompanied with dancing, which afterwards bore his name in the appellation of the Salii. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 298. l. 10, v. 753.

Crispus Sallustius, a Latin historian, born at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He received his education at Rome, and made himself known as a public magistrate in the office of questor and consul. His licentiousness, and the depravity of his manners, however, did not escape the censure of the age, and Sallust was degraded from the dignity of a senator, B.C. 50. His amour with Fausta the daughter of Sylla was a strong proof of his debauchery; and Milo the husband, who discovered the adulterer in his house, revenged the violence offered to his bed, by beating him with stripes, and selling him his liberty at a high price. A continuation of extravagance could not long be supported by the income of Sallust, but he extricated himself from all difficulties by embracing the cause of Cæsar. He was restored to the rank of senator, and made governor of Numidia. In the administration of his province, Sallust behaved with unusual tyranny; he enriched himself by plundering the Africans, and at his return to Rome he built himself a magnificent house, and bought gardens, which, from their delightful and pleasant situation, still preserve the name of the gardens of Sallust. He married Terentia the divorced wife of Cicero; and from this circumstance, according to some, arose an immortal hatred between the historian and the orator. Sallust died in the 51st year of his age, 35 years before the christian era. As a writer he is peculiarly distinguished. He had composed a history of Rome, but nothing remains of it except a few fragments, and his only compositions extant are his history of Catiline's conspiracy, and of the wars of Jugurtha king of Numidia. In these celebrated works the author is greatly commended for his elegance, the vigour and animation of his sentences; he everywhere displays a wonderful knowledge of the human heart, and paints with a masterly hand the causes that gave rise to the great events which he relates. No one was better acquainted with the vices that prevailed in the capital of Italy, and no one seems to have been more severe against the follies of the age, and the failings of which he himself was guilty in the eyes of the world. His descriptions are elegantly correct, and his harangues are nervous and animated, and well suiting the character and the different pursuits of the great men in whose mouths they are placed. The historian, however, is blamed for tedious and insipid exordiums, which often disgust the reader without improving him; his affectation of old and obsolete words and phrases is also censured, and particularly his unwarrantable partiality in some of his narrations. Though faithful in every other respect, he has not painted the character of Cicero with all the fidelity and accuracy which the reader claims from the historian; and in passing in silence over many actions which reflect the greatest honour on the first husband of Terentia, the rival of Cicero has disgraced himself, and rendered his compositions less authentic. There are two orations or epistles to Cæsar, concerning the regulations of the state, attributed to him, as also an oration against Cicero, whose authenticity some of the moderns have disputed. The best editions of Sallust, are those of Haverkamp, a vols. 4to, Amst. 1742; and of Edinburgh, 12mo, 1755. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Suet. de Gram. in Cæs. Mart. Ital. 14, ep. 191.—A nephew of the historian, by whom he was adopted. He imitated the moderation of Mæcenas, and remained satisfied with the dignity of a Roman knight, when he could have made himself powerful by the favours of Augustus and Tiberius. He was very effeminate and luxurious. Horace dedicated 2, od. 2, to him. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Plin. 34.—Secundus Promotus, a native of Gaul, very intimate with the emperor Julian. He is remarkable for his integrity, and the soundness of his counsels. Julian made him his prefect of Gaul.—There is also another Sallust, called Secundus, whom some have improperly confounded with Promotus. Secundus was also one of Julian's favourites, and was made by him prefect of the east. He conciliated the good graces of the Romans by the purity of his morals, his fondness for discipline, and his religious principles. After the death of the emperor Jovian, he was universally named by the officers of the Roman empire to succeed on the imperial throne; but he refused this great though dangerous honour, and pleaded infirmities of body and old age. The Romans wished upon this to invest his son with the imperial purple, but Secundus opposed it, and observed that he was too young to support the dignity.—A prefect of Rome in the reign of Valentinian.—An officer in Britain.

Salmacis, a fountain of Caria, near Halicarnassus, which rendered effeminate all those who drank of its waters. It was there that Hermaphroditus changed his sex, though he still retained the characteristics of his own. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 285. l. 15, v. 319.—Hygin. Fab. 271.—Festus de V. Sig.

Salamantica, a town of Spain, now Salamanca.

Salmone, a town of Elis in Peloponnesus, with a fountain, from which the Enipeus takes its source, and falls into the Alpheus, about 40 stadia from Olympia, which, on account of that, is called Salmoneis. Ovid. 3, Amor. el. 6, v. 43.—A promontory at the east of Crete. Dionys. 5.

Salmoneus, a king of Elis, son of Æolus and Enarete, who married Alcideia, by whom he had Tyro. He wished to be called a god, and to receive divine honours from his subjects; therefore to imitate the thunder, he used to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every side, as if to imitate the lightning. This impiety provoked Jupiter. Salmoneus was struck with a thunderbolt, and placed in the infernal regions near his brother Sisyphus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 235.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. Fab. 60.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 585.

Salmónis, a name given to Olympia. Vid. Salmone.—The patronymic of Tyro daughter of Salmoneus. Ovid. Am. 3, el. 6, v. 43.

Salmus (untis), a town of Asia near the Red sea, where Alexander saw a theatrical representation. Diod. 17.

Salmydessus, a bay on the Euxine sea.

Salo, now Xalou, a river in Spain, falling into the Iberus. Mart. 10, ep. 20.

Salodurum, now Solours, a town of the Helvetii.

Salôme, a queen of Judæa. This name was common to some of the princesses in the family of Herod, &c.

Salon, a country of Bithynia.

Salóna, or Salone, a town of Dalmatia, about 10 miles distant from the coast of the Adriatic, conquered by Pollio, who on that account called his son Saloninus, in honour of the victory. It was the native place of the emperor Diocletian, and he retired there to enjoy peace and tranquillity, after he had abdicated the imperial purple, and built a stately palace, the ruins of which were still seen in the 16th century. A small village of the same name preserves the traces of its Italian grandeur. Near is Spalatro. Lucan. 4, v. 404.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 9.—Met. 2, c. 3.

Salonina, a celebrated matron who married the emperor Gallienus, and distinguished herself by her private as well as public virtues. She was a patroness of all the fine arts, and to her clemency, mildness, and benevolence, Rome was indebted some time for her peace and prosperity. She accompanied her husband in some of his expeditions, and often called him away from the pursuits of pleasure to make war against the enemies of Rome. She was put to death by the hands of the conspirators, who also assassinated her husband and family, about the year 268 of the christian era.

Saloninus, a son of Asinius Pollio. He received his name from the conquest of Salona by his father. Some suppose that he is the hero of Virgil's fourth eclogue, in which the return of the golden age is so warmly and beautifully anticipated.—P. Licinius Cornelius, a son of Gallienus by Salonina, sent into Gaul, there to be taught the art of war. He remained there some time, till the usurper Posthumus arose, and proclaimed himself emperor. Saloninus was upon this delivered up to his enemy and put to death in the 10th year of his age.

Salonius, a friend of Cato the censor. The daughter of Censorius married Salonius in his old age. Plut.—A tribune and centurion of the Roman army, hated by the populace for his strictness.

Salpis, a colony of Etruria, whose inhabitants are called Salpiniates. Liv. 5, c. 31.

Salsum, a river in Spain. Cæs.

Salvian, one of the fathers of the fifth century, of whose works the best edition is the 12mo, Paris, 1684.

Salvidianus, an officer of the army of Augustus. He was betrayed by Antony, and put to death.—A Latin writer in the age of the emperor Probus.

Salvius, a flute-player, sated king by the rebellious slaves of Sicily in the age of Marius. He maintained for some time war against the Romans.—A nephew of the emperor Otho.—A friend of Pompey.—A man put to death by Domitian.—A freedman of Atticus. Cic. ad Div. c. 11.—Another of the sons of Hortensius. Id.

Salus, the goddess of health at Rome, worshipped by the Greeks under the name of Hygeia. Liv. 9 & 10.

Salves, a people of Gaul on the Rhone. Liv. 5, c. 34 & 35. l. 21, c. 26.

Samára, a river of Gaul, now called the Somme, which falls into the British channel near Abbeville.

Samarita, a city and country of Palestine, famous in sacred history. The inhabitants, called Samaritanians, were composed of heathens and rebellious Jews, and on having a temple built there after the form of that of Jerusalem, a lasting enmity arose between the people of Judæa and of Samaria, so that no intercourse took place between the two countries, and the name of Samaritan became a word of reproach, and as it were a curse.

Samarobriva, a town of Gaul, now Amiens, in Picardy.

Sambolus, a mountain near Mesopotamia, where Hercules was worshipped. Tacit. A. 12, c. 13.

Sambus, an Indian king defeated by Alexander. Diod. 17. — A river of India.

Same, or Samos, a small island in the Ionian near Ithaca, called also Cephalenia. Virg. An. 3, v. 271.

Samia, a daughter of the river Maander. Paus. 7, c. 4. — A surname of Juno, because she was worshipped at Samos.

Samnites, or Amnites, a people of Gaul. Samnites, a people of Italy, who inhabited the country situate between Picenum, Campania, Apulia, and ancient Latium. They distinguished themselves by their implacable hatred against the Romans, in the first ages of that empire, till they were at last totally extirpated, B.C. 272, after a war of 71 years. Their chief town was called Samnium, or Samnis. Liv. 7, Æn. 1, c. 16, &c. 1, 3, c. 18. — Strab. 5. — Lucan. 2. — Eutrop. 2.

Samnium, a town and part of Italy inhabited by the Samnites. Vid. Samnites.

Samochonites, a small lake of Palestine.

Samonium, a promontory of Crete.

Samos, an island in the Ægean sea, on the coast of Asia Minor, from which it is divided by a narrow strait, with a capital of the same name, built B.C. 986. It is about 87 miles in circumference, and is famous for the birth of Pythagoras. It has been anciently called Parthenia, Anthemusa, Stephane, Melanophyllus, Anthemus, Cyprisissia, and Dryusa. It was first in the possession of the Leleges, and afterwards of the Ionians. The people of Samos were at first governed by kings, and afterwards the form of their government became democratical and oligarchical. Samos was in its most flourishing situation under Polycrates, who had made himself absolute there. The Samians assisted the Greeks against the Persians, when Xerxes invaded Europe, and were reduced under the power of Athens, after a revolt, by Pericles, B.C. 441. They were afterwards subdued by Eumenes king of Pergamus, and were restored to their ancient liberty by Augustus. Under Vespasian, Samos became a Roman province. Juno was held in the greatest veneration there; her temple was uncommonly magnificent, and it was even said that the goddess had been born there under a willow tree, on the banks of the Imbrasus. Mela, 2, c. 7. — Paus. 7, c. 2 & 4. Plut. in Per. — Plin. 5, c. 31. — Virg. Æn. 1, v. 20. — Thucyd. — The islands of Samothrace and Cephalenia were also known by the name of Samos.

Samosāta, a town of Syria, near the Euphrates, below mount Taurus, where Lucian was born.

Samothræe, or Samothræcia, an island in the Ægean sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus, on the coast of Thrace, from which it is distant about 32 miles. It was known by the ancient names of Leucosia, Melitis, Electria, Leucania, and Dardani. It was afterwards called Samos, and distinguished from the Samos which lies on the coast of Ionia by the epithet of Thracian, or by the name of Samothrace. It is about 38 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or only 20 according to modern travellers. The origin of the first inhabitants of Samothrace is unknown. Some, however, suppose that they were Thracians, and that the place was afterwards peopled by the colonies of the Pelasgians, Samians, and Phœnicians. Samothrace is famous for a deluge which inundated the country, and reached the very top of the highest mountains. This inundation, which happened before the age of the Argonauts, was owing to the sudden overflow of the waters of the Euxine, which the ancients considered merely as a lake. The Samothracians were very religious; and as all mysteries were supposed to have taken their origin there, the island received the name of sacred, and was a safe and inviolable asylum to all fugitives and criminals. The island was originally governed by kings, but afterwards the government became democratical. It enjoyed all its rights and immunities under the Romans till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced it, with the rest of the islands in the Ægean, into the form of a province. Plin. 4, c. 12. — Strab. 10. — Herodot. 7, c. 108, &c. — Virg. Æn. 7, v. 208. — Mela, 2, c. 7. — Paus. 7, c. 4. — Flor. 2, c. 12.

Samus, a son of Ancæus and Samia, grandson of Neptune. Paus. 7, c. 4.

Sana, a town of mount Athos, near which Xerxes began to make a channel to convey the sea.

Sanaos, a town of Phrygia. Strab.

Sanchoñiáthos, a Phœnician historian, born at Berytus, or, according to others, at Tyre. He flourished a few years before the Trojan war, and wrote, in the language of his country, a history in nine books, in which he amply treated of the theology and antiquities of Phœnicia, and the neighbouring places. It was compiled from the various records found in the cities, and the annals which were usually kept in the temples of the gods among the ancients. This history was translated into Greek by Philo, a native of Byblus, who lived in the reign of the emperor Adrian. Some few fragments of this Greek translation are extant. Some, however, suppose them to be spurious, while others contend that they are true and authentic.

Sancus, Sangus, or Sanctus, a deity of the Sabines introduced among the gods of Rome under the name of Dis Pater. According to some, Sancus was father to Sabus, or Sabinus, the first king of the Sabines. Ital. 8, v. 421. — Varron. de L. L. 4, c. 10. — Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.

Sandace, a sister of Xerxes.

Sandalotia, a name given to Sardinia, from its resemblance to a sandal. Plin. 3, c. 7.

Sandalium, a small island of the Ægean, near Lesbos. — A port of Pisidia. Strab.

Sandanis, a Lydian, who advised Croesus not to make war against the Persians.

Sandænes, a river of Thrace near Pailene.

Sandrocottus, an Indian of a mean origin. His impertinence to Alexander was the beginning of his greatness; the conqueror ordered him to be seized, but Sandrocottus fled away, and at last dropped down overwhelmed with fatigue. As he slept on the ground, a lion came to him, and gently licked the sweat from his face. This uncommon tameness of the animal appeared supernatural to Sandrocottus, and raised his ambition. He aspired to the monarchy, and after the death of Alexander, he made himself master of a part of the country which was in the hands of Seleucus. Justin. 15, c. 4.

Sane, or Sana, a town of Macedonia. Vid. Sana.

Sangāla, a town of India destroyed by Alexander. Arrian. 5.

Sangārius, or Sangāris, a river of Phrygia, rising in mount Dindymus, and falling into the Euxine. The daughter of the Sangarius became pregnant of Altes only from gathering the boughs of an almond tree on the banks of the river. Hecuba, according to some, was daughter of this river.

Some of the poets call it Sagaris. Ovid. ex Pont. 4. el. 10.—Claudian. in Eutrop. 2.—Paus. 7. c. 17.

Sanguinius, a man condemned for ill language, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6. c. 7.

Sannyrion, a tragic poet of Athens. He composed many dramatical pieces, one of which was called Io, and another Danae. Athen. 9.

Santones and Santone, now Saintonge, a people with a town of the same name in Gaul. Lucan. 2. v. 422.—Martial. 3. ep. 96.

Saon, an historian. Dion. Hal.—A man who first discovered the oracle of Trophonius. Paus. 9. c. 40.

Sapsel, or Saphal, a people of Thrace, called also Sinthi. Ovid. Fast. 1. v. 389.

Sapirene, an island of the Arabic gulf. Plin. 6. c. 29.

Sapis, now Savio, a river of Gaul Cispadana, falling into the Adriatic. Lucan. 2. v. 406.

Sapor, a king of Persia, who succeeded his father Artaxerxes about the 238th year of the christian era. Naturally fierce and ambitious, Sapor wished to increase his paternal dominions by conquest; and as the indulgence of the emperors of Rome seemed favourable to his views, he laid waste the provinces of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia; and he might have become master of all Asia, if Odenatus had not stopped his progress. If Gordian attempted to repel him, his efforts were weak, and Philip, who succeeded him on the imperial throne, bought the peace of Sapor with money. Valerian, who was afterwards invested with the purple, marched against the Persian monarch, but he was defeated and taken prisoner. Odenatus no sooner heard that the Roman emperor was a captive in the hands of Sapor, than he attempted to release him by force of arms. The forces of Persia were cut to pieces; the wives and the treasures of the monarch fell into the hands of the conqueror, and Odenatus penetrated, with little opposition, into the very heart of the kingdom. Sapor, soon after this defeat, was assassinated by his subjects, A.D. 273, after a reign of 37 years. He was succeeded by his son called Hormisdas. Marcellin., &c.—The second of that name succeeded his father Hormisdas on the throne of Persia. He was as great as his ancestor of the same name; and by undertaking a war against the Romans, he attempted to enlarge his dominions, and to add the provinces on the west of the Euphrates to his empire. His victories alarmed the Roman emperors, and Julian would have perhaps seized him in the capital of his dominions, if he had not received a mortal wound. Jovian, who succeeded Julian, made peace with Sapor; but the monarch, always restless and indefatigable, renewed hostilities, invaded Armenia, and deposed the emperor Valens. Sapor died A.D. 330, after a reign of 70 years, in which he had often been the sport of fortune. He was succeeded by Artaxerxes, and Artaxerxes by Sapor III., a prince who died after a reign of five years, A.D. 389, in the age of Theodosius the Great. Marcellin., &c.

Sappho, or Sappho, celebrated for her beauty, her poetical talents, and her amorous disposition, was born in the island of Lesbos, about 600 years before Christ. Her father's name, according to Herodotus, was Scamandronymus, or, according to others, Symon, or Senius, or Etarchus, and her mother's name was Cleis. Her tender passions were so violent, that some have represented her attachments to three of her female companions, Telesippe, Atthis, and Megara, as criminal, and, on that account, have given her the surname of Tribas. She conceived such a passion for Phaon, a youth of Mitylene, that upon his refusal to gratify her desires, she threw herself into the sea from mount Leucas. She had composed nine books in lyric verses, besides epigrams, elegies, &c. Of all these compositions, nothing now remains but two fragments, whose uncommon sweetness and elegance show how meritoriously the praises of the ancients have been bestowed upon a poetess, who for the sublimity of her genius was called the 10th Muse. Her compositions were all extant in the age of Horace. The Lesbians were so sensible of the merit of Sappho, that, after her death, they paid her divine honours, and raised her temples and altars, and stamped their money with her image. The poetess has been censured for writing with that licentiousness and freedom which so much disgraced her character as a woman. The Sapphic verse has been called after her name. Ovid. Heroid. 15. Trist. 2. v. 365.—Horat. 2. od. 13.—Herodot. 2. c. 135.—Stat. 5. Syll. 3. v. 155.—Elian. V. H. 12. c. 18 & 29.—Plin. 27. c. 8.

Saptine, a daughter of Darius the last king of Persia, offered in marriage to Alexander.

Saracene, part of Arabia Petraea, the country of the Saracens who embraced the religion of Mahomet.

Saracori, a people who go to war riding on asses. Elian. V. H. 12.

Saranges, a people near Caucasus. Plin. 6. c. 16.

Saranges, a river of India, falling into the Hydrates, and thence into the Indus.

Sarapini, a people of Colchis. Strab.

Sarapus, a surname of Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece.

Sarasa, a fortified place of Mesopotamia, on the Tigris. Strab.

Saraspadus, a son of Phraates king of Parthia, sent as a hostage to Augustus, &c. Strab.

Saravus, now Saar, a river of Belgium, falling into the Moselle.

Sardanapalus, the 60th and last king of Assyria, celebrated for his luxury and voluptuousness. The greatest part of his time was spent in the company of his eunuchs, and the monarch generally appeared in the midst of his concubines disguised in the habit of a female, and spinning wool for his amusement. This effeminacy irritated his officers; Belesis and Arsaces conspired against him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus quitted his voluptuousness for a while, and appeared at the head of his armies. The rebels were defeated in three successive battles, but at last Sardanapalus was beaten and besieged in the city of Ninus for two years. When he despaired of success, he burned himself in his palace, with his eunuchs, concubines, and all his treasures, and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators. This famous event happened B.C. 820, according to Eusebius; though Justin and others, with less probability, place it 80 years earlier. Sardanapalus was made a god after death. Herodot. 2. c. 150.—Diod. 2.—Strab. 14.—Cic. Tusc. 5. c. 35.

Sardes. Vid. Sardis.

Sardinia, the greatest island in the Mediterranean after Sicily, is situate between Italy and Africa, at the south of Corsica. It was originally called Sandaliotis, or Ichnusa, from its resembling the human foot (ixor), and it received the name of Sardinia from Sardus, a son of Hercules, who settled there with a colony which he had brought with him from Libya. Other colonies, under Aristæus, Norax, and Iolas, also settled there. The Carthaginians were long masters of it, and were dispossessed by the Romans in the Punic wars, B.C. 231. Some call it, with Sicily, one of the granaries of Rome. The air was very unwholesome, though the soil was fertile, in corn, in wine, and oil. Neither wolves nor serpents are found in Sardinia, nor any poisonous herb, except one, which, when eaten, contracts the nerves, and is attended with a paroxysm of laughter, the forerunner of death; hence ritus Sardonicus, Sardonius. Cic. Fam. 7, c. 25.—Servius ad Virg. 7, ecl. 43.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 85.—Mela, 3, c. 7.—Strab. 2 & 5.—Cic. pro Manil. Ad Q. Frat. 2, ep. 3.—Plin. 3, c. 7.—Paus. 10, c. 17.—Varro, de R. R.—Val. Max. 7, c. 6.

Sardica, a town of Thrace, at the north of mount Hæmus.

Sardis, or Sardes, now Sart, a town of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia, situate at the foot of mount Tmolus, on the banks of the Pactolus. It is celebrated for the many sieges it sustained against the Cimmerians, Persians, Medes, Macedonians, Ionians, and Athenians, and for the battle in which, B.C. 262, Antiochus Soter was defeated by Eumenes king of Pergamus. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who ordered it to be rebuilt. It fell into the hands of Cyrus, B.C. 548, and was burnt by the Athenians, B.C. 504, which became the cause of the invasion of Attica by Darius. Plut. in Alex.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 137, 152, &c.—Strab. 13.—Herodot. 1, c. 7, &c.

Sardones, the people of Roussillon in France, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Plin. 3, c. 4.

Sardus, a son of Hercules, who led a colony to Sardinia and gave it his name.

Sarepta, a town of Phœnicia between Tyre and Sidon, now Sarfund.

Saristaner, a son of Tigranes king of Armenia, who conspired against his father, &c. Val. Max. 9, c. 11.

Sariphi, mountains at the east of the Caspian.

Sarmætes, or Sauromætes, the inhabitants of Sarmatia. Virg. Sarmatia.

Sarmatia, an extensive country at the north of Europe and Asia, divided into European and Asiatic. The European was bounded by the ocean on the north, Germany and the Vistula on the west, the Jazygæ on the south, and the Tanais on the east. The Asiatic was bounded by Hyrcania, the Tanais, and the Euxine sea. The former contains the modern kingdoms of Russia, Poland, Lithuania, and Little Tartary; and the latter, Great Tartary, Circassia, and the neighbouring country. The Sarmatians were a savage uncivilized nation, often confounded with the Scythians, naturally warlike, and famous for painting their bodies to appear more terrible in the field of battle. They were well known for their lewdness, and they passed among the Greeks and Latins by the name of barbarians. In the time of the emperors they became very powerful, and disturbed the peace of Rome by their frequent incursions; till at last, increased by the savage hordes of Scythia, under the barbarous names of Huns, Vandals, Goths, Alans, &c., they successfully invaded and ruined the empire in the third and fourth centuries of the christian era. They generally lived on the mountains without any habitation, except their chariots, whence they have been called Hamasarii. They lived upon plunder, and fed upon milk mixed with the blood of horses. Strab. 7, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Diod. 2.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 1, &c. Firo. 2.—Ovid. Trist. 3, &c. Sarmaticum mare, a name given to the Euxine sea, because on the coast of Sarmatia. Ovid. 4, ex Pont. ep. 10, v. 38.

Sarmentus, a scurrilous person, mentioned by Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 56.

Sarnus, a river of Asia, near Hyrcania. Sarnus, a river of Picenum, dividing it from Campania, and falling into the Tuscan sea. Stat. 1, Sylv. 2, v. 265.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.—Strab. 5.

Saron, a king of Troezen, unusually fond of hunting. He was drowned in the sea, where he had swum for some miles in pursuit of a stag. He was made a sea god by Neptune, and divine honours were paid to him by the Troezenians. It was customary for sailors to offer him sacrifices before they embarked. That part of the sea where he was drowned was called Saronicus sinus, on the coast of Achaia, near the isthmus of Corinth. Saron built a temple to Diana at Troezen, and instituted festivals to her honour, called from himself Saronia. Paus. 2, c. 30.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8.

Saronicus sinus, now the gulf of Engia, a bay of the Ægean sea, lying at the south of Attica, and on the north of the Peloponnesus. The entrance into it is between the promontory of Sunium and that of Scyllæum. Some suppose that this part of the sea received its name from Saron, who was drowned there, or from a small river which discharged itself on the coast, or from a small harbour of the same name. The Saronic bay is about 62 miles in circumference, 23 miles in its broadest, and 25 in its longest part, according to modern calculation.

Sarpëdon, a son of Jupiter by Europa the daughter of Agenor. He banished himself from Crete, after he had in vain attempted to make himself king in preference to his elder brother Minos, and he retired to Caria, where he built the town of Miletus. He went to the Trojan war to assist Priam against the Greeks, where he was attended by his friend and companion Glaucus. He was at last killed by Patroclus, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy, and his body, by order of Jupiter, was conveyed to Lycia by Apollo, where his friends and relations paid him funeral honours, and raised a monument to perpetuate his valour. According to some mythologists, the brother of king Minos, and the prince who assisted Priam, were two different persons. This last was king of Lycia, and son of Jupiter by Laodamia the daughter of Heleerophon, and lived about 100 years after the age of the son of Europa. *Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 12.—Homer. Il. 16.—A son of Neptune, killed by Hercules for his barbarous treatment of strangers.—A learned preceptor of Cato of Utica. Plut. in Cat.—A town of Cilicia, famous for a temple sacred to Apollo and Diana.—Also a promontory of the same name in Cilicia, beyond which Antiochus was not permitted to sail by a treaty of peace which he had made with the Romans. *Liv. 38, c. 38.—Mela, 1, c. 13.—A promontory of Thrace.—A Syrian general who flourished B.C. 143.

Sarra, a town of Phœnicia, the same as Tyrr. It receives its name from a small shell-fish of the same name which was found in the neighbourhood, and with whose blood garments were dyed. Hence came the epithet of sarranus, so often applied to Tyrian colours, as well as to the inhabitants of the colonies of the Tyrians, particularly Carthage. Sar

Satricum, a town of Italy, taken by Camillus. Liv. 6, c. 8.

Satropæes, an officer in the army of Darius, &c. Curt. 4, c. 9.

Saturna, a lake of Latium, forming part of the Pontine lakes. Sil. 8, v. 382.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 801.

Satureium, or Satureum, a town of Calabria, near Tarentum, with famous pastures and horses, whence the epithet of saturianus in Horat. 1, sat. 6.

Satureius, one of Domitian's murderers.

Saturnalia, festivals in honour of Saturn, celebrated the 16th or the 17th, or, according to others, the 18th of December. They were instituted long before the foundation of Rome, in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. Some, however, suppose that the Saturnalia were first observed at Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, after a victory obtained over the Sabines; while others support that Janus first instituted them in gratitude to Saturn, from whom he had learnt agriculture. Others suppose that they were first celebrated in the year of Rome 257, after a victory obtained over the Latins by the dictator Posthumus. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated only for one day, but afterwards the solemnity continued for three, four, five, and at last for seven days. The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which universally prevailed. The slaves were permitted to ridicule their masters, and to speak with freedom upon every subject. It was usual for friends to make presents one to another; all animosity ceased, no criminals were executed, schools were shut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot, and debauchery. In the sacrifices the priests made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a custom which was never observed at other festivals. Senec. ep. 18.—Cato de R. R. 57.—Sueton. in Vesp. 19.—Cic. ad Attic. 5, ep. 20.

Saturninus P. Sempronius, a general of Valerian, proclaimed emperor in Egypt by his troops after he had rendered himself celebrated by his victories over the barbarians. His integrity, his complaisance and affability, had gained him the affection of the people, but his fondness for ancient discipline provoked his soldiers, who wantonly murdered him in the 43rd year of his age, A. D. 262.—Sextius Julius, a Gaul, intimate with Aurelian. The emperor esteemed him greatly, not only for his virtues, but for his abilities as a general, and for the victories which he had obtained in different parts of the empire. He was saluted emperor at Alexandria, and compelled by the clamorous army to accept of the purple, which he rejected with disdain and horror. Probus, who was then emperor, marched his forces against him, and besieged him in Apamea, where he destroyed himself when unable to make head against his powerful adversary.—Appuleius, a tribune of the people who raised a sedition at Rome, intimidated the senate, and tyrannized for three years. Meeting at last with opposition, he seized the capitol, but being induced by the hopes of a reconciliation to trust himself amidst the people, he was suddenly torn to pieces. His sedition has received the name of Appuleiana in the Roman annals. Flor.—Lucius, a seditious tribune, who supported the oppression of Marius. He was at last put to death on account of his tumultuous disposition. Plut. in Mario.—Flor. 3, c. 16.—An officer in the court of Theodosius, murdered for obeying the emperor's orders, &c.—Pompeius, a writer in the reign of Trajan. He was greatly esteemed by Pliny, who speaks of him with great warmth and approbation, as an historian, a poet, and an orator. Pliny always consulted the opinion of Saturninus before he published his compositions.—Sautius, a friend of Augustus and Tiberius. He succeeded Agrippa in the government of the provinces of Syria and Phœnicia.—Vitellius, an officer among the friends of the emperor Otho.

Saturnus, a name given to Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune, as being the sons of Saturn.

Saturnus, a son of Cælus, or Uranus, by Terra, called also Titea, Thea, or Tithæa. He was naturally artful, and by means of his mother, he revenged himself on his father, whose cruelty to his children had provoked the anger of Thea. The mother armed her son with a scythe, which was fabricated with the metals drawn from her bowels, and as Cælus was going to unite himself to Thea, Saturn mutilated him, and for ever prevented him from increasing the number of his children, whom he treated with unkindness, and confined in the infernal regions. After this the sons of Cælus were restored to liberty, and Saturn obtained his father's kingdom by the consent of his brother, provided he did not bring up any male children. Pursuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his sons as soon as born, because, as some observe, he dreaded from them a retaliation of his unkindness to his father, till his wife Rhea, unwilling to see her children perish, concealed from her husband the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and instead of the children she gave him large stones, which he immediately swallowed without perceiving the deceit. Titus was some time after informed that Saturn had concealed his male children, therefore he made war against him, dethroned and imprisoned him with Rhea; and Jupiter, who was secretly educated in Crete, was no sooner grown up, than he flew to deliver his father, and to replace him on the throne. Saturn, unmindful of his son's kindness, conspired against him, when he heard that he raised cabals against him, but Jupiter banished him from his throne, and the father fled for safety into Italy, where the country retained the name of Latinum, as being the place of his concealment (lateo). Janus, who was then king of Italy, received Saturn with marks of attention; he made him his partner on the throne; and the king of heaven employed himself in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people of Italy, and in teaching them agriculture and the useful and liberal arts. His reign there was so mild and popular, so beneficent and virtuous, that mankind have called it the golden age, to intimate the happiness and tranquility which the earth then enjoyed. Saturn was father of Chiron the centaur by Philyra, whom he had changed into a mare, to avoid the importunities of Rhea. The worship of Saturn was not so solemn or so universal as that of Jupiter. It was usual to offer human victims on his altars, but this barbarous custom was abolished by Hercules, who substituted small images of clay. In the sacrifices of Saturn, the priest always performed the ceremony with his head uncovered, which was unusual at other solemnities. The god is generally represented as an old man, bent through age and infirmity. He holds a scythe in his right hand, with a serpent which bites its own tail, which is an emblem of time and of the revolution of the year. In his left hand he holds a child, which he raises up as if instantly to devour it. Tatius king of the Sabines first built a temple to Saturn on the Capitoline hill, a second was afterwards added by Tullius Hostilius, and a third by the first consuls. On his statues were generally hung fetters in commemoration of the chains he had worn when imprisoned by Jupiter. From this circumstance, all slaves that obtained their liberty generally dedicated their fetters to him. During the celebration of the Saturnalia, the chains were taken from the statues to intimate the freedom and the independence which mankind enjoyed during the golden age. One of his temples at Rome was appropriated for the public treasury, and it was there also that the names of foreign ambassadors were enrolled. *Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Virg. Sätürum, a town of Calabria, where stuffs of all kinds were dyed in different colours with great success. Virg. G. 2, v. 197. l. 4, v. 335.

Sätüri, demigods of the country, whose origin is unknown. They are represented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, short horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themselves known in his orgies by their riot and lasciviousness. The first fruits of everything were generally offered to them. The Romans promiscuously called them Fauni, Panes, and Syl- vani. It is said that a Satyr was brought to Sylla as that general returned from Thessaly. The monster had been surprised asleep in a cave; but his voice was inarticulate when brought into the presence of the Roman general, and Sylla was so disgusted with it, that he ordered it to be instantly removed. The monster answered in every degree the description which the poets and painters have given of the Satyrs. Paus. 1, c. 23.—Plut. in Sil.—Virg. el. 5, v. 13.—Ovid. Heroid. 4, v. 171.

Sätürus, a king of Bosphorus, who reigned 14 years, &c. His father's name was Sparacus. Diod. 20.—An Athenian who attempted to eject the garrison of Demetrius from the citadel, &c. Polyan.—A Greek actor who instructed Demosthenes, and taught him how to have a good and strong delivery.—A man who assisted in murdering Timophanes, by order of his brother Timoleon.—A Rhodian sent by his countrymen to Rome, when Eumenes had accused some of the allies of intentions to favour the interest of Macedonia against the republic.—A peripatetic philosopher and historian, who flourished B.C. 148.—A tyrant of Heraclea, 346 B.C.—An architect who, together with Petus, is said to have planned and built the celebrated tomb which Artemisia erected to the memory of Mausolus, and which became one of the wonders of the world. The honour of erecting it is ascribed to others.

Säufelius Trogus, one of Messalina's favourites, punished by Claudius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 35.—Appius, a Roman, who died on his return from the bath upon taking mead, &c. Plin. 7, c. 53.

Sävo, or Sävona, a town with a small river of the same name in Campania. Stat. 4.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—A town of Liguria.

Säuromates, a people in the northern parts of Europe and Asia. They are called Sarmatae by the Latins. Vid. Sarmatia.

Säurus, a famous robber of Elis, killed by Hercules. Paus. 6, c. 21.—A statuary. Plin. 36, c. 5.

Sävus, a river of Pannonia, rising in Noricum, at the north of Aquileia, and falling into the Danube, after flowing through Pannonia, in an eastern direction. Claudius, de Stil. 2.—A small river of Numidia, falling into the Mediterranean.

Sävones, a people of Germany, near the Chersonesus Cimbrica. Ptolem. 3, 11.—Claud. 1, Eutr. v. 392.

Sävohes, an ancient legislator of Egypt.
Sävsa, one of the gates of Troy, where the tomb of Laomedon was seen. The name is derived by some from saavo (sinister), because it was through this avenue that the fatal horse was introduced. Homer. Il.—Sil. 13, v. 73.—One of the Danaides. Her husband's name was Daiphron. Apollod.

Sävsa, a soldier in Cæsar's army, who behaved with great courage at Dyrrachium. Lucan. 6, v. 144.—Memor, a Latin poet in the reign of Titus and Domitian.—A man who poisoned his own mother. Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 53.—A friend of Horace, to whom the poet addressed 2, ep. 17. He was a Roman knight.

Sävsvöla. Vid. Mutius.
Sävlabia, now St. Irene, a town of ancient Spain.

Sävldis, or Sävldium, a river of Belgium, now called the Scheld, and dividing the modern country of the Netherlands from Holla. Cor. G.

6, v. 33.—Pons, a town on the same river, now called Condit. Cas.

Scamander, or Scamandros, a celebrated river of Troas, rising at the east of mount Ida, and falling into the sea below Siganum. It receives the Simois in its course, and towards its mouth it is very muddy, and flows through marshes. This river, according to Homer, was called Xanthus by the gods, and Scamander by men. The waters of the Scamander had the singular property of giving a beautiful colour to the hair or the wool of such animals as bathed in them; and from this circumstance the three goddesses, Minerva, Juno, and Venus, bathed there before they appeared before Paris, to obtain the golden apple. It was usual among all the virgins of Troas to bathe in the Scamander, when they were arrived to nubile years, and to offer to the god their virginity in these words, ἄσπε μόν, Σκαμανδρῆ, τῆς αὐθεντίας. The god of the Scamander had a regular priest, and sacrifices offered to him. Some suppose that the river received its name from Scamander the son of Corybas. Ælian. Æschin. ep. 10.—A son of Corybas and Demodiox, who brought a colony from Crete into Phrygia, and settled at the foot of mount Ida, where he introduced the festivals of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. He some time after lost the use of his senses and threw himself into the river Xanthus, which ever after bore his name. His son-in-law Teucer succeeded him in the government of the colony. He had two daughters, Thymo and Callithoe. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Diad. 4.

Scamandria, a town on the Scamander. Plin. 4, c. 30.

Scamandrius, one of the generals of Priam, son of Strophius. He was killed by Menelaus. Homer. Il. 5, v. 49.

Scandaria, a promontory in the island of Cos. Strab. 14.

Scandinavia, a name given by the ancients to that tract of territory which contains the modern kingdoms of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Lapland, Finland, &c., supposed by them to be an island. Plin. 4, c. 13.

Scantia Sylva, a wood of Campania, the property of the Roman people. Cic.

Scantilla, the wife of Didius Julianus. It was by her advice that her husband bought the empire which was exposed to sale at the death of Pertinax.

Scantinia lex. Vid. Scantinia.

Scaptestyle, a town of Thrace, near Abdera, abounding in silver and gold mines, belonging to Thucydides, who is supposed there to have written his history of the Peloponnesian war. Lucret. 6, v. 810.—Plut. in Cim.

Scaptia, a town of Latium. Sil. 8, v. 396.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Liv. 8, c. 17.

Scaptius, an intimate friend of Brutus. Cic. ep. ad Attic. 5, &c. His brother was a merchant of Cappadocia.

Scaptia, a native of Corduba, who defended that town against Cæsar, after the battle of Munda. When he saw that all his efforts were useless against the Roman general, he destroyed himself. Cæs. Bell. H. 33.—A usurper. Cic. ad Att. 12, ep. 37.

Scandion, a town on the confines of Dalmatia.

Scardil, a ridge of mountains of Macedonia, which separates it from Illyricum. Liv. 43, c. 20.

Scarphia, or Scarphe, a town near Thermopylae, on the confines of Phthiotis. Senec. in Tr.

Scantinia lex, de pudicitia, by C. Scantinius Ancinus the tribune, was enacted against those who kept catamites, and such as prostituted themselves to any vile or unnatural service. The penalty was originally a fine, but it was afterwards made a capital crime under Augustus. It is sometimes called Scantinia, from a certain Scantinius upon whom it was first executed.

Scaurus M. Æmilius, a Roman consul who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the bar, and by his successes in Spain in the capacity of commander. He was sent against Jugurtha, and some time after accused of suffering himself to be bribed by the Numidian prince. Scaurus conquered the Ligurians, and in his censorship he built the Milvian bridge at Rome, and began to pave the road, which from him was called the Æmilian. He was originally very poor. He wrote some books, and among these a history of his own life, all now lost.—His son, of the same name, made himself known by the large theatre which he built during his edileship. This theatre, which could contain 30,000 spectators, was supported by 300 columns of marble, 38 feet in height, and adorned with 3000 brazen statues. This celebrated edifice, according to Pliny, proved more fatal to the manners and the simplicity of the Romans, than the proscriptions and wars of Sylla had done to the inhabitants of the city. Scaurus married Marcia. Cic. in Brut.—Val. Max. 4, c. 4.—Plin. 34, c. 7. l. 36, c. 2.—A Roman of consular dignity. When the Cimbric invaded Italy, the son of Scaurus behaved with great cowardice, upon which the father sternly ordered him never to appear again in the field of battle. The severity of this command rendered young Scaurus melancholy, and he plunged a sword into his own heart, to free himself from further ignominy.—Aurelius, a Roman consul taken prisoner by the Gauls. He was put to a cruel death because he told the king of the enemy not to cross the Alps to invade Italy, which was universally deemed unconquerable.—M. Æmilius, a man in the reign of Tiberius accused of adultery with Livia, and put to death. He was an eloquent orator, but very lascivious and debauched in his morals.—Mamercus, a man put to death by Tiberius.—Maximus, a man who conspired against Nero.—Terentius, a Latin grammarian. He had been preceptor to the emperor Adrian. A. Gellius, 12, c. 15.

Scedæsus, a native of Leuctra in Bœotia. His two daughters, Meletia and Molpia, whom some called Theano and Hippo, were ravished by some Spartans, in the reign of Cleombrotus, and after this they killed themselves, unable to survive the loss of their honour. The father became so disconsolate, that when he was unable to obtain relief from his country, he killed himself on their tomb. Paus. 9, c. 13.—Plut. in Amat. 3.

Sceleratus, a plain of Rome near the Colline gate, where the vestal Minucia was buried alive, when convicted of adultery. Liv. 8, c. 15.—One of the gates of Rome was called Scelerata, because the 300 Fabii, who were killed at the river Cremera, had passed through it when they went to attack the enemy. It was before named Carmentalis.—There was also a street at Rome formerly called Cyprinus, which received the name of the Sceleratus vicus, because there Tullia ordered her postilion to drive her chariot over the body of her father, king Servius. Liv. 1, c. 28.—Ovid. Ib. 365.

Soena, a town on the confines of Babylon. Strab. 16.—A river of Ireland, now the Shannon. Orosius, 1, c. 2.

Soenites, Arabians who live in tents. Plin. 5, c. 13.

Soepsis, a town of Troas, where the works of Theophrastus and Aristotle were long concealed underground, and damaged by the wet, &c. Strab. 10.

Sohedia, a small village of Egypt, with a dock-yard between the western mouths of the Nile and Alexandria. Strab.

Sohedius, one of Helen's suitors. Paus. 10, c. 4, l. 30.

Scheria, an ancient name of Corcyra. Paus. 2, c. 5.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Sohoneus, a son of Athamas.—The father of Atalanta.

Sohonus, or Soheno, a port of Peloponnesus, on the Saronic sinus.—A village near Thebes, with a river of the same name.—A river of Arcadia.—Another near Athens.

Sciastes, a surname of Apollo at Lacedæmon, from the village Scias where he was particularly worshipped. Lycoph. 562.—Tzetzes loco.

Sciathis, a mountain of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 14.

Sciathos, an island in the Ægean sea, opposite mount Pelion, on the coast of Thessaly. Val. Flacc. 2.

Scidros, a town of Magna Græcia.

Scillius, a town of Peloponnesus, near Olympia, where Xenophon wrote his history.

Scyllurus, a king of Scythia, who had 80 sons. Vid. Scyllurus.

Scinis, a cruel robber who tied men to the boughs of trees, which he had forcibly brought together, and which he afterwards unloosed, so that their limbs were torn in an instant from their body. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 440.

Scinthis, a people of Germany.

Sciône, a town of Thrace, in the possession of the Atheuæus. It revolted and passed into the hands of the Lacedæmonians during the Peloponnesian war. It was built by a Grecian colony on their return from the Trojan war. Thucyd. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 10.

Scipiades, a name applied to the two Scipios, who obtained the surname of Africanus, from the conquest of Carthage. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 843.

Scipio, a celebrated family at Rome, who obtained the greatest honours in the republic. The name seems to be derived from scipio, which signifies a stick, because one of the family had conducted his blind father, and had been to him as a stick. The Scipios were a branch of the Cornelian family. The most illustrious were —P. Corn., a man made master of horse by Camillus, &c.—A Roman dictator.—L. Cornel., a consul, A.U.C. 456, who defeated the Etrurians near Volaterra.—Another consul, A.U.C. 495.—Cn., surnamed Asina, was consul A.U.C. 494 and 500. He was conquered in his first consulship in a naval battle, and lost 17 ships. The following year he took Aleria, in Corsica, and defeated Hanno the Carthaginian general, in Sardinia. He also took 200 of the enemy's ships, and the city of Panormum in Sicily. He was father to Publius and Cneus Scipio. Publius, in the beginning of the second Punic war, was sent with an army to Spain to oppose Annibal; but when he heard that his enemy had passed over into Italy, he attempted by his quick marches and secret evolutions to stop his progress. He was conquered by Annibal near the Ticinus, where he nearly lost his life, had not his son, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus, courageously defended him. He again passed into Spain, where he obtained some memorable victories over the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants of the country. His brother Cneus shared the supreme command with him, but their great confidence proved their ruin. They separated their armies, and soon after Publius was furiously attacked by the two Asdrubals and Mago, who commanded the Carthaginian armies. The forces of Publius were too few to resist with success the three Carthaginian generals. The Romans were cut to pieces, and their commander was left on the field of battle. No sooner had the enemy obtained this victory than they immediately marched to meet Cneus Scipio, whom the revolt of 39,000 Celtiberians had weakened and alarmed. The general, who was already apprised of his brother's death, secured an eminence, where he was soon surrounded on all sides. After desperate acts of valour he was left among the slain, or, according to some, he fled into a tower, where he was burnt with some of his friends by the victorious enemy. Liv. 21, &c.—Polyb. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 6, &c.—Eutrop. 3, c. 8, &c.—Publius Cornelius, surnamed Africanus, was son of Publius Scipio, who was killed in Spain. He first distinguished himself at the battle of Ticinus, where he saved his father's life by deeds of unexampled valour and boldness. The battle of Cannæ, which proved so fatal to the Roman arms, instead of disheartening Scipio, raised his expectations, and he no sooner heard that some of his desperate countrymen wished to abandon Italy, and to fly from the insolence of the conqueror, than with his sword in his hand, and by his firmness and example, he obliged them to swear eternal fidelity to Rome, and to put to immediate death the first man who attempted to retire from his country. In his 21st year, Scipio was made an edile, an honourable office which was never given but to such as had reached their 27th year. Some time after, the Romans were alarmed by the intelligence that the commanders of their forces in Spain, Publius and Cneus Scipio, had been slaughtered, and immediately young Scipio was appointed to avenge the death of his father and of his uncle, and to vindicate the military honour of the republic. It was soon known how able he was to be at the head of an army; the various nations of Spain were conquered, and in four years the Carthaginians were banished from that part of the continent. The whole province became tributary to Rome; New Carthage submitted in one day, and in a battle 54,000 of the enemy were left dead on the field. After these signal victories Scipio was recalled to Rome, which still trembled at the continual alarms of Annibal, who was at her gates. The conqueror of the Carthaginians in Spain was looked upon as a proper general to encounter Annibal in Italy; but Scipio opposed the measures which his countrymen wished to pursue, and he declared in the senate that if Annibal was to be conquered he must be conquered in Africa. These bold measures were immediately adopted, though opposed by the eloquence, age, and experience of the great Fabius, and Scipio was empowered to conduct the war on the coasts of Africa. With the dignity of consul he embarked for Carthage. Success attended his arms; his conquests were here as rapid as in Spain; the Carthaginian armies were routed, the camp of the crafty Asdrubal was set on fire during the night, and his troops totally defeated in a drawn battle. These repeated losses alarmed Carthage; Annibal, who was victorious at the gates of Rome, was instantly recalled to defend the walls of his country, and the two greatest generals of the age met each other in the field. Terms of accommodation were proposed; but in the parley which the two commanders had together, nothing satisfactory was offered, and while the one enlarged on the vicissitudes of human affairs, the other wished to dictate like a conqueror, and recommended the decision of the controversy to the sword. The celebrated battle was fought near Zama, and both generals displayed their military knowledge in drawing up their armies and in choosing their ground. Their courage and intrepidity were not less conspicuous in charging the enemy; a thousand acts of valour were performed on both sides, and though the Carthaginians fought in their own defence, and the Romans for fame and glory, yet the conqueror of Italy was vanquished. About 20,000 Carthaginians were slain, and the same number made prisoners of war, B.C. 202. Only 2000 of the Romans were killed. This battle was decisive; the Carthaginians sued for peace, which Scipio at last granted on the most severe and humiliating terms. The conqueror after this returned to Rome, where he was received with the most unbounded applause, honoured with a triumph, and dignified with the appellation of Africanus. Here he enjoyed for some time the tranquillity and the honours which his exploits merited, but in him also, as in other great men, fortune showed herself inconstant. Scipio offended the populace in wishing to distinguish the senators from the rest of the people at the public exhibitions; and when he canvassed for the consulship for two of his friends, he had the mortification to see his application slighted, and the honours which he claimed bestowed on a man of no character, and recommended by neither abilities nor meritorious actions. He retired from Rome no longer to be a spectator of the ingratitude of his countrymen, and in the capacity of lieutenant he accompanied his brother against Antiochus king of Syria. In this expedition his arms were attended with usual success, and the Asiatic monarch submitted to the conditions which the conquerors dictated. At his return to Rome, Africanus found the malevolence of his enemies still unabated. Cato, his inveterate rival, raised seditions against him, and the Petilli, two tribunes of the people, accused the conqueror of Annibal of extortion in the provinces of Asia, and of living in an indolent and luxurious manner. Scipio condescended to answer to the accusation of his calumniators; the first day was spent in hearing the different charges, but when he again appeared on the second day of his trial, the accused interrupted his judges, and exclaimed, "Tribunes and fellow-citizens, on this day, this very day, did I conquer Annibal and the Carthaginians: come, therefore, with me, Romans; let us go to the capitol, and there return our thanks to the immortal gods for the victories which have attended our arms." These words had the desired effect; the tribes and all the assembly followed Scipio, the court was deserted, and the tribunes were left alone in the seat of judgment. Yet when this memorable day was past and forgotten, Africanus was a third time summoned to appear; but he had fled before the impending storm, and retired to his country house at Liternum. The accusation was therefore stopped, and the accusers silenced, when one of the tribunes, formerly distinguished for his malevolence against Scipio, rose to defend him, and declared in the assembly, that it reflected the highest disgrace on the Roman people, that the conqueror of Annibal should become the sport of the populace, and be exposed to the malice and envy of disappointed ambition. Some time after Scipio died in the place of his retreat, about 184 years before Christ, in the 48th year of his age; and so great an aversion did he express, as he expired, for the depravity of the Romans, and the ingratitude of their senators, that he ordered his bones not to be conveyed to Rome. They were accordingly inhumated at Liternum, where his wife Æmilia the daughter of Paulus Æmilius, who fell at the battle of Cannæ, raised a mausoleum on his tomb, and placed upon it his statue, with that of the poet Ennius, who had been the companion of his peace and of his retirement. If Scipio was robbed during his lifetime of the honours which belonged to him as the conqueror of Africa, he was not forgotten when dead. The Romans viewed his character with reverence; with raptures they read of his warlike actions, and Africanus was regarded in the following ages as a pattern of virtue, of innocence, courage, and liberality. As a general, the fame and the greatness of his conquests explain his character; and indeed we hear that Annibal declared himself inferior to no general that ever lived except Alexander the Great, and Pyrrhus king of Epirus; and when Scipio asked him what rank he would claim, if he had conquered him, the Carthaginian general answered, "If I had conquered you, Scipio, I would call myself greater than the conqueror of Darius and the ally of the Tarentines." As an instance of Scipio's continence, ancient authors have faithfully recorded that the conqueror of Spain refused to see a beautiful princess that had fallen into his hands after the taking of New Carthage, and that he not only restored her inviolate to her parents, but also added immense presents for the person to whom she was betrothed. It was to the artful complaisance of Africanus that the Romans owed their alliance with Masinissa king of Numidia, and also that with king Syphax. The friendship of Scipio and Lælius is well known. Polyp. 6.—Plut.—Mor. 2, c. 6.—Cic. in Brut., &c.—Eutrop.—Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Asiaticus, accompanied his brother Africanus in his expeditions in Spain and Africa. He was rewarded with the consulship, A.U.C. 504, for his services to the state, and he was empowered to attack Antiochus king of Syria, who had declared war against the Romans. Lucius was accompanied in this campaign by his brother Africanus; and by his own valour, and the advice of the conqueror of Annibal, he soon routed the enemy, and in a battle near the city of Sardes he killed 50,000 foot and 4000 horse. Peace was soon after settled by the submission of Antiochus, and the conqueror, at his return home, obtained a triumph, and the surname of Asiaticus. He did not, however, long enjoy his prosperity; Cato, after the death of Africanus, turned his fury against Asiaticus, and the two Petilli, his devoted favourites, presented a petition to the people, in which they prayed that an inquiry might be made to know what money had been received from Antiochus and his allies. The petition was instantly received, and Asiaticus, charged to have suffered himself to be corrupted by Antiochus, was summoned to appear before the tribunal of Terentius Culeo, who was on this occasion created pretor. The judge, who was an inveterate enemy to the family of the Scipios, soon found Asiaticus, with his two lieutenants and his questor, guilty of having received the first 6000 pounds weight of gold, and 480 pounds weight of silver, and the others nearly an equal sum, from the monarch against whom, in the name of the Roman people, they were enjoined to make war. Immediately they were condemned to pay large fines; but while the others gave security, Scipio declared that he had accounted to the public for all the money which he had brought from Asia, and therefore that he was innocent. For this obstinacy Scipio was dragged to prison, but his cousin Nasica pleaded his cause before the people, and the pretor instantly ordered the goods of the prisoner to be seized and confiscated. The sentence was executed, but the effects of Scipio were insufficient to pay the fine, and it was the greatest justification of his innocence, that whatever was found in his house had never been in the possession of Antiochus or his subjects. This, however, did not totally liberate him; he was reduced to poverty, and refused to accept the offer of his friends and of his clients. Some time after he was appointed to settle the disputes between Eumenes and Seleucus, and at his return the Romans, ashamed of their severity towards him, rewarded his merit with such uncommon liberality, that Asiaticus was enabled to celebrate games in honour of his victory over Antiochus, for 10 successive days, at his own expense. Liv. 38, c. 55, &c.—Eutrop. 4.—Nasica, was son of Cneus Scipio, and cousin to Scipio Africanus. He was refused the consulship, though supported by the interest and the fame of the conqueror of Annibal; but he afterwards obtained it, and in that honourable office conquered the Boii, and gained a triumph. He was also successful in an expedition which he undertook in Spain. When the statue of Cybele was brought to Rome from Phrygia, the Roman senate delegated one of their body, who was the most remarkable for the purity of his manners and the innocence of his life, to go and meet the goddess in the harbour of Ostia. Nasica was the object of their choice, and as such he was enjoined to bring the statue of the goddess to Rome with the greatest pomp and solemnity. Nasica also distinguished himself by the active part which he took in confuting the accusations laid against the two Scipios, Africanus and Asiaticus.—There was also another of the same name, who distinguished himself by his enmity against the Gracchi, to whom he was nearly related. Falero. 2, c. 7, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Liv. 29, c. 14, &c.—Publ. Æmilianus, son of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus, was adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. He received the same surname as his grandfather, and was called Africanus the younger, on account of his victories over Carthage. Æmilianus first appeared in the Roman armies under his father, and afterwards distinguished himself as a legionary tribune in the Spanish provinces, where he killed a Spaniard of gigantic stature, and he obtained a mural crown at the siege of Interata. He passed into Africa to demand a reinforcement from king Masinissa the ally of Rome, and he was the spectator of a long and bloody battle which was fought between that monarch and the Carthaginians, and which soon produced the third Punic war. Some time after Æmilianus was made edile, and next appointed consul, though under the age required for that important office. The surname which he had received from his grandfather, he was doomed lawfully to claim as his own. He was empowered to finish the war with Carthage, and as he was permitted by the senate to choose his colleague, he took with him his friend Lælius, whose father of the same name had formerly enjoyed the confidence and shared the victories of the first Africanus. The siege of Carthage was already begun, but the operations of the Romans were not continued with vigour. Scipio had no sooner appeared before the walls of the enemy, than every communication with the land was cut off, and that they might not have the command of the sea, a stupendous mole was thrown across the harbour with immense labour and expense. This, which might have disheartened the most active enemy, rendered the Carthaginians more eager in the cause of freedom and independence; all the inhabitants, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, employed themselves without cessation to dig another harbour, and to build and equip another fleet. In a short time, in spite of the vigilance and activity of Æmilianus, the Romans were astonished to see another harbour formed, and 50 galleys suddenly issuing under sail, ready for the engagement. This unexpected fleet, by immediately attacking the Roman ships, might have gained the victory, but the delay of the Carthaginians proved fatal to their cause, and the enemy had sufficient time to prepare themselves. Scipio soon got the possession of a small eminence in the harbour, and, by the success of his subsequent operations, he broke open one of the gates of the city and entered the streets, where he made his way by fire and sword. The surrender of above 50,000 men was followed by the reduction of the citadel, and the total submission of Carthage, B.C. 147. The captive city was set on fire, and though Scipio was obliged to demolish its very walls to obey the orders of the Romans, yet he wept bitterly over the melancholy and tragical scene; and in bewailing the miseries of Carthage, he expressed his fears lest Rome, in her turn, in some future age, should exhibit such a dreadful conflagration. The return of Æmilianus to Rome was that of another conqueror of Annibal, and, like him, he was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and received the surname of Africanus. He was not long left in the enjoyment of his glory, before he was called to obtain fresh honours. He was chosen consul a second time, and appointed to finish the war which the Romans had hitherto carried on without success or vigorous exertions against Numantia. The fall of Numantia was more noble than that of the capital of Africa, and the conqueror of Carthage obtained the victory only when the enemies had been consumed by famine or by self-destruction, B.C. 133. From his conquests in Spain, Æmilianus was honoured with a second triumph, and with the surname of Numantinus. Yet his popularity was short, and, by telling the people that the murder of their favourite, his brother-in-law Gracchus, was lawful, since he was turbulent and inimical to the peace of the republic, Scipio incurred the displeasure of the tribunes, and was received with hisses. His authority for a moment quelled their sedition, when he reproached them for their own cowardice, and exclaimed, "Factious wretches, do you think your clamours can intimidate me; me, whom the fury of your enemies never daunted? Is this the gratitude that you owe to my father Paulus who conquered Macedonia, and to me? Without my family you were slaves. Is this the respect you owe to your deliverers? Is this your affection?" This firmness silenced the murmurs of the assembly, and some time after Scipio retired from the clamours of Rome to Caieta, where, with his friend Lælius, he passed the rest of his time in innocent pleasure and amusement, in diversions which had pleased them when children; and the two greatest men that ruled the state, were often seen on the sea-shore picking up light pebbles, and throwing them on the smooth surface of the waters. Though fond of retirement and literary ease, yet Scipio often interested himself in the affairs of the state. His enemies accused him of aspiring to the dictatorship, and the clamours were most loud against him, when he had opposed the Sempronian law, and declared himself the patron of the inhabitants of the provinces of Italy. This active part of Scipio was seen with pleasure by the friends of the republic, and not only the senate, but also the citizens, the Latins, and neighbouring states conducted their illustrious friend and patron to his house. It seemed also the universal wish that the troubles might be quieted by the election of Scipio to the dictatorship, and many presumed that that honour would be on the morrow conferred upon him. In this, however, the expectations of Rome were frustrated. Scipio was found dead in his bed, to the astonishment of the world; and those who inquired for the causes of this sudden death, perceived violent marks on his neck, and concluded that he had been strangled, B.C. 128. This assassination, as it was then generally believed, was committed by the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, who supported the Sempronian law, and by his wife Sempronia, who is charged with having introduced the murderers into his room. No inquiries were made after the authors of his death; Gracchus was the favourite of the mob, and the only atonement which the populace made for the death of Scipio was to attend his funeral, and to show their concern by their cries and loud lamentations. The second Africanus has often been compared to the first of that name; they seemed to be equally great and equally meritorious, and the Romans were unable to distinguish which of the two was entitled to a greater share of their regard and admiration. Æmilius, like his grandfather, was fond of literature, and he saved from the flames of Carthage many valuable compositions, written by Phœnician and Punic authors. In the midst of his greatness he died poor, and his nephew Q. Fabius Maximus, who inherited his estate, scarce found in his house 32 pounds weight of silver, and two and a half of gold. His liberality to his brother and to his sisters deserves the greatest commendations, and, indeed, no higher encomium can be passed upon his character, private as well as public, than the words of his rival Metellus, who told his sons, at the death of Scipio, to go and attend the funeral of the greatest man that ever lived or should live in Rome. Liv. 44, &c.—Cic. de Senec. Orat. in Brut., &c.—Polyb.—Appian.—Paterc. 1, c. 12, &c.—Flor.—A son of the first Africanus, taken captive by Antiochus king of Syria, and restored to his father without a ransom. He adopted as his son young Æmilianus the son of Paulus Æmilius, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus. Like his father Scipio, he distinguished himself by his fondness for literature, and his valour in the Roman armies.—Metellus, the father-in-law of Pompey, appointed commander in Macedonia. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and afterwards retired to Africa with Cato. He was defeated by Cæsar at Thapsus. Plut.—Saluto, a mean person in Cæsar's army in Africa. The general appointed him his chief commander, either to ridicule him, or because there was an ancient oracle that declared that the Scipios would ever be victorious in Africa. Plut.—L. Cornelius, a consul who opposed Sylla. He was at last deserted by his army, and proscribed.—The commander of a cohort in the reign of Vitellius.

Scira, an annual solemnity observed at Athens in honour of Minerva, or, according to others, of Ceres and Proserpine. It received its name either from Sciras, a small town of Attica, or from a native of Eleusis, called Scirus.

Sciradium, a promontory of Attica, on the Saronicus sinus.

Sciras, a name of Ægina. Minerva was also called Sciras. Strab. 9.

Scrossa, a mountain of Arcadia. Plin. 4, c. 5.

Sciron, a celebrated thief in Attica, who plundered the inhabitants of the country, and threw them down from the highest rocks into the sea, after he had obliged them to wait upon him and to wash his feet. Theseus attacked him, and treated him as he treated travellers. According to Ovid, the earth as well as the sea refused to receive the bones of Sciron, which remained for some time suspended in the air, till they were changed into large rocks called Scironia Sarsa, situate between Megara and Corinth. There was a road near them which bore the name of Sciron, naturally small and narrow, but afterwards enlarged by the emperor Adrian. Some suppose that Iphigeneia threw herself into the sea, from one of these rocks. Sciron had married the daughter of Cyclops, a king of Salamis. He was brother-in-law to Telamon the son of Æacus. Ovid. 7, Met. v. 444. Heroid. 2, v. 69.—Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 13.—Plin. 2, c. 47.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 38.—Propert. 3, el. 14, v. 12.—Paus. 1, c. 44.—Seneca. N. Q. 5, c. 17.

Scirus, a village of Arcadia, of which the inhabitants are called Sciritæ.—A plain and river of Attica, near Megara. Paus. 1, c. 36.

Scissis, a town of Spain. Liv. 21, c. 60.

Scodra, a town of Illyricum, where Gentius resided. Liv. 43, c. 20.

Scolus, a mountain of Bœotia.—A town of Macedonia, near Olynthus. Strab.

Scombrus, a mountain of Thrace, near Rhodope.

Scopas, an architect and sculptor of Ephesus, for some time employed in making the mausoleum which Artemisia raised to her husband, and which was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. One of his statues of Venus was among the antiquities with which Rome was adorned. Scopas lived about 450 years before Christ. Paus. 1, c. 43, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 8.—Vitr. 9, c. 9.—Plin. 34, c. 8, l. 36, c. 5.—An Ætolian who raised some forces to assist Ptolemy Epiphanes king of Egypt, against his enemies Antiochus and his allies. He afterwards conspired against the Egyptian monarch, and was put to death, B.C. 196.—An ambassador to the court of the emperor Domitian.

Scopium, a town of Thessaly.

Scordisci and Scordiscas, a people of Pannonia and Thrace, well known during the reign of the Roman emperors for their barbarity and uncivilized manners. They were fond of drinking human blood, and they generally sacrificed their captive enemies to their gods. Liv. 41, c. 19.—Strab. 7.—Flor. 3, c. 4.

Scoti, the ancient inhabitants of Scotland, mentioned as different from the Picts. Claudian. de Hon. 3, Cons. v. 54.

Scotinus, a surname of Heracles. Strab. 15.

Scotussa, a town of Thessaly at the north of Larissa and of the Peneus, destroyed by Alexander of Phœre. Liv. 28, c. 5 & 7. l. 36, c. 14.—Strab. 7 & 9.—Paus. 6, c. 5.—Another in Macedonia. Plin. 4, c. 10.

Scribonia, a daughter of Scribonius, who married Augustus after he had divorced Claudia. He had by her a daughter, the celebrated Julia. Scribonia was some time after repudiated, that Augustus might marry Livia. She had been married twice before she became the wife of the emperor. Sueton. in Aug. 62.—A woman who married Crassus.

Scribonianus, a man in the age of Nero. Some of his friends wished him to be competitor for the imperial purple against Vespasian, which he declined. Tacit. H. 4, c. 39.—There were also two brothers of that name, who did nothing without each other's consent. Id. 4, c. 41.

Scribonius, a man who made himself master of the kingdom of Bosphorus.—A physician in the age of Augustus and Tiberius.—A man who wrote annals, A. D. 22. The best edition of Scribonius is that of Patav. 4to, 1655.—A friend of Pompey, &c.

Scutenna, a river of Gaul Cispadana, falling into the Po, now called Panaro. Liv. 43, c. 12 & 18.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

Scylacœum, a town of the Brutii, built by Mnœsthus at the head of an Athenian colony. As Virgil has applied the epithet Naufragum to Scylacœum, some suppose that either the poet was mistaken in his knowledge of the place, because there are no apparent dangers to navigation there, or that he confounds this place with a promontory of the same name on the Tuscan sea. Servius explains this passage by supposing that the houses of the place were originally built with the shipwrecked vessels of Ulysses' fleet—a most puerile explanation! Virg. Æn. 3, v. 553.—Strab. 6.

Scylax, a geographer and mathematician of Caria, in the age of Darius son of Hystaspes, about 550 years before Christ. He was commissioned by Darius to make discoveries in the east, and after a journey of 30 months he visited Egypt. Some suppose that he was the first who invented geographical tables. The latest edition of the Periplus of Scylax, is that of Gronovius, 4to, L. Bat. 1597. Herodot. 4, c. 44.—Strab.—A river of Cappadocia.

Scylla, a daughter of Nisus king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos, as that monarch besieged her father's capital. To make him sensible of her passion, she informed him that she would deliver Megara into his hands if he promised to marry her. Minos consented, and as the prosperity of Megara depended on a golden hair, which was on the head of Nisus, Scylla cut it off as her father was asleep, and from that moment the sallies of the Megareans were unsuccessful, and the enemy easily became master of the place. Scylla was disappointed in her expectations, and Minos treated her with such contempt and ridicule, that she threw herself from a tower into the sea, or, according to other accounts, she was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 393.—Paus. 2, c. 34.—Propert. 3, el. 10, v. 21.—Hygin. Fab. 108.—Virg. G. 1, v. 405, &c.—A daughter of Typhon, or, as some say, of Phorcys, who was greatly loved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the sea. Scylla scorned the addresses of Glaucus, and the god, to render her more propitious, applied to Circe, whose knowledge of herbs and incantations was universally admired. Circe no sooner saw him than she became enamoured of him, and instead of giving him the required assistance, she attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To punish her rival, Circe poured the juice of some poisonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no sooner had the nymph touched the place than she found every part of her body below the waist changed into frightful monsters like dogs, which never ceased barking. The rest of her body assumed an equally hideous form. She found herself supported by 12 feet, and she had six different heads, each with three rows of teeth. This sudden metamorphosis so terrified her, that she threw herself into that part of the sea which separates the coast of Italy and Sicily, where she was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which were universally deemed by the ancients as very dangerous to sailors, as well as the whirlpool of Charybdis on the coast of Sicily. During a tempest the waves are described by modern navigators as roaring dreadfully when driven into the rough and uneven cavities of the rock. Hom. Od. 12, v. 85.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 66, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 34.—Hygin. Fab. 199. Some authors, as Propert. 4, el. 4, v. 39, and Virg. el. 6, v. 74, with Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 500, have confounded the daughter of Typhon with the daughter of Nisus. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 424, &c.—A ship in the fleet of Æneas, commanded by Cloanthus, &c. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 122.

Scyllœum, a promontory of Peloponnesus on the coast of Argolis.—A promontory of the Brutii in Italy, supposed to be the same as Scylacœum, near which was the famous whirlpool Scylla, from which the name is derived.

Scyllias, a celebrated swimmer who enriched himself by diving after the goods which had been shipwrecked in the Persian ships near Pelium. It is said that he could dive 80 stadia under the water. Herodot. 8, c. 8.—Paus. 10, c. 19.

Scyllis and Diponœus, statues of Crete before the age of Cyrus king of Persia. They were said to be sons and pupils of Dædalus, and they established a school at Sicyon, where they taught the principles of their profession. Paus.—Plin. 36, c. 4.

Scyllus (untis), a town of Achaia, given to Xenophon by the Lacedæmonians. Strab.

Scyllurus, a monarch who left 80 sons. He called them to his bedside as he expired, and by enjoining them to break a bundle of sticks tied together, and afterwards separately, he convinced them that, when altogether firmly united, their power would be insuperable, but, if ever disunited, they would fall an easy prey to their enemies. Plut. de Garr.

Scyppulum, a town in the neighbourhood of Colophon. Paus. 7, c. 3.

Scyras, a river of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 25.

Scyrias, a name applied to Deidamia as a native of Scyros. Ovid. A. v. 682.

Scyros, a rocky and barren island in the Ægean, at the distance of about 28 miles north-east from Eubœa, 60 miles in circumference. It was originally in the possession of the Pelasgians and Carians. Achilles retired there not to go to the Trojan war, and became father of Neoptolemus by Deidamia the daughter of king Lycomedes. Scyros was conquered by the Athenians under Cimon. Hom. Od. 10, v. 508.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 464, l. 13, v. 156.—Paus. 1, c. 7.—Strab. 9.

Scythæ, the inhabitants of Scythia. Vid. Scythia.

Scythæ, or Scythia, a son of Jupiter by a daughter of Tellus. Half his body was that of a man, and the rest that of a serpent. He became king of a country which he called Scythia. Diod. 2.—A son of Hercules and Echidna.

Scythia, a large country situate in the most northern parts of Europe and Asia, from which circumstance it is generally denominated European and Asiatic. The most northern parts of Scythia were uninhabited on account of the extreme coldness of the climate. The more southern parts in Asia that were inhabited were distinguished by the name of Scythia intra et extra Imaum, &c. The boundaries of Scythia were unknown to the ancients, as no traveller had penetrated beyond the vast tracts of land which lay at the north, east, and west. Scythia comprehended the modern kingdoms of Tartary, Russia in Asia, Siberia, Muscovy, the Crimea, Poland, part of Hungary, Lithuania, the northern parts of Germany, Sweden, Norway, &c. The Scythians were divided into several nations or tribes; they had no cities, but continually changed their habitations. They inured themselves to bear labour and fatigue; they despised money, and lived upon milk, and covered themselves with the skins of their cattle. The virtues seemed to flourish among them, and that philosophy and moderation which other nations wished to acquire by study, seemed natural to them. Some authors, however, represent them as a savage and barbarous people, who fed upon human flesh, who drank the blood of their enemies, and used the skulls of travellers as vessels in their sacrifices to their gods. The Scythians made several irruptions upon the more southern provinces of Asia, especially B.C. 624, when they remained in possession of Asia Minor for 28 years, and we find them at different periods extending their conquests in Europe, and penetrating as far as Egypt. Their government was monarchical, and the deference which they paid to their sovereigns was unparalleled. When the king died, his body was carried through every province, where it was received in solemn procession, and afterwards buried. In the first centuries after Christ they invaded the Roman empire with the Sarmatians. *Vid. Sarmatia. Herodot. 1, c. 4, &c.—Strab. 7.—Diod. 2.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Justin. 2, c. 1, &c.—Ovid. Scythius, a Greek poet of Teos in Ionia, who wrote iambics. Diog. in Herac.—Athen. 11.

Scythopólis, a town of Syria, said to have been built by Bacchus. Strab. 16.—Plin. 5, c. 18.

Scythotauri, a people of Chersonesus Taurica. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Sebasta, a town of Judæa.—Another in Cilicia.—The name was common to several cities, as it was in honour of Augustus.

Sebastia, a city of Armenia.

Sebennytus, a town of the Delta in Egypt. The branch of the Nile which flows near it has been called the Sebennytic. Plin. 5, c. 10.

Sebētus, a small river of Campania, falling into the bay of Naples, whence the epithet Sebethis, given to one of the nymphs who frequented its borders, and became mother of Cebalus by Telon. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Sebusiani, or Segusiani, a people of Celtic Gaul.

Sectānus, an infamous debauchee in the age of Horace, 1, sat. 4, v. 112.

Secundus Julius, a man who published some harangues and orations in the age of the emperor Titus.—A favourite of Nero.—One of the associates of Sejanus.

Seditāni, or Sedentāni, a people of Spain. Ital. 3, v. 372.

Sedūni, an ancient nation of Belgic Gaul. Cæs. Bell. G. 3.

Sedusii, a people of Germany near the Suevi. Cæs.

Segesta, a town of Sicily founded by Æneas, or, according to some, by Cnusus. Vid. Agesta.

Segestes, a German, friendly to the Roman interest in the time of Germanicus. His daughter married Arminius. Tacit. A. 1, c. 55.

Segetia, a divinity at Rome, invoked by the husbandmen that the harvest might be plentiful. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 8.—Blacrob. 1, c. 15.—Plin. 18, c. 2.

Segni, a people with a town of the same name in Belgic Gaul. Cæs. B. G. 6.

Segobrica, a town of Spain near Saguntum. Plin. 3, c. 3.

Segonax, a prince in the southern parts of Britain, who opposed Cæsar, by order of Cassivelaunus, &c. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 22.

Segontia, or Seguntia, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis. Liv. 34, c. 10.

Segontiaci, a people of Belgic Gaul, who submitted to J. Cæsar.

Segovia, a town of Spain, of great power in the age of the Cæsars.—There was also another of the same name in Lusitania. Both had been founded by the Celtiberi.

Seguntium, a town of Britain, supposed to be Carnarvon in Wales. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 21.

Segusiani, a people of Gaul on the Loire. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 10.—Plin. 4, c. 18.

Segusio, a town of Piedmont on the Durias. Plin. 3, c. 17.

Seius Sejanus, a native of Vulturnum in Tuscany, who distinguished himself in the court of Tiberius. His father's name was Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the pretorian guards. His mother was descended from the Junian family. Sejanus first gained the favours of Caius Cæsar the grandson of Augustus, but afterwards he attached himself to the interest and the views of Tiberius, who then sat on the imperial throne. The emperor, who was naturally of a suspicious temper, was free and open with Sejanus, and while he distrusted others, he communicated his greatest secrets to this fawning favourite. Sejanus improved this confidence, and when he had found that he possessed the esteem of Tiberius, he next endeavoured to become the favourite of the soldiers and the darling of the senate. As commander of the pretorian guards he was the second man in Rome, and in that important office he made use of insinuations and every mean artifice to make himself beloved and revered. His affability and condescension gained him the hearts of the common soldiers, and by appointing his own favourites and adherents to places of trust and honour, all the officers and centurions of the army became devoted to his interest. The views of Sejanus in this were well known; yet to advance with more success, he attempted to gain the affection of the senators. In this he met with no opposition. A man who has the disposal of places of honour and dignity, and who has the command of the public money, cannot but be the favourite of those who are in need of his assistance. It is even said that Sejanus gained to his views all the wives of the senators, by a private and most secret promise of marriage to each of them, whenever he had made himself independent and sovereign of Rome. Yet however successful with the best and noblest families in the empire, Sejanus had to combat numbers in the house of the emperor; but these seeming obstacles were soon removed. All the children and grandchildren of Tiberius were sacrificed to the ambition of the favourite under various pretences; and Drusus the son of the emperor, by striking Sejanus, made his destruction sure and inevitable. Livia the wife of Drusus was gained by Sejanus, and though the mother of many children, she was prevailed upon to assist her adulterer in the murder of her husband, and she consented to marry him when Drusus was dead. No sooner was Drusus poisoned than Sejanus openly declared his wish to marry Livia. This was strongly opposed by Tiberius; and the emperor, by recommending Germanicus to the senators for his successor, rendered Sejanus bold and determined. He was more urgent in his demands; and when he could not gain the consent of the emperor, he persuaded him to retire to solitude from the noise of Rome and the troubles of the government. Tiberius, naturally fond of ease and luxury, yielded to his representations, and retired to Campania, leaving Sejanus at the head of the empire. This was highly gratifying to the favourite, and he was now without a master. Prudence and moderation might have made him what he wished to be; but Sejanus offended the whole empire when he declared that he was emperor of Rome, and Tiberius only the dependent prince of the island of Capreae, where he had retired. Tiberius was upon this fully convinced of the designs of Sejanus; and when he had been informed that his favourite had had the meanness and audacity to ridicule him by introducing him on the stage, the emperor ordered him to be accused before the senate. Sejanus was deserted by all his pretended friends, as soon as by fortune; and the man who aspired to the empire, and who called himself the favourite of the people, the darling of the pretorian guards, and the companion of Tiberius, was seized without resistance, and the same day strangled in prison, A.D. 31. His remains were exposed to the fury and insolence of the populace, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber. His children and all his relations were involved in his ruin, and Tiberius sacrificed to his resentment and suspicions all those who were even connected with Sejanus, or had shared his favours and enjoyed his confidence. Tacit. 3 Ann., &c.—Dio. 58.—Suet. in Tib.

Cn. Seius, a Roman who had a famous horse of large size and uncommon beauty. He was put to death by Antony, and it was observed, that whoever obtained possession of his horse, which was supposed to be of the same race as the horses of Diomedes destroyed by Hercules, and which was called Sejanus equus, became unfortunate, and lost all his property, with every member of his family. Hence arose the proverb, ille homo habet Sejanum equum, applied to such as were oppressed with misfortunes. Au. Gellius, 3, c. 9.

Seius Strabo, the father of Sejanus, was a Roman knight, and commander of the pretorian guards.

Selasia. Vid. Sellasia.

Selennus, a river of Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 23. Vid. Selimnus.

Selone, the wife of Antiochus king of Syria, put to death by Tigranes king of Armenia. She was daughter of Phiscon king of Egypt, and had first married her brother Lathurus, according to the custom of her country, and afterwards, by desire of her mother, her other brother Gryphus. At the death of Gryphus she had married Antiochus, surnamed Eusebes, the son of Antiochus Cyzicenus, by whom she had two sons. According to Appian, she first married the father, and after his death, his son Eusebes. Appian. Syr., &c.

Selencæna, or Selencis, a country of Syria, in Asia. Vid. Seleucis.

Selencis, a town of Syria, on the sea-shore, generally called Pieria, to distinguish it from others of the same name. There were no less than eight other cities which were called Seleucia, and which had all received their name from Seleucus Nicator. They were all situate in the kingdom of Syria, in Cilicia, and near the Euphrates. *Flor. 3, c. 11.—Plut. in Dem.—Metz, 1, c. 12.—Strab. 11 & 15.—Plin. 6, c. 26.—*Also the residence of the Parthian kings. Cic. 8, Fam. 14.

Selencidæ, a surname given to those monarchs who sat on the throne of Syria, which was founded by Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, from whom the word is derived. The era of the Selencidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B.C. 312, and ends at the conquest of Syria by Pompey, B.C. 65. The order in which these monarchs reigned is shown in the account of Syria. Vid. Syria.

Selencis, a division of Syria, which received its name from Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian empire after the death of Alexander the Great. It was also called Tetrapolis, from the four cities which it contained, called also sister cities; Seleucia called after Seleucus, Antioch called after his father, Laodicea after his mother, and Apamea after his wife. Strab. 16.

Selencus I., one of the captains of Alexander the Great, surnamed Nicator, or Victorious, was son of Antiochus. After the king's death, he received Babylon as his province; but his ambitious views, and his attempt to destroy Eumenes as he passed through his territories, rendered him so unpopular, that he fled for safety to the court of his friend Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was soon after enabled to recover Babylon, which Antigonus had seized in his absence, and he increased his dominions by the immediate conquest of Media, and some of the neighbouring provinces. When he had strengthened himself in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the rest of the generals of Alexander, and assumed the title of independent monarch. He afterwards made war against Antigonus, with the united forces of Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus; and after this monarch had been conquered and slain, his territories were divided among his victorious enemies. When Seleucus became master of Syria, he built a city there, which he called Antioch in honour of his father, and made it the capital of his dominions. He also made war against Demetrius and Lysimachus, though he had originally married Stratonice the daughter of the former, and had lived in the closest friendship with the latter. Seleucus was at last murdered by one of his servants called Ptolemy Ceraunus, a man on whom he bestowed the greatest favours, and whom he had distinguished by acts of the most unbounded confidence. According to Arrian, Seleucus was the greatest and most powerful of the princes who inherited the Macedonian empire after the death of Alexander. His benevolence has been commended; and it has been observed, that he conquered not to enslave nations, but to make them more happy. He founded no less than 34 cities in different parts of his empire, which he peopled with Greek colo-aries, whose national industry, learning, religion, and spirit, were communicated to the indolent and luxurious inhabitants of Asia. Seleucus was a great benefactor to the Greeks; he restored to the Athenians the library and statues which Xerxes had carried away from their city when he invaded Greece, and among them were those of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Seleucus was murdered 280 years before the christian era, in the 32nd year of his reign, and the 38th, or, according to others, the 73rd year of his age, as he was going to conquer Macedonia, where he intended to finish his days in peace and tranquillity in that province where he was born. He was succeeded by Antiochus Soter. Justin, 13, c. 4. l. 15, c. 4. l. 16, c. 3, 8c.—Plut. in Dem.—Plin. 6, c. 17.—Paus. 8, c. 51.—Joseph Ant. 12.

Seleucus II., surnamed Callinicus, succeeded his father Antiochus Tlicus on the throne of Syria. He attempted to make war against Ptolemy king of Egypt, but his fleet was shipwrecked in a violent storm, and his armies soon after conquered by his enemy. He was at last taken prisoner by Arsaces, an officer who made himself powerful by the dissensions which reigned in the house of the Seleucidae, between the two brothers Seleucus and Antiochus; and after he had been a prisoner for some time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horse, B.C. 226, after a reign of 30 years. Seleucus had received the surname of Pogon, from his long beard, and that of Callinicus, ironically to express his very unfortunate reign. He had married Laodice the sister of one of his generals, by whom he had two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus, and a daughter whom he gave in marriage to Mithridates king of Pontus. Strab. 16.—Justin, 27.—Appian. de Syr.

Seleucus III., succeeded his father Seleucus II. on the throne of Syria, and received the surname of Ceraunus, by antiphrasis, as he was a very weak, timid, and irresolute monarch. He was murdered by two of his officers, after a reign of three years, B.C. 223, and his brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, ascended the throne, and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great. Appian.

Seleucus IV., succeeded his father Antiochus the Great on the throne of Syria. He was surnamed Philopater, or, according to Josephus, Soter. His empire had been weakened by the Romans when he became monarch, and the yearly tribute of 1000 talents to those victorious enemies concurred in lessening his power and consequence among nations. Seleucus was poisoned after a reign of 12 years, B.C. 175. His son Demetrius had been sent to Rome, there to receive his education, and he became a prince of great abilities. Strab. 16.—Justin, 32.—Appian.

Seleucus V., succeeded his father Demetrius Nicator on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age. He was put to death in the first year of his reign by Cleopatra his mother, who had also sacrificed her husband to her ambition. He is not reckoned by many historians in the number of the Syrian monarchs.

Seleucus VI., one of the Seleucidae, son of Antiochus Gryphus, killed his uncle Antiochus Cynicenus, who wished to obtain the crown of Syria. He was some time after banished from his kingdom by Antiochus Pius son of Cynicenus, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burnt in a palace by the inhabitants, B.C. 93. Appian.—Joseph.

Seleucus, a prince of Syria, to whom the Egyptians offered the crown of which they had robbed Auletes. Seleucus accepted it, but he soon disgusted his subjects, and received the surname of Cybiosactes, or Scallion, for his meanness and avarice. He was at last murdered by Herenice, whom he had married.—A servant of Cleopatra the last queen of Egypt, who accused his mistress, before Octavianus, of having secreted part of her jewels and treasures.—A mathematician intimate with Vespasian the Roman emperor.—A part of the Alps.—A Roman consul.—A celebrated singer. Juv. 10, v. 211.—A king of the Bosphorus, who died B.C. 429.

Selge, a town of Pamphylia, made a colony by the Lacedaemonians. Liv. 36, c. 13.—Strabo.

Selimnus, a shepherd of Achaia, who for some time enjoyed the favours of the nymph Argyra without interruption. Argyra was at last disgusted with her lover, and the shepherd died through melancholy, and was changed into a river of the same name. Argyra was also changed into a river of the same name. Argyra was also changed into a fountain, and was fond of mingling her waters with those of the Selimnus. Paus. 7, c. 23.

Selinus, or Selinus (untis), a town on the southern parts of Sicily, founded A.U.C. 127, by a colony from Megara. It received its name from selavor, parsley, which grew there in abundance. The marks of its ancient consequence are visible in the venerable ruins now found in its neighbourhood. *Virg. Sellasia, a town of Laconia, where Cleomenes was defeated by the Achaeans, B.C. 222. Scarce 200 of a body of 5000 Lacedaemonians survived the battle. Plut.

Sellois, a river of Peloponnesus falling into the Ionian sea. Hom. Il.

Selletæ, a people of Thrace near mount Haemus. Liv. 38, c. 40.

Selli, an ancient nation of Epirus near Dodona. Lucan. 3, v. 180.—Strab. 7.

Selymbria, a town of Thrace on the Propontis. Liv. 39, c. 39.

Semele, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione the daughter of Mars and Venus. She was tenderly beloved by Jupiter; but Juno, who was always jealous of her husband's amours, and who hated the house of Cadmus because they were related to the goddess of beauty, determined to punish this successful rival. She borrowed the girdle of Ate, which contained every wickedness, deceit, and perfidy, and in the form of Beroe, Semele's nurse, she visited the house of Jupiter's mistress. Semele listened with attention to the artful admonitions of the false Beroe, and was at last persuaded to entreat her lover to come to her arms with the same majesty as he approached Juno. This rash request was heard with horror by Jupiter; but as he had sworn by the Styx to grant Semele whatever she required, he came to her bed attended by the clouds, the lightning, and thunderbolts. The mortal nature of Semele could not endure so much majesty, and she was instantly consumed with fire. The child, however, of which she was pregnant, was saved from the flames by Mercury, or, according to others, by Dirce, one of the nymphs of the Achelous, and Jupiter placed him in his thigh the rest of the time which he ought to have been in his mother's womb. This child was called Bacchus, or Dionysius. Semele immediately after death was honoured with immortality under the name of Thyone. Some, however, suppose that she remained in the infernal regions till Bacchus her son was permitted to bring her back. There were in the temple of Diana, at Træzene, two altars raised to the infernal gods, one of which was over an aperture, through which, as Pausanias reports, Bacchus returned from hell with his mother. Semele was particularly worshipped at Brasie in Laconia, where, according to a certain tradition, she had been driven by the winds with her son, after Cadmus had exposed her on the sea on account of her incontinent amour with Jupiter. The mother of Bacchus, though she received divine honours, had no temples; she had a statue in a temple of Ceres, at Thebes, in Boeotia. Paus. 3, c. 24. l. 9, c. 5.—*Hesiod. Theog.—Homer. Semigermáni, a name given to the Helvetii, a people of Germany. Liv. 21, c. 38.

Semiguntus, a general of the Cherusci, taken prisoner by Germanicus, &c. Strab. 7.

Semiramis, a celebrated queen of Assyria, daughter of the goddess Derceto by a young Assyrian. She was exposed in a desert, but her life was preserved by doves for one whole year, till Simmas, one of the shepherds of Ninus, found her, and brought her up as his own child. Semiramis, when grown up, married Menones the governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactra, where, by her advice and prudent directions, she hastened the king's operations and took the city. These eminent services, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to Ninus. The monarch asked her of her husband, and offered him instead, his daughter Sosana; but Menones, who tenderly loved Semiramis, refused, and when Ninus had added threats to entreaties, he hung himself. No sooner was Menones dead than Semiramis, who was of an aspiring soul, married Ninus, by whom she had a son called Ninyas. Ninus was so fond of Semiramis, that at her request he resigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and sole empress of Assyria. Of this, however, he had cause to repent; Semiramis put him to death, the better to establish herself on the throne, and when she had no enemies to fear at home, she began to repair the capital of her empire, and by her means Babylon became the most superb and magnificent city in the world. She visited every part of her dominions, and left everywhere immortal monuments of her greatness and benevolence. To render the roads passable and communication easy, she hollowed mountains and filled up valleys; and water was conveyed at a great expense, by large and convenient aqueducts, to barren deserts and unfruitful plains. She was not less distinguished as a warrior. Many of the neighbouring nations were conquered; and when Semiramis was once told, as she was dressing her hair, that Babylon had revolted, she left her toilette with precipitation, and though only half dressed, she refused to have the rest of her head adorned before the sedition was quelled and tranquillity re-established. Semiramis has been accused of licentiousness, and some authors have observed that she regularly called the strongest and stoutest men in her army to her arms, and afterwards put them to death, that they might not be living witnesses of her incontinence. Her passion for her son was also unnatural, and it was this criminal propensity which induced Ninyas to destroy his mother with his own hands. Some say that Semiramis was changed into a dove after death, and received immortal honours in Assyria. It is supposed that she lived about 1965 years before the christian era, and that she died in the 62d year of her age, and the 25th of her reign. Many fabulous reports have been propagated about Semiramis, and some have declared that for some time she disguised herself and passed for her son Ninyas. *Val. Semnonēs, a people of Italy, on the borders of Umbria.—Of Germany, on the Elbe and Oder.

Semōnes, inferior deities of Rome, that were not in the number of the 12 great gods. Among these were Faunus, the Satyrs, Priapus, Vertumnus, Janus, Pan, Silenus, and all such illustrious heroes as had received divine honours after death. The word seems to be the same as semi homines, because they were inferior to the supreme gods and superior to men. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.

Semosanctus, one of the gods of the Romans among the Indigetes, or such as were born and educated in their country.

Sempronia, a Roman matron, mother of the two Gracchi, celebrated for her learning, and her private as well as public virtues.—Also a sister of the Gracchi, who is accused of having assisted the triumvirs Carbo, Gracchus, and Flaccus to murder her husband Scipio Africanus the younger. The name of Sempronia was common to the female descendants of the family of the Sempronii, Gracchi, and Scipios.

Sempronia lex, de magistratibus, by C. Sempronius Gracchus the tribune, A.U.C. 630, ordained that no person who had been legally deprived of a magistracy for misdemeanours should be capable of bearing an office again. This law was afterwards repealed by the author.—Another, de civitate, by the same, A.U.C. 630. It ordained that no capital judgment should be passed over a Roman citizen without the concurrence and authority of the senate. There were also some other regulations, included in this law.—Another, de comitiis, by the same, A.U.C. 635. It ordained that, in giving their votes, the centuries should be chosen by lot, and not give it according to the order of their classes.—Another, de comitiis, by the same, the same year, which granted to the Latin allies of Rome the privilege of giving votes at elections, as if they were Roman citizens.—Another, de provinciis, by the same, A.U.C. 630.—It enacted that the senators should be permitted before the assembly of the consular comitia, to determine as they pleased the particular provinces which should be proposed to the consuls, to be divided by lot, and that the tribunes should be deprived of the power of interposing against a decree of the senate.

—Another, called agraria prima, by T. Sempronius Gracchus the tribune, A.U.C. 670. It confirmed the lex agraria Licinia, and enacted that all such as were in possession of more lands than that law allowed, should immediately resign them, to be divided among the poor citizens. Three commissioners were appointed to put this law into execution; and its consequences were so violent, as it was directly made against the nobles and senators, that it cost the author his life.—Another, called agraria altera, by the same. It required that all the ready money which was found in the treasury of Attalus king of Pergamus, who had left the Romans his heirs, should be divided among the poorer citizens of Rome, to supply them with all the various instruments requisite in husbandry, and that the lands of that monarch should be farmed by the Roman censors, and the money drawn from thence should be divided among the people.—Another, frumentaria, by C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that a certain quantity of corn should be distributed among the people, so much to every individual, for which it was required that they should only pay the trifling sum of a semissis, and a triens.—Another, de usuris, by M. Sempronius the tribune, A.U.C. 560. It ordained that, in lending money to the Latins and the allies of Rome, the Roman laws should be observed as well as among the citizens.—Another, de iudiciis, by the tribune C. Sempronius, A.U.C. 630. It required that the right of judging, which had been assigned to the Senatorial order by Romulus, should be transferred from them to the Roman knights.—Another, militaris, by the same, A.U.C. 630. It enacted that the soldiers should be clothed at the public expense, without any diminution of their usual pay. It also ordered that no person should be obliged to serve in the army before the age of 17.

Sempronius A. Atratinus, a senator who opposed the Agrarian law, which was proposed by the consul Cassius, soon after the election of the tribunes.—L. Atratinus, a consul A.U.C. 310. He was one of the first censors with his colleague in the consulship, Papirius.—Caius, a consul summoned before an assembly of the people because he had fought with ill success against the Volsci.—Blaesus, a consul who obtained a triumph for some victories gained in Sicily.—Sophus, a consul against the Æqui. He also fought against the Picentes, and during the engagement there was a dreadful earthquake. The soldiers were terrified, but Sophus encouraged them, and observed that the earth trembled only for fear of changing its old masters.—A man who proposed a law that no person should dedicate a temple or altar, without the previous approbation of the magistrates, A.U.C. 449. He repudiated his wife because she had gone to see a spectacle without his permission or knowledge.—Rufus, a senator, banished from the senate, because he had killed a crane to serve him as food.—Tuditanus, a man sent against Sardinia by the Romans.—A legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the soldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards consul, and fought in the field against Annibal with great success. He was killed in Spain.—Tiberius Longus, a Roman consul defeated by the Carthaginians in an engagement which he had begun against the approbation of his colleague C. Scipio. He afterwards obtained victories over Hanno and the Gauls.—Tiberius Gracchus, a consul who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was afterwards betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody resistance against the enemy. Annibal showed great honour to his remains; a funeral pile was raised at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in solemn procession.—Gracchus, a man who had debauched Julia. Vid. Gracchus.—A eunuch, made governor of Rome by Caracalla.—Densus, a centurion of a pretorian cohort who defended the person of Galba against his assassins. He was killed in the attempt.—The father of the Gracchi. Vid. Gracchus.—A censor, who was also sent as ambassador to the court of Egypt.—A tribune of the people, &c. Tacit.—Flor.—Liv.—Plut. Cas.—Appian.—An emperor. Vid. Saturninus.

Semurium, a place near Rome, where Apollo had a temple. Cic. Phil. 6, 6.

Sena, or Senogallia, a town of Umbria in Italy, on the Adriatic, built by the Senones, after they had made an irruption into Italy, A.U.C. 396; and on that account called Gallica. There was also a small river in the neighbourhood which bore the name of Sena. It was near it that Asdrubal was defeated by Cl. Nero. C. Nep. in Catone.—Sil. 8, v. 454.—Liv. 27, c. 46.—Cic. Brut. 18.

Senatus, the chief council of the state among the Romans. The members of this body, called senatores on account of their age, and patres on account of their authority, were of the greatest consequence in the republic. The senate was first instituted by Romulus to govern the city, and to preside over the affairs of the state during his absence. This was continued by his successors; but Tarquin II. disdained to consult them, and by having his own council chosen from his favourites, and from men who were totally devoted to his interest, he diminished the authority and the consequence of the senators, and slighted the concurrence of the people. The senators whom Romulus created were 100, to whom he afterwards added the same number when the Sabines had migrated to Rome. Tarquin the ancient made the senate consist of 300, and this number remained fixed for a long time. After the expulsion of the last Tarquin, whose tyranny had thinned the patricians as well as the plebeians, 164 new senators were chosen to complete the 300; and as they were called conscripsi, the senate ever afterwards consisted of members who were denominated patres and conscripsi. The number continued to fluctuate during the times of the republic, but gradually increased to 700, and afterwards to 900 under Julius Cæsar, who filled the senate with men of every rank and order. Under Augustus, the senators amounted to 1000, but this number was reduced to 300, which being the cause of complaints, induced the emperor to limit the number to 600. The place of a senator was always bestowed upon merit; the monarchs had the privilege of choosing the members, and after the expulsion of the Tarquins, it was one of the rights of the consuls, till the election of the censors, who from their office seemed most capable of making choice of men whose character was irreprouchable, whose morals were pure, and relations honourable. Sometimes the assembly of the people elected senators, but it was only upon some extraordinary occasions; there was also a dictator chosen to fill up the number of the senate after the battle of Cannæ. Only particular families were admitted into the senate; and when the plebeians were permitted to share the honours of the state, it was then required that they should be born of free citizens. It was also required that the candidates should be knights before their admission into the senate. They were to be above the age of 25, and to have previously passed through the inferior offices of questor, tribune of the people, edile, pretor, and consul. Some, however, suppose that the senators whom Romulus chose were all old men; yet his successors neglected this, and often men who were below the age of 25 were admitted by courtesy into the senate. The dignity of a senator could not be supported without the possession of 80,000 sesterces, or about 300*l.* English money; and therefore such as squandered away their money, and whose fortune was reduced below this sum, were generally struck out of the list of senators. This regulation was not made in the first ages of the republic, when the Romans boasted of their poverty. The senators were not permitted to be of any trade or profession. They were distinguished from the rest of the people by their dress; they wore the laticlave, half boots of a black colour, with a crescent or silver buckle in the form of a C; but this last honour was confined only to the descendants of those 100 senators who had been elected by Romulus, as the letter C seems to imply. They had the sole right of feasting publicly in the capitol in ceremonial habits; they sat in curule chairs, and at the representation of plays and public spectacles, they were honoured with particular seats. Whenever they travelled abroad, even on their own business, they were maintained at the public expense, and always found provisions for themselves and their attendants ready prepared on the road; a privilege that was generally termed free legation. On public festivals they wore the prætecta, or long white robe, with purple borders. The right of convoking the senate belonged only to the monarchs; and after the expulsion of the Tarquins, to the consuls, the dictator, master of the horse, governor of Rome, and tribunes of the people; but no magistrate could exercise this privilege except in the absence of a superior officer, the tribunes excepted. The time of meeting was generally three times a month, on the calends, nones, and ides. Under Augustus they were not assembled on the nones. It was requisite that the place where they assembled should have been previously consecrated by the augur. This was generally in the temple of Concord, of Jupiter Capitolinus, Apollo, Castor and Pollux, &c., or in the Curia called Hostilia, Julia, Pompeia, &c. When audience was given to foreign ambassadors, the senators assembled without the walls of the city, either in the temples of Bellona or of Apollo; and the same ceremony as to their meeting was also observed when they transacted business with their generals, as the ambassadors of foreign nations, and the commanders of armies, while in commission, were not permitted to appear within the walls of the city. To render their decrees valid and authentic, a certain number of members was requisite, and such as were absent without some proper cause, were always fined. In the reign of Augustus, 400 senators were requisite to make a senate. Nothing was transacted before sunrise, or after sunset. In their office the senators were the guardians of religion; they disposed of the provinces as they pleased; they prorogued the assemblies of the people, they appointed thanksgivings, nominated their ambassadors, distributed the public money, and, in short, had the management of everything political or civil in the republic, except the creating of the magistrates, the enacting of laws, and the declarations of war or peace, which were confined to the assemblies of the people. Rank was always regarded in their meetings; the chief magistrates of the state, such as the consuls, the pretors, and censors, sat first; after these the inferior magistrates, such as the ediles and questors, and last of all, those that then exercised no office in the state. Their opinions were originally collected, each according to his age; but when the office of consul was instituted, the opinion of the princeps senatus, or the person whose name stood first on the censor's list, was first consulted, and afterwards those who were of consular dignity, each in their respective order. In the age of Cicero the consuls elect were first consulted; and in the age of Cæsar, he was permitted to speak first till the end of the year, on whom the consul had originally conferred that honour. Under the emperors the same rules were observed, but the consuls were generally consulted before all others. When any public matter was introduced into the senate, which was always called referre ad senatum, any senator whose opinion was asked, was permitted to speak upon it as long as he pleased; and on that account it was often usual for the senators to protract their speeches till it was too late to determine. When the question was put, they passed to the side of that speaker whose opinion they approved, and a majority of votes was easily collected, without the trouble of counting the numbers. This mode of proceeding was called pedibus in allicujus sententiam ire; and therefore, on that account, the senators who had not the privilege of speaking, but only the right of giving a silent vote, such as bore some curule honours, and on that account were permitted to sit in the senate, but not to deliberate, were denominated pedarii senatores. After the majority had been known, the matter was determined, and a senatus consultum was immediately written by the clerks of the house, at the feet of the chief magistrates, and it was signed by all the principal members of the house. When there was not a sufficient number of members to make a senate, the decision was called senatus auctoritas; but it was of no consequence if it did not afterwards pass into a senatus consultum. The tribunes of the people, by the word veto, could stop the debates, and the decrees of the assembled senate, as also any one who was of equal authority with him who had proposed the matter. The senatus consulta were left in the custody of the consuls, who could suppress or preserve them; but about the year of Rome 304, they were always deposited in the temple of Ceres, and afterwards in the treasury, by the ediles of the people. The degradation of the senators was made by the censor, by omitting their names when he called over the list of the senate. This was called præterire. A senator could be again introduced into the senate if he could repair his character or fortune, which had been the causes why the censor had lawfully called him unqualified, and had challenged his opposition. The meeting of the senate was often sudden, except the particular times already mentioned, upon any emergency. After the death of J. Cæsar, they were not permitted to meet on the ides of March, which were called paricidium, because on that day the dictator had been assassinated. The sons of senators, after they had put on the  toga virilis, were permitted to come into the senate, but this was afterwards limited. Vid. Papius. The rank and authority of the senators, which were so conspicuous in the first ages of the republic, and which caused the minister of Pyrrhus to declare that the Roman senate was a venerable assembly of kings, dwindled into nothing under the emperors. Men of the lowest character were admitted into the senate; the emperors took pleasure in robbing this illustrious body of their privileges and authority, and the senators themselves, by their manners and servility, contributed as much as the tyranny of the sovereign to diminish their own consequence; and by applauding the follies of a Nero, and the cruelties of a Domitian, they convinced the world that they no longer possessed sufficient prudence or authority to be consulted on matters of weight and importance. In the election of successors to the imperial purple after Augustus, the approbation of the senate was consulted, but it was only a matter of courtesy, and the concurrence of a body of men was little regarded who were without power, and under the control of a mercenary army. The title of Clarissimus was given to the senators under the emperors, and, indeed, this was the only distinction which they had in compensation for the loss of their independence. The senate was abolished by Justinian, 13 centuries after its first institution by Romulus.

Seneca, M. Annaeus, a native of Corduba in Spain, who married Helvia, a woman of Spain, by whom he had three sons, Seneca the philosopher, Annaeus Novatus, and Annaeus Mela, the father of the poet Lucan. Seneca made himself known by some declamations, of which he made a collection from the most celebrated orators of the age; and from that circumstance, and for distinction, he obtained the appellation of declamator. He left Corduba, and went to Rome, where he became a Roman knight. His son L. Annaeus Seneca, who was born about six years before Christ, was early distinguished by his extraordinary talents. He was taught eloquence by his father, and received lessons in philosophy from the best and most celebrated stoics of the age. As one of the followers of the Pythagorean doctrines, Seneca observed the most reserved abstinence, and in his meals never ate the flesh of animals; but this he abandoned at the representation of his father, when Tiberius threatened to punish some Jews and Egyptians, who abstained from certain meats. In the character of a pleader, Seneca appeared with great advantage, but the fear of Caligula, who aspired to the name of an eloquent speaker, and who consequently was jealous of his fame, deterred him from pursuing his favourite study, and he sought a safer employment in canvassing for the honours and offices of the state. He was made questor, but the aspersions which were thrown upon him on account of a shameful amour with Julia Livilla, removed him from Rome, and the emperor banished him for some time into Corsica. During his banishment, the philosopher wrote some spirited epistles to his mother, remarkable for elegance of language and for sublimity; but he soon forgot his philosophy and disgraced himself by his flatteries to the emperor, and in wishing to be recalled, even at the expense of his innocence and character. The disgrace of Messalina at Rome, and the marriage of Agrippina with Claudius, proved favourable to Seneca; and after he had remained five years in Corsica, he was recalled by the empress to take care of the education of her son Nero, who was destined to succeed to the empire. In the honourable duty of preceptor, Seneca gained applause; and as long as Nero followed his advice, Rome enjoyed tranquillity, and believed herself safe and happy under the administration of the son of Agrippina. Some, however, are clamorous against the philosopher, and observe that Seneca initiated his pupil in those unnatural vices and abominable indulgences which disgraced him as a monarch and as a man. This may be the language of malevolence, or the insinuation of jealousy. In the corrupted age of Nero, the preceptor had to withstand the clamours of many wicked and profligate ministers; and if he had been the favourite of the emperor, and shared his pleasures, his debauchery and extravagance, Nero would not perhaps have been so anxious of destroying a man whose example, from vicious inclinations, he could not follow, and whose salutary precepts his licentious associates forbade him to obey. Seneca was too well acquainted with the natural disposition of Nero to think himself secure; he had been accused of having amassed the most ample riches, and of having built sumptuous houses, and adorned beautiful gardens, during the four years in which he had attended Nero as a preceptor, and therefore he desired his imperial pupil to accept of the riches, and the possessions which his attendance on his person had procured, and to permit him to retire to solitude and study. Nero refused with artful duplicity, and Seneca, to avoid further suspicions, kept himself at home for some time as if labouring under a disease. In the conspiracy of Piso, which happened some time after, and in which some of the most noble of the Roman senators were concerned, Seneca's name was mentioned by Natalis, and Nero, who was glad of an opportunity of sacrificing him to his secret jealousy, ordered him to destroy himself. Seneca very probably was not accessory to the conspiracy, and the only thing which could be produced against him as a criminal, was trivial and unsatisfactory. Piso, as Natalis declared, had complained that he never saw Seneca, and the philosopher had observed in answer, that it was not proper or conducive to their common interest to see one another often. He further pleaded indispotion, and said that his own life depended upon the safety of Piso's person. Seneca was at table with his wife Paulina and two of his friends, when the messenger from Nero arrived. He heard the words which commanded him to destroy himself, with philosophical firmness, and even with joy; and observed, that such a mandate might have long been expected from a man who had murdered his own mother, and assassinated all his friends. He wished to dispose of his possessions as he pleased, but this was refused; and when he heard this, he turned to his friends who were weeping at his melancholy fate, and told them, that since he could not leave them what he believed his own, he would leave them at least his own life for an example, an innocent conduct which they might imitate, and by which they might acquire immortal fame. Against their tears and wallings he exclaimed with firmness, and asked them whether they had not learnt better to withstand the attacks of fortune, and the violence of tyranny? As for his wife, he attempted to calm her emotions, and when she seemed resolved to die with him, he said he was glad to find his example followed with so much constancy. Their veins were opened at the same moment, but the life of Paulina was preserved, and Nero, who was partial to her, ordered the blood to be stopped; and from that moment, according to some authors, the philosopher's wife seemed to rejoice that she could still enjoy the comforts of life. Seneca's veins bled but slowly, and it has been observed, that the sensible and animated conversation of his dying moments was collected by his friends, and that it has been preserved among his works. To hasten his death he drank a dose of poison, but it had no effect, and therefore he ordered himself to be carried into a hot bath, to accelerate the operation of the draught, and to make the blood flow more freely. This was attended with no better success; and as the soldiers were clamorous, he was carried into a stove, and suffocated by the steam, on the 12th of April, in the 53d year of the christian era, in his 53d year. His body was burnt without pomp or funeral ceremony, according to his will, which he had made when he enjoyed the most unbounded favours of Nero. The compositions of Seneca are numerous, and chiefly on moral subjects. He is so much admired for his refined sentiments and virtuous precepts, for his morality, his constancy, and his innocence of manners, that St. Jerome has not hesitated to rank him among christian writers. His style is nervous, it abounds with ornament, and seems well suited to the taste of the age in which he lived. The desire of recommending himself and his writings to the world, obliged him too often to depreciate the merit of the ancients, and to sink into obscurity. His treatises are de ira, de consolatione, de Providentia, de tranquillitate animi, de clementia, de sapientia constantia, de otio sapientis, de brevitate vite, de beneficiis, de vita beata, besides his naturales questiones, ludus in Claudium, moral letters, &c. There are also some tragedies ascribed to Seneca. Quintilian supposes that the Medea is his composition, and according to others, the Troas and the Hippolytus were also written by him, and the Agamemnon, Hercules furens, Thyestes & Hercules in Oeta by his father, Seneca the declaimer. The best editions of Seneca are those of Antwerp, fol. 1615, and of Gronovius, 3 vols. Amst. 1672; and those of his tragedies, are that of Schroder's, 4to, Delph. 1728, and the 8vo of Gronovius, L. Bat. 1682. Tacit. Ann. 12, &c.—Dio. Sueton. in Ner., &c.—Quintil.

Claudius Senecio, one of Nero's favourites, and the associate of his pleasures and debauchery.—Tullius, a man who conspired against Nero, and was put to death though he turned informer against the rest of the conspirators.—A man put to death by Domitian, for writing an account of the life of Helvidius, one of the emperor's enemies.—One of Constantine's enemies.—A man who from a restless and aspiring disposition acquired the surname of Grandis. Seneca, Suas. 1.

Senia, a town of Liburnia, now Segna. Plin. 3, c. 21.

Senna, or Sena, a river of Umbria. Vid. Sena. Lucan. 2, v. 407.

Senones, an uncivilized nation of Gallia Transalpinga, who left their native possessions, and under the conduct of Brennus, invaded Italy and pillaged Rome. They afterwards united with the Umbri, Latins, and Etrurians to make war against the Romans, till they were totally destroyed by Dolabella. The chief of their towns in that part of Italy where they settled near Umbria, and which from them was called Senogallia, were Fanum Fortunæ, Sena, Pisaurum, and Ariminum. *Vid. Cimbr. Sentia lex, de senatu, by C. Sentius the consul, A.U.C. 734, enacted the choosing of proper persons to fill up the number of senators.

Sentinum, a town of Umbria. Liv. 10, c. 27 & 30.

Sentius Cn., a governor of Syria, under the emperors.—A governor of Macedonia.—Septimius, one of the soldiers of Pompey, who assisted the Egyptians in murdering him.—A Roman emperor. Vid. Severus.—A writer in the reign of the emperor Alexander, of whose life he wrote an account in Latin, or, according to others, in Greek.

Sepias, a cape of Magnesia in Thessaly, at the north of Eubœa, now St. George.

Sepiasia, a place of Capua, where ointments were sold. Cic. Pis. 7 & 11.

Septem aquæ, a portion of the lake near Reate. Cic. 4, Att. 15.—Frates, a mountain of Mauritania, now Gebel-Mausa. Strab. 17.—Maria, the entrance of the seven mouths of the Po.

Septempeda, a town of Picenum.

Septerion, a festival observed once in nine years at Delphi, in honour of Apollo. It was a representation of the pursuit of Python by Apollo, and of the victory obtained by the god.

Tit. Septimius, a Roman knight distinguished by his poetical compositions both lyric and tragic. He was intimate with Augustus as well as Horace, who has addressed the sixth of his second lib. of Odes to him.—A centurion put to death, &c. Tacit. A. 1, c. 32.—A native of Africa, who distinguished himself at Rome as a poet. He wrote, among other things, a hymn in praise of Janus. Only 11 of his verses are preserved. M. Terent. Crinitus in Vita.

L. Septimuleius, a friend of C. Gracchus. He suffered himself to be bribed by Opimius, and had the meanness to carry his friend's head fixed to a pole through the streets of Rome.

Sepyra, a town of Cilicia, taken by Cicero when he presided over that province. Cic. ad Div. 15, c. 4.

Séquana, a river of Gaul, which separates the territories of the Belgæ and the Celtæ, and is now called la Seine. Strab. 4.—Mela, 3, c. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 425.

Séquani, a people of Gaul near the territories of the Ædui, between the Soane and mount Jura, famous for their wars against Rome, &c. Vid. Ædui. The country which they inhabited is now called Franche Comté, or Upper Burgundy. Cæs. Bell. G.

Sequinius, a native of Alba, who married one of his daughters to Curiatius of Alba, and the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome. The two daughters were brought to bed on the same day, each of three male children.

Serapio, a surname given to one of the Scipios, because he resembled a swine-herd of that name.—A Greek poet who flourished in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.—An Egyptian put to death by Achilles, when he came at the head of an embassy from Ptolemy, who was a prisoner in the hands of J. Caesar.—A painter. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Serapis, one of the Egyptian deities, supposed to be the same as Osiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another very rich at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worship of Serapis was introduced at Rome, by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A.D. 146, and the mysteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with so much licentiousness that the senate were soon after obliged to abolish them. Herodotus, who speaks in a very circumstantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus says it is the same as the bull Apis. Paus. 1, c. 18. J. 2, c. 34.—Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 83.—Strab. 17.—Martial. 9, ep. 30.

Serbônia, a lake between Egypt and Palestine. Serôna, a daughter of Theolusius, who married Stilicho. She was put to death, &c. Claudians.

Serenianus, a favourite of Gallus the brother of Julian. He was put to death.

Serênus Samonius, a physician in the age of the emperor Severus and Caracalla. There remains a poem of his composition on medicine, the last edition of which is that of 1706, in 8vo, Amst.—Vibius, a governor of Spain, accused of cruelty in the government of his province, and put to death by order of Tiberius.

Seres, a nation of Asia, according to Ptolemy, between the Ganges and the eastern ocean in the modern Thibet. They were naturally of a meek disposition. Silk, of which the fabrication was unknown to the ancients, who imagined that the materials were collected from the leaves of trees, was brought to Rome from their country, and on that account it received the name of Sericum, and thence a garment or dress of silk is called serica vestis. Heliogabalus the Roman emperor was the first who wore a silk dress, which at that time was sold for its weight in gold. It afterwards became very cheap, and consequently was the common dress among the Romans. Some suppose that the Seres are the same as the Chinese. Plol. 6, c. 16.—Horat. 1, od. 29, v. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 19, l. 19, v. 142 & 292.—Ovid. Am. 7, l. 14, v. 6.—Virg. G. 2, v. 121.

Sergestus, a sailor in the fleet of Æneas, from whom the family of the Sergii at Rome were descended. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 121.

Sergia, a Roman matron. She conspired with others to poison their husbands. The plot was discovered, and Sergia, with some of her accomplices, drank poison and died.

Sergius, one of the names of Catiline.—A military tribune at the siege of Veii. The family of the Sergii was patrician, and branched out into the several families of the Fidenates, Sili, Catiline, Natta, Ocella, and Plancti.

Sergius and Sergiolus, a deformed youth, greatly admired by the Roman ladies in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 105 et seq.

Seriphus, an island in the Ægean sea, about 36 miles in circumference, according to Pliny only 12, very barren, and uncultivated. The Romans generally sent their criminals there in banishment, and it was there that Cassius Severus the orator was exiled, and there he died. According to Ælian, the frogs of this island never croaked, but when they were removed from the island to another place, they were more noisy and clamorous than others; hence the proverb of seriphia rana, applied to a man who neither speaks nor sings. This, however, is found to be a mistake by modern travellers. It was on the coast of Seriphos that the chest was discovered in which Acrisius had exposed his daughter Danae and her son Perseus. Strab. 10.—Ælian. Anim. 3, c. 37.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 21.—Ovid. Mel. 5, v. 242, l. 7, v. 65.

Sermylia, a town of Macedonia. Herodot. 7, c. 122.

Seron, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Serranus, a surname given to Cincinnatus, because he was found sowing his fields when told that he had been elected dictator. Some, however, suppose that Serranus was a different person from Cincinnatus. Plin. 18, c. 3.—Liv. 3, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.—One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed in the night by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 335.—A poet of some merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, v. 80.

Serrheum, a fortified place of Thrace. Liv. 37, c. 16.

Quintus Sertorius, a Roman general, son of Quintus and Rhea, born at Nursia. His first campaign was under the great Marius, against the Teutones and Cimbri. He visited the enemy's camp as a spy, and had the misfortune to lose one eye in the first battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and slaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expressed his sorrow and concern at the melancholy death of so many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for safety into Spain, when Sylla had proscribed him, and in this distant province he behaved himself with so much address and valour that he was looked upon as the prince of the country. The Lusitanians universally revered and loved him, and the Roman general did not show himself less attentive to their interest, by establishing public schools, and educating the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had established a senate, over which he presided with consular authority, and the Romans, who followed his standard, paid equal reverence to his person. They were experimentally convinced of his valour and magnanimity as a general, and the artful manner in which he imposed upon the credulity of his adherents in the garb of religion, did not diminish his reputation. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great success, and which followed him everywhere, even in the field of battle. The success of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives, alarmed the Romans. They sent some troops to oppose him, but with little success. Four armies were found insufficient to crush or even hurt Sertorius; and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory, were driven with dishonour from the field. But the favourite of the Lusitanians was exposed to the dangers which usually attend greatness. Perpenna, one of his officers who was jealous of his fame and tired of a superior, conspired against him. At a banquet the conspirators began to open their intentions by speaking with freedom and licentiousness in the presence of Sertorius, whose age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glass of wine, as a signal for the rest of the conspirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers, stabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the rest, 73 years before Christ. Sertorius has been commended for his love of justice and moderation. The flattering description which he heard of the Fortunate Islands when he passed into the west of Africa, almost tempted him to bid adieu to the world, and perhaps he would have retired from the noise of war, and the clamours of envy, to end his days in the bosom of a peaceful and solitary island, had not the stronger calls of ambition and the love of fame prevailed over the intruding reflections of a moment. It has been observed that in his latter days Sertorius became indolent, and fond of luxury and wanton cruelty; yet we must confess that in affability, clemency, complaisance, generosity, and military valour, he not only surpassed his contemporaries, but the rest of the Romans. Plut. in Vit.—Pater. 2, c. 30, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 21, &c.—Appian. de Civ.—*Val. Servus, a man accused by Tiberius of being privy to the conspiracy of Sejanus. Tacit. A. 6, c. 7.

Serviānus, a consul in the reign of Adrian. He was a great favourite of the emperor Trajan.

Servilia, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of J. Caesar, though her brother was one of the most inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Caesar of her affection, she sent him a letter filled with the most tender expressions of regard for his person. The letter was delivered to Caesar in the senate-house, while they were debating about punishing the associates of Catiline's conspiracy; and when Cato saw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conspirators, and insisted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Caesar gave it to Cato, and the stern senator had no sooner read its contents, than he threw it back, with the words of "Take it, drunkard." From the intimacy which existed between Servilia and Caesar, some have supposed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cas.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Another sister of Cato, who married Silanus. Id.—A daughter of Thræsea, put to death by order of Nero with her father. Her crime was the consulting of magicians only to know what would happen in her family.

Servilia lex, de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius the pretor, A.U.C. 653. It punished severely such as were guilty of speculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not precisely known.—Another, de iudiciis, by Q. Servilius Cæpio the consul, A.U.C. 648. It divided the right of judging between the senators and the equites, a privilege which, though originally belonging to the senators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.—Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accused a Roman senator, so that he was condemned, the accuser should be honoured with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen.—Another, agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus the tribune, A.U.C. 600. It required the immediate sale of certain houses and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchase of others in a different part of Italy. It required that 10 commissioners should be appointed to see it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its passing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced against it.

Serviliânus, a Roman consul defeated by Viriathus, in Spain, &c.

Servilius Quintus, a Roman who in his dictatorship defeated the Æqui.—Publius, a consul who supported the cause of the people against the nobles, and obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senate, after defeating the Volsci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently opposed the people because they had illiberally treated him.—A proconsul killed at the battle of Cannæ by Annibal.—Ahala, a master of horse to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refused to appear before the dictator to answer the accusations which were brought against him on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, Ahala slew him in the midst of the people whose protection he claimed. Ahala was accused for this murder and banished, but his sentence was afterwards repealed. He was raised to the dictatorship.—Marcus, a man who pleaded in favour of Paulus Æmilius, &c.

—An augur prosecuted by Lucullus for his inattention in his office. He was acquitted.—A pretor ordered by the senate to forbid Sylla to approach Rome. He was ridiculed and insulted by the conqueror's soldiers.—A man appointed to guard the sea-coast of Pontus by Pompey.—Publius, a proconsul of Asia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Isauria, for which service he was surnamed Isauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.—A Roman general who defeated an army of Etruscans.—An informer in the court of Tiberius.—A favourite of Augustus.—Geminus, a Roman consul who opposed Annibal with success.—Nonianus, a Latin historian, who wrote a history of Rome, in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name, as Pliny speaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another also illustrious for his genius and literary merit.—Casca, one of Caesar's murderers.—The family of the Servilius was of patrician rank, and came to settle at Rome after the destruction of Alba, where they were promoted to the highest offices of the state. To the several branches of this family were attached the different surnames of Ahala, Axilla, Fracas, Cæpio, Structus, Geminus, Pulex, Vatto, Casca, Fidenas, Longus, and Tucca.—Lacus, a lake near Rome. Cic. S. Ros. 32.

Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to Tanauqui his wife, and she brought up her son in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father, to denote his slavery. Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and though originally a slave, he raised himself so much to consequence, that Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not less than the royal favours, and Servius, become the favourite of the people and the darling of the soldiers, by his liberality and complaisance, was easily raised to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reason to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himself still more as a warrior and as a legislator. He defeated the Veientes and the Tuscans, and by a proper act of policy he established the census, which told him that Rome contained about 84,000 inhabitants. He increased the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes, and that he might not seem to neglect the worship of the gods, he built several temples to the goddess of fortune, to whom he deemed himself particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He also built a temple to Diana on mount Aventine, and raised himself a palace on the hill Esquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns. This union, as might be supposed, tended to ensure the peace of his family; but if such were his expectations, he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Aruns, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. These bloody measures were no sooner pursued than Servius was murdered by his own son-in-law, and his daughter Tullia showed herself so inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B.C. 534. His death was universally lamented, and the slaves annually celebrated a festival in his honour, in the temple of Diana on mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia, his wife, buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, c. 41.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 6.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 601.—Galba, a seditious person who wished to refuse a triumph to Paulus Æmilius after il- conquest of Macedonia.—Claudius, a grammarian. Suet. de Cl. Gr.—A friend of Sylla, who applied for the consulship to no purpose.—Cornelius, a consul in the first ages of the republic, &c.—Sulpitius, an orator in the age of Cicero and Hortensius. He was sent as ambassador to M. Antony, and died before his return. Cicero obtained a statue for him from the senate and the Roman people, which was raised in the Campus Martius. Besides orations he wrote verses, which were highly censured for their indelicacy. His works are lost. Cic. in Brut. Phil., &c.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.—A despicable informer in the Augustan age. Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 47.—Honoratus Maurus, a learned grammarian in the age of young Theodosius. He wrote Latin commentaries upon Virgil, still extant.

Sesostris, a celebrated king of Egypt some ages before the Trojan war. His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the same day with him to be publicly educated, and to pass their youth in the company of his son. This succeeded in the highest degree, and Sesostris had the pleasure to find himself surrounded by a number of faithful ministers and active warriors, whose education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inseparably devoted to his interest. When Sesostris had succeeded on his father's throne, he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into 36 different districts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya, Ethiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red sea, were conquered, and the victorious monarch marched through Asia, and penetrated further into the east than the conqueror Darius. He also invaded Europe, and subdued the Thracians; and that the fame of his conquests might long survive him, he placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued; and many ages after, this pompous inscription was read in many parts of Asia: "Sesostris the king of kings has conquered this territory by his arms." At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts, and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories which he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in several parts of Egypt, where cities were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were also dug near Memphis to facilitate navigation, and the communication of one province with another. In his old age Sesostris, grown infirm and blind, destroyed himself, after a reign of 44 years, according to some. His mildness towards the conquered has been admired, while some have upbraided him for his cruelty and insolence in causing his chariot to be drawn by some of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that many have supposed that the actions and conquests ascribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. Herodot. 2, c. 102, &c.—Diad. 1.—Val. Flacc. 5, v. 419.—Plin. 33, c. 3.—Lucan. 10, v. 276.—Strab. 16.

Sesuites, now Sessia, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Po. Plin. 3, c. 16.

Sestias, a name applied to Hero, as born at Sestos. Stat. 6, Theb. 547.

Sestius, a friend of Brutus, with whom he fought at the battle of Philippi. Augustus resigned the consulship in his favour, though he still continued to reverence the memory of Brutus.—A governor of Syria.

Sestos, or Seatus, a town of Thrace on the shores of the Hellespont, exactly opposite Abydos on the Asiatic side. It is celebrated for the bridge which Xerxes built there across the Hellespont, as also for being the seat of the amours of Hero and Lauder. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 13.—Missonis, de L. & H.—*Virg. Sesuvii, a people of Celtic Gaul. Cos. Bell. G.

Setabis, a town of Spain between New Carthage and Saguntum, famous for the manufacture of linen. There was also a small river of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 16, v. 474.—Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 3, l. 19, c. 1.

Sethon, a priest of Vulcan, who made himself king of Egypt after the death of Anysis. He was attacked by the Assyrians and delivered from this powerful enemy by an immense number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bows-strings and things, so that on the morrow their arms were found to be useless. From this wonderful circumstance Sethon had a statue which represented him with a rat in his hand, with the inscription of, "Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious." Herodot. 4, c. 141.

Setia, a town of Latium above the Pontine marshes, celebrated for its wines, which Augustus is said to have preferred to all others. Plin. 14, c. 6.—Juv. 5, v. 34, sat. 10, v. 27.—Martial. 13, ep. 112.

Severa Julia Aquilia, a Roman lady, whom the emperor Hellogabulus married. She was soon after repudiated, though possessed of all the charms of the mind and body which could captivate the most virtuous.—Valeria, the wife of Valentinian, and the mother of Gratian, was well known for her avarice and ambition. The emperor, her husband, repudiated her and afterwards took her again. Her prudent advice at last ensured her son Gratian on the imperial throne.—The wife of Philip the Roman emperor.

Severianus, a governor of Macedonia, father-in-law to the emperor Philip.—A general of the Roman armies in the reign of Valentinian, defeated by the Germans.—A son of the emperor Severus.

Severus Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor born at Leptis in Africa, of a noble family. He gradually exercised all the offices of the state, and recommended himself to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind and a restless activity, that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the most complicated hardships. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus resolved to remove Didius Julianus, who had bought the imperial purple when exposed to sale by the licentiousness of the pretorians, and therefore he proclaimed himself emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was stationed against the barbarians. To support himself in this bold measure, he took as his partner in the empire Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to crush Didus and all his partisans. He was received as he advanced through the country with universal acclamations, and Julianus himself was soon deserted by his favourites, and assassinated by his own soldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was sufficient to gratify his pride; the streets were strewed with flowers, and the submissive senate were ever ready to grant whatever honours or titles the conqueror claimed. In professing that he had assumed the purple only to revenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to disarm, but to banish the pretorians, whose insolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens, but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Pescennius Niger was in the east at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and ensigns of Augustus. Many obstinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till on the plains of Issus, which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Persian soldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loss of 20,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off and sent to the conqueror, who punished in a most cruel manner all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had shut her gates against him; and after he had conquered several nations in the east, he returned to Rome, resolved to destroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly shared the imperial power. He attempted to assassinate him by his emissaries; but when this had failed of success, Severus had recourse to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was so elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he insulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had suffered it to putrefy before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by his dogs. The family and the adherents of Albinus shared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital exhibited the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richest of the citizens were sacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honours, and his murderers were punished in the most wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life which he led in Rome, Severus marched into the east, with his two sons Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon success made himself master of Seleucia, Babylon, and Ctesiphon; and advanced without opposition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more southern provinces of Asia; after he had visited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and after he had granted a senate to that celebrated city, he viewed with the most criticizing and inquisitive curiosity the several monuments and ruins which that ancient kingdom contains. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the east. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall across the northern part of the island, to defend it against the frequent invasions of the Caledonians. Hitherto successful against his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family disturbed. Caracalla attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was so shocked at the unfitness of his son, that on his return home he called him into his presence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn sword, adding, "If you are so ambitious of reigning alone, now imbue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witnesses of your want of filial tenderness." If these words checked Caracalla, yet he did not show himself concerned, and Severus, worn out with infirmities which the gout and the uneasiness of his mind increased, soon after died, exclaiming he had been everything man could wish, but that he was then nothing. Some say that he wished to poison himself, but that when this was denied, he ate to great excess, and soon after expired at York on the 4th of February, in the 21st year of the christian era, in the 66th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years, eight months, and three days. Severus has been so much admired for his military talents, that some have called him the most warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel, and it has been observed that he never did an act of humanity or forgave a fault. In his diet he was temperate, and he always showed himself an open enemy to pomp and splendour. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even composed a history of his own reign, which some have praised for its correctness and veracity. However cruel Severus may appear in his punishments and in his revenge, many have endeavoured to exculpate him, and observed that there was need of severity in an empire whose morals were so corrupted, and where no less than 3000 persons were accused of adultery during the space of 17 years. Of him, as of Augustus, some were found to say, that it would have been better for the world if he had never been born, or had never died. Dio—Herodian—Victor, &c. — Alexander Marcus Aurelius, a native of Phoenicia, adopted by Helio-gabalus. His father's name was Genesius Marcianus, and his mother's Julia Mammaea, and he received the surname of Alexander, because he was born in a temple sacred to Alexander the Great. He was carefully educated, and his mother, by paying particular attention to his morals, and the character of his preceptors, preserved him from those infirmities and that licentiousness which old age too often attributes to the depravity of youth. At the death of Helio-gabalus, who had been jealous of his virtues, Alexander, though only in the 14th year of his age, was proclaimed emperor, and his nomination was approved by the universal shouts of the army, and the congratulations of the senate. He had not long been on the throne before the peace of the empire was disturbed by the incursions of the Persians. Alexander marched into the east without delay, and soon obtained a decisive victory over the barbarians. At his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph, but the revolt of the Germans soon after called him away from the indulgence of the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with some success, but the virtues and the amiable qualities of Alexander were forgotten in the stern and sullen strictness of the disciplinarian. His soldiers, fond of repose, murmured against his severity; their clamours were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midst of his camp, after a reign of 13 years and nine days, on the 18th of March, A.D. 235. His mother Mammaea shared his fate with all his friends; but this was no sooner known than the soldiers punished with immediate death all such as had been concerned in the murder except Maximinus. Alexander has been admired for his many virtues, and every historian, except Herodian, is bold to assert, that if he had lived, the Roman empire might soon have been freed from those tumults and abuses which continually disturbed her peace, and kept the lives of her emperors and senators in perpetual alarms. His severity in punishing offences was great, and such as had robbed the public, were they even the most intimate friends of the emperor, were indiscriminately sacrificed to the tranquillity of the state.

which they had violated. The great offices of the state, which had before his reign been exposed to sale, and occupied by favourites, were now bestowed upon merit, and Alexander could boast that all his officers were men of trust and abilities. He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets; and in the public schools which his liberality and the desire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleasure and satisfaction the eloquent speeches and declamations of his subjects. The provinces were well supplied with provisions, and Rome was embellished with many stately buildings and magnificent porticoes. Alex. vit.—Herodian.—Zosim.
Victor.—Flavius Valerius, a native of Illyricum, nominated Cæsar by Galerius. He was put to death by Maximianus, A.D. 307.—Julius, a governor of Britain under Adrian.—A general of Valens.—Libius, a man proclaimed emperor of the west, at Ravenna, after the death of Majorianus. He was soon after poisoned.—Lucius Cornelius, a Latin poet in the age of Augustus, for some time employed in the judicial proceedings of the forum.—Cassius, an orator banished into the island of Crete by Augustus, for his illiberal language. He was banished 17 years, and died in Seriphos. He is commended as an able orator, yet declaiming with more warmth than prudence. His writings were destroyed by order of the senate. Suet. in Oct.—Quint.—Sulpitius, an ecclesiastical historian, who died A.D. 420. The best of his works is his Historia Sacra, from the creation of the world to the consulship of Stilicho, of which the style is elegant, and superior to that of the age in which he lived. The best edition is in 2 vols. 4to. Patavii, 1741.—An officer under the emperor Julian.—Aquilus, a native of Spain, who wrote an account of his own life in the reign of the emperor Valens.—An officer of Valentinian, &c.—A prefect of Rome, &c.—A celebrated architect employed in building Nero's golden palace at Rome after the burning of that city.—A mountain of Italy, near the Fabaris. *Virg. Southes, a man who dethroned his monarch, &c.—A friend of Perdiccas, one of Alexander's generals.—A Thracian king, who encouraged his countrymen to revolt, &c. This name is common to several of the Thracian princes.

Sextia, a woman celebrated for her virtue and her constancy, put to death by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 10.

Sextia Licinia lex, de Magistratibus, by C. Licinius and L. Sextius the tribunes, A.U.C. 386. It ordained that one of the consuls should be elected from among the plebeians.—Another, de religione, by the same, A.U.C. 385. It enacted that a decemvirate should be chosen from the patricians and plebeians instead of the decemviri sacris faciendis.

Sextius Aquæ, now Aix, a place of Cisalpine Gaul, where the Cimbri were defeated by Marius. It was built by C. Sextius, and is famous for its cold and hot springs. Liv. 61.—Vell. Paterc. 1, c. 15.

Sextilla, the wife of Vitellius. She became mother of two children. Suet. in Vit.—Another in the same family. Tacit. H. 2, c. 64.

Sextilius, a governor of Africa, who ordered

Marius, when he landed there, to depart immediately from his province. Marius heard this with some concern, and said to the messengers, "Go and tell your master that you have seen the exiled Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Plut. in Mar.—A Roman preceptor, who was seized and carried away by pirates, &c.—One of the officers of Lucullus.—Hæna, a poet. Virg. Hæna.—An officer sent to Germany, &c. Tacit. H. 3, c. 7.

Sextius, a lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul.—A seditious tribune in the first ages of the republic.—Lucius was remarkable for his friendship with Brutus; he gained the confidence of Augustus, and was consul. Horace, who was in the number of his friends, dedicated 1, od. 4, to him.—The first plebeian consul.—A dictator.—One of the sons of Tarquin. Virg. Tarquinus.

Sextus, a prænomen given to the sixth son of a family.—A son of Pompey the Great. Virg. Pompeius.—A stoic philosopher, born at Cheronæa in Bœotia. Some suppose that he was Plutarch's nephew. He was preceptor to M. Aurelius and L. Verus.—A governor of Syria.—A philosopher in the age of Antoninus. He was one of the followers of the doctrines of Pyrrho. Some of his works are still extant. The best edition of the treatise of Sextus Pompeius Festus, de verborum significatione, is that of Amst. 4to, 1669.

Sibaris. Virg. Sybaris.

Sibini, a people near the Suevi.

Siburina, a satrap of Arachosia, in the age of Alexander, &c.

Sibyllæ, certain women inspired by heaven, who flourished in different parts of the world. Their number is unknown. Plato speaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Elian of four, and Varro of 10, an opinion which is universally adopted by the learned. These 10 Sibyls generally resided in the following places: Persia, Libya, Delphi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythraea, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpessa on the Hellespont, Ançyra in Phrygia, and Tiburtis. The most celebrated of the Sibyls is that of Cumæ in Italy, whom some have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Pheonoe, and Deiphobe. It is said that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that, to make her sensible of his passion, he offered to give her whatever she should ask. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to ask for the enjoyment of the health, vigour, and bloom, of which she was then in possession. The god granted her her request, but she refused to gratify the passion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after she became old and decrepit, her form decayed, and melancholy paleness and haggard looks succeeded to bloom and cheerfulness. She had already lived about 700 years when Æneas came to Italy, and, as some have imagined, she had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of sand which she had in her hand. She gave Æneas instructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was usual for the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in such as consulted her to take up those leaves before they were dispersed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehensible. According to the most authentic historians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin II., with nine volumes, which she offered to sell for a very high price. The monarch disregarded her, and she immediately disappeared, and soon after returned, when she had burned three of the volumes. She asked the same price for the remaining six books; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, she burned three more, and still persisted in demanding the same sum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour astonished Tarquin; he bought the books, and the Sibyl instantly vanished, and never after appeared to the world. These books were preserved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verses. A college of priests was appointed to have the care of them; and such reverence did the Romans entertain for these prophetic books, that they were consulted with the greatest solemnity, and only when the state seemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, the Sibylline verses, which were deposited there, perished in the conflagration; and to repair the loss which the republic seemed to have sustained, commissioners were immediately sent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verses could be found of the inspired writings of the Sibyls. The fate of the Sibylline verses, which were collected after the conflagration of the capitol, is unknown. There are now eight books of Sibylline verses extant, but they are universally reckoned spurious. They speak so plainly of our Saviour, of his sufferings, and of his death, as even to surpass far the sublime prediction of Isaiah in description, and therefore from this very circumstance, it is evident that they were composed in the second century, by some of the followers of christianity, who wished to convince the heathens of their error, by assisting the cause of truth with the arms of pious artifice. The word Sibyl seems to be derived from σῖβυλ, kolice for δῶς, fovis, and βουλή, consilium. Plat. in Phæd.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 35.—Paus. 10, c. 12, &c.—Diod. 4.—*Quint. Sica, a man who showed much attention to Cicero in his banishment. Some suppose that he is the same as the Vibius Siculus mentioned by Plut. in Cic.—Cic. ad Attic. 8, ep. 12. Ad Div. 14, c. 4, 15.

Sicambri, or Sicambria, a people of Germany, conquered by the Romans. They revolted against Augustus, who marched against them, but did not totally reduce them. Drusus conquered them, and they were carried away from their native country to inhabit some of the more westerly provinces of Gaul. Dio. 54.—Strab. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 2, v. 36, od. 14, v. 51.—Tacit. 2, Ann. 26.

Sicambria, the country of the Sicambri, formed the modern provinces of Guelderland. Claud. in Eutrop. 1, v. 383.

Sicāni, a people of Spain, who left their native country and passed into Italy, and afterwards into Sicily, which they called Sicania. They inhabited the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, where they built some cities and villages. Some reckoned them the next inhabitants of the island after the Cyclops. They were afterwards driven from their ancient possessions by the Siculi, and retired into the western parts of the island. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Quint. Met. 5 & 13.—Virg. Æcl. 10. Æn. 7, v. 795.—Diod. 5.—Horat. ep. 17, v. 32.

Sicānia and Sicānia, an ancient name of Italy, which it received from the Sicani, or from Sicanus their king, or from Sicanus, a small river in Spain, in the territory where they lived, as some suppose. The name was more generally given to Sicily. Virg. Sicani.

Sicēlis (Sicēlides, plur.), an epithet applied to the inhabitants of Sicily. The Muses are called Sicēlides by Virgil, because Theocritus was a native of Sicily, whom the Latin poet, as a writer of Bucolic poetry, professed to imitate. Virg. Æcl. 4.

Sichæus, called also Sicharbas and Acerbas, was a priest of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Plisthenes. He married Elisa the daughter of Belus, and sister to king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was so extremely rich, that his brother-in-law murdered him to obtain his possessions. This murder Pygmalion concealed from his sister Dido; and he amused her by telling her that her husband had gone upon an affair of importance, and that he would soon return. This would have perhaps succeeded had not the shades of Sichæus appeared to Dido, and related to her the cruelty of Pygmalion, and advised her to fly from Tyre, after she had previously secured some treasures, which, as he mentioned, were concealed in an obscure and unknown place. According to Justin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Justin. 18, c. 4.

Sicilia, the largest and most celebrated island in the Mediterranean sea, at the bottom of Italy. It was anciently called Sicania, Trinacria, and Triguëtra. It is of a triangular form, and has three celebrated promontories, one looking towards Africa, called Lilybæum; Pachynum looking towards Greece; and Pelorum towards Italy. Sicily is about 600 miles in circumference, celebrated for its fertility, so much that it was called one of the granaries of Rome, and Pliny says that it rewards the husbandman an hundredfold. Its most famous cities were Syracuse, Messana, Leontium, Lilybæum, Agrigentum, Gela, Drepanum, Eryx, &c. The highest and most famous mountain in the island is Ætna, whose frequent eruptions are dangerous, and often fatal to the country and its inhabitants, from which circumstance the ancients supposed that the forges of Vulcan and the Cyclops were placed there. The poets feign that the Cyclops were the original inhabitants of this island, and that after them it came into the possession of the Sicani, a people of Spain, and at last of the Siculi, a nation of Italy. Virg. Siculi. The plains of Enna are well known for their excellent honey; and, according to Diodorus, the hounds lost their scent in hunting on account of the many odoriferous plants that profusely perfumed the air. Ceres and Proserpine were the chief deities of the place, and it was there, according to poetical tradition, that the latter was carried away by Pluto. The Phœnicians and Greeks settled some colonies there, and at last the Carthaginians became masters of the whole island till they were dispossessed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars. Some authors suppose that Sicily was originally joined to the continent, and that it was separated from Italy by an earthquake, and that the straits of the Charybdis were formed. The inhabitants of Sicily were so fond of luxury, that Sicula mensa became proverbial. The rights of citizens of Rome were extended to them by M.

Antony. Cic. 14. Att. 12. Verr. 2, c. 13.—Homer. Od. 9, &c.—Justin. 4, c. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 414. Sc. Ital. 14, v. 11, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 8, &c.—The island of Naxos in the Ægean was called Iatta Sicily on account of its fruitfulness.

S. Sicius Dentatus, a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valour and the honours he obtained in the field of battle, during the period of 40 years, in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was present in 121 battles: he obtained 14 civic crowns, three mural crowns, eight crowns of gold, 83 golden collars, 60 bracelets, 28 lances, 23 horses with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon services. He could show the scars of 45 wounds, which he had received all in his breast, particularly in opposing the Sabines when they took the capitol. The popularity of Sicius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wished to make himself absolute at Rome, and therefore, to remove him from the capital, he sent him to the army, by which, soon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicius killed 15, and wounded 30; and, according to Dionysius, the surviving number had recourse to artifice to overpower him, by killing him with a shower of stones and darts thrown at a distance, about 405 years before the christian era. For his uncommon courage Sicius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Dionys. 8.—Vellutus, one of the first tribunes in Rome. He raised cabals against Coriolanus, and was one of his accusers. Plut. in Cor.—Sabinus, a Roman general who defeated the Volsci.

Siclus, a man privately sent by Themistocles to deceive Xerxes, and to advise him to attack the combined forces of the Greeks. He had been precursor to Themistocles. Plut.—An island, &c.

Sicoris, now Segre, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and falling into the Iberus, a little above its mouth. It was near this city that J. Caesar conquered Afranius and Petreius, the partisans of Pompey. Lucan. 4, v. 14, 130, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 3.

Siculi, a people of Italy, driven from their possessions by the Opici. They fled into Sicania, or Sicily, where they settled in the territories which the Sicani inhabited. They soon extended their borders, and after they had conquered their neighbours the Sicani, they gave their name to the island. This, as some suppose, happened about 300 years before Greek colonies settled in the island, or about 1059 years before the christian era. Diod. 5.—Dionys. Hal.—Strab.

Siculum fretum, the sea which separates Sicily from Italy, is 15 miles long, but in some places so narrow, that the barking of dogs can be heard from shore to shore. This strait is supposed to have been formed by an earthquake, which separated the island from the continent. Plin. 3, c. 8.

Sicyon, now Basilico, a town of Peloponnesus, the capital of Sicyonia. It is celebrated as being the most ancient kingdom of Greece, which began B.C. 2089, and ended B.C. 1089, under a succession of monarchs of whom little is known, except the names. Agamemnon was the first king. Some time after, Agamemnon made himself master of the place, and afterwards it fell into the hands of the Heraclidae. It became very powerful in the time of the Achaean league, which it joined B.C. 251, at the persuasion of Aratus. The inhabitants of Sicyon are mentioned by some authors as dissolute and fond of luxury, hence the Sicyonian shores, which were once very celebrated, were deemed marks of effeminacy. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Lucret. 1, v. 1118.—Liv. 32, c. 16. 1, 33, c. 15.—Strab. 8. Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Dem.—Paus. 2, c. 2, &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 24.—Virg. G. 2, v. 519.

Sicyonia, a province of Peloponnesus, on the bay of Corinth, of which Sicyon was the capital. It is the most eminent kingdom of Greece, and in its flourishing situation, not only its dependent states, but also the whole Peloponnesus, were called Sicyonia. The territory is said to abound with corn, wine, and olives, and also with iron mines. It produced many celebrated men, particularly artists. Vid. Sicyon.

Sido, the wife of Orion, thrown into hell by Juno, for boasting herself fairer than the goddess. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—A daughter of Belus.—A daughter of Danaus.—A town of Pamphylia. Liv. 37, c. 23.—Cic. 3, Fam. 6.

Sidoro, the stepmother of Tyro, killed by Pelias.

Sidicium, a town of Campania, called also Teanum. Vid. Teanum. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727.

Sidon, an ancient city of Phœnicia, the capital of the country, with a famous harbour, now called Said. It is situate on the shores of the Mediterranean, at the distance of about 50 miles from Damascus and 24 from Tyre. The people of Sidon were well known for their industry, their skill in arithmetic, in astronomy, and commercial affairs, and in sea voyages. They, however, had the character of being very dishonest. Their women were peculiarly happy in working embroidery. The invention of glass, of linen, and of a beautiful purple dye, is attributed to them. The city of Sidon was taken by Ochus king of Persia, after the inhabitants had burnt themselves and the city, B.C. 352; but it was afterwards rebuilt by its inhabitants. Lucan. 3, v. 217. l. 20, v. 141.—Diod. 16.—Justin. 11, c. 10.—Plin. 36, c. 26.—Homer. Od. 15, v. 411.—Mela, 1, c. 12.

Sidoniorum insulæ, islands in the Persian gulf. Strab. 16.

Sidonis, is the country of which Sidon was the capital, situate at the west of Syria, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 19.—Dido, as a native of the country, is often called Sidonis. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 80.

Sidonius Calus SOLLIS Apollinaris, a christian writer, born A.D. 430. He died in the 52d year of his age. There are remaining of his compositions, some letters and different poems, consisting chiefly of panegyrics on the great men of his time, written in heroic verse, and occasionally in other metre, of which the best edition is that of Labbeus, Paris, 4to, 1652.—The epithet of Sidonius is applied not only to the natives of Sidon, but it is used to express the excellence of anything, especially embroidery or dyed garments. Carthage is called Sidonia urbs, because built by Sidonians. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 682.

Siena Julia, a town of Etruria. Cic. Brut. 18.—Tacit. 4, Hist. 45.

Sida, now Ned-Roma, a town of Numidia, famous as the residence of Syphax. Plin. 5, c. 11.

Sigeum, or Sigœum, now cape Inclusaræ, a town of Troas, on a promontory of the same name, where the Scamander falls into the sea, extending six miles along the shore. It was near Sigeum that the greatest part of the battles between the Greeks and Trojans were fought, as Homer mentions, and there Achilles was buried. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312. l. 7, v. 294.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 71.

—Lucan, 9, v. 960.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Strab., 13.—Pliny, Cret., 5, c. 12.

SIGNIA, an ancient town of Latium, whose inhabitants were called Signini. The wine of Signia was used by the ancients for medicinal purposes. Martial, 13, ep. 116.—A mountain of Phrygia. Plin., 5, c. 29.

SIGOVEAUS, a prince among the Celts, in the reign of Tarquin. Liv., 5, c. 34.

SIGYNI, SIGUNÆ, or SIGYNNÆ, a nation of European Scythia, beyond the Danube. Herodot., 5, c. 9.

SILA, or SYLA, a large wood in the country of the Bruttii near the Apennines, abounding in much pitch. Strab., 6.—Virg., Æn., 12, v. 713.

SILANA JULIA, a woman at the court of Nero, remarkable for her licentiousness and impurities. She married C. Julius, by whom she was divorced.

D. SILANUS, a son of T. Manlius Torquatus, accused of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himself desired to hear the complaints laid against his son, and after he had spent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced on the third day his son guilty of extortion, and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He also banished him from his presence, and so struck was the son at the severity of his father, that he hanged himself on the following night. Liv., 54.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max., 5, c. 8.—C. Junius, a consul under Tiberius, accused of extortion, and banished to the island of Cythere. Tacit.—Marcus, a lieutenant of Cæsar's armies in Gaul.—The father-in-law of Caligula. Suet. Cal., 22.—A propretor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there, while Annibal was in Italy.—Turpilius, a lieutenant of Metellus against Jugurtha. He was accused by Marius, though totally innocent, and condemned by the malice of his judges.—Torquatus, a man put to death by Nero.—Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials, Salinus killed himself.—An augur in the army of the 10,000 Greeks, at their return from Cumana.

SILÆRUS, a river of Picenum, rising in the Apennine mountains, and falling into the Tyrrhene sea. Its waters, as it is reported, petrified all leaves that fell into it. Strab., 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg., G., 3, v. 146.—Plin., 2, c. 103.—Sil., 1, v. 582.

SILĒNI, a people on the banks of the Indus. Plin., 6, c. 20.

SILĒNUS, a demi-god, who became the nurse, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as some suppose, son of Pan, or, according to others, of Mercury, or of Terra. Malea in Lesbos was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honours, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by some peasants in Phrygia, after he had lost his way, and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to king Midas, who received him with great attention. He detained him for 10 days, and afterwards restored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors assert that Silenus was a philosopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and assisted him by the soundness of his counsels. From this circumstance, therefore, he is often introduced speaking with all the gravity of a philosopher concerning the formation of the world, and the nature of things. The Fauns in general, and the Satyrs, are often called Sileni. Paus., 3, c. 25. l. 6, c. 24.—Philost., 23.—Ovid. Met., 4.—Hygin., Fab., 191.—Diod., 3, &c.—Cic. Tusc., 1, c. 48.—Filiab., V. 11, 3, c. 18.—Virg., Æd., 6, v. 13.—A Carthaginian historian who wrote an account of the affairs of his country in the Greek language.—An historian who wrote an account of Sicily.

SILICONSO, a river of Spain.

SILICIS MONS, a town near Padua.

SILIS, a river of Venetia in Italy, falling into the Adriatic. Plin., 3, c. 18.

C. SILIUS ITALICUS, a Latin poet, who was originally at the bar, where he for some time distinguished himself, till he retired from Rome more particularly to consecrate his time to study. He was consul the year that Nero was murdered. Pliny has observed, that when Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Silius refused to come to Rome and congratulate him like the rest of his fellow-citizens, a neglect which was never resented by the emperor, or insolently mentioned by the poet. Silius was in possession of a house where Cicero had lived, and another in which was the tomb of Virgil, and it has been justly remarked, that he looked upon no temple with greater reverence than upon the sepulchre of the immortal poet, whose steps he followed, but whose fame he could not equal. The birthday of Virgil was yearly celebrated with unusual pomp and solemnity by Silius; and for his partiality, not only to the memory, but to the compositions of the Mantuan poet, he has been called the ape of Virgil. Silius starved himself when labouring under an imposthume which his physicians were unable to remove, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, about the 75th year of his age. There remains a poem of Italicus, on the second Punic war, divided into 17 books, greatly commended by Martial. The moderns have not been so favourable in their opinions concerning its merit. The poetry is weak and inelegant, yet the author deserves to be commended for his purity, the authenticity of his narrations, and his interesting descriptions. He has everywhere imitated Virgil, but with little success. Silius was a great collector of antiquities. His son was honoured with the consulship during his lifetime. The best editions of Italicus will be found to be Drakenborch's in 4to, Utr. 1717, and that of Cellarius, 8vo, Lips. 1695. Mart., 11, ep. 49, &c.—Caius, a man of consular dignity, greatly beloved by Messalina for his comely appearance and elegant address. Messalina obliged him to divorce his wife, that she might enjoy his company without intermission. Silius was forced to comply, though with reluctance, and he was at last put to death for the adulteries which the empress obliged him to commit. Tacit.—Suet.—Dio.—A tribune in Cæsar's legions in Gaul.—A commander in Germany, put to death by Sejanus. Tacit. Ann., 5 & 4.

SILPIA, a town of Spain. Liv., 28, c. 12.

SILVĀNUS, a rural deity, son of an Italian shepherd by a goat. From this circumstance he is generally represented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was son of Picus, or, as others report, of Mars, or, according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tuscullanaria, a young woman, who introduced herself into her father's bed, and became pregnant by him. The worship of Silvanus was established only in Italy, where, as some authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Evander. This deity was sometimes represented holding a cypress in his hand, because he became enamoured of a beautiful youth called Cyparissus, who was changed into a tree of the same name. Silvanus presided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. Plut. in Parall.—Virg. Ecl. 10. li. 1. v. 20. l. 2. v. 493.—Elian. Anim. 6. c. 42.—Ovid. Met. 10.—Horat. ep. 2.—Dionys. Hal.—A man who murdered his wife Aponia, by throwing her down from one of the windows of her chambers.—One of those who conspired against Nero.—An officer of Constantius, who revolted and made himself emperor. He was assassinated by his soldiers.

Silvium, a town of Apulia, now Gorgolione. Plin. 3. c. 11.—A town of Istria.

Silures, the people of South Wales in Britain.

Simbrivius, or Simbrivius, a lake of Latium, formed by the Anio. Tacit. 14. Ann. 22.

Simona, a town of Lycia near Chimera. Plin. 5. c. 27.

Simethus, or Symethus, a town and river at the east of Sicily, which served as a boundary between the territories of the people of Catania and the Leontini. In its neighbourhood the gods Falci were born. Virg. En. 9. v. 584.

Similae, a grove at Rome where the orgies of Bacchus were celebrated. Liv. 39. c. 12.

Similia, one of the courtiers of Trajan, who removed from Rome into the country to enjoy peace and solitary retirement.

Simmia, a philosopher of Thebes, who wrote dialogues.—A grammarian of Rhodes.—A Macedonian suspected of conspiracy against Alexander, on account of his intimacy with Philotas. Curt. 7. c. 1.

Simo, a comic character in Terence.

Simois (entis), a river of Troas, which rises in mount Ida and falls into the Xanthus. It is celebrated by Homer and most of the ancient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. It is found to be but a small rivulet by modern travellers, and even some have disputed its existence. Homer. Il.—Virg. En. 2. v. 104. l. 5. v. 302. &c.—Ovid. Met. 31. v. 324.—Mela. 1. c. 18.

Simonius, a Trojan prince, son of Anthemion, killed by Ajax. Homer. Il. 4. v. 473.

Simon, a currier of Athens, whom Socrates often visited on account of his great sagacity and genius. He collected all the information he could receive from the conversation of the philosopher, and afterwards published it with his own observations in 33 dialogues. He was the first of the disciples of Socrates who attempted to give an account of the opinions of his master concerning virtue, justice, poetry, music, honour, &c. These dialogues were extant in the age of the biographer Diogenes, who has preserved their title. Diog. 2. c. 14.—Another who wrote on rhetoric. Id.—A sculptor. Id.—The name of Simon was common among the Jews.

Simonides, a celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished 538 years B.C. His father's name was Leoprepis, or Theoprepis. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces, esteemed for their elegance and sweetness, and composed also epic poems, one on Cambyses king of Persia, &c. Simonides was universally courted by the princes of Greece and Sicily, and according to one of the fables of Phædrus, he was such a favourite of the gods, that his life was miraculously preserved in an entertainment when the roof of the house fell upon all those who were feasting. He obtained a poetical prize in the 80th year of his age, and he lived to his 90th year. The people of Syracuse, who had hospitably honoured him when alive, erected a magnificent monument to his memory. Simonides, according to some, added the four letters  $\eta, \theta, \epsilon, \psi,$  to the alphabet of the Greeks. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. According to some, the grandson of the elegiac poet of Cos was also called Simonides. He flourished a few years before the Peloponnesian war, and was the author of some books of inventions, genealogies, &c. Quintil. 10. c. 1.—Phædr. 4. l. 21 & 24.—Horat. 2. od. 1. v. 38.—Herodot. 5. c. 102.—Cic. de Orat., &c.—Arist. —Pindar. Isth. 2.—Cattull. 1. ep. 39.—Lucian, de Macrob.—Elian. V. H. 8. c. 2.

Simplicius, a Greek commentator on Aristotle, whose works were all edited in the 16th century, and the latter part of the 15th, but without a Latin version.

Simulus, an ancient poet, who wrote some verses on the Tarpeian rock. Plut. in Rom.

Simus, a king of Arcadia after Phialus. Paus. 8. c. 5.

Simyra, a town of Phœnicia. Mela. 1. c. 12.

Sinæ, a people of India called by Ptolemy the most eastern nation of the world.

Sindæ, islands in the Indian ocean, supposed to be the Nicobar islands.

Sindi, a people of European Scythia, on the Palus Mæotis. Flacc. 5. v. 66.

Singææ, a people on the confines of Macedonia and Thrace.

Singara, a city at the north of Mesopotamia, now Sinjar.

Singuliv, a river of Spain falling into the Guadalquivir.

Singus, a town of Macedonia.

Sinis, a famous robber. Vid. Scinis.

Sinnaces, a Parthian of an illustrious family, who conspired against his prince, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6. c. 31.

Sinnôcha, a town of Mesopotamia, where Crassus was put to death by Surena.

Sinoe, a nymph of Arcadia, who brought up Pan.

Sinon, a son of Sisyphus, who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Sinon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to sacrifice one of their soldiers, to render the wind favourable to their return, and that because the lot had fallen upon him, at the instigation of Ulysses, he had fled away from their camp, not to be cruelly immolated. These false assertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Sinon advised Priam to bring into his city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left behind them, and to consecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed, and Sinon in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the side of the horse, from which issued a number of armed Greeks, who surprised the Trojans, and pillaged their city. Dares Phryg.—Homer. Od. 8. v. 472. l. 11. v. 521.—Virg. En. 2. v. 79. &c.—Paus. 10. c. 27.—Q. Smyrn. 12. &c.

Sinôpe, a daughter of the Asopus by Methron. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the border of the Euxine sea, in Asia Minor, where she gave birth to a son called Syrus. Diod. 4.—A seaport town of Asia Minor, in Pontus, now Sinakh, founded or rebuilt by a colony of Milesians. It was long an independent state, till Pharmaces king of Pontus seized it. It was the capital of Pontus, under Mithridates, and was the birthplace of Diogenes the cynic philosopher. It received its name from Sinope, whom Apollo carried there. Ovid. Pont. 1, el. 3, v. 67.—Strab. 2, & 12.—Diod. 4.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—The original name of Sinuessa.

Sinorix, a governor of Gaul, &c. Polyan. 8.

Sintice, a district of Macedonia.

Sintii, a nation of Thracians, who inhabited Lemnos, when Vulcan fell there from heaven. Hom. 11, v. 594.

Sinuessa, a maritime town of Campania, originally called Sinope. It was celebrated for its hot baths and mineral waters, which cured people of insanity, and rendered women prolific. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 713.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—liv. 22, c. 13.—Mart. 6 ep. 42. l. 11, ep. 8.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

Sion, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built.

Siphnos, now Sifano, one of the Cyclades, situate at the west of Paros, 20 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or, according to modern travellers, 40. Siphnos had many excellent harbours, and produced great plenty of delicious fruit. The inhabitants were so depraved, that their licentiousness became proverbial. They, however, behaved with spirit in the Persian wars, and refused to give earth and water to the emissaries of Xerxes in token of submission. There were some gold mines in Siphnos, of which Apollo demanded a tenth part. When the inhabitants refused to continue to offer part of their gold to the god of Delphi, the island was inundated, and the mines disappeared. The air was so wholesome that many of the natives lived to their 120th year. Paus. 10, c. 11.—Herodot. 8, c. 46.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

Sipontum, Sipus, or Sopus, a maritime town in Apulia in Italy, founded by Diomedes after his return from the Trojan war. Strab. 6.—Lucan. 5, v. 372.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Sipylum and Sipylus, a town of Lydia, with a mountain of the same name near the Mæander, formerly called Ceraunius. The town was destroyed by an earthquake, with 12 others in the neighbourhood, in the reign of Tiberius. Strab. 1 & 12.—Paus. 1, c. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hom. 11, 24.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.—One of Niobe's children, killed by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Sirbo, a lake between Egypt and Palestine, now Sebaket Bardotil. Plin. 4, c. 13.

Sirènes, sea nymphs who charmed so much with their melodious voice, that all forgot their employments to listen with more attention, and at last died for want of food. They were daughters of the Achelous by the muse Caliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpsichore. They were three in number, called Parthenoe, Ligeia, and Leucosia, or, according to others, Mæolpe, Aglaphonous, and Thelxiope, or Thelxione, and they usually lived in a small island near cape Pelorus in Sicily. Some authors suppose that they were monsters, who had the form of a woman above the waist, and the rest of the body like that of a bird; or rather that the whole body was covered with feathers, and had the shape of a bird, except the head, which was that of a beautiful female. This monstrous form they had received from Ceres, who wished to punish them, because they had not assisted her daughter when carried away by Pluto. But, according to Ovid, they were so disconsolate at the rape of Proserpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might seek her in the sea as well as by land. The Sirens were informed by the oracle, that as soon as any persons passed by them without suffering themselves to be charmed by their sons, they should perish; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all passengers, till Ulysses, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, stopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himself to be tied to the mast of his ship, and no attention to be paid to his commands, should he wish to stay and listen to their song. This was a salutary precaution. Ulysses made signs for his companions to stop, but they were disregarded, and the fatal coast was passed with safety. Upon this artifice of Ulysses, the Sirens were so disappointed, that they threw themselves into the sea and perished. Some authors say that the Sirens challenged the Muses to a trial of skill in singing, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adversaries, with which they made themselves crows. The place where the Sirens destroyed themselves was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coast of Sicily. Virgil, however, Æn. 5, v. 864, places the Sirenum Scopuli on the coast of Italy, near the island of Caprea. Some suppose that the Sirens were a number of lascivious women in Sicily, who prostituted themselves to strangers, and made them forget their pursuits while drowned in unlawful pleasures. The Sirens are often represented holding, one a lyre, a second a flute, and the third singing. Paus. 10, c. 6.—Hom. Od. 12, v. 167.—Strab. 6.—Amnian. 20, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 141.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 555. De Art. Am. 3, v. 317.—Stat. 12, v. 33.

Sirenclass, three small rocky islands near the coast of Campania, where the Sirens were supposed to reside.

Siris, a town of Magna Græcia, founded by a Grecian colony after the Trojan war, at the mouth of the river of the same name. There was a battle fought near it between Pyrrhus and the Romans. Diomys. Perieg. v. 221.—The Ethiopians gave that name to the Nile before its divided streams united into one current. Plin. 5, c. 9.—A town of Pæonia in Thrace.

Sirius, or Canicula, the dog-star, whose appearance, as the ancients supposed, always caused great heat on the earth. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 141.

Sirmio, now Sermione, a peninsula in the lake Benacus, where Caullus had a villa. Carm. 29.

Sirmium, the capital of Pannonia, at the confluence of the Savus and Bacuntius, very celebrated during the reign of the Roman emperors.

Sisamnes, a judge slayed alive for his partiality, by order of Cambyses. His skin was nailed on the benches of the other judges, to incite them to act with candour and impartiality. Herodot. 5, c. 25.

Sisapho, a Corinthian, who had murdered his brother, because he had put his children to death. Ovid. in Ib.

Sisapo, a town of Spain, famous for its vermilion mines, whose situation is not well ascertained. Plin. 33, c. 7.—Cic. Phil. 2, c. 19.

Sisacia, a town of Pannonia, now Sisseg.

Sisenes, a Persian deserter, who conspired against Alexander, &c. Curt. 3, c. 7.

S. Sisenna, an ancient historian among the Romans, 91 B.C. He wrote an account of the republic, of which Cicero speaks with great warmth, and also translated from the Greek the Milesian fables of Aristides. Some fragments of his compositions are quoted by different authors. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 443.—Cic. in Brut. 64 & 67.—Patere. 2, c. 9.—Corn, a Roman, who, on being reprimanded in the senate for the ill conduct and depraved manners of his wife, accused publicly Augustus of unlawful commerce with her. Dia. 54.—The family of the Corneli and Apronii received the surname of Sisenna. They are accused of intemperate loquacity in the Augustan age, by Horat. 1, sat. 7, v. 8.

Sisigambis, or Sisygambis, the mother of Darius the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great at the battle of Issus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderness and attention; he saluted her as his own mother, and what he had sternly denied to the petitions of his favourites and ministers, he often granted to the intercession of Sisygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and, indeed, she no sooner heard that he was dead, than she killed herself, unwilling to survive the loss of so generous an enemy; though she had seen, with less concern, the fall of her son's kingdom, the ruin of his subjects, and himself murdered by his servants. She had also lost, in one day, her husband and 800 of her brothers, whom Ocnus had assassinated to make himself master of the kingdom of Persia. Curt. 4, c. 9. l. 10, c. 5.

Sisimithræ, a fortified place of Bactriana, 15 stadia high, 80 in circumference, and plain at the top. Alexander married Roxana there. Strab. 11.

Sisocostus, one of the friends of Alexander, entrusted with the care of the rock Aornus. Curt. 8, c. 11.

Sisyphus, a brother of Athamas and Salmoeneus, son of Æolus and Enaretta, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope the daughter of Atlas, or, according to others, of Pandæus, by whom he had several children. He built Epiphyre, called afterwards Corinth, and he debauched Tyro the daughter of Salmoeneus, because he had been told by an oracle that his children by his brother's daughter would avenge the injuries which he had suffered from the malevolence of Salmoeneus. Tyro, however, as Hyginus says, destroyed the two sons whom she had by her uncle. It is reported that Sisyphus, mistrusting Autolycus, who stole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the dishonesty of his friend, he confounded and astonished the thief by selecting from his numerous flocks those bulls which, by the mark, he knew to be his own. The artifice of Sisyphus was so pleasing to Autolycus, who had now found one more cunning than himself, that he permitted him to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, whom a few days after he gave in marriage to Laertes of Ithaca. After his death, Sisyphus was condemned in hell to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal. The causes of this rigorous sentence are variously reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones on those whom he had plundered, and suffering them to expire in the most agonizing torments. Others, to the insult offered to Pluto, in chaining Death in his palace, and detaining her till Mars, at the request of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others suppose that Jupiter inflicted this punishment because he told Asopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her ravisher. The more followed opinion, however, is, that Sisyphus, by his death-bed, entreated his wife to leave his body unburied, and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received the permission of returning upon earth to punish this seeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promise of immediately returning. But he was no sooner out of the infernal regions, than he violated his engagements, and when he was at last brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to punish his want of fidelity and honour, condemned him to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the ancients. Homer. Od. 11, v. 592.—*Virg. Antony, who was born deformed, and received the name of Sisyphus, because he was endowed with genius and an excellent understanding. Horat. 1, sat. 3, v. 47.

Sitalcos, one of Alexander's generals, imprisoned for his cruelty and avarice in the government of his province. Curt. 10, c. 1.—A king of Thrace, B.C. 436.

Sithides, certain nymphs of a fountain in Megara. Paus. 1, c. 40.

Sithon, a king of Thrace.—An island in the Ægean.

Sithonia, a country of Thrace between mount Hæmus and the Danube. Sithonia is often applied to all Thrace, and thence the epithet Sithonius, so often used by the poets. It received its name from king Sithon. Horat. 1, od. 18, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 588. l. 7, v. 466. l. 13, v. 571.—Herodot. 7, c. 127.

Sitones, a nation of Germany, or modern Norway according to some. Tacit. de Germ. 45.

Sittace, a town of Assyria. Plin. 6, c. 27.

Smaragdus, a town of Egypt on the Arabian gulf, where emeralds (smaragdi) were dug. Strab. 16.

Smenus, a river of Laconia rising in mount Taygetus, and falling into the sea near Hyppos. Paus. 3, c. 24.

Smerdis, a son of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyses. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the Magi of Persia, who was himself called Smerdis, and who greatly resembled the deceased prince, declared himself king, at the death of Cambyses. This usurpation would not, perhaps, have been known, had not he taken too many precautions to conceal it. After he had reigned for six months with universal approbation, seven noblemen of Persia conspired to dethrone him, and when this had been executed with success, they chose one of their number to reign in the usurper's place, B.C. 521. This was Darius the son of Hystaspes. Herodot. 3, c. 30.—Justin. 1, c. 9.

Smilax, a beautiful shepherdess who became enamoured of Crocus. She was changed into a flower, as also her lover. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 283.

Smilis, a statutory of Ægina in the age of Dædalus. Paus. 7.

Smindyrides, a native of Sybaris, famous for his luxury. Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 24, & 12, c. 24.

Smintheus, one of the surnames of Apollo in Phrygia, where the inhabitants raised him a temple, because he had destroyed a number of rats that infested the country. These rats were called σμιθες, in the language of Phrygia, whence the surname. There is another story similar to this related by the Greek scholiast of Homer. Il. 1, v. 39.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 585.

Smyrna, a celebrated seaport town of Ionia in Asia Minor, built, as some suppose, by Tantalus, or, according to others, by the Æolians. It has been subject to many revolutions, and been severally in the possession of the Æolians, Ionians, Lydians, and Macedonians. Alexander, or according to Strabo, Lysimachus, rebuilt it 400 years after it had been destroyed by the Lydians. It was one of the richest and most powerful cities of Asia, and became one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy. The inhabitants were given much to luxury and indolence, but they were universally esteemed for their valour and intrepidity when called to action. Marcus Aurelius repaired it after it had been destroyed by an earthquake, about the 180th year of the christian era. Smyrna still continues to be a very commercial town. The river Meles flows near its walls. The inhabitants of Smyrna believed that Homer was born among them, and to confirm this opinion they not only paid him divine honours, but showed a place which bore the poet's name, and also had a brass coin in circulation which was called Homerium. Some suppose that it was called Smyrna from an Amazon of the same name who took possession of it. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.—Strab. 12 & 14.—Ælian. 8, v. 565.—Paus. 5, c. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—A daughter of Thias, mother of Adonis.—An Amazon.—The name of a poem which Cinnæ, a Latin poet, composed in nine years, and which was worthy of admiration, according to Catullus, 94.

Smyrnæus, a Greek poet of the third century, called also Calaber. Vid. Calaber.

Soana, a river of Albania. Ptol.

Soanda, a town of Armenia.

Soanes, a people of Colchis, near Caucasus, in whose territories the rivers abound with golden sands, which the inhabitants gather in wool skins, whence, perhaps, arose the fable of the golden fleece. Strab. 11.—Plin. 33, c. 3.

Socrates, the most celebrated philosopher of antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father Sophroniscus was a statutory, and his mother Phænarete was by profession a midwife. For some time he followed the occupation of his father, and some have mentioned the statues of the graces, admired for their simplicity and elegance, as the work of his own hands. He was called away from this meaner employment, of which, however, he never blushed, by Crito, who admired his genius and courted his friendship. Philosophy soon became the study of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that exemplary virtue which succeeding ages have ever loved and venerated. He appeared like the rest of his countrymen in the field of battle; he fought with boldness and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and disciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preservation of their lives. But the character of Socrates appears more conspicuous and dignified as a philosopher and moralist than as a warrior. He was fond of labour, he inured himself to suffer hardships, and he acquired that serenity of mind and firmness of countenance, which the most alarming dangers could never destroy, or the most sudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effects of vanity, or the wish of appearing singular. He bore injuries with patience, and the insults of malice or resentment he not only treated with contempt, but even received with a mind that expressed some concern, and felt compassion for the depravity of human nature. So singular and so venerable a character was admired by the most enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illustrious pupils, whom he instructed by his exemplary life, as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the god of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the aggregation of riches, was the object of his study, he was present everywhere, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Illyssus. He spoke with freedom on every subject, religious as well as civil; and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withstand the torrent of resentment, by which the Athenian generals were capitially punished for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginæ. This independence of spirit, and that visible superiority of mind and genius over the rest of his countrymen, created many enemies to Socrates; but as his character was unapproachable, and his doctrines pure, and void of all obscurity, the voice of malice was silent. Yet Aristophanes soon undertook, at the instigation of Melitus, in his comedy of the Clouds, to ridicule the venerable character of Socrates on the stage; and when once the way was open to calumny and defamation, the fickle and licentious populace paid no reverence to the philosopher whom they had before regarded as a being of a superior order. When this had succeeded, Melitus stood forth to criminate him, together with Anytus and Lycon, and the philosopher was summoned before the tribunal of the 500. He was accused of corrupting the Athenian youth, of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks, and of ridiculing the many gods whom the Athenians worshipped; yet, false as this might appear, the accusers relied for the success of their cause upon the perjury of false witnesses, and the envy of the judges, whose ignorance would readily yield to misrepresentation, and be influenced and guided by eloquence and artifice. In this their expectations were not frustrated, and while the judges expected submission from Socrates, and that meanness of behaviour and servility of defence which distinguished criminals, the philosopher, perhaps, accelerated his own fall by the firmness of his mind, and his uncompromising integrity. Lysias, one of the most celebrated orators of the age, composed an oration in a laboured and pathetic style, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the presence of his judges. Socrates read it, but after he had praised the eloquence and the animation of the whole, he rejected it, as neither manly nor expressive of fortitude, and comparing it to Sicyonian shoes, which, though fitting, were proofs of effeminacy, he observed, that a philosopher ought to be conspicuous for magnanimity and for firmness of soul. In his apology he spoke with great animation, and confessed that while others boasted that they were acquainted with everything, he himself knew nothing. The whole discourse was full of simplicity and noble grandeur, the energetic language of offended innocence. He modestly said, that what he possessed was applied for the service of the Athenians; it was his wish to make his fellow-citizens happy, and it was a duty which he performed by the special command of the gods, "whose authority," said he, emphatically to his judges, "I regard more than yours." Such language from a man who was accused of a capital crime, astonished and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned, but only by a majority of three voices; and when he was demanded, according to the spirit of the Athenian laws, to pass sentence on himself, and to mention the death he preferred, the philosopher said, "For my attempts to teach the Athenian youth justice and moderation, and render the rest of my countrymen more happy, let me be maintained at the public expense the remaining years of my life in the Prytaneum, an honour, O Athenians, which I deserve more than the victors of the Olympic games. They make their countrymen more happy in appearance, but I have made you so in reality." This exasperated the judges in the highest degree, and he was condemned to drink hemlock. Upon this he addressed the court, and more particularly the judges who had decided in his favour, in a pathetic speech. He told them that to die was a pleasure, since he was going to hold converse with the greatest heroes of antiquity; he recommended to their paternal care his defenceless children, and as he returned to prison, he exclaimed: "I go to die, you to live; but which is the best the Divinity alone can know." The solemn celebration of the Delian festivals (Vid. Delia) prevented his execution for 30 days, and during that time he was confined in the prison and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his disciples, were his constant attendants; he discoursed with them upon different subjects with all his usual cheerfulness and serenity. He reproved them for their sorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved because he was to suffer, though innocent, the philosopher replied, "Would you then have me die guilty?" With this composure he spent his last days. He continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and instructed his pupils on questions of the greatest importance; he told them his opinions in support of the immortality of the soul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent custom of suicide. He disregarded the intercession of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his escape out of prison he refused it, and asked, with his usual pleasantry, where he could escape death. "Where," says he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler, and made his escape certain, "where shall I fly, to avoid this irrevocable doom passed on all mankind?" When the hour to drink the poison was come, the executioner presented him the cup with tears in his eyes. Socrates received it with composure, and after he had made a libation to the gods, he drank it with an unaltered countenance, and a few moments after he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the unfeigned answer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wisest of mankind. Socrates died 400 years before Christ, in the 70th year of his age. He was no sooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty; his accusers were universally despised and shunned. One suffered death, some were banished, and others, with their own hands, put an end to the life which their severity to the best of the Athenians had rendered insupportable. The actions, sayings, and opinions of Socrates have been faithfully recorded by two of the most celebrated of his pupils, Xenophon and Plato, and everything which relates to the life and circumstances of this great philosopher is now minutely known. To his poverty, his innocence, and his example, the Greeks were particularly indebted for their greatness and splendour and the learning which was universally disseminated by his pupils, gave the whole nation a consciousness of their superiority over the rest of the world, not only in the polite arts, but in the more laborious exercises, which their writings celebrated. The philosophy of Socrates forms an interesting epoch in the history of the human mind. The son of Sophroniscus derided the more abstruse inquiries and metaphysical researches of his predecessors, and by first introducing moral philosophy, he induced mankind to consider themselves, their passions, their opinions, their duties, actions, and faculties. From this it was said that the founder of the Socratic school drew philosophy down from heaven upon the earth. In his attendance upon religious worship, Socrates was himself an example; he believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a daemon or invisible conductor (Vid. Dæmon), whose frequent interposition stopped him from the commission of evil, and the guilt of misconduct. This familiar spirit, however, according to some, was nothing more than a sound judgment assisted by prudence and long experience, which warned him at the approach of danger, and from a general speculation of mankind could foresee what success would attend an enterprise, or what calamities would follow an ill-managed administration. As a supporter of the immortality of the soul, he allowed the perfection of a supreme knowledge, from which he deduced the government of the universe. From the resources of experience as well as nature and observation, he perceived the indiscriminate dispensation of good and evil to mankind by the hand of Heaven, and he was convinced that none but the most inconsiderate would incur the displeasure of their Creator to avoid poverty or sickness, or gratify a sensual appetite, which must at the end harass their soul with remorse and the consciousness of guilt. From this natural view of things, he perceived the relation of one nation with another, and how much the tranquillity of civil society depended upon the proper discharge of these respective duties. The actions of men furnished materials also for his discourse; to instruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily lessons. From principles like these, which were enforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate husband, a tender parent, a warlike soldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, soon after the celebrated sects of the Platonists, the Peripatetics, the Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c., arose. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many support that the tragedies of his pupil Euripides were partly composed by him. He was naturally of a licentious disposition, and a physiognomist observed, in looking in the face of the philosopher, that his heart was the most depraved, immodest, and corrupted that ever was in the human breast. This nearly cost the satirist his life, but Socrates upbraided his disciples, who wished to punish the physiognomist, and declared that his assertions were true, but that all his vicious propensities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reason. Socrates made a poetical version of Æsop's fables, while in prison. Laert.—Xenoph.—Pluto.—Paus. 1, c. 22.—Plut. de op. Phil., &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 54.—Tusc. 1, c. 41, &c.—*Val. Solman Julia, mother of the emperor Helio-gabalus, was made president of a senate of women, which she had elected to decide the quarrels and the affairs of the Roman matrons. She at last provoked the people by her debaucheries, extravagance, and cruelties, and was murdered with her son and family. She was a native of Apamea; her father's name was Julius Avitus, and her mother's Masa. Her sister Julia Mamaea married the emperor Septimius Severus.

Sogdiana, a country of Asia, bounded on the north by Scythia, east by the Saccæ, south by Bactriana, and west by Margiana, and now known by the name of Zagatai, or Ubec. The people were called Sogdiani. The capital was called Marcanda. Herodot. 3, c. 93.—Curt. 7, c. 10.

Sogdianus, a son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who murdered his elder brother, king Xerxes, to make himself master of the Persian throne. He was but seven months in possession of the crown. His brother Ochus, who reigned under the name of Darius Nothus, conspired against him, and suffocated him in a tower full of warm ashes.

Sol (the sun), was an object of veneration among the ancients. It was particularly worshipped by the Persians, under the name of Mithras; and was the Baal or Bel of the Chaldeans, the Belphegor of the Moabites, the Moloch of the Canaanites, the Osiris of the Egyptians, and the Adonis of the Syrians. The Massagetæ sacrificed horses to the sun on account of their swiftness. According to some of the ancient poets, Sol and Apollo were two different persons. Apollo, however, and Phœbus and Sol, are universally supposed to be the same deity.

Solicinium, a town of Germany, now Sultz, on the Neckar.

Solinus C. Julius, a grammarian at the end of the first century, who wrote a book called Polyhistor, which is a collection of historical remarks and geographical annotations on the most celebrated places of every country. He has been called Pliny's ape, because he imitated that well-known naturalist. The last edition of the Polyhistor is that of Norimb. ex editione Salamasi. 1777.

Solis Fons, a celebrated fountain in Libya. Vid. Ammon.

Soloe, or Soli, a town of Cyprus, built on the borders of the Clarius by an Athenian colony. It was originally called Æpera, till Solon visited Cyprus, and advised Philocyprus, one of the princes of the island, to change the situation of his capital. His advice was followed; a new town was raised in a beautiful plain, and called after the name of the Athenian philosopher. Strab. 14.—Plut. in Sol.—A town of Cilicia on the sea-coast, built by the Greeks and Rhodians. It was afterwards called Pompeipolis, from Pompey, who settled a colony of pirates there. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Dionys. Some suppose that the Greeks, who settled in either of these two towns, forgot the purity of their native language, and thence arose the term Solicimus, applied to an inelegant or improper expression.

Solonia, or Solontia, a promontory of Libya at the extremity of mount Atlas, now cape Cantiu.—A town of Sicily, between Panormus and Hinera, now Solanto. Cic. Verr. 3, c. 43.—Thucyd. 6.

Solon, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was born at Salamis, and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Exechesides, one of the descendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's side he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Pisistratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philosophical and political studies, Solon travelled over the greatest part of Greece, but at his return home he was distressed with the dissensions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He might have become absolute, but he refused the dangerous office of king of Athens, and, in the capacity of lawgiver, he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poorer citizens found redress, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to seize the person of his debtor if unable to make a restoration of his money. After he had made the most salutary regulations in the state, and bound the Athenians by a solemn oath that they would faithfully observe his laws for the space of 200 years, Solon resigned the office of legislator and removed himself from Athens. He visited Egypt, and in the court of Cæsus king of Lydia he convinced the monarch of the instability of fortune, and told him, when he wished to know whether he was not the happiest of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian, who had always seen his country in a flourishing state, who had seen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himself fallen in defence of his country, was more entitled to happiness than the possessor of riches and the master of empires. After 10 years' absence Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greatest part of his regulations disregarded by the factious spirit of his countrymen, and the usurpation of Pisistratus. Not to be longer a spectator of the divisions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the 80th year of his age, 558 years before the christian era. The salutary consequences of the laws of Solon can be discovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they flourished in full vigour, and Cicero, who was himself a witness of their benign influence, passes the highest encomiums upon the legislator, whose superior wisdom framed such a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorer citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four classes, three of which were permitted to discharge the most important offices and magistracies of the state, and the last to give their opinion in the assemblies, but not have a share in the distinctions and honours of their superiors, the legislator gave the populace a privilege which, though at first small and inconsiderable, soon rendered them masters of the republic, and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, he increased the authority of the members, and permitted them yearly to inquire how every citizen maintained himself, and to punish such as lived in idleness, and were not employed in some honourable and lucrative profession. He also regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges at 400. The sanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that against murder, and the punishment denounced against every offender was proportioned to his crime; but Solon made no law against parricide or sacrilege. The former of these crimes, he said, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, because the history of Athens had never furnished a single instance. Such as had died in the service of their country were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expense; but such as had squandered away their estates, such as refused to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and distress of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated; it became a union of affection and tenderness, and no longer a mercenary contract. To speak with ill language against the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legislator wished that the character of his fellow-citizens should be freed from the aspersions of malevolence and envy. A person that had no children was permitted to dispose of his estates as he pleased, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dress or expenses. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime, and the friend and associate of lewdness and debauchery was never permitted to speak in public, for, as the philosopher observed, a man who has no shame, is not capable of being intrusted with the people. These celebrated laws were engraven on several tables, and that they might be better known and more familiar to the Athenians, they were written in verse. The indignation which Solon expressed on seeing the tragical representations of Thespis, is well known, and he sternly observed, that if falsehood and fiction were tolerated on the stage, they would soon find their way among the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Pisistratus; but this seems to be false, as the legislator refused to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow-citizens were trampled upon by the usurpation of a tyrant. *Vid. Solona, a town of Gaul Cispadana on the Utens.

Solva, a town of Noricum.

Solus (untis), a maritime town of Sicily. Vid. Solois. Strab. 14.

Solyma and Solymae, a town of Lycia. The inhabitants, called Solymi, were anciently called Milyades, and afterwards Ternili and Lycians. Sarpedon settled among them. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 6.—Plin. 5, c. 27 & 29.—An ancient name of Jerusalem. Vid. Hierosolyma. Jos. 6, v. 543.

Somnus, son of Erebus and Nox, was one of the infernal deities, and presided over sleep. His palace, according to some mythologists, is a dark cave where the sun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and somniferous herbs. The god himself is represented as asleep on a bed of feathers with black curtains. The dreams stand by him, and Morpheus, as his principal minister, watches to prevent the noise from awaking him. The Lacedaemonians always placed the image of Somnus near that of death. Hesiod. Theog.—Homer. Il. 14.—Virg. Aen. 6, v. 893.—Ovid. Met. 11.

Sonchis, an Egyptian priest, in the age of Solon. It was he who told that celebrated philosopher a number of traditions, particularly about the Atlantic isles, which he represented as more extensive than the continent of Africa and Asia united. This island disappeared, it is said, in one day and one night. Plut. in Sol., &c.

Sontistes, a people in Gaul.

Sopater, a philosopher of Apamea, in the age of the emperor Constantine. He was one of the disciples of Iamblicus, and after his death he was at the head of the Platonic philosophers.

Sophae, a son of Hercules and Tinga the widow of Antaeus, who founded the kingdom of Tingis, in Mauritania, and from whom were descended Diodorus, and Juba king of Mauritania. Strab. 3.

Sophæne, a country of Armenia, on the borders of Mesopotamia. Lucan. 2, v. 593.

Sophocles, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, educated in the school of Æschylus. He distinguished himself not only as a poet, but also as a statesman. He commanded the Athenian armies, and in several battles he shared the supreme command with Pericles, and exercised the office of archon with credit and honour. The first appearance of Sophocles as a poet reflects great honour on his abilities. The Athenians had taken the island of Scyros, and to celebrate that memorable event, a yearly contest for tragedy was instituted. Sophocles on this occasion obtained the prize over many competitors, in the number of whom was Æschylus, his friend and his master. This success contributed to encourage the poet; he wrote for the stage with applause, and obtained the poetical prize on different times. Sophocles was the rival of Euripides for public praise; they divided the applause of the populace, and while the former surpassed in the sublime and majestic, the other was not inferior in the tender and pathetic. The Athenians were pleased with their contention, and as the theatre was at that time an object of importance and magnitude, and deemed an essential and most magnificent part of the religious worship, each had his admirers and adherents; but the two poets, captivated at last by popular applause, gave way to jealousy and rivalry. Of two tragedies which Sophocles composed, only seven are extant: Ajax, Electra, Œdipus the tyrant, Antigone, the Trachinians, Philoctetes, and Œdipus at Colonus. The ingratitude of the children of Sophocles is well known. They wished to become immediate masters of their father's possessions, and therefore, tired of his long life, they accused him before the Areopagus of insanity. The only defence the poet made was to read his tragedy of Œdipus at Colonus, which he had lately finished, and then he asked his judges, whether the author of such a performance could be taxed with insanity? The father upon this was acquitted, and the children returned home covered with shame and confusion. Sophocles died in the 91st year of his age, 406 years before Christ, through excess of joy, as some authors report, of having obtained a poetical prize at the Olympic games. Athenæus has accused Sophocles of licentiousness and debauchery, particularly when he commanded the armies of Athens. The best editions of Sophocles are those of Cappestove, and suffocated by the steam, on the 12th of April, in the 65th year of the christian era, in his 53rd year. His body was burnt without pomp or funeral ceremony, according to his will, which he had made when he enjoyed the most unbounded favours of Nero. The compositions of Seneca are numerous, and chiefly on moral subjects. He is so much admired for his refined sentiments and virtuous precepts, for his morality, his constancy, and his innocence of manners, that St. Jerome has not hesitated to rank him among christian writers. His style is nervous, it abounds with ornament, and seems well suited to the taste of the age in which he lived. The desire of recommending himself and his writings to the world, obliged him too often to depreciate the merit of the ancients, and to sink into obscurity. His treatises are de irâ, de consolatione, de Providentiâ, de tranquillitate animi, de clementiâ, de sapientiâ constantiâ, de otio sapientiâ, de brevitate vitæ, de beneficiis, de vitâ beatâ, besides his naturales questiones, ludus in Claudium, moral letters, &c. There are also some tragedies ascribed to Seneca. Quintilian supposes that the Medea is his composition, and according to others, the Troas and the Hippolytus were also written by him, and the Agamemnon, Hercules furens, Thyestes & Hercules in Oetâ by his father, Seneca the declaimer. The best editions of Seneca are those of Antwerp, fol. 1615, and of Gronovius, 3 vols. Amst. 1672; and those of his tragedies, are that of Schröder's, 4to, Delph. 1728, and the 8vo of Gronovius, l. Bat. 1682. Tacit. Ann. 12, &c.—Dio—Sueton. in Ner., &c.—Quintil.

Claudius Senecio, one of Nero's favourites, and the associate of his pleasures and debauchery.—Tullius, a man who conspired against Nero, and was put to death though he turned informer against the rest of the conspirators.—A man put to death by Domitian, for writing an account of the life of Helvidius, one of the emperor's enemies.—One of Constantine's enemies.—A man who from a restless and aspiring disposition acquired the surname of Grandilo. Seneca, Suet. 1.

Senia, a town of Liburnia, now Segna. Plin. 3, c. 27.

Senna, or Sena, a river of Umbria. Virg. Sena. Lucan. 7, v. 407.

Senones, an uncivilized nation of Gallia Transalpina, who left their native possessions, and under the conduct of Brennus, invaded Italy and pillaged Rome. They afterwards united with the Umbri, Latins, and Etrurians to make war against the Romans, till they were totally destroyed by Dolabella. The chief of their towns in that part of Italy where they settled near Umbria, and which from them was called Senogallia, were Fanum Fortunæ, Sena, Pisaurum, and Ariminum. Virg. Cimbri. Lucan. 1, v. 254.—Sil. 8, v. 454.—Liv. 5, c. 35, &c.—Flor.—A people of Germany near the Suevi.

Sentia lex, de sensatu, by C. Sentius the consul, A.U.C. 734, enacted the choosing of proper persons to fill up the number of senators.

Sentinum, a town of Umbria. Liv. 10, c. 27 & 30.

Sentius Cn., a governor of Syria, under the emperors.—A governor of Macedonia.—Septimius, one of the soldiers of Pompey, who assisted the Egyptians in murdering him.—A Roman emperor. Virg. Severus—A writer in the reign of the emperor Alexander, of whose life he wrote an account in Latin, or, according to others, in Greek.

Sepias, a cape of Magnesia in Thessaly, at the north of Eubœa, now St. George.

Sepiasia, a place of Capua, where ointments were sold. Cic. Pis. 7 & 11.

Septem aquæ, a portion of the lake near Reate. Cic. 4, Att. 15.—Fratres, a mountain of Mauritania, now Gebel-Monsa. Strab. 17.—Maria, the entrance of the seven mouths of the Po.

Septempeda, a town of Picenum.

Septeron, a festival observed once in nine years at Delphi, in honour of Apollo. It was a representation of the pursuit of Python by Apollo, and of the victory obtained by the god.

Tit. Septimius, a Roman knight distinguished by his poetical compositions both lyric and tragic. He was intimate with Augustus as well as Horace, who has addressed the sixth of his second lib. of Odes to him.—A centurion put to death, &c. Tacit. A. 1, c. 32.—A native of Africa, who distinguished himself at Rome as a poet. He wrote, among other things, a hymn in praise of Janus. Only 11 of his verses are preserved. M. Terent.—Crispinitus in Vita.

L. Septimuleius, a friend of C. Gracchus. He suffered himself to be bribed by Opimius, and had the meanness to carry his friend's head fixed to a pole through the streets of Rome.

Sepyra, a town of Cilicia, taken by Cicero when he presided over that province. Cic. ad Div. 15, c. 4.

Sequana, a river of Gaul, which separates the territories of the Belgæ and the Celtæ, and is now called la Seine. Strab. 4.—Mela, 3, c. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 425.

Sequani, a people of Gaul near the territories of the Ædui, between the Soane and mount Jura, famous for their wars against Rome, &c. Virg. Ædui. The country which they inhabited is now called Franche Comté, or Upper Burgundy. Cæs. Bell. G.

Sequintus, a native of Alba, who married one of his daughters to Curvilius of Alba, and the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome. The two daughters were brought to bed on the same day, each of three male children.

Serapio, a surname given to one of the Scipios, because he resembled a swine-herd of that name.—A Greek poet who flourished in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.—An Egyptian put to death by Achilles, when he came at the head of an embassy from Ptolemy, who was a prisoner in the hands of J. Caesar.—A painter. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Serâpis, one of the Egyptian deities, supposed to be the same as Osiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another very rich at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worship of Serapis was introduced at Rome, by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A.D. 146, and the mysteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with so much licentiousness that the senate were soon after obliged to abolish them. Herodotus, who speaks in a very circumstantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus says it is the same as the bull Apis. Paus. 1, c. 18, l. 2, c. 34.—Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 83.—Strab. 17.—Martial, 9, ep. 30.

Serbônias, a lake between Egypt and Palestine.

Serôna, a daughter of Theodosius, who married Stilicho. She was put to death, &c. Claudian.

Serenianus, a favourite of Gallus the brother of Julian. He was put to death.

Serenus Samonicus, a physician in the age of the emperor Severus and Caracalla. There remains a poem of his composition on medicine, the last edition of which is that of 1706, in 8vo. Amst.—Vibius, a governor of Spain, accused of cruelty in the government of his province, and put to death by order of Tiberius.

Seres, a nation of Asia, according to Ptolemy, between the Ganges and the eastern ocean in the modern Thibet. They were naturally of a meek disposition. Silk, of which the fabrication was unknown to the ancients, who imagined that the materials were collected from the leaves of trees, was brought to Rome from their country, and on that account it received the name of Sericum, and thence a garment or dress of silk is called serica vestis. Heliothalus the Roman emperor was the first who wore a silk dress, which at that time was sold for its weight in gold. It afterwards became very cheap, and consequently was the common dress among the Romans. Some suppose that the Seres are the same as the Chinese. Ptol. 6, c. 16.—Horat. 1, od. 29, v. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 19, l. 19, v. 142 & 292.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 14, v. 6.—Virg. G. 2, v. 121.

Sergestus, a sailor in the fleet of Æneas, from whom the family of the Sergii at Rome were descended. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 121.

Sergia, a Roman matron. She conspired with others to poison their husbands. The plot was discovered, and Sergia, with some of her accomplices, drank poison and died.

Sergius, one of the names of Catiline.—A military tribune at the siege of Veii. The family of the Sergii was patrician, and branched out into the several families of the Fidenates, Silli, Catilineæ, Natta, Ocellæ, and Planci.

Sergius and Sergiölius, a deformed youth, greatly admired by the Roman ladies in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 105 et seq.

Sermyla, a town of Macedonia. Herodot. 7, c. 122.

Seron, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes.
Serranus, a surname given to Cincinnatus, because he was found sowing his fields when told that he had been elected dictator. Some, however, suppose that Serranus was a different person from Cincinnatus. Plin. 18, c. 3.—Liv. 3, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.—One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed in the night by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 335.—A poet of some merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, v. 80.

Serrheum, a fortified place of Thrace. Liv. 31, c. 16.

Quintus Sertorius, a Roman general, son of Quintus and Rhea, born at Nursia. His first campaign was under the great Marius, against the Teutones and Cimbri. He visited the enemy's camp as a spy, and had the misfortune to lose one eye in the first battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and slaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expressed his sorrow and concern at the melancholy death of so many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for safety into Spain, when Sylla had proscribed him, and in this distant province he behaved himself with so much address and valour that he was looked upon as the prince of the country. The Lusitanians universally revered and loved him, and the Roman general did not show himself less attentive to their interest, by establishing public schools, and educating the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had established a senate, over which he presided with consular authority, and the Romans, who followed his standard, paid equal reverence to his person. They were experimentally convinced of his valour and magnanimity as a general, and the artful manner in which he imposed upon the credulity of his adherents in the garb of religion, did not diminish his reputation. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great success, and which followed him everywhere, even in the field of battle. The success of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives, alarmed the Romans. They sent some troops to oppose him, but with little success. Four armies were found insufficient to crush or even hurt Sertorius; and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory, were driven with dishonour from the field. But the favourite of the Lusitanians was exposed to the dangers which usually attend greatness. Perpenna, one of his officers who was jealous of his fame and tired of a superior, conspired against him. At a banquet the conspirators began to open their intentions by speaking with freedom and licentiousness in the presence of Sertorius, whose age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glass of wine, as a signal for the rest of the conspirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers, stabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the rest, 73 years before Christ. Sertorius has been commended for his love of justice and moderation. The flattering description which he heard of the Fortunate Islands when he passed into the west of Africa, almost tempted him to bid adieu to the world, and perhaps he would have retired from the noise of war, and the clamours of envy, to end his days in the bosom of a peaceful and solitary island, had not the stronger calls of ambition and the love of fame prevailed over the intruding reflections of a moment. It has been observed that in his latter days Sertorius became indolent, and fond of luxury and wanton cruelty; yet we must confess that in affability, clemency, complaisance, generosity, and military valour, he not only surpassed his contemporaries, but the rest of the Romans. Plut. in Vit.—Paterc. 2, c. 30, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 21, &c.—Appian. de Civ.—Val. Max. 1, c. 2, l. 7, c. 3.—Eutrop. Aul. Gell. 15, c. 22.

Servæus, a man accused by Tiberius of being privy to the conspiracy of Sejanus. Tacit. A. 6, c. 7.

Serviänus, a consul in the reign of Adrian. He was a great favourite of the emperor Trajan.

Servilia, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of J. Cæsar, though her brother was one of the most inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Cæsar of her affection, she sent him a letter filled with the most tender expressions of regard for his person. The letter was delivered to Cæsar in the senate-house, while they were debating about punishing the associates of Catiline's conspiracy; and when Cato saw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conspirators, and insisted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Cæsar gave it to Cato, and the stern senator had no sooner read its contents, than he threw it back, with the words of "Take it, drunkard." From the intimacy which existed between Servilia and Cæsar, some have supposed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cæs.—C. Nep. in Alcibi.—Another sister of Cato, who married Silanus. Id.—A daughter of Thrasea, put to death by order of Nero with her father. Her crime was the consulting of magicians only to know what would happen in her family.

Servilia lex, de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius the pretor, A.U.C. 653. It punished severely such as were guilty of peculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not precisely known.—Another, de iudiciis, by Q. Servilius Cæpio the consul, A.U.C. 648. It divided the right of judging between the senators and the equites, a privilege which, though originally belonging to the senators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.—Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accused a Roman senator, so that he was condemned, the accuser should be honoured with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen.—Another, agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus the tribune, A.U.C. 690. It required the immediate sale of certain houses and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchase of others in a different part of Italy. It required that 10 commissioners should be appointed to see it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its passing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced against it.

Servilianus, a Roman consul defeated by Viriathus, in Spain, &c.

Servilius Quintus, a Roman who in his dictatorship defeated the Æqui.—Publius, a consul who supported the cause of the people against the nobles, and obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senate, after defeating the Volsci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently opposed the people because they had illiberally treated him.—A proconsul killed at the battle of Cannæ by Annibal.—Ahala, a master of horse to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refused to appear before the dictator to answer the accusations which were brought against him on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, Ahala slew him in the midst of the people whose protection he claimed. Ahala was accused for this murder and banished, but his sentence was afterwards repealed. He was raised to the dictatorship.—Marcus, a man who pleaded in favour of Paulus Æmilius, &c.—An augur prosecuted by Lucullus for his inattention in his office. He was acquitted.—A pretor ordered by the senate to forbid Sylla to approach Rome. He was ridiculed and insulted by the conqueror's soldiers.—A man appointed to guard the sea-coast of Pontus by Pompey.—Publius, a proconsul of Asia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Isauria, for which service he was surnamed Isauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.—A Roman general who defeated an army of Etruscans.—An informer in the court of Tiberius.—A favourite of Augustus.—Geminus, a Roman consul who opposed Annibal with success.—Nonianus, a Latin historian, who wrote a history of Rome, in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name; as Pliny speaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another also illustrious for his genius and literary merit.—Casca, one of Cæsar's murderers.—The family of the Servilii was of patrician rank, and came to settle at Rome after the destruction of Alba, where they were promoted to the highest offices of the state. To the several branches of this family were attached the different surnames of Ahala, Axilla, Priscas, Cæpio, Structus, Geminus, Pulex, Vatia, Casca, Fidenas, Longus, and Yucca.—Lacus, a lake near Rome. Cic. S. Ros. 32.

Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to Tanaquil his wife, and she brought up her son in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father, to denote his slavery. Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and though originally a slave, he raised himself so much to consequence, that Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not less than the royal favours, and Servius, become the favourite of the people and the darling of the soldiers, by his liberality and complaisance, was easily raised to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reason to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himself still more as a warrior and as a legislator. He defeated the Veientes and the Tuscans, and by a proper act of policy he established the census, which told him that Rome contained about 34,000 inhabitants. He increased the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes, and that he might not seem to neglect the worship of the gods, he built several temples to the goddess of fortune, to whom he deemed himself particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He also built a temple to Diana on mount Aventine, and raised himself a palace on the hill Esquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns. This union, as might be supposed, tended to ensure the peace of his family; but if such were his expectations, he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Aruns, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. These bloody measures were no sooner pursued than Servius was murdered by his own son-in-law, and his daughter Tullia showed herself so inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B.C. 534. His death was universally lamented, and the slaves annually celebrated a festival in his honour, in the temple of Diana on mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia, his wife, buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, c. 41.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 601.—Galba, a seditious person who wished to refuse a triumph to Paulus Ænylius after li.

conquest of Macedonia.—Claudius, a grammarian. Suet. de Cl. Gr.—A friend of Sylla, who applied for the consulship to no purpose.—Cornelius, a consul in the first ages of the republic, &c.—Sulpitius, an orator in the age of Cicero and Hortensius. He was sent as ambassador to M. Antony, and died before his return. Cicero obtained a statue for him from the senate and the Roman people, which was raised in the Campus Martius. Besides orations he wrote verses, which were highly censured for their indelicacy. His works are lost. Cic. in Brut. Phil., &c.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.—A despicable informer in the Augustan age. Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 47.—Honoratus Maurus, a learned grammarian in the age of young Theodosius. He wrote Latin commentaries upon Virgil, still extant.

Sesostris, a celebrated king of Egypt some ages before the Trojan war. His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the same day with him to be publicly educated, and to pass their youth in the company of his son. This succeeded in the highest degree, and Sesostris had the pleasure to find himself surrounded by a number of faithful ministers and active warriors, whose education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inseparably devoted to his interest. When Sesostris had succeeded on his father's throne, he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into 36 different districts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya, Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red sea, were conquered, and the victorious monarch marched through Asia, and penetrated further into the east than the conqueror Darius. He also invaded Europe, and subdued the Thracians; and that the fame of his conquests might long survive him, he placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued; and many ages after, this pompous inscription was read in many parts of Asia: "Sesostris the king of kings has conquered this territory by his arms." At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts, and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories which he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in several parts of Egypt, where cities were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were also dug near Memphis to facilitate navigation, and the communication of one province with another. In his old age Sesostris, grown infirm and blind, destroyed himself, after a reign of 44 years, according to some. His mildness towards the conquered has been admired, while some have upbraided him for his cruelty and insolence in causing his chariot to be drawn by some of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that many have supposed that the actions and conquests ascribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. Herodot. 2, c. 102, &c.—Diod. 1.—Val. Flacc. 5, v. 419.—Plin. 33, c. 3.—Lucan. 10, v. 276.—Strab. 16.

Sessites, now Sessia, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Po. Plin. 3, c. 16.

Sestias, a name applied to Hero, as born at Sestos. Stat. 6, Theb. 547.

Sestius, a friend of Brutus, with whom he fought at the battle of Philippi. Augustus resigned the consulship in his favour, though he still continued to reverence the memory of Brutus.—A governor of Syria.

Sestos, or Sestus, a town of Thrace on the shores of the Hellespont, exactly opposite Abydos on the Asiatic side. It is celebrated for the bridge which Xerxes built there across the Hellespont, as also for being the seat of the amours of Hero and Leander. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 13.—Miscell. de L. & H.—*Virg. Sesuvii, a people of Celtic Gaul. Cæs. Bell. G.
Setabis, a town of Spain between the Carthage and Saguntum, famous for the manufacture of linen. There was also a small river of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 16, v. 474.—Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 3, l. 19, c. 1.

Sethon, a priest of Vulcan, who made himself king of Egypt after the death of Anysis. He was attacked by the Assyrians and delivered from this powerful enemy by an immense number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bow-strings and thongs, so that on the morrow their arms were found to be useless. From this wonderful circumstance Sethon had a statue which represented him with a rat in his hand, with the inscription of, "Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious." Herodot. 4, c. 141.

Setia, a town of Latium above the Pontine marshes, celebrated for its wines, which Augustus is said to have preferred to all others. Plin. 14, c. 6.—Juv. 5, v. 34, sat. 10, v. 27.—Martial. 13, ep. 112.

Severa Julia Aquilia, a Roman lady, whom the emperor Hellogabalus married. She was soon after repudiated, though possessed of all the charms of the mind and body which could captivate the most virtuous.—Valeria, the wife of Valentinian, and the mother of Gratian, was well known for her avarice and ambition. The emperor, her husband, repudiated her and afterwards took her again. Her prudent advice at last caused her son Gratian on the imperial throne.—The wife of Philip the Roman emperor.

Severianus, a governor of Macedonia, father-in-law to the emperor Philip.—A general of the Roman armies in the reign of Valentinian, defeated by the Germans.—A son of the emperor Severus.

Severus Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor born at Leptis in Africa, of a noble family. He gradually exercised all the offices of the state, and recommended himself to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind and a restless activity, that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the most complicated hardships. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus resolved to remove Didius Julianus, who had bought the imperial purple when exposed to sale by the licentiousness of the pretorians, and therefore he proclaimed himself emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was stationed against the barbarians. To support himself in this bold measure, he took as his partner in the empire Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to crush Didius and all his partisans. He was received as he advanced through the country with universal acclamations, and Julianus himself was soon deserted by his favourites, and assassinated by his own soldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was sufficient to gratify his pride; the streets were strewed with flowers, and the submissive senate were ever ready to grant whatever honours or titles the conqueror claimed. In promising that he had assumed the purple only to revenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to disarm, but to banish the pretorians, whose insolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens, but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Pescennius Niger was in the east at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and ensigns of Augustus. Many obstinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till on the plains of Issus, which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Persian soldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loss of 30,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off and sent to the conqueror, who punished in a most cruel manner all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had shut her gates against him; and after he had conquered several nations in the east, he returned to Rome, resolved to destroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly shared the imperial power. He attempted to assassinate him by his emissaries; but when this had failed of success, Severus had recourse to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was so elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he insulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had suffered it to putrefy before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by his dogs. The family and the adherents of Albinus shared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital exhibited the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richest of the citizens were sacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honours, and his murderers were punished in the most wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life which he led in Rome, Severus marched into the east, with his two sons Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon success made himself master of Seleucia, Babylon, and Ctesiphon; and advanced without opposition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more southern provinces of Asia; after he had visited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and after he had granted a senate to that celebrated city, he viewed with the most criticizing and inquisitive curiosity the several monuments and ruins which that ancient kingdom contains. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the east. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall across the northern part of the island, to defend it against the frequent invasions of the Caledonians. Hitherto successful against his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family disturbed. Caracalla attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was so shocked at the undutifulness of his son, that on his return home he called him into his presence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn sword, adding, "If you are so ambitious of reigning alone, now imbue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witnesses of your want of filial tenderness." If these words checked Caracalla, yet he did not show himself concerned, and Severus, worn out with infirmities which the gout and the uneasiness of his mind increased, soon after died, exclaiming he

which they had violated. The great offices of the state, which had before his reign been exposed to sale, and occupied by favourites, were now bestowed upon merit, and Alexander could boast that all his officers were men of trust and abilities. He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets; and in the public schools which his liberality and the desire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleasure and satisfaction the eloquent speeches and declamations of his subjects. The provinces were well supplied with provisions, and Rome was embellished with many stately buildings and magnificent porticoes. Alex. vit.—Herodian—Zosim.—Victor.—Flavius Valerius, a native of Illyricum, nominated Cæsar by Galerius. He was put to death by Maximianus, A.D. 307.—Julius, a governor of Britain under Adrian.—A general of Valens.—Libius, a man proclaimed emperor of the west, at Ravenna, after the death of Majorianus. He was soon after poisoned.—Lucius Cornelius, a Latin poet in the age of Augustus, for some time employed in the judicial proceedings of the forum.—Cassius, an orator banished into the island of Crete by Augustus, for his illiberal language. He was banished 17 years, and died in Seriphos. He is commended as an able orator, yet declaiming with more warmth than prudence. His writings were destroyed by order of the senate. Suet. in Oct.—Quint.—Sulpitius, an ecclesiastical historian, who died A.D. 420. The best of his works is his Historia Sacra, from the creation of the world to the consulship of Stilicho, of which the style is elegant, and superior to that of the age in which he lived. The best edition is in 2 vols. 4to. Pataxii, 1741.—An officer under the emperor Julian.—Aquilus, a native of Spain, who wrote an account of his own life in the reign of the emperor Valens.—An officer of Valentinian, &c.—A prefect of Rome, &c.—A celebrated architect employed in building Nero's golden palace at Rome after the burning of that city.—A mountain of Italy, near the Fabaris. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 713.

Sevo, a ridge of mountains between Norway and Sweden, now called Fjell, or Dovre. Plin. 4, c. 15.

Seuthes, a man who dethroned his monarch, &c.—A friend of Perdiccas, one of Alexander's generals.—A Thracian king, who encouraged his countrymen to revolt, &c. This name is common to several of the Thracian princes.

Sextia, a woman celebrated for her virtue and her constancy, put to death by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 10.

Sextia Licinia lex, de Magistratibus, by C. Licinius and L. Sextius the tribunes, A.U.C. 386. It ordained that one of the consuls should be elected from among the plebeians.—Another, de religione, by the same, A.U.C. 385. It enacted that a decemvirate should be chosen from the patricians and plebeians instead of the decemviri sacris faciundis.

Sextius Aquæ, now Aix, a place of Cisalpine Gaul, where the Cimbri were defeated by Marius. It was built by C. Sextius, and is famous for its cold and hot springs. Liv. 61.—Vell. Patere. 1, c. 15.

Sextilla, the wife of Vitellius. She became mother of two children. Suet. in Vit.—Another in the same family. Tacit. H. 2, c. 64.

Sextilius, a governor of Africa, who ordered

Marius, when he landed there, to depart immediately from his province. Marius heard this with some concern, and said to the messengers, "Go and tell your master that you have seen the exiled Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Plut. in Mar.—A Roman preceptor, who was seized and carried away by pirates, &c.—One of the officers of Lucullus.—Mæna, a poet. Vid. Mæna.—An officer sent to Germany, &c. Tacit. H. 3, c. 7.

Sextius, a lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul.—A seditious tribune in the first ages of the republic.—Lucius was remarkable for his friendship with Brutus; he gained the confidence of Augustus, and was consul. Horace, who was in the number of his friends, dedicated 1, od. 4, to him.—The first plebeian consul.—A dictator.—One of the sons of Tarquin. Vid. Tarquinus.

Sextus, a prænomén given to the sixth son of a family.—A son of Pompey the Great. Vid. Pompeius.—A stoic philosopher, born at Cheronæa in Bœotia. Some suppose that he was Plutarch's nephew. He was preceptor to M. Aurelius and L. Verus.—A governor of Syria.—A philosopher in the age of Antoninus. He was one of the followers of the doctrines of Pyrrho. Some of his works are still extant. The best edition of the treatise of Sextus Pompeius Festus, de verborum significatiõne, is that of Amst. 10, 1669.

Sibini, a people near the Suevi.

Siburtius, a satrap of Arachosia, in the age of Alexander, &c.

Sibyllæ, certain women inspired by heaven, who flourished in different parts of the world. Their number is unknown. Plato speaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Ælian of four, and Varro of 10, an opinion which is universally adopted by the learned. These 10 Sibyls generally resided in the following places: Persia, Libya, Delphi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythraea, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpessa on the Hellespont, Ancyra in Phrygia, and Tiburtus. The most celebrated of the Sibyls is that of Cumæ in Italy, whom some have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Phemonoe, and Deiphobe. It is said that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that, to make her sensible of his passion, he offered to give her whatever she should ask. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to ask for the enjoyment of the health, vigour, and bloom, of which she was then in possession. The god granted her her request, but she refused to gratify the passion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after she became old and decrepit, her form decayed, and melancholy paleness and haggard looks succeeded to bloom and cheerfulness. She had already lived about 700 years when Æneas came to Italy, and, as some have imagined, she had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of sand which she had in her hand. She gave Æneas instructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was usual for the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in such as consulted her to take up those leaves before they were dispersed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehensible. According to the most authentic historians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin II., with nine volumes, which she offered to sell for a very high price. The monarch disregarded her, and she immediately disappeared, and soon after returned, when she had burned three of the volumes. She asked the same price for the remaining six books; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, she burned three more, and still persisted in demanding the same sum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour astonished Tarquin; he bought the books, and the Sibyl instantly vanished, and never after appeared to the world. These books were preserved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verses. A college of priests was appointed to have the care of them; and such reverence did the Romans entertain for these prophetic books, that they were consulted with the greatest solemnity, and only when the state seemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, the Sibylline verses, which were deposited there, perished in the conflagration; and to repair the loss which the republic seemed to have sustained, commissioners were immediately sent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verses could be found of the inspired writings of the Sibyls. The fate of the Sibylline verses, which were collected after the conflagration of the capitol, is unknown. There are now eight books of Sibylline verses extant, but they are universally reckoned spurious. They speak so plainly of our Saviour, of his sufferings, and of his death, as even to surpass far the sublime prediction of Isaiah in description, and therefore from this very circumstance, it is evident that they were composed in the second century, by some of the followers of christianity, who wished to convince the heathens of their error, by assisting the cause of truth with the arms of pious artifice. The word Sibyl seems to be derived from σιωβη, Koïce for Διωβη, Jewis, and βουλη, consilium. Plat. in Phæd.—Ælian. V. H. 12. c. 35.—Paus. 10. c. 12, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 14. v. 709 & 140.—Virg. Æn. 3. v. 445. l. 6. v. 36.—Lucan. 1. v. 564.—Plin. 13. c. 13.—Flor. 4. c. 1.—Sallust.—Cic. Catil. 3.—Val. Max. 1. c. 1. l. 8. c. 15, &c.

Sica, a man who showed much attention to Cicero in his banishment. Some suppose that he is the same as the Vibius Siculus mentioned by Plat. in Cic.—Cic. ad Attic. 8. ep. 12. Ad Div. 14. c. 4, 15.

Sicambri, or Sicambria, a people of Germany, conquered by the Romans. They revolted against Augustus, who marched against them, but did not totally reduce them. Drusus conquered them, and they were carried away from their native country to inhabit some of the more westerly provinces of Gaul. Dio. 54.—Strab. 4.—Horat. 4. od. 2. v. 36. od. 14. v. 51.—Tacit. 2. Ann. 26.

Sicambria, the country of the Sicambri, formed the modern provinces of Guelderland. Claud. in Eutrop. 1. v. 383.

Sicani, a people of Spain, who left their native country and passed into Italy, and afterwards into Sicily, which they called Sicania. They inhabited the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, where they built some cities and villages. Some reckoned them the next inhabitants of the island after the Cyclops. They were afterwards driven from their ancient possessions by the Siculi, and retired into the western parts of the island. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Ovid. Met. 5 & 13.—Virg. Ecl. 10. Æn. 7. v. 795.—Diod. 5.—Horat. ep. 17. v. 32.

Sicānia and Sicānia, an ancient name of Italy, which it received from the Sicani, or from Sicanus their king, or from Sicanus, a small river in Spain, in the territory where they lived, as some suppose. The name was more generally given to Sicily. Vid. Sicani.

Sicōlis (Sicēlides, plur.), an epithet applied to the inhabitants of Sicily. The Muses are called Sicelides by Virgil, because Theocritus was a native of Sicily, whom the Latin poet, as a writer of Bucolic poetry, professed to imitate. Virg. Ecl. 4.

Sichæus, called also Sicharbas and Acerbas, was a priest of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Piisthenes. He married Elisa the daughter of Belus, and sister to king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was so extremely rich, that his brother-in-law murdered him to obtain his possessions. This murder Pygmalion concealed from his sister Dido; and he amused her by telling her that her husband had gone upon an affair of importance, and that he would soon return. This would have perhaps succeeded had not the shades of Sichæus appeared to Dido, and related to her the cruelty of Pygmalion, and advised her to fly from Tyre, after she had previously secured some treasures, which, as he mentioned, were concealed in an obscure and unknown place. According to Justin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Virg. Æn. 1. v. 347, &c.—Paterc. 1. c. 6.—Justin. 18. c. 4.

Sicilia, the largest and most celebrated island in the Mediterranean sea, at the bottom of Italy. It was anciently called Sicania, Trinacria, and Triguetra. It is of a triangular form, and has three celebrated promontories, one looking towards Africa, called Lilybæum; Pachynum looking towards Greece; and Pelorum towards Italy. Sicily is about 600 miles in circumference, celebrated for its fertility, so much that it was called one of the granaries of Rome, and Pliny says that it rewards the husbandman an hundredfold. Its most famous cities were Syracuse, Messina, Leontini, Lilybæum, Agrigentum, Gela, Drepanum, Eryx, &c. The highest and most famous mountain in the island is Ætna, whose frequent eruptions are dangerous, and often fatal to the country and its inhabitants, from which circumstance the ancients supposed that the forges of Vulcan and the Cyclops were placed there. The poets feign that the Cyclops were the original inhabitants of this island, and that after them it came into the possession of the Sicani, a people of Spain, and at last of the Siculi, a nation of Italy. Vid. Siculi. The plains of Ætna are well known for their excellent honey; and, according to Diodorus, the hounds lost their scent in hunting on account of the many odoriferous plants that profusely perfumed the air. Ceres and Proserpine were the chief deities of the place, and it was there, according to poetical tradition, that the latter was carried away by Pluto. The Phœnicians and Greeks settled some colonies there, and at last the Carthaginians became masters of the whole island till they were dispossessed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars. Some authors suppose that Sicily was originally joined to the continent, and that it was separated from Italy by an earthquake, and that the straits of the Charybdis were of luxury. The inhabitants of Sicily were so fond of luxury, that Sicula mensæ became proverbial. The rights of citizens of Rome were extended to them by At.

Antony. Cic. 14. Att. 12. Verr. 2, c. 13.—Homer. Od. 9. &c.—Justin. 4, c. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 414. &c.—Stat. 14, v. 11; &c.—Plin. 3, c. 8, &c.—The island of Naxos in the Ægean was called Little Sicily on account of its fruitfulness.

S. Sicius Dentatus, a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valour and the honours he obtained in the field of battle, during the period of 40 years, in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was present in 121 battles: he obtained 14 civic crowns, three mural crowns, eight crowns of gold, 83 golden collars, 60 bracelets, 18 lances, 23 horses with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon services. He could show the scars of 45 wounds, which he had received all in his breast, particularly in opposing the Sabines when they took the Capitol. The popularity of Sicius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wished to make himself absolute at Rome, and therefore, to remove him from the capital, he sent him to the army, by which, soon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicius killed 15, and wounded 30; and, according to Dionysius, the surviving number had recourse to artifice to overpower him, by killing him with a shower of stones and darts thrown at a distance, about 405 years before the christian era. For his uncommon courage Sicius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Dionys. 8.—Vellutus, one of the first tribunes in Rome. He raised cabals against Coriolanus, and was one of his accusers. Plut. in Cor.—Sabinus, a Roman general who defeated the Volsci.

Sicinus, a man privately sent by Themistocles to deceive Xerxes, and to advise him to attack the combined forces of the Greeks. He had been preceptor to Themistocles. Plut.—An island, &c.

Sicorus, now Segre, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and falling into the Iberus, a little above its mouth. It was near this city that J. Caesar conquered Afranius and Petreius, the partisans of Pompey. Lucan. 4, v. 14, 130, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 3.

Siculi, a people of Italy, driven from their possessions by the Opici. They fled into Sicania, or Sicily, where they settled in the territories which the Sicani inhabited. They soon extended their borders, and after they had conquered their neighbours the Sicani, they gave their name to the island. This, as some suppose, happened about 300 years before Greek colonies settled in the island, or about 1059 years before the christian era. Diad. 5.—Dionys. Hal.—Strab.

Siculum fretum, the sea which separates Sicily from Italy, is 15 miles long, but in some places so narrow, that the barking of dogs can be heard from shore to shore. This strait is supposed to have been formed by an earthquake, which separated the island from the continent. Plin. 3, c. 8.

Sicyon, now Basiglio, a town of Peloponnesus, the capital of Sicyonia. It is celebrated as being the most ancient kingdom of Greece, which began B.C. 2085, and ended B.C. 1058, under a succession of monarchs of whom little is known, except the names. Agamemnon was the first king. Some time after, Agamemnon made himself master of the place, and afterwards it fell into the hands of the Heraclidae. It became very powerful in the time of the Achæan league, which it joined B.C. 251, at the persuasion of Aratus. The inhabitants of Sicyon are mentioned by some authors as dissolute and fond of luxury, hence the Sicyonian shoes, which were once very celebrated, were deemed marks of effeminacy. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Lucret. 1, v. 1118.—Liv. 32, c. 16. l. 33, c. 15.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Dem.—Paus. 2, c. 1, &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 54.—Virg. G. 2, v. 510.

Sicyonia, a province of Peloponnesus, on the bay of Corinth, of which Sicyon was the capital. It is the most eminent kingdom of Greece, and in its flourishing situation, not only its dependent states, but also the whole Peloponnesus, were called Sicyonia. The territory is said to abound with corn, wine, and olives, and also with iron mines. It produced many celebrated men, particularly artists. Vid. Sicyon.

Sido, the wife of Orion, thrown into hell by Juno, for boasting herself fairer than the goddess. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—A daughter of Belus.—A daughter of Danaus.—A town of Pamphylia. Liv. 37, c. 23.—Cic. 3, Fam. 6.

Sidoro, the stepmother of Tyro, killed by Pelias.

Sidicinium, a town of Campania, called also Teanum. Vid. Teanum. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727.

Sidon, an ancient city of Phœnicia, the capital of the country, with a famous harbour, now called Said. It is situate on the shores of the Mediterranean, at the distance of about 50 miles from Damascus and 24 from Tyre. The people of Sidon were well known for their industry, their skill in arithmetic, in astronomy, and commercial affairs, and in sea voyages. They, however, had the character of being very dishonest. Their women were peculiarly happy in working embroidery. The invention of glass, of linen, and of a beautiful purple dye, is attributed to them. The city of Sidon was taken by Ochus king of Persia, after the inhabitants had burnt themselves and the city, B.C. 351; but it was afterwards rebuilt by its inhabitants. Lucan. 3, v. 217. l. 10, v. 141.—Diad. 16.—Justin. 13, c. 10.—Plin. 36, c. 26.—Homer. Od. 15, v. 411.—Mela. 1, c. 12.

Sidonorium insulæ, islands in the Persian gulf. Strab. 16.

Sidonia, is the country of which Sidon was the capital, situate at the west of Syria, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 19.—Dido, as a native of the country, is often called Sidonia. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 80.

Sidonius Caius Sollius Apollinaris, a christian writer, born A.D. 430. He died in the 52d year of his age. There are remaining of his compositions, some letters and different poems, consisting chiefly of panegyrics on the great men of his time, written in heroic verse, and occasionally in other metre, of which the best edition is that of Labæus, Paris, 4to, 1652.—The epithet of Sidonius is applied not only to the natives of Sidon, but it is used to express the excellence of anything, especially embroidery or dyed garments. Carthage is called Sidonia urbs, because built by Sidonians. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 682.

Siena Julia, a town of Etruria. Cic. Brut. 18.—Tact. 4, Hist. 45.

Sida, now Nest-Roma, a town of Numidia, famous as the residence of Syphax. Plin. 5, c. 11.

Sigœum, or Sigœum, now cape Inchisarâ, a town of Troas, on a promontory of the same name, where the Scamander falls into the sea, extending six miles along the shore. It was near Sigœum that the greatest part of the battles between the Greeks and Trojans were fought, as Homer mentions, and there Achilles was buried. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312. l. 7, v. 294.—Joid. Met. 12, v. 71.

—Lucan, 9, v. 96a.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Strab. 13.—Dionys. Crat. 5, c. 12.

Signia, an ancient town of Latium, whose inhabitants were called Signini. The wine of Signia was used by the ancients for medicinal purposes. Martial, 13, ep. 116.—A mountain of Phrygia. Plin. 5, c. 29.

Sigovessus, a prince among the Celts, in the reign of Tarquin. Liv. 5, c. 34.

Sigyri, Siguas, or Sigynas, a nation of European Scythia, beyond the Danube. Herodot. 5, c. 9.

Sila, or Syla, a large wood in the country of the Brutii near the Apennines, abounding in much pitch. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 713.

Silena Julia, a woman at the court of Nero, remarkable for her licentiousness and impurities. She married C. Julius, by whom she was divorced.

D. Silanus, a son of T. Manlius Torquatus, accused of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himself desired to hear the complaints laid against his son, and after he had spent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced on the third day his son guilty of extortion, and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He also banished him from his presence, and so struck was the son at the severity of his father, that he hanged himself on the following night. Liv. 54.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max. 5, c. 8.—C. Junius, a consul under Tiberius, accused of extortion, and banished to the island of Cythere. Tacit.—Marcus, a lieutenant of Caesar's armies in Gaul.—The father-in-law of Caligula. Suet. Cal. 22.—A propretor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there, while Annibal was in Italy.—Turpilius, a lieutenant of Metellus against Jugurtha. He was accused by Marius, though totally innocent, and condemned by the malice of his judges.—Torquatus, a man put to death by Nero.—Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials, Silanus killed himself.—An augur in the army of the 10,000 Greeks, at their return from Cunaxa.

Silanus, a river of Picenum, rising in the Apennine mountains, and falling into the Tyrrhene sea. Its waters, as it is reported, petrified all leaves that fell into it. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 146.—Plin. 2, c. 103.—Sil. 11, 2, v. 582.

Silōni, a people on the banks of the Indus. Plin. 6, c. 20.

Silenus, a demi-god, who became the nurse, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as some suppose, son of Pan, or, according to others, of Mercury, or of Terra. Malea in Lesbos was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honours, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by some peasants in Phrygia, after he had lost his way, and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to king Midas, who received him with great attention. He detained him for 10 days, and afterwards restored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors assert that Silenus was a philosopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and assisted him by the soundness of his counsels. From this circumstance, therefore, he is often introduced speaking with all the gravity of a philosopher concerning the formation of the world, and the nature of things. The Fauns in general, and the Satyrs, are often called Sileni. Paris, 3, c. 25. 1. 6, c. 24.—Philost. 23.—Ovid. Met. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 191.—Diod. 3, &c.—*Cic. Silicoense, a river of Spain.

Silicis mons, a town near Padua.

Silis, a river of Venetia in Italy, falling into the Adriatic. Plin. 3, c. 18.

C. Silius Italicus, a Latin poet, who was originally at the bar, where he for some time distinguished himself, till he retired from Rome more particularly to consecrate his time to study. He was consul the year that Nero was murdered. Pliny has observed, that when Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Silius refused to come to Rome and congratulate him like the rest of his fellow-citizens, a neglect which was never resented by the emperor, or insolently mentioned by the poet. Silius was in possession of a house where Cicero had lived, and another in which was the tomb of Virgil, and it has been justly remarked, that he looked upon no temple with greater reverence than upon the sepulchre of the immortal poet, whose steps he followed, but whose fame he could not equal. The birthday of Virgil was yearly celebrated with unusual pomp and solemnity by Silius; and for his partiality, not only to the memory, but to the compositions of the Mantuan poet, he has been called the ape of Virgil. Silius starved himself when labouring under an imposthume which his physicians were unable to remove, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, about the 75th year of his age. There remains a poem of Italicus, on the second Punic war, divided into 17 books, greatly commended by Martial. The moderns have not been so favourable in their opinions concerning its merit. The poetry is weak and inelegant, yet the author deserves to be commended for his purity, the authenticity of his narrations, and his interesting descriptions. He has everywhere imitated Virgil, but with little success. Silius was a great collector of antiquities. His son was honoured with the consulship during his lifetime. The best editions of Italicus will be found to be Drakenborch's in 4to, Utr. 1717, and that of Cellarius, 8vo, Lips. 1695. Mart. 11, ep. 40, &c.—Caius, a man of consular dignity, greatly beloved by Messalina for his comely appearance and elegant address. Messalina obliged him to divorce his wife, that she might enjoy his company without intermission. Silius was forced to comply, though with reluctance, and he was at last put to death for the adulteries which the empress obliged him to commit. Tacit.—Suet.—Dio.—A tribune in Caesar's legions in Gaul.—A commander in Germany, put to death by Sejanus. Tacit. Ann. 5 & 4.

Silpia, a town of Spain. Liv. 28, c. 12.

Silvanus, a rural deity, son of an Italian shepherd by a goat. From this circumstance he is generally represented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was son of Picus, or, as others report, of Mars, or, according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tusculanaria, a young woman, who introduced herself into her father's bed, and became pregnant by him. The worship of Silvanus was established only in Italy, where, as some authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Evander. This deity was sometimes represented holding a cypress in his hand, because he became enamoured of a beautiful youth called Cyparissus, who was changed into a tree of the same name. Silvanus presided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. Plut. in Paroll.—Virg. Ecl. 10. G. 1, v. 20. l. 2, v. 493.—Ælian. Anim. 6, c. 42.—Ovid. Hal.—A man who murdered his wife Aponia, by throwing her down from one of the windows of her chambers.—One of those who conspired against Nero.—An officer of Constantius, who revolted and made himself emperor. He was assassinated by his soldiers.

Silyrium, a town of Apulia, now Gorgolione. Plin. 3, c. 11.—A town of Istria.

Silures, the people of South Wales in Britain.

Simbrivius, or Simbruvius, a lake of Latium, formed by the Anio. Tacit. 14, Ann. 22.

Simena, a town of Lycia near Chimera. Plin. 5, c. 27.

Simethus, or Symethus, a town and river at the east of Sicily, which served as a boundary between the territories of the people of Catania and the Leontino. In its neighbourhood the gods Palici were born. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 584.

Similæ, a grove at Rome where the orgies of Bacchus were celebrated. Liv. 30, c. 12.

Similla, one of the courtiers of Trajan, who removed from Rome into the country to enjoy peace and solitary retirement.

Simonias, a philosopher of Thebes, who wrote dialogues.—A grammarian of Rhodes.—A Macedonian suspected of conspiracy against Alexander, on account of his intimacy with Philotas. Curt. 7, c. 1.

Simo, a comic character in Terence.

Simois (entis), a river of Troas, which rises in mount Ida and falls into the Xanthus. It is celebrated by Homer and most of the ancient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. It is found to be but a small rivulet by modern travellers, and even some have disputed its existence. Homer. II.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 104. l. 3, v. 302, &c.—Ovid. Met. 31, v. 324.—Mela, 1, c. 18.

Simosius, a Trojan prince, son of Anthemion, killed by Ajax. Homer. II. 4, v. 473.

Simon, a currier of Athens, whom Socrates often visited on account of his great sagacity and genius. He collected all the information he could receive from the conversation of the philosopher, and afterwards published it with his own observations in 33 dialogues. He was the first of the disciples of Socrates who attempted to give an account of the opinions of his master concerning virtue, justice, poetry, music, honour, &c. These dialogues were extant in the age of the biographer Diogenes, who has preserved their title. Diog. 2, c. 14.—Another who wrote on rhetoric. Id.—A sculptor. Id.—The name of Simon was common among the Jews.

Simônides, a celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished 538 years B.C. His father's name was Leoprepis, or Theoprepis. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces, esteemed for their elegance and sweetness, and composed also epic poems, one on Cambyses king of Persia, &c. Simonides was universally courted by the princes of Greece and Sicily, and according to one of the fables of Phædrus, he was such a favourite of the gods, that his life was miraculously preserved in an entertainment when the roof of the house fell upon all those who were feasting. He obtained a poetical prize in the 50th year of his age, and he lived to his 90th year. The people of Syracuse, who had hospitably honoured him when alive, erected a magnificent monument to his memory. Simonides, according to some, added the four letters  $\eta, \omega, \epsilon, \psi,$  to the alphabet of the Greeks. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. According to some, the grandson of the elegiac poet of Cos was also called Simonides. He flourished a few years before the Peloponnesian war, and was the author of some books of inventions, genealogies, &c. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Phædr. 4, Fab. 21 & 24.—Horat. 2, od. 1, v. 38.—Herodot. 5, c. 107.—Cic. de Orat., &c.—Arist.—Pinaar. 15th. 2.—Catull. 1, ep. 39.—Lucian. de Macrob.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 2.

Simplicius, a Greek commentator on Aristotle, whose works were all edited in the 16th century, and the latter part of the 15th, but without a Latin version.

Simulus, an ancient poet, who wrote some verses on the Tarpeian rock. Plut. in Rom.

Simus, a king of Arcadia after Phialus. Paus. 8, c. 5.

Simyra, a town of Phœnicia. Mela, 1, c. 12.

Sinæ, a people of India called by Ptolemy the most eastern nation of the world.

Sindæ, islands in the Indian ocean, supposed to be the Nicobar islands.

Sindi, a people of European Scythia, on the Palus Mæotis. Flacc. 6, v. 86.

Singæi, a people on the confines of Macedonia and Thrace.

Singara, a city at the north of Mesopotamia, now Singar.

Singulivæ, a river of Spain falling into the Guadalquivir.

Singus, a town of Macedonia.

Sinis, a famous robber. Vid. Scinis.

Sinnaces, a Parthian of an illustrious family, who conspired against his prince, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 31.

Sinnæcha, a town of Mesopotamia, where Crassus was put to death by Surena.

Sinoo, a nymph of Arcadia, who brought up Pan.

Simon, a son of Sisyphus, who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Simon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to sacrifice one of their soldiers, to render the wind favourable to their return, and that because the lot had fallen upon him, at the instigation of Ulysses, he had fled away from their camp, not to be cruelly immolated. These false assertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Simon advised Priam to bring into his city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left behind them, and to consecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed, and Simon in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the side of the horse, from which issued a number of armed Greeks, who surprised the Trojans, and pilaged their city. *Dares Phryg.—Homer. Sinope, a daughter of the Asopus by Methron. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the border of the Euxine sea, in Asia Minor, where she gave birth to a son called Syrus. Diod. 4.—A seaport town of Asia Minor, in Pontus, now Sinab, founded or rebuilt by a colony of Milesians. It was long an independent state, till Pharnaces king of Pontus seized it. It was the capital of Pontus, under Mithridates, and was the birthplace of Diogenes the cynic philosopher. It received its name from Sinope, whom Apollo carried there. Ovid. Pont. 1, el. 3, v. 67.—Strab. 2, & 12.—Diod. 4.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—The original name of Sinue-sa.

Sinorix, a governor of Gaul, &c. Polyan. 8.

Sintica, a district of Macedonia.

Sintil, a nation of Thracians, who inhabited Lemnos, when Vulcan fell there from heaven. Homer. Il. 1, v. 594.

Sinuessa, a maritime town of Campania, originally called Sinope. It was celebrated for its hot baths and mineral waters, which cured people of insanity, and rendered women prolific. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 715.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Liv. 22, c. 13.—Mart. 6 ep. 42. l. 11, ep. 8.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

Sion, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built.

Siphnos, now Sifano, one of the Cyclades, situate at the west of Paros, 20 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or, according to modern travellers, 40. Siphnos had many excellent harbours, and produced great plenty of delicious fruit. The inhabitants were so depraved, that their licentiousness became proverbial. They, however, behaved with spirit in the Persian wars, and refused to give earth and water to the emissaries of Xerxes in token of submission. There were some gold mines in Siphnos, of which Apollo demanded a tenth part. When the inhabitants refused to continue to offer part of their gold to the god of Delphi, the island was inundated, and the mines disappeared. The air was so wholesome that many of the natives lived to their 120th year. Paus. 10, c. 11.—Herodot. 8, c. 46.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

Sipontum, Sipus, or Sopus, a maritime town in Apulia in Italy, founded by Diomedes after his return from the Trojan war. Strab. 6.—Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Sipylum and Sipylus, a town of Lydia, with a mountain of the same name near the Meander, formerly called Ceramusius. The town was destroyed by an earthquake, with 12 others in the neighbourhood, in the reign of Tiberius. Strab. 1 & 12.—Paus. 1, c. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Homer. Il. 24.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.—One of Niobe's children, killed by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Sirbo, a lake between Egypt and Palestine, now Sebaket Bardoi. Plin. 4, c. 13.

Sirēnes, sea nymphs who charmed so much with their melodious voice, that all forgot their employments to listen with more attention, and at last died for want of food. They were daughters of the Achelous by the muse Caliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpsichore. They were three in number, called Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, or, according to others, Mæolpe, Aglrophonos, and Thelxiope, or Thelxione, and they usually lived in a small island near cape Pelorus in Sicily. Some authors suppose that they were monsters, who had the form of a woman above the waist, and the rest of the body like that of a bird; or rather that the whole body was covered with feathers, and had the shape of a bird, except the head, which was that of a beautiful female. This monstrous form they had received from Ceres, who wished to punish them, because they had not assisted her daughter when carried away by Pluto. But, according to Ovid, they were so disconsolate at the rape of Proserpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might seek her in the sea as well as by land. The Sirēnes were informed by the oracle, that as soon as any persons passed by them without suffering themselves to be charmed by their sons, they should perish; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all passengers, till Ulysses, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, stopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himself to be tied to the mast of his ship, and no attention to be paid to his commands, should he wish to stay and listen to their song. This was a salutary precaution. Ulysses made signs for his companions to stop, but they were disregarded, and the fatal coast was passed with safety. Upon this artifice of Ulysses, the Sirēnes were so disappointed, that they threw themselves into the sea and perished. Some authors say that the Sirēnes challenged the Muses to a trial of skill in singing, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adversaries, with which they made themselves crowns. The place where the Sirēnes destroyed themselves was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coast of Sicily. Virgil, however, Æn. 5, v. 864, places the Sirenium Scæptis on the coast of Italy, near the island of Caprea. Some suppose that the Sirēnes were a number of lascivious women in Sicily, who prostituted themselves to strangers, and made them forget their pursuits while drowned in unlawful pleasures. The Sirēnes are often represented holding, one a lyre, a second a flute, and the third singing. Paus. 10, c. 6.—Homer. Od. 12, v. 167.—Strab. 6.—Ammian. 29, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 141.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 555. De Art. Am. 3, v. 311.—Ibid. 12, v. 33.

Sirenflass, three small rocky islands near the coast of Campania, where the Sirēnes were supposed to reside.

Siris, a town of Magna Græcia, founded by a Grecian colony after the Trojan war, at the mouth of the river of the same name. There was a battle fought near it between Pyrrhus and the Romans. Diomys. Perieg. v. 221.—The Ethiopians gave that name to the Nile before its divided streams united into one current. Plin. 5, c. 9.—A town of Pæonia in Thrace.

Sirius, or Canicula, the dog-star, whose appearance, as the ancients supposed, always caused great heat on the earth. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 141.

Sirmio, now Sermione, a peninsula in the lake Benacus, where Catullus had a villa. Carm. 29.

Sirmium, the capital of Pannonia, at the confluence of the Savus and Bacuntius, very celebrated during the reign of the Roman emperors.

Sisamnes, a judge stayed alive for his partiality, by order of Cambyzes. His skin was nailed on the benches of the other judges, to incite them to act with candour and impartiality. Herodot. 5, c. 25.

Sisapho, a Corinthian, who had murdered his brother, because he had put his children to death. Ovid. in Ib.

Sisapo, a town of Spain, famous for its vermilion mines, whose situation is not well ascertained. Plin. 33, c. 7.—Cic. Phil. 2, c. 19.

Sisola, a town of Pannonia, now Sisig.

Sisenes, a Persian deserter, who conspired against Alexander, &c. Curt. 3, c. 7.

L. Sisenna, an ancient historian among the Romans, 91 B.C. He wrote an account of the republic, of which Cicero speaks with great warmth, and also translated from the Greek the Milesian fables of Aristides. Some fragments of his compositions are quoted by different authors. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 443.—Cic. in Brut. 64 & 67.—Patere. 2, c. 9.—Corn, a Roman, who, on being reprimanded in the senate for the ill conduct and depraved manners of his wife, accused publicly Augustus of unlawful commerce with her. Dis. 54.—The family of the Corneli and Apronii received the surname of Sisenna. They are accused of intemperate loquacity in the Augustan age, by Horat. 1, sat. 7, v. 8.

Sisigambis, or Sisygambis, the mother of Darius the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great at the battle of Issus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderness and attention; he saluted her as his own mother, and what he had sternly denied to the petitions of his favourites and ministers, he often granted to the intercession of Sisygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and, indeed, she no sooner heard that he was dead, than she killed herself, unwilling to survive the loss of so generous an enemy; though she had seen, with less concern, the fall of her son's kingdom, the ruin of his subjects, and himself murdered by his servants. She had also lost, in one day, her husband and 80 of her brothers, whom Cæsar had assassinated to make himself master of the kingdom of Persia. Curt. 4, c. 9, l. 10, c. 5.

Sisimithree, a fortified place of Bactriana, 15 stadia high, 80 in circumference, and plain at the top. Alexander married Roxana there. Strab. 11.

Sisocostus, one of the friends of Alexander, entrusted with the care of the rock Aornus. Curt. 8, c. 11.

Sisyphus, a brother of Athamas and Salmoeneus, son of Æolus and Enaretta, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope the daughter of Atlas, or, according to others, of Pandæus, by whom he had several children. He built Ephyre, called afterwards Corinth, and he debauched Tyro the daughter of Salmoeneus, because he had been told by an oracle that his children by his brother's daughter would avenge the injuries which he had suffered from the malevolence of Salmoeneus. Tyro, however, as Hyginus says, destroyed the two sons whom she had by her uncle. It is reported that Sisyphus, mistrusting Autolycus, who stole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the dishonesty of his friend, he confounded and astonished the thief by selecting from his numerous flocks those bulls which, by the mark, he knew to be his own. The artifice of Sisyphus was so pleasing to Autolycus, who had now found one more cunning than himself, that he permitted him to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, whom a few days after he gave in marriage to Laertes of Ithaca. After his death, Sisyphus was condemned in hell to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal. The causes of this rigorous sentence are variously reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones on those whom he had plundered, and suffering them to expire in the most agonizing torments. Others, to the insult offered to Pluto, in chaining Death in his palace, and detaining her till Mars, at the request of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others suppose that Jupiter inflicted this punishment because he told Asopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her ravisher. The more followed opinion, however, is, that Sisyphus, on his death-bed, entreated his wife to leave his body unburied, and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received the permission of returning upon earth to punish this seeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promise of immediately returning. But he was no sooner out of the infernal regions, than he violated his engagements, and when he was at last brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to punish his want of fidelity and honour, condemned him to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the ancients. Homer. Od. 11, v. 592.—*Virg. Antony, who was born deformed, and received the name of Sisyphus, because he was endowed with genius and an excellent understanding. Horat. 1, sat. 3, v. 47.

Sitalces, one of Alexander's generals, imprisoned for his cruelty and avarice in the government of his province. Curt. 10, c. 1.—A king of Thrace, B.C. 436.

Sithnides, certain nymphs of a fountain in Megara. Paus. 1, c. 40.

Sithon, a king of Thrace.—An island in the Ægean.

Sithonia, a country of Thrace between mount Hæmus and the Danube. Sithonia is often applied to all Thrace, and thence the epithet Sithonis, so often used by the poets. It received its name from king Sithon. Horat. 1, od. 18, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 588. l. 7, v. 466. l. 13, v. 571.—Herodot. 7, c. 122.

Sitius, a Roman who assisted Cæsar in Africa with great success. He was rewarded with a province of Numidia. Sallust. Jug. 21.

Sitones, a nation of Germany, or modern Norway, according to some. Tacit. de Germ. 45.

Sittacæ, a town of Assyria. Plin. 6, c. 27.

Smaragdus, a town of Egypt on the Arabian gulf, where emeralds (smaragdus) were dug. Strab. 16.

Smonus, a river of Laconia rising in mount Taygetus, and falling into the sea near Hyppos. Paus. 3, c. 24.

Smerdis, a son of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyses. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the Magi of Persia, who was himself called Smerdis, and who greatly resembled the deceased prince, declared himself king, at the death of Cambyses. This usurpation would not, perhaps, have been known, had not he taken too many precautions to conceal it. After he had reigned for six months with universal approbation, seven noblemen of Persia conspired to dethrone him, and when this had been executed with success, they chose one of their number to reign in the usurper's place, B.C. 521. This was Darius the son of Hystaspes. Herodot. 3, c. 30.—Julian. 1, c. 9.

Smilax, a beautiful shepherdess who became enamoured of Crocus. She was changed into a flower, as also her lover. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 283.

Smilis, a statuary of Egina in the age of Dædalus. Paus. 7.

Smindyrides, a native of Sybaris, famous for his luxury. Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 24, & 12, c. 24.

Smintheus, one of the surnames of Apollo in Phrygia, where the inhabitants raised him a temple, because he had destroyed a number of rats that infested the country. These rats were called smintus, in the language of Phrygia, whence the surname. There is another story similar to this related by the Greek scholiast of Homer. Il. 1, v. 39.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 585.

Smyrna, a celebrated seaport town of Ionia in Asia Minor, built, as some suppose, by Tantalus, or, according to others, by the Æolians. It has been subject to many revolutions, and been severally in the possession of the Æolians, Ionians, Lydians, and Macedonians. Alexander, or according to Strabo, Lysimachus, rebuilt it 400 years after it had been destroyed by the Lydians. It was one of the richest and most powerful cities of Asia, and became one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy. The inhabitants were given much to luxury and indolence, but they were universally esteemed for their valour and intrepidity when called to action. Marcus Aurelius repaired it after it had been destroyed by an earthquake, about the 180th year of the christian era. Smyrna still continues to be a very commercial town. The river Meles flows near its walls. The inhabitants of Smyrna believed that Homer was born among them, and to confirm this opinion they not only paid him divine honours, but showed a place which bore the poet's name, and also had a brass coin in circulation which was called Homerium. Some suppose that it was called Smyrna from an Amazon of the same name who took possession of it. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.—Strab. 12 & 14.—Ital. 8, v. 595.—Paus. 5, c. 8.—Met. 1, c. 17.—A daughter of Thias, mother of Adonis.—An Amazon.—The name of a poem which Cinna, a Latin poet, composed in nine years, and which was worthy of admiration, according to Catullus, 94.

Smyrnessus, a Greek poet of the third century, called also Calaber. Vid. Calaber.

Soana, a river of Albania. Ptol.

Soanda, a town of Armenia.

Soanes, a people of Colchis, near Caucasus, in whose territories the rivers abound with golden sands, which the inhabitants gather in wool skins, whence, perhaps, arose the fable of the golden fleece. Strab. 11.—Plin. 33, c. 3.

Socrates, the most celebrated philosopher of all antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father Sophroniscus was a staturary, and his mother Phænarete was by profession a midwife. For some time he followed the occupation of his father, and some have mentioned the statues of the graces, admired for their simplicity and elegance, as the work of his own hands. He was called away from this meaner employment, of which, however, he never blushed, by Crito, who admired his genius and courted his friendship. Philosophy soon became the study of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that exemplary virtue which succeeding ages have ever loved and venerated. He appeared like the rest of his countrymen in the field of battle; he fought with boldness and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and disciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preservation of their lives. But the character of Socrates appears more conspicuous and dignified as a philosopher and moralist than as a warrior. He was fond of labour, he inured himself to suffer hardships, and he acquired that serenity of mind and firmness of countenance, which the most alarming dangers could never destroy, or the most sudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effects of vanity, or the wish of appearing singular. He bore injuries with patience, and the insults of malice or resentment he not only treated with content, but even received with a mind that expressed some concern, and felt compassion for the depravity of human nature. So singular and so venerable a character was admired by the most enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illustrious pupils, whom he instructed by his exemplary life, as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the god of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the aggregation of riches, was the object of his study, he was present everywhere, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Illyssus. He spoke with freedom on every subject, religious as well as civil; and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withstand the torrent of resentment, by which the Athenian generals were capitally punished for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginusæ. This independence of spirit, and that visible superiority of mind and genius over the rest of his countrymen, created many enemies to Socrates; but as his character was irreproachable, and his doctrines pure, and void of all obscurity, the voice of malice was silent. Yet Aristophanes soon undertook, at the instigation of Melitus, in his comedy of the Clouds, to ridicule the venerable character of Socrates on the stage; and when once the way was open to calumny and defamation, the fickle and licentious populace paid no reverence to the philosopher whom they had before regarded as a being of a superior order. When this had succeeded, Melitus stood forth to criminate him, together with Anytus and Lycon, and the philosopher was summoned before the tribunal of the 500. He was accused of corrupting the Athenian youth, of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks, and of ridiculing the many gods whom the Athenians worshipped; yet, false as this might appear, the accusers relied for the success of their cause upon the perjury of false witnesses, and the envy of the judges, whose ignorance would readily yield to misrepresentation, and be influenced and guided by eloquence and artifice. In this their expectations were not frustrated, and while the judges expected submission from Socrates, and that meanness of behaviour and servility of defence which distinguished criminals, the philosopher, perhaps, accelerated his own fall by the firmness of his mind, and his uncompromising integrity. Lysias, one of the most celebrated orators of the age, composed an oration in a laboured and pathetic style, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the presence of his judges. Socrates read it, but after he had praised the eloquence and the animation of the whole, he rejected it, as neither manly nor expressive of fortune, and comparing it to Scyriotic shoes, which, though fitting, were proofs of effeminacy, he observed, that a philosopher ought to be conspicuous for magnanimity and for firmness of soul. In his apology he spoke with great animation, and confessed that while others boasted that they were acquainted with everything, he himself knew nothing. The whole discourse was full of simplicity and noble grandeur, the energetic language of offended innocence. He modestly said, that what he possessed was applied for the service of the Athenians; it was his wish to make his fellow-citizens happy, and it was a duty which he performed by the special command of the gods, "whose authority," said he, emphatically to his judges, "I regard more than yours." Such language from a man who was accused of a capital crime, astonished and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned, but only by a majority of three voices; and when he was demanded, according to the spirit of the Athenian laws, to pass sentence on himself, and to mention the death he preferred, the philosopher said, "For my attempts to teach the Athenian youth justice and moderation, and render the rest of my countrymen more happy, let me be maintained at the public expense the remaining years of my life in the Prytaneum, an honour, O Athenians, which I deserve more than the victors of the Olympic games. They make their countrymen more happy in appearance, but I have made you so in reality." This exasperated the judges in the highest degree, and he was condemned to drink hemlock. Upon this he addressed the court, and more particularly the judges who had decided in his favour, in a pathetic speech. He told them that to die was a pleasure, since he was going to hold converse with the greatest heroes of antiquity; he recommended to their paternal care his defenceless children, and as he returned to prison, he exclaimed: "I go to die, you to live; but which is the best the Divinity alone can know." The solemn celebration of the Delian festivals (Vid. Delia) prevented his execution for 30 days, and during that time he was confined in the prison and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his disciples, were his constant attendants; he discoursed with them upon different subjects with all his usual cheerfulness and serenity. He reproved them for their sorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved because he was to suffer, though innocent, the philosopher replied, "Would you then have me die guilty?" With this composure he spent his last days. He continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and instructed his pupils on questions of the greatest importance; he told them his opinions in support of the immortality of the soul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent custom of suicide. He disregarded the intercession of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his escape out of prison he refused it, and asked, with his usual pleasantry, where he could escape death. "Where," says he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler, and made his escape certain, "where shall I fly, to avoid this irrevocable doom passed on all mankind?" When the hour to drink the poison was come, the executioner presented him the cup with tears in his eyes. Socrates received it with composure, and after he had made a libation to the gods, he drank it with an unaltered countenance, and a few moments after he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the uninfluenced answer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wisest of mankind. Socrates died 400 years before Christ, in the 70th year of his age. He was no sooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty; his accusers were universally despised and shunned. One suffered death, some were banished, and others, with their own hands, put an end to the life which their severity to the best of the Athenians had rendered insupportable. The actions, sayings, and opinions of Socrates have been faithfully recorded by two of the most celebrated of his pupils, Xenophon and Plato, and everything which relates to the life and circumstances of this great philosopher is now minutely known. To his poverty, his innocence, and his example, the Greeks were particularly indebted for their greatness and splendour and the learning which was universally disseminated by his pupils, gave the whole nation a consciousness of their superiority over the rest of the world, not only in the polite arts, but in the more laborious exercises, which their writings celebrated. The philosophy of Socrates forms an interesting epoch in the history of the human mind. The son of Sophroniscus denied the more abstruse inquiries and metaphysical researches of his predecessors, and by first introducing moral philosophy, he induced mankind to consider themselves, their passions, their opinions, their duties, actions, and faculties. From this it was said that the founder of the Socratic school drew philosophy down from heaven upon the earth. In his attendance upon religious worship, Socrates was himself an example; he believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a demon or invisible conductor (Vid. Dæmon), whose frequent interposition stopped him from the commission of evil, and the guilt of misconduct. This familiar spirit, however, according to some, was nothing more than a sound judgment assisted by prudence and long experience, which warned him at the approach of danger, and from a general speculation of mankind could foresee what success would attend an enterprise, or what calamities would follow an ill-managed administration. As a supporter of the immortality of the soul, he allowed the perfection of a supreme knowledge, from which he deduced the government of the universe. From the resources of experience as well as nature and observation, he perceived the indiscriminate dispensation of good and evil to mankind by the hand of Heaven, and he was convinced that none but the most inconsiderate would incur the displeasure of their Creator to avoid poverty or sickness, or gratify a sensual appetite, which must at the end harass their soul with remorse and the consciousness of guilt. From this natural view of things, he perceived the relation of one nation with another, and how much the tranquillity of civil society depended upon the proper discharge of these respective duties. The actions of men furnished materials also for his discourse; to instruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily lessons. From principles like these, which were enforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate husband, a tender parent, a warlike soldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, soon after the celebrated sects of the Platonists, the Peripatetics, the Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c., arose. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many support that the tragedies of his pupil Euripides were partly composed by him. He was naturally of a licentious disposition, and a physiognomist observed, in looking in the face of the philosopher, that his heart was the most depraved, immodest, and corrupted that ever was in the human breast. This nearly cost the satirist his life, but Socrates upbraided his disciples, who wished to punish the physiognomist, and declared that his assertions were true, but that all his vicious propensities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reason. Socrates made a poetical version of Æsop's fables, while in prison. Laert.—Xenoph.—Pluto.—Paus. 1, c. 22.—Plut. de op. Phil. &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 54. Tusc. 2, c. 41, &c.—*Val. Somias Julia, mother of the emperor Heliogabalus, was made president of a senate of women, which she had elected to decide the quarrels and the affairs of the Roman matrons. She at last provoked the people by her debaucheries, extravagance, and cruelties, and was murdered with her son and family. She was a native of Apamea; her father's name was Julius Avitus, and her mother's Masa. Her sister Julia Mamaea married the emperor Septimius Severus.

Sogdiana, a country of Asia, bounded on the north by Scythia, east by the Saccæ, south by Bactriana, and west by Margiana, and now known by the name of Zagatai, or Uzbek. The people were called Sogdiani. The capital was called Marcanda. Herodot. 3, c. 93.—Curt. 7, c. 10.

Sogdianus, a son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who murdered his elder brother, king Xerxes, to make himself master of the Persian throne. He was but seven months in possession of the crown. His brother Ochus, who reigned under the name of Darius Nothus, conspired against him, and suffocated him in a tower full of warm ashes.

Sol (the sun), was an object of veneration among the ancients. It was particularly worshipped by the Persians, under the name of Mithras; and was the Baal or Bel of the Chaldeans, the Belphegor of the Moabites, the Moloch of the Canaanites, the Osiris of the Egyptians, and the Adonis of the Syrians. The Massagetz sacrificed horses to the sun on account of their swiftness. According to some of the ancient poets, Sol and Apollo were two different persons. Apollo, however, and Phoebus and Sol, are universally supposed to be the same deity.

Solicinium, a town of Germany, now Sultz, on the Neckar.

Solinus G. Julius, a grammarian at the end of the first century, who wrote a book called Polyhistor, which is a collection of historical remarks and geographical annotations on the most celebrated places of every country. He has been called Pliny's ape, because he imitated that well-known naturalist. The last edition of the Polyhistor is that of Norimb. ex editione Salamassii. 1777.

Solis Fons, a celebrated fountain in Libya. Vid. Ammon.

Soloe, or Soli, a town of Cyprus, built on the borders of the Clarius by an Athenian colony. It was originally called Æpeta, till Solon visited Cyprus, and advised Philocyprus, one of the princes of the island, to change the situation of his capital. His advice was followed; a new town was raised in a beautiful plain, and called after the name of the Athenian philosopher. Strab. 14.—Plut. in Sol.—A town of Cilicia on the sea-coast, built by the Greeks and Rhodians. It was afterwards called Pompeipolis, from Pompey, who settled a colony of pirates there. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Dionys. Some suppose that the Greeks, who settled in either of these two towns, forgot the purity of their native language, and thence arose the term Solœismus, applied to an inelegant or improper expression.

Solœis, or Soloentia, a promontory of Libya at the extremity of mount Atlas, now cape Cantini.—A town of Sicily, between Panormus and Himera, now Solanto. Cic. Verr. 3, c. 43.—Thucyd. 6.

Solon, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was born at Salamis, and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Exechestides, one of the descendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's side he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Pisistratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philosophical and political studies, Solon travelled over the greatest part of Greece, but at his return home he was distressed with the dissensions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He might have become absolute, but he refused the dangerous office of king of Athens, and, in the capacity of lawgiver, he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poorer citizens found redress, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to seize the person of his debtor if unable to make a restoration of his money. After he had made the most salutary regulations in the state, and bound the Athenians by a solemn oath that they would faithfully observe his laws for the space of 100 years, Solon resigned the office of legislator and removed himself from Athens. He visited Egypt, and in the court of Cæsus king of Lydia he convinced the monarch of the instability of fortune, and told him, when he wished to know whether he was not the happiest of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian, who had always seen his country in a flourishing state, who had seen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himself fallen in defence of his country, was more entitled to happiness than the possessor of riches and the master of empires. After 10 years' absence Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greatest part of his regulations disregarded by the factious spirit of his countrymen, and the usurpation of Pisistratus. Not to be longer a spectator of the divisions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the 80th year of his age, 558 years before the christian era. The salutary consequences of the laws of Solon can be discovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they flourished in full vigour, and Cicero, who was himself a witness of their benign influence, passes the highest encomiums upon the legislator, whose superior wisdom framed such a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorer citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four classes, three of which were permitted to discharge the most important offices and magistracies of the state, and the last to give their opinion in the assemblies, but not have a share in the distinctions and honours of their superiors, the legislator gave the populace a privilege which, though at first small and inconsiderable, soon rendered them masters of the republic, and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, he increased the authority of the members, and permitted them yearly to inquire how every citizen maintained himself, and to punish such as lived in idleness, and were not employed in some honourable and lucrative profession. He also regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges at 400. The sanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that against murder, and the punishment denounced against every offender was proportioned to his crime; but Solon made no law against parricide or sacrilege. The former of these crimes, he said, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, because the history of Athens had never furnished a single instance. Such as had died in the service of their country were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expense; but such as had squandered away their estates, such as refused to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and distress of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated; it became a union of affection and tenderness, and no longer a mercenary contract. To speak with ill language against the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legislator wished that the character of his fellow-citizens should be freed from the aspersions of malevolence and envy. A person that had no children was permitted to dispose of his estates as he pleased, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dress or expenses. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime, and the friend and associate of lewdness and debauchery was never permitted to speak in public, for, as the philosopher observed, a man who has no shame, is not capable of being intrusted with the people. These celebrated laws were engraven on several tables, and that they might be better known and more familiar to the Athenians, they were written in verse. The indignation which Solon expressed on seeing the tragical representations of Thespis, is well known, and he sternly observed, that if falsehood and fiction were tolerated on the stage, they would soon find their way among the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Pisistratus; but this seems to be false, as the legislator refused to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow-citizens were trampled upon by the usurpation of a tyrant. *Vid. Solva, a town of Noricum.

Solymsa and Solymsæ, a town of Lycia. The inhabitants, called Solymsi, were anciently called Milyadsæ, and afterwards Ternilli and Lycians. Sarpedon settled among them. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 6.—Plin. 5, c. 27 & 29.—An ancient name of Jerusalem. Vid. Hierosolymsa. Jyr. 6, v. 543.

Somnus, son of Erebus and Nox, was one of the infernal deities, and presided over sleep. His palace, according to some mythologists, is a dark cave where the sun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and somniferous herbs. The god himself is represented as asleep on a bed of feathers with black curtains. The dreams stand by him, and Morpheus, as his principal minister, watches to prevent the noise from awaking him. The Lacedæmonians always placed the image of Somnus near that of death. Hæcid. Theog.—Homer. Il. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 803.—Ovid. Met. 11.

Sonchis, an Egyptian priest, in the age of Solon. It was he who told that celebrated philosopher a number of traditions, particularly about the Atlantic isles, which he represented as more extensive than the continent of Africa and Asia united. This island disappeared, it is said, in one day and one night. Plut. in Sol., &c.

Sontistes, a people in Gaul.

Sopæter, a philosopher of Apamea, in the age of the emperor Constantine. He was one of the disciples of Iamblicus, and after his death he was at the head of the Platonic philosophers.

Sophax, a son of Hercules and Tinga the widow of Anteus, who founded the kingdom of Tingis, in Mauritania, and from whom were descended Diodorus, and Juba king of Mauritania. Strab. 3.

Sophène, a country of Armenia, on the borders of Mesopotamia. Lucan. 2, v. 593.

Sophocles, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, educated in the school of Æschylus. He distinguished himself not only as a poet, but also as a statesman. He commanded the Athenian armies, and in several battles he shared the supreme command with Pericles, and exercised the office of archon with credit and honour. The first appearance of Sophocles as a poet reflects great honour on his abilities. The Athenians had taken the island of Scyros, and to celebrate that memorable event, a yearly contest for tragedy was instituted. Sophocles on this occasion obtained the prize over many competitors, in the number of whom was Æschylus, his friend and his master. This success contributed to encourage the poet; he wrote for the stage with applause, and obtained the poetical prize 20 different times. Sophocles was the rival of Euripides for public praise; they divided the applause of the populace, and while the former surpassed in the sublime and majestic, the other was not inferior in the tender and pathetic. The Athenians were pleased with their contention, and as the theatre was at that time an object of importance and magnitude, and deemed an essential and most magnificent part of the religious worship, each had his admirers and adherents; but the two poets, captivated at last by popular applause, gave way to jealousy and rivalry. Of 120 tragedies which Sophocles composed, only seven are extant: Ajax, Electra, CEdipus the tyrant, Antigone, the Trachinians, Philoctetes, and CEdipus at Colonus. The ingratitude of the children of Sophocles is well known. They wished to become immediate masters of their father's possessions, and therefore, tired of his long life, they accused him before the Areopagus of insanity. The only defence the poet made was to read his tragedy of CEdipus at Colonus, which he had lately finished, and then he asked his judges, whether the author of such a performance could be taxed with insanity? The father upon this was acquitted, and the children returned home covered with shame and confusion. Sophocles died in the 91st year of his age, 406 years before Christ, through excess of joy, as some authors report, of having obtained a poetical prize at the Olympic games. Athenæus has accused Sophocles of licentiousness and debauchery, particularly when he commanded the armies of Athens. The best editions of Sophocles are those of Cappel-ronier, 2 vols. 4to, Paris, 1780; of Glasgow, 2 vols. 8mo, 1745; of Geneva, 4to, 1603; and that by Brunck, 4 vols. 8vo, 1786. Cic. in Cat. de Div. 1, c. 25.—Plut. in Cim., &c.—Quintil. 1, c. 10. l. 10, c. 1.—Val. Max. 8, c. 7. l. 9, c. 12.—Plin. 7, c. 53.—Athen. 10, &c.

Sophonisba, a daughter of Asdrubal the Carthaginian, celebrated for her beauty. She married Syphax, a prince of Numidia, and when her husband was conquered by the Romans and Masinissa, she fell a captive into the hands of the enemy. Masinissa became enamoured of her, and married her. This behaviour displeased the Romans; and Scipio, who at that time had the command of the armies of the republic in Africa, rebuked the monarch severely, and desired him to part with Sophonisba. This was an arduous task for Masinissa, yet he dreaded the Romans. He entered Sophonisba's tent with tears in his eyes, and told her that, as he could not deliver her from captivity and the jealousy of the Romans, he recommended her, as the strongest pledge of his love and affection for her person, to die like the daughter of Asdrubal. Sophonisba obeyed, and drank, with unusual composure and serenity, the cup of poison which Masinissa sent to her, about 203 years before Christ. Liv. 30, c. 12, &c.—Sallust. de Jug.—Justin.

Sophon, a comic poet of Syracuse, son of Agathocles and Damasyllis. His compositions were so universally esteemed, that Plato is said to have read them with rapture. Val. Max. 8, c. 7.—Quintil. 1, c. 10.

Sophonisus, the father of Socrates.
Sophonria, a Roman lady whom Maxentius took by force from her husband's house, and married. Sophronia killed herself when she saw that her affections were abused by the tyrant.

Sophrone, a daughter of Dionysius by Dion's sister.

Sopilis, the father of Hermolaus. Curt. 8, c. 7.—A painter in Cicero's age. Cic. Att. 4, ep. 16.

Soracte and Soracte, a mountain of Etruria, near the Tiber, seen from Rome, at the distance of 20 miles. It was sacred to Apollo, who is from thence surnamed Soractis; and it is said that the priests of the god could walk over burning coals without hurting themselves. There was, as some report, a fountain on mount Soracte, whose waters boiled at sunrise, and instantly killed all such birds as drank of them. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 93. l. 7, c. 1.—Horat. 1, ad. 9.—*Virg. Sorex, a favourite of Sylla, and the companion of his debaucheries. Plut.

Sorge, a daughter of Æneus king of Calydon, by Æthea daughter of Thestius. She married Andromon, and was mother of Oxilus. Apollod. 1 & 2.

Soritia, a town of Spain.

Sosia Galla, a woman at the court of Tiberius, banished, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 19.

Sosibius, a grammarian of Laconia, B.C. 255. He was a great favourite of Ptolemy Philopator, and advised him to murder his brother, and the queen his wife, called Arsinoe. He lived to a great age, and was on that account called Polychronos. He was afterwards permitted to retire from the court, and spend the rest of his days in peace and tranquillity after he had disgraced the name of minister by the most abominable crimes, and the murder of many of the royal family. His son, of the same name, was preceptor to king Ptolemy Epiphanes.—The preceptor of Britannicus the son of Claudius. Tacit. A. 11, c. 1.

Sosicles, a Greek who behaved with great valour when Xerxes invaded Greece.

Sosicrætes, a noble senator among the Achæans, put to death because he wished his countrymen to make peace with the Romans.

Sosigenes, an Egyptian mathematician, who assisted J. Cæsar in regulating the Roman calendar. Suet.—Diod.—Plin. 18, c. 25.—A commander of the fleet of Eumenes. Polyæn. 4.—A friend of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Sosii, celebrated booksellers at Rome, in the age of Horace, 1, ep. 20, v. 2.

Sosilus, a Lacedæmonian in the age of Annibal. He lived in great intimacy with the Carthaginian, taught him Greek, and wrote the history of his life. C. Nep. in Annib.

Sospiter, a grammarian in the reign of Honorius. He published five books of observations on grammar.—A Syracusan magistrate.—A general of Philip king of Macedonia.

Sosis, a seditious Syracusan, who raised tumults against Dion. When accused before the people he saved himself by flight, and thus escaped a capital punishment.

Sosistratus, a tyrant of Syracuse, in the age of Agathocles. He invited Pyrrhus into Sicily, and afterwards revolted from him. He was at last removed by Hermocrates. Polyæn. 1.—Another tyrant. Id.

Sospis, a consul who followed the interest of Mark Antony.—A governor of Syria.—A Roman consular dignity, to whom Plutarch dedicated his Lives.

Sophta, a surname of Juno in Latium. Her most famous temple was at Lanuvium. She had also two at Rome, and her statue was covered with a goat-skin, with a buckler, &c. Liv. 3, 6, 8, &c.—Festus de V. Sig.

Sosthènes, a general of Macedonia, who flourished B.C. 281. He defeated the Gauls under Brennus, and was killed in the battle. Justin. 24, c. 5.—A native of Cnidus, who wrote a history of Iberia. Plut.

Sostratus, a friend of Hermolaus, put to death for conspiring against Alexander. Curt. 1, c. 6.—A grammarian in the age of Augustus. He was Strabo's preceptor. Strab. 14.—A statuary.—An architect of Cnidus, B.C. 284, who built the white tower of Pharos, in the bay of Alexandria. He inscribed his name upon it. Vid. Pharos. Strab. 17.—Plin. 30, c. 12.—A priest of Venus at Paphos, among the favourites of Vespasian. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 7.—A favourite of Hercules.—A Greek historian, who wrote an account of Etruria.—A poet, who wrote a poem on the expedition of Xerxes into Greece. Juv. 10, v. 178.

Sotades, an athlete. A Greek poet of Thrace. He wrote verses against Philadelphus Ptolemy, for which he was thrown into the sea in a cage of lead. He was called Cinadus, not only because he was addicted to the abominable crime which the surname indicates, but because he wrote a poem in commendation of it. Some suppose, that instead of the word Socratius in the 2nd satire, verse the roth, of Juvenal, the word Sotadicos should be inserted, as the poet Sotades, and not the philosopher Socrates, deserved the appellation of Cinædas. Obscene verses were generally called Sotadea carmina from him. They could be turned and read different ways without losing their measure or sense, such as the following, which can be read backwards:

*Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor.
Si bene te tua laus taxat, sua laute tenetis.
Sic medere pede, eide, perede melos.*

Quintil. 1, c. 8. l. 9, c. 4.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.—Auson. ep. 17, v. 29.

Soter, a surname of the first Ptolemy.—It was also common to other monarchs.

Soteria, days appointed for thanksgivings and the offerings of sacrifices for deliverance from danger. One of these was observed at Sicione, to commemorate the deliverance of that city from the hands of the Macedonians, by Aratus.

Soterious, a poet and historian in the age of Diocletian. He wrote a panegyric on that emperor, as also a life of Apollonius Thyaneus. His works, greatly esteemed, are now lost, except some few fragments preserved by the scholiast of Lycophron.

Sothis, an Egyptian name of the constellation called Sirius, which received divine honours in that country.

Sotiates, a people of Gaul, conquered by Cæsar. Cæs. Bell. G. 3, c. 20 & 21.

Sotion, a grammarian and philosopher of Alexandria, preceptor to Seneca. Senec. ep. 49 & 58.

Sotius, a philosopher in the reign of Tiberius.

Sous, a king of Sparta, who made himself known by his valour, &c.

Sozomen, an ecclesiastical historian, who died 450 A. D. His history extends from the year 124 to 490, and is dedicated to Theodosius the younger, being written in a style of elegance and mediocrity. The best edition is that of Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

Spaco, the name of Cyrus. Justin. 1, c. 4.—Herodot.

Sparta, a celebrated city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, situate on the Eurotas, at the distance of about 30 miles from its mouth. It received its name from Sparta the daughter of Eurotas, who married Lacedæmon. It was also called Lacedæmon. Vid. Lacedæmon.

Spartacus, a king of Pontus.—Another, king of Bosphorus, who died B. C. 433. His son and successor of the same name died B. C. 407.—Another, who died 284 B. C.—A Thracian shepherd, celebrated for his abilities and the victories which he obtained over the Romans. Being one of the gladiators who were kept at Capua in the house of Lentulus, he escaped from the place of his confinement, with 30 of his companions, and took up arms against the Romans. He soon found himself with 10,000 men equally resolute with himself, and though at first obliged to hide himself in the woods and solitary retreats of Campania, he soon laid waste the country; and when his followers were increased by additional numbers, and better disciplined, and more completely armed, he attacked the Roman generals in the field of battle. Two consuls and other officers were defeated with much loss, and Spartacus, superior in counsel and abilities, appeared more terrible, though often deserted by his feeble attendants. Crassus was sent against him, but this celebrated general at first despaired of success. A bloody battle was fought, in which, at last, the gladiators were defeated. Spartacus behaved with great valour: when wounded in the leg, he fought on his knees, covering himself with his buckler in one hand, and using his sword with the other; and when at last he fell, he fell upon a heap of Romans, whom he had sacrificed to his fury, B. C. 71. In this battle no less than 40,000 of the rebels were slain, and the war totally finished. Flor. 3, c. 20.—Liv. 95.—Eutrop. 6, c. 2.—Plut. in Crass.—Patere. 7, c. 30.—Appian.

Spartæ, or Spartæ, a name given to those men who sprang from the dragon's teeth which Cadmus sowed. They all destroyed one another, except five, who survived and assisted Cadmus in building Thebes.

Spartani, or Spartiatæ, the inhabitants of Sparta. Vid. Sparta, Lacedæmon.

Spartianus Ælius, a Latin historian who wrote the lives of all the Roman emperors, from J. Cæsar to Diocletian. He dedicated them to Diocletian, to whom, according to some, he was related. Of these compositions only the life of Adrian, Verus, Pridius Julianus, Septimus Severus, Caracalla, and Geta, are extant, published among the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ. Spartianus is not esteemed as an historian or biographer.

Spechia, an ancient name of the island of Cyprus.

Spentius, a Campanian deserter who rebelled against the Romans and raised tumults, and made war against Amilcar the Carthaginian general.

Spendon, a poet of Lacedæmon.

Sperchia, a town of Thessaly, on the banks of the Sperchius. Plot.

Sperchius, a river of Thessaly, rising on mount Ceta, and falling into the sea in the bay of Malia, near Anticyra. The name is supposed to be derived from its rapidity (σπερχειν, festinare). Peleus vowed to the god of this river the hair of his son Achilles, if ever he returned safe from the Trojan war. Herodot. 7, c. 198.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 23, v. 144.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 557. l. 2, v. 250. l. 7, v. 230.

Spermatophagi, a people who lived in the extremest parts of Egypt. They fed upon the fruits that fell from the trees.

Spensippus, an Athenian philosopher, nephew, as also successor, of Plato. His father's name was Eurymedon, and his mother's Potone. He presided in Plato's school for eight years, and disgraced himself by his extravagance and debauchery. Plato attempted to check him, but to no purpose. He died of the lousy sickness, or killed himself, according to some accounts, B. C. 330. Plut. in Lys.—Diog. 4.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.

Sphaoteris, three small islands opposite Pylos, on the coast of Messenia. They are also called Sphagia.

Sphærus, an arm-bearer of Pelops son of Tantalus. He was buried in a small island near the isthmus of Corinth, which, from him, was called Sphæria. Paus. 5, c. 10.—A Greek philosopher, disciple to Zeno of Cyprus, 243 B. C. He came to Sparta in the age of Agis and Cleomenes, and opened a school there. Plut. in Ag.—Diod.

Sphinx, a monster which had the head and breasts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and a human voice. It sprang from the union of Orthos with the Chimæra, or of Typhon with Echidna. The Sphinx had been sent into the neighbourhood of Thebes by Juno, who wished to punish the family of Cadmus, which she persecuted with immortal hatred, and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms by proposing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midst of their consternation the Thebans were told by the oracle, that the Sphinx would destroy herself as soon as one of the enigmas she proposed was explained. In this enigma she wished to know what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Upon this, Creon king of Thebes promised his crown and his sister Jocasta in marriage to him who could deliver his country from the monster by a successful explanation of the enigma. It was at last happily explained by Œdipus, who observed that man walked on his hands and feet when young, or in the morning of life, at the noon of life he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he supported his infirmities upon a stick. Vid. Œdipus. The Sphinx no sooner heard this explanation than she dashed her head against a rock, and immediately expired. Some mythologists wish to unridle the fabulous traditions about the Sphinx, by the supposition that one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, infested the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, because she had been refused a part of her father's possessions. The lion's paw expressed, as they observe, her cruelty, the body of the dog her lasciviousness, her enigmas the snares she laid for strangers and travellers, and her wings the despatch she used in her expeditions. Plut.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 326.—Hygin. Fab. 68.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. in lb. 378.—Strab. 9.—Sophocl. in Œdip. Spart.

Sphodrias, a Tyrant who, at the instigation of Cleombrotus, attempted to seize the Piræus. Diod. 15.

Sphragidium, a retired cave on mount Cithæron in Bœotia. The nymphs of the place, called Sphragiades, were yearly honoured with a sacrifice by the Athenians, by order of the oracle of Delphi, because they had lost few men at the battle of Platæa. Plin. 35, c. 6.—Paus. 9, c. 3.—Plut. in Arist.

Spicillus, a favourite of Nero. He refused to assassinate his master, for which he was put to death in a cruel manner.

Spina, now Primaso, a town on the most southern mouth of the Po. Plin. 3, c. 16.

Spintharus, a Corinthian architect, who built Apollo's temple at Delphi. Paus. 10, c. 5.—A freedman of Cicero. Ad Att. 13, ep. 25.

Spinther, a Roman consul. He was one of Pompey's friends, and accompanied him at the battle of Pharsalia, where he betrayed his meanness by being too confident of victory, and contending for the possession of Cæsar's offices and gardens before the action. Plut.

Spio, one of the Nereides. Ving. Æn. 5, v. 26.

Spitamenes, one of the officers of king Darius, who conspired against the murderer Bessus, and delivered him to Alexander. Curt. 7, c. 5.

Sphthobates, a satrap of Ionia, son-in-law of Darius. He was killed at the battle of the Granicus. Diod. 17.

Spithridates, a Persian killed by Clitus as he was going to strike Alexander dead.—A Persian satrap in the age of Lysander.

Spoletium, now Spoleto, a town of Umbria, which bravely withstood Annibal while he was in Italy. The people were called Spolitani. Water is conveyed to the town from a neighbouring fountain by an aqueduct of such a great height, that in one place the top is raised above the foundation 230 yards. An inscription over the gates still commemorates the defeat of Annibal. Mar. 13, ep. 20.

Spórades, a number of islands in the Ægean sea. They received their name ἀσπεργω, spargo, because they are scattered in the sea at some distance from Delos, and in the neighbourhood of Crete. Those islands that are contiguous to Delos, and that encircle it, are called Cyclades. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 2.

Spurina, a mathematician and astrologer, who told J. Cæsar to beware of the ides of March. As he went to the senate-house on the morning of the ides, Cæsar said to Spurina, "The ides are at last come." "Yes," replied Spurina, "but not yet past," Cæsar was murdered a few moments after. Suet. in Cæs. 81.—Val. Max. 1 & 8.

Spurius, a prænomen common to many of the Romans.—One of Cæsar's murderers.—Latius, a Roman who defended the bridge over the Tiber against Porsenna's army.—A friend of Otho, &c.

L. Staberius, a friend of Pompey, set over Apollonia, which he was obliged to yield to Cæsar, because the inhabitants favoured his cause. Cæsar, B. G.—An avacious fellow, who wished it to be known that he was uncommonly rich. Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 89.

Stabie, a maritime town of Campania on the bay of Puteoli, destroyed by Sylla, and converted into a villa, whither Pliny endeavoured to escape from the eruption of Vesuvius, in which he perished. Plin. 3, c. 5, ep. 6, c. 16.

Stabulum, a place in the Pyrenees, where a communication was open from Gaul into Spain.

Stagira, a town on the borders of Macedonia, near the bay into which the Strymon discharges itself, at the south of Amphipolis; founded 665 years before Christ. Aristotle was born there, from which circumstance he is called Stagirites. Thucyd. 4.—Paus. 6, c. 4.—Laert. in Sol.—Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 46.

Staius, an unprincipled wretch, in Nero's age, who murdered all his relations. Plin. 2, v. 19.

Stalonus, a senator who sat as judge in the trial of Cluentius, &c. Cic. pro Cluent.

Staphylus, one of the Argonauts, son of Theseus, or, according to others, of Bacchus and Ariadne. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Stassander, an officer of Alexander, who had Aria at the general division of the provinces. Curt. 8, c. 3.

Staseas, a peripatetic philosopher, engaged to instruct young M. Piso in philosophy. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 22.

Stasióretes, a statuary and architect in the wars of Alexander, who offered to make a statue of mount Athos, which was rejected by the conqueror, &c.

Stasileus, an Athenian killed at the battle of Marathon. He was one of the 10 pretors.

Statilli, a people of Liguria, between the Tænarus and the Apennines. Liv. 42, c. 7.—Cic. 11, Fam. 11.

Statilla, a woman who lived to a great age, as mentioned by Seneca, ep. 77.—Another. Vid. Messalina.

Statilius, a young Roman celebrated for his courage and constancy. He was an inveterate enemy to Caesar, and when Cato murdered himself, he attempted to follow his example, but was prevented by his friends. The conspirators against Caesar wished him to be in their number, but the answer which he gave displeased Brutus. He was at last killed by the army of the triumvirs. Plut.—Tadius, one of the friends of Catiline. He joined in his conspiracy, and was put to death. Cic. Cat. 2.—A young general in the war which the Latins undertook against the Romans. He was killed, with 25,000 of his troops.—A general who fought against Antony.—Taurus, a proconsul of Africa. He was accused of consulting magicians, upon which he put himself to death. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 59.

Statiuæ, islands on the coast of Campania, raised from the sea by an earthquake. Plin. 2, c. 88.

Statira, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander. The conqueror had formerly refused her, but when she had fallen into his hands at Issus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon splendour. No less than 9000 persons attended, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup, to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children by Alexander. She was cruelly put to death by Roxana, after the conqueror's death. Justin. 12, c. 12.—A sister of Darius the last king of Persia. She also became his wife, according to the manners of the Persians. She died after an abortion, in Alexander's camp, where she was detained as a prisoner. She was buried with great pomp by the conqueror. Plut. in Alex.—A wife of Artaxerxes Memnon, poisoned by her mother-in-law queen Parysatis. Plut. in Art.—A sister of Mithridates the Great. Plut.

Statius Cœcilius, a comic poet in the age of Ennius. He was a native of Gaul, and originally a slave. His latinity was bad, yet he acquired great reputation by his comedies. He died a little after Ennius. Cic. de Sen.—Annæus, a physician, the friend of the philosopher Seneca. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 64.—P. Papinius, a poet born at Naples, in the reign of the emperor Domitian. His father's name was Statius of Epirus, and his mother's Aglolina. Statius has made himself known by two epic poems, the Thebais in 12 books, and the Achilleis in two books, which remained unfinished on account of his premature death. There are, besides, other pieces composed on several subjects, which are extant, and well known under the name of Sylva, divided into four books. The two epic poems of Statius are dedicated to Domitian, whom the poet ranks among the gods. They were universally admired in his age at Rome, but the taste of the times was corrupted, though some of the moderns have called them inferior to no Latin compositions except Virgil's. The style of Statius is bombastic and affected, and he often forgets the poet to become the declaimer and the historian. In his Sylva, which were written generally extempore, are many beautiful expressions and strokes of genius. Statius, as some suppose, was poor, and he was obliged to maintain himself by writing for the stage. None of his dramatic pieces are extant. Martial has satirized him, and what Juvenal has written in his praise, some have interpreted as an illiberal reflection upon him. Statius died about the sixth year of the christian era. The best editions of his works are that of Barthius, 2 vols. 4to, Cyg. 1664, and that of the Variorum, 8vo, L. Bat. 1671; and of the Thebais, separate, that of Warrington, 2 vols. 12mo, 1778.—Domitius, a tribune in the age of Nero, deprived of his office when Piso's conspiracy was discovered. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 17.—A general of the Samnites.—An officer of the pretorian guards, who conspired against Nero.

Stator, a surname of Jupiter, given him by Romulus, because he stopped (sto) the flight of the Romans in a battle against the Sabines. The conqueror erected him a temple under that name. Liv. 1, c. 12.

Stellates, a field remarkable for its fertility, in Campania. Cic. Ag. 1, c. 70.—Suet. Cæs. 20.

Stello, a youth turned into an elf by Ceres, because he derided the goddess, who drank with avidity when tired and afflicted in her vain pursuit of her daughter Proserpine. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 445.

Stena, a narrow passage on the mountains near Antigonis, in Chaonia. Liv. 32, c. 5.

Stenobœa. Vid. Stenobœa.

Stenocrates, an Athenian who conspired to murder the commander of the garrison which Demetrius had placed in the citadel, &c. Polyæn. 5.

Stentor, one of the Greeks who went to the Trojan war. His voice alone was louder than that of 50 men together. Homer. Il. 5, v. 784.—Juv. 13, v. 112.

Stentoria lacus, a lake near Enos in Thrace. Herodot. 7, c. 53.

Stephanus, a musician of Media, upon whose body Alexander made an experiment in burning a certain sort of bitumen called naphtha. Strab. 16.—Plut. in Alex.—A Greek writer of Byzantium, known for his dictionary giving an account of the towns and places of the ancient world, of which the best edition is that of Gronovius, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1694.

Sterōpe, one of the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas. She married (Enomaus king of Pisa, by whom she had Hippodamia, &c.)—A daughter of Parthaon, supposed by some to be the mother of the Sirens.—A daughter of Cepheus.—A daughter of Pleuron,—of Acastus,—of Danaus,—of Cebriou.

Sterōpes, one of the Cyciops. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Sterpsichorus, a lyric Greek poet of Himera, in Sicily. He was originally called Fisias, and obtained the name of Sterpsichorus from the alterations which he made in music and dancing. His compositions were written in the Doric dialect, and comprised in 26 books, all now lost, except a few fragments. Some say he lost his eyesight for writing invectives against Helen, and that he received it only upon making a recantation of what he had said. He was the first inventor of that fable of the horse and the stag, which Horace and some other poets have imitated, and this he wrote to prevent his countrymen from making an alliance with Phalaris. According to some, he was the first who wrote an epithalamium. He flourished 556 B.C., and died at Cantana, in the 85th year of his age. Isocrat. in Hel.—Aristot. Rhet.—Strab. 3.—Lucian. in Macr.—Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 35.—Plut. de Mus.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Faus. 3, c. 19. L. 10, c. 26.

Stertinus, a stoic philosopher, ridiculed by Horace, 2, sat. 3. He wrote in Latin verse 200 books on the philosophy of the stoics.

Stesagōres, a brother of Miltiades. Vid. Miltiades.

Stesilla, a beautiful woman of Athens, &c.

Stasilus, a beautiful youth of Cos, loved by Theocritus and Aristides, and the cause of jealousy and dissension between these celebrated men. Plut. in Cim.

Stesimbrotus, an historian very inconsistent in his narrations. He wrote an account of Cimón's exploits. Plut. in Cim.—A son of Epaminondas, put to death by his father, because he had fought the enemy without his orders, &c. Plut.—A musician of Thasos.

Steneie, a daughter of Acastus, wife of Menocritus. Apollod. 3, c. 13.—A daughter of Danaus by Memphis. Id. 2, c. 1.

Stenelus, a king of Mycenæ, son of Perseus and Andromeda. He married Nicippe the daughter of Pelops, by whom he had two daughters, and a son called Eurystheus, who was born, by Juno's influence, two months before the natural time, that he might obtain a superiority over Hercules, as being older. Stenelus made war against Amphitryon, who had killed Electryon and seized his kingdom. He fought with success, and took his enemy prisoner, whom he transmitted to Eurystheus. Homer. Il. 19, v. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—One of the sons of Egyptus by Tyria.—A son of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni, and of the suitors of Helen. He went to the Trojan war, and was one of those who were shut up in the wooden horse, according to Virgil. Paus. 2, c. 18.—Virg. Æn. 2 & 10.—A son of Androgeus the son of Minos. Hercules made him king of Thrace. Apollod. 2, c. 5.—A king of Argos, who succeeded his father Crotopus. Paus. 2, c. 16.—A son of Actor, who accompanied Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons. He was killed by one of these females.—A son of Melas, killed by Tydeus. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Steno, one of the three Gorgons.

Stenobœa, a daughter of Jobates king of Lycia, who married Prætus king of Argos. She became enamoured of Bellerophon, who had taken refuge at her husband's court, after the murder of his brother, and when he refused to gratify her criminal passion, she accused him before Prætus of attempts upon her virtue. According to some she killed herself after his departure. Homer. Il. 6, v. 162.—Hygin. Fab. 57.—Many mythologists call her Antæa.

Stilbo, or Stilbia, a daughter of Peneus by Creusa, who became mother of Centaurus and Lapithus by Apollo. Diad. 4.

Stilbo, a name given to the planet Mercury by the ancients, from his shining appearance. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 20.

Stilicho, a general of the emperor Theodosius the Great. He behaved with much courage, but under the emperor Honorius he showed himself turbulent and disaffected. As being of barbarian extraction, he wished to see the Roman provinces laid desolate by his countrymen, but in this he was disappointed. Honorius discovered his intrigues, and ordered him to be beheaded about the year of Christ 408. His family were involved in his ruin. Claudian has been loud in his praises, and Zosimus, Hist. 5, denies the truth of the charges laid against him.

Stilpo, a celebrated philosopher of Megara, who flourished 336 years before Christ, and was greatly esteemed by Ptolemy Soter. He was naturally addicted to riot and debauchery, but he reformed his manners when he opened a school at Megara. He was universally respected, his school was frequented, and Demetrius, when he plundered Megara, ordered the house of the philosopher to be left safe and unmolested. It is said that he intoxicated himself when ready to die, to alleviate the terrors of death. He was one of the chiefs of the Stoics. Plut. in Dem.—Diog. 2.—Seneca de Const.

Stimoon, a shepherd's name in Virgil's fifth eclogue.

Stiphilus, one of the Lapithæ, killed in the house of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12.

Stobæus, a Greek writer who flourished A.D. 405. His work is valuable for the precious relics of ancient literature which he has preserved. The best edition is that of Aurel. Allob. fol. 1609.

Stobi, a town of Pæonia, in Macedonia. Liv. 33, c. 19. l. 40, c. 21.

Stoehades, five small islands in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Gaul, now the Hierres, near Marseilles. They were called Ligustides by some, but Pliny speaks of them as only three in number. Steph. Byzant.—Lucan. 3, v. 515.—Strab. 4, ep. 62.

Stoici, a celebrated sect of philosophers founded by Zeno of Citium. They received the name from the portico (stoa), where the philosopher delivered his lectures. They preferred virtue to everything else, and whatever was opposite to it, they looked upon as the greatest of evils. They required, as well as the disciples of Epicurus, an absolute command over the passions, and they supported that man alone, in the present state of his existence, could attain perfection and felicity. They encouraged suicide, and believed that the doctrine of future punishments and rewards was unnecessary to excite or intimidate their followers. Vid. Zeno.

Strabo, a name among the Romans, given to those whose eyes were naturally deformed or distorted. Pompey's father was distinguished by that name.—A native of Amasia, on the borders of Cappadocia, who flourished in the age of Augustus and Tiberius. He first studied under Xenarchus the peripatetic, and afterwards warmly embraced the tenets of the Stoics. Of all his compositions nothing remains but his geography, divided into 17 books, a work justly celebrated for its elegance, its purity, the erudition and universal knowledge of the author. It contains an account, in Greek, of the most celebrated places of the world, the origin, the manners, religion, prejudices, and government of nations; the foundation of cities, and the accurate history of each separate province. Strabo travelled over great part of the world in quest of information, and to examine with the most critical inquiry, not only the situation of the places, but also the manners of the inhabitants, whose history he meant to write. In the two first books the author wishes to show the necessity of geography; in the 3rd he gives a description of Spain; in the 4th of Gaul and the British isles. The 5th and 6th contain an account of Italy and the neighbouring islands; the 7th, which is mutilated at the end, gives a full description of Germany, and the country of the Getæ, Illyricum, Taurica, Chersonesus, and Epirus. The affairs of Greece and the adjacent islands are separately treated in the 8th, 9th, and 10th; and in the four next Asia, within mount Taurus; and in the 15th and 16th, Asia without Taurus, India, Persia, Syria, and Arabia; the last book gives an account of Egypt, Æthiopia, Carthage, and other places of Africa. Among the books of Strabo which have been lost, were historical commentaries. This celebrated geographer died A.D. 25. The best editions of his geography are those of Casaubon, fol. Paris, 1620; and of Amst. 2 vols. fol. 1707.—A Sicilian, so clear-sighted, that he could distinguish objects at the distance of 130 miles, with the same ease as if they had been near.

Stratarchas, the grandfather of the geographer Strabo. His father's name was Dorylaus. Strab. 10.

Strato, or Straton, a king of the island Atalidis, received into alliance by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 1.—A king of Sidon, dependent upon Darius. Alexander deposed him, because he refused to surrender. Curt. ib.—A philosopher of Lampsacus, disciple and successor in the school of Theophrastus, about 289 years before the christian era. He applied himself with uncommon industry to the study of nature, and was surnamed Physicus; and after the most mature investigations, he supported that nature was inanimate, and that there was no god but nature. He was appointed preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who not only revered his abilities and learning, but also rewarded his labours with unbounded liberality. He wrote different treatises, all now lost. Diog. 5.—Cic. Acad. 1, c. 9. l. 4, c. 38, &c.—A physician.—A peripatetic philosopher.—A native of Epirus, very intimate with Brutus the murderer of Cæsar. He killed his friend at his own request.—A rich Orchomenian who destroyed himself, because he could not obtain in marriage a young woman of Haliartus. Plut.

—A Greek historian who wrote the life of some of the Macedonian kings.—An athlete of Achaia, twice crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 7, c. 23.

Stratocles, an Athenian general at the battle of Cherone, Æc. Polyæn.—A stage-player in Domitian's reign. Juv. 3, v. 99.

Straton. Vid. Strato.

Stratonice, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.—A daughter of Pleuron. Id.—A daughter of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, who married Eumenes king of Pergamus, and became mother of Attalus. Strab. 13.—A daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who married Seleucus king of Syria. Antiochus, her husband's son by a former wife, became enamoured of her, and married her with his father's consent, when the physicians had told him that if he did not comply, his son's health would be impaired. Plut. in Dem.—Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—A concubine of Mithridates king of Pontus. Plut. in Pomp.—The wife of Antigonus, mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes.—A town of Caria, made a Macedonian colony. Strab. 14.—Liv. 33, c. 18 & 33.—Another, in Mesopotamia.—A third, near mount Taurus.

Stratoniceus, an opulent person in the reign of Philip, and of his son Alexander, whose riches became proverbial. Plut.—A musician of Athens in the age of Demosthenes. Athen. 6, c. 6. l. 8, c. 12.

Stratonis turris, a city of Judea, afterwards called Cæsarea by Herod in honour of Augustus.

Stratos, a city of Æolia. Liv. 36, c. 11.—Of Acamania

Strenua, a goddess at Rome, who gave vigour and energy to the weak and indolent. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11 & 16.

Strongyle, now Stromboli, one of the islands called Æolides in the Tyrrhene sea, near the coast of Sicily. It has a volcano, 10 miles in circumference, which throws up flame continually, and of which the crater is on the side of the mountain. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Paus. 10, c. 11.

Strophades, two islands in the Ionian sea, on the western coasts of the Peloponnesus. They were anciently called Plota, and received the name of Strophades from στροφάω, verto, because Zethus and Calais, the sons of Boreas, returned from thence by order of Jupiter, after they had driven the Harpies there from the tables of Phineus. The fleet of Æneas stopped near the Strophades. The largest of these two islands is not above five miles in circumference. Hygin. fab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 709.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 210.—Strab. 8.

Strophius, a son of Crisus king of Phocis. He married a sister of Agamemnon, called Anaxibia, or Astyochia, or, according to others, Cyndragora, by whom he had Pylades, celebrated for his friendship with Orestes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, the king of Phocis educated at his own house, with the greatest care, his nephew, whom Electra had secretly removed from the dagger of his mother and her adulterer. Orestes was enabled, by means of Strophius, to revenge the death of his father. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Hygin. fab. 1, 17.—A son of Pylades by Electra the sister of Orestes.

Struthophagi, a people of Æthiopia, who fed on sparrows, as their name signifies.

Struthus, a general of Artaxerxes against the Lacedæmonians, B.C. 393.

Stryma, a town of Thrace, founded by a Thasian colony. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Strymo, a daughter of the Scamander, who married Laomedon. Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Strymon, a river which separates Thrace from Macedonia, and falls into a part of the Ægean sea, which has been called Strymonicus sinus. A number of cranes, as the poets say, resorted on its banks in the summer time. Its eels were excellent. Mela. 2, c. 2.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 120. l. 4, v. 508. Æn. 10, v. 265.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 261.

Stubera, a town of Macedonia, between the Axius and Erigon. Liv. 31, c. 39.

Stura, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Po.

Sturni, a town of Calabria.

Stymphália, or Stymphális, a part of Macedonia. Liv. 45, c. 30.—A surname of Diana.

Stymphálius, a king of Arcadia, son of Eliatus and Laodice. He made war against Pelops, and was killed in a truce. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 4.—A town, river, lake, and fountain of Arcadia, which receives its name from king Stymphalus. The neighbourhood of the lake Stymphalus was infested with a number of voracious birds, like cranes or storks, which fed upon human flesh, and which were called Stymphalides. They were at last destroyed by Hercules, with the assistance of Minerva. Some have confounded them with the Harpies, while others pretend that they never existed but in the imagination of the poets. Pausanias, however, supports that there were carnivorous birds like the Stymphalides, in Arabia. Paus. 8, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 298.—A lofty mountain of Peloponnesus in Arcadia.

Stygne, a daughter of Danaus. Stat. Syl. 4, 6.—Apollod.

Styra, a town of Euboea.

Styrus, a king of Albania, to whom Æetes promised his daughter Medea in marriage, to obtain his assistance against the Argonauts. Ætæc. 3, v. 497. l. 8, v. 358.

Styx, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Pallas, by whom she had three daughters, Victory, Strength, and Valour. Hesiod. Theog. 363 & 384.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.—A celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times. According to some writers, the Styx was a small river of Nonacris in Arcadia, whose waters were so cold and venomous, that they proved fatal to such as tasted them. Among others, Alexander the Great is mentioned as a victim to their fatal poison, in consequence of drinking them. They even consumed iron, and broke all vessels. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea that it was a river of hell, especially when it disappeared in the earth a little below its fountain head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in such veneration, that they always swore by them; an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themselves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year into a senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their punishment, they were restored to the assembly of the deities, and to all their original privileges. It is said that this veneration was shown to the Styx, because it received its name from the nymph Styx, who, with her three daughters, assisted Jupiter in his war against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. v. 384, 775.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 513.—Herodot. 6, c. 74.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 323, 439, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 29, &c.—Lucan. 6, v. 378, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 17 & 18.—Curt. 10, c. 10.

Suada, the goddess of persuasion, called Pitho by the Greeks. She had a form of worship established to her honour first by Theseus. She had a statue in the temple of Venus Praxias at Megara. Cic. de Cl. Orat. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 22 & 43. l. 9, c. 35.

Suana, a town of Etruria.

Suardones, a people of Germany. Tacit. G. 40.

Suasa, a town of Umbria.

Subatril, a people of Germany, over whom Drusus triumphed. Strab. 7.

Subi, a small river of Catalonia.

Sublicius, the first bridge erected at Rome over the Tiber. Vid. Pons.

Submontorium, a town of Vindelicis, now Ansburg.

Subota, small islands at the east of Athos. Liv. 44, c. 28.

Subur, a river of Mauritania.—A town of Spain.

Suburra, a street in Rome where all the licentious, dissolute, and lascivious Romans and courtisans resorted. It was situated between mount Viminalis and Quirinalis, and was remarkable as having been the residence of the obscure years of J. Caesar. Suet. in Cas.—Varro, de L. L. 4, c. 8.—Martial. 8, ep. 66.—Juv. 3, v. 5.

Sucro, now Uxcar, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, celebrated for a battle fought there between Sertorius and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. Plut.—A Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 505.

Sudertum, a town of Etruria. Liv. 26, c. 23.

Suessa, a town of Campania, called also Avruncus, to distinguish it from Suessa Pomicina, the capital of the Volsci. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Liv. 1 & 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775. Cic. Phil. 3, c. 4. l. 4, c. 2.

Suessitani, a people of Spain. Liv. 25, c. 34.

Suessones, a powerful nation of Belgic Gaul, reduced by J. Caesar. Cæs. Bell. G. 2.

Suessula, a town of Campania. Liv. 7, c. 37. l. 23, c. 14.

Suetonius C. Paulinus, the first Roman general who crossed mount Atlas with an army, of which expedition he wrote an account. He presided over Britain as governor for about 20 years, and was afterwards made consul. He forsook the interest of Otho, and attached himself to Vitellius.—C. Tranquillus, a Latin historian, son of a Roman knight of the same name. He was favoured by Adrian, and became his secretary, but he was afterwards banished from the court for want of attention and respect to the empress Sabina. In his retirement Suetonius enjoyed the friendship and correspondence of Pliny the younger, and dedicated his time to study. He wrote a history of the Roman kings, divided into three books; a catalogue of all the illustrious men of Rome, a book on the games and spectacles of the Greeks, &c., which are all now lost. The only one of his compositions extant, is the lives of the 12 first Cæsars, and some fragments of his catalogue of celebrated grammarians. Suetonius, in his Lives, is praised for his impartiality and correctness. His expressions, however, are often too indelicate, and it has been justly observed, that while he exposed the deformities of the Cæsars, he wrote with all the licentiousness and extravagance with which they lived. The best editions of Suetonius are that of Pitiscus, 4to, 2 vols. Leovard. 1714; that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 8vo, L. Bar. 1751; and that of Ernesti, 8vo, Lips. 1775. Plin. 1, ep. 11. l. 5, ep. 11, &c.

Suetri, a people of Gaul near the Alps.

Suovi, a people of Germany, between the Elbe and the Vistula, who made frequent incursions upon the territories of Rome under the emperors. Lucan. 2, v. 51.

Suevius, a Latin poet in the age of Ennius.

Suffetala, an inland town in Mauritania.

Suffenus, a Latin poet in the age of Catullus. He was but of moderate abilities, but puffed up with a high idea of his own excellence, and therefore deservedly exposed to the ridicule of his contemporaries. Catull. 22.

Suffetius, or Suftius. Vid. Metius.

Suidas, a Greek writer who flourished A.D. 1100. The best edition of his excellent Lexicon is that of Kuster, 3 vols. fol. Cantab. 1705.

Pub. Sullius, an informer in the court of Claudius, banished under Nero, by means of Seneca, and sent to the Balears. Tacit. A. 14, c. 42, &c.—Cæsarinus, a guilty favourite of Messalina. Id. 11, c. 36.

Suiones, a nation of Germany, supposed the modern Suedes. Tacit. de Germ. c. 44.

Sulochi, a town at the south of Sardinia. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Claudian. de Gild. 518.—Strab. 5.

Sulcius, an informer whom Horace describes as hoarse with the number of defamations which he daily gave. Horat. 1, sat. 4, v. 65.

Sulga, now Sorgue, a small river of Gaul, falling into the Rhone. Strab. 4.

Sulla. Virg. Sylla.

Sulino, now Sulmona, an ancient town of the Pelign, at the distance of about 90 miles from Rome, founded by Solymus, one of the followers of Eneas. Ovid was born there. Ovid. Assum.—Ital. 8, v. 511.—Strab. 5.—A Latin chief killed in the night by Nisus, as he was going with his companions to destroy Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 417.

Sulpitia, a daughter of Paternus, who married Fulvius Placcus. She was so famous for her chastity, that she consecrated a temple to Venus Verticordia, a goddess who was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. Plin. 7, c. 35.—A poetess in the age of Domitian, against whom she wrote a poem, because he had banished the philosophers from Rome. This composition is still extant. She had also written a poem on conjugal affection, commended by Martial, ep. 35, now lost.—A daughter of Serv. Sulpitius, mentioned in the fourth book of elegies, falsely attributed to Tibullus.

Sulpitia lex, militaris, by C. Sulpicius the tribune, A.U.C. 665, invested Marius with the full power of the war against Mithridates, of which Sulla was to be deprived.—Another, de senatu, by Servius Sulpicius the tribune, A.U.C. 665. It required that no senator should owe more than 2000 drachmæ.—Another, de civitate, by P. Sulpitius the tribune, A.U.C. 675. It ordered that the new citizens who composed the eight tribes lately created, should be divided among the 35 old tribes, as a greater honour.—Another, called also Sempronia, de religione, by P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Sempronius Sophus, consuls, A.U.C. 449. It forbade any person to consecrate a temple or altar without the permission of the senate and the majority of the tribunes.—Another, to empower the Romans to make war against Philip of Macedon.

Sulpitius, or Sulpicius, an illustrious family at Rome, of whom the most celebrated are:—Peticius, a man chosen dictator against the Gauls. His troops mutinied when he first took the field, but soon after he engaged the enemy and totally defeated them. Liv. 7.—Saverrio, a consul who gained a victory over the Æqui. Id. 9, c. 45.—C. Paternus, a consul sent against the Carthaginians. He conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy's fleet. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. Id. 17.—Spurius, one of the three commissioners whom the Romans sent to collect the best laws which could be found in the different cities and republics of Greece. Id. 3, c. 10.

—One of the first consuls who received intelligence that a conspiracy was formed in Rome to restore the Tarquins to power, &c.—A priest who died of the plague in the first ages of the republic at Rome.—P. Galba, a Roman consul who signalized himself greatly during the war which his countrymen waged against the Achæans and the Macedonians.—Severus, a writer. Virg. Severus.

—Publius, one of the associates of Marius, well known for his intrigues and cruelty. He made some laws in favour of the allies of Rome, and he kept about 3000 young men in continual pay, whom he called his anti-senatorial band, and with these he had often the impertinence to attack the consul in the popular assemblies. He became at last so seditious, that he was proscribed by Sulla's adherents, and immediately murdered. His head was fixed on a pole in the rostrum, where he had often made many seditious speeches in the capacity of tribune. Liv. 77.—A Roman consul who fought against Pyrrhus and defeated him.—C. Longus, a Roman consul, who defeated the Samnites, and killed 30,000 of their men. He obtained a triumph for this celebrated victory. He was afterwards made dictator to conduct a war against the Etrurians.—Rufus, a lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul.—One of Messalina's favourites, put to death by Claudius.—P. Quirinus, a consul in the age of Augustus.—Camerinus, a proconsul of Africa, under Nero, accused of cruelty, &c. Tacit. 13, Ann. 52.—Gallus, a celebrated astrologer in the age of Paulus. He accompanied the consul in his expedition against Perseus, and told the Roman army that the night before the day on which they were to give the enemy battle there would be an eclipse of the moon. This explanation encouraged the soldiers, which, on the contrary, would have intimidated them, if not previously acquainted with the causes of it. Sulpitius was universally respected, and he was honoured a few years after with the consulship. Liv. 44, c. 37.—Plin. 2, c. 12.—Apollinaris, a grammarian in the age of the emperor M. Aurelius. He left some letters and a few grammatical observations now lost. Cic.—Liv.—Plut.—Polyb.—Flor.—Eutrap.

Summanus, a surname of Pluto, as prince of the dead, summus manium. He had a temple at Rome, erected during the wars with Pyrrhus, and the Romans believed that the thunderbolts of Jupiter were in his power during the night. Cic. de Div.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 731.

Suniol, a people of Germany on the shores of the Rhine. Tacit. H. 4, c. 56.

Sunides, a soothsayer in the army of Eumenes. Polyæn. 4.

Suntium, a promontory of Attica, about 45 miles distant from the Piræus. There was there a small harbour, as also a town. Mithra had there a beautiful temple, whence she was called Suntis. There are still extant some ruins of this temple. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Strab. 9.—Paus. 1, c. 1.—Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3, l. 13, ep. 10.

Suovetaurilia, a sacrifice among the Romans, which consisted of the immolation of a sow (sus), a sheep (ovis), and a bull (taurus), whence the name. It was generally observed every fifth year.

Supërum mare, a name of the Adriatic sea, because it was situate above Italy. The name of Mare Inferum was applied for the opposite reasons to the sea below Italy. Cic. pro Cluent. &c.

Sura Æmylius, a Latin writer, &c. P. Fat. 1, c. 6.—L. Licinius, a favourite of Trajan, honoured with the consulship.—A writer in the age of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote a history of the reign of the emperor.—A city on the Euphrates.—Another in Iberia.—A river of Germany, whose waters fall into the Moselle. Aut. in Mos.

Suxëna, a powerful officer in the armies of Orodes king of Parthia. His family had the privilege of crowning the kings of Parthia. He was appointed to conduct the war against the Romans, and to protect the kingdom of Parthia against Crassus, who wished to conquer it. He defeated the Roman triumvir, and after he had drawn him perforce to a conference, he ordered his head to be cut off. He afterwards returned to Parthia, mimicking the triumphs of the Romans. Orodes ordered him to be put to death, B.C. 57. Surena has been admired for his valour, his sagacity as a general, and his prudence and firmness in the execution of his plans; but his perfidy, his effeminate manners, and his lasciviousness have been deservedly censured. Polyb. 7.—Plut. in Crass.

Suriuzum, a town at the south of Colchis.

Surrentum, a town of Campania, on the bay of Naples, famous for the wine which was made in the neighbourhood. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 17, v. 52.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 710.—Mart. 13, ep. 210.

Surus, one of the Æduli, who made war against Casar. Ces. G. 8, c. 45.

Susa (orum), now Suster, a celebrated city of Asia, the chief town of Susiana, and the capital of the Persian empire, built by Tithonus the father of Memnon. Cyrus took it. The walls of Susa were above 120 stadia in circumference. The treasures of the kings of Persia were generally kept there, and the royal palace was built with white marble, and its pillars were covered with gold and precious stones. It was usual with the kings of Persia to spend the summer at Ecbatana, and the winter at Susa, because the climate was more warm than at any other royal residence. It has been called Memnonia, or the palace of Memnon, because that prince reigned there. Plin. 6, c. 26, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 49.—Strab. 15.—Xenoph. Cyr.—Propert. 2, el. 13.—Claudian.

Susarion, a Greek poet of Megara, who is supposed, with Dolon, to be the inventor of comedy, and to have first introduced it at Athens on a movable stage. B.C. 562.

Susiana, or Susis, a country of Asia, of which the capital was called Susa, situate at the east of Assyria. Lilies grow in great abundance in Susiana, and it is from that plant that the province received its name, according to some, as Susan is the name of a lily in Hebrew.

Susidæ pylæ, narrow passes over mountains, from Susiana into Persia. Curt. 5, c. 3.

Suthul, a town of Numidia, where the king's treasures were kept. Sall. Jug. 37.

Sutrium, a town of Etruria, about 24 miles north-west of Rome. Some suppose that the phrase Inter Sutrium, to act with despatch, arises from the celerity with which Camillus recovered the place, but Festus explains it differently. Plaut. Cas. 3, l. v. 10.—Liv. 26, c. 34.—Paterc. 1, c. 14.—Liv. 9, c. 32.

Syagrus, an ancient poet, the first who wrote on the Trojan war. He is called Segaris, by Diogenes Laertius, who adds that he lived in Homer's age, of whom he was the rival. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 21.

Sybaris, a river of Lucania in Italy, whose waters were said to render men more strong and robust. *Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 21, l. 37, c. 2.—*There was a town of the same name on its banks on the bay of Tarentum, which had been founded by a colony of Achæans. Sybaris became very powerful, and in its most flourishing situation it had the command of four neighbouring nations, of 75 towns, and could send an army of 300,000 men into the field. The walls of the city were said to extend six miles and a half in circumference, and the suburbs covered the banks of the Crathis for the space of seven miles. It made a long and vigorous resistance against the neighbouring town of Crotona, till it was at last totally reduced by the disciples of Pythagoras, B.C. 501. Sybaris was destroyed no less than five times, and always repaired. In a more recent age the inhabitants became so effeminate, that the word Sybarite became proverbial to intimate a man devoted to pleasure. There was a small town built in the neighbourhood about 444 years before the Christian era, and called Thurium, from a small fountain called Thuria, where it was built. *Diod. 12.—Strab. 6.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 24.—Martial. 12, ep. 96.—Plut. in Pelop., &c.—Plin. 3, c. 10, &c.—*A friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. *Virg. Æn. 12, v. 363.—*A youth enamoured of Lydia, &c. Horat. 1, od. 8, v. 2.

Sybarita, an inhabitant of Sybaris. Vid. Sybaris.

Sybotas, a king of the Messenians in the age of Lycurgus the Spartan legislator. Paus. 4, c. 4.

Sycinnus, a slave of Themistocles, sent by his master to engage Xerxes to fight against the fleet of the Peloponnesians.

Sycurium, a town of Thessaly at the foot of Ossa. Liv. 47, c. 54.

Sydra, a town of Cilicia.

Syðne, now Assuan, a town of Thebais, on the extremities of Egypt. Juvenal the poet was banished there on pretence of commanding a pretorian cohort stationed in the neighbourhood. It was famous for its quarries of marble. Strab. 1 & 2.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 8.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 5, v. 79.—Met. 5, v. 74.—Lucan. 2, v. 587, l. 8, v. 851, l. 10, v. 234.

Syonesius, a Cilician who, with Labinetus of Babylon, concluded a peace between Alyattes king of Lydia, and Cyaxares king of Media, while both armies were terrified by a sudden eclipse of the sun, B.C. 585. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

Syennesis, a satrap of Cilicia, when Cyrus made war against his brother Artaxerxes. He wished to favour both the brothers by sending one of his sons into the army of Cyrus and another to Artaxerxes.

Sylsa, a daughter of Corinthus.

Sylenum, a town of Pamphylia.

Syleus, a king of Aulis.

Sylla L. Cornelius, a celebrated Roman of a noble family. The poverty of his early years was relieved by the liberality of the courtesan Nicopolis, who left him heir to a large fortune; and with the addition of the immense wealth of his mother-in-law, he soon appeared one of the most potent of the Romans. He first entered the army under the great Marius, whom he accompanied in Numidia in the capacity of questor. He rendered himself conspicuous in military affairs; and Bocchus, one of the princes of Numidia, delivered Jugurtha into his hands for the Roman consul. The rising fame of Sylla gave umbrage to Marius, who was always jealous of an equal, as well as of a superior; but the ill language which he might use, rather inflamed than extinguished the ambition of Sylla. He left the conqueror of Jugurtha, and carried arms under Catullus. Some time after he obtained the pretorship, and was appointed by the Roman senate to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, against the views and interest of Mithridates king of Pontus. This he easily effected: one battle left him victorious; and before he quitted the plains of Asia, the Roman pretor had the satisfaction to receive in his camp the ambassadors of the king of Parthia, who wished to make a treaty of alliance with the Romans. Sylla received them with haughtiness, and behaved with such arrogance, that one of them exclaimed, "Surely this man is master of the world, or doomed to be such!" At his return to Rome, he was commissioned to finish the war with the Marsi, and when this was successfully ended, he was rewarded with the consulship, in the 50th year of his age. In this capacity he wished to have the administration of the Mithridatic war; but he found an obstinate adversary in Marius, and he attained the summit of his wishes only when he had entered Rome sword in hand. After he had slaughtered all his enemies, set a price upon the head of Marius, and put to death the tribune Sulpitius, who had continually opposed his views, he marched towards Asia, and disregarded the flames of discord which he left behind him unextinguished. Mithridates was already master of the greatest part of Greece; and Sylla, when he reached the coast of Peloponnesus, was delayed by the siege of Athens, and of the Piræus. His operations were carried on with vigour, and when he found his money fail, he made no scruple to take the riches of the temples of the gods to bribe his soldiers, and render them devoted to his service. His boldness succeeded. The Piræus surrendered; and the conqueror, as if struck with reverence at the beautiful porticoes where the philosophic followers of Socrates and Plato had often disputed, spared the city of Athens, which he had devoted to destruction, and forgave the living for the sake of the dead. Two celebrated battles at Cheronæa and Orchomenos, rendered him master of Greece. He crossed the Hellespont, and attacked Mithridates in the very heart of his kingdom. The artful monarch, who well knew the valour and perseverance of his adversary, made proposals of peace; and Sylla, whose interest at home was then decreasing, did not hesitate to put an end to a war which had rendered him master of so much territory, and which enabled him to return to Rome like a conqueror, and to dispute with his rival the sovereignty of the republic with a victorious army. Muraena was left at the head of the Roman forces in Asia, and Sylla hastened to Italy. In the plains of Campania, he was met by a few of his adherents, whom the success of his rivals had banished from the capital, and he was soon informed, that if he wished to contend with Marius, he must encounter 15 generals, followed by 25 well-disciplined legions. In these critical circumstances he had recourse to artifice, and while he proposed terms of accommodation to his adversaries, he secretly strengthened himself, and saw, with pleasure, his armies daily increase by the revolt of soldiers whom his bribes or promises had corrupted. Pompey, who afterwards merited the surname of Great, embraced his cause, and marched to the camp with three legions. Soon after he appeared in the field with advantage; the confidence of Marius decayed with his power, and Sylla entered Rome like a tyrant and a conqueror. The streets were daily filled with dead bodies, and 7000 citizens, to whom the conqueror had promised pardon, were suddenly massacred in the circus. The senate, at that time assembled in the temple of Bellona, heard the shrieks of their dying countrymen; and when they inquired into the cause of it, Sylla coolly replied, "They are only a few rebels whom I have ordered to be chastised." If this had been the last and most dismal scene, Rome might have been called happy; but it was only the beginning of her misfortunes. Each succeeding day exhibited a great number of slaughtered bodies, and when one of the senators had the boldness to ask the tyrant when he meant to stop his cruelties, Sylla, with an air of unconcern, answered, that he had not yet determined, but that he would take it into his consideration. The slaughter was continued; a list of such as were proscribed was daily struck in the public streets, and the slave was rewarded to bring his master's head, and the son was not ashamed to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father for money. No less than 4700 of the most powerful and opulent were slain, and Sylla wished the Romans to forget his cruelties in aspiring to the title of perpetual dictator. In this capacity he made new laws, abrogated such as were inimical to his views, and changed every regulation where his ambition was obstructed. After he had finished whatever the most absolute sovereign may do from his own will and authority, Sylla abdicated the dictatorial power, and retired to a solitary retreat at Puteoli, where he spent the rest of his days, if not in literary ease and tranquillity, yet far from the noise of arms, in the midst of riot and debauchery. The companions of his retirement were the most base and licentious of the populace, and Sylla took pleasure still to wallow in voluptuousness, though on the verge of life, and covered with infirmities. His intemperance hastened his end, his blood was corrupted, and an imposthume was bred in his bowels. He at last died in the greatest torments of the lousy disease, about 78 years before Christ, in the 60th year of his age; and it has been observed, that, like Marius, on his death-bed, he wished to drown the stings of conscience and remorse by continual intoxication. His funeral was very magnificent; his body was attended by the senate and the vestal virgins, and hymns were sung to celebrate his exploits and to honour his memory. A monument was erected in the field of Mars, on which appeared an inscription written by himself, in which he said, that the good services he had received from his friends, and the injuries of his enemies, had been returned with unexampled usury. The character of Sylla is that of an ambitious, dissimulating, credulous, tyrannical, debauched, and resolute commander. He was revengeful in the highest degree, and the surname of Felix, or the Fortunate, which he assumed, showed that he was more indebted to fortune than to valour for the great fame which he had acquired. But in the midst of all this, who cannot admire the moderation and philosophy of a man, who when absolute master of a republic, which he had procured by his cruelty and avarice, silently abdicates the sovereign power, challenges a critical examination of his administration, and retires to live securely in the midst of thousands whom he has injured and offended? The Romans were pleased and astonished at his abdication; and when the insolence of a young man had been vented against the dictator, he calmly answered, "This usage may perhaps deter another to resign his power to follow my example, if ever he becomes absolute." Sylla has been commended for the patronage which he gave to the arts and sciences. He brought from Asia the extensive library of Apellicon the Peripatetic philosopher, in which were the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and he himself composed 22 books of memoirs concerning himself. Cic. in Verr., &c.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Valer. 2, c. 17, &c.—Liv. 75, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 20.—Flor. 3, c. 5, &c. l. 4, c. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 12, &c.—Polyb. 5.—Justin. 37 & 38.—Eutrop. 5, c. 2.—Plut. in Vit.—A nephew of the dictator, who conspired against his country because he had been deprived of his consulship for bribery.—Another relation, who also joined in the same conspiracy.—A man put to death by Nero at Marseilles, where he had been banished.—A friend of Cato, defeated and killed by one of Cæsar's lieutenants.—A senator banished from the senate for his prodigality by Tiberius.

Syllis, a nymph, mother of Zeuxippus by Apollo. Paus. 2, c. 6.

Syloes, a promontory of Africa.

Sylōson, a man who gave a splendid garment to Darius son of Hystaspes, when a private man. Darius, when raised to the throne of Persia, remembered the gift of Sylōson with gratitude. Strab. 14.

Sylvānus, a god of the woods. Vid. Silvanus.

Sylvia, or Ilia, the mother of Romulus. Vid. Rhea.—A daughter of Tyrrhenus, whose favourite stag was wounded by Ascanius. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 503.

Sylvius, a son of Æneus by Lavinia, from whom afterwards all the kings of Alba were called Sylvii. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 765.

Syma, or Syme, a town of Asia.—A nymph, mother of Chthonius by Neptune. Diod. 5.

Symbolum, a place of Macedonia, near Philippi, on the confines of Thrace.

Symmachus, an officer in the army of Agesilaus.—A celebrated orator in the age of Theodosius the Great. His father was prefect of Rome. He wrote against the christians, and 10 books of his letters are extant, which have been refuted by Ambrose and Prudentius. The best editions of Symmachus are that of Geneva, 8vo, 1598, and that of Paris, 4to, 1604.—A writer in the second century. He translated the Bible into Greek, of which few fragments remain.

Symplegades, or Cyanæ, two islands or rocks at the entrance of the Euxine sea. Vid. Cyanæ.

Synus, a mountain of Armenia, from which the Araxes flows.

Synellus, one of the Byzantine historians, whose works were edited in fol. Paris, 1652.

Synesius, a bishop of Cyrene in the age of Theodosius the younger, as conspicuous for his learning as his piety. He wrote 155 epistles, besides other treatises, in Greek, in a style pure and elegant, and bordering much upon the poetic. The last edition is in 8vo, Paris, 1605; inferior, however, to the editio princeps by Pectavius. fol. Paris, 1613. The best edition of Synesius de febribus is that of Bernard, Amst. 1749.

Synnalaxis, a nymph of Ionia, who had a temple at Heraclea in Elis. Paus. 6, c. 22.

Synnas (adis), or Synnada (plur.), a town of Phrygia, famous for its marble quarries. Strab. 12.—Claudian. in Eutr. 2.—Martial. 9, ep. 77.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 5, v. 41.

Synnias, a famous robber of Attica. Vid. Scins.

Synōpe, a town on the borders of the Euxine. Vid. Sinope.

Synhæum, a town of the Brutii in Italy. Liv. 30, c. 16.

Syphax, a king of the Massæsylii in Libya, who married Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, and forsook the alliance of the Romans to join himself to the interest of his father-in-law, and of Carthage. He was conquered in a battle by Masinissa the ally of Rome, and given to Scipio the Roman general. The conqueror carried him to Rome, where he adorned his triumph. Syphax died in prison 201 years before Christ, and his possessions were given to Masinissa. According to some, the descendants of Syphax reigned for some time over a part of Numidia, and continued to make opposition to the Romans. Liv. 24, &c.—Plut. in Scip.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Polyb.—Ital. 16, v. 171 & 188.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 769.

Syraces, one of the Saccæ, who mutilated himself, and, by pretending to be a deserter, brought Darius, who made war against his country, into many difficulties. Polyæn. 7.

Syracosia, festivals at Syracuse celebrated during 20 days, in which women were busily employed in offering sacrifices.—Another yearly observed near the lake of Syracuse, where, as they supposed, Pluto had disappeared with Proserpine.

Syracusæ, a celebrated city of Sicily, founded about 732 years before the christian era by Archias, a Corinthian, and one of the Hæmelidæ. In its flourishing state it extended 22½ English miles in circumference, and was divided into four districts, Ortygia, Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis, to which some add a fifth division, Epipolæ, a district little inhabited. These were of themselves separate cities, and were fortified with three citadels, and three-folded walls. Syracuse had two capacious harbours separated from one another by the island of Ortygia. The greatest harbour was about 5000 paces in circumference, and its entrance 300 paces wide. The people of Syracuse were very opulent and powerful, and though subject to tyrants, they were masters of vast possessions and dependent states. The city of Syracuse was well built, its houses were stately and magnificent; and it has been said, that it produced the best and most excellent of men when they were virtuous, but the most wicked and depraved when addicted to vicious pursuits. The women of Syracuse were not permitted to adorn themselves with gold, or wear costly garments, except such as prostituted themselves. Syracuse gave birth to Theocritus and Archimedes. It was under different governments; and after being freed from the tyranny of Thrasylbulus, B.C. 446, it enjoyed security for 61 years, till the usurpation of the Dionysii, who were expelled by Timoleon, B.C. 343. In the age of the elder Dionysius, an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and 400 ships, were kept in constant pay. It fell into the hands of the Romans, under the consul Marcellus, after a siege of three years, B.C. 212. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 52 & 53.—Strab. 1 & 8.—C. Nep.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Liv. 23, &c.—Plut. in Marcell., &c.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Ital. 14, v. 278.

Syria, a large country of Asia, whose boundaries are not accurately ascertained by the ancients. Syria, generally speaking, was bounded on the east by the Euphrates, north by mount Taurus, west by the Mediterranean, and south by Arabia. It was divided into several districts and provinces, among which were Phœnicia, Seleucia, Judæa or Palestine, Mesopotamia, Babylon, and Assyria. It was also called Assyria; and the words Syria and Assyria, though distinguished and defined by some authors, were often used indifferently. Syria was subjected to the monarchs of Persia; but after the death of Alexander the Great, Seleucus, surnamed Nicator, who had received this province as his lot in the division of the Macedonian dominions, raised it into an empire, known in history by the name of the kingdom of Syria or Babylon, B.C. 312. Seleucus died after a reign of 32 years, and his successors, surnamed the Seleucidae, ascended the throne in the following order: Antiochus, surnamed Soter, 280 B.C.; Antiochus Theos, 261; Seleucus Callinicus, 246; Seleucus Ceraunus, 226; Antiochus the Great, 223; Seleucus Philopator, 187; Antiochus Epiphanes, 175; Antiochus Eupator, 164; Demetrius Soter, 162; Alex. Balas, 150; Demetrius Nicator, 146; Antiochus VI., 144; Diodorus Tryphon, 147; Antiochus Sidetes, 139; Demetrius Nicator restored, 130; Alexander Zebina, 127, who was dethroned by Antiochus Grypus, 123; Antiochus Cyzicenus, 112, who takes part of Syria, which he calls Coele Syria; Philip and Demetrius Eucerus, 93, and in Coele Syria, Antiochus Pius; Artaxas was king of Coele Syria, 85; Tigranes, king of Armenia, 83; and Antiochus Asiaticus, 69, who was dethroned by Pompey, B.C. 65; in consequence of which Syria became a Roman province. Herodot. 2, 3 & 7.—Apollod. 1, 479.—Strab. 12 & 16.—C. Nep. in Dat.—Mela, 1, c. 2.—Ital. 5, c. 6.—Curt. 6.—Dionys. Perieg.

Syrīacum mare, that part of the Mediterranean sea which is on the coast of Phœnicia and Syria.

Syrinx, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the river Ladon. Pan became enamoured of her, and attempted to offer her violence; but Syrinx escaped, and at her own request was changed by the gods into a reed called Syrinx by the Greeks. The god made himself a pipe with the reeds, into which his favourite nymph had been changed. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 691.—Martial. 9, ep. 63.

Syrophœnia, the name of an inhabitant of the maritime coast of Syria. Juv. 8.

Syros, one of the Cyclades in the Ægean sea, at the east of Delos, about 20 miles in circumference, very fruitful in wine and corn of all sorts. The inhabitants lived to a great old age, because the air was wholesome. Homer. Od. 15, v. 504.—Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—A town of Caria. Paus. 3, c. 26.

Syrtēs, two large sand-banks in the Mediterranean on the coast of Africa, one of which was near Leptis, and the other near Carthage. As they often changed places, and were sometimes very high or very low under the water, they were deemed most dangerous in navigation, and proved fatal to whatever ships touched upon them. From this circumstance, therefore, the word has been used to denote any part of the sea of which the navigation was attended with danger, either from whirlpools or hidden rocks. Mela, 1, c. 7. l. 2, c. 7.—Vig. Æn. 4, v. 41.—Lucan. 9, 303.—Sallust. in J.

Syros, an island. Vid. Syros.—A son of Apollo by Sinope the daughter of the Asopus, who gave his name to Syria. Plut. in Luc.—A writer. Vid. Publius.

Sysigambis, the mother of Darius. Vid. Sysigambis.

Systēthres, a Persian satrap, who had two children by his mother, an incestuous commerce tolerated by the laws of Persia. He opposed Alexander with 2000 men, but soon surrendered. He was greatly honoured by the conqueror. Curt. 8, c. 4.

Syriacus, the elder son of Datames, who revolted from his father to Artaxerxes.

Sythas, a river of Peloponnesus, flowing through Sicyonia into the bay of Corinth. Paus. 2, c. 7.

TAAUTES, a Phœnician deity, the same as the Saturn of the Latins, and probably the Thoth, or Thaut, the Mercury of the Egyptians. Cic. de N. D. 3, c. 22.—Varro.

Tabæ, a town of Pisidia. Liv. 38, c. 13.

Tabellarie leges, laws made by suffrages delivered upon tables (tabellæ), and not vivâ voce. There were four of these laws, the Gabinia lex, A.U.C. 614, by Gabinus; the Cassia, by Cassius, A.U.C. 616; the Papiria, by Carbo, A.U.C. 622; and the Cælia, by Cælius, A.U.C. 646. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 16.

Tabernæ novæ, a street in Rome where shops were built. Liv. 3, c. 48.—Rhenanæ, a town of Germany on the confluence of the Feibach and the Rhine, now Rhin-Zabern.—Riguxæ, now Bern-Castel, on the Moselle.—Tribocorum, a town of Alsace in France, now Saverne.

Tabor, a mountain of Palestine.

Tabræca, a maritime town of Africa, near Hippo, made a Roman colony. The neighbouring forests abounded with monkeys. Juv. 10, v. 194.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Ital. 3, v. 256.

Tabuda, a river of Germany, now the Schedd. Plut.

Taburnus, a mountain of Campania, which abounded with olives. Virg. G. 2, v. 38. Æn. 12, v. 715.

Tacape, a town of Africa.

Tacatus, a maritime town of Numidia.

Tacfarinas, a Numidian who commanded an army against the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had formerly served in the Roman legions, but in the character of an enemy, he displayed the most inveterate hatred against his benefactor. After he had severally defeated the officers of Tiberius, he was at last routed and killed in the field of battle, fighting with uncommon fury, by Dolabella. Tacit. Ann. 2, &c.

Tachampso, an island in the Nile, near Thebais. The Egyptians held one half of this island, and the rest was in the hands of the Æthiopians. Herodot. 2.

Tachos, or Tachus, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, against whom he sustained a long war. He was assisted by the Greeks, but his confidence in Agesilaus king of Lacedæmon proved fatal to him. Chabrias the Athenian had been entrusted with the fleet of the Egyptian monarch, and Agesilaus was left with the command of the mercenary army. The Lacedæmonian disregarded his engagements, and by joining with Nectanebus, who had revolted from Tachus, he ruined the affairs of the monarch, and obliged him to save his life by flight. Some observe that Agesilaus acted with that duplicity to avenge himself upon Tachus, who had insolently ridiculed his short and deformed stature. The expectations of Tachus had been raised by the fame of Agesilaus; but when he saw the lame monarch, he repeated on the occasion the fable of the mountain which brought forth a mouse, upon which Agesiulus replied with asperity, though he called him a mouse, yet he soon should find him to be a lion. C. Nep. in Ages.

TACINA, a river of the Brutii.

TACITA, a goddess who presided over silence. Numa, as some say, paid particular veneration to this divinity.

TACITUS C. CORNELIUS, a celebrated Latin historian, born in the reign of Nero. His father was a Roman knight, who had been appointed governor of Belgic Gaul. The native genius and the rising talents of Tacitus were beheld with rapture by the emperor Vespasian, and as he wished to protect and patronize merit, he raised the young historian to places of trust and honour. The succeeding emperors were not less partial to Tacitus, and Domitian seemed to forget his cruelties, when virtue and innocence claimed his patronage. Tacitus was honoured with the consulship, and he gave proofs of his eloquence at the bar by supporting the cause of the injured Africans against the proconsul Marius Priscus, and in causing him to be condemned for his avarice and extortion. The friendly intercourse of Pliny and Tacitus has often been admired, and many have observed, that the familiarity of these two great men arose from similar principles, and a perfect conformity of manners and opinions. Yet Tacitus was as much the friend of a republican government, as Pliny was an admirer of the imperial power, and of the short-lived virtues of his patron Trajan. Pliny gained the heart of his adherents by affability, and all the elegant graces which became the courtier and the favourite, while Tacitus conciliated the esteem of the world by his virtuous conduct, which prudence and love of honour ever guided. The friendship of Tacitus and of Pliny almost became proverbial, and one was scarce mentioned without the other, as the following instance may indicate. At the exhibition of the spectacles in the circus, Tacitus held a long conversation on different subjects with a Roman knight, with whom he was unacquainted; and when the knight asked him whether he was a native of Italy, the historian told him that he was not unknown to him, and that for their distant acquaintance he was indebted to literature. "Then you are," replied the knight, "either Tacitus or Pliny." The time of Tacitus was not employed in trivial pursuits; the orator might have been forgotten if the historian had not flourished. Tacitus wrote a treatise on the manners of the Germans, a composition admired for the fidelity and exactness with which it is executed, though some have declared that the historian delineated manners and customs with which he was not acquainted, and which never existed. His life of C. Julius Agricola, whose daughter he had married, is celebrated for its purity, elegance, and the many excellent instructions and important truths which it relates. His history of the Roman emperors is imperfect; of the 28 years of which it treated, that is from the 59th to the 96th year of the christian era, nothing remains but the year 60, and part of the 70th. His annals were the most extensive and complete of his works. The history of the reign of Tiberius, Caius, Claudius, and Nero, was treated with accuracy and attention, yet we are to lament the loss of the history of the reign of Caius, and the beginning of that of Claudius. Tacitus had reserved for his old age the history of the reign of Nerva and Trajan, and he also proposed to give to the world an account of the interesting administration of Augustus; but these important subjects never employed the pen of the historian, and as some of the ancients observe, the only compositions of Tacitus were contained in 30 books, of which we have now left only 16 of his annals, and five of his history. The style of Tacitus has always been admired for peculiar beauties: the thoughts are great; there is a sublimity, force, weight, and energy; everything is treated with precision and dignity. Yet many have called him obscure, because he was fond of expressing his ideas in few words. This was the fruit of experience and judgment; the history appears copious and diffuse, while the annals, which were written in his old age, are less flowing as to style, more concise, and more heavily laboured. His Latin is remarkable for being pure and classical; and though a writer in the decline of the Roman empire, he has not used obsolete words, antiquated phrases, or barbarous expressions, but with him everything is sanctioned by the authority of the writers of the Augustan age. In his biographical sketches he displays an uncommon knowledge of human nature; he paints every scene with a masterly hand, and gives each object its proper size and becoming colours. Affairs of importance are treated with dignity, the secret causes of events and revolutions are investigated from their primeval source, and the historian everywhere shows his reader that he was a friend of public liberty and national independence, a lover of truth, and of the general good and welfare of mankind, and an inveterate enemy to oppression and to a tyrannical government. The history of the reign of Tiberius is his masterpiece: the deep policy, the dissimulation and various intrigues of this celebrated prince, are painted with all the fidelity of the historian; and Tacitus boasted in saying, that he neither would flatter the follies, or maliciously or partially represent the extravagance, of the several characters he delineated. Candour and impartiality were his standard, and his claim to these essential qualifications of an historian have never been disputed. It is said that the emperor Tacitus, who boasted in being one of the dependants of the historian, ordered the works of his ancestor to be placed in all public libraries, and directed that 10 copies, well ascertained for accuracy and exactness, should be yearly written, that so great and so valuable a work might not be lost. Some ecclesiastical writers have exclaimed against Tacitus for the partial manner in which he speaks of the Jews and christians; but it should be remembered that he spoke the language of the Romans, and that the peculiarities of the christians could not but draw upon them the odium and the ridicule of the pagans, and the imputation of superstition. Among the many excellent editions of Tacitus, these may pass for the best: that of Rome, fol. 1515; that in 8vo, 3 vols. L. Bat. 1673; that in usum Delphum, 4 vols. 4to, Paris, 1682; that of Lips. 2 vols. 8vo, 1714; of Gronovius, 2 vols. 4to, 1721; that of Broetier, 2 vols. 12mo, Paris, 1776; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1777; and Harbous's, 3 vols. 12mo, Paris, 1760.—M. Claudius, a Roman chosen emperor by the senate, after the death of Aurelian. He would have refused this important and dangerous office, but the pressing solicitations of the senate prevailed, and in the 70th year of his age he complied with the wishes of his countrymen, and accepted the purple. The time of his administration was very popular, the good of the people was his care, and as a pattern of moderation, economy, temperance, regularity, and impartiality, Tacitus found no equal. He abolished the several brothels which under the preceding reigns had filled Rome with licentiousness and obscenity; and by ordering all the public baths to be shut at sunset, he prevented the commission of many irregularities, which the darkness of the night had hitherto sanctioned. The senators under Tacitus seemed to have recovered their ancient dignity and long-lost privileges. They were not only the counsellors of the emperor, but they even seemed to be his masters; and when Flavianus, the brother-in-law of Tacitus, was refused the consulship, the emperor said, that the senate, no doubt, could fix upon a more deserving object. As a warrior, Tacitus is inferior to few of the Romans; and during a short reign of about six months, he not only repelled the barbarians who had invaded the territories of Rome in Asia, but he prepared to make war against the Persians and Scythians. He died in Cilicia as he was on his expedition, of a violent distemper, or, according to some, he was destroyed by the secret dagger of an assassin, on the 13th of April, in the 27th year of the christian era. Tacitus has been commended for his love of learning; and it has been observed, that he never passed a day without consecrating some part of his time to reading or writing. He has been accused of superstition, and authors have recorded that he never studied on the second day of each month, a day which he deemed inauspicious and unlucky. Tacit. Vit. — Lucan.

Tader, a river of Spain, near New Carthage.

Tædæa, a prostitute at Rome, &c. Juv. 2, v. 49.

Tænærus, now Matapan, a promontory of Laconia, the most southern point of Europe, where Neptune had a temple. There was there a large and deep cavern, whence issued a black and unwholesome vapour, from which circumstance the poets have imagined that it was one of the entrances of hell, through which Hercules dragged Cerberus from the infernal regions. This fabulous tradition arises, according to Pausanias, from the continual resort of a large serpent near the cavern of Tænærus, whose bite was mortal. The serpent, as the geographer observes, was at last killed by Hercules, and carried to Eurystheus. The town of Tænærus was at the distance of about 40 stadia from the promontory, and was famous for marble of a beautiful green colour. The town, as well as the promontory, received its name from Tænarus, a son of Neptune. There were some festivals celebrated there, called Tænæria, in honour of Neptune, surnamed Tænærius. *Homer. Tænias, a part of the lake Mæotis. Strab.

Tægeste, a town of Numidia. Plin. 5, c. 4.

Tages, a son of Genius, grandson of Jupiter, was the first who taught the 12 nations of the Etrurians the science of augury and divination. It is said that he was found by a Tuscan ploughman in the form of a clod, and that he assumed a human shape to instruct this nation, which became so celebrated for their knowledge of omens and incantations. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 23. — Ovid. Met. 15, v. 558. — Lucan. 1, v. 673.

Tagonius, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis.

Tagus, a river of Spain, which falls into the Atlantic after it has crossed Lusitania or Portugal, and now bears the name of Tajo. The sands of the Tagus, according to the poets, were covered with gold. *Meib. 3, c. 1. — Ovid. Talassius. Vid. Thalassius.

Talaus, a son of Bias and Pero, father of Adrastus by Lysimache. He was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 6.

Talayra, the sister of Phœbe. She is also called Hilaira. Vid. Phœbe.

Talotum, a temple sacred to the sun on mount Taygetus in Laconia. Horses were generally offered there for sacrifice. Paus.

Talthybius, a herald in the Grecian camp during the Trojan war, the particular minister and friend of Agamemnon. He brought away Briseis from the tent of Achilles by order of his master. Talthybius died at Ægium in Achaia. Homer. Il. 2, v. 320, &c. — Paus. 7, c. 23.

Talus, a youth, son of the sister of Dædalus, who invented the saw, compasses, and other mechanical instruments. His uncle became jealous of his growing fame, and murdered him privately; or, according to others, he threw him down from the citadel of Athens. Talus was changed into a partridge by the gods. He is also called Calus, Acubus, Perdix, and Taltris. Apollod. 3, c. 1. — Paus. 1, c. 21. — Ovid. Met. 8, c. 1. — A son of Ctenopion. Paus. 7, c. 4. — A son of Cres, the founder of the Cretan nation. Paus. 8, c. 53. — A friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 513.

Tamaris, a river of Spain.

Tamærus, a mountain of Epirus, called also Tmarus and Tomarus. Strab.

Tamæsa, a beautiful plain of Cyprus, sacred to the goddess of beauty. It was in this place that Venus gathered the golden apples with which Hippomanes was enabled to overtake Atalanta. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 644. — Plin. 5. — Strab. 14.

Tamesis, a river of Britain, now the Thames. Cæs. G. 5, c. 11.

Tamos, a native of Memphis, made governor of Ionia, by young Cyrus. After the death of Cyrus, Tamos fled into Egypt, where he was murdered on account of his immense treasures. Diod. 14. — A promontory of India in the Ganges.

Tampius, a Roman historian.

Tamyrras, a river of Phœnicia, between Tyre and Sidon.

Tamyris, a queen. Vid. Thomyris.

Tanagra, a town of Bœotia, near the Euripus, between the Asopus and Thermodon, famous for fighting-cocks. It was founded by Pœmandros, a son of Cheresilaus the son of Jasius, who married Tanagra the daughter of Æolus, or, according to some, of the Asopus. Corinna was a native of Tanagra. Strab. 9. — Paus. 9, c. 20 & 23. — Elian. V. H. 13, v. 25.

Tanærus, or Tanæger, now Negro, a river of Lucania in Italy, remarkable for its cascades, and the beautiful meanders of its streams, through a fine picturesque country. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.

Tannais, a eunuch, freedman to Mæcenæus. *Horat. 1, sat. 1, v. 105. — A river of Scythia, now the Don, which divides Europe from Asia, and falls into the Palus Mæoticus after a rapid course, and after it has received the additional streams of many small rivulets. Artaxerxes the son of Darius was the first who raised statues to Tanais in the different provinces of his empire, and taught his subjects to pay her divine honours. Curt. 5, c. 1.—Strab. 11.

Tanaquil, called also Caia Cæcilia, was the wife of Tarquin the fifth king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, where she married Lucumon, better known by the name of Tarquin, which he assumed after he had come to Rome at the representation of his wife, whose knowledge of augury promised him something uncommon. Her expectations were not frustrated; her husband was raised to the throne, and she shared with him the honours of royalty. After the murder of Tarquin, Tanaquil raised her son-in-law Servius Tullius to the throne, and ensured him the succession. She distinguished herself by her liberality; and the Romans in succeeding ages had such a veneration for her character, that the embroidery she had made, her girdle, as also the robe of her son-in-law, which she had worked with her own hands, were preserved with the greatest sanctity. Juvenal bestows the appellation of Tanaquil on all such women as were imperious, and had the command of their husbands. Liv. 1, c. 34, &c.—*Dionys. Tanetum, a town of Italy, now Toneto, in the duchy of Modena.

Tanfane lucus, a sacred grove in Germany, in the country of the Marci, between the Ems and Lippe. Tacit. A. 1, c. 51.

Tania, a city of Egypt, on one of the eastern mouths of the Nile.

Tantalides, a patronymic applied to the descendants of Tantalus, such as Niobe, Hermione, &c.—Agamemnon and Menelaus, as grandsons of Tantalus, are called Tantalidae fratres. Ovid. Heroid. 8, v. 45 & 122.

Tantalus, a king of Lydia, son of Jupiter by a nymph called Pluto. He was father of Niobe, Pelops, &c., by Dione, one of the Atlantides, called by some Euryanassa. Tantalus is represented by the poets as punished in hell with an insatiable thirst, and placed up to the chin in the midst of a pool of water, which, however, flows away as soon as he attempts to taste it. There hangs also above his head a bough richly loaded with delicious fruit, which, as soon as he attempts to seize, is carried away from his reach by a sudden blast of wind. According to some mythologists, his punishment is to sit under a huge stone hung at some distance over his head, and as it seems every moment ready to fall, he is kept under continual alarms and never-ceasing fears. The causes of this eternal punishment are variously explained. Some declare that it was inflicted upon him because he stole a favourite dog, which Jupiter had entrusted to his care to keep his temple in Crete. Others say that he stole away the nectar and ambrosia from the tables of the gods, when he was admitted into the assemblies of heaven, and that he gave it to mortals on earth. Others support that this proceeds from his cruelty and impiety in killing his son Pelops, and in serving his limbs as food before the gods, whose divinity and power he wished to try, when they had stopped at his house as they passed over Phrygia. There were also others who impute it to his lasciviousness in carrying away Ganymedes to gratify the most unnatural of passions. Pindar. Olymp. 1.—Homer. Od. 11, v. 581.—*Cic. Taphisæ, islands in the Ionian sea called Taliboides. They received these names from Taphius and Telebus, the sons of Neptune who reigned there. The Taphians made war against Electryon king of Mycenæ, and killed all his sons; upon which the monarch promised his kingdom and his daughter in marriage to whoever could avenge the death of his children upon the Taphians. Amphitryon did it with success, and obtained the promised reward. The Taphians were expert sailors, but too fond of plunder and piratical excursions. *Homer. Taphius, a son of Neptune by Hippothoe the daughter of Nestor. He was king of the Taphians, to which he gave his name. Strab. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.

Taphius, or Taphiasus, a mountain of Locris on the confines of Ætolia.

Taphiusa, a place near Leucas, where a stone is found called Taphiusius. Plin. 36, c. 21.

Taphræ, a town on the isthmus of the Taurica Chersonesus, now Precep. Meta, 2, c. 1.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Taphros, the strait between Corsica and Sardinia, now Bonifacio.

Taprobane, an island in the Indian ocean, now called Ceylon. Its inhabitants were very rich, and lived to a great age. Their country was visited by two summers and two winters. Hercules was their chief deity, and as the sovereignty was elective, and only from among unmarried men, the monarch was immediately deposed if he became a father. Plol. 6.—Strab. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 8, el. 5, v. 80.

Tarchetius, an impious king of Alba. Plut. in Rom.

Tarohon, an Etrurian chief, who assisted Æneas against the Rutuli. Some suppose that he founded Mantua. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 693.—A prince of Cilicia. Lucan. 9, v. 210.

Tarohondimotus, a prince of Cilicia. Lucan. 11, v. 210.

Tarentum, Tarentus, or Tarus, a town of Calabria, situate on a bay of the same name, near the mouth of the river Galesus. It was founded, or rather repaired, by a Lacedæmonian colony, about 707 years before Christ, under the conduct of Phalanthus. Long independent, it maintained its superiority over 13 tributary cities; and could once arm 100,000 foot and 3000 horse. The people of Tarentum were very indolent, and as they were easily supplied with all necessaries as well as luxuries from Greece, they gave themselves up to voluptuousness, so that the delights of Tarentum became proverbial. The war which they supported against the Romans, with the assistance of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, and which has been called the Tarentine war, is greatly celebrated in history. This war, which had been undertaken B.C. 281, by the Romans, to avenge the insults the Tarentines had offered to their ships when near their harbour, was terminated after 10 years; 300,000 prisoners were taken, and Tarentum became subject to Rome. The government was democratical; there were, however, some monarchs who reigned there. It was for some time the residence of Pythagoras, who inspired the citizens with the love of virtue, and rendered them superior to their neighbours in the cabinet as well as in the field of battle. The large, beautiful, and capacious harbour of Tarentum is greatly commended by ancient historians. Tarentum, now called Taranto, is inhabited by about 18,000 souls, who still maintain the character of their forefathers in idleness and effeminacy, and live chiefly by fishing. Flor. 1, c. 18.—*Val. Tarnæ, a town mentioned by Homer, Il. 5.—A fountain of Lydia, near Tmolus. Strab.—A river of Aquitania.

Tarpe Spurius Mæstius, a critic at Rome in the age of Augustus. He was appointed with four others in the temple of Apollo, to examine the merit of every poetical composition, which was to be deposited in the temple of the Muses. In this office he acted with great impartiality, though many taxed him with want of candour. All the pieces that were represented on the Roman stage had previously received his approbation. Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 38.

Tarpeia, the daughter of Tarpeius the governor of the citadel of Rome, promised to open the gates of the city to the Sabines, provided they gave her their gold bracelets, or, as she expressed it, what they carried on their left hands. Tatius the king of the Sabines consented, and as he entered the gates, to punish her perfidy, he threw not only his bracelet but his shield upon Tarpeia. His followers imitated his example, and Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of the bracelets and shields of the Sabine army. She was buried in the capitol, which from her has been called the Tarpeian rock, and there afterwards many of the Roman malefactors were thrown down a deep precipice. Plut. in Rom.—*Ovid. Tarpeia lex, was enacted A.U.C. 269, by Sp. Tarpeius, to empower all the magistrates of the republic to lay fines on offenders. This power belonged before only to the consuls. This fine was not to exceed 20 sheep and 30 oxen.

Sp. Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel of Rome, under Romulus. His descendants were called Montani and Capitolini.

Tarpeius mons, a hill at Rome about 80 feet in perpendicular height, from whence the Romans threw down their condemned criminals. It received its name from Tarpeia, who was buried there, and is the same as the Capitoline hill. Liv. 6, c. 20.—Lucan. 7, v. 258.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 347 & 657.

Tarquini, ooov Tarchina, a town of Etruria, built by Tarcho, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. Tarquinius Priscus was born or educated there, and he made it a Roman colony when he ascended the throne. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 95.—Liv. 2, c. 34. l. 27, c. 4.

Tarquiniæ, a daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, who married Servius Tullius. When her husband was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, she privately conveyed away his body by night, and buried it. This preyed upon her mind, and the night following she died. Some have attributed her death to excess of grief, or to suicide, while others, perhaps more justly, have suspected Tullia the wife of young Tarquin of the murder.—A vestal virgin, who, as some suppose, gave the Roman people a large piece of land, which was afterwards called the Campus Martius.

Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king of Rome, was son of Demaratus, a native of Greece. His first name was Lucumon, but this he changed when, by the advice of his wife Tanaquil, he had come to Rome. He called himself Lucius, and assumed the surname of Tarquinius, because born in the town of Tarquinii, in Etruria. At Rome he distinguished himself so much by his liberality and engaging manners, that Ancus Martius, the reigning monarch, nominated him, at his death, the guardian of his children. This was insufficient to gratify the ambition of Tarquin; the princes were young, and an artful oration delivered to the people immediately transferred the crown of the deceased monarch on the head of Lucumon. The people had every reason to be satisfied with their choice. Tarquin reigned with moderation and popularity. He increased the number of the senate, and made himself friends by electing 100 new senators from the plebeians, whom he distinguished by the appellation of Patres minorum gentium, from those of the patrician body, who were called Patres majorum gentium. The glory of the Roman army, which was supported with so much dignity by the former monarch, was not neglected in this reign, and Tarquin showed that he possessed vigour and military prudence in the victories which he obtained over the united forces of the Latins and Sabines, and in the conquest of the 12 nations of Etruria. He repaired, in the time of peace, the walls of the capital; the public places were adorned with elegant buildings and useful ornaments, and many centuries after, such as were spectators of the stately mansions and golden palaces of Nero, viewed with more admiration and greater pleasure the more simple, though not less magnificent, edifices of Tarquin. He laid the foundations of the capitol, and to the industry and the public spirit of this monarch, the Romans were indebted for their aqueducts and subterraneous sewers, which supplied the city with fresh and wholesome water, and removed all the filth and ordure, which in a great capital too often breed pestilence and diseases. Tarquin was the first who introduced among the Romans the custom to canvass for offices of trust and honour; he distinguished the monarch, the senators, and other inferior magistrates with particular robes and ornaments, with ivory chairs at spectacles, and the hatchets carried before the public magistrates were by his order surrounded with bundles of sticks, to strike more terror, and to be viewed with greater reverence. Tarquin was assassinated by the two sons of his predecessor, in the 80th year of his age, 38 of which he had sat on the throne, 58 years before Christ. Diomys. Hal. 3. c. 59.—Val. Max. 1. c. 4. l. 3. c. 2.—Flor. 1. c. 5. &c.—Liv. 1. c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6. v. 817.—The second Tarquin, surnamed Superbus, from his pride and insolence, was grandson of Tarquin Priscus. He ascended the throne of Rome after his father-in-law Servius Tullius, and was the seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia the daughter of Tullius, and it was at her instigation that he murdered his father-in-law, and seized the kingdom. The crown which he had obtained with violence, he endeavoured to keep by a continuation of tyranny. Unlike his royal predecessors, he paid no regard to the decisions of the senate, or the approbation of the public assemblies, and by wishing to disregard both, he incurred the jealousy of the one and the odium of the other. The public treasury was soon exhausted by the continual extravagance of Tarquin, and to silence the murmurs of his subjects, he resolved to call their attention to war. He was successful in his military operations, and the neighbouring cities submitted; but while the siege of Ardea was continued, the wantonness of the son of Tarquin at Rome for ever stopped the progress of his arms; and the Romans, whom a series of barbarity and oppression had hitherto provoked, no sooner saw the virtuous Lucretia stab herself, not to survive the loss of her honour [Vid. Lucretia], than the whole city and camp arose with indignation against the monarch. The gates of Rome were shut against him, and Tarquin was for ever banished from his throne, in the year of Rome 244. Unable to find support from even one of his subjects, Tarquin retired among the Etrurians, who attempted in vain to replace him on his throne. The republican government was established at Rome, and all Italy refused any longer to support the cause of an exiled monarch against a nation, who heard the name of Tarquin, of king, and tyrant, mentioned with equal horror and indignation. Tarquin died in the 90th year of his age, about 14 years after his expulsion from Rome. He had reigned about 25 years. Though Tarquin appeared so odious among the Romans, his reign was not without its share of glory. His conquests were numerous; to beautify the buildings and porticoes at Rome was his wish, and with great magnificence and care he finished the capitol, which his predecessor of the same name had begun. He also bought the Sibylline books which the Romans consulted with such religious solemnity. Vid.

Collatinus*.—Sextius, the eldest of the sons of Tarquin the Proud, rendered himself known by a variety of adventures. When his father besieged Gabii, young Tarquin publicly declared that he was at variance with the monarch, and the report was the more easily believed when he came before Gabii with his body all mangled and bloody with stripes. This was an agreement between the father and the son, and Tarquin had no sooner declared that this proceeded from the tyranny and oppression of his father, than the people of Gabii entrusted him with the command of their armies, fully convinced that Rome could never have a more inveterate enemy. When he had thus succeeded, he despatched a private messenger to his father, but the monarch gave no answer to be returned to his son. Sextius inquired more particularly about his father, and when he heard from the messenger that when the message was delivered, Tarquin cut off with a stick the tallest poppies in his garden, the son followed the example by putting to death the most noble and powerful citizens of Gabii. The two soon fell into the hands of the Romans. The violence which some time after Tarquinus offered to Lucretia, was the cause of his father's exile, and the total expulsion of his family from Rome. Vid. Lucretia. Tarsus, a river of Troas. Strab.
Tarsus, now Tarasso, a town of Cilicia, on the Cydnus, founded by Triptolemus, and a colony of Argives, or, as others say, by Sardanapalus, or by Perseus. Tarsus was celebrated for the great men it produced. It was once the rival of Alexandria and Athens in literature and the study of the polite arts. The people of Tarsus wished to ingratiate themselves into the favour of J. Cæsar by giving the name of Juliotropolis to their city, but it was soon lost. Lucan. 3, v. 225.—Mela, 1, c. 13.—Strab. 14.

Tartarus, (pl. a. orum), one of the regions of hell, where, according to the ancients, the most impious and guilty among mankind were punished. It was surrounded by a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the sight by a cloud of darkness, which is represented three times more gloomy than the obscurest night. According to Hesiod it was a separate prison, at a greater distance from the earth than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil says that it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls, and by the impetuous and burning streams of the river Phlegethon. The entrance was by a large and lofty tower, whose gates were supported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men could open. In Tartarus, according to Virgil, were punished such as had been disobedient to their parents, traitors, adulterers, faithless ministers, and such as had undertaken unjust and cruel wars, or had betrayed their friends for the sake of money. It was also the place where Ixion, Tityus, the Danaides, Tantalus, Sisyphus, &c., were punished, according to Ovid. Hesiod. Theog. v. 720.—Sil. 13, v. 591.—Virg. Æn. 6.—Homer. Od. 11.—*Ovid. Tartessus, a town in Spain near the columns of Hercules, on the Mediterranean. Some suppose that it was afterwards called Carteia, and it was better known by the name of Gades, when Hercules had set up his columns on the extremity of Spain and Africa. There is also a town called Tartessus, in a small island formed by the river of the same name, near Gades in Iberia. Tartessus has been called the most distant town in the extremities of Spain, by the Romans, as also the place where the poets imagined the sun unharnessed his tired horses. Sil. 3, v. 399 & 411. 1, v. 538.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 10.—*Ovid. Tatian, one of the Greek fathers, A.D. 172. The best edition of his works is that of Worth, 8vo, Oxon. 1700.

Tatienses, a name given to one of the tribes of the Roman people by Romulus, in honour of Tatius king of the Sabines. The Tatienses, who were partly the ancient subjects of the king of the Sabines, lived on mounts Capitolinus and Quirinalis.

Tätius Titus, king of Cures among the Sabines, made war against the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. The gates of the city were betrayed into his hands by Tarpeia, and the army of the Sabines advanced as far as the Roman forum, where a bloody battle was fought. The cries of the Sabine virgins at last stopped the fury of the combatants, and an agreement was made between the two nations. Tatius consented to leave his ancient possessions, and with his subjects of Cures, to come and live in Rome, which, as stipulated, was permitted still to bear the name of its founder, whilst the inhabitants adopted the name of Quirites in compliment to the new citizens. After he had for six years shared the royal authority with Romulus, in the greatest union, he was murdered at Lanuvium, B.C. 742, for an act of cruelty to the ambassadors of the Laurentes. This was done by order of his royal colleague, according to some authors. Liv. 1, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Rom.—Cic. pro Balb.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 804.—Flor. 1, c. 4.

There is a small river near it called Taurominus. Diod. 16.

Taurus, the largest mountain of Asia, as to extent. One of its extremities is in Caria, and it extends not only as far as the most eastern extremities of Asia, but it also branches in several parts, and runs far into the north. Mount Taurus was known by several names, particularly in different countries. In Cilicia, where it reaches as far as the Euphrates, it was called Taurus. It was known by the names of Amanus, from the bay of Issus as far as the Euphrates; of Antitaurus from the western boundaries of Cilicia up to Armenia; of Montes Mattieni in the country of the Leucosyrians; of Mons Moschicus at the south of the river Phasis; of Amaranta at the north of the Phasis; of Caucasus between the Hyrcanian and Euxine seas; of Hyrcanii Montes near Hyrcania; of Amanus in the more eastern parts of Asia. The word Taurus was more properly confined to the mountains which separate Phrygia and Pamphylia from Cilicia. The several passes which were opened in the mountains were called Pyle, and hence frequent mention is made in ancient authors of the Armenian Pylæ, Cilician Pylæ, &c. Mela, 1, c. 15. l. 3, c. 7 & 8.—Plin. 5, c. 27.—A mountain in Germany. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 41.—Of Sicily.—Titus Statilius, a consul distinguished by his intimacy with Augustus, as well as by a theatre which he built, and the triumph which he obtained after a prosperous campaign in Africa. He was made prefect of Italy by his imperial friend.—A proconsul of Africa, accused by Agrippina, who wished him to be condemned, that she might become mistress of his gardens. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 59.—An officer of Minos king of Crete. He had an amour with Pasiphæa, whence arose the fable of the Minotaur, from the son, who was born some time after. Vid. Minotaurus. Taurus was vanquished by Theseus, in the games which Minos exhibited in Crete. Plut. in These.

Taxila (plur.), a large country in India, between the Indus and the Hydaspes. Strab. 15.

Taxilus, or Taxiles, a king of Taxila in the age of Alexander, called also Omphis. He submitted to the conqueror, who rewarded him with great liberality. Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Alian.—V. H. 5, c. 6.—Curt. 8, c. 14.—A general of Mithridates, who assisted Archelaus against the Romans in Greece. He was afterwards conquered by Murræna the lieutenant of Sylla.

Taximaquillus, a king in the southern parts of Britain when Cæsar invaded it. Cæs. 5, G. c. 22.

Taygète, or Taygêta, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, mother of Lacedæmon by Jupiter. She became one of the Pleiades after death. Hyg. fab. 155 & 192.—Paus. in Cic. 1 & 18.

Taygétus, or Taygêta (orum), a mountain of Laconia, in Peloponnesus, at the west of the river Eurotas. It hung over the city of Lacedæmon, and it is said that once a part of it fell down by an earthquake, and destroyed the suburbs. It was on this mountain that the Lacedæmonian women celebrated the orgies of Bacchus. Mela, 2, c. 5.—Paus. 3, c. 1.—Strab. 8.—Lucan. 5, v. 52.—Virg. G. 2, v. 488.

Teanum, a town of Campania, on the Apennian road, at the east of the Liris, called Sidicinum, to be distinguished from another town of the same name at the west of Apulia, at a small distance from the coast of the Adriatic. The rights of citizenship were extended to it under Augustus. Cic. Cluent. 9 & 69. Phil. 12, c. 11.—Horat. 1, ep. 1.—Plin. 31, c. 2.—Liv. 22, c. 27.

Tearus, a river of Thrace, rising in the same rock from 38 different sources, some of which are hot, and others cold. Darius raised a column there when he marched against the Scythians, as if to denote the sweetness and salubrity of the waters of that river. Herodot. 4, 5, 90, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

Teatea, Teate, or Tegate, a town of Latium. Sil. It. 8, v. 522. l. 17, v. 457.

Teche, a mountain of Pontus, from which the 10,000 Greeks had first a view of the sea. Xenoph. Anab. 4.

Techemessa, the daughter of a Phrygian prince, called by some Teuthras, and by others Teleutas. When her father was killed in war by Ajax son of Telamon, the young princess became the property of the conqueror, and by him she had a son called Eurysaces. Sophocles, in one of his tragedies, represents Techemessa as moving her husband to pity by her tears and entreaties, when he wished to stab himself. Horat. 2, od. 1, v. 6.—Dictys Cret.—Sophoc. in Ajac.

Teconia, a town of Epirus. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Teconatis, a king of Egypt.

Tectæmus, a son of Dorus, grandson of Hellen the son of Deucalion, went to Crete with the Ætoliens and Pelasgians, and reigned there. He had a son called Asterus by the daughter of Cretheus.

Tectosagæ, or Tectosagæ, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, whose capital was the modern Toulouse. They received the name of Tectosagæ quod sagis tegetentur. Some of them passed into Germany, where they settled near the Hercynian forest, and another colony passed into Asia, where they conquered Phrygia, Paphlagonia, and Cappadocia. The Tectosagæ were among those Gauls who pillaged Rome under Brennus, and who attempted some time after to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. At their return home from Greece they were visited by a pestilence, and ordered, to stop it, to throw into the river all the riches and plunder which they had obtained in their distant excursions. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 23.—Strab. 4.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3.—Liv. 38, c. 16.—Flor. 2, c. 11.—Jutlin. 32.

Tecum, a river of Gaul falling from the Pyrenees into the Mediterranean.

Tedanius, a river of Liburnia. Plin. 3, c. 21.

Tegæa, or Tegæa, now Moklai, a town of Arcadia in the Peloponnesus, founded by Tegæates, a son of Lycaon, or, according to others, by Aleus. The gigantic bones of Orestes were found buried there and removed to Sparta. Apollo and Pan were worshipped there, and there also Ceres, Persephone, and Venus had each a temple. The inhabitants were called Tegæates; and the epithet Tegæa is given to Atalanta, as a native of the place. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 7. Fast. 6, v. 531.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 293.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 45, &c.

Tegula F. Licini, a comic poet who flourished B.C. 198.

Tegyra, a town of Bœotia where Apollo Tegyraeus was worshipped. There was a battle fought there between the Thebans and the Peloponnesians.

Telios. Vid. Teos.

Telium, a town of Paphlagonia on the Euxine sea.

Tela, a town of Spain.

Telamon, a king of the island of Salamis, son of Æacus and Endeis. He was brother to Peleus, and father to Teucer and to Ajax, who on that account is often called Telamonius Aëros. He fled from Megara, his native country, after he had accidentally murdered his brother Phocus in playing with the quoit, and he sailed to the island of Salamis, where he soon after married Glaucæ, the daughter of Cychreus the king of the place. At the death of his father-in-law, who had no male issue, Telamon became king of Salamis. He accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis, and was arm-bearer to Hercules, when that hero took Laomedon prisoner, and destroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his services with the hand of Hesione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the spoils of Troy, and with her he returned to Greece. He also married Periboea, whom some call Eriboea. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 151.—Sophoc. in Aj.—Pindar. Isthm. 6.—Stat. Theb. 6.—Apollod. 1, 2, &c.—Paus. in Cor.—Hygin. fab. 97, &c.—A seaport town of Etruria. Met. 2, c. 4.

Telamonides, a patronymic given to the descendants of Telamon.

Telchines, a people of Rhodes, said to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many useful arts, and, according to Diodorus, passed for the sons of the sea. They were the first who raised statues to the gods. They had the power of changing themselves into whatever shape they pleased, and, according to Ovid, they could poison and fascinate all objects with their eyes, and cause rain and hail to fall at pleasure. The Telchines insulted Venus, for which the goddess inspired them with a sudden fury, so that they committed the grossest crimes, and offered violence even to their own mothers. Jupiter destroyed them all by a deluge. Diod.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 265, &c.

Telchinea, a surname of Minerva at Teumessa in Bœotia, where she had a temple. Paus. 9, c. 19.—Also a surname of Juno in Rhodes, where she had a statue at Ialysus raised by the Telchines, who settled there.—Also an ancient name of Crete, as the place from whence the Telchines of Rhodes were descended. Stat. 6, Syll. 6, v. 47.

Telchinius, a surname of Apollo among the Rhodians. Diod. 5.

Telchis, a son of Europa the son of Ægeleus. He was one of the first kings of the Peloponnesus.

Telea, a surname of Juno in Bœotia.

Teleboæ, or Teleboææ, a people of Ætolia, called also Taphians; some of whom left their native country, and settled in the island of Caprea. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 715. Vid. Taphiæ.

Teleboææ, a son of Ixion and the cloud. Ovid. Met. 11.—A son of Lycæon. Apollod.

Teleboïdes, islands opposite Leucadia. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Telôlos, or Telôlus, a Lacedæmonian king of the family of the Agidæ, who reigned 40 years, B.C. 813. Herodot. 7, c. 205.—Paus. 3, c. 2.—A philosopher, disciple of Læcidas, B.C. 214.—A Milesian.

Telœclides, an Athenian comic poet in the age of Pericles, one of whose plays, called the Amphictyon, is mentioned by ancient authors. Plut. in Nicla.—Athen.

Telœgônus, a son of Ulysses and Circe, born in the island of Ææa, where he was educated. When arrived to the years of manhood, he went to Ithaca to make himself known to his father, but he was shipwrecked on the coast, and, being destitute of provisions, he plundered some of the inhabitants of the island. Ulysses and Telemachus came to defend the property of their subjects against this unknown invader; a quarrel arose, and Telegonus killed his father without knowing who he was. He afterwards returned to his native country, and, according to Hyginus, he carried thither his father's body, where it was buried. Telemachus and Penelope also accompanied him in his return, and soon after the nuptials of Telegonus and Penelope were celebrated by order of Minerva. Penelope had by Telegonus a son called Italus, who gave his name to Italy. Telegonus founded Tusculum and Tibur or Præneste, in Italy, and, according to some, he left one daughter called Mamilia, from whom the patrician family of the Mamilli at Rome were descended. Horat. 3, od. 20, v. 8.—Ovid. Fast. 3 & 4.—Trist. 1, el. 1.—Plut. in Par.—Hygin. fab. 12.—Diod. 7.—A son of Proteus, killed by Hercules. Apollod.—A king of Egypt, who married to after she had been restored to her original form by Jupiter. Id.

Telœmachus, a son of Ulysses and Penelope. He was still in the cradle when his father went with the rest of the Greeks to the Trojan war. At the end of this celebrated war, Telemachus, anxious to see his father, went to seek him, and as the place of his residence, and the cause of his long absence, were then unknown, he visited the court of Menelaus and Nestor to obtain information. He afterwards returned to Ithaca, where the suitors of his mother Penelope had conspired to murder him; but he avoided their snares, and by means of Minerva, he discovered his father, who had arrived in the island two days before him, and was then in the house of Eumæus. With this faithful servant and Ulysses, Telemachus concerted how to deliver his mother from the importunities of her suitors, and it was effected with success. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the island of Ææa, where he married Circe, or, according to others, Cassiphonæ the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a son called Latinus. He some time after had the misfortune to kill his mother-in-law Circe, and fled to Italy, where he founded Clusium. Telemachus was accompanied in his visit to Nestor and Menelaus by the goddess of wisdom, under the form of Mentor. It is said that, when a child, Telemachus fell into the sea, and that a dolphin brought him safe to shore, after he had remained some time under water. From this circumstance Ulysses had the figure of a dolphin engraved on the seal which he wore on his ring. Hygin. fab. 95 & 125.—Ovid. Heroid. 1, v. 98.—Horat. 1, ep. 7, v. 41.—Homer. Od. 2, &c.—Lycophr. in Cass.

Telœmus, a Cyclops who was acquainted with futurity. He foretold to Polyphemus all the evils which he some time after suffered from Ulysses. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 771.

Telephassa, the mother of Cadmus, Phoenix, and Cilix by Agenor. She died in Thrace, as she was seeking her daughter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away. Apollod. 3, c. 1 & 4.

Telœphus, a king of Mysia, son of Hercules and Auge the daughter of Aleus. He was exposed as soon as born on mount Parthenius, but his life was preserved by a goat, and by some shepherds. According to Apollodorus, he was exposed, not on a mountain, but in the temple of Minerva, at Tegea, or, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, he was left to the mercy of the waves with his mother, by the cruelty of Aleus, and carried by the winds to the mouth of the Caycus, where he was found by Teuthras the king of the country, who married, or rather adopted as his daughter, Auge, and educated her son. Some, however, suppose that Auge fled to Teuthras to avoid the anger of her father, on account of her amour with Hercules. Yet others declare that Aleus gave her to Nauplius to be severely punished for her incontinence, and that Nauplius, unwilling to injure her, sent her to Teuthras king of Bithynia, by whom she was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wished to know his parents, to go to Mysia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Mysia, where Teuthras offered him his crown, and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hostilities of Idas the son of Aphareus. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Mysians, he soon routed the enemy, and received the promised reward. As he was going to unite himself to Auge, the sudden appearance of an enormous serpent separated the two lovers; Auge implored the assistance of Hercules, and was soon informed by the god that Telephus was her own son. When this was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus some time after married one of the daughters of king Priam. As one of the sons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to assist Priam against the Greeks, and with heroic valour he attacked them when they had landed on his coast. The carnage was great, and Telephus was victorious, had not Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, suddenly raised a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch, and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately rushed upon him, and wounded him so severely, that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, but Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it could totally cure it. Upon this, applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero observed that he was no physician, till Ulysses, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of one of the sons of Hercules, and who wished to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, persuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles consented, and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero scraped the rust from the point of his spear, and, by applying it to the sore, gave it immediate relief. It is said that Telephus showed himself so grateful to the Greeks, that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them against his father-in-law. Hygin. fab. 101.—Paus. 8, c. 48.—Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 42.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 1, l. 2, &c.—Philostr. Her.—Plin.—A friend of Horace, remarkable for his beauty and the elegance of his person. He was the favourite of Lydia the mistress of Horace, &c. Horat. 1, od. 12, l. 4, od. 11, v. 21.—A slave who conspired against Augustus. Sueton. in Aug.—L. Verus, wrote a book on the rhetoric of Homer, as also a companion of that poet with Plato, and other treatises, all lost.

Telesicles, a Parian, father to the poet Archilochus by a slave called Enippo. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 13.

Telesilla, a lyric poetess of Argos, who bravely defended her country against the Lacedæmonians, and obliged them to raise the siege. A statue was raised to her honour in the temple of Venus. Paus. 2, c. 20.

Telesinicus, a Corinthian auxiliary at Syracuse, &c. Polyam. 5.

Telesinus, a general of the Samnites, who joined the interest of Marius, and fought against the generals of Sylla. He marched towards Rome and defeated Sylla with great loss. He was afterwards routed in a bloody battle, and left in the number of the slain, after he had given repeated proofs of valour and courage. Plut. in Mar., &c.—A poet of considerable merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, v. 25.

Telesippus, a poor man of Phæzæ, father to the tyrant Dinias. Polyam. 2.

Telestagoras, a man of Naxos, whose daughters were ravished by some of the nobles of the island, in consequence of which they were expelled by the direction of Lygdamis, &c. Athen. 8.

Telestas, a son of Priam. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—An athlete of Messenia. Paus. 6, c. 14.—A king of Corinth, who died 729 B.C.

Telestes, a dithyrambic poet, who flourished B.C. 402.

Telethusa, the wife of Lygæus or Lyctus, a native of Crete. She became mother of a daughter, who was afterwards changed into a boy. Vid. Iphis. Ovid. Met. 9, 681.

Teleurias, a prince of Macedonia, &c. Xenophon.

Teleutias, the brother of Agesilaus, who was killed by the Olynthians, &c.

Teleute, a surname of Venus among the Egyptians. Plut. de Is. & Os.

Tellenæ, a town of Latium, now destroyed.

Liv. 1, c. 33.

Telles, a king of Achaia, son of Tisamenus. Paus. 7, c. 6.

Tellias, a famous soothsayer of Elis, in the age of Xerxes. He was greatly honoured in Phocis, where he had settled, and the inhabitants raised him a statue in the temple of Apollo, at Delpi. Paus. 10, v. 1.—Herodot. 8, c. 27.

Tellis, a Greek lyric poet, the father of Brasidas.

Tellus, a divinity, the same as the earth, the most ancient of all the gods after Chaos. She was mother by Coelus of Oceanus, Hyperion, Cœus, Rhea, Japetus, Themis, Saturn, Phœbe, Tethys, &c. Tellus is the same as the divinity who is honoured under the several names of Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Tithea, Bona Dea, Proserpine, &c.

Tellus is the same as the divinity who is honoured under the several names of Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Tithea, Bona Dea, Proserpine, &c. She was generally represented in the character of Tellus, as a woman with many breasts, distended with milk, to express the fecundity of the earth. She also appeared crowned with turrets, holding a sceptre in one hand and a key in the other; while at her feet was lying a tame lion without chains, as if to intimate that every part of the earth can be made fruitful by means of cultivation. Hesiod. Theog. v. 130.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 137.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—A poor man, whom Solon called happier than Cræsus the rich and ambitious king of Lydia. Tellus had the happiness to see a strong and healthy family of children, and at last to fall in the defence of his country. Herodot. 2, c. 30.—An Italian who is said to have had commerce with his mares, and to have had a daughter called Hippone, who became the goddess of horses.

Telmessus, or Telmessus, a town of Caria, whose inhabitants were skilled in augury and the interpretation of dreams. Cic. de Div. 1.—Strab. 14.—Liv. 37, c. 16.—Another in Lycia.—A third in Pisidia.

Telo Martius, a town at the south of Gaul, now Toulon.

Telon, a skilful pilot of Massilia, killed during the siege of that city by Cæsar. Lucan. 2, v. 592

—A king of the Teichosæ, who married Sebethis, by whom he had (Ebalus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Telos, a small island near Rhodes.

Teiphusa, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the Ladon who gave her name to a town and fountain of that place. The waters of the fountain Teiphusa were so cold, that Tyrias died by drinking them. Diod. 4.—Strab. 9.—Lycophron, 1040.

Telexippe, one of the muses according to Cic. de N. D. 3, c. 21.

Telys, a tyrant of Sybaris.

Temathæa, a mountain of Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 34.

Temōnium, a place in Messene, where Temenus was buried.

Temēnites, a surname of Apollo, which he received at Temenos, a small place near Syracuse, where he was worshipped. Cic. in Verr.

Temēnos, a place of Syracuse, where Apollo, called Temenites, had a statue. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 53.—Suet. Tib. 74.

Temēnus, the son of Aristomachus, was the first of the Heraclidæ, who returned to Peloponnesus with his brother Ctesiphontes, and in the reign of Tisamenus king of Argos. Temenus made himself master of the throne of Argos, from which he expelled the reigning sovereign. After death he was succeeded by his son-in-law Deiphon, who had married his daughter Hyrætho, and this succession was in preference to his own son. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 18 & 19.—A son of Pelægus, who was entrusted with the care of Juno's infancy. Paus. 8, c. 22.

Temerinda, the name of the Paulus Mæotis among the natives.

Temēssa, a town of Cyprus.—Another in Calabria in Italy, famous for its mines of copper, which were exhausted in the age of Strabo. Cic. Verr. 5, c. 15.—Liv. 34, c. 35.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 184.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 441. Met. 7, v. 207.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 6.

Temnes, a king of Sidon.

Temnos, a town of Æolia, at the mouth of the Hermus. Herodot. 2, c. 49.—Cic. Flacc. 18.

Tempe (plur.), a valley in Thessaly, between mount Olympus at the north and Ossa at the south, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean. The poets have described it as the most delightful spot on the earth, with continually cool shades and verdant walks, which the warbling of birds rendered more pleasant and romantic, and which the gods often honoured with their presence. Tempe extended about five miles in length, but varied in the dimensions of its breadth so as to be in some places scarce one acre and a half wide. All valleys that are pleasant, either for their situation or the mildness of their climate, are called Tempe by the poets. Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Diod. 4.—Dionys. Perieg. 219.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 1.—Plut. de Mus.—Virg. G. 2, v. 469.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 569.

Tenothori, a nation of Germany, who frequently changed the place of their habitation. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 56. H. 4, c. 21.

Tendera, a town of Caria. Liv. 33, c. 18.

Tenea, a part of Corinth. Mela, 2, c. 3.

Tenēdia securis. Vid. Tenes.

Tēnēdos, a small and fertile island of the Ægean sea, opposite Troy, at the distance of about 52 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Lesbos. It was anciently called Leucophrys, till Tenes the son of Cycnus settled there and built a town, which he called Tenedos, from which the whole island received its name. It became famous during the Trojan war, as it was there that the Greeks concealed themselves, the more effectually to make the Trojans believe that they were returned home without finishing the siege. Homer. Od. 3, v. 59.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 540. l. 12; v. 109.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Tēnērus, son of Apollo and Melia, received from his father the knowledge of futurity. Paus. 9, c. 10.

Tēnos, a son of Cycnus and Proclea. He was exposed on the sea, on the coast of Troas, by his father, who credulously believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cycnus, and accused him of attempts upon her virtue, when he refused to gratify her passion. Tenes arrived in Leucophrys, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the sovereign. Some time after Cycnus discovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wished to be reconciled to his son whom he had so grossly injured, he went to Tenedos. But when he had tied his ship to the shore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and suffered his father's ship to be tossed about in the sea. From this circumstance the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a resentment that cannot be pacified. Some, however, suppose that the proverb arose from the severity of a law made by a king of Tenedos against adultery, by which the guilty were both put to death by a hatchet. The hatchet of Tenes was carefully preserved at Tenedos, and afterwards deposited by Periclytus son of Eutyrmachus, in the temple of Delphi, where it was still seen in the age of Pausanias. Tenes, as some suppose, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country against the Greeks, and he received divine honours after death. His statue at Tenedos was carried away by Verres. Strab. 13.—Paus. 10, c. 14.—A general of 4000 mercenary Greeks sent by the Egyptians to assist the Phœnicians. Diod. 16.

Tēnos, a king of Sidon, who, when his country was besieged by the Persians, burnt himself and the city together. B. C. 351.

Tēnnum, a town of Æolia.

Tēnos, a small island in the Ægean, near Andros, called Ophiussa, and also Hydrussa, from the number of its fountains. It was very mountainous, but it produced excellent wines, universally esteemed by the ancients. Tenos was about 15 miles in extent. The capital was also called Tenos. Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.

Tēntyra (plur.) and Tēntyria, a small town of Egypt, on the Nile, whose inhabitants were at enmity with the crocodiles, and made war against those who paid them adoration. Seneca. N. Q. 4, c. 2.—Strab. 17.—Juv. 15.—Plin. 25, c. 8.

Tēntyra (melius Tempyria), a place of Thrace, opposite Samothrace. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 21.

Teos, or Teios, now Sigagik, a maritime town on the coast of Ionia in Asia Minor, opposite Samos. It was one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, and gave birth to Anacreon and Hecæatus, who is by some deemed a native of Miletus. According to Pliny, Teos was an island. Augustus repaired Teos, whence he is often called the founder of it on ancient medals. Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 5.—Horat. 1, ad. 17, v. 18.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

Tēredon, a town on the Arabian gulf. Dia. Per. 582.

Terentia, the wife of Cicero. She became mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her because she had been faithless to his bed, when he was banished in Asia. Terentia married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Messala Corvinus. She lived to her 103rd, or, according to Pliny, to her 117th year. Plut. in Cic.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Cic. ad Attic. 11, ep. 26, &c.—The wife of Scipio Africanus.—The wife of Mæcenas, with whom it was said that Augustus carried on an intrigue.

Terentia lex, called also Cassia, frumentaria, by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus and C. Cassius, A.U.C. 680. It ordered that the same price should be given for all corn bought in the provinces, to hinder the exactions of the questors.—Another, by Terentius the tribune, A.U.C. 207, to elect five persons to define the power of the consuls, lest they should abuse the public confidence, by violence or rapine.

Terentianus, a Roman to whom Longinus dedicated his treatise on the sublime.—Maurus, a writer who flourished A.D. 240. The last edition of his treatise de literis, syllabis, et metris Horatii, is by Mycillus, Francof. 8vo, 1584. Martial. 1, ep. 70.

Terentius Publius, a native of Carthage in Africa, celebrated for the comedies which he wrote. He was sold as a slave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, who educated him with great care, and manumitted him for the brilliancy of his genius. He bore the name of his master and benefactor, and was called Terentius. He applied himself to the study of Greek comedy with uncommon assiduity, and merited the friendship and patronage of the learned and powerful. Scipio the elder Africanus, and his friend Lælius, have been suspected, on account of their intimacy, of assisting the poet in the composition of his comedies; and the fine language, the pure expressions, and delicate sentiments with which the plays of Terence abound, seem, perhaps, to favour the supposition. Terence was in the 25th year of his age when his first play appeared on the Roman stage. All his compositions were received with great applause, but when the words were repeated, the plaudits were reiterated, and the audience, though composed of foreigners, conquered nations, allies, and citizens of Rome, were unanimous in applauding the poet, who spoke with such elegance and simplicity the language of nature, and supported the native independence of man. The talents of Terence were employed rather in translation than in the effusions of originality. It is said that he translated 108 of the comedies of the poet Menander, six of which only are extant, his Andria, Eunuch, Heautontimorumenos, Adelphi, Phormio, and Hecyra. Terence is admired for the purity of his language, and the artless elegance and simplicity of his diction, and for a continual delicacy of sentiment. There is more originality in Plautus, more vivacity in the intrigues, and more surprise in the catastrophes of his plays; but Terence will ever be admired for his taste, his expressions, and his faithful pictures of nature and manners, and the becoming dignity of his several characters. Quintilian, who candidly acknowledges the deficiencies of the Roman comedy, declares that Terence was the most elegant and refined of all the comedians whose writings appeared on the stage. The time and the manner of his death are unknown. He left Rome in the 35th year of his age, and never after appeared there. Some suppose that he was drowned in a storm as he returned from Greece, about 159 years before Christ, though others imagine he died in Arcadia or Leucadia, and that his death was accelerated by the loss of his property, and particularly of his plays which perished in a shipwreck. The best editions of Terence are those of Westerhove, 2 vols. 4to, Amst. 1726; of Edinb. 1760, 1758; of Cambridge, 4to, 1723; Hawkey's, 12mo, Dublin, 1745; and that of Zeunius, 8vo, Lips. 1774. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3.—Pateric. 1, c. 17.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 59.—Culeo, a Roman senator, taken by the Carthaginians, and redeemed by Africanus. When Africanus triumphed, Culeo followed his chariot with a pileus on his head. He was some time after appointed judge between his deliverer and the people of Asia, and had the meanness to condemn him and his brother Asiaticus, though both innocent. Liv. 30, c. 45.—A tribune who wished the number of the citizens of Rome to be increased.—Evocatus, a man who, as it was supposed, murdered Galba. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 41.

—Lentinus, a Roman knight condemned for perjury.—Varro, a writer. Vid. Varro.—A consul with Æmilius Paulus at the battle of Cannæ. He was the son of a butcher, and had followed for some time the profession of his father. He placed himself totally in the power of Hannibal, by making an improper disposition of his army. After he had been defeated, and his colleague slain, he retired to Canusium, with the remains of his slaughtered countrymen, and sent word to the Roman senate of his defeat. He received the thanks of this venerable body, because he had engaged the enemy, however improperly, and not despaired of the affairs of the republic. He was offered the dictatorship, which he declined. Plut.—Liv. 22, &c.—An ambassador sent to Philip king of Macedonia.—Massaliora, an edile of the people, &c.—Marcus, a friend of Sejanus, accused before the senate for his intimacy with that discarded favourite. He made a noble defence, and was acquitted. Tacit. Ann. 6.

Terentus, a place in the Campus Martius near the capitol, where the infernal deities had an altar. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 504.

Tereus, a king of Thrace, son of Mars and Bistonis. He married Progne the daughter of Pandion king of Athens, whom he had assisted in a war against Megara. He offered violence to his sister-in-law Philomela, whom he conducted to Thrace by desire of Progne. Vid. Philomela and Progne.—A friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 675.

Tergeste and Tergestum, now Trieste, a town of Italy on the Adriatic sea, made a Roman colony. Mela, 2, c. 3, &c.—Dionys. Perieg. v. 380.—Pateric. 2, c. 110.—Plin. 3, c. 18.

Terias, a river of Sicily near Catania.

Teribazus, a nobleman of Persia, sent with a fleet against Evagoras king of Cyprus. He was accused of treason, and removed from office, &c. Polyan. 7.

Teridas, a concubine of Menelaus.

Teridates, a favourite eunuch at the court of Artaxerxes. At his death the monarch was in tears for three days, and was consoled at last only by the arts and the persuasion of Aspasia, one of his favourites. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 1.

Terigum, a town of Macedonia.

Terina, a town of the Bruttii.

Terioli, now Tirolo, a fortified town at the north of Italy, in the country of the Grisons.

Termentia, or Termes, a town of Hispania Tarragonensis.

Termera, a town of Caria.

Terminus, a robber of Peloponnesus, who killed people by crushing their head against his own. He was slain by Hercules in the same manner. Plut. in These.

Termodus, a river of Arcadia.

Termilæ, a name given to the Lycians.

Terminalia, annual festivals at Rome, observed in honour of the god Terminus, in the month of February. It was then usual for peasants to assemble near the principal landmarks which separated their fields, and after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and to sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. They were originally established by Numa, and though at first it was forbidden to shed the blood of victims, yet in process of time landmarks were plentifully sprinkled with it. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 641.—Cic. Phil. 12, c. 10.

Terminialis, a surname of Jupiter, because he presided over the boundaries and lands of individuals, before the worship of the god Terminus was introduced. Dionys. Hal. 2.

Terminus, a divinity at Rome who was supposed to preside over bounds and limits, and to punish all unlawful usurpation of land. His worship was first introduced at Rome by Numa, who persuaded his subjects that the limits of their lands and estates were under the immediate inspection of heaven. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was represented with a human head without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved, wherever he was placed. The people of the country assembled once a year with their families, and crowned with garlands and flowers the stones which separated their different possessions, and offered victims to the god who presided over their boundaries. It is said that when Tarquin the Proud wished to build a temple on the Tarpeian rock to Jupiter, the god Terminus refused to give way, though the other gods resigned their seats with cheerfulness; whence Ovid has said,

Restitit, et mango cum Jove templa tenet.

Dionys. Hal. 2.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 641.—Plut. in Numi.—Liv. 5.—Virg. Æn. 9.

Termissus, or Termeasus, a town of Pisidia.

Terpander, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos, 675 B.C. It is said that he appeased a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes. He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four. Ælian. V. II. 12, c. 50.—Plut. de Mus.

Terpsichore, one of the muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, of which she was reckoned the inventress, as her name intimates, and with which she delighted her sisters. She is represented like a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument. Juv. 7, v. 35.—Apollod. 1.—Eustat. in II. 10.

Terpsistrate, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Terra, one of the most ancient deities in mythology, wife of Uranus, and mother of Oceanus, the Titans, Cyclops, Giants, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Phœbe, Thetys, and Mnemosyne. By the Air she had Grief, Mourning, Oblivion, Vengeance, &c. According to Hyginus, she is the same as Tellus. Vid. Tellus.

Terracina. Vid. Tarricina.

Terracidus, a Roman knight in Caesar's army in Gaul. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 7 & 8.

Terror, an emotion of the mind which the ancients have made a deity, and one of the attendants of the god Mars, and of Bellona.

Tertia, a sister of Clodius the tribune, &c.—A daughter of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus.

Cic. ad Div. 1, c. 46.—A daughter of Isidorus. Cic. in Verr. 3, c. 34.—A sister of Brutus, who married Cassius. She was also called Tertulla and Junia. Tacit. A. 3, c. 76.—Suet. Cæs. 50.—Cic. ad B. 5 & 6. Ad Att. 15, ep. 11. l. 16, ep. 20.

Tertius Julianus, a lieutenant in Caesar's legions.

Tertullianus J. Septimius Florens, a celebrated christian writer of Carthage, who flourished A.D. 196. He was originally a pagan, but afterwards embraced christianity, of which he became an able advocate by his writings, which showed that he was possessed of a lively imagination, impetuous eloquence, elevated style, and strength of reasoning. The most famous and esteemed of his numerous works, are his Apology for the Christians, and his Prescriptions. The best edition of Tertullian is that of Semlerus, 4 vols. 8vo, Hal. 1770; and of his Apology, that of Havercamp, 8vo, L. Bat. 1718.

Tethys, the greatest of the sea deities, was wife of Oceanus, and daughter of Uranus and Terra. She was mother of the chiefest rivers of the universe, such as the Nile, the Alpheus, the Meander, Simois, Peneus, Euenus, Scamander, &c., and about 3000 daughters called Oceanides. Tethys is confounded by some mythologists with her granddaughter Thetis the wife of Peleus, and the mother of Achilles. The word Tethys is poetically used to express the sea. Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 500. I. 9, v. 498. Fast. 2, v. 191.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 336.—Homer. Il. 14, v. 302.

Tetrapolis, a name given to the city of Antioch the capital of Syria, because it was divided into four separate districts, each of which resembled a city. Some apply the word to Seleucia, which contained the four large cities of Antioch near Daphne, Laodicea, Apamea, and Seleucia in Pieria.—The name of four towns at the north of Attica. Strab. 8.

Tétrica, a mountain of the Sabines near the river Fabaris. It was very rugged and difficult of access, whence the epithet Tetricus was applied to persons of a morose and melancholy disposition. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 713.

Tetricus, a Roman senator, saluted emperor in the reign of Aurelian. He was led in triumph by his successful adversary, who afterwards heaped the most unbounded honours upon him and his son of the same name.

Teuoeer, a king of Phrygia, son of the Scamander by Ida. According to some authors he was the first who introduced among his subjects the worship of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Teucris, and his subjects Teucris. His daughter

Teatea married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who succeeded him in the government of Teucra. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 108.—A son of Telamon king of Salamis, by Hesione the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helen's suitors, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he signalized himself by his valour and intrepidity. It is said that his father refused to receive him into his kingdom, because he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenged. This severity of the father did not dishearten the son; he left Salamis, and retired to Cyprus, where, with the assistance of Belus king of Sidon, he built a town, which he called Salamis, after his native country. He attempted, to no purpose, to recover the island of Salamis after his father's death. He built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, on which a man was annually sacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some suppose that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a less received opinion, he went to settle in Spain, where new Carthage was afterwards built, and thence into Galatia. Hom. Il. 1, v. 281.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 623.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 29.—Justin. 44, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.—One of the servants of Phalaris of Agrigentum.

Teuceri, a name given to the Trojans, from Teucer their king. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 42 & 239.

Teuceria, a name given to Troy, from Teucer one of its kings. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 26.

Teuceteri, a people of Germany, at the east of the Rhine. Tacit. de Germ. c. 22.

Teumessus, a mountain of Bœotia with a village of the same name, where Hercules, when young, killed an enormous lion. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 331.

Teuta, a queen of Illyricum, B.C. 231, who ordered some Roman ambassadors to be put to death. This unprecedented murder was the cause of a war, which ended in her disgrace. Flor. 2, c. 5.—Plin. 34, c. 6.

Teutamis, or Teutamias, a king of Larissa. He instituted games in honour of his father, where Perseus killed his grandfather Acrisius with a quoit.

Teutamus, a king of Assyria, the same as Tithonus the father of Memnon. Diad. 5.

Teutas, or Teutates, a name of Mercury among the Gauls. The people offered human victims to this deity. Lucan. 1, v. 445.—Cæsar. Bell. G.

Teuthrania, a part of Mysia where the Caycus rises.

Teuthras, a king of Mysia on the borders of the Caycus. He adopted as his daughter, or, according to others, married, Auge the daughter of Aleus, when she fled away into Asia from her father, who wished to punish her for her amours with Hercules. Some time after his kingdom was invaded by Idas the son of Aphareus, and to remove this enemy, he promised Auge and his crown to any one who could restore tranquillity to his subjects. This was executed by Telephus, who afterwards proved to be the son of Auge, who was promised in marriage to him by right of his successful expedition. The 50 daughters of Teuthras, who became mothers by Hercules, are called Teuthrancia turba. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 25.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 19. Heroid. 9, v. 51.—Hygin. fab. 100.—A river's name.—One of the companions of Aeneas in Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 402.

Teutoburgiensis saltus, a forest of Germany, between the Ems and Lippe, where Varus and his legions were cut to pieces. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 80.

Teutomatus, a prince of Gaul, among the allies of Rome.

Teutōni and Teutōnes, a people of Germany, who with the Cimbræ made incursions upon Gaul, and cut to pieces two Roman armies. They were at last defeated by the consul Marius, and an infinite number made prisoners. Vid. Cimbræ. Cic. pro Manil.—Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plut. in Mar.—Martial. 14, ep. 26.—Plin. 4, c. 14.

Thabenna, an inland town of Africa. Hist. Afric. 77.

Thabasius, a fortified place of Phrygia. Liv. 38, c. 14.

Thais, a famous courtesan of Athens, who accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, and gained such an ascendancy over him, that she made him burn the royal palace of Persepolis. After Alexander's death, she married Ptolemy king of Egypt. Menander celebrated her charms both mental and personal, which were of a superior nature, and on this account she is called Menandrea by Propert. 2, el. 6.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 604. De Rem. Am. v. 384.—Plut. in Alex.—Juv. 3, v. 93.—Athen. 13, c. 13.

Thala, a town of Africa. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 21.

Thalame, a town of Messenia, famous for a temple and oracle of Pasiphæa. Plut. in Agid.

Thalassius, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of these virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed, as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned, than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. He was descended from Cadmus: his father's name was Examus, and his mother's Cleobula. Like the rest of the ancients, he travelled in quest of knowledge, and for some time resided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the priests of Memphis he was taught geometry, astronomy, and philosophy, and enabled to measure with exactness the vast height and extent of a pyramid merely by its shadow. His discoveries in astronomy were great and ingenious; and he was the first who calculated with accuracy a solar eclipse. He discovered the solstices and equinoxes, he divided the heavens into five zones, and recommended the division of the year into 365 days, which was universally adopted by the Egyptian philosophy. Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of everything. He was the founder of the Ionic sect, which distinguished itself for its deep and abstruse speculations under the successors and pupils of the Milesian philosopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus the master of Socrates. Thales was never married; and when his mother pressed him to choose a wife, he said he was too young. The same exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philosopher eluded them by observing that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial state. He died in the 66th year of his age, about 548 years before the christian era. His compositions on philosophical subjects are lost. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—Plato.—Diog. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D., &c.—A lyric poet of Crete, intimate with Lycurgus. He prepared by his rhapsodies the minds of the Spartans to receive the rigorous institutions of his friend, and inculcated a reverence for the peace of civil society.

Thalestria, or Thalestria, a queen of the Amazons, who, accompanied by 300 women, came 35 days' journey to meet Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great, and courage so uncommon. Curt. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 4.

Thaletes, a Greek poet of Crete, 900 B.C.

Thalia, one of the Muses, who presided over festivals, and over pastoral and comic poetry. She is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook. Her dress appears shorter, and not so ornamented as that of the other Muses. Horat. 4, od. 6, v. 25.—Mart. 9, ep. 75.—Plut. in Symp., &c.—Virg. Ec. 6, v. 2.—One of the Nereids. Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 826.—An island in the Tyrrhene sea.

Thalio, one of the Hours or Seasons, who presided over the spring. Paus. 9, c. 35.

Thalpius, a son of Eurytus, one of Helen's suitors. Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Thalysia, Greek festivals celebrated by the people of the country in honour of Ceres, to whom the first fruits were regularly offered. Schol. Theocr. 3.

Thamiras, a Cilician who first introduced the art of augury in Cyprus, where it was religiously preserved in his family for many years. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 3.

Thamuda, a part of Arabia Felix.

Thamyras, or Thamyris, a celebrated musician of Thrace. His father's name was Phylammon, and his mother's Argiope. He became enamoured of the Muses, and challenged them to a trial of skill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed that the conqueror should be totally at the disposal of his victorious adversary. He was conquered, and the Muses deprived him of his eyesight and his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compositions are lost. Some accused him of having first introduced into the world the unnatural vice of which Sotades is accused. Homer. Il. 2, v. 594. l. 5, v. 599.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 7, v. 62. Art. Am. 3, v. 399.—Paus. 4, c. 33.

Thamyris, one of the petty princes of the Dace, in the age of Darius, &c.—A queen of the Massagetae. Vid. Thomyris.—A Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 341.

Thapsacus, a city on the Euphrates.

Thapsus, a town of Africa Propria, where Scipio and Juba were defeated by Caesar. Sil. 3, 261.—Liv. 29, c. 30. l. 33, c. 48.—A town at the north of Syracuse in Sicily.

Thargelia, festivals in Greece, in honour of Apollo and Diana. They lasted two days, and the youngest of both sexes carried olive branches, on which were suspended cakes and fruits. Athen. 12.

Thariades, one of the generals of Antiochus, &c.

Tharops, the father of Ceager, to whom Bacchus gave the kingdom of Thrace, after the death of Lycurgus. Diad. 4.

Thasius, or Thrasius, a famous soothsayer of Cyprus, who told Bursis king of Egypt, that to stop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country, he must offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be seized and sacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 549.—A surname of Hercules, who was worshipped at Thasos.

Thasos, or Thasus, a small island in the Ægean, on the coast of Thrace, opposite the mouth of the Nestus, anciently known by the name of Æria, Odonis, Æthria, Acte, Ogygia, Chryse, and Ceresis. It received that of Thasos from Thasus the son of Agenor, who settled there when he despaired of finding his sister Europa. It was about 40 miles in circumference, and so uncommonly fruitful, that the fertility of Thasos became proverbial. Its wine was universally esteemed, and its marble quarries were also in great repute, as well as its mines of gold and silver. The capital of the island was also called Thasos. Liv. 33, c. 30 & 55.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 25.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 91.—C. Nep. Cim. 2.

Thasus, a son of Neptune, who went with Cadmus to seek Europa. He built the town of Thasus in Thrace. Some make him brother of Cadmus. Apollod. 3, c. 1.

Thaumaci, a town of Thessaly on the Maliac gulf. Liv. 37, c. 4.

Thaumatias and Thaumantis, a name given to Iris the messenger of Juno, because she was the daughter of Thaumias the son of Oceanus and Terra by one of the Oceanides. Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 479. l. 14, v. 845.

Thaumas, a son of Neptune and Terra, who married Electra, one of the Oceanides, by whom he had Iris and the Harpyies, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Thaumasius, a mountain of Arcadia, on whose top, according to some accounts, Jupiter was born.

Thea, a daughter of Uranus and Terra. She married her brother Hyperion, by whom she had the sun, the moon, Aurora, &c. She is also called Thia, Titua, Rhea, Tethys, &c.—One of the Sporades.

Theagones, a man who made himself master of Megara, &c.—An athlete of Thasos, famous for his strength. His father's name was Timosthenes, a friend of Hercules. He was crowned above 1000 times at the public games of the Greeks, and became a god after death. Paus. 6, c. 6 & 11.—Plut.—A Theban officer, who distinguished himself at the battle of Cheronæa. Plut.—A writer who published commentaries on Homer's works.

Theages, a Greek philosopher, disciple of Socrates. Plato.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.

Theangela, a town of Caria.

Theano, the wife of Meapontus son of Sisyphus, possessed some twins to her husband, when he wished to repudiate her for her barrenness. The children were educated with the greatest care, and some time afterwards Theano herself became the mother of twins. When they were grown up she encouraged them to murder the supposititious children, who were to succeed to their father's throne in preference to them. They were both killed in the attempt, and the father, displeas'd with the conduct of Theano, repudiated her to marry the mother of the children whom he had long considered as his own. Hygin. Fab. 186.—A daughter of Cisseus, sister to Hecuba, who married Antenor, and was supposed to have betrayed the Palladium to the Greeks, as she was priestess of Minerva. Hom. Il. 6, v. 208.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—Dictys Crat. 5, c. 8.—One of the Danaides. Her husband's name was Phantes. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—The wife of the philosopher Pythagoras, daughter of Pythianax of Crete, or, according to others, of Brontinus of Crotona. Diog. 8, c. 42.—The daughter of Pythagoras.—A poetess of Locris.—A priestess of Athens, daughter of Menon, who refused to pronounce a curse upon Alcibiades when he was accused of having mutilated all the statues of Mercury. Plut.—The mother of Pausanias. She was the first, as it is reported, who brought a stone to the entrance of Minerva's temple, to shut up her son when she heard of his crimes and perfidy to his country. Polyan. 8.—A daughter of Soedastus, to whom some of the Lacedæmonians offered violence at Leuctra.—A Trojan matron, who became mother of Mimas by Ameycus, the same night that Paris was born. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 703.

Theanum, a town of Italy. Vid. Teanum.

Thearidas, a brother of Dionysius the elder. He was made admiral of his fleet. Diod. 14.

Thearius, a surname of Apollo at Træzene. Paus. 2, c. 51.

Theatetes, a Greek epigrammatist.

Theba, or Thebe, a town of Cilicia. Vid. Thebæ.

Thebæ (arum), a celebrated city, the capital of Bœotia, situate on the banks of the river Ismenus. The manner of its foundation is not precisely known. Cadmus is supposed to have first begun to found it by building the citadel Cadmea. It was afterwards finished by Amphion and Zethus; but, according to Varro, it owed its origin to Ogyges. The government of Thebes was monarchical, and many of the sovereigns are celebrated for their misfortunes, such as Laius, Edipus, Polynices, Eteocles, &c. The war which Thebes supported against the Argives, is famous as well as that of the Epigoni. The Thebans were looked upon as an indolent and sluggish nation, and the words of Theban pig, became proverbial to express a man remarkable for stupidity and inattention. This, however, was not literally true; under Epaminondas, the Thebans, though before dependent, became masters of Greece, and everything was done according to their will and pleasure. When Alexander invaded Greece, he ordered Thebes to be totally demolished, because it had revolted against him, except the house where the poet Pindar had been born and educated. In this dreadful period 6000 of its inhabitants were slain, and 30,000 sold for slaves. Thebes was afterwards repaired by Cassander the son of Antipater, but it never rose to its original consequence, and Strabo, in his age, mentions it merely as an inconsiderable village. The monarchical government was abolished there at the death of Xanthus, about 190 years before Christ, and Thebes became a republic. It received its name from Thebe the daughter of Asopus, to whom the founder Amphion was nearly related. Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 6. 1, 9, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Plut. in Pel. Flam. & Alex.—C. Nep. in Pel. Epam., &c.—Horat. Art. Poet. 394.—Ovid. Met.—A town at the south of Tross, built by Hercules, and also called Placia and Hypoplacia. It fell into the hands of the Cilicians, who occupied it during the Trojan war. Curt. 3, c. 4.—Liv. 37, c. 19.—Strab. 11.—An ancient celebrated city of Thebais in Egypt, called also Hecatompyles, on account of its 100 gates, and Diospolis, as being sacred to Jupiter. In the time of its splendour, it extended above 23 miles, and upon any emergency could send into the field, by each of its 100 gates, 20,000 fighting men and 200 chariots. Thebes was ruined by Lambeus king of Persia, and few traces of it were seen in the age of Juvenal. Plin. 5, c. 9.—Juv. 15, v. 16.—Tacit. Ann. c. 2.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Diod. 2.—Hom. Il. 9, v. 381.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—A town of Africa, built by Bacchus.—Another in Thessaly. Liv. 28, c. 7.—Another in Phthiotis.

Thebais, a country in the southern parts of Egypt, of which Thebes was the capital.—There have been some poems which have borne the name of Thebais, but of these the only one extant is the Thebais of Statius. It gives an account of the war of the Thebans against the Argives, in consequence of the dissension of Eteocles with his brother Polynices. The poet was 12 years in composing it.—A river of Lydia.—A name given to a native of Thebes.

Thebe, a daughter of the Asopus, who married Zethus. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 5.—The wife of Alexander tyrant of Phæzæ. She was persecuted by Pelopidas to murder her husband.

Theia, a goddess. Vid. Thea.

Theias, a son of Belus, who had an incestuous intercourse with his daughter Smyrna.

Telephassa, the second wife of Agenor, called also Telephassa.

Thelpusa, a nymph of Arcadia. Vid. Telpusa.

Thelxion, a son of Apis, who conspired against his father, who was king of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Thelxiope, one of the Muses, according to some writers. Cic. de Fin.

Themeneus, a son of Aristomachus, better known by the name of Temenus.

Themision, a tyrant of Eretria. Diod. 15.

Themillas, a Trojan, &c. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 376.

Themis, a daughter of Coelus and Terra, who married Jupiter against her own inclination. She became mother of Dice, Irene, Eupomia, the Parææ and Hora; and was the first to whom the inhabitants of the earth raised temples. Her oracle was famous in Attica in the age of Deucalion, who consulted it with great solemnity, and was instructed how to repair the loss of mankind. She was generally attended by the seasons. Among the moderns she is represented as holding a sword in one hand, and a pair of scales in the other. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 321.—A daughter of Ius, who married Caphys, and became mother of Anchises. Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Themiscyra, a town of Cappadocia, at the mouth of the Thermodon, belonging to the Amazons. The territories round it bore the same name.

Themison, a famous physician of Laodicea, disciple to Asclepiades. He was founder of a sect called Methodists, because he wished to introduce methods to facilitate the learning and the practice of physic. He flourished in the Augustan age. Plin. 29, c. 1.—Juv. 10.—One of the generals and ministers of Antiochus the Great. He was born at Cyprus. Elian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

Themisto, or Themistia, a goddess, the same as Themis.

Themistius, a celebrated philosopher of Paphlagonia in the age of Constantius, greatly esteemed by the Roman emperors, and called Enphrades, the fine speaker, from his eloquent and commanding delivery. He was made a Roman senator, and always distinguished for his liberality and munificence. His school was greatly frequented. He wrote, when young, some commentaries on Aristotle, fragments of which are still extant, and 33 of his orations. He professed himself to be an enemy to flattery, and though he often deviates from this general rule in his addresses to the emperors, yet he strongly recommends humanity, wisdom, and clemency. The best edition of Themistius is that of Harduin, fol. Paris, 1684.

Themisto, a daughter of Hypseus, was the third wife of Athamas king of Thebes, by whom she had four sons, called Prous, Leucon, Schoeneus, and Erythroos. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her husband's second wife, but she killed her own, by means of Ino, who lived in her house in the disguise of a servant-maid, and to whom she entrusted her bloody intentions, upon which she destroyed herself. Paus. 9, c. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—A woman mentioned by Polygnus.—The mother of the poet Homer, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, 10, c. 24.

Themistocles, a celebrated general born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotomum, a native of Halicarnassos, or of Thrace, or Acarnaia. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices so flagrant, and an inclination so incorrigible, that his father disinherited him. This, which might have disinherited others, roused the ambition of Themistocles, and the protection which he was denied at home, he sought in courting the favours of the populace, and in sharing the administration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was entrusted to his care. When the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were opposing the Persians at Thermopylae, the naval operations of Themistocles, and of the combined fleet of the Peloponnesians, were directed to destroy the armament of Xerxes, and to ruin his maritime power. The obstinate wish of the generals to command the Grecian fleet might have proved fatal to the interest of the allies, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and by nominating his rival Eurybiades master of the expedition, shown the world that his ambition could stoop when his country demanded his assistance. The Persian fleet was distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a decisive battle had never been fought if Themistocles had not used threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favourable answers of the oracle, to second his measures. The Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by sea against an enemy whom they saw victorious by land, plundering their cities and destroying all by fire and sword; but before they were dispersed, Themistocles sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet, in the bay of Salamis, prevented their escape, and while he wished to crush them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, B.C. 480, was decisive; the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themistocles the honour of having destroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to ensure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch that the Greeks had conspired to cut the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. This met with equal success; Xerxes hastened away from Greece, and while he believed the words of Themistocles, that his return would be disputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the victorious Greeks. These signal services to his country endeared Themistocles to the Athenians, and he was universally called the most warlike and most courageous of all the Greeks who fought against the Persians. He was received with the most distinguished honours, and by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls. Her Piræus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet in the midst of that glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen, which had proved so fatal to many of his illustrious predecessors. He was banished from the city, and after he had sought in vain a safe retreat among the republics of Greece, and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himself into the arms of a monarch, whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, received the illustrious Athenian with kindness; and though he had formerly set a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greatest favourites, and bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. Such kindness from a monarch, from whom he, perhaps, expected the most hostile treatment, did not alter the sentiments of Themistocles. He still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain, and while some affirm that he poisoned himself, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent distemper in the city of Magnesia, where he had fixed his residence, while in the dominions of the Persian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. Themistocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the christian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a disposition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprise. Blessed with a provident and discerning mind, he seemed to rise superior to misfortunes, and in the midst of adversity, possessed of resources which could enable him to regain his splendour, and even to command fortune. Plut. & C. Nep. in Vita.—Paus. 1, c. 1, l. 8, c. 52.—Allian. V. H. 2, c. 12, l. 9, c. 18, l. 13, c. 40.—A writer, some of whose letters are extant.

Themistogènes, an historian of Syracuse, in the age of Artaxerxes Memnon. He wrote on the wars of Cyrus the younger, a subject ably treated afterwards by Xenophon.

Theocles, an opulent citizen of Corinth, who liberally divided his riches among the poor. Thra- sonides, a man equally rich with himself, followed the example. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 24. — A Greek statury. Paus. 6, c. 19.

Theolus, a Messenian poet and soothsayer, who died B.C. 671. Paus. 4, c. 15, &c.

Theoclymēnus, a soothsayer of Argolis, descended from Melampus. His father's name was Thestor. He foretold the speedy return of Ulysses to Penelope and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, v. 225, &c. — Hægin. fab. 128.

Theocritus, a Greek poet who flourished at Syracuse, in Sicily, 282 B.C. His father's name was Praxagoras or Simichus, and his mother's Philina. He lived in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whose praises he sung, and whose favours he enjoyed. Theocritus distinguished himself by his poetical compositions, of which 30 idylls and some epigrams are extant, written in the Doric dialect, and admired for their beauty, elegance, and simplicity. Virgil, in his eclogues, has imitated and often copied him. Theocritus has been blamed for the many indelicate and obscene expressions which he uses; and while he introduces shepherds and peasants with all the rusticity and ignorance of nature, he often disguises their character by making them speak on high and exalted subjects. It is said he wrote some invectives against Hiero king of Syracuse, who ordered him to be strangled. He also wrote a ludicrous poem called Syrinx, and placed his verses in such order that they represented the pipe of the god Pan. The best editions of Theocritus, are Warton's, 9 vols. 4to, Oxon. 1770; that of Heinsius, 8vo, Oxon. 1699; that of Valkenær, 8vo, L. Bat. 1781; and that of Reiske, 2 vols. 4to, Lips. 1790. Quintil. 10, c. 1. — Laert. 5. — A Greek historian of Chios, who wrote an account of Libya. Plut.

Theodamas, or Thiodamas, a king of Mysia, in Asia Minor. He was killed by Hercules, because he refused to treat him and his son with hospitality. Ovid. in Ib. v. 438. — Apollod. 2, c. 7. — Hægin. fab. 271.

Theodectes, a Greek orator and poet of Phaselis in Pamphylia, son of Aristander, and disciple of Isocrates. He wrote 50 tragedies, besides other works now lost. He had such a happy memory that he could repeat with ease whatever verses were spoken in his presence. When Alexander passed through Phaselis, he crowned with garlands the statue which had been erected to the memory of the deceased poet. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 24, in Orat. 51, &c. — Plut. — Quintil.

Theodonia, a town of Germany, now Thionville, on the Moselle.

Theodora, a daughter-in-law of the emperor Maximian, who married Constantius. — A daughter of Constantine. — A woman who, from being a prostitute, became empress to Justinian, and distinguished herself by her intrigues and enterprises. — The name of Theodora is common to the empresses of the east in a later period.

Theodoretus, one of the Greek fathers who flourished A.D. 425, whose works have been edited, 5 vols. fol. Paris, 1642, and 5 vols. Halle, 1769 to 1774.

Theodoritus, a Greek ecclesiastical historian, whose works have been edited by Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

Theodorus, a Syracusan of great authority among his countrymen, who severely inveighed against the tyranny of Dionysius. — A philosopher, disciple to Aristippus. He denied the existence of a God. He was banished from Cyrene, and fled to Athens, where the friendship of Demetrius Philareus saved him from the accusations which were carried to the Areopagus against him. Some suppose that he was at last condemned to death for his impiety, and that he drank poison. — A preceptor to one of the sons of Antony, whom he betrayed to Augustus. — A consul in the reign of Honorius. Claudian wrote a poem upon him, in which he praises him with great liberality. — A secretary of Valens. He conspired against the emperor and was beheaded. — A man who compiled a history of Rome. Of this, nothing but his history of the reigns of Constantine and Constantius is extant. — A comic actor. — A player on the flute in the age of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who contemptuously rejected the favours of Lamia the mistress of the monarch. — A Greek poet of Colophon, whose compositions are lost. — A sophist of Byzantium, called Logodidaxer by Plato. — A Greek poet in the age of Cleopatra. He wrote a book of metamorphoses, which Ovid imitated, as some suppose. — An artist of Samos about 700 years B.C. He was the first who found out the art of melting iron, with which he made statues. — A priest, father of Isocrates. — A Greek writer, called also Prodrumus. The time in which he lived is unknown. There is a romance of his composition extant, called the amours of Rhodanthe and Dosisies, the only edition of which was by Gaulminis, 8vo, Paris, 1625.

Theodosiopolis, a town of Armenia, built by Theodosius, &c.

Theodosius Flavius, a Roman emperor surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits. He was invested with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eastern provinces, which had been in the possession of Valentinian. The first years of his reign were marked by different conquests over the barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 4000 of their chariots, with an immense number of prisoners of both sexes, were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome; they sued for peace, and treaties of alliance were made with distant nations, who wished to gain the favours and the friendship of a prince whose military virtues were so conspicuous. Some conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but Theodosius totally disregarded them; and while he punished his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himself sufficiently secure in the love and the affection of his subjects. His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror; he triumphed over the barbarians, and restored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropsy at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January, A.D. 395. His body was conveyed to Constantinople, and buried by his son Arcadius, in the tomb of Constantine. Theodosius was the last of the emperors who was the sole master of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius, who succeeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodosius has been commended by ancient writers, as a prince blessed with every virtue, and debased by no vicious propensity. Though master of the world, he was a stranger to that pride and arrogance which too often disgrace the monarch; he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent and compassionate, and it was his wish to treat his subjects as himself was treated when a private man and a dependant. Men of merit were promoted to places of trust and honour, and the emperor was fond of patronizing the cause of virtue and learning. His zeal as a follower of christianity has been applauded by all the ecclesiastical writers, and it was the wish of Theodosius to support the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekness, and christian charity, as by his edicts and ecclesiastical institutions. His want of clemency, however, in one instance, was too openly betrayed, and when the people of Thessalonica had unmeaningly, perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his soldiers to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and no less than 6000 persons, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the space of three hours. This violence irritated the ecclesiastics, and Theodosius was compelled by St. Ambrose to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make atonement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the bosom of the church, and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodosius was an example of sobriety and temperance; his palace displayed becoming grandeur, but still with moderation. He never indulged in luxury, or countenanced superfluities. He was fond of bodily exercise, and never gave himself up to pleasure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire, were of the most salutary nature. Socrat. 5, &c.—Zozim. 4, &c.—Ambros.—Augustin.—Claudian., &c.

Theodosius II., succeeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the western Roman empire, though only in the eighth year of his age. He was governed by his sister Pulcheria, and by his ministers and eunuchs, in whose hands was the disposal of the offices of state, and all places of trust and honour. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philosopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety. The territories of Theodosius were invaded by the Persians, but the emperor soon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hostile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The consternation was universal on both sides: without even a battle, the Persians fled, and no less than 100,000 were lost in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodosius raised the siege of Nisibis, where his operations failed of success, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promises. He died on the 29th of July, in the 49th year of his age, A.D. 450, leaving only one daughter, Licinia Eudoxia, whom he married to the emperor Valentinian III. The carelessness and inattention of Theodosius to public affairs are well known. He signed all the papers that were brought to him without even opening them or reading them, till his sister apprised him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and diligent, by making him sign a paper, in which he delivered into her hand, Eudoxia his wife as a slave and menial servant. The laws and regulations which were promulgated under him, and selected from the most useful and salutary institutions of his imperial predecessors, have been called the Theodosian code. Theodosius was a warm advocate for the christian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to those who opposed the orthodox faith. Saxom.—Socrates, &c.

Theodosius, a lover of Antonina the wife of Belisarius.—A mathematician of Tripoli, who flourished 75 B.C. His treatise, called Sphærica, is best edited by Hunt, 8vo, Oxon. 1707.—A Roman general, father of Theodosius the Great; he died A.D. 376.

Theodōta, a beautiful courtesan of Elis, whose company was frequented by Socrates. Xenoph. de Sacr.—Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 32.—A Roman empress, &c.

Theodotian, an interpreter, in the reign of Commodus.

Theodōtus, an admiral of the Rhodians, sent by his countrymen to make a treaty with the Romans.—A native of Chios, who, as preceptor and counsellor of Ptolemy, advised the feeble monarch to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Caesar, but the resentment of the conqueror was such that the mean assassin fled, and after a wandering and miserable life in the cities of Asia, he was at last put to death by Brutus. Plut. in Brut. & Pomp.—A Syracusan, accused of a conspiracy against Hieronymus the tyrant of Syracuse.—A governor of Bactriana in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himself king, B.C. 250.—A friend of the emperor Julian.—A Phœnician historian.—One of the generals of Alexander.

Theognis, a Greek poet of Megara, who flourished about 540 years before Christ. He wrote several poems, of which only few sentences are now extant, quoted by Plato and other Greek historians and philosophers, and intended as precepts for the conduct of human life. The morals of the poet have been censured as neither decorous nor chaste. The best edition of Theognis is that of Blackwall, 12mo, London, 1706.—There was also a tragic poet of the same name, whose compositions were so lifeless and inanimated, that they procured him the name of Chion, or swan.

Theomnestus, a rival of Nicias in the administration of public affairs at Athens. Strab. 14.—A statuary of Sardinia. Paus. 6, c. 15.—An Athenian philosopher, among the followers of Plato's doctrines. He had Brutus, Caesar's murderer, among his pupils.—A painter. Plin. 35.

Theon, a philosopher, who used frequently to walk in his sleep. Diog.—An astronomer of Smyrna, in the reign of Adrian.—A painter of Samos. Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 44.—Another philosopher. Diog.—An infamous reviler. Horat. 1, ep. 19.

Theonoe, a daughter of Thestor, sister to Calchas. She was carried away by sea pirates, and sold to Icarus king of Caria, &c. Hygin. fab. 190.—A daughter of Proteus and a Nereid, who became enamoured of Canobus, the pilot of a Trojan vessel, &c.

Theope, one of the daughters of Leos.

Theophāne, a daughter of Bisaltus, whom Neptune changed into a sheep, to remove her from her numerous suitors, and conveyed to the island Crumissa. The god afterwards assumed the shape of a ram, and under this transformation he had by the nymph a ram with a golden fleece, which carried Phryxus to Colchis. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 177.—Hygin. fab. 188.

Theophānes, a Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendship with the Roman general, his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharsalia, he advised Pompey to return to the coast of Egypt. Cic. pro Arch., &c.—Plut. in Cic. & Pomp.—His son M. Pompeius Theophrastus was made governor of Asia, and enjoyed the intimacy of Tiberius.—The only edition of Theophrastus the Byzantine historian, is that of Paris, fol. 1549.

Theophrastia, a festival celebrated at Delphi in honour of Apollo.

Theophilus, a comic poet of Athens.—A governor of Syria in the age of Julian.—A friend of Piso.—A physician, whose treatise de Urinis is best edited by Guidotius, L. Bat. 1728, and another by Morrell, 8vo, Paris, 1556.—One of the Greek fathers, whose work ad Autolycom is best edited in romo, by Wolf, Hamb. 1724.—The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive christians.

Theophrastus, a native of Eresus in Lesbos, son of a fuller. He studied under Plato, and afterwards under Aristotle, whose friendship he gained, and whose warmest commendations he deserved. His original name was Tytamus, but this the philosopher made him exchange for that of Euphrastus, to intimate his excellence in speaking, and afterwards for that of Theophrastus, which he deemed still more expressive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. After the death of Socrates, when the malevolence of the Athenians drove all the philosopher's friends from the city, Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himself so conspicuous, that in a short time the number of his auditors was increased to 2000. Not only his countrymen courted his applause, but kings and princes were desirous of his friendship: and Cassander and Ptolemy, two of the most powerful of the successors of Alexander, regarded him with more than usual partiality. Theophrastus composed many books, and Dionogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatises, which he wrote with great elegance and copiousness. About 20 of these are extant, among which are his history of stones, his treatise on plants, on the winds, on the signs of fair weather, &c., and his Characters, an excellent moral treatise, which was begun in the 96th year of his age. He died, loaded with years and infirmities, in the 107th year of his age, B.C. 287, lamenting the shortness of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the stag, but not to man. To his care we are indebted for the works of Aristotle, which the dying philosopher entrusted to him. The best edition of Theophrastus, is that of Heinsius, fol. L. Bat. 1613; and of his Characters, that of Needham, 8vo, Cantab. 1712, and that of Fischer, 8vo, Coburg, 1761. Cic. Tusc. 3, c. 28, in Fract. c. 31, in Orat. 19, &c.—Strab. 13.—Diag. in Verb. Ælian. V. II. 2, c. 8. l. 34, c. 20. l. 8, c. 12.—Quintill. 10, c. 1.—Plut. adv. Colot.—An officer entrusted with the care of the citadel of Corinth by Antigonus. Polyen.

Theophilus, a man who, with his brother Hiero, plundered Apollo's temple at Delphi, and fled away for fear of being punished. Cic. in Tusc. 4.

Theophilus, a name given to Antioch, because the christians first received their name there.

Theopompus, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclides, who succeeded his father Nicanor, and distinguished himself by the many new regulations which he introduced. He created the Epheori, and died, after a long and peaceful reign,

B.C. 723. While he sat on the throne, the Spartans made war against Messenia. Plat. in Lyc.—Paus. 3, c. 7.—A famous Greek historian of Chios, disciple of Isocrates, who flourished B.C. 354. All his compositions are lost, except a few fragments quoted by ancient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus as an historian, yet he is severely censured for his satirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his master was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for composing the best funeral oration in honour of Mausolus. His father's name was Dannasistratus. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Plut. in Lyc.—C. Nep. 7.—Paus. 6, c. 18.—Quintill. 10, c. 1.—An Athenian, who attempted to deliver his countrymen from the tyranny of Demetrius. Polyen. 5.—A comic poet in the age of Menander. He wrote 24 plays, all lost.—A son of Demaratus, who obtained several crowns at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 10.—An orator and historian of Cnidus, very intimate with J. Cesar. Strab. 14.—A Spartan general, killed at the battle of Tegyra.—A philosopher of Cheronæa, in the reign of the emperor Philip.

Theophylactus Simocatta, a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1649.—One of the Greek fathers who flourished A.D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

Theorius, a surname of Apollo at Troezene, where he had a very ancient temple. It signifies clear-sighted.

Theotimus, a wrestler of Elis, in the age of Alexander. Paus. 6, c. 17.—A Greek who wrote a history of Italy.

Theoxena, a noble lady of Thessaly, who threw herself into the sea, when unable to escape from the soldiers of king Philip, who pursued her. Liv. 40, c. 4.

Theoxenia, a festival celebrated in honour of all the gods in every city of Greece, but especially at Athens. Games were then observed, and the conqueror who obtained the prize received a large sum of money, or, according to others, a vest beautifully ornamented. The Dioscuri established a festival of the same name, in honour of the gods who had visited them at one of their entertainments.

Theoxenus, a surname of Apollo.

Thera, a daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Hygin. fab. 69.—One of the Sporades in the Ægean sea, anciently called Callista, now Santorin. It was first inhabited by the Phoenicians, who were left there under Membliabes by Cadmus, when he went in quest of his sister Europa. It was called Thera by Theras the son of Autesion, who settled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8.—A town of Caria.

Therambus, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

Theramenes, an Athenian philosopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the 30 tyrants of Athens, but he had no share in the cruelties and oppression which disgraced their administration. He was accused by Critias, one of his colleagues, because he opposed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence, and the friendly intercession of the philosopher Socrates. He drank the poison with great composure, and poured some of it on the ground, with the sarcastical exclamation of, "This is to the health of Critias." This happened about 404 years before the Christian era. Theramenes, on account of the fickleness of his disposition, has been called Cothurnus, a pair of the dress used both by men and women. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib., &c.—C. Nep.

Therapne, or Therapie, a town of Laconia, at the west of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phœbeum. It was but a very short distance from Lacedæmon, and, indeed, some authors have confounded it with the capital of Laconia. It received its name from Therapne, a daughter of Lelex. Castor and Pollux were born there, and on that account they were sometimes called Therapneii fratres. Paus. 3, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 223.—Sil. 6, v. 303. l. 8, v. 414. l. 13, v. 43.—Liv. 2, c. 16.—Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 49.—Stat. 7, Theb. v. 793.

Theras, a son of Auteson of Lacedæmon, who conducted a colony to Callista, to which he gave the name of Thera. He received divine honours after death. Paus. 3, c. 1 & 15.

Therimachus, a son of Hercules by Megara. Apollod. 2, c. 4 & 7.

Therippidas, a Lacedæmonian, &c. Diad. 15.

Theritas, a surname of Mars in Laconia.

Therma, a town of Africa. Strab.—A town of Macedonia, afterwards called Thessalonica, in honour of the wife of Cassander, and now Salonichi. The bay in the neighbourhood of Therma is called Thermaus, or Thermaicus sinus, and advances far into the country, so much, that Pliny has named it Macedonicus sinus, by way of eminence, to intimate its extent. Strab.—Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 10.—Herodot.

Thermæ (baths), a town of Sicily, where were the baths of Selinus, now Sciaccæ.—Another, near Panormus, now Thermi. Sil. 14, v. 23.—Cic. Ver. 2, c. 35.

Thermodon, now Ternoch, a famous river of Cappadocia, in the ancient country of the Amazons, falling into the Euxine sea near Themiscyra. There was also a small river of the same name in Bœotia, near Tanagra, which was afterwards called Hæmon. Strab. 11.—Herodot. 9, c. 27.—Mela. 1, c. 19.—Paus. 1, c. 1. l. 9, c. 19.—Plut. in Dem.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 659.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 249, &c.

Thermopylæ, a small pass leading from Thessaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the west, and the sea on the east, with deep and dangerous marshes, being in the narrowest part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there B.C. 480, on the 7th of August, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans resisted for three successive days repeatedly the attacks of the most brave and courageous of the Persian army, which, according to some historians, amounted to 5,000,000. There was also another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Cat., &c.—Paus. 7, c. 15.

Thermum, a town of Ætolia on the Evenus. Polyb. 5.

Thermus, a man accused in the reign of Tiberius, &c.—A man put to death by Nero.—A town of Ætolia, the capital of the country.

Therodamas, a king of Scythia, who, as some report, fed lions with human blood, that they might be more cruel. Ovid. Ib. 383.

Theron, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who died 472 B.C. He was a native of Bœotia, and son of Ænesidamus, and he married Damarete the daughter of Gelon of Sicily. Herodot. 7.—Pind. Olymp. 2.—One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid.—A Rutulian who attempted to kill Æneas. He perished in the attempt. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 312.—A priest in the temple of Hercules at Saguntum, &c. Sil. 2, v. 149.—A Theban descended from the Spartæ. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 572.—A daughter of Phylas, beloved by Apollo. Paus. 9, c. 40.

Therpander, a celebrated poet and musician of Lesbos. Vid. Terpander.

Thersander, a son of Polynices and Argia. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, but he was killed in Mysia by Telephus, before the confederate army reached the enemy's country. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—A son of Sisyphus king of Corinth.—A musician of Ionia.

Thersilochus, a leader of the Pæonians in the Trojan war, killed by Achilles. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—A friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Id. 12, v. 363.—An athlete at Corycra, crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 13.

Thersippus, a son of Agrius, who drove Æneus from the throne of Calydon.—A man who carried a letter from Alexander to Darius. Curt.—An Athenian author, who died 954 B.C.

Thersites, an officer, the most deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow-soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fist, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, l. 17, v. 15.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 212, &c.

Thesoids, a patronymic given to the Athenians from Theseus, one of their kings. Virg. G. 2, v. 383.

Thesoids, a poem written by Codrus, containing an account of the life and actions of Theseus, and now lost. Juv. 1, v. 2.

Theseus, a king of Athens, and son of Ægeus by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Trozene in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given him, by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. Vid. Ægeus. His journey to Athens was not across the sea, as it was usual with travellers, but Theseus determined to signalize himself in going by land, and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Trozene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and almost impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. He destroyed Corymetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæax. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground, if Theseus was received in his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra.

He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Palantides, who expected to succeed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to assassinate Theseus; but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. The labour seemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the streets of Athens, he sacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this Theseus went to Crete among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute, engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was successful by means of Ariadne the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread, and killed the Minotaur [Vid. Minotaurus], he sailed from Crete with the six boys and seven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. Vid. Ægeus. His ascension on his father's throne was universally applauded, B.C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies, to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia and her female attendants, against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. Their first attempt was upon Helen the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch entrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years, but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Helen, before she reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theseus, but this tradition, confirmed by some ancient mythologists, is confuted by others, who affirm that she was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto reddi passa timore nihil. Some time after Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine. Pluto, apprised of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone on which he had sat to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment repeating to the shades in Tartarus the words of Diocle justitiam moniti, et non temere divos. Apollodorus, however, and others declare that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence, that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnæstheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, infiltrated himself into the favours of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes king of the island of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the presence of Mnæstheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnæstheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised him statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated with original solemnity in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch, about 1200 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose that, instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wished to seduce a daughter of Aïdoeus king of the Molossi. This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus, and hence, perhaps, arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape some time after by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. *Plut. in Vita. — Apollod. 3. — Hygin. fab. 14 & 79. — Paus. 1. c. 2, &c. — Ovid. Thesides, a name given to the people of Athens, because they were governed by Theseus.

Thesmophōra, a surname of Ceres, as law-giver, in whose honour festivals were instituted called Thesmophoria. The Thesmophoria were instituted by Triptolemus, or, according to some, by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greatest part of the Grecian cities, especially Athens, observed them with great solemnity. The worshippers were free-born women, whose husbands were obliged to defray the expenses of the festival. They were assisted by a priest called στεφανοφορος, because he carried a crown on his head. There were also certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expense. The freeborn women were dressed in white robes, to intimate their spotless innocence; they were charged to observe the strictest chastity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the solemnity; and on that account it was usual for them to strew their bed with agnus castus, scabum, and all such herbs as were supposed to have the power of expelling all venereal propensities. They were also charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be observed with the greatest signs of seriousness and gravity, without any display of wantonness or levity. It was, however, usual to jest at one another, as the goddess Ceres had been made to smile by a merry expression when she was sad and melancholy for the recent loss of her daughter Proserpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepsion, the women went to Eleusis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddess had invented were contained. On the 12th of the same month the festival began, on the 16th day a fast was observed, and the women sat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was usual during the festival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom some suppose to be the nurse or favourite maid of the goddess of corn, or perhaps one of her surnames. There were some sacrifices of a mysterious nature, and all persons whose offence was small were released from confinement. Such as were initiated at the festivals of Eleusis assisted at the Thesmophoria. The place of high priest was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 431. Fast. 4, v. 619.—Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 58.—Sophoc. in Cedip. Col.—Clem. Alex.

Thesmothētēs, a name given to the last six Archons among the Athenians, because they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to see justice impartially administered. They were at that time nine in number.

Thespia, now Necoreia, a town of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon, which received its name from Thespia the daughter of Asopus, or from Thespius. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Paus. 9, c. 26.—Strab. 9.

Thespiades, the sons of Thespiades. Vid. Thespius.

Thespiades, a name given to the 50 daughters of Thespius. Vid. Thespius. Diod. 4.—Seneca, in Her. (Æt. 369.—Also a surname of the nine muses, because they were held in great veneration in Thespia. Flacc. 2, v. 368.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 310.

Thespia, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. Horat. Art. P. 276.—Diog.

Thespius, a king of Thespia, in Bœotia, son of Erechtheus, according to some authors. He was desirous that his 50 daughters should have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This, which, according to some, was effected in one night, passes for the 13th and most arduous of the labours of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcanissima indicate:

Quinquaginta simul stuprauit nocte puellas.*

All the daughters of Thespius brought male children into the world, and some of them twins, particularly Procris the eldest, and the youngest. Some suppose that one of the Thespiades refused to admit Hercules to her arms, for which the hero condemned her to pass all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the priestess of a temple he had at Thespia. The children of the Thespiades, called Thespiada, went to Sardinia, where they made a settlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Thespius is often confounded by ancient authors with Thespius, though the latter lived in a different place, and, as king of Pleuron, sent his sons to the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 9, c. 26 & 27.—Plut.

Thesprotia, a country of Epirus, at the west of Ambracia, bounded on the south by the sea. It is watered by the rivers Acheron and Cocytus, which the poets, after Homer, have called the streams of hell. The oracle of Dodona was in Thesprotia. Homer. Od. 14, v. 325.—Strab. 7, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—Lucan. 3, v. 179.

Thesprotus, a son of Lycaon king of Arcadia. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

Thessalia, a country of Greece, whose boundaries have been different at different periods. Properly speaking, Thessaly was bounded on the south by the northern parts of Greece, or Græcia propria; east, by the Ægean; north, by Macedonia and Mygdonia; and west, by Illyricum and Epirus. It was generally divided into four separate provinces, Thessaliois, Pelasgiotis, Istiæotis, and Phthiotis, to which some add Magnesia. It has been severally called Bœonia, Pelasgicum, Argos, Hellas, Argæia, Dryopis, Pelasgia, Pyrrhæa, Emathia, &c. The name of Thessaly is derived from Thessalus, one of its monarchs. Thessaly is famous for a deluge which happened there in the age of Deucalion. Its mountains and cities are also celebrated, such as Olympus, Pelion, Ossa, Larissa, &c. The Argonauts were partly natives of Thessaly. The inhabitants of the country passed for a treacherous nation, so that false money was called Thessalian coin, and a perfidious action, Thessalian deceit. Thessaly was governed by kings, till it became subject to the Macedonian monarchs. The cavalry was universally esteemed, and the people were superstitious, and addicted to the study of magic and incantations. Thessaly is now called Janna. Lucan. 6, v. 438, &c.—Dionys.

Thessalon, a servant of Mentor of Sidon, in the age of Antaxerxes Ochus, &c. Diod. 16.

Thessalotis, a part of Thessaly at the south of the river Peneus.

Thessalonica, an ancient town of Macedonia, first called Therma, and Thessalonica, after Thessalonica the wife of Cassander. According to ancient writers it was once very powerful, and it still continues to be a place of note. Strab. 7.—Dionys.—Cic. in Pis. c. 17.—Liv. 29, c. 17, l. 40, c. 4, l. 44, c. 10 & 45.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—A daughter of Philip king of Macedonia, sister to Alexander the Great. She married Cassander, by whom she had a son called Antipater, who put her to death. Paus. 8, c. 7.

Thesiæus, a son of Æmon.—A son of Hercules and Caliope daughter of Euryphilus. Thesæus received its name from one of these. Apollod. 2.—Dictys Cræ. 2.—A physician who invited Alexander to a feast at Babylon to give him poison.—A physician of Lydia in the age of Nero. He gained the favours of the great and opulent at Rome, by the meanness and servility of his behaviour. He treated all physicians with contempt, and thought himself superior to all his predecessors.—A son of Cimón, who accused Alcibiades because he imitated the mysteries of Ceres.—A son of Pisicratus.—A player in the age of Alexander.

Thesæus, a son of Hercules and Epicaste. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Thesto, a sister of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. She married Philoxenus, and was greatly esteemed by the Sicilians.

Thestia, a town of Ætolia, between the Evenus and Achelous. Polyb. 5.

Thesiades and Thesiædes. Vid. Thespiades and Thespiades.

Thesiædes, the sons of Thesius, Toxæus, and Plexippus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 286.

Thesias, a patronymic of Althæa, daughter of Thesius. Ovid. Met. 8.

Thesias, a fountain in the country of Cyrene.

Thesius, a king of Pleuron, and son of Parthaon, was father to Toxæus, Plexippus, and Althæa.—A king of Thespia. Vid. Thespius. The sons of Thesius, called Thesiada, were killed by Meleager at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Thesior, a son of Idmon and Lathoe, father to Calchas. From him Calchas is often called Thesiorides. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 19.—Stat. 1, Æch. v. 497.—Apollon. 1, v. 239.—Homer. 11, l. v. 69.

Thestyis, a country-woman mentioned in Theocritus and Virgil.

Thetis, one of the sea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Tethys her grandmother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the son she would bring forth must become greater than his father, their addresses were stopped, and Peleus the son of Æacus was permitted to solicit her hand. Thetis refused him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when asleep, and, by binding her strongly, he prevented her from escaping from his grasp, in assuming different forms. When Thetis found that she could not elude the vigilance of her lover she consented to marry him, though much against her inclination. Their nuptials were celebrated on mount Pelion with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddess of discord, who punished the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midst of the assembly a golden apple, to be given to the fairest of all the goddesses. Vid. Discordia. Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus, but all these she destroyed by fire in attempting to see whether they were immortal. Achilles must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand as she was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her son, she attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was useless. He went with the rest of the Greeks. The mother, still anxious for his preservation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a suit of armour; but when it was done, she refused the god the favours which she had promised him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis issued out of the sea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after she had collected his ashes in a golden urn, she raised a monument to his memory, and instituted festivals in his honour. *Hesiod. Thetis, or Tethis, a prince of a town of the same name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva, under the form of Melas son of Ops, attempted to pacify him, he struck the goddess and returned home. Some say that the goddess afterwards appeared to him and showed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died soon after. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Thia, the mother of the sun, moon, and Aurora by Hyperion. Vid. Thea. Hesiod. Theog. v. 371.—One of the Sporades, that rose out of the sea in the age of Piny. Plin. 27, c. 12.

Thias, a king of Assyria.

Thimbron, a Lacedæmonian, chosen general to conduct a war against Persia. He was recalled, and afterwards reappointed. He died B.C. 391. Diod. 17.—A friend of Harpalus.

Thiodamas, the father of Hylas. Vid. Theodamus.

Thistiæ, a town of Bœotia. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Thoantium, a place on the sea coast at Rhodes.

Thoas, a king of Taurica Chersonesus, in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. Vid. Iphigenia. According to some, Thoas was the son of Borysthenes. Ovid. Pont. 3, el. 2.—A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne the daughter of Minos, and husband to Myrtilus. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhada-manthus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hippisyle, in whose favour he had resigned the crown. Hippisyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island, which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thoas was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thoas was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, v. 208.—Hyllin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in Ib. 384. Heriod. 6, v. 114.—*Stat. Tholus, a town of Africa.

Thomyris, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris, and Tomeris, was queen of the Massagetae. After her husband's death, she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invade her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of the fallen monarch to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, with the insulting words of satis te sanguine quem sisti. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herodot. 1, c. 205.—Justin. 1, c. 8.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 143.

Thoria lax agraria, by Sp. Thorius the tribune. It ordained that no person should pay any rent for the land which he possessed. It also made some regulations about grazing and pastures. Cic. in Brut.

Thornax, a mountain of Argolis. It received its name from Thornax, a nymph who became mother of Buphagus by Japetus. The mountain was afterwards called Coccygn, because Jupiter changed himself there into a cuckoo. Paus. 8, c. 27.

Thorus, a river of Sardinia. Paus. 10, c. 17.

Thoth, an Egyptian deity, the same as Mercury.

Thous, a Trojan chief, &c.—One of Actæon's dogs.

Thræces, the inhabitants of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

Thraciæ, a large country of Europe, at the south of Scythia, bounded by mount Hæmus. It had the Ægean sea on the south, on the west Macedonia and the river Strymon, and on the east the Euxine sea, the Propontis, and the Hellespont. Its northern boundaries extended as far as the Ister, according to Pliny and others. The Thracians were looked upon as a cruel and barbarous nation; they were naturally brave and warlike, addicted to drinking and venereal pleasures, and they sacrificed without the smallest humanity their enemies on the altars of their gods. Their government was originally monarchical, and divided among a number of independent princes. Thrace is barren as to its soil. It received its name from Thrax the son of Mars, the chief deity of the country. The first inhabitants lived upon plunder, and on the milk and flesh of sheep. It forms now the province of Romania. Herodot. 4, c. 99, l. 5, c. 3.—Strab. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, &c.—Met. 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 9, c. 29, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 92, l. 13, v. 565, &c.—*C. Thrasimenus. Vid. Thrasymenus.

Thrasius, a general of a mercenary band in Sicily, who raised a sedition against Timoleon. Diod. 16.—A spendthrift at Rome, &c. Horat. 2, sat. 2, v. 99.

Thraso, a painter. Strab. 14.—A favourite of Hieronymus, who espoused the interest of the Romans. He was put to death by the tyrant.—The character of a captain in Terence.

Thrasylbulus, a famous general of Athens, who began the expulsion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only assisted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with success, B.C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive branch; a proof of his own disinterestedness and of the virtues of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whose abilities and humanity were so conspicuous, and Thrasylbulus was sent with a powerful fleet to recover their lost power sent her to Teuthras king of Bithynia, by whom she was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wished to know his parents, to go to Mysia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Mysia, where Teuthras offered him his crown, and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hostilities of Idas the son of Appareus. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Mysians, he soon routed the enemy, and received the promised reward. As he was going to unite himself to Auge, the sudden appearance of an enormous serpent separated the two lovers; Auge implored the assistance of Hercules, and was soon informed by the god that Telephus was her own son. When this was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus some time after married one of the daughters of king Priam. As one of the sons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to assist Priam against the Greeks, and with heroic valour he attacked them when they had landed on his coast. The carnage was great, and Telephus was victorious, had not Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, suddenly raised a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch, and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately rushed upon him, and wounded him so severely, that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, but Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it could totally cure it. Upon this, applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero observed that he was no physician, till Ulysses, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of one of the sons of Hercules, and who wished to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, persuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles consented, and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero scraped the rust from the point of his spear, and, by applying it to the sore, gave it immediate relief. It is said that Telephus showed himself so grateful to the Greeks, that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them against his father-in-law. *Hygin. fab. 105.—Paus. 8, c. 48.—Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Ælian. Telles, a king of Achaia, son of Tisamenus. Paus. 7, c. 6.

Tellias, a famous soothsayer of Elis, in the age of Xerxes. He was greatly honoured in Phocis, where he had settled, and the inhabitants raised him a statue in the temple of Apollo, at Delphi. Paus. 10, v. 1.—Herodot. 8, c. 27.

Tellis, a Greek lyric poet, the father of Brasidas.

Tellus, a divinity, the same as the earth, the most ancient of all the gods after Chaos. She was mother by Cœlus of Oceanus, Hyperion, Cœus, Rhea, Japetus, Themis, Saturno, Phœbe, Tethys, &c. Tellus is the same as the divinity who is honoured under the several names of Cybele, Rhea, Vesta, Ceres, Tithea, Bona Dea, Proserpine, &c. She was generally represented in the character of Tellus, as a woman with many breasts, distended with milk, to express the fecundity of the earth. She also appeared crowned with turrets, holding a sceptre in one hand and a key in the other; while at her feet was lying a tame lion without chains, as if to intimate that every part of the earth can be made fruitful by means of cultivation. Hesiod. Theog. v. 130.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 137.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—A poor man, whom Solon called happier than Croesus the rich and ambitious king of Lydia. —A king of the Teleboæ, who married Sebethis, by whom he had Ebalus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Telphusa, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the Ladon who gave her name to a town and fountain of that place. The waters of the fountain Telphusa were so cold, that Tiresias died by drinking them. Diad. 4.—Strab. 9.—Lycophron, 1049.

Telxiöpe, one of the muses according to Cic. de N. D. 3, c. 21.

Telys, a tyrant of Sybaris.

Temathæa, a mountain of Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 34.

Temänium, a place in Messene, where Temenus was buried.

Temänites, a surname of Apollo, which he received at Temenos, a small place near Syracuse, where he was worshipped. Cic. in Verr.

Temänos, a place of Syracuse, where Apollo, called Temenites, had a statue. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 53.—Suet. Tib. 74.

Temänos, v. the son of Aristomachus, was the first of the Heraclidæ, who returned to Peloponnesus with his brother Ctesiphontes, and in the reign of Tisamenes king of Argos. Temenus made himself master of the throne of Argos, from which he expelled the reigning sovereign. After death he was succeeded by his son-in-law Deiphon, who had married his daughter Hymetho, and this succession was in preference to his own son. Apolod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 18 & 19.—A son of Peläagus, who was entrusted with the care of Juno's infancy. Paus. 8, c. 22.

Temnes, a king of Sidon.

Temnos, a town of Æolia, at the mouth of the Hermus. Herodot. 1, c. 49.—Cic. Flacc. 18.

Tempe (plur.), a valley in Thessaly, between mount Olympus at the north and Ossa at the south, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean. The poets have described it as the most delightful spot on the earth, with continually cool shades and verdant walks, which the warbling of birds rendered more pleasant and romantic, and which the gods often honoured with their presence. Tempe extended about five miles in length, but varied in the dimensions of its breadth so as to be in some places scarce one acre and a half wide. All valleys that are pleasant, either for their situation or the mildness of their climate, are called Tempe by the poets. Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Diod. 4.—Dionys. Perieg. 219.—*Ælian. V. Tenchtheri, a nation of Germany, who frequently changed the place of their habitation. Pacit. Ann. 13, c. 56. H. 4, c. 21.

Tenders, a town of Caria. Liv. 33, c. 18.

Tenea, a part of Coninth. Mela, 2, c. 3.

Tenädia securis. Vid. Tenes.

Tenädos, a small and fertile island of the Ægean sea, opposite Troy, at the distance of about 17 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Lesbos. It was anciently called Leucophris, till Tenes the son of Cyncus settled there and built a town, which he called Tenedos, from which the whole island received its name. It became famous during the Trojan war, as it was there that the Greeks concealed themselves, the more effectually to make the Trojans believe that they were returned home without finishing the siege. Homér. Od. 3, v. 59.—Diad. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 21.—Övid. Met. 1, v. 540. l. 12, v. 109.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Tenärus, son of Apollo and Melia, received from his father the knowledge of futurity. Paus. 9, c. 10.

Tenes, a son of Cyncus and Proclæ. He was exposed on the sea, on the coast of Troas, by his father, who credulously believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cyncus, and accused him of attempts upon her virtue, when he refused to gratify her passion. Tenes arrived in Leucophris, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the sovereign. Some time after Cyncus discovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wished to be reconciled to his son whom he had so grossly injured, he went to Tenedos. But when he had tied his ship to the shore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and suffered his father's ship to be tossed about in the sea. From this circumstance the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a resentment that cannot be pacified. Some, however, suppose that the proverb arose from the severity of a law made by a king of Tenedos against adultery, by which the guilty were both put to death by a hatchet. The hatchet of Tenes was carefully preserved at Tenedos, and afterwards deposited by Periclytus son of Eutymanus, in the temple of Delphi, where it was still seen in the age of Pausanias. Tenes, as some suppose, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country against the Greeks, and he received divine honours after death. His statue at Tenedos was carried away by Verres. Strab. 13.—Paus. 10, c. 14.—A general of 4000 mercenary Greeks sent by the Egyptians to assist the Phœnicians. Diad. 16.

Tensäis, a part of Æthiopia. Strab.

Tennes, a king of Sidon, who, when his country was besieged by the Persians, burnt himself and the city together. B.C. 351.

Tennum, a town of Æolia.

Tenos, a small island in the Ægean, near Andros, called Ophisussa, and also Hydrussa, from the number of its fountains. It was very mountainous, but it produced excellent wines, universally esteemed by the ancients. Tenos was about 15 miles in extent. The capital was also called Tenos.—Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Övid. Met. 7, v. 469.

Tentyris (plur.) and Tentyris, a small town of Egypt, on the Nile, whose inhabitants were at enmity with the crocodiles, and made war against those who paid them adoration. Seneca. N. Q. 4, c. 2.—Strab. 17.—Juv. 15.—Plin. 25, c. 8.

Tentyra (melius Tempyra), a place of Thrace, opposite Samothrace. Övid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 27.

Teos, or Teios, now Sigayri, a maritime town on the coast of Ionia in Asia Minor, opposite Samos. It was one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, and gave birth to Anacreon and Hecætus, who is by some deemed a native of Miletus. According to Pliny, Teos was an island. Augustus repaired Teos, whence he is often called the founder of it on ancient medals. Strab. 14.—Mela, 2, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 18.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

Terëdon, a town on the Arabian gulf. Dio. Per. 982.

Terentia, the wife of Cicero. She became mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her because she had been faithless to his bed, when he was banished in Asia. Terentia married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Messala Corvinus. She lived to her 103rd, or, according to Pliny, to her 117th year. Plut. in Cic.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13. Cic. ad Attic. 11, ep. 16, &c.—The wife of Scipio Africanus.—The wife of Mecenas, with whom it was said that Augustus carried on an intrigue.

Terentia lex, called also Cassia, frumentaria, by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus and C. Cassius, A.U.C. 680. It ordered that the same price should be given for all corn bought in the provinces, to hinder the exactions of the questors.—Another, by Terentius the tribune, A.U.C. 201, to elect five persons to define the power of the consuls, lest they should abuse the public confidence, by violence or rapine.

Terentianus, a Roman to whom Longinus dedicated his treatise on the sublime.—Maurus, a writer who flourished A.D. 240. The last edition of his treatise de litteris, syllabis, et metris Horatii, is by Mycillus, Francof. 8vo, 1584. Martial. 1, ep. 70.

Terentius Publius, a native of Carthage in Africa, celebrated for the comedies which he wrote. He was sold as a slave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, who educated him with great care, and manumitted him for the brilliancy of his genius. He bore the name of his master and benefactor, and was called Terentius. He applied himself to the study of Greek comedy with uncommon assiduity, and merited the friendship and patronage of the learned and powerful. Scipio the elder Africanus, and his friend Lælius, have been suspected, on account of their intimacy, of assisting the poet in the composition of his comedies; and the fine language, the pure expressions, and delicate sentiments with which the plays of Terence abound, seem, perhaps, to favour the supposition. Terence was in the 25th year of his age when his first play appeared on the Roman stage. All his compositions were received with great applause, but when the words were repeated, the plaudits were reiterated, and the audience, though composed of foreigners, conquered nations, allies, and citizens of Rome, were unanimous in applauding the poet, who spoke with such elegance and simplicity the language of nature, and supported the native independence of man. The talents of Terence were employed rather in translation than in the effusions of originality. It is said that he translated 108 of the comedies of the poet Menander, six of which only are extant, his Andria, Eunuch, Heautontimorumenos, Adelphi, Phormio, and Hecyra. Terence is admired for the purity of his language, and the artless elegance and simplicity of his diction, and for a continual delicacy of sentiment. There is more originality in Plautus, more vivacity in the intrigues, and more surprise in the catastrophes of his plays; but Terence will ever be admired for his taste, his expressions, and his faithful pictures of nature and manners, and the becoming dignity of his several characters. Quintilian, who candidly acknowledges the deficiencies of the Roman comedy, declares that Terence was the most elegant and refined of all the comedians whose writings appeared on the stage. The time and the manner of his death are unknown. He left Rome in the 35th year of his age, and never after appeared there. Some suppose that he was drowned in a storm as he returned from Greece, about 159 years before Christ, though others imagine he died in Arcadia or Leucadia, and that his death was accelerated by the loss of his property, and particularly of his plays which perished in a shipwreck. The best editions of Terence are those of Westerhovius, 2 vols. 4to, Amst. 1726; of Edinb. 12mo, 1758; of Cambridge, 4to, 1723; Hawkey's, 12mo, Dublin, 1745; and that of Zeunius, 8vo, Lips. 1774. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3.—Patric. 1, c. 17.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 59.—Culeo, a Roman senator, taken by the Carthaginians, and redeemed by Africanus. When Africanus triumphed, Culeo followed his chariot with a pileus on his head. He was some time after appointed judge between his deliverer and the people of Asia, and had the meanness to condemn him and his brother Asiaticus, though both innocent. Liv. 30, c. 45.—A tribune who wished the number of the citizens of Rome to be increased.—Evocatus, a man who, as it was supposed, murdered Galba. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 41.

—Lentinus, a Roman knight condemned for perjury.—Varro, a writer. Vid. Varro.—A consul with Æmilius Paulus at the battle of Cannæ. He was the son of a butcher, and had followed for some time the profession of his father. He placed himself totally in the power of Hannibal, by making an improper disposition of his army. After he had been defeated, and his colleague slain, he retired to Canusium, with the remains of his slaughtered countrymen, and sent word to the Roman senate of his defeat. He received the thanks of this venerable body, because he had engaged the enemy, however improperly, and not despaired of the affairs of the republic. He was offered the dictatorship, which he declined. Plut.—Liv. 22, &c.—An ambassador sent to Philip king of Macedonia.—Massaliota, an edite of the people, &c.—Marcus, a friend of Sejanus, accused before the senate for his intimacy with that discarded favourite. He made a noble defence, and was acquitted. Tacit. Ann. 6.

Terentus, a place in the Campus Martius near the capitol, where the infernal deities had an altar. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 504.

Tereus, a king of Thrace, son of Mars and Bistonis. He married Progne the daughter of Pandion king of Athens, whom he had assisted in a war against Megara. He offered violence to his sister-in-law Philomela, whom he conducted to Thrace by desire of Progne. Vid. Philomela and Progne.—A friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 675.

Tergeste and Tergestum, now Trieste, a town of Italy on the Adriatic sea, made a Roman colony. Mela, 2, c. 3, &c.—Dionys. Perieg. v. 380.—Patric. 2, c. 110.—Plin. 3, c. 18.

Terias, a river of Sicily near Catania.

Teribazus, a nobleman of Persia, sent with a fleet against Evagoras king of Cyprus. He was accused of treason, and removed from office, &c. Polyan. 7.

Teridas, a concubine of Menelaus.

Teridates, a favourite eunuch at the court of Artaxerxes. At his death the monarch was in tears for three days, and was consoled at last only by the arts and the persuasion of Aspasia, one of his favourites. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 1.

Terigum, a town of Macedonia.

Terina, a town of the Bruttii.

Terioli, now Tiroli, a fortified town at the north of Italy, in the country of the Grisons.

Termentia, or Termea, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis.

Termera, a town of Caria.

Termerus, a robber of Peloponnesus, who killed people by crushing their head against his own. He was slain by Hercules in the same manner. Plut. in These.

Termesus, a river of Arcadia.

Termileo, a name given to the Lycians.

Terminalia, annual festivals at Rome, observed in honour of the god Terminus, in the month of February. It was then usual for peasants to assemble near the principal landmarks which separated their fields, and after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and to sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. They were originally established by Numa, and though at first it was forbidden to shed the blood of victims, yet in process of time landmarks were plentifully sprinkled with it. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 641.—Cic. Phil. 12, c. 10.

Terminālis, a surname of Jupiter, because he presided over the boundaries and lands of individuals, before the worship of the god Terminus was introduced. Dionys. Hal. 2.

Terminus, a divinity at Rome who was supposed to preside over bounds and limits, and to punish all unlawful usurpation of land. His worship was first introduced at Rome by Numa, who persuaded his subjects that the limits of their lands and estates were under the immediate inspection of heaven. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was represented with a human head without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved, wherever he was placed. The people of the country assembled once a year with their families, and crowned with garlands and flowers the stones which separated their different possessions, and offered victims to the god who presided over their boundaries. It is said that when Tarquin the Proud wished to build a temple on the Tarpeian rock to Jupiter, the god Terminus refused to give way, though the other gods resigned their seats with cheerfulness; whence Ovid has said,

Restitit, et mango cum Jove templa tenet.

Dionys. Hal. 2.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 641.—Plut. in Num.—Livy. 5.—Virg. Æn. 9.

Termissus, or Termessus, a town of Pisidia.

Terpander, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos, 675 B.C. It is said that he appeased a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes. He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Plut. de Mus.

Terpsichōra, one of the muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, of which she was reckoned the inventress, as her name intimates, and with which she delighted her sisters. She is represented like a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument. Juv. 7, v. 35.—Apollod. 1.—Eustat. in Il. 10.

Terpsiorāte, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Terra, one of the most ancient deities in mythology, wife of Uranus, and mother of Oceanus, the Titans, Cyclops, Giants, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Phoebe, Theys, and Mnemosyne. By the Air she had Grief, Mourning, Oblivion, Vengeance, &c. According to Hyginus, she is the same as Tellus. Vid. Tellus.

Terracina. Vid. Terracina.

Terrasidius, a Roman knight in Caesar's army in Gaul. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 7 & 8.

Terror, an emotion of the mind which the ancients have made a deity, and one of the attendants of the god Mars, and of Bellona.

Tertia, a sister of Clodius the tribune, &c.—A daughter of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus. Cic. ad. Div. 1, c. 46.—A daughter of Isidorus. Cic. in Verr. 3, c. 34.—A sister of Brutus, who married Cassius. She was also called Tertulla and Jumia. Tacit. A. 3, c. 76.—Suet. Cæs. 50.—Cic. ad B. 5 & 6. Ad Att. 15, ep. 11. l. 16, ep. 20.

Tertius Julianus, a lieutenant in Caesar's legions.

Tertullianus J. Septimius Florens, a celebrated christian writer of Carthage, who flourished A.D. 196. He was originally a pagan, but afterwards embraced christianity, of which he became an able advocate by his writings, which showed that he was possessed of a lively imagination, impetuous eloquence, elevated style, and strength of reasoning. The most famous and esteemed of his numerous works, are his Apology for the Christians, and his Prescriptions. The best edition of Tertullian is that of Semlerus, 4 vols. 8vo. Hal. 1770; and of his Apology, that of Havercamp, 8vo, L. Bat. 1718.

Tethys, the greatest of the sea deities, was wife of Oceanus, and daughter of Uranus and Terra. She was mother of the chiefest rivers of the universe, such as the Nile, the Alpheus, the Meander, Simois, Peneus, Evenus, Scamander, &c., and about 3000 daughters called Oceanides. Tethys is confounded by some mythologists with her granddaughter Thetis the wife of Peleus, and the mother of Achilles. The word Tethys is poetically used to express the sea. Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 509. l. 9, v. 498. Fast. 2, v. 191.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 336.—Homer. Il. 14, v. 302.

Tetrapōlis, a name given to the city of Antioch the capital of Syria, because it was divided into four separate districts, each of which resembled a city. Some apply the word to Seleucia, which contained the four large cities of Antioch near Daphne, Laodicea, Apamea, and Seleucia in Pieria.—The name of four towns at the north of Attica. Strab. 8.

Tétrica, a mountain of the Sabines near the river Fabaris. It was very rugged and difficult of access, whence the epithet Tetricus was applied to persons of a morose and melancholy disposition. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 713.

Tenœus, a king of Phrygia, son of the Scamander by Ida. According to some authors he was the first who introduced among his subjects the worship of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Tenœria, and his subjects Tenœri. His daughter Helen married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who succeeded him in the government of Teucra. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 108.—A son of Pelamion king of Salamis, by Hesione the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helen's suitors, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he signalized himself by his valour and intrepidity. It is said that his father refused to receive him into his kingdom, because he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenge. This severity of the father did not dishearten the son; he left Salamis, and retired to Cyprus, where, with the assistance of Belus king of Sidon, he built a town, which he called Salamis, after his native country. He attempted, to no purpose, to recover the island of Salamis after his father's death. He built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, on which a man was annually sacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some suppose that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a less received opinion, he went to settle in Spain, where new Carthage was afterwards built, and thence into Galatia. Hom. Il. 1, v. 281.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 623.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 29.—Justin. 44, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.—One of the servants of Phalaris of Agrigentum.

Teuceri, a name given to the Trojans, from Teucer their king. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 43 & 239.

Teucra, a name given to Troy, from Teucer one of its kings. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 26.

Teucteri, a people of Germany, at the east of the Rhine. Tacit. de Germ. c. 22.

Teumessus, a mountain of Bœotia with a village of the same name, where Hercules, when young, killed an enormous lion. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 331.

Teuta, a queen of Illyricum, B.C. 231, who ordered some Roman ambassadors to be put to death. This unprecedented murder was the cause of a war, which ended in her disgrace. Flor. 2, c. 5.—Plin. 34, c. 6.

Teutamias, or Teutamias, a king of Larissa. He instituted games in honour of his father, where Perseus killed his grandfather Acrisius with a quoit.

Teutamius, a king of Assyria, the same as Tithonus the father of Memnon. Diod. 5.

Teutas, or Teutates, a name of Mercury among the Gauls. The people offered human victims to this deity. Lucan. 1, v. 445.—Cæsar. Bell. G.

Teuthrania, a part of Mysia where the Caycus rises.

Teuthras, a king of Mysia on the borders of the Caycus. He adopted as his daughter, or, according to others, married, Auge the daughter of Aleus, when she fled away into Asia from her father, who wished to punish her for her amours with Hercules. Some time after his kingdom was invaded by Idas the son of Aphareus, and to remove this enemy, he promised Auge and his crown to any one who could restore tranquillity to his subjects. This was executed by Telephus, who afterwards proved to be the son of Auge, who was promised in marriage to him by right of his successful expedition. The 50 daughters of Teuthras, who became mothers by Hercules, are called Teuthranitia turba. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 25.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 19. Heroid. 9, v. 51.—Hygin. fab. 100.—A river's name.—One of the companions of Æneas in Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 402.

Teutoburgiensis saltus, a forest of Germany, between the Ems and Lippe, where Varus and his legions were cut to pieces. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 60.

Teutomatus, a prince of Gaul, among the allies of Rome.

Teutoni and Teutones, a people of Germany, who with the Cimbræ made incursions upon Gaul, and cut to pieces two Roman armies. They were at last defeated by the consul Marius, and an infinite number made prisoners. Vid. Cimbræ. Cic. pro Manil.—Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plut. in Mar.—Martial. 14, ep. 26.—Plin. 4, c. 14.

Thabenna, an inland town of Africa. Hist. Afric. 77.

Thabusiium, a fortified place of Phrygia. Liv. 38, c. 14.

Thais, a famous courtesan of Athens, who accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, and gained such an ascendancy over him, that she made him burn the royal palace of Persepolis. After Alexander's death, she married Ptolemy king of Egypt. Menander celebrated her charms both mental and personal, which were of a superior nature, and on this account she is called Menandrea by Propert. 2, el. 6.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 604. De Rem. Am. v. 384.—Plut. in Alex.—Juv. 3, v. 93.—Athen. 13, c. 13.

Thais, a town of Africa. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 21.

Thalame, a town of Messenia, famous for a temple and oracle of Pasiphæe. Plut. in Agid.

Thalassius, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabine, one of these virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed, as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned, than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. He was descended from Cadmus; his father's name was Examius, and his mother's Cleobuia. Like the rest of the ancients, he travelled in quest of knowledge, and for some time resided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the priests of Memphis he was taught geometry, astronomy, and philosophy, and enabled to measure with exactness the vast height and extent of a pyramid merely by its shadow. His discoveries in astronomy were great and ingenious; and he was the first who calculated with accuracy a solar eclipse. He discovered the solstices and equinoxes, he divided the heavens into five zones, and recommended the division of the year into 365 days, which was universally adopted by the Egyptian philosophy. Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of everything. He was the founder of the Ionic sect, which distinguished itself for its deep and abstruse speculations under the successors and pupils of the Milesian philosopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus the master of Socrates. Thales was never married; and when his mother pressed him to choose a wife, he said he was too young. The same exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philosopher eluded them by observing that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial state. He died in the 96th year of his age, about 548 years before the Christian era. His compositions on philosophical subjects are lost. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—Plato.—Diog. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D., &c.—A lyric poet of Crete, intimate with Lycurgus. He prepared by his rhapsodies the minds of the Spartans to receive the rigorous institutions of his friend, and inculcated a reverence for the peace of civil society.

Thalestria, or Thalestria, a queen of the Amazons, who, accompanied by 300 women, came 35 days' journey to meet Alexander in his Asiatic conquests, to raise children by a man whose fame was so great, and courage so uncommon. Curt. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 4.

Thales, a Greek poet of Crete, 900 B.C.
Thalia, one of the Muses, who presided over festivals, and over pastoral and comic poetry. She is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook. Her dress appears shorter, and not so ornamented as that of the other Muses. Horat. 4, od. 6, v. 25.—Mart. 9, ep. 75.—Plut. in Symp., &c.—Virg. Ec. 6, v. 2.—One of the Nereides. Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 826.—An island in the Tyrrhene sea.

Thallo, one of the Hours or Seasons, who presided over the spring. Paus. 9, c. 35.

Thalpius, a son of Eurypus, one of Helen's suitors. Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Thalysia, Greek festivals celebrated by the people of the country in honour of Ceres, to whom the first fruits were regularly offered. Schol. Theocr. 3.

Thamiras, a Cilician who first introduced the art of augury in Cyprus, where it was religiously preserved in his family for many years. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 3.

Thamuda, a part of Arabia Felix.

Thamyras, or Thamyris, a celebrated musician of Thrace. His father's name was Philammon, and his mother's Argiope. He became enamoured of the Muses, and challenged them to a trial of skill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed that the conqueror should be totally at the disposal of his victorious adversary. He was conquered, and the Muses deprived him of his eyesight and his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compositions are lost. Some accused him of having first introduced into the world the unnatural vice of which Sotades is accused. Homer. Il. 2, v. 594. l. 5, v. 599.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 7, v. 62. Art. Am. 3, v. 399.—Paus. 4, c. 33.

Thamyris, one of the petty princes of the Dace, in the age of Darius, &c.—A queen of the Massagete. Vid. Thomyris.—A Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 341.

Thapsacus, a city on the Euphrates.

Thapsus, a town of Africa Propria, where Scipio and Juba were defeated by Cæsar. Sil. 3, 261.—Liv. 29, c. 30. l. 33, c. 48.—A town at the north of Syracuse in Sicily.

Thargella, festivals in Greece, in honour of Apollo and Diana. They lasted two days, and the youngest of both sexes carried olive branches, on which were suspended cakes and fruits. Athen. 12.

Tharixides, one of the generals of Antiochus, &c.

Tharops, the father of Cæger, to whom Bacchus gave the kingdom of Thrace, after the death of Lycurgus. Diog. 4.

Thasius, or Thrasius, a famous soothsayer of Cyprus, who told Busiris king of Egypt, that to stop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country, he must offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be seized and sacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 549.—A surname of Hercules, who was worshipped at Thasos.

Thasos, or Thasus, a small island in the Ægean, on the coast of Thrace, opposite the mouth of the Nestus, anciently known by the name of Æria, Odemis, Athria, Acte, Ugveia, Chryse, and Ceresis. It received that of Thasos from Thasus the son of Agenor, who settled there when he despaired of finding his sister Europa. It was about 40 miles in circumference, and so uncommonly fruitful, that the fertility of Thasos became proverbial. Its wine was universally esteemed, and its marble quarries were also in great repute, as well as its mines of gold and silver. The capital of the island was also called Thasos. Liv. 33, c. 30 & 55.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 25.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 93.—C. Nep. Cim. 2.

Thasus, a son of Neptune, who went with Cadmus to seek Europa. He built the town of Thasus in Thrace. Some make him brother of Cadmus. Apollod. 3, c. 1.

Thaumaci, a town of Thessaly on the Maliac gulf. Liv. 32, c. 4.

Thaumasias and Thaumasias, a name given to Iris the messenger of Juno, because she was the daughter of Thaumias the son of Oceanus and Terra by one of the Oceanides. Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 479. l. 14, v. 845.

Thaumas, a son of Neptune and Terra, who married Electra, one of the Oceanides, by whom he had Iris and the Harpyies, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Thaumasius, a mountain of Arcadia, on whose top, according to some accounts, Jupiter was born.

Thea, a daughter of Uranus and Terra. She married her brother Hyperion, by whom she had the sun, the moon, Aurora, &c. She is also called Thia, Titæa, Rhea, Tethys, &c.—One of the Sporades.

Theagènes, a man who made himself master of Megara, &c.—An athlete of Thasos, famous for his strength. His father's name was Timosthenes, a friend of Hercules. He was crowned above 1000 times at the public games of the Greeks, and became a god after death. Paus. 6, c. 6 & 11.—Plut.—A Theban officer, who distinguished himself at the battle of Cheronæa. Plut.—A writer who published commentaries on Homer's works.

Theages, a Greek philosopher, disciple of Socrates. Plato.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.

Theangela, a town of Caria.

Theano, the wife of Metapontus son of Sisypus, presented some twins to her husband, when he wished to repudiate her for her barrenness. The children were educated with the greatest care, and some time afterwards Theano herself became the mother of twins. When they were grown up she encouraged them to murder the supposititious children, who were to succeed to their father's throne in preference to them. They were both killed in the attempt, and the father, displeased with the conduct of Theano, repudiated her to marry the mother of the children whom he had long considered as his own. Hygin. fab. 186.—A daughter of Cisseus, sister to Hecuba, who married Antenor, and was supposed to have betrayed the Palladium to the Greeks, as she was priestess of Minerva. Homer. Il. 6, v. 258.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—Dionys. Cret. 5, c. 8.—One of the Danaides. Her husband's name was Phantes. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—The wife of the philosopher Pythagoras, daughter of Pythianax of Crete, or, according to others, of Bronnius of Crotona. Diog. 8, c. 42.—The daughter of Pythagoras.—A poetess of Locris.—A priestess of Athens, daughter of Menon, who refused to pronounce a curse upon Alcibiades when he was accused of having mutilated all the statues of Mercury. Plut.—The mother of Pausanias. She was the first, as it is reported, who brought a stone to the entrance of Minerva's temple, to shut up her son when she heard of his crimes and perfidy to his country. Polyem. 8.—A daughter of Scedastus, to whom some of the Lacedæmonians offered violence at Leuctra.—A Trojan matron, who became mother of Mimas by Amycus, the same night that Paris was born. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 793.

Teannum, a town of Italy. Vid. Teannum.

Thearidas, a brother of Dionysius the elder. He was made admiral of his fleet. Diod. 14.

Thearins, a surname of Apollo at Træzene. Paus. 2, c. 52.

Theatotes, a Greek epigrammatist.

Theba, or Thebe, a town of Lijicia. Vid. Theba.

Thebæ (arum), a celebrated city, the capital of Bœotia, situate on the banks of the river Ismenus. The manner of its foundation is not precisely known. Cadmus is supposed to have first begun to found it by building the citadel Cadmea. It was afterwards finished by Amphion and Zethus; but, according to Varro, it owed its origin to Ogyges. The government of Thebes was monarchical, and many of the sovereigns are celebrated for their misfortunes, such as Laius, Œdipus, Polyneices, Eteocles, &c. The war which Thebes supported against the Argives, is famous as well as that of the Epigoni. The Thebans were looked upon as an indolent and sluggish nation, and the words of Theban pig, became proverbial to express a man remarkable for stupidity and inattention. This, however, was not literally true; under Epaminondas, the Thebans, though before dependent, became masters of Greece, and everything was done according to their will and pleasure. When Alexander invaded Greece, he ordered Thebes to be totally demolished, because it had revolted against him, except the house where the poet Pindar had been born and educated. In this dreadful period 6000 of its inhabitants were slain, and 30,000 sold for slaves. Thebes was afterwards repaired by Cassander the son of Antipater, but it never rose to its original consequence, and Strabo, in his age, mentions it merely as an inconsiderable village. The monarchical government was abolished there at the death of Xanthus, about 1190 years before Christ, and Thebes became a republic. It received its name from Thebe the daughter of Asopus, to whom the founder Amphion was nearly related. Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 6, l. 9, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Plut. in Pel. Flam. & Alex.—C. Nep. in Pel. Epam., &c.—Horat. Art. Poet. 394.—Ovid. Met. 1.—A town at the south of Troas, built by Hercules, and also called Placia and Hypoplacia. It fell into the hands of the Cilicians, who occupied it during the Trojan war. Curt. 3, c. 4.—Liv. 37, c. 19.—Strab. 11.—An ancient celebrated city of Thebais in Egypt, called also Hecatompylos, on account of its 100 gates, and Diospolis, as being sacred to Jupiter. In the time of its splendour, it extended above 23 miles, and upon any emergency could send into the field, by each of its 100 gates, 20,000 fighting men and 200 chariots. Thebes was ruined by Cambyses king of Persia, and few traces of it were seen in the age of Juvenal. Plin. 5, c. 9.—Juv. 15, v. 16.—Tacit. Ann. c. 2.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Diod. 2.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 381.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—A town of Africa, built by Bacchus.—Another in Thessaly. Liv. 28, c. 7.—Another in Phthiotis.

Thebais, a country in the southern parts of Egypt, of which Thebes was the capital.—There have been some poems which have borne the name of Thebais, but of these the only one extant is the Thebais of Statius. It gives an account of the war of the Thebans against the Argives, in consequence of the dissension of Eteocles with his brother Polyneices. The poet was 12 years in composing it.—A river of Lydia.—A name given to a native of Thebes.

Thebe, a daughter of the Asopus, who married Zethus. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 5.—The wife of Alexander tyrant of Phæze. She was persuaded by Pelopidas to murder her husband.

Thea, a goddess. Vid. Thea.

Theias, a son of Belus, who had an incestuous intercourse with his daughter Smyrna.

Theiophassa, the second wife of Agenor, called also Teiaphassa.

Theipusa, a nymph of Arcadia. Vid. Teipusa.

Thelxion, a son of Apis, who conspired against his father, who was king of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Thelxiope, one of the Muses, according to some writers. Cic. de Fin.

Themeneus, a son of Aristomachus, better known by the name of Temenus.

Themision, a tyrant of Eretria. Diod. 15.

Themillas, a Trojan, &c. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 376.

Themis, a daughter of Coelus and Terra, who married Jupiter against her own inclination. She became mother of Dice, Irene, Eunomia, the Parca and Hora; and was the first to whom the inhabitants of the earth raised temples. Her oracle was famous in Attica in the age of Deucalion, who consulted it with great solemnity, and was instructed how to repair the loss of mankind. She was generally attended by the seasons. Among the moderns she is represented as holding a sword in one hand, and a pair of scales in the other. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 321.—A daughter of Ius, who married Cappas, and became mother of Anchises. Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Themiscyra, a town of Cappadocia, at the mouth of the Thermodon, belonging to the Amazons. The territories round it bore the same name.

Themison, a famous physician of Laodicea, disciple to Asclepiades. He was founder of a sect called Methodists, because he wished to introduce methods to facilitate the learning and the practice of physic. He flourished in the Augustan age. Plin. 29, c. 1.—Juv. 10.—One of the generals and ministers of Antiochus the Great. He was born at Cyprus. Blitum. V. H. 2, c. 41.

Themista, or Themistia, a goddess, the same as Themis.

Themistius, a celebrated philosopher of Paphlagonia in the age of Constantius, greatly esteemed by the Roman emperors, and called Enphrades, the fine speaker, from his eloquent and commanding delivery. He was made a Roman senator, and always distinguished for his liberality and munificence. His school was greatly frequented. He wrote, when young, some commentaries on Aristotle, fragments of which are still extant, and 33 of his orations. He professed himself to be an enemy to flattery, and though he often deviates from this general rule in his addresses to the emperors, yet he strongly recommends humanity, wisdom, and clemency. The best edition of Themistius is that of Harduin, fol. Paris, 1684.

Themisto, a daughter of Hypseus, was the third wife of Athamas king of Thebes, by whom she had four sons, called Ptoüs, Leucön, Schœneus, and Erythroës. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her husband's second wife, but she killed her own, by means of Ino, who lived in her house in the disguise of a servant-maid, and to whom she entrusted her bloody intentions, upon which she destroyed herself. Paus. 9, c. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—A woman mentioned by Polyænus.—The mother of the poet Homer, according to a tradition mentioned by Pausanias, 10, c. 24.

Themistocles, a celebrated general born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotonum, a native of Halicarnassus, or of Thrace, or Acarnania. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices so flagrant, and an inclination so incorrigible, that his father disinherited him. This, which might have disheartened others, roused the ambition of Themistocles, and the protection which he was denied at home, he sought in courting the favours of the populace, and in sharing the administration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was entrusted to his care. When the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were opposing the Persians at Thermopylæ, the naval operations of Themistocles, and of the combined fleet of the Peloponnesians, were directed to destroy the armament of Xerxes, and to ruin his maritime power. The obstinate wish of the generals to command the Grecian fleet might have proved fatal to the interest of the allies, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and by nominating his rival Eurýbiades master of the expedition, shown the world that his ambition could stoop when his country demanded his assistance. The Persian fleet was distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a decisive battle had never been fought if Themistocles had not used threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favourable answers of the oracle, to second his measures. The Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by sea against an enemy whom they saw victorious by land, plundering their cities and destroying all by fire and sword; but before they were dispersed, Themistocles sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet, in the bay of Salamis, prevented their escape, and while he wished to crush them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, B.C. 480, was decisive: the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themistocles the honour of having destroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to ensure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch that the Greeks had conspired to cut the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. This met with equal success: Xerxes hastened away from Greece, and while he believed the words of Themistocles, that his return would be disputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the victorious Greeks. These signal services to his country endeared Themistocles to the Athenians, and he was universally called the most warlike and most courageous of all the Greeks who fought against the Persians. He was received with the most distinguished honours, and by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, her Piræus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet in the midst of that glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen, which had proved so fatal to many of his illustrious predecessors. He was banished from the city, and after he had sought in vain a safe retreat among the republics of Greece, and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himself into the arms of a monarch, whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, received the illustrious Athenian with kindness; and though he had formerly set a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greatest favourites, and bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. Such kindness from a monarch, from whom he, perhaps, expected the most hostile treatment, did not alter the sentiments of Themistocles. He still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain, and while some affirm that he poisoned himself, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent distemper in the city of Magnesia, where he had fixed his residence, while in the dominions of the Persian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. Themistocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the christian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a disposition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprise. Blessed with a provident and discerning mind, he seemed to rise superior to misfortunes, and in the midst of adversity, possessed of resources which could enable him to regain his splendour, and even to command fortune. Plut. & C. Nep. in Vita.—Paus. 1, c. 1, l. 8, c. 52.—Allian. V. H. 2, c. 12, l. 9, c. 18, l. 13, c. 40.—A writer, some of whose letters are extant.

Themistogènes, an historian of Syracuse, in the age of Artaxerxes Memnon. He wrote on the wars of Cyrus the younger, a subject ably treated afterwards by Xenophon.

Theocles, an opulent citizen of Corinth, who liberally divided his riches among the poor. Thrasonides, a man equally rich with himself, followed the example. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 24.—A Greek satirist. Paus. 6, c. 19.

Theocelus, a Messenian poet and soothsayer, who died B.C. 671. Paus. 4, c. 15, &c.

Theoclymēnus, a soothsayer of Argolis, descended from Melampus. His father's name was Thestor. He foretold the speedy return of Ulysses to Penelope and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, v. 225, &c.—Hygin. fab. 128.

Theocritus, a Greek poet who flourished at Syracuse, in Sicily, 282 B.C. His father's name was Praxagoras or Simichus, and his mother's Philina. He lived in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whose praises he sung, and whose favours he enjoyed. Theocritus distinguished himself by his poetical compositions, of which 30 idylls and some epigrams are extant, written in the Doric dialect, and admired for their beauty, elegance, and simplicity. Virgil, in his eclogues, has imitated and often copied him. Theocritus has been blamed for the many indelicate and obscene expressions which he uses; and while he introduces shepherds and peasants with all the rusticity and ignorance of nature, he often disguises their character by making them speak on high and exalted subjects. It is said he wrote some invectives against Hiero king of Syracuse, who ordered him to be strangled. He also wrote a ludicrous poem called Syrinx, and placed his verses in such order that they represented the pipe of the god Pan. The best editions of Theocritus, are Warton's, 2 vols. 4to, Oxon. 1770; that of Heinsius, 8vo, Oxon. 1699; that of Valkenær, 8vo, L. Bat. 1781; and that of Reiske, 2 vols. 4to, Lips. 1790. Quintil. 10, c. 2.—Laert. 5.—A Greek historian of Chios, who wrote an account of Libya. Plut.

Thodamas, or Thiodamas, a king of Mysia, in Asia Minor. He was killed by Hercules, because he refused to treat him and his son with hospitality. Ovid. in Æl. v. 438.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Hygin. fab. 271.

Theodectea, a Greek orator and poet of Phaselis in Pamphylia, son of Aristander, and disciple of Isocrates. He wrote 50 tragedies, besides other works now lost. He had such a happy memory that he could repeat with ease whatever verses were spoken in his presence. When Alexander passed through Phaselis, he crowned with garlands the statue which had been erected to the memory of the deceased poet. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 24, in Orat. 51, &c.—Plut.—Quintil.

Theodonia, a town of Germany, now Thionville, on the Moselle.

Theodora, a daughter-in-law of the emperor Maximian, who married Constantius.—A daughter of Constantine.—A woman who, from being a prostitute, became empress to Justinian, and distinguished herself by her intrigues and enterprises.—The name of Theodora is common to the empresses of the east in a later period.

Theodoretus, one of the Greek fathers who flourished A.D. 425, whose works have been edited, 5 vols. fol. Paris, 1642, and 5 vols. Halle, 1769 to 1774.

Theodoritus, a Greek ecclesiastical historian, whose works have been best edited by Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

Theodorus, a Syracusan of great authority among his countrymen, who severely inveighed against the tyranny of Dionysius.—A philosopher, disciple to Aristippus. He denied the existence of a God. He was banished from Cyrene, and fled to Athens, where the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus saved him from the accusations which were carried to the Areopagus against him. Some suppose that he was at last condemned to death for his impiety, and that he drank poison.—A preceptor to one of the sons of Antony, whom he betrayed to Augustus.—A consul in the reign of Honorius. Claudian wrote a poem upon him, in which he praises him with great liberality.—A secretary of Valens. He conspired against the emperor and was beheaded.—A man who compiled a history of Rome. Of this, nothing but his history of the reigns of Constantine and Constantius is extant.—A comic actor.—A player on the flute in the age of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who contemptuously rejected the favours of Lamia the mistress of the monarch.—A Greek poet of Colophon, whose compositions are lost.—A sophist of Byzantium, called Logodaitalos by Plato.—A Greek poet in the age of Cleopatra. He wrote a book of metamorphoses, which Ovid imitated, as some suppose.—An artist of Samos about 700 years B.C. He was the first who found out the art of melting iron, with which he made statues.—A priest, father of Isocrates.—A Greek writer, called also Prodrimus. The time in which he lived is unknown. There is a romance of his composition extant, called the amours of Rhodanthe and Dosicles, the only edition of which was by Gaulminius, 8vo, Paris, 1625.

Theodosiopolis, a town of Armenia, built by Theodosius, &c.

Theodosius Flavius, a Roman emperor surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits. He was invested with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eastern provinces, which had been in the possession of Valentinian. The first years of his reign were marked by different conquests over the barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 4000 of their chariots, with an immense number of prisoners of both sexes, were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome; they sued for peace, and treaties of alliance were made with distant nations, who wished to gain the favours and the friendship of a prince whose military virtues were so conspicuous. Some conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but Theodosius totally disregarded them; and while he punished his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himself sufficiently secure in the love and the affection of his subjects. His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror; he triumphed over the barbarians, and restored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropsy at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January, A.D. 395. His body was conveyed to Constantinople, and buried by his son Arcadius, in the tomb of Constantine. Theodosius was the last of the emperors who was the sole master of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius, who succeeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodosius has been commended by ancient writers, as a prince blessed with every virtue, and debased by no vicious propensity. Though master of the world, he was a stranger to that pride and arrogance which too often disgrace the monarch; he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent and compassionate, and it was his wish to treat his subjects as himself was treated when a private man and a dependant. Men of merit were promoted to places of trust and honour, and the emperor was fond of patronizing the cause of virtue and learning. His zeal as a follower of christianity has been applauded by all the ecclesiastical writers, and it was the wish of Theodosius to support the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekness, and christian charity, as by his edicts and ecclesiastical institutions. His want of clemency, however, in one instance, was too openly betrayed, and when the people of Thessalonica had unmeaningly, perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his soldiers to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and no less than 6000 persons, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the space of three hours. This violence irritated the ecclesiastics, and Theodosius was compelled by St. Ambrose to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make atonement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the bosom of the church, and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodosius was an example of soberness and temperance; his palace displayed becoming grandeur, but still with moderation. He never indulged in luxury, or countenanced superfluities. He was fond of bodily exercise, and never gave himself up to pleasure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire, were of the most salutary nature. Socrat. 5, &c.—Zozim. 4, &c.—Ambros.—Augustin.—Claudian., &c.

Theodosius II., succeeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the western Roman empire, though only in the eighth year of his age. He was governed by his sister Pulcheria, and by his ministers and eunuchs, in whose hands was the disposal of the offices of state, and all places of trust and honour. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philosopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety. The territories of Theodosius were invaded by the Persians, but the emperor soon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hostile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The consternation was universal on both sides; without even a battle, the Persians fled, and no less than 100,000 were lost in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodosius raised the siege of Nisibis, where his operations failed of success, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promises. He died on the 20th of July, in the 49th year of his age, A.D. 450, leaving only one daughter, Licinia Eudoxia, whom he married to the emperor Valentinian III. The carelessness and inattention of Theodosius to public affairs are well known. He signed all the papers that were brought to him without even opening them or reading them, till his sister apprised him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and diligent, by making him sign a paper, in which he delivered into her hand, Eudoxia his wife as a slave and menial servant. The laws and regulations which were promulgated under him, and selected from the most useful and salutary institutions of his imperial predecessors, have been called the Theodosian code. Theodosius was a warm advocate for the christian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to those who opposed the orthodox faith. Sosom.—Socrates, &c.

Belisarius.—A mathematician of Tripoli, who flourished 75 B.C. His treatise, called Sphærica, is best edited by Hunt, 8vo, Oxon. 1707.—A Roman general, father of Theodosius the Great; he died A.D. 376.

Theodōta, a beautiful courtesan of Elis, whose company was frequented by Socrates. Xenoph. de Socr.—Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 32.—A Roman empress, &c.

Theodotian, an interpreter, in the reign of Commodus.

Theodōtus, an admiral of the Rhodians, sent by his countrymen to make a treaty with the Romans.—A native of Chios, who, as preceptor and counsellor of Ptolemy, advised the feeble monarch to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Cæsar, but the resentment of the conqueror was such that the mean assassin fled, and after a wandering and miserable life in the cities of Asia, he was at last put to death by Brutus. Plat. in Brut. et Pomp.—A Syracusan, accused of a conspiracy against Hieronymus the tyrant of Syracuse.—A governor of Bactriana in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himself king, B.C. 95.—A friend of the emperor Julian.—A Phœnician historian.—One of the generals of Alexander.

Theognis, a Greek poet of Megara, who flourished about 549 years before Christ. He wrote several poems, of which only few sentences are now extant, quoted by Plato and other Greek historians and philosophers, and intended as precepts for the conduct of human life. The morals of the poet have been censured as neither decorous nor chaste. The best edition of Theognis is that of Blackwall, 1760, London, 1766.—There was also a tragic poet of the same name, whose compositions were so lifeless and inanimated, that they procured him the name of Chion, or snow.

Theomnestus, a rival of Nicias in the administration of public affairs at Athens. Strab. 14.—A statuary of Sardinia. Paus. 6, c. 15.—An Athenian philosopher, among the followers of Plato's doctrines. He had Brutus, Cæsar's murderer, among his pupils.—A painter. Plin. 35.

Theon, a philosopher, who used frequently to walk in his sleep. Diog.—An astronomer of Smyrna, in the reign of Adrian.—A painter of Samos. Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 44.—Another philosopher. Diog.—An infamous reviler. Horat. 1, ep. 19.

Theonoe, a daughter of Thestor, sister to Calchas. She was carried away by sea pirates, and sold to Icarus king of Caria, &c. Hygin. fab. 190.—A daughter of Proteus and a Nereid, who became enamoured of Canobus, the pilot of a Trojan vessel, &c.

Theope, one of the daughters of Leos.
Theophāne, a daughter of Bialtus, whom Neptune changed into a sheep, to remove her from her numerous suitors, and conveyed to the island Crumissa. The god afterwards assumed the shape of a ram, and under this transformation he had by the nymph a ram with a golden fleece, which carried Phryxus to Colchis. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 177.—Hygin. fab. 188.

Theophānes, a Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendship with the Roman general, his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharsalia, he advised Pompey to retire to the court of Egypt. Cic. pro Arch., &c.—Paterc.—Plut. in Cic. & Pomp.—His son M. Pompeius Theophanes was made governor of Asia, and enjoyed the intimacy of Tiberius.—The only edition of Theophanes the Byzantine historian, is that of Paris, fol. 1649.

Theophaonia, festivals celebrated at Delphi in honour of Apollo.

Theophilus, a comic poet of Athens.—A governor of Syria in the age of Julian.—A friend of Piso.—A physician, whose treatise de Urinis is best edited by Guidotius, L. Bat. 1728, and another by Morell, 8vo, Paris, 1556.—One of the Greek fathers, whose work ad Autolyceum is best edited in 1790, by Wolf, Hamb. 1724.—The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive christians.

Theophrastus, a native of Eresus in Lesbos, son of a fuller. He studied under Plato, and afterwards under Aristotle, whose friendship he gained, and whose warmest commendations he deserved. His original name was Tyrtamus, but this the philosopher made him exchange for that of Euphrastus, to intimate his excellence in speaking, and afterwards for that of Theophrastus, which he deemed still more expressive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. After the death of Socrates, when the malevolence of the Athenians drove all the philosopher's friends from the city, Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himself so conspicuous, that in a short time the number of his auditors was increased to 2000. Not only his countrymen courted his applause, but kings and princes were desirous of his friendship: and Casander and Ptolemy, two of the most powerful of the successors of Alexander, regarded him with more than usual partiality. Theophrastus composed many books, and Diogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatises, which he wrote with great elegance and copiousness. About 20 of these are extant, among which are his history of stones, his treatise on plants, on the winds, on the signs of fair weather, &c., and his Characters, an excellent moral treatise, which was begun in the 99th year of his age. He died, loaded with years and infirmities, in the 107th year of his age, B.C. 288, lamenting the shortness of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the stag, but not to man. To his care we are indebted for the works of Aristotle, which the dying philosopher entrusted to him. The best edition of Theophrastus, is that of Heinsius, fol. L. Bat. 1613; and of his Characters, that of Needham, 8vo, Cantab. 1722, and that of Fischer, 8vo, Coburg, 1763. Cic. Tusc. 3, c. 28, in Brut. c. 31, in Orat. 19, &c.—Strab. 13.—Diog. in Vit.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 8. l. 34, c. 20. l. 8, c. 12.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. adv. Colot.—An officer entrusted with the care of the citadel of Corinth by Antigonus. Polyan.

Theopolimus, a man who, with his brother Hiero, plundered Apollo's temple at Delphi, and fled away for fear of being punished. Cic. in Verr. 5.

Theopollis, a name given to Antioch, because the christians first received their name there.

Theopompus, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidae, who succeeded his father Nicander, and distinguished himself by the many new regulations which he introduced. He created the Ephori, and died, after a long and peaceful reign,

B.C. 723. While he sat on the throne, the Spartans made war against Messenia. Plut. in Lyc.—Paus. 3, c. 7.—A famous Greek historian of Chios, disciple of Isocrates, who flourished B.C. 354. All his compositions are lost, except a few fragments quoted by ancient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus as a historian, yet he is severely censured for his satirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his master was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for composing the best funeral oration in honour of Mausolus. His father's name was Damasistratus. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Plut. in Lyc.—C. Nep. 7.—Paus. 6, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—An Athenian, who attempted to deliver his countrymen from the tyranny of Demetrius. Polyan. 5.—A comic poet in the age of Menander. He wrote 24 plays, all lost.—A son of Demaratus, who obtained several crowns at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 10.—An orator and historian of Cnidus, very intimate with J. Caesar. Strab. 14.—A Spartan general, killed at the battle of Tegyra.—A philosopher of Cheronæa, in the reign of the emperor Philip.

Theophylactus Simocatta, a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.—One of the Greek fathers who flourished A.D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

Theorius, a surname of Apollo at Trozæne, where he had a very ancient temple. It signifies clear-sighted.

Theotimus, a wrestler of Elis, in the age of Alexander. Paus. 6, c. 17.—A Greek who wrote a history of Italy.

Theoxena, a noble lady of Thessaly, who threw herself into the sea, when unable to escape from the soldiers of king Philip, who pursued her. Liv. 40, c. 4.

Theoxenia, a festival celebrated in honour of all the gods in every city of Greece, but especially at Athens. Games were then observed, and the conqueror who obtained the prize received a large sum of money, or, according to others, a vest beautifully ornamented. The Dioscuri established a festival of the same name, in honour of the gods who had visited them at one of their entertainments.

Theoxenus, a surname of Apollo.

Thera, a daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Hygin. fab. 69.—One of the Sporades in the Ægean sea, anciently called Callista, now Santorin. It was first inhabited by the Pheonicians, who were left there under Memliabares by Cadmus, when he went in quest of his sister Europa. It was called Thera by Theras the son of Autesson, who settled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8.—A town of Caria.

Therambus, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

Theramenes, an Athenian philosopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agouo. He was one of the 30 tyrants of Athens, but he had no share in the cruelties and oppression which disgraced their administration. He was accused by Critias, one of his colleagues, because he opposed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence, and the friendly intercession of the philosopher Socrates. He drank the poison with great composure, and poured some of it on the ground, with the sarcastical exclamation of, "This is to the health of Critias." This happened about 404 years before the Christian era. Theramenes, on account of the fickleness of his disposition, has been called Coturnus, a part of the dress used both by men and women. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib., &c.—C. Nep.

Therapne, or Terapne, a town of Laconia, at the west of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phrebum. It was but a very short distance from Lacedæmon, and, indeed, some authors have confounded it with the capital of Laconia. It received its name from Therapne, a daughter of Lelex. Castor and Pollux were born there, and on that account they were sometimes called Therapnæi fratres. Paus. 3, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 223.—Sil. 6, v. 303. l. 8, v. 414. l. 13, v. 43.—Liv. 2, c. 16.—Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 49.—Stat. 7, Theb. v. 793.

Theras, a son of Autesson of Lacedæmon, who conducted a colony to Callista, to which he gave the name of Thera. He received divine honours after death. Paus. 3, c. 1 & 15.

Therimachus, a son of Hercules by Megara. Apollod. 2, c. 4 & 7.

Therippidas, a Lacedæmonian, &c. Diod. 15.

Theritas, a surname of Mars in Laconia.

Therma, a town of Africa. Strabo.—A town of Macedonia, afterwards called Thessalonica, in honour of the wife of Cassander, and now Salonichi. The bay in the neighbourhood of Therma is called Thermaus, or Thermaicus sinus, and advances far into the country, so much, that Pliny has named it Macedonicus sinus, by way of eminence, to intimate its extent. Strab.—Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 10.—Herodot.

Thermæ (baths), a town of Sicily, where were the baths of Selinus, now Sciaca.—Another, near Panormus, now Thermimi. Sil. 14, v. 23.—Cic. Ver. 2, c. 35.

Thermodon, now Termek, a famous river of Cappadocia, in the ancient country of the Amazons, falling into the Euxine sea near Thermiscyra. There was also a small river of the same name in Bœotia, near Tanagra, which was afterwards called Hermion. Strab. 11.—Herodot. 9, c. 27.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—Paus. 1, c. 1. l. 9, c. 19.—Plut. in Dem.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 659.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 249, &c.

Thermopylæ, a small pass leading from Thessaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the west, and the sea on the east, with deep and dangerous marshes, being in the narrowest part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there B.C. 480, on the 7th of August, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans resisted for three successive days repeatedly the attacks of the most brave and courageous of the Persian army, which, according to some historians, amounted to 5,000,000. There was also another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Cat., &c.—Paus. 7, c. 15.

Therumum, a town of Ætolia on the Evenus. Polyb. 5.

Thermsus, a man accused in the reign of Tiberius, &c.—A man put to death by Nero.—A town of Ætolia, the capital of the country.

Therodamas, a king of Scythia, who, as some report, fed lions with human blood, that they might be more cruel. Ovid. Ib. 383.

Theron, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who died 472 B.C. He was a native of Bœotia, and son of Ænesidamus, and he married Damarete the daughter of Geion of Sicily. Herodot. 7.—Pind. Olymp. 2.—One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid.—A Rutulian who attempted to kill Æneas. He perished in the attempt. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 372.—A priest in the temple of Hercules at Saguntum, &c. Sil. 2, v. 149.—A Theban descended from the Spartæ. Stat. Theb. 3, v. 572.—A daughter of Phylas, beloved by Apollo. Paus. 9, c. 40.

Therpander, a celebrated poet and musician of Lesbos. Vid. Terpander.

Thersander, a son of Polynices and Argia. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, but he was killed in Mysia by Telephus, before the confederate army reached the enemy's country. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—A son of Sisyphus king of Corinth.—A musician of Ionia.

Thersilobus, a leader of the Pæonians in the Trojan war, killed by Achilles. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—A friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Id. 12, v. 353.—An athlete at Corcyra, crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 13.

Thersippus, a son of Agrius, who drove Æneus from the throne of Caiyon.—A man who carried a letter from Alexander to Darius. Curt.—An Athenian author, who died 954 B.C.

Thersites, an officer, the most deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow-soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fist, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 17, v. 15.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 212, &c.

Thesides, a paronymic given to the Athenians from Theseus, one of their kings. Virg. G. 2, v. 383.

Thesela, a poem written by Codrus, containing an account of the life and actions of Theseus, and now lost. Juv. 1, v. 2.

Theseus, a king of Athens, and son of Ægeus by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Træzene in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given him, by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. Vid. Ægeus. His journey to Athens was not across the sea, as it was usual with travellers, but Theseus determined to signalize himself in going by land, and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Træzene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and almost impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. He destroyed Corynetes, Synnisis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæax. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground, if Theseus was received in his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra.

He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Palantides, who expected to succeed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to assassinate Theseus; but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. The labour seemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the streets of Athens, he sacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this Theseus went to Crete among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute, engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was successful by means of Ariadne the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread, and killed the Minotaur [Vid. Minotaurus], he sailed from Crete with the six boys and seven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. Vid. Ægeus. His ascension on his father's throne was universally applauded, B.C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies, to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia and her female attendants, against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. Their first attempt was upon Hele the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch entrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years, but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Hele, before she reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theseus, but this tradition, confirmed by some ancient mythologists, is confuted by others, who affirm that she was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto radii passa timore nihil. Some time after Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine. Pluto, apprised of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone on which he had sat to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment repeating to the shades in Tartarus the words of Disce justitiam moniti, et non temere divos. Apollodorus, however, and others declare that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence, that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnestheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himself into the favours of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycopomides king of the island of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycopomides, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the presence of Mnestheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycopomides. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnestheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised him statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated with original solemnity in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch, about 1200 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose that, instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wished to seduce a daughter of Aidoneus king of the Molossi. This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus, and hence, perhaps, arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape some time after by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. *Plut. in Vita. Thesidæ, a name given to the people of Athens, because they were governed by Theseus.

Thesmophōra, a surname of Ceres, as law-giver, in whose honour festivals were instituted called Thesmophoria. The Thesmophoria were instituted by Triptolemus, or, according to some, by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greatest part of the Grecian cities, especially Athens, observed them with great solemnity. The worshippers were free-born women, whose husbands were obliged to defray the expenses of the festival. They were assisted by a priest called ερεφανοποιος, because he carried a crown on his head. There were also certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expense. The freeborn women were dressed in white robes, to intimate their spotless innocence; they were charged to observe the strictest chastity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the solemnity; and on that account it was usual for them to strew their bed with agnus castus, leabane, and all such herbs as were supposed to have the power of expelling all venereal propensities. They were also charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be observed with the greatest signs of seriousness and gravity, without any display of wantonness or levity. It was, however, usual to jest at one another, as the goddess Ceres had been made to smile by a merry expression when she was sad and melancholy for the recent loss of her daughter Proserpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepsion, the women went to Eleusis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddess had invented were contained. On the 14th of the same month the festival began, on the 16th day a fast was observed, and the women sat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was usual during the festival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom some suppose to be the nurse or favourite maid of the goddess of corn, or perhaps one of her surnames. There were some sacrifices of a mysterious nature, and all persons whose offence was small were released from confinement. Such as were initiated at the festivals of Eleusis assisted at the Thesmophoria. The place of high priest was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. *Ovid. Thesmothetes, a name given to the last six Archons among the Athenians, because they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to see justice impartially administered. They were at that time nine in number.

Thespis, now Neocorio, a town of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon, which received its name from Thespis the daughter of Asopus, or from Thespius. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Paus. 9, c. 26.—Strab. 9.

Thespiades, the sons of Thespiades. Vid. Thespius.

Thespiades, a name given to the 50 daughters of Thespius. Vid. Thespius. Diod. 4.—Seneca, in Herc. Frl. 369.—Also a surname of the nine muses, because they were held in great veneration in Thespis. Flacc. 3, v. 368.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 310.

Thespis, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. Horat. Art. P. 276.—Dio.

Thespius, a king of Thespis, in Bœotia, son of Erechtheus, according to some authors. He was desirous that his 50 daughters should have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This, which, according to some, was effected in one night, passes for the 13th and most arduous of the labours of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcantissima indicate:

*Tertius hinc decimus labor est durissimus, unâ
Quinquaginta simul stupravit nocte puellas.*

All the daughters of Thespius brought male children into the world, and some of them twins, particularly Procris the eldest, and the youngest. Some suppose that one of the Thespiades refused to admit Hercules to her arms, for which the hero condemned her to pass all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the priestess of a temple he had at Thespis. The children of the Thespiades, called Thespiades, went to Sardinia, where they made a settlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Thespius is often confounded by ancient authors with Thespius, though the latter lived in a different place, and, as king of Pleuron, sent his sons to the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 9, c. 26 & 27.—Plut.

Thesprotia, a country of Epirus, at the west of Ambracia, bounded on the south by the sea. It is watered by the rivers Acheron and Cocytus, which the poets, after Homer, have called the streams of hell. The oracle of Dodona was in Thesprotia. Homer. Od. 14, v. 315.—Strab. 7, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—Lucan. 3, v. 179.

Thesprotus, a son of Lycaon king of Arcadia. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

Thessalia, a country of Greece, whose boundaries have been different at different periods. Properly speaking, Thessaly was bounded on the south by the northern parts of Greece, or Græcia propria; east, by the Ægean; north, by Macedonia and Mygdonia; and west, by Illyricum and Epirus. It was generally divided into four separate provinces, Thessaliotis, Pelagiottis, Istriotis, and Phthiotis, to which some add Magnesia. It has been severally called Æmonia, Pelagisicum, Argos, Hellas, Argeia, Dryopis, Pelagis, Pyrrhæa, Æmathia, &c. The name of Thessaly is derived from Thessalus, one of its monarchs. Thessaly is famous for a deluge which happened there in the age of Deucalion. Its mountains and cities are also celebrated, such as Olympus, Pelion, Ossa, Larissa, &c. The Argonauts were partly natives of Thessaly. The inhabitants of the country passed for a treacherous nation, so that false money was called Thessalian coin, and a perfidious action, Thessalian deceit. Thessaly was governed by kings, till it became subject to the Macedonian monarchs. The cavalry was universally esteemed, and the people were superstitious, and addicted to the study of magic and incantations. Thessaly is now called Janna. Lucan. 6, v. 438, &c.—Dionys.

Thessillon, a servant of Mentor of Sidon, in the age of Artaxerxes Ochus, &c. Diad. 16.

Thessalotis, a part of Thessaly at the south of the river Peneus.

Thessalonica, an ancient town of Macedonia, first called Therma, and Thessalonica, after Thessalonica the wife of Cassander. According to ancient writers it was once very powerful, and it still continues to be a place of note. Strab. 7.—Dionys.—Cic. in Pis. c. 17.—Liv. 29, c. 17. l. 40, c. 4. l. 44, c. 10 & 45.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—A daughter of Philip king of Macedonia, sister to Alexander the Great. She married Cassander, by whom she had a son called Antipater, who put her to death. Paus. 8, c. 7.

Thessalus, a son of Æmon.—A son of Hercules and Calliope daughter of Eurypylus. Thessaly received its name from one of these. Apollod. 2.—Dicys Crat. 2.—A physician who invited Alexander to a feast at Babylon to give him poison.—A physician of Lydia in the age of Nero. He gained the favours of the great and opulent at Rome, by the meanness and servility of his behaviour. He treated all physicians with contempt, and thought himself superior to all his predecessors.—A son of Cimon, who accused Alcibiades because he imitated the mysteries of Ceres.—A son of Piscirarus.—A player in the age of Alexander.

Thestains, a son of Hercules and Epicaste. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Theste, a sister of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. She married Philoxenus, and was greatly esteemed by the Sicilians.

Thestia, a town of Ætolia, between the Evenus and Achelous. Polyb. 5.

Thestiades and Thestiades. Virg. Thespiade and Thespiades.

Thestiades, the sons of Thestius, Toxeus, and Plexippus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 286.

Thestias, a patronymic of Althæa, daughter of Thestius. Ovid. Met. 8.

Thestia, a fountain in the country of Cyrene.

Thestius, a king of Pleuron, and son of Parthaon, was father to Toxeus, Plexippus, and Althæa.—A king of Thespiæ. Virg. Thespius. The sons of Thestius, called Thestiades, were killed by Meleager at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Thestor, a son of Idmon and Laothot, father to Calchas. From him Calchas is often called Thestorides. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 29.—Stat. 1, Ach. v. 497.—Apollon. 1, v. 239.—Homer. II. 1, v. 60.

Thestyliæ, a country-woman mentioned in Theocritus and Virgil.

Thetis, one of the sea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Thetys her grandmother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the son she would bring forth must become greater than his father, their addresses were stopped, and Peleus the son of Æacus was permitted to solicit her hand. Thetis refused him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when asleep, and, by binding her strongly, he prevented her from escaping from his grasp, in assuming different forms. When Thetis found that she could not elude the vigilance of her lover she consented to marry him, though much against her inclination. Their nuptials were celebrated on mount Pelion with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddess of discord, who punished the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midst of the assembly a golden apple, to be given to the fairest of all the goddesses. Virg. Discordia. Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus, but all these she destroyed by fire in attempting to see whether they were immortal. Achilles must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand as she was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her son, she attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was useless. He went with the rest of the Greeks. The mother, still anxious for his preservation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a suit of armour; but when it was done, she refused the god the favours which she had promised him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis issued out of the sea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after she had collected his ashes in a golden urn, she raised a monument to his memory, and instituted festivals in his honour. *Hesiod. Thoutis, or Teuthis, a prince of a town of the same name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva, under the form of Melas son of Ops, attempted to pacify him, he struck the goddess and returned home. Some say that the goddess afterwards appeared to him and showed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died soon after. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Thia, the mother of the sun, moon, and Aurora by Hyperion. Virg. Thea. Hesiod. Theog. v. 371.

—One of the Sporades, that rose out of the sea in the age of Pliny. Plin. 27, c. 72.

Thias, a king of Assyria.

Thimbron, a Lacedæmonian, chosen general to conduct a war against Persia. He was recalled, and afterwards reappointed. He died B.C. 391. Diad. 17.—A friend of Harpalus.

Thiodamas, the father of Hylas. Virg. Theodamus.

Thirmidia, a town of Numidia, where Hiempsal was slain. Sat. Jug. 2.

Thisbe, a beautiful woman of Babylon. Virg. Pyramus.—A town of Bœotia, between two mountains. Paus. 9, c. 32.

Thissæ, a Sicilian river.

Thiosæ, one of the three nymphs who fed Jupiter in Arcadia. She built a town which bore her name in Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Thistie, a town of Bœotia. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Thoantium, a place on the sea coast at Rhodes.

Thoas, a king of Taurica Chersonesus, in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. Virg. Iphigenia. According to some, Thoas was the son of Borysthenes. Ovid. Pont. 3, el. 2.—A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne the daughter of Minos, and husband to Myrione. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhada-manthus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hippisyle, in whose favour he had resigned the crown. Hippisyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island, which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thos was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thos was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, v. 208.—Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in l. 384. Herod. 6, v. 114.—Stat. Theb. 6, v. 342.—A son of Ornytion, grandson of Sisypheus.—A king of Assyria, father of Adonis and Myrrha, according to Apollod. 3, c. 14.—A man who made himself master of Miletus.—An officer of Ætolia, who strongly opposed the views of the Romans, and favoured the interest of Antiochus, B.C. 193.—One of the friends of Æneas in Italy, killed by Halesus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 415.

Tholus, a town of Africa.

Thomyris, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris, and Tomeris, was queen of the Massagetae. After her husband's death, she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invade her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of the fallen monarch to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, with the insulting words of satis te sanguine quem sisti. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herodot. 1, c. 205.—Justin. 1, c. 8.—Vibull. 4, el. 1, v. 143.

Thon, an Egyptian physician, &c.

Thonis, a courtesan of Egypt.

Thoon, a Trojan chief killed by Ulysses. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 259.—One of the giants who made war against Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 6.

Thoosa, a sea nymph, daughter of Phorcys, and mother of Polyphemus by Neptune. Hesiod. Theog. v. 236.—Homer. od. 1, v. 71.

Thootes, one of the Grecian heralds.

Thoranis, a general of Metellus, killed by Sertorius. Plut.

Thorax, a mountain near Magnesia in Ionia, where the grammarian Daphitas was suspended on a cross for his abusive language against kings and absolute princes, whence the proverb case a Thorace. Strab. 14.—A Lacedæmonian officer who served under Lysander, and was put to death by the Ephori. Plut. in Lys.—A man of Larissa, who paid much attention to the dead body of Antigonus, &c. Plut. in Lys., &c.

Thoria lex agraria, by Sp. Thorius the tribune. It ordained that no person should pay any rent for the land which he possessed. It also made some regulations about grazing and pastures. Cic. in Brut.

Thornax, a mountain of Argolis. It received its name from Thornax, a nymph who became mother of Huphagus by Japetus. The mountain was afterwards called Coccyria, because Jupiter changed himself there into a cuckoo. Paus. 8, c. 27.

Thorsus, a river of Sardinia. Paus. 10, c. 17.

Thoth, an Egyptian deity, the same as Mercury.

Thous, a Trojan chief, &c.—One of Actæon's dogs.

Thrace, a daughter of Titan.—A name of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

Thracæes, the inhabitants of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

Thracia, a large country of Europe, at the south of Scythia, bounded by mount Hæmus. It had the Ægean sea on the south, on the west Macedonia and the river Strymon, and on the east the Euxine sea, the Propontis, and the Hellespont. Its northern boundaries extended as far as the Ister, according to Ptolemy and others. The Thracians were looked upon as a cruel and barbarous nation; they were naturally brave and warlike, addicted to drinking and venereal pleasures, and they sacrificed without the smallest humanity their enemies on the altars of their gods. Their government was originally monarchical, and divided among a number of independent princes. Thrace is barren as to its soil. It received its name from Thrac the son of Mars, the chief deity of the country. The first inhabitants lived upon plunder, and on the milk and flesh of sheep. It forms now the province of Romania. Herodot. 4, c. 99, l. 5, c. 3.—Strab. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 9, c. 29, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 92, l. 13, v. 565, &c.—*C. Thracides, an illustrious family at Delphi, destroyed by Philomelus because they opposed his views. Diod. 16.

Thracis, a town of Phocis. Paus. 10, c. 3.

Thræseas, or Thrasius, a sooth-sayer. Vid. Thrasius.—Pætus, a stoic philosopher of Patavium, in the age of Nero, famous for his independence and generous sentiments. He died A.D. 66. Juv. 5, v. 36.—Mart. 1, ep. 19.—Facit. A. 15, c. 16.

Thrasidæus, succeeded his father Theron as tyrant of Agrigentum. He was conquered by Hiero, and soon after put to death. Diod. 11.

Thrasimæus. Vid. Thrasymeneus.

Thrasius, a general of a mercenary band in Sicily, who raised a sedition against Timoleon. Diod. 16.—A spendthrift at Rome, &c. Horat. 2, sat. 2, v. 99.

Thraso, a painter. Strab. 14.—A favourite of Hieronymus, who espoused the interest of the Romans. He was put to death by the tyrant.—The character of a captain in Terence.

Thrasylulus, a famous general of Athens, who began the expulsion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only assisted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with success, B.C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive branch; a proof of his own disinterestedness and of the virtues of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whose abilities and humanity were so conspicuous, and Thrasylulus was sent with a powerful fleet to recover their lost power in the Ægean, and on the coast of Asia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aspendus, whom his soldiers had plundered without his knowledge. B.C. 391. Diod. 14.—C. Nep. in Vita.—Cic.—Phil.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—A tyrant of Miletus, B.C. 634. —A soothsayer descended from Apollo. Paus. 6, c. 2. —A son of Gelon, banished from Syracuse, of which he was the tyrant, B.C. 466. —An Athenian in the army of the Persians, who supported the siege of Halicarnassus.

Thrasylus, a king of Thessaly, &c.

Thrasylus, a man of Attica, so disordered in his mind that he believed all the ships which entered the Piræus to be his own. He was cured by means of his brother, whom he liberally reproached for depriving him of that happy illusion of mind. Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 25. —A general of the Athenians in the age of Alcibiades, with whom he obtained a victory over the Persians. Thucyd. 8. —A Greek Pythagorean philosopher and mathematician, who enjoyed the favours and the friendship of Augustus and Tiberius. Suet. in Tib.

Thrasymachus, a native of Carthage, who became the pupil of Isocrates and of Plato. Though he was a public teacher at Athens, he starved for want of bread, and at last hanged himself. Juv. 7, v. 204. —A man who abolished democracy at Cumæ. Arist. Pol. 5, c. 5.

Thrasymedes, a son of Nestor king of Pylos, by Anaxibia the daughter of Bias. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Hægin. Fab. 27.—Paus. 2, c. 26. —A son of Philomelus, who carried away a daughter of Pisistratus, whom he married. Polyan. 5.

Thrasymenus, a lake of Italy near Perusium, celebrated for a battle fought there between Annibal and the Romans, under Flaminius, B.C. 217. No less than 15,000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle, and 10,000 taken prisoners, or, according to Livy, 6000, or Polybius, 15,000. The loss of Annibal was about 1500 men. About 10,000 Romans made their escape, all covered with wounds. This lake is now called the lake of Perugia. Strab. 5.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 765.—Plut.

Threicius, of Thrace. Orpheus is called, by way of eminence, Threicius Sacerdos. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 645.

Threissa, an epithet applied to Harpalycæ, a native of Thrace. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 310.

Threpsippas, a son of Hercules and Panope. Apollod.

Thriambus, one of the surnames of Bacchus.

Thronium, a town of Phocis, where the Boægus falls into the sea, in the Sinus Malicus. Liv. 26, c. 20.—Strab. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 7. —Another of Thesprotia.

Thryus, a town of Peloponnesus, near Elis.

Thucydides, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Athens. His father's name was Olorus, and among his ancestors he reckoned the great Miltiades. His youth was distinguished by an eager desire to excel in the vigorous exercises and gymnastic amusements which called the attention of his contemporaries, and when he had reached the years of manhood, he appeared in the Athenian armies. During the Peloponnesian war he was commissioned by his countrymen to relieve Amphipolis; but the quick march of Brasidas the Lacedæmonian general defeated his operations, and Thucydides, unsuccessful in his expedition, was banished from Athens. This happened in the eighth year of this celebrated war, and in the place of his banishment the general began to write an impartial history of the important events which had happened during his administration, and which still continued to agitate the several states of Greece. This famous history is continued only to the 21st year of the war, and the remaining part of the time, till the demolition of the walls of Athens, was described by the pen of Theopompus and Xenophon. Thucydides wrote in the Attic dialect, as possessed of more vigour, purity, elegance, and energy. He spared neither time nor money to procure authentic materials; and the Athenians, as well as their enemies, furnished him with many valuable communications, which contributed to throw great light on the different transactions of the war. His history has been divided into eight books, the last of which is imperfect, and supposed to have been written by his daughter. The character of this interesting history is well known, and the noble emulation of the writer will ever be admired, who shed tears when he heard Hercules repeat his history of the Persian wars at the public festivals of Greece. The historian of Halicarnassus has been compared with the son of Olorus, but each has his peculiar excellence. Sweetness of style, grace, and elegance of expression, may be called the characteristics of the former, while Thucydides stands unequalled for the fire of his descriptions, the conciseness, and, at the same time, the strong and energetic matter of his narratives. His relations are authentic, as he himself was interested in the events he mentions; his impartiality is indubitable, as he nowhere betrays the least resentment against his countrymen, and the factious partisans of Cleon, who had banished him from Athens. Many have blamed the historian for the injudicious distribution of his subjects; and while, for the sake of accuracy, the whole is divided into summers and winters, the thread of history is interrupted, the scene continually shifted; and the reader, unable to pursue events to the end, is transported from Persia to Peloponnesus, or from the walls of Syracuse to the coast of Corcyra. The animated harangues of Thucydides have been universally admired; he found a model in Herodotus, but he greatly surpassed the original; and succeeding historians have adopted, with success, a peculiar mode of writing which introduces a general addressing himself to the passions and the feelings of his armies. The history of Thucydides was so admired, that Demosthenes, to perfect himself as an orator, transcribed it eight different times, and read it with such attention, that he could almost repeat it by heart. Thucydides died at Athens, where he had been recalled from his exile, in his 80th year, 397 years before Christ. The best editions of Thucydides are those of Duker, fol. Amst. 1731; of Glaycock, 12mo, 8 vols. 1759; of Hudson, fol. Oxon. 1796, and the 8vo of Bipont. 1788. Cic. de Orat. &c.—Diod. 12.—Dionys. Hal. de Thuc.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Quintil. —A son of Milesias, in the age of Pericles. He was banished for his opposition to the measures of Pericles, &c.

Thule, an island in the most northern parts of the German ocean, to which, on account of its great distance from the continent, the ancients gave the epithet of ultima. Its situation was never accurately ascertained, hence its present name is unknown by modern historians. Some suppose that it is the island now called Iceland or part of Greenland, whilst others imagine it to be the Shetland isles. *Stat. 3, Syl. 5, v. 20.—Strab. 1.—Mela, 3, c. 6.—Tacit. Thusia, a country of Italy, the same as Etruria. Vid. Etruria.

Thya, a daughter of the Cephissus.—A place near Delphi.

Thyades (sing. Thyas), a name of the Bacchantes. They received it from Thyas daughter of Castalius, and mother of Delphus by Apollo. She was the first woman who was priestess of the god Bacchus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 302.—Paus. 10, c. 4.

Thyamis, a river of Epirus falling into the Ionian sea. Paus. 1, c. 11.—Cic. 7, Att. 2.

Thyana, a town of Cappadocia. Strab.

Thyatira, a town of Lydia, now Akisar. Liv. 37, c. 8 & 44.

Thybarni, a people near Sardes. Diod. 17.

Thyesta, a sister of Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse.

Thyestes, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and grandson of Tantalus, debauched Ærope the wife of his brother Atreus, because he refused to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no sooner known, than Atreus divorced Ærope, and banished Thyestes from his kingdom; but soon after, the more effectually to punish his infidelity, he expressed a wish to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyestes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was soon informed that he had been feeding upon the flesh of one of his own children. This Atreus took care to communicate to him by showing him the remains of his son's body. This action appeared so barbarous, that, according to the ancient mythologists, the sun changed his usual course, not to be a spectator of so bloody a scene. Thyestes escaped from his brother, and fled to Epirus. Some time after he met his daughter Pelopeia in a grove sacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who she was. This incest, however, according to some, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle, that the injuries he had received from Atreus would be avenged by a son born from himself and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was seen by her uncle Atreus and married, and some time after she brought into the world a son, whom she exposed in the woods. The life of the child was preserved by goats; he was called Ægysthus, and presented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atreus. When grown to years of maturity, the mother gave her son Ægysthus a sword, which she had taken from her unknown ravisher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of discovering who he was. Meantime Atreus, intent to punish his brother, sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to pursue him, and when at last they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a close prison. Ægysthus was sent to murder Thyestes, but the father recollected the sword, which was raised to stab him, and a few questions convinced him that his assassin was his own son. Pelopeia was present at this discovery, and when she found that she had committed incest with her father, she asked Ægysthus to examine the sword, and immediately plunged it into her own breast. Ægysthus rushed from the prison to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wished to offer thanks to the gods on the supposed death of Thyestes. At the death of Atreus, Thyestes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægysthus, from which he was soon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was banished into the island of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Sophocl. in Ajax.—Hygin. fab. 86, &c.—Ovid. in 1b. 359.—Lucan. 1, v. 544. l. 7, v. 452.—Senec. in Thyest.

Thymbra, a small town of Lydia near Sardes, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between Cyrus and Croesus, in which the latter was defeated. The troops of Cyrus amounted to 196,000 men, besides chariots, and those of Croesus were twice as numerous.—A plain in Troas, through which a small river, called Thymbrus, falls in its course to the Scamander. Apollo had there a temple, and from thence he is called Thymbræus. Achilles was killed there by Paris, according to some. Strab. 13.—Stat. 4.—Syl. 7, v. 22.—Dionys. Crete. 2, c. 52. l. 2, c. 1.

Thymbræus, a surname of Apollo. Virg. G. 4, v. 323. Æn. 3, v. 85. Vid. Thymra.

Thymbris, a concubine of Jupiter, said to be mother of Pan. Apollod.—A fountain and river of Sicily. Theoc. 1, v. 100.

Thymochæres, an Athenian defeated in a battle by the Lacedæmonians.

Thymotes, a king of Athens, son of Oinithas, the last of the descendants of Theseus, who reigned at Athens. He was deposed because he refused to accept a challenge sent by Xanthus king of Bœotia, and was succeeded by a Messenian, B.C. 1128, who repaired the honour of Athens by fighting the Bœotian king. Paus. 2, c. 18.—A Trojan prince, whose wife and son were put to death by order of Priam. It was to revenge the king's cruelty that he persuaded his countrymen to bring the wooden horse within their city. He was son of Laomedon, according to some. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 32.—Dionys. Crete. 4, c. 4.—A son of Hicetaon, who accompanied Æneas into Italy, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 123. l. 12, v. 364.

Thyni, or Bythyni, a people of Bithynia, hence the word Thynæ mæxæ applied to their commodities. Horat. 3, od. 7, v. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

Thyodamas. Vid. Theodamus.

Thyone, a name given to Semele after she had been presented with immortality by her son Bacchus. Apollod. 3, c. 5.

Thyoneus, a surname of Bacchus from his mother Semele, who was called Thyone. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 23.—Ovid. 4, Met. v. 13.

Thyotes, a priest of the Cabiri, in Samothrace. Flacc. 2, v. 438.

Thyre, a town of the Messenians, famous for a battle fought there between the Argives and the Lacedæmonians. Herodot. 1, c. 82.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 48.

Thyrea, an island on the coast of Peloponnesus, near Hermione. Herodot. 6, c. 76.

Thyreum, a town of Acarnania, whose inhabitants are called Thyrienses. Liv. 36, c. 11. l. 38, c. 9.

Thyreus, a son of Lycaon king of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 3.—A son of Cneus king of Calydon. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Thyrides, three small islands at the point of Tannarus. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Thyrsgætes, a people of Sarmatia, who live upon hunting. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Thyrus, a river of Sardinia, now Oristagni.

Thyros, a town near mount Athos.

Thyus, a satrap of Paphlagonia, who revolted from Artaxerxes, and was seized by Datames. C. Nep. in Dat.

Tiassa, a daughter of the Eurotas, who gave her name to a river in Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 18.

Tibaræni, a people of Cappadocia, on the borders of the Thermodon.—A people of Pontus. Mela. 2, c. 20.

Tiberias, a town of Galilee, built by Herod, near a lake of the same name, and called after Tiberius. Plin. 5, c. 16.—Joseph. 4, c. 3.

Tiberinus, son of Capetus, and king of Alba, was drowned in the river Albulæ, which on that account assumed the name of Tiberis, of which he became the protecting god. Liv. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 20.—Varro, de L. L. 4, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 380. l. 4, v. 47.

Tibiris, Tyberis, Tiber, or Tibris, a river of Italy on whose banks the city of Rome was built. It was originally called Albulæ, from the whiteness of its waters, and afterwards Tiberis, when Tiberinus king of Alba had been drowned there. It was also named Tyrrenus, because it watered Etruria, and Lydius, because the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were supposed to be of Lydian origin. The Tiber rises in the Apennines, and falls into the Tyrrhene sea, 16 miles below Rome, after dividing Latium from Etruria. *Ovid. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero, a Roman emperor after the death of Augustus, was descended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators, and he gained some applause in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His first appearance in the Roman armies was under Augustus, in the war against the Cantabri; and afterwards, in the capacity of general, he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midst of his glory, Tiberius fell under the displeasure of Augustus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for seven years as an exile, till, by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor, he was recalled. His return to Rome was the more glorious; he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus. At the death of this celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, assumed the reins of government; and while with dissimulation and affected modesty he wished to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greatest part of the Romans believe that he was invested with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Augustus, and the urgent entreaties of the Roman senate. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the world. Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace; he was the friend of justice, and never assumed the sounding titles which most disgust a free nation, but he was satisfied to say of himself that he was the master of his slaves, the general of his soldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That seeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepest policy, soon disappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whose intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people, and suspected even by his most intimate favourites. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were silenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to their condign punishment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his successors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very existence in perpetual danger. He continued as he had begun, to pay the greatest deference to the senate; all libels against him he disregarded, and he observed that, in a free city, the thoughts and the tongue of every man should be free. The taxes were gradually lessened, and luxury restrained by the salutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a scene of peace and public tranquillity, the barbarians were severally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honours, by the activity and valour of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealousy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison, and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent, were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was scarce in Rome one single family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at last retired to the island of Capræ, on the coast of Campania, where he buried himself in unlawful pleasures. The care of the empire was entrusted to favourites, among whom Sejanus for a while shone with uncommon splendour. In this solitary retreat the emperor proposed rewards to such as invented new pleasures, or could produce fresh luxuries. He forgot his age, as well as his dignity, and disgraced himself by the most unnatural vices and enormous indulgencies, which can draw a blush even upon the countenance of the most debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was lost to himself and the world, the provinces were harassed on every side by the barbarians, and Tiberius found himself insulted by those enemies whom hitherto he had seen fall prostrate at his feet with every mark of submissive adulation. At last, grown weak and helpless through infirmities, he thought of his approaching dissolution; and as he well knew that Rome could not exist without a head, he nominated, as his successor, Caius Caligula. Many might inquire, why a youth naturally so vicious and abandoned as Caius was chosen to be the master of an extensive empire; but Tiberius wished his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be displayed in the reign of his successor, whose natural propensities he had well defined, in saying of Caligula that he bred a serpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the rest of the empire. Tiberius died at Misenum the 16th of March, A. D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, six months, and 26 days. Caligula was accused of having hastened his end by suffocating him. The joy was universal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midst of sorrow, had a moment to rejoice, heedless of the calamities which awaited them in the succeeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great solemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who seemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praises of Augustus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was universally esteemed; when he had no superior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue; but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favourite, he was tyrannical and dissolute. If, as some observe, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conspicuous as his great ancestors; but the sovereign power lodged in his hands, rendered him vicious and oppressive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favoured flattery, he blushed at the mean servilities of the senate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he said, as if they approached a savage elephant. He was a patron of learning; he was an eloquent and ready speaker, and dedicated some part of his time to study. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, "A Complaint on the death of Lucius Caesar," as also some Greek pieces in imitation of some of his favourite authors. He avoided all improper expressions, and all foreign words he totally wished to banish from the Latin tongue. As instances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Asia Minor, whose cities had been destroyed by a violent earthquake, A. D. 17. One of his officers wished him to increase the taxes. "No," said Tiberius; "a good shepherd must shear, not flay, his sheep." The senators wished to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of J. Caesar and Augustus, in the months of July and August; but this he refused, saying, "What will you do, conscript fathers, if you have thirteen Caesars?" Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily observed by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual state of intoxication from the time he gave himself to drinking till the last moment of his life. Sueton. in Vita, &c.—Tacit. Ann. 6, &c.—Dion. Cass.—A friend of Julius Caesar, whom he accompanied in the war of Alexandria. Tiberius forgot the favours he had received from his friend; and when he was assassinated, he wished all his murderers to be publicly rewarded.—One of the Gracchi. Vid. Gracchus.

 —Sempronius, a son of Drusus and Livia the sister of Germanicus, put to death by Caligula.
 —A son of Brutus, put to death by his father, because he had conspired with other young noblemen to restore Tarquin to his throne.—A Thracian made emperor of Rome in the latter ages of the empire.

Tibōsis, a river of Scythia, flowing from mount Hæmus into the Ister. Herodot. 4, c. 49.

Tiblocus, now Teisse, a river of Dacia, with a town of the same name, now Temestwar. It falls into the Danube.

Tibris. Vid. Tiberis.

Tibullius Aulus Albius, a Roman knight celebrated for his poetical compositions. He followed Messala Corvinus into the island of Corcyra, but he was soon dissatisfied with the toils of war, and retired to Rome, where he gave himself up to literary ease, and to all the effeminate indolence of an Italian climate. His first composition was to celebrate the virtues of his friend Messala; but his more favourite study was writing love verses, in praise of his mistresses Delia and Plautia, of Nemesius and Neæra, and in these elegant effusions he showed himself the most correct of the Roman poets. As he had espoused the cause of Brutus, he lost his possessions when the soldiers of the triumvirate were rewarded with lands; but he might have recovered them if he had descended, like Virgil, to make his court to Augustus. Four books of elegies are the only remaining pieces of his composition. They are uncommonly elegant and beautiful, and possessed with so much grace and purity of sentiment, that the writer is deservedly ranked as the prince of elegiac poets. Tibullus was intimate with the literary men of his age, and for some time he had a poetical contest with Horace, in gaining the favours of an admired courtesan. Ovid has written a beautiful elegy on the death of his friend. The poems of Tibullus are generally published with those of Propertius and Catullus, of which the best editions are that of Vulpis, Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755; that of Barbou, 12mo, Paris, 1755; and that by Heyne, 8vo, Lips. 1776. Ovid. 3, Am. el. 9. Triat. 2, v. 487.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, l. 1, od. 33, v. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Tibur, an ancient town of the Sabines, about 20 miles north of Rome, built, as some say, by Tiburtus the son of Amphiaraus. It was watered by the Anio, and Hercules was the chief deity of the place, from which circumstance it has been called Herules muni. In the neighbourhood, the Romans, on account of the salubrity of the air, had their several villas where they retired; and there also Horace had his favourite country seat, though some place it nine miles higher. Strab. 5.—Cic. 9, Orat. 65.—Suet. Cal. 21.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 632.—Horat. 3, od. 4, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 61, &c.

L. Tiburtius, a centurion in Caesar's army, wounded by Pompey's soldiers.

Tiburtus, the founder of Tibur, often called Tiburtia manna. He was one of the sons of Amphiaraus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 670.

Tichia, now Tech, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean.

Tichius, a name given to the top of mount Ceta. Liv. 36, c. 16.

Ticida, a Roman poet a few years before the age of Cicero, who wrote epigrams, and praised his mistress Metella under the fictitious name of Petilla. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 437.

Ticinus, now Tezino, a river near Ticinum, a small town of Italy, where the Romans were defeated by Annibal. The town of Ticinum was also called Pavia. The Ticinus falls into the Po. Strab. 5.—Stat. 4, v. 81.

Tidius, a man who joined Pompey, &c.

Tiessa, a river of Laconia, falling into the Eurotas. Paus. 3, c. 18.

Tifata, a mountain of Campania, near Capua. Stat. Sylv. 4.

Tifernum, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them, for distinction's sake, is called Metaurense, near the Metaurus, in Umbria; the other, Tiberinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Sauniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.—Plin. 3, c. 14.—Plin. sec. 4, cp. 1.

Tiferus, a mountain and river in the country of the Samnites. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 10, c. 30.—Meta. 3, c. 4.

Tignis, a son of Hercules.

Tigellinus, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conspirators who had leagued against Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honours. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to destroy himself, 68 A.D. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 72.—Plut.—Juv. 1.

Tigellius, a native of Sardinia, who became the favourite of J. Caesar, of Cleopatra and Augustus, by his mimicry and facetiousness. He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous disposition, and of unpleasant manners, as Horace, 1, sat. 2, v. 3 et seq. insinuates.

Tigranes, a king of Armenia, who made himself master of Assyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war against the Romans. He despised these distant enemies, and even ordered the head of the messenger to be cut off who first told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was soon abated, and though he ordered the Roman consul Lucullus to be brought alive into his presence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was soon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally disheartened him; he refused to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even set a price upon his head. His mean submission to Pompey, the successor of Lucullus in Asia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, insured him on his throne, and he received a garrison in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His second son of the same name revolted against him, and attempted to dethrone him with the assistance of the king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married. This did not succeed, and the son had recourse to the Romans, by whom he was put in possession of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The son was afterwards sent in chains to Rome, for his insolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—Val. Max. 5, c. 1. Patern. 2, c. 33 & 37.—Justin. 40, c. 1 & 2. Plut. in Luc. Pomp., &c.—A king of Armenia in the reign of Tiberius.

He was put to death. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 40.—One of the royal family of the Cappadocians, chosen by Tiberius to ascend the throne of Armenia.—A general of the Medes.—A man appointed king of Armenia by Nero. Tacit. A. 14, c. 26.—A prince of Armenia in the age of Theodosius.

Tigranocerta, now Sered, the capital of Armenia, was built by Tigranes, during the Mithridatic war, on a hill between the springs of the Tigris and mount Taurus. Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immense riches, and no less than 8000 talents in ready money. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 9.

Tigres, a river of Peloponnesus, called also Harpys, from a person of the same name drowned in it. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Tigris, now Basilensa, a river of Asia, rising on mount Niphates in Armenia, and falling into the Persian gulf. It is the eastern boundary of Mesopotamia. The Tigris now falls into the Euphrates, though in the age of Pliny the two separate channels of these rivers could be easily traced. Plin. 6, c. 27.—Justin. 42, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 256.

Tigurini, a warlike people among the Helvetii, now forming the modern cantons of Saïto, Zurich, Schaffhausen, and St. Gall. Their capital was Tigurnum. Cæs. Bell. G.

Tilatæi, a people of Thrace. Thucyd. 2.

Tilavemptus, a river of Italy falling into the Adriatic at the west of Aquileia.

Tilfosinus, a mountain of Bœotia.—Also a fountain at the tomb of Tiresias. Paus. Bœot. 33.

Tillam, a town of Sardinia, now Argentera.

Tillius Cimber. Vid. Tullius.

Tilox, a north-west cape of Corsica.

Tilphusius, a mountain of Bœotia.

Timachus, a river of Mœsia falling into the Danube. The neighbouring people were called Timachi. Plin. 3, c. 26.

Timæ, the wife of Agis king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom she had a son. This child was rejected in the succession to the throne, though Agis, on his death-bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

Timæus, a friend of Alexander, who came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Curt. 9, c. 5.—An historian of Sicily, who flourished about 267 B.C., and died in the 95th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus. He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compositions are lost. Plut. in Nic.—Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.—A writer who published some treatises concerning ancient philosophers. Diog. in Emp.—A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locria. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatise on the nature and the soul of the world, in the Doric dialect, still extant. Plato in Tim.—Plut.—An Athenian in the age of Alcibiades. Plut.—A sophist, who wrote a book called Lexicon vocum Platonicarum.

Timagones, a Greek historian of Alexandria, 54 B.C., brought to Rome by Gabinius, and sold as a slave to the son of Sylla. His great abilities procured him his liberty, and gained the favours of the great, and of Augustus. The emperor discarded him for his impertinence; and Timagenes, to revenge himself on his patron, burnt the interesting history which he had composed of his reign. Plut.—Horat. 1, ep. 19, v. 15.—Quintil.—An historian and rhetorician of Miletus. —A man who wrote an account of the life of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 5.—A general, killed at Cheronæa.

Timagoras, an Athenian, capitally punished for paying homage to Darius, according to the Persian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was sent to Persia as ambassador. Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Suidas.—Another. Vir. Meles.

Timandra, a daughter of Leda, sister to Helen. She married Echemus of Arcadi. Paus. 8, c. 5.—A mistress of Alcibiades.

Timandrides, a Spartan celebrated for his virtues. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 32.

Timanthes, a painter of Sicily, in the reign of Philip the father of Alexander the Great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, he represented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his superior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep sorrows of the father. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his dis-appointments could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.—An athlete of Cleone, who burnt himself when he perceived that his strength began to fail. Paus. 6, c. 8.

Timarchus, a philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprocles the disciple of Socrates. Diog.—A rhetorician, who hung himself when accused of licentiousness by Æschines. —A Cretan, accused before Nero of oppression. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 20.—An officer in Ætolia, who burnt his ships to prevent the flight of his companions, and to ensure himself the victory. Polyæn. 5.—A king of Salamis. —A tyrant of Miletus, in the age of Antiochus, &c.

Timasion, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, &c.

Timasitheus, a prince of Lipara, who obliged a number of pirates to spare some Romans who were going to make an offering of the spoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were dispossessed of Lipara, the same generosity was nobly extended to his descendants in the island. Diod. 14.—Plut. in Cam.

Timavus, a broad river of Italy rising from a mountain, and, after running a short space, falling by seven mouths, or, according to some, by one, into the Adriatic sea. There are, at the mouth of the Timavus, small islands with hot springs of water. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 6. Æn. 1, v. 44 & 248.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

Timæsius, a native of Clazomene, who began to build Abdera. He was prevented by the Thracians, but honoured as a hero at Abdera. Herodot. 1, c. 168.

Timochæris, an astronomer of Alexandria, 294 B.C. Vir. Aristillus.

Timocleia, a Theban lady, sister to Theogenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timocleia threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

Timoclea, two Greek poets of Athens, who wrote some theatrical pieces, the one six, and the other 11, some verses of which are extant. Athen. 6.—A statue of Athens. Paus. 10, c. 34.

Timocrates, a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity. —A Syracusan who married Arete when Dion had been banished into Greece by Dionysius. He commanded the forces of the tyrant.

Timocreon, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic, prizes at Olympia. He lived about 476 years before Christ, distinguished for his voracity, and for his resentment against Simonides and Themistocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:

*Multa bibens, et multa vorans, mala denique
Alens*

Multis, hic jaceo Timocreon Rhodius.

Timodæmus, the father of Timoleon.

Timoléus, a Spartan, intimate with Philopœmen, &c. —A son of the celebrated Zenobia. —A general of Alexander, put to death by the Thebans.

Timoleon, a celebrated Corinthian, son of Timodemus and Demariste. He was such an enemy to tyranny, that he did not hesitate to murder his own brother Timophanes, when he attempted, against his representations, to make himself absolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleasure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the most inveterate aversion for her son, and for ever banished him from her sight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a settled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refused to accept of any offices in the state. When the Syracusans, oppressed with the tyranny of Dionysius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had solicited the assistance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been disregarded, if one of the magistrates had not awakened in him the sense of natural liberty. "Timoleon," says he, "if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer." This had due effect, and Timoleon sailed for Syracuse in 10 ships, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppose him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Ietas, who had the possession of the city, was defeated, and Dionysius, who despaired of success, gave himself up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This success gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily; many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impostor, claimed his protection; and when he was at last master of Syracuse by the total overthrow of Ietas and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the seat of tyranny, and erected on the spot a common hall. Syracuse was almost destitute of inhabitants, and at the solicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was sent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houses were sold for 1000 talents, which were appropriated to the use of the state, and deposited in the treasury. When Syracuse was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other states of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and banished from the island. A code of salutary laws was framed for the Syracusans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raise commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at last re-established. The gratitude of the Sicilians was shown everywhere to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applause in the public assemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuse: his advice was consulted on matters of importance, and his authority respected. He ridiculed the accusations of malevolence, and when some informers had charged him with oppression, he rebuked the Syracusans who were going to put the accusers to immediate death. A remarkable instance of his providential escape from the dagger of an assassin, has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a sacrifice to the gods after a victory, two assassins, sent by the enemies, approached his person in disguise. The arm of one of the assassins was already lifted up, when he was suddenly stabbed by an unknown person, who made his escape from the camp. The other assassin, struck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confessed, in the presence of the army, the conspiracy that had been formed against his life. The unknown assassin was in the mean time pursued, and when he was found, he declared that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had stabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Inquiries were made, and his confessions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuse, about 337 years before the christian era. His body received an honourable burial, in a public place called from him Timoleonium; but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the institution of festivals and games yearly to be observed on the day of his death. C. Nep. & Plut. in Vitâ.—Polyæn. 5. c. 3.—Diod. 16.

Timolus. Vid. Imolus.
Timomachus, a painter of Byzantium, in the age of Sylla and Marius. His painting of Medea murdering her children, and his Ajax, were purchased for 80 talents by J. Cæsar, and deposited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35. c. 11.
 —A general of Athens, sent to assist the Thebans. Xenoph.

Timon, a native of Athens, called Misanthrope, for his unconquerable aversion to mankind and to all society. He was fond of Apemantus, another Athenian whose character was similar to his own, and he said that he had some partiality for Alcibiades, because he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public assembly, and told his countrymen that he had a fig tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raise a building on the spot, he advised all such as were inclined to destroy themselves, to hasten and go and hang themselves in his garden. Plut. in Alc., &c.—Lucan. in Tim.—Paus. 6. c. 12.—A Greek poet, son of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote several dramatic pieces, all now lost, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog.—Athen. 6 & 13.—An athlete of Elis. Paus. 6. c. 12.

Timophanes, a Corinthian, brother to Timoleon. He attempted to make himself tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary soldiers with whom he had fought against the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wished to convince him of the impropriety of his measures, and when he found him unmoved, he caused him to be assassinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim.—A man of Mitylene, celebrated for his riches, &c.

Timotheus, a poet and musician of Miletus, son of Thersander or Philopolis. He was received with hisses the first time he exhibited as musician in the assembly of the people; and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides discovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profession in which he afterwards gained so much applause. He received the immense sum of 1000 pieces of gold from the Ephesians, because he had composed a poem in honour of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the Great. There was also another musician of Ebeotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the musician of Miletus. He was a great favourite of the conqueror of Darius. Cic. de Leg. 2. c. 15.—Paus. 3. c. 12.—Plut. de music. de fort. &c.—An Athenian general, son of Conon. He signalized himself by his valour and magnanimity, and showed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He seized Corcyra, and obtained several victories over the Thebans, but his ill success in one of his expeditions disgusted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the rest of his noble predecessors, was fined a large sum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was so disinterested, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own use, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treasury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the ancients, to imitate his continual successes, have represented him sleeping by the side of Fortune, while the goddess drove cities into his net. He was intimate with Plato, at whose table he learned temperance and moderation. Athen. 10. c. 3.—Paus. 1. c. 29.—Plut. in Syll., &c.—Ælian. V. H. 2. c. 10 & 18. l. 2. c. 16.—C. Nep.—A Greek statuary. Paus. 1. c. 32.—A tyrant of Heraclea, who murdered his father. Diod. 16.—A king of the Sapei.

Timoxenus, a governor of Sicily, who betrayed his trust, &c. Polyæn.—A general of the Achæans.

Tingis, now Tangiers, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania, built by the giant Antæus. Sertorius took it, and as the tomb of the founder was near the place, he caused it to be opened, and found in it a skeleton six cubits long. This increased the veneration of the people for their founder. Plut. in Sert.—Meia, 1. c. 5.—Plin. 5. c. 1.—Sil. 3. v. 258.

Tinia, a river of Umbria, now Topino, falling into the Chitumnus. Strab. 5.—Sil. 8. v. 454.

Tipha, a town of Bœotia, where Hercules had a temple. Ovid. ep. 6. v. 48.—Paus. 9. c. 32.

Tiphys, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts, was son of Hagnius, or, according to some, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was chosen in his place. Orph.—Apollod. 1. c. 9.—Apollon.—Val. Flacc.—Paus. 9. c. 32.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.

Tiphysa, a daughter of Thestius. Apollod. 2. c. 7.

Tiræias, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, son of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which some authors have called as long as seven generations of men, others six, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his sons sat on the throne of Thebes. It is said that in his youth he found two serpents in the act of copulation on mount Cyllene, and that when he had struck them with a stick to separate them, he found himself suddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again some serpents together in the same manner, and he recovered his original sex, by striking them a second time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tiresias had married, and it was from those reasons, according to some of the ancients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his decision, a dispute in which the deities wished to know which of the sexes received greater pleasure from the connubial state. Tiresias, who could speak from actual experience, decided in favour of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleasure which the female received was 10 times greater than that of the male. Juno, who supported a different opinion, and gave the superiority to the male sex, punished Tiresias by depriving him of his eyesight. But this dreadful loss was in some measure repaired by the humanity of Jupiter, who bestowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live seven times more than the rest of men. These causes of the blindness of Tiresias, which are supported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c., who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a punishment, because he had seen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the severity with which her son was treated; but the goddess, who well knew that this was the irrevocable punishment inflicted by Saturn on such mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddess without her consent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tiresias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a staff which could conduct his steps with as much safety as if he had the use of his eyesight. During his lifetime, Tiresias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or the language of birds, in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity, with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on mount Tilphusses, and honoured as a god. His oracle at Orchomenos was in universal esteem. Homer represents Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3, c. 6.—Theocrit. Id. 24, v. 70.—*Stat. Tiribases, an officer of Artaxerxes killed by the guards for conspiring against the king's life, B.C. 394. Plut. in Art.

Tirida, a town of Thrace where Diomedes lived. Plin. 4, c. 11.

Tiridates, a king of Parthia, after the expulsion of Phraates by his subjects. He was soon after deposed, and fled to Augustus in Spain.

Horat. 1, od. 26.—A man made king of Parthia by Tiberius, after the death of Phraates, in opposition to Artabanus. Tacit. Ann. 6, &c.—A keeper of the royal treasures at Persepolis, who offered to surrender to Alexander the Great. Curt. 5, c. 5, &c.—A king of Armenia, in the reign of Nero.—A son of Phraates, &c.

Tiris, a general of the Thracians, who opposed Antiochus. Polyam. 4.

Tiro Tullius, a freedman of Cicero, greatly esteemed by his master for his learning and good qualities. It is said that he invented shorthand writing among the Romans. He wrote the life of Cicero and other treatises now lost. Cic. ad Att., &c.

Tiryntia, a name given to Alcmena, because she lived at Tiryntus. Ovid. Met. 6.

Tiryntus, a town of Argolis in the Peloponnesus, founded by Tyrius son of Argus. Hercules generally resided there, whence he is called Tiryntius heros. Paus. 2, c. 16 & 25.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 15 & 49.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 662.—Sil. 8, v. 217.

Tisæum, a mountain of Thessaly. Polyb.

Tisagoras, a brother of Miltiades, called also Stesagoras. C. Nep. in Mil.

Tisamones, or Tisamonus, a son of Orestes and Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidæ entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and he was obliged to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apollod. 3, c. 7.—Paus. 3, c. 1, l. 7, c. 1.—A king of Thebes, son of Thersander and grandson of Polynices. The Furies, who continually persecuted the house of Œdipus, permitted him to live in tranquillity, but they tormented his son and successor Autseon, and obliged him to retire to Doris. Paus. 3, c. 5, l. 9, c. 6.—A native of Elis, crowned twice at the Olympic games. Paus. 3, c. 11.

Tisandrus, one of the Greeks concealed with Ulysses in the wooden horse. Some suppose him to be the same as Thersander the son of Polynices. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.

Tisarchus, a friend of Agathocles, by whom he was murdered, &c. Polyam. 5.

Tisdra, a town of Africa. Cæs. Afr. 76.

Tislarus, a town of Africa.

Tisias, an ancient philosopher of Sicily, considered by some as the inventor of rhetoric, &c. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 2. Orat. 1, c. 13.

Tisiphone, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, who was the minister of divine vengeance upon mankind, and visited them with plagues and diseases, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's direction she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to retire to hell. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 59.—Virg. G. 3, 552. Æn. 6, v. 555.—Horat. 1, sat. 8, v. 34.—A daughter of Alcæon and Manto.

Tisiphonus, a man who conspired against Alexander tyrant of Phœcia, and seized the sovereign power, &c. Diod. 16.

Tissa, now Randazzo, a town of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 268. Cic. Verr. 3, c. 38.

Tissamonus. Vid. Tisamenus.

Tissaphernes, an officer of Darius.—A satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes, at the battle of Cunaxa, against Cyrus. It was by his valour and intrepidity that the king's forces gained the victory, and for this he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B.C. C. Nep.—An officer in the army of Cyrus, killed by Artaxerxes at the battle of Cunaxa. Plut.

Titæa, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

Titan, or Titānus, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus; but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and with the assistance of his brothers the Titans, he imprisoned him till he was replaced on the throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the ancient mythologists, such as Apollodorus, Hesiod, Hyginus, &c., have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian, to the sun by Virgil and Ovid, and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 10.—Juv. 14, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 11.—Orpheus, Hymn. 13.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 119.

Titāna, a town of Sicily in Peloponnesus. Titanus reigned there.—A man skilled in astronomy. Paus. 2, c. 11.

Titānes, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus six, and Hesiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The most known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus, to whom Horace adds Typhœus, Mimas, Porphyryon, Rheus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologists reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic stature, and with proportionable strength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes, and armed them against their father. Saturn, with a scythe, cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himself to Terra, and threw them into the sea, and from the froth sprang a new deity, called Venus; as also Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn succeeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed by an oracle that he should be dethroned by them as a punishment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be observed, that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter. Hesiod. Theog. 135, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Æschyl. in Prom.—Callim. in Del. 17.—Diod. 1.—Hygin. pref. fab.

Titānia, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as granddaughter of Titan, and likewise to Diana. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 395. l. 2, &c.

Titanides, the daughters of Cœlus and Terra; reduced in number to six, according to Orpheus. The most celebrated were Tethys, Themis, Dione, Thea, Mnemosyne, Ops, Cybele, Vesta, Phoebe, and Rhea. Hesiod. Theog. 145, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

Titānus, a river in Peloponnesus, with a town and mountain of the same name.

Titaræus, a river of Thessaly, called also Eurotas, flowing into the Teneus, but without mingling its thick and turbid waters with the transparent stream. From the unwholesomeness of its water, it was considered as deriving its source from the Styx. Lucan. 6, v. 376.—Homer. Il. 2, ev. 258.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 18.

Titōnus, a river of Colchis, falling into the Euxine sea. Apollon. 4.

Tithenidia, a festival of Sparta, in which nurses, τιθνας, conveyed male infants entrusted to their charge to the temple of Diana, where they sacrificed young pigs. During the time of the solemnity, they generally danced and exposed themselves in ridiculous postures; there were also some entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a separate portion allotted him, together with a small loaf, a piece of new cheese, part of the entrails of the victims, and figs, beans, and green vetches, instead of sweetsmeats.

Tithōnus, a son of Laomedon king of Troy, by Strymo the daughter of the Scamander. He was so beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Æmation. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddess granted it; but as he had forgotten to ask the vigour, youth, and beauty which he then enjoyed, he soon grew old, infirm, and discrep; and as life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddess changed him into a cicada, or grasshopper. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447.—Æn. 4, v. 585. l. 8, v. 384.—Hesiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 461. l. 9, v. 403.—Horat. 1, od. 28. l. 2, od. 16.

Tithorea, one of the tops of Parnassus. Herodot. 8, c. 32.

Tithraustes, a Persian satrap, B.C. 395, ordered to murder Tissaphernes by Artaxerxes. He succeeded to the offices which the slaughtered favourite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Cimon.—An officer in the Persian court, &c.—The name was common to some of the superior officers of state in the court of Artaxerxes. Plut.—C. Nep. in Dat. & Conon.

Titia, a deity among the Milesians.

Titia lex, de magistratibus, by P. Titius the tribune, A.U.C. 710. It ordained that a triumvirate of magistrates should be invested with consular power to preside over the republic for five years. The persons chosen were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus.—Another, de provinciis, which required that the provincial questors, like the consuls and pretors, should receive their provinces by lot.

Titiana Flavia, the wife of the emperor Pertinax, disgraced herself by her debaucheries and incontinence. After the murder of her husband she was reduced to poverty, and spent the rest of her life in an obscure retreat.

Titianus Attil, a noble Roman put to death, A.D. 156, by the senate for aspiring to the purple. He was the only one proscribed during the reign of Antoninus Pius.—A brother of Otho.

Titii, priests of Apollo at Rome, who observed the flight of doves, and drew omens from it. Varrø, de L. L. 4, c. 45.—Lucan. 1, v. 602.

Titinius, a tribune of the people, in the first ages of the republic.—A friend of Cassius, who killed himself.—One of the slaves who revolted at Capua. He betrayed his trust to the Roman generals.

Titus Proculus, a Roman knight, appointed to watch Messalina. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 35.—A tribune of the people who enacted the Titian law.—An orator of a very dissolute character.—One of Pompey's murderers.—One of Antony's officers.—A man who foretook a victory to Sylla.—Septimius, a poet in the Augustan age, who distinguished himself by his lyric and tragic compositions, now lost. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 9.

Titormus, a shepherd of Ætolia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious strength. He was stronger than his contemporary, Milo of Crotona, as he could lift on his shoulders a stone which the Crotonian moved with difficulty. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 22.—Hærodot. 6, c. 127.

Titurius, a friend of Julia Silana, who informed against Agrippina, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13.—A lieutenant of Caesar in Gaul, killed by Ambiorix. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 29, &c.

Titus Vespasianus, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valour in the Roman armies, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem. In the 7th year of the christian era, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reason to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the house of Vespasian, Titus had been distinguished for his extravagance and incontinence; his attendants were the most abandoned and dissolute; and it seemed that he wished to be superior to the rest of the world in the gratification of every impure desire, and in every unnatural vice. From such a private character, which still might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected but tyranny and oppression? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wish to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his usual profligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardour, even to render himself despised by the Roman people, was dismissed from his presence. When raised to the throne, he thought himself bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty; and Titus is, perhaps, the only monarch who, when invested with uncontrollable power, bade adieu to those vices, those luxuries and indulgencies, which as a private man he never ceased to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refused the donations which were due to sovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and magnificent than Titus. All informers were banished from his presence, and even severely punished. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be postponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the sight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the sudden appearance of 5000 wild beasts brought into the circus for their amusement. To do good to his subjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no service, or granted no favour, one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of "My friends, I have lost a day!" A continual wish to be benevolent and kind, made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could say that he had rather die himself, than be the cause of the destruction of one of his subjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the senators conspired against his life, but the emperor disregarded their attempts; he made them his friends by kindness, and, like another Nerva, presented them with a sword to destroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, and the empire was visited by a pestilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conspicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their distresses by his liberal bounties, and as if they were but one family, he exerted himself for the good and preservation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favours of this magnificent prince. Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's house, his indisposition was increased by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modest submission complained of the severity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41st year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and 30 days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears, and all looked upon themselves as deprived of the most benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian ascended the throne, not without incurring the suspicion of having hastened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of snow, where he expired. Domitian has also been accused of raising commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with severity upon the cruelties which Titus exercised against the Jews; but though certainly a disgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we must consider him as an instrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the punishment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joseph. B. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Suetonius.—Dio., &c.

Titus Tatius, a king of the Sabines. Vid. Tatius.—Livius, a celebrated historian. Vid. Livius.—A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.—A friend of Coriolanus.—A native of Crotona, engaged in Cætiline's conspiracy.

Tityrus, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c.—A large mountain of Crete.

Tityus, a celebrated giant, son of Terra; or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched on the ground. He had a small chapel with an altar in the island of Eubœa. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Pind. P.yth. 4.—Homer. Od. 7, v. 325, l. 11, v. 575.—Apollon. RA. 1, v. 182, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 525.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 77.—Hygin. Fab. 55.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 457.—Tibull. 1, el. 3, v. 75.

Tium, or Tion, a maritime town of Paphlagonia, built by the Milesians. Mela, 1, c. 9.

Tiēpōlemus, a son of Hercules and Astyoehia, born at Argos. He left his native country after the accidental murder of Lycimnius, and retired to Rhodes, by order of the oracle, where he was chosen king, as being one of the sons of Hercules. He went to the Trojan war with nine ships, and was killed by Sarpedon. There were some festivals established at Rhodes in his honour, called Tiēpōlemia, in which men and boys contended. The victors were rewarded with poplar crowns. Homer. II.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Hygin. Fab. 97.

—One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Carmania at the general division of the Macedonian empire. Diod. 18.—An Egyptian general, who flourished B.C. 207.

Tmarus, a Rutulian in the wars of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 685.—A mountain of Thesprotia, called Tomarus by Pliny.

Tmolus, a king of Lydia, who married Omphale, and was son of Sipyllus and Chthouia. He offered violence to a young nymph called Arriphe, at the foot of Diana's altar, for which impiety he was afterwards killed by a bull. The mountain on which he was buried bore his name. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 191.—A town of Asia Minor, destroyed by an earthquake.

—A mountain of Lydia, now Bowzadag, on which the river Pactolus rises. The air was so wholesome near Tmolus, that the inhabitants generally lived to their 150th year. The neighbouring country was very fertile, and produced many vines, saffron, and odoriferous flowers. Strab. 13, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 84, &c.—Ovid. Met. 2, &c.—Sil. 7, v. 210.—Virg. G. 1, v. 56, l. 2, v. 98.

Togāta, an epithet applied to a certain part of Gaul where the inhabitants were distinguished by the peculiarity of their dress. Virg. Gallia.

Togonius Gallus, a senator of ignoble birth, devoted to the interest of Tiberius, whom he flattered, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 2.

Tolbiacum, a town of Gallia Belgica, south of Juliers.

Tolenus, a river of Latium, now Salto, falling into the Velinus. Ovid. Fast. 9, v. 561.

Toletum, now Toledo, a town of Spain on the Tagus.

Tolistoboffi, a people of Galatia in Asia, descended from the Boii of Gaul. Plin. 5, 32.—Liv. 58, c. 15 & 16.

Tollentinum, a town of Picenum. Plin. 3, c. 13.

Tolmides, an Athenian officer, defeated and killed in a battle in Bœotia, 477 B.C. Polyem. 7.

Tolōsa, now Toulouse, the capital of Languedoc, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, which became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was afterwards celebrated for the cultivation of the sciences. Minerva had there a rich temple, which Cæpio the consul plundered, and as he was never after fortunate, the words aurum Tolosanum became proverbial. Cæz. Bell. G.—Mela, 2, c. 5.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.

Tolmanus, an augur in the army of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 429.—A king of Veii, killed by Cor. Cossus after he had ordered the ambassadors of Rome to be assassinated. Liv. 4, c. 19.

Tolus, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

Tomæum, a mountain of Peloponnesus. Thucyd.

Tomærus, or Tmarus. Virg. Tmarus.

Tomisa, a country between Cappadocia and Taurus. Strabo.

Tomos, or Tomi, a town situate on the western shore of the Euxine sea, about 36 miles from the mouth of the Danube. The word is derived from taurom, seco, because Medea, as it is said, cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus there. It is celebrated as being the place where Ovid was banished by Augustus. Tomos was the capital of Lower Moesia, founded by a Milesian colony, B.C. 633.—Strab. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 14, v. 59.—Trist. 3, el. 9, v. 33, &c.

Tomyris. Virg. Tomyris.

Tonea, a solemnity observed at Samos. It was usual to carry Juno's statue to the sea-shore, and to offer cakes before it, and afterwards to replace it again in the temple. This was in commemoration of the theft of the Tyrrhenians, who attempted to carry away the statue of the goddess, but were detained in the harbour by an invisible force.

Tongillius, an avaricious lawyer, &c. Juv. 7, v. 130.

Topōsa, an island in the Arabian gulf, anciently called Ophiodes from the quantity of serpents that were there. The valuable stone called topas is found there. Plin. 6, c. 20.

Topiris, or Torpus, a town of Thrace.

Torini, a people of Scythia. Valer. 6.

Torōne, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 45.—Of Epirus.

Torquāta, one of the vestal virgins, daughter of C. Silanus. She was a vestal for 64 years. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 69.

Torquātus, a surname of Titus Manlius. Virg. Manlius.—Silanus, an officer put to death by Nero.—A governor of Orcum, in the interest of Pompey. He surrendered to J. Caesar, and was killed in Africa. Hirt. Afric. 96.—An officer in Sylla's army.—A Roman sent ambassador to the court of Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt.

Tortor, a surname of Apollo. He had a statue at Rome under that name.

Torus, a mountain of Sicily, near Agrigentum.

Torvne, a small town near Actium. The word in the language of the country signifies a saddle, which gave Cleopatra occasion to make a pun when it fell into the hands of Augustus. Plut. in Ant.

Toxandri, a people of Gallia Belgica. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Toxaridia, a festival at Athens, in honour of Toxaris, a Scythian hero who died there.

Toxæus, a son of Æneas, killed by his father. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Toxicrāte, a daughter of Thespisus.

Q. Trabea, a comic poet at Rome, in the age of Regulus. Some fragments of his poetry remain. Cic. in Pusc. 4, c. 31. Plin. 3, c. 4.

Trachinus M. Galerius, a consul in the reign of Nero, celebrated for his eloquence as an orator, and for a majestic and commanding aspect.

Quintil.—Tacit.—One of the friends and ministers of Otho.

Trachas, a town of Latium. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 717.

Trachinia, a small country of Phthiotis, on the bay of Malea, near mount Œta. The capital was called Trachis, or Trachina, where Hercules went after he had killed Eumomus. Strab. 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 269.

Trachonitis, a part of Judæa, on the other side of the Jordan. Plin. 5, c. 14.

Tragurium, a town of Dalmatia on the sea.

Tragus, a river of Arcadia, falling into the Aipeus. Paus. 8, c. 33.

Trajanopólis, a town of Thrace.—A name given to Selinus of Cilicia, where Trajan died.

Trajanus M. Ulpius Crinitus, a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. His great virtues, and his private as well as public character, and his services to the empire, both as an officer, a governor, and a consul, recommended him to the notice of Nerva, who solemnly adopted him as his son; invested him during his lifetime with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Caesar and Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany and the banks of the Danube. The noble and independent behaviour of Trajan evinced the propriety and goodness of Nerva's choice, and the attachment of the legions; and the new emperor seemed calculated to ensure peace and domestic tranquillity to the extensive empire of Rome. All the actions of Trajan showed a good and benevolent prince, whose virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyrist has paid. The barbarians continued quiet, and the hostilities which they generally displayed at the election of a new emperor whose military abilities they distrusted, were now few. Trajan, however, could not behold with satisfaction and unconcern the insolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The sudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers awed the barbarians to peace; but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, soon began hostilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country, by throwing a bridge across the rapid stream of the Danube, and a battle was fought in which the slaughter was so great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dress the wounds of the soldiers. Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus, despairing of success, destroyed himself, and Dacia became a province of Rome. That the ardour of the Roman soldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool, an expedition was undertaken into the east, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan passed through the submissive kingdom of Armenia, and, by his well-directed operations, made himself master of the provinces of Assyria and Mesopotamia. He extended his conquests in the east, he obtained victories over unknown nations; and when on the extremities of India, he lamented that he possessed not the vigour and youth of an Alexander, that he might add unexplored provinces and kingdoms to the Roman empire. These successes in different parts of the world gained applause, and the senators were profuse in the honours they decreed to the conqueror. This, however, was but the blaze of transient glory. Trajan had no sooner signified his intentions of returning to Italy, than the conquered barbarians appeared again in arms, and the Roman empire did not acquire one single acre of territory from the conquests of her sovereign in the east. The return of the emperor towards Rome was hastened by indisposition; he stopped in Cilicia, and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, he was seized with a flux, and a few days after expired, in the beginning of August, A.D. 117, after a reign of 19 years, six months, and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was succeeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empress Plotina introduced to the Roman armies, as the adopted son of her husband. The ashes of Trajan were carried to Rome, and deposited under the stately column which he had erected a few years before. Under this emperor the Romans enjoyed tranquillity, and for a moment supposed that their prosperity was complete under a good and virtuous sovereign. Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The sounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily bestowed upon a prince who was equal to the greatest generals of antiquity, and who, to indicate his affability, and his wish to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, distinguished his palace by the inscription of the public palace. Like other emperors, he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends, but rose from his seat and went cordially to salute them. He refused the statues which the flattery of favourites wished to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold, inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people; he appeared on foot, and showed himself an enemy to parade and an ostentatious equipage. When in his camp, he exposed himself to the fatigues of war, like the meanest soldier, and crossed the most barren deserts and extensive plains on foot, and in his dress and food displayed all the simplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. All the oldest soldiers he knew by their own name; he conversed with them with great familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had visited the camp, and by a personal attendance convinced himself of the vigilance and the security of his army. As a friend he was not less distinguished than as a general. He had a select number of intimates, whom he visited with freedom and openness, and at whose tables he partook many a moderate repast without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others, was, perhaps, carried to excess. His favourite Sura had once been accused of attempts upon his life, but Trajan disregarded the informer, and as he was that same day invited to the house of the supposed conspirator, he went thither early. To try further the sincerity of Sura, he ordered himself to be shaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his surgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are also celebrated; he opened free and easy communications between the cities of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furnished Rome with all the corn and provisions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was by his directions that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is still to be seen at Rome, under the name of Trajan's column.

Theophanía, festivals celebrated at Delphi in honour of Apollo.

Theophilus, a comic poet of Athens.—A governor of Syria in the age of Julian.—A friend of Piso.—A physician, whose treatise de Urinis is best edited by Guidottius, L. Bat. 1728, and another by Morell, 8vo, Paris, 1756.—One of the Greek fathers, whose work ad Autolyicum is best edited in 12mo, by Wolf, Hamb. 1724.—The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive christians.

Theophrastus, a native of Eresus in Lesbos, son of a fuller. He studied under Plato, and afterwards under Aristotle, whose friendship he gained, and whose warmest commendations he deserved. His original name was Tyrtamus, but this the philosopher made him exchange for that of Euphrastus, to intimate his excellence in speaking, and afterwards for that of Theophrastus, which he deemed still more expressive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. After the death of Socrates, when the malevolence of the Athenians drove all the philosopher's friends from the city, Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himself so conspicuous, that in a short time the number of his auditors was increased to 2000. Not only his countrymen courted his applause, but kings and princes were desirous of his friendship: and Cassander and Ptolemy, two of the most powerful of the successors of Alexander, regarded him with more than usual partiality. Theophrastus composed many books, and Diogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatises, which he wrote with great elegance and copiousness. About 20 of these are extant, among which are his history of stones, his treatise on plants, on the winds, on the signs of fair weather, &c., and his Characters, an excellent moral treatise, which was begun in the 99th year of his age. He died, loaded with years and infirmities, in the 107th year of his age, B.C. 288, lamenting the shortness of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the stag, but not to man. To his care we are indebted for the works of Aristotle, which the dying philosopher entrusted to him. The best edition of Theophrastus, is that of Heinsius, fol. L. Bat. 1673; and of his Characters, that of Needham, 8vo, Cantab. 1722, and that of Fischer, 8vo, Coburg, 1763. *Cic. Theopŏlis, a name given to Antioch, because the christians first received their name there.

Theopompus, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidae, who succeeded his father Nicander, and distinguished himself by the many new regulations which he introduced. He created the Ephori, and died, after a long and peaceful reign,

B.C. 723. While he sat on the throne, the Spartans made war against Messenia. Plut. in Lyc.—Paus. 3, c. 7.—A famous Greek historian of Chios, disciple of Isocrates, who flourished B.C. 354. All his compositions are lost, except a few fragments quoted by ancient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus as an historian, yet he is severely censured for his satirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his master was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for composing the best funeral oration in honour of Mausolus. His father's name was Damasistratus. *Dionys. Caesar. Strab. 14.—A Spartan general, killed at the battle of Tegyra.—A philosopher of Cheronæa, in the reign of the emperor Philip.

Theophylactus Simocatta, a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.—One of the Greek fathers who flourished A.D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

Theorius, a surname of Apollo at Troezen, where he had a very ancient temple. It signifies clear-sighted.

Theotimus, a wrestler of Elis, in the age of Alexander. Paus. 6, c. 17.—A Greek who wrote a history of Italy.

Theoxēna, a noble lady of Thessaly, who threw herself into the sea, when unable to escape from the soldiers of king Philip, who pursued her. Liv. 40, c. 4.

Theoxenia, a festival celebrated in honour of all the gods in every city of Greece, but especially at Athens. Games were then observed, and the conqueror who obtained the prize received a large sum of money, or, according to others, a vest beautifully ornamented. The Dioscuri established a festival of the same name, in honour of the gods who had visited them at one of their entertainments.

Theoxenus, a surname of Apollo.

Thera, a daughter of Amphin and Niobe. Hygin. fab. 69.—One of the Sporades in the Ægean sea, anciently called Callista, now Santorin. It was first inhabited by the Phœnicians, who were left there under Memblarius by Cadmus, when he went in quest of his sister Europa. It was called Thera by Theras the son of Antiesion, who settled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8.—A town of Caria. Therambus, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

Theramenes, an Athenian philosopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the 30 tyrants of Athens, but he had no share in the cruelties and oppression which disgraced their administration. He was accused by Critias, one of his colleagues, because he opposed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence, and the friendly intercession of the philosopher Socrates. He drank the poison with great composure, and poured some of it on the ground, with the sarcastical exclamation of, "This is to the health of Critias." This happened about 404 years before the Christian era. Theramenes, on account of the fickleness of his disposition, has been called Coturnus, a part of the dress used both by men and women. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib., &c.—C. Nep.

Therapne or Terapne, a town of Laconia, at the west of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phœbeum. It was but a very short distance from Lacedæmon, and, indeed, some authors have confounded it with the capital of Laconia. It received its name from Therapne, a daughter of Lelex. Castor and Pollux were born there, and on that account they were sometimes called Therapnæi fratres. Paus. 3, c. 14.—*Ovid. Theras, a son of Auteson of Lacedæmon, who conducted a colony to Callista, to which he gave the name of Thera. He received divine honours after death. Paus. 3, c. 1 & 15.

Therimachus, a son of Hercules by Megara. Apollod. 2, c. 4 & 7.

Therippidas, a Lacedæmonian, &c. Diod. 15.

Theritas, a surname of Mars in Laconia.

Therma, a town of Africa. Strabo.—A town of Macedonia, afterwards called Thessalonica, in honour of the wife of Cassander, and now Salonichi. The bay in the neighbourhood of Therma is called Thermaus, or Thermaicus sinus, and advances far into the country, so much, that Pliny has named it Macedonicus sinus, by way of eminence, to intimate its extent. Strab.—Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 10.—Herodot.

Therma (baths), a town of Sicily, where were the baths of Selinus, now Stiaccia.—Another, near Panormus, now Thermuni. Sil. 14, v. 23.—Cic. Ver. 2, c. 35.

Thermodon, now Termeh, a famous river of Cappadocia, in the ancient country of the Amazons, falling into the Euxine sea near Themiscyra. There was also a small river of the same name in Bœotia, near Tanagra, which was afterwards called Hœman. Strab. 11.—Herodot. 9, c. 27.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—Paus. 1, c. 1. l. 9, c. 19.—Plut. in Dem.—*Virg. Thermopylae, a small pass leading from Thessaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the west, and the sea on the east, with deep and dangerous marshes, being in the narrowest part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylae receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there B.C. 480, on the 7th of August, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans resisted for three successive days repeatedly the attacks of the most brave and courageous of the Persian army, which, according to some historians, amounted to 5,000,000. There was also another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Cat., &c.—Paus. 7, c. 15.

Thermon, a town of Ætolia on the Evenus. Polyb. 5.

Therms, a man accused in the reign of Tiberius, &c.—A man put to death by Nero.—A town of Ætolia, the capital of the country.

Therodamas, a king of Scythia, who, as some report, fed lions with human blood, that they might be more cruel. Ovid. Ib. 383.

Theron, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who died 472 B.C. He was a native of Bœotia, and son of Ænesidamus, and he married Damarete the daughter of Gelon of Sicily. Herodot. 7.—Pind. Olymp. 2.—One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid.—A Rutulian who attempted to kill Æneas. He perished in the attempt. Virg. Theb. 2, v. 572.—A daughter of Phylax, beloved by Apollo. Paus. 9, c. 40.

Therpander, a celebrated poet and musician of Lesbos. Vid. Terpander.

Thersander, a son of Polynices and Argia. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, but he was killed in Mysia by Telephus, before the confederate army reached the enemy's country. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—A son of Sisypheus king of Coninth.—A musician of Ionia.

Therulochus, a leader of the Pæonians in the Trojan war, killed by Achilles. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—A friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Id. 12, v. 363.—An athlete at Corcyra, crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 13.

Thersippus, a son of Agrius, who drove Æneus from the throne of Calydon.—A man who carried a letter from Alexander to Darius. Cæsar.—An Athenian author, who died 954 B.C.

Thersites, an officer, the most deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow-soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fist, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 17, v. 15.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 212, &c.

Thesides, a patronymic given to the Athenians from Theseus, one of their kings. Virg. G. 2, v. 383.

Thesias, a poem written by Codrus, containing an account of the life and actions of Theseus, and now lost. Juv. 1, v. 2.

Theseus, a king of Athens, and son of Ægeus by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the most celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Træzene in the house of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the son of the king of Athens, he passed for the son of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to his father, and a sword was given him, by which he might make himself known to Ægeus in a private manner. Vid. Ægeus. His journey to Athens was not across the sea, as it was usual with travellers, but Theseus determined to signalize himself in going by land, and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Træzene to Athens was infested with robbers and wild beasts, and almost impassable; but these obstacles were easily removed by the courageous son of Ægeus. He destroyed Corymbetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæax. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground, if Theseus was received in his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra.

He destroyed Corynetes, Synnisc, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæax. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as she knew that her influence would fall to the ground, if Theseus was received in his father's house, she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the cup of poison to this unknown stranger at a feast, but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus reminded him of his amours with Æthra.

He knew him to be his son, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illustrious stranger, who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the son of their monarch. The Palantides, who expected to succeed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to assassinate Theseus; but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theseus. The labour seemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the streets of Athens, he sacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this Theseus went to Crete among the seven chosen youths whom the Athenians yearly sent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wish to deliver his country from so dreadful a tribute, engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was successful by means of Ariadne the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had escaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread, and killed the Minotaur [Vid. Minotaurus], he sailed from Crete with the six boys and seven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the island of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanness to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. The rejoicings which his return might have occasioned at Athens were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship return with black sails, which was the signal of ill success. Vid. Ægeus. His ascension on his father's throne was universally applauded, B.C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was increased by the liberality of the monarch, religious worship was attended with more than usual solemnity, a court was instituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theseus made the government democratical, while he reserved for himself only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous king of the Lapithæ, alone wished to gain his friendship, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theseus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, struck at the sight of each other, rushed between their two armies, to embrace one another in the most cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the most sincere and admired friendship, which has become proverbial. Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and was the most eager and courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia and her female attendants, against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had lost Hippodamia, he agreed with Theseus, whose wife Phædra was also dead, to carry away some of the daughters of the gods. Their first attempt was upon Helen the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they cast lots, and she became the property of Theseus. The Athenian monarch entrusted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till she was of nubile years, but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her safe into their hands. Helen, before she reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theseus, but this tradition, confirmed by some ancient mythologists, is confuted by others, who affirm that she was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epistles, saying, Excepto reddi passa timore nihil. Some time after Theseus assisted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both descended into the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine. Pluto, apprised of their intentions, stopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theseus was tied to a huge stone on which he had sat to rest himself. Virgil represents him in this eternal state of punishment repeating to the shades in Tartarus the words of Discite justitiam moniti, et non temeræ divos. Apollodorus, however, and others declare that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to steal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the stone, but with such violence, that his skin was left behind. The same assistance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favour of Hercules and the consent of the infernal deities, not, however, without suffering the most excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnæstheus, one of the descendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himself into the favours of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. The Athenians had forgotten his many services, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes king of the island of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the presence of Mnæstheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some suppose that Theseus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was crushed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnæstheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honours due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They also raised him statues and a temple, and festivals and games were publicly instituted to commemorate the actions of a hero who had rendered such services to the people of Athens. These festivals were still celebrated with original solemnity in the age of Pausanias and Plutarch, about 1200 years after the death of Theseus. The historians disagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all suppose that, instead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wished to seduce a daughter of Aidoneus king of the Molossi. This daughter, as they say, bore the name of Proserpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus, and hence, perhaps, arises the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theseus was confined in prison, from whence he made his escape some time after by the assistance of Hercules. Some authors place Theseus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Molossi, in the time of Jason's expedition to Colchis. *Plut. in Vita. — Apollod. 3. — Hygin. Thesidæ, a name given to the people of Athens, because they were governed by Theseus.

Thesmophōra, a surname of Ceres, as law-giver, in whose honour festivals were instituted called Thesmophoria. The Thesmophoria were instituted by Triptolemus, or, according to some, by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greatest part of the Grecian cities, especially Athens, observed them with great solemnity. The worshippers were free-born women, whose husbands were obliged to defray the expenses of the festival. They were assisted by a priest called αρεπονομοποις, because he carried a crown on his head. There were also certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expense. The freeborn women were dressed in white robes, to intimate their spotless innocence; they were charged to observe the strictest chastity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the solemnity; and on that account it was usual for them to strew their bed with agnus castus, scabane, and all such herbs as were supposed to have the power of expelling all venereal propensities. They were also charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be observed with the greatest signs of seriousness and gravity, without any display of wantonness or levity. It was, however, usual to jest at one another, as the goddess Ceres had been made to smile by a merry expression when she was sad and melancholy for the recent loss of her daughter Proserpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyaneasion, the women went to Eleusis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddess had invented were contained. On the 14th of the same month the festival began, on the 16th day a fast was observed, and the women sat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was usual during the festival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom some suppose to be the nurse or favourite maid of the goddess of corn, or perhaps one of her surnames. There were some sacrifices of a mysterious nature, and all persons whose offence was small were released from confinement. Such as were initiated at the festivals of Eleusis assisted at the Thesmophoria. The place of high priest was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. *Ovid. Met. 10, v. 431. Thesmothētēs, a name given to the last six Archons among the Athenians, because they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to see justice impartially administered. They were at that time nine in number.

Thespia, now Neocorio, a town of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon, which received its name from Thespia the daughter of Asopus, or from Thespius. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Paus. 9, c. 26.—Strab. 9.

Thespiadæ, the sons of Thespiades. Vid. Thespius.

Thespiadēs, a name given to the 50 daughters of Thespius. Vid. Thespius. Diad. 4.—Seneca, in Her. Et. 369.—Also a surname of the nine muses, because they were held in great veneration in Thespia. Flacc. 2, v. 368.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 310.

Thespia, a Greek poet of Attica, supposed by some to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Christ. His representations were very rustic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, whose faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic representations. Horat. Art. P. 276.—Diog.

Thespius, a king of Thespia, in Bœotia, son of Erechtheus, according to some authors. He was desirous that his 50 daughters should have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This, which, according to some, was effected in one night, passes for the 13th and most arduous of the labours of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcanissima indicate:

*Tertius hinc decimus labor est durissimus, unda
Quinquaginta simul stuprauit nocte puellas.*

All the daughters of Thespius brought male children into the world, and some of them twins, particularly Procris the eldest, and the youngest. Some suppose that one of the Thespiades refused to admit Hercules to her arms, for which the hero condemned her to pass all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the priestess of a temple he had at Thespia. The children of the Thespiades, called Thespiades, went to Sardinia, where they made a settlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Thespius is often confounded by ancient authors with Thesius, though the latter lived in a different place, and, as king of Pleuron, sent his sons to the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 9, c. 26 & 27.—Plut.

Thesprōtia, a country of Epirus, at the west of Ambracia, bounded on the south by the sea. It is watered by the rivers Acheron and Cocytus, which the poets, after Homer, have called the streams of hell. The oracle of Dodona was in Thesprōtia. Hom. Od. 14, v. 315.—Strab. 7, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 17.—Lucan. 3, v. 179.

Thesprōtēs, a son of Lycaon king of Arcadia. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

Thessalia, a country of Greece, whose boundaries have been different at different periods. Properly speaking, Thessaly was bounded on the south by the northern parts of Greece, or Græcia propria; east, by the Ægean; north, by Macedonia and Mygdonia; and west, by Illyricum and Epirus. It was generally divided into four separate provinces, Thessaliotis, Pelasgiotis, Isteriatis, and Phthiotis, to which some add Magnesia. It has been severally called Ænomia, Pelagium, Argos, Hellas, Argelia, Dryopis, Pelagria, Pyrhæa, Æmathia, &c. The name of Thessaly is derived from Thessalus, one of its monarchs. Thessaly is famous for a deluge which happened there in the age of Deucalion. Its mountains and cities are also celebrated, such as Olympus, Pelion, Ossa, Larissa, &c. The Argopauts were partly natives of Thessaly. The inhabitants of the country passed for a treacherous nation, so that false money was called Thessalian coin, and a perfidious action, Thessalian deceit. Thessaly was governed by kings, till it became subject to the Macedonian monarchs. The cavalry was universally esteemed, and the people were superstitious, and addicted to the study of magic and incantations. Thessaly is now called Janna. Lucan. 6, v. 438, &c.—Dionys.

Thessaliotis, a part of Thessaly at the south of the river Peneus.

Thessalonica, an ancient town of Macedonia, first called Therma, and Thessalonica, after Thessalonica the wife of Cassander. According to ancient writers it was once very powerful, and it still continues to be a place of note. Strab. 7.—Dionys.—Cic. in Pis. c. 17.—Liv. 29, c. 17. l. 40, c. 4. l. 44, c. 10 & 45.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—A daughter of Philip king of Macedonia, sister to Alexander the Great. She married Cassander, by whom she had a son called Antipater, who put her to death. Paus. 8, c. 7.

Thessalus, a son of Ermon.—A son of Hercules and Caliope daughter of Eurypylus. Thessaly received its name from one of these. Apollod. 2.—Dictys Cret. 2.—A physician who invited Alexander to a feast at Babylon to give him poison.—A physician of Lydia in the age of Nero. He gained the favours of the great and opulent at Rome, by the meanness and servility of his behaviour. He treated all physicians with contempt, and thought himself superior to all his predecessors.—A son of Cimon, who accused Alcibiades because he imitated the mysteries of Ceres.—A son of Piscicratus.—A player in the age of Alexander.

Thestalus, a son of Hercules and Epicaste. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Thesto, a sister of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. She married Phloxenus, and was greatly esteemed by the Sicilians.

Thestia, a town of Ætolia, between the Evenus and Achelous. Polyb. 5.

Thestiades and Thestiades. Virg. Thespiades and Thespiades.

Thestiades, the sons of Thestius, Toxeus, and Plexippus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 286.

Thestias, a patronymic of Althea, daughter of Thestius. Ovid. Met. 8.

Thestis, a fountain in the country of Cyrene.

Thestius, a king of Pleuron, and son of Parthaon, was father to Toxeus, Plexippus, and Althea.—A king of Thespia. Virg. Thespius. The sons of Thestius, called Thestiades, were killed by Meleager at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Thestor, a son of Idmon and Lathoe, father to Calchas. From him Calchas is often called Thestorides. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 19.—Stat. 1, Ach. v. 497.—Apollon. 1, v. 239.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 69.

Thestylis, a country-woman mentioned in Theocritus and Virgil.

Thetis, one of the sea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Tethys her grandmother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the son she would bring forth must become greater than his father, their addresses were stopped, and Peleus the son of Æacus was permitted to solicit her hand. Thetis refused him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when asleep, and, by binding her strongly, he prevented her from escaping from his grasp, in assuming different forms. When Thetis found that she could not elude the vigilance of her lover she consented to marry him, though much against her inclination. Their supperstitions were celebrated on mount Pelion with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddess of discord, who punished the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midst of the assembly a golden apple, to be given to the fairest of all the goddesses. Virg. Discordia. Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus, but all these she destroyed by fire in attempting to see whether they were immortal. Achilles must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand as she was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her son, she attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was useless. He went with the rest of the Greeks. The mother, still anxious for his preservation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a suit of armour; but when it was done, she refused the god the favours which she had promised him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis issued out of the sea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after she had collected his ashes in a golden urn, she raised a monument to his memory, and instituted festivals in his honour. *Hesiod. Thentis, or Tenthis, a prince of a town of the same name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva, under the form of Melas son of Ops, attempted to pacify him, he struck the goddess and returned home. Some say that the goddess afterwards appeared to him and showed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died soon after. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Thia, the mother of the sun, moon, and Aurora by Hyperion. Virg. Thea. Hesiod. Theog. v. 371.—One of the Sporades, that rose out of the sea in the age of Pliny. Plin. 27, c. 12.

Thias, a king of Assyria.

Thimbron, a Lacedæmonian, chosen general to conduct a war against Persia. He was recalled, and afterwards reappointed. He died B.C. 391. Diod. 17.—A friend of Harpalus.

Thiodamas, the father of Hylas. Virg. Theodamus.

Thirmidia, a town of Numidia, where Hiempsal was slain. Sal. Jug. 2.

Thisbe, a beautiful woman of Babylon. Virg. Pyramus.—A town of Bœotia, between two mountains. Paus. 9, c. 32.

Thiosia, a Sicilian writer.

Thiosa, one of the three nymphs who fed Jupiter in Arcadia. She built a town which bore her name in Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Thistie, a town of Bœotia. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Thoantium, a place on the sea coast at Rhodes.

Thoas, a king of Taurica Chersonesus, in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. Virg. Iphigenia. According to some, Thoas was the son of Borysthenes. Ovid. Pont. 3, el. 2.—A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne the daughter of Minos, and husband to Myrtilus. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhada-manthus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hippisyle, in whose favour he had resigned the crown. Hippisyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island, which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thoas was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thoas was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, v. 208.—Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in l. 384. Herod. 6, v. 114.—*Stat. —A son of Ornytion, grandson of Nisiphus.—A king of Assyria, father of Adonis and Myrrha, according to Apollod. 3, c. 14.—A man who made himself master of Miletus.—An officer of Ætolia, who strongly opposed the views of the Romans, and favoured the interest of Antiochus, B.C. 193.—One of the friends of Æneas in Italy, killed by Halesus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 415.

Thoe, one of the Nereides. Hæstod. Th. 245.—One of the horses of Admetus.—One of the Amazons, &c. Val. Fl. 6, v. 376.

Tholus, a town of Africa.

Thomyris, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris, and Tomeris, was queen of the Massagete. After her husband's death, she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invade her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of the fallen monarch to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, with the insulting words of satis te sanguine quem sisti. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herodot. 1, c. 205.—Justin. 1, c. 8.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 143.

Thon, an Egyptian physician, &c.

Thonia, a courtesan of Egypt.

Thoon, a Trojan chief killed by Ulysses. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 259.—One of the giants who made war against Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 6.

Thoosa, a sea nymph, daughter of Phorcys, and mother of Polyphemus by Neptune. Hæstod. Theog. v. 236.—Homer. od. 1, v. 71.

Thootes, one of the Grecian heralds.

Thoranus, a general of Metellus, killed by Sertorius. Plut.

Thorax, a mountain near Magnesia in Ionia, where the grammarian Daphnitas was suspended on a cross for his abusive language against kings and absolute princes, whence the proverb caste a Thorace. Strab. 14.—A Lacedæmonian officer who served under Lysander, and was put to death by the Ephori. Plut. in Lys.—A man of Larissa, who paid much attention to the dead body of Antigonus, &c. Plut. in Lys., &c.

Thorax lex, agraria, by Sp. Thorius the tribune. It ordained that no person should pay any rent for the land which he possessed. It also made some regulations about grazing and pastures. Cic. in Bruti.

Thornax, a mountain of Argolis. It received its name from Thornax, a nymph who became mother of Iuphagus by Japetus. The mountain was afterwards called Coccygia, because Jupiter changed himself there into a cuckoo. Paus. 8, c. 27.

Thorsus, a river of Sardinia. Paus. 10, c. 17.

Thoth, an Egyptian deity, the same as Mercury.

Thous, a Trojan chief, &c.—One of Actæon's dogs.

Thrace, a daughter of Titan.—A name of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

Thræces, the inhabitants of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

Thracia, a large country of Europe, at the south of Scythia, bounded by mount Hæmus. It had the Ægean sea on the south, on the west Macedonia and the river Strymon, and on the east the Euxine sea, the Propontis, and the Hellespont. Its northern boundaries extended as far as the Ister, according to Ptolemy and others. The Thracians were looked upon as a cruel and barbarous nation; they were naturally brave and warlike, addicted to drinking and venereal pleasures, and they sacrificed without the smallest humanity their enemies on the altars of their gods. Their government was originally monarchical, and divided among a number of independent princes. Thrace is barren as to its soil. It received its name from Thrax the son of Mars, the chief deity of the country. The first inhabitants lived upon plunder, and on the milk and flesh of sheep. It forms now the province of Romania. Herodot. 4, c. 99, l. 5, c. 3.—Strab. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, &c.—Met. 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 9, c. 29, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 92, l. 13, v. 565, &c.—*C. Thrasimænus. Vid. Thrasymenus.

Thrasius, a general of a mercenary band in Sicily, who raised a sedition against Timoleon. Diod. 16.—A spendthrift at Rome, &c. Horat. 2, sat. 2, v. 99.

Thraseo, a painter. Strab. 14.—A favourite of Hieronymus, who espoused the interest of the Romans. He was put to death by the tyrant.—The character of a captain in Terence.

Thrasylulus, a famous general of Athens, who began the expulsion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only assisted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with success, B.C. 407, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive branch; a proof of his own disinterestedness and of the virtues of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whose abilities and humanity were so conspicuous, and Thrasylulus was sent with a powerful fleet to recover their lost power in the Ægean, and on the coast of Asia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aspendus, whom his soldiers had plundered without his knowledge. B.C. 391. *Diod. 14. C. Thrasylus, a king of Thessaly, &c.

Thrasylus, a man of Antica, so disordered in his mind that he believed all the ships which entered the Piræus to be his own. He was cured by means of his brother, whom he liberally reproached for depriving him of that happy illusion of mind. Ælian. V. H. 4. c. 25. — A general of the Athenians in the age of Alcibiades, with whom he obtained a victory over the Persians. — Thucyd. 8. — A Greek Pythagorean philosopher and mathematician, who enjoyed the favours and the friendship of Augustus and Tiberius. — Suet. in Tib.

Thrasymachus, a native of Carthage, who became the pupil of Isocrates and of Plato. Though he was a public teacher at Athens, he starved for want of bread, and at last hanged himself. Juv. 7. v. 204. — A man who abolished democracy at Cumæ. — Arist. Pol. 5. c. 5.

Thrasymedus, a son of Nestor king of Pylos, by Anaxibia the daughter of Bias. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Hægin. Fab. 27. — Pans. 2. c. 26. — A son of Philomelus, who carried away a daughter of Pisistratus, whom he married. — Polyem. 5.

Thrasymenus, a lake of Italy near Perusia, celebrated for a battle fought there between Annibal and the Romans, under Flaminius, B.C. 217. No less than 15,000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle, and 10,000 taken prisoners, or, according to Livy, 6000, or Polybius, 15,000. The loss of Annibal was about 1500 men. About 10,000 Romans made their escape, all covered with wounds. This lake is now called the lake of Perugia. Strab. 5. — Ovid. Fast. 6. v. 765. — Plut.

Threicius, of Thrace. Orpheus is called, by way of eminence, Threicius Sacerdos. Virg. Æn. 6. v. 645.

Threissa, an epithet applied to Harpalyce, a native of Thrace. Virg. Æn. 1. v. 310.

Threpsippas, a son of Hercules and Panope. Apollod.

Thriambus, one of the surnames of Bacchus.

Thronium, a town of Phocis, where the Boagrius falls into the sea, in the Sinus Malicus. Liv. 36. c. 20. — Strab. 9. — Plin. 4. c. 7. — Another of Thesprotia.

Thryon, a town of Messenia, near the Alpheus. Strab. 8. — Homer. Il. 2.

Thryus, a town of Peloponnesus, near Elis.

Thucydides, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Athens. His father's name was Olorus, and among his ancestors he reckoned the great Miltiades. His youth was distinguished by an eager desire to excel in the vigorous exercises and gymnastic amusements which called the attention of his contemporaries, and when he had reached the years of manhood, he appeared in the Athenian armies. During the Peloponnesian war he was commissioned by his countrymen to relieve Amphipolis; but the quick march of Brasidas the Lacedæmonian general defeated his operations, and Thucydides, unsuccessful in his expedition, was banished from Athens. This happened in the eighth year of this celebrated war, and in the place of his banishment the general began to write an impartial history of the important events which had happened during his administration, and which still continued to agitate the several states of Greece. This famous history is continued only to the 21st year of the war, and the remaining part of the time, till the demolition of the walls of Athens, was described by the pen of Theopompus and Xenophon. Thucydides wrote in the Attic dialect, as possessed of more vigour, purity, elegance, and energy. He spared neither time nor money to procure authentic materials; and the Athenians, as well as their enemies, furnished him with many valuable communications, which contributed to throw great light on the different transactions of the war. His history has been divided into eight books, the last of which is imperfect, and supposed to have been written by his daughter. The character of this interesting history is well known, and the noble emulation of the writer will ever be admired, who shed tears when he heard Hercules repeat his history of the Persian wars at the public festivals of Greece. The historian of Halicarnassus has been compared with the son of Olorus, but each has his peculiar excellence. Sweetness of style, grace, and elegance of expression, may be called the characteristics of the former, while Thucydides stands unequalled for the fire of his descriptions, the conciseness, and, at the same time, the strong and energetic matter of his narratives. His relations are authentic, as he himself was interested in the events he mentions; his impartiality is indubitable, as he nowhere betrays the least resentment against his countrymen, and the factious partisans of Cleon, who had banished him from Athens. Many have blamed the historian for the injudicious distribution of his subjects; and while, for the sake of accuracy, the whole is divided into summers and winters, the thread of history is interrupted, the scene continually shifted; and the reader, unable to pursue events to the end, is transported from Persia to Peloponnesus, or from the walls of Syracuse to the coast of Corcyra. The animated harangues of Thucydides have been universally admired; he found a model in Herodotus, but he greatly surpassed the original; and succeeding historians have adopted, with success, a peculiar mode of writing which introduces a general addressing himself to the passions and the feelings of his armies. The history of Thucydides was so admired, that Demosthenes, to perfect himself as an orator, transcribed it eight different times, and read it with such attention, that he could almost repeat it by heart. Thucydides died at Athens, where he had been recalled from his exile, in his 80th year, 91 years before Christ. The best editions of Thucydides are those of Duker, fol. Amst. 1731; of Giasgow, 12mo, 8 vols. 1759; of Hudson, fol. Oxon. 1796, and the 8vo of Bipont. 1788. *Cic. de Orat., &c. — Diod. 12. — Dionys. Hal. de Thuc. — Ælian. V. Thusto, one of the deities of the Germans. Tacit.

Thule, an island in the most northern parts of the German ocean, to which, on account of its great distance from the continent, the ancients gave the epithet of ultima. Its situation was never accurately ascertained, hence its present name is unknown by modern historians. Some suppose that it is the island now called Iceland or part of Greenland, whilst others imagine it to be the Shetland Isles. *Stat. 3, Syl. 5, v. 20.—Strab. 1.—Mela, 3, c. 6.—Tacit. Thuscia, a country of Italy, the same as Etruria. Vid. Etruria.

Thya, a daughter of the Cephissus.—A place near Delphi.

Thyades (sing. Thyas), a name of the Bacchantes. They received it from Thyas daughter of Castalius, and mother of Delphus by Apollo. She was the first woman who was priestess of the god Bacchus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 302.—Paus. 10, c. 4.

Thymis, a river of Epirus falling into the Ionian sea. Paus. 1, c. 11.—Cic. 7, Att. 2.

Thyana, a town of Cappadocia. Strab.

Thyatira, a town of Lydia, now Aksisar. Liv. 37, c. 8 & 44.

Thybarni, a people near Sardes. Diod. 17.

Thyesta, a sister of Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse.

Thyestes, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and grandson of Tantalus, debauched Arope the wife of his brother Atreus, because he refused to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no sooner known, than Atreus divorced Arope, and banished Thyestes from his kingdom; but soon after, the more effectually to punish his infidelity, he expressed a wish to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyestes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was soon informed that he had been feeding upon the flesh of one of his own children. This Atreus took care to communicate to him by showing him the remains of his son's body. This action appeared so barbarous, that, according to the ancient mythologists, the sun changed his usual course, not to be a spectator of so bloody a scene. Thyestes escaped from his brother, and fled to Epirus. Some time after he met his daughter Pelopeia in a grove sacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who she was. This incest, however, according to some, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle, that the injuries he had received from Atreus would be avenged by a son born from himself and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was seen by her uncle Atreus and married, and some time after she brought into the world a son, whom she exposed in the woods. The life of the child was preserved by goats; he was called Ægysthus, and presented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atreus. When grown to years of maturity, the mother gave her son Ægysthus a sword, which she had taken from her unknown ravisher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of discovering who he was. Meantime Atreus, intent to punish his brother, sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to pursue him, and when at last they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a close prison. Ægysthus was sent to murder Thyestes, but the father recollected the sword, which was raised to stab him, and a few questions convinced him that his assassin was his own son. Pelopeia was present at this discovery, and when she found that she had committed incest with her father, she asked Ægysthus to examine the sword, and immediately plunged it into her own breast. Ægysthus rushed from the prison to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wished to offer thanks to the gods on the supposed death of Thyestes. At the death of Atreus, Thyestes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægysthus, from which he was soon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was banished into the island of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Sophoc. in Ajax.—Hygin. fab. 86, &c.—Ovid. in 16. 359.—Lucan. 1, v. 544. l. 7, v. 481.—Senec. in Thyest.

Thymbra, a small town of Lydia near Sardes, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between Cyrus and Croesus, in which the latter was defeated. The troops of Cyrus amounted to 196,000 men, besides chariots, and those of Croesus were twice as numerous.—A plain in Troas, through which a small river, called Thymbrius, falls in its course to the Scamander. Apollo had there a temple, and from thence he is called Thymbriæus. Achilles was killed there by Paris, according to some. Strab. 13.—Stat. 4.—Syl. 7, v. 22.—Dictys. Cret. 2, c. 52. l. 2, c. 1.

Thymathis, a river of Epirus. Strab. 7.

Thymocharos, an Athenian defeated in a battle by the Lacedæmonians.

Thymotes, a king of Athens, son of Oxinthes, the last of the descendants of Theseus, who reigned at Athens. He was deposed because he refused to accept a challenge sent by Xanthus king of Bœotia, and was succeeded by a Messenian, B. C. 1128, who repaired the honour of Athens by fighting the Bœotian king. *Paus. 2, c. 18.—A Trojan prince, whose wife and son were put to death by order of Priam. Tiberias, a town of Galilee, built by Herod, near a lake of the same name, and called after Tiberius. Plin. 5, c. 16.—Joseph. A. 18, c. 3.

Tiberinus, son of Capetus, and king of Alba, was drowned in the river Alba, which on that account assumed the name of Tiberis, of which he became the protecting god. Liv. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 20.—Varro, de L. L. 4, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 389. l. 4, v. 47.

Tibris, Tiberis, Tiber, or Tibore, a river of Italy on whose banks the city of Rome was built. It was originally called Albula, from the whiteness of its waters, and afterwards Tiberis, when Tiberinus king of Alba had been drowned there. It was also named Tyrrhenus, because it watered Etruria, and Lydius, because the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were supposed to be of Lydian origin. The Tiber rises in the Apennines, and falls into the Tyrrhene sea, 16 miles below Rome, after dividing Latium from Etruria. *Ovid. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero, a Roman emperor after the death of Augustus, was descended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators, and he gained some applause in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His first appearance in the Roman armies was under Augustus, in the war against the Cantabri; and afterwards, in the capacity of general, he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midst of his glory, Tiberius fell under the displeasure of Augustus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for seven years as an exile, till, by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor, he was recalled. His return to Rome was the more glorious; he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus. At the death of this celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, assumed the reins of government; and while with dissimulation and affected modesty he wished to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greatest part of the Romans believe that he was invested with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Augustus, and the urgent entreaties of the Roman senate. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the world. Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace; he was the friend of justice, and never assumed the sounding titles which must disgust a free nation, but he was satisfied to say of himself that he was the master of his slaves, the general of his soldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That seeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepest policy, soon disappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whose intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people, and suspected even by his most intimate favourites. The armies mutined in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were silenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to their condign punishment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his successors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very existence in perpetual danger. He continued as he had begun, to pay the greatest deference to the senate; all libels against him he disregarded, and he observed that, in a free city, the thoughts and the tongue of every man should be free. The taxes were gradually lessened, and luxury restrained by the salutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a scene of peace and public tranquillity, the barbarians were severally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honours, by the activity and valour of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealousy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison, and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent, were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was scarce in Rome one single family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at last retired to the island of Capree, on the coast of Campania, where he buried himself in unlawful pleasures. The care of the empire was entrusted to favourites, among whom Sejanus for a while shone with uncommon splendour. In this solitary retreat the emperor proposed rewards to such as invented new pleasures, or could produce fresh luxuries. He forgot his age, as well as his dignity, and disgraced himself by the most unnatural vices and enormous indulgencies, which can draw a blush even upon the countenance of the most debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was lost to himself and the world, the provinces were harassed on every side by the barbarians, and Tiberius found himself insulted by those enemies whom hitherto he had seen fall prostrate at his feet with every mark of submissive adulation. At last, grown weak and helpless through infirmities, he thought of his approaching dissolution; and as he well knew that Rome could not exist without a head, he nominated, as his successor, Caius Caligula. Many might inquire, why a youth naturally so vicious and abandoned as Caius was chosen to be the master of an extensive empire; but Tiberius wished his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be displayed in the reign of his successor, whose natural propensities he had well defined, in saying of Caligula that he bred a serpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the rest of the empire. Tiberius died at Misenum the 16th of March, A.D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, six months, and 26 days. Caligula was accused of having hastened his end by suffocating him. The joy was universal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midst of sorrow, had a moment to rejoice, heedless of the calamities which awaited them in the succeeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great solemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who seemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praises of Augustus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was universally esteemed; when he had no superior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue; but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favourite, he was tyrannical and dissolute. If, as some observe, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conspicuous as his great ancestors; but the sovereign power lodged in his hands, rendered him vicious and oppressive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favoured flattery, he blushed at the mean servilities of the senate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he said, as if they approached a savage elephant. He was a patron of learning; he was an eloquent and ready speaker, and dedicated some part of his time to study. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, "A Complaint on the death of Lucius Cæsar," as also some Greek pieces in imitation of some of his favourite authors. He avoided all improper expressions, and all foreign words he totally wished to banish from the Latin tongue. As instances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Asia Minor, whose cities had been destroyed by a violent earthquake, A.D. 17. One of his officers wished him to increase the taxes. "No," said Tiberius; "a good shepherd must shear, not flay, his sheep." The senators wished to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of J. Cæsar and Augustus, in the months of July and August; but this he refused, saying, "What will you do, conscript fathers, if you have thirteen Cæsars?" Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily observed by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual state of intoxication from the time he gave himself to drinking till the last moment of his life. Sueton. in Viti, &c.—Tacit. Ann. 6, &c.—Dion. Cass.—A friend of

Tibiscus, now Telisse, a river of Dacia, with a town of the same name, now Temeswar. It falls into the Danube.

Tibris. Vid. Tiberis.

Tibullus Autus Albius, a Roman knight celebrated for his poetical compositions. He followed Messala Corvinus into the island of Corcyra, but he was soon dissatisfied with the toils of war, and retired to Rome, where he gave himself up to literary ease, and to all the effeminate indolence of an Italian climate. His first composition was to celebrate the virtues of his friend Messala; but his more favourite study was writing love verses, in praise of his mistresses Delia and Plautia, of Nemesia and Neæra, and in these elegant effusions he showed himself the most correct of the Roman poets. As he had espoused the cause of Brutus, he lost his possessions when the soldiers of the triumvirate were rewarded with lands; but he might have recovered them if he had condescended, like Virgil, to make his court to Augustus. Four books of elegies are the only remaining pieces of his composition. They are uncommonly elegant and beautiful, and possessed with so much grace and purity of sentiment, that the writer is deservedly ranked as the prince of elegiac poets. Tibullus was intimate with the literary men of his age, and for some time he had a poetical contest with Horace, in gaining the favours of an admired courtesan. Ovid has written a beautiful elegy on the death of his friend. The poems of Tibullus are generally published with those of Propertius and Catullus, of which the best editions are that of Vulpinus, Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755; that of Barbou, 12mo, Paris, 1755; and that by Heyne, 8vo, Lips. 1776. Ovid. 3, Am. el. 9. Trist. 2, v. 487.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, l. 1, ad. 33, v. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Tibur, an ancient town of the Sabines, about 20 miles north of Rome, built, as some say, by Tiburtus the son of Amphiaraus. It was watered by the Anio, and Hercules was the chief deity of the place, from which circumstance it has been called Herculei muri. In the neighbourhood, the Romans, on account of the salubrity of the air, had their several villas where they retired; and there also Horace had his favourite country seat, though some place it nine miles higher. Strab. 5.—Cic. 2, Orat. 65.—Suet. Cal. 21.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 630.—Horat. 3, od. 4, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 61, &c.

L. Tiburtius, a centurion in Cæsar's army, wounded by Pompey's soldiers.

Tiburtus, the founder of Tibur, often called Tiburtia maxia. He was one of the sons of Amphiaraus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 670.

Tichis, now Tech, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean.

Tichius, a name given to the top of mount Ceta. Liv. 36, c. 16.

Ticida, a Roman poet a few years before the age of Cicero, who wrote epigrams, and praised his mistress Metella under the fictitious name of Peccilla. Ovid. Frist. 2, v. 433.

Ticinus, now Ticino, a river near Ticinum, a small town of Italy, where the Romans were defeated by Annibal. The town of Ticinum was also called Pavia. The Ticinus falls into the Po. Strab. 5.—Ital. 4, v. 81.

Tidius, a man who joined Pompey, &c.

Tiessa, a river of Laconia, falling into the Eurotas. Paus. 3, c. 18.

Tifata, a mountain of Campania, near Capua. Stat. Sylv. 4.

Tifernum, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them, for distinction's sake, is called Metaurensis, near the Metaurus, in Umbria; the other, Tiferinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Samniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.—Plin. 3, c. 14.—Plin. sec. 4, ep. 1.

Tiferus, a mountain and river in the country of the Samnites. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 10, c. 30.—Mela. 3, c. 4.

Tigais, a son of Hercules.

Tigellinus, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conspirators who had leagued against Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honours. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to destroy himself, 68 A.D. Tact. Hist. 1, c. 72.—Plut.—Juv. 1.

Tigellius, a native of Sardinia, who became the favourite of J. Cæsar, of Cleopatra and Augustus, by his mimicry and facetiousness. He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous disposition, and of unpleasing manners, as Horace, 1, sat. 2, v. 3 et seq. insinuates.

Tigranes, a king of Armenia, who made himself master of Assyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war against the Romans. He despised these distant enemies, and even ordered the head of the messenger to be cut off who first told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was soon abated, and though he ordered the Roman consul Lucullus to be brought alive into his presence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was soon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally disheartened him; he refused to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even set a price upon his head. His mean submission to Pompey, the successor of Lucullus in Asia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, insured him on his throne, and he received a garrison in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His second son of the same name revolted against him, and attempted to dethrone him with the assistance of the king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married. This did not succeed, and the son had recourse to the Romans, by whom he was put in possession of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The son was afterwards sent in chains to Rome, for his insolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—Val Max. 5, c. 1. Patere. 2, c. 33 & 37.—Justin. 40, c. 1 & 2. Plut. in Luc. Pomp., &c.—A king of Armenia in the reign of Tiberius.

He was put to death. Tact. Ann. 6, c. 40.—One of the royal family of the Cappadocians, chosen by Tiberius to ascend the throne of Armenia.—A general of the Medes.—A man appointed king of Armenia by Nero. Tact. A. 14, c. 26.

—A prince of Armenia in the age of Theodosius.

Tigranocerta, now Sered, the capital of Armenia, was built by Tigranes, during the Mithridatic war, on a hill between the springs of the Tigris and mount Taurus. Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immense riches, and no less than 8000 talents in ready money. Tact. Ann. 15, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 9.

Tigres, a river of Peloponnesus, called also Harpyx, from a person of the same name drowned in it. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Tigris, now Basileusa, a river of Asia, rising on mount Niphates in Armenia, and falling into the Persian gulf. It is the eastern boundary of Mesopotamia. The Tigris now falls into the Euphrates, though in the age of Pliny the two separate channels of these rivers could be easily traced. Plin. 6, c. 27.—Justin. 42, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 256.

Tigurini, a warlike people among the Helvetii, now forming the modern cantons of Solis, Zurich, Schaffhausen, and St. Gall. Their capital was Tigurnum. Cæs. Bell. G.

Tilatesi, a people of Thrace. Thucyd. 2.

Tilavemptus, a river of Italy falling into the Adriatic at the west of Aquileia.

Tilfossius, a mountain of Bœotia.—Also a fountain at the tomb of Thresias. Paus. Bœot. 33.

Tilium, a town of Sardinia, now Argentiera.

Tillius Cimper. Vid. Tullius.

Tilox, a north-west cape of Corsica.

Tilphussus, a mountain of Bœotia.

Timachus, a river of Messia falling into the Danube. The neighbouring people were called Timachi. Plin. 3, c. 26.

Timæ, the wife of Agis king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom she had a son.

This child was rejected in the succession to the throne, though Agis, on his death-bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

Timæus, a friend of Alexander, who came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Cæst. 9, c. 5.—An historian of Sicily, who flourished about 262 B.C., and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus.

He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compositions are lost. Plut. in Nic.

Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.—A writer who published some treatises concerning ancient philosophers. Diog. in Emp.

—A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locria. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatise on the nature and the soul of the world, in the Doric dialect, still extant. Plato in Tim.—Plut.—An Athenian in the age of Alcibiades. Plut.—A sophist, who wrote a book called Lexicon vocum Platonicarum.

Timagènes, a Greek historian of Alexandria, 54 B.C., brought to Rome by Gabinus, and sold as a slave to the son of Sylla. His great abilities procured him his liberty, and gained the favours of the great, and of Augustus. The emperor discarded him for his impertinence; and Timagenes, to revenge himself on his patron, burnt the interesting history which he had composed of his reign. *Plut.—Horat. 1, ep. 19, v. 15.—Quintil.—*An historian and rhetorician of Miletus.—A man who wrote an account of the life of Alexander. *Curt. 9, c. 5.—*A general, killed at Cheronæa.

Timagoras, an Athenian, capably punished for paying homage to Darius, according to the Persian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was sent to Persia as ambassador. *Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Suidas.—*Another. Vid. Meles.

Timandra, a daughter of Leda, sister to Helen. She married Echeinus of Arcadi. *Paus. 8, c. 5.—*A mistress of Alcibiades.

Timandrides, a Spartan celebrated for his virtues. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 32.

Timanthes, a painter of Sicily, in the reign of Philip the father of Alexander the Great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, he represented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his superior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep sorrows of the father. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his disappointments could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. *Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.—*An athlete of Cleone, who burnt himself when he perceived that his strength began to fail. Paus. 6, c. 8.

Timarchus, a philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprocles the disciple of Socrates. *Diog.—*A rhetorician, who hung himself when accused of licentiousness by Æschines.—A Cretan, accused before Nero of oppression. *Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 20.—*An officer in Ætolia, who burnt his ships to prevent the flight of his companions, and to ensure himself the victory. *Polyam. 5.—*A king of Salamis.—A tyrant of Miletus, in the age of Antiochus, &c.

Timasion, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, &c.

Timasitheus, a prince of Lipara, who obliged a number of pirates to spare some Romans who were going to make an offering of the spoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were dispossessed of Lipara, the same generosity was nobly extended to his descendants in the island. Diod. 14.—Plut. in Cam.

Timavus, a broad river of Italy rising from a mountain, and, after running a short space, falling by seven mouths, or, according to some, by one, into the Adriatic sea. There are, at the mouth of the Timavus, small islands with hot springs of water. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 6. Æn. 1, v. 44 & 248.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

Timesitus, a native of Clazomenæ, who began to build Abdera. He was prevented by the Thracians, but honoured as a hero at Abdera. Herodot. 1, c. 168.

Timochæris, an astronomer of Alexandria, 294 B.C. Vid. Aristillus.

Timoclea, a Theban lady, sister to Theogenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

Timocles, two Greek poets of Athens, who wrote some theatrical pieces, the one six, and the other 11, some verses of which are extant. *Athen. 6.—*A statutory of Athens. Paus. 10, c. 34.

Timocrætes, a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity.—A Syracusan who married Arete when Dion had been banished into Greece by Dionysius. He commanded the forces of the tyrant.

Timocreon, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic prizes at Olympia. He lived about 475 years before Christ, distinguished for his voracity, and for his resentment against Simonides and Themistocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:

Multa bibens, et multa vorans, maia denique licent

Mullis, hic jacet Timocreon Rhodius.

Timodæmus, the father of Timoleon.
Timodæus, a Spartan, intimate with Philopœmen, &c.—A son of the celebrated Zenobia.—A general of Alexander, put to death by the Thebans.

Timoleon, a celebrated Corinthian, son of Timodemus and Demariste. He was such an enemy to tyranny, that he did not hesitate to murder his own brother Timophanes, when he attempted, against his representations, to make himself absolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleasure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the most inveterate aversion for her son, and for ever banished him from her sight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a settled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refused to accept of any offices in the state. When the Syracusans, oppressed with the tyranny of Dionysius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had solicited the assistance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been disregarded, if one of the magistrates had not awakened in him the sense of natural liberty. "Timoleon," says he, "if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer." This had due effect, and Timoleon sailed for Syracuse in 10 ships, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppose him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Ictæta, who had the possession of the city, was defeated, and Dionysius, who despaired of success, gave himself up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This success gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily; many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impostor, claimed his protection; and when he was at last master of Syracuse by the total overthrow of Ictæta and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the seat of tyranny, and erected on the spot a common hall. Syracuse was almost destitute of inhabitants, and at the solicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was sent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houses were sold for 1000 talents, which were appropriated to the use of the state, and deposited in the treasury. When Syracuse was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other states of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and banished from the island. A code of salutary laws was framed for the Syracusans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raise commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at last re-established. The gratitude of the Sicilians was shown everywhere to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applause in the public assemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuse: his advice was consulted on matters of importance, and his authority respected. He ridiculed the accusations of malevolence, and when some informers had charged him with oppression, he rebuked the Syracusans who were going to put the accusers to immediate death. A remarkable instance of his providential escape from the dagger of an assassin, has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a sacrifice to the gods after a victory, two assassins, sent by the enemies, approached his person in disguise. The arm of one of the assassins was already lifted up, when he was suddenly stabbed by an unknown person, who made his escape from the camp. The other assassin, struck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confessed, in the presence of the army, the conspiracy that had been formed against his life. The unknown assassin was in the mean time pursued, and when he was found, he declared that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had stabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Inquiries were made, and his confessions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuse, about 337 years before the christian era. His body received an honourable burial, in a public place called from him Timoleonium; but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the institution of festivals and games yearly to be observed on the day of his death. C. Nep. & Plut. in Vita. — Polyem. 5, c. 3. — Diad. 16.

Timölus. Vid. Timolus.

Timomachus, a painter of Byzantium, in the age of Sylla and Marius. His painting of Medea murdering her children, and his Ajax, were purchased for 80 talents by J. Cæsar, and deposited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35, c. 11. — A general of Athens, sent to assist the Thebans. Xenoph.

Timon, a native of Athens, called Hisanthrope, for his unconquerable aversion to mankind and to all society. He was fond of Apemantus, another Athenian whose character was similar to his own, and he said that he had some partiality for Alcibiades, because he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public assembly, and told his countrymen that he had a fig tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raise a building on the spot, he advised all such as were inclined to destroy themselves, to hasten and go and hang themselves in his garden. Plut. in Alc. &c. — Lucan. in Tim. — Paus. 6, c. 12. — A Greek poet, son of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote several dramatic pieces, all now lost, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog. — Athen. 6 & 13. — An athlete of Elis. Paus. 6, c. 12.

Timophanes, a Corinthian, brother to Timo-

leon. He attempted to make himself tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary soldiers with whom he had fought against the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wished to convince him of the impropriety of his measures, and when he found him unmoved, he caused him to be assassinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim. — A man of Mitylene, celebrated for his riches, &c.

Timotheus, a poet and musician of Miletus, son of Thersander or Philopolis. He was received with hisses the first time he exhibited as musician in the assembly of the people; and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides discovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profession in which he afterwards gained so much applause. He received the immense sum of 1000 pieces of gold from the Ephesians, because he had composed a poem in honour of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the Great. There was also another musician of Bœotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the musician of Miletus. He was a great favourite of the conqueror of Darius. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 15. — Paus. 3, c. 12. — Plut. de music. de fort. &c. — An Athenian general, son of Conon. He signalized himself by his valour and magnanimity, and showed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He seized Corcyra, and obtained several victories over the Thebans, but his ill success in one of his expeditions disgusted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the rest of his noble predecessors, was fined a large sum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was so disinterested, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own use, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treasury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the ancients, to imitate his continual successes, have represented him sleeping by the side of Fortune, while the goddess drove cities into his net. He was intimate with Plato, at whose table he learned temperance and moderation. Athen. 10, c. 3. — Paus. 1, c. 29. — Plut. in Syll. &c. — Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 10 & 18. 1. 3, c. 16. — C. Nep. — A Greek statuary. Paus. 1, c. 32. — A tyrant of Heraclea, who murdered his father. Diad. 16. — A king of the Sapei.

Timoxenus, a governor of Sicily, who betrayed his trust, &c. Polyem. — A general of the Achæans.

Tingis, now Tangiers, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania, built by the giant Antæus. Sertorius took it, and as the tomb of the founder was near the place, he caused it to be opened, and found in it a skeleton six cubits long. This increased the veneration of the people for their founder. Plut. in Sert. — Meis. 1, c. 5. — Plin. 5, c. 1. — Sil. 3, v. 258.

Tinia, a river of Umbria, now Topino, falling into the Clitumnus. Strab. 5. — Sil. 8, v. 454.

Tipha, a town of Bœotia, where Hercules had a temple. Ovid. ep. 6, v. 48. — Paus. 9, c. 37.

Tiphys, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts, was son of Hagnius, or, according to some, of Colchus. He died before the Argonauts reached Corchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was chosen in his place. Orph. — Apollod. 1, c. 9. — Apollon. — Val. Flacc. — Paus. 9, c. 32. — Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.

Tiphysa, a daughter of Thestius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Tiresias, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, son of Egeus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which some authors have called as long as seven generations of men, others six, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Oedipus, and his sons sat on the throne of Thebes. It is said that in his youth he found two serpents in the act of copulation on mount Cyllene, and that when he had struck them with a stick to separate them, he found himself suddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again some serpents together in the same manner, and he recovered his original sex, by striking them a second time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tiresias had married, and it was from those reasons, according to some of the ancients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his decision, a dispute in which the deities wished to know which of the sexes received greater pleasure from the connubial state. Tiresias, who could speak from actual experience, decided in favour of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleasure which the female received was 10 times greater than that of the male. Juno, who supported a different opinion, and gave the superiority to the male sex, punished Tiresias by depriving him of his eyesight. But this dreadful loss was in some measure repaid by the humanity of Jupiter, who bestowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live seven times more than the rest of men. These causes of the blindness of Tiresias, which are supported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c., who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a punishment, because he had seen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the severity with which her son was treated; but the goddess, who well knew that this was the irrevocable punishment inflicted by Saturn on such mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddess without her consent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tiresias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a staff which could conduct his steps with as much safety as if he had the use of his eyesight. During his lifetime, Tiresias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or the language of birds, in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity, with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on mount Tilphusses, and honoured as a god. His oracle at Orchomenos was in universal esteem. Homer represents Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3. c. 6.—Theocrit. Id. 24. v. 70.—*Stat. Tissam, a mountain of Thessaly. Polyb.

Tissagoras, a brother of Miltiades, called also Stesagoras. C. Nep. in Mill.

Tisamones, or Tisamonus, a son of Orestes and Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidæ entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and he was obliged to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apollod. 2. c. 7.—Paus. 3. c. 1. l. 7. c. 1.—A king of Thebes, son of Thersander and grandson of Polynices. The Furies, who continually persecuted the house of Ædipus, permitted him to live in tranquillity, but they tormented his son and successor Autesion, and obliged him to retire to Doris. Paus. 3. c. 5. l. 9. c. 6.—A native of Elis, crowned twice at the Olympic games. Paus. 3. c. 11.

Tisandrus, one of the Greeks concealed with Ulysses in the wooden horse. Some suppose him to be the same as Thersander the son of Polynices. Virg. Æn. 2. v. 261.

Tisarchus, a friend of Agathocles, by whom he was murdered, &c. Polyæn. 5.

Tisdra, a town of Africa. Cæs. Afr. 76.

Tisdras, a town of Africa.

Tisias, an ancient philosopher of Sicily, considered by some as the inventor of rhetoric, &c. Cic. de Inv. 2. c. 2. Orat. 1. c. 18.

Tisiphone, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, who was the minister of divine vengeance upon mankind, and visited them with plagues and diseases, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's direction she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to retire to hell. Stat. Theb. 1. v. 59.—Virg. G. 3. 552. Æn. 6. v. 555.—Horat. 1. sat. 8. v. 34.—A daughter of Alcmaon and Manto.

Tisiphonius, a man who conspired against Alexander tyrant of Phœnæ, and seized the sovereign power, &c. Diod. 16.

Tissa, now Ranazzo, a town of Sicily. Sil. 14. v. 268. Cic. Verr. 3. c. 38.

Tisamenus. Vid. Tisamenus.

Tissaphernes, an officer of Darius.—A satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes, at the battle of Cunaxa, against Cyrus. It was by his valour and intrepidity that the king's forces gained the victory, and for this he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B.C. C. Nep.—An officer in the army of Cyrus, killed by Artaxerxes at the battle of Cunaxa. Plut.

TITĀA, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

TITAN, or TITĀNIUS, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus; but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and with the assistance of his brothers the Titans, he imprisoned him till he was replaced on the throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a Christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the ancient mythologists, such as Apollodorus, Hesiod, Hyginus, &c., have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian, to the sun by Virgil and Ovid, and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 10.—Juv. 14, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 11.—Orpheus, Hymn. 13.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 119.

TITĀNA, a town of Sicily in Peloponnesus. Titanus reigned there.—A man skilled in astronomy. Paus. 2, c. 11.

TITĀNES, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus six, and Hesiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The most known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus, to whom Horace adds Typhæus, Mimæ, Porphyryon, Rhœtus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologists reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic stature, and with proportionable strength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes, and armed them against their father. Saturn, with a scythe, cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himself to Terra, and threw them into the sea, and from the froth sprang a new deity, called Venus; as also Aleto, Tisiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn succeeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed by an oracle that he should be dethroned by them as a punishment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be observed, that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter. Hesiod. Theog. 135, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Æschyl. in Prom.—Callim. in Del. 17.—Diod. 1.—Hygin. pref. fab.

TITĀNIA, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as granddaughter of Titan, and likewise to Diana. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 395. l. 2, &c.

TITĀNIDES, the daughters of Cœlus and Terra; reduced in number to six, according to Orpheus. The most celebrated were Tethys, Themis, Dione, Thea, Mnemosyne, Ops, Cybele, Vesta, Phœbe, and Rhea. Hesiod. Theog. 145, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

TITĀNIUS, a river in Peloponnesus, with a town and mountain of the same name.

TITARESIUS, a river of Thessaly, called also Eurotas, flowing into the Teneus, but without mingling its thick and turbid waters with the transparent stream. From the unwholesomeness of its water, it was considered as deriving its source from the Styx. Lucan. 6, v. 376.—Homér. Il. 2, en. 258.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 18.

TITĀNIUS, a river of Colchis, falling into the Euxine sea. Apollon. 4.

TITHENIDIA, a festival of Sparta, in which parres, τῆνοια, conveyed male infants entrusted to their charge to the temple of Diana, where they sacrificed young pigs. During the time of the solemnity, they generally danced and exposed themselves in ridiculous postures; there were also some entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a separate portion allotted him, together with a small loaf, a piece of new cheese, part of the entrails of the victims, and figs, beans, and green vetches, instead of sweet-meats.

TITHŌNIUS, a son of Laomedon king of Troy, by Strymo the daughter of the Scamander. He was so beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Æmation. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddess granted it; but as he had forgotten to ask the vigour, youth, and beauty which he then enjoyed, he soon grew old, infirm, and decrepit; and as life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddess changed him into a cicada, or grasshopper. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447.—Æn. 4, v. 585. l. 8, v. 384.—Hesiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 462. l. 9, v. 403.—Horat. 1, od. 28. l. 1, od. 16.

TITHOREA, one of the tops of Parnassus. Herodot. 8, c. 32.

TITHRĀSTES, a Persian satrap, B.C. 395, ordered to murder Tissaphernes by Artaxerxes. He succeeded to the offices which the slaughtered favourite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Cimon.—An officer in the Persian court, &c.—The name was common to some of the superior officers of state in the court of Artaxerxes. Plut.—C. Nep. in Dat. & Canon.

TITIA, a deity among the Milesians.

TITIA lex, de magistratibus, by P. Titius the tribune, A.U.C. 710. It ordained that a triumvirate of magistrates should be invested with consular power to preside over the republic for five years. The persons chosen were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus.—Another, de provinciis, which required that the provincial questors, like the consuls and pretors, should receive their provinces by lot.

TITĀNA FLAVIA, the wife of the emperor Pertinax, disgraced herself by her debaucheries and incontinence. After the murder of her husband she was reduced to poverty, and spent the rest of her life in an obscure retreat.

TITĀNIUS ATTIL, a noble Roman put to death, A.D. 156, by the senate for aspiring to the purple. He was the only one proscribed during the reign of Antoninus Pius.—A brother of Otho.

TITIL, priests of Apollo at Rome, who observed the flight of doves, and drew omens from it. Varrus, de L. L. 4, c. 45.—Lucan. 1, v. 602.

Titinus, a tribune of the people in the first age of the republic.—A friend of Cassius, who killed himself.—One of the slaves who revolted at Capua. He betrayed his trust to the Roman generals.

Titus Proculus, a Roman knight, appointed to watch Messalina. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 35.—A tribune of the people who enacted the Titian law.

—An orator of a very dissolute character.—One of Pompey's murderers.—One of Antony's officers.

—A man who foretold a victory to Sylla.—Septimius, a poet in the Augustan age, who distinguished himself by his lyric and tragic compositions, now lost. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 9.

Titormus, a shepherd of Ætolia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious strength. He was stronger than his contemporary, Milo of Crotona, as he could lift on his shoulders a stone which the Crotonian moved with difficulty. Ælian. V. II. 12, c. 22.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.

Titurius, a friend of Julia Silana, who informed against Agrippina, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13.—A lieutenant of Caesar in Gaul, killed by Ambiorix.—Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 29, &c.

Titus Vespasianus, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valour in the Roman armies, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem. In the 77th year of the christian era, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reason to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the house of Vespasian, Titus had been distinguished for his extravagance and incontinence; his attendants were the most abandoned and dissolute; and it seemed that he wished to be superior to the rest of the world in the gratification of every impure desire, and in every unnatural vice. From such a private character, which still might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected but tyranny and oppression? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wish to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his usual profligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardour, even to render himself despised by the Roman people, was dismissed from his presence. When raised to the throne, he thought himself bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty; and Titus is, perhaps, the only monarch who, when invested with uncontrollable power, bade adieu to those vices, those luxuries and indulgences, which as a private man he never ceased to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refused the donations which were due to sovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and magnificent than Titus. All informers were banished from his presence, and even severely punished. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be postponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the sight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the sudden appearance of 5000 wild beasts brought into the circus for their amusement. To do good to his subjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no service, or granted no favour, one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of "My friends, I have lost a day!" A continual wish to be benevolent and kind, made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could say that he had rather die himself, than be the cause of the destruction of one of his subjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the senators conspired against his life, but the emperor disregarded their attempts; he made them his friends by kindness, and, like another Nerva, presented them with a sword to destroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, and the empire was visited by a pestilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conspicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their distresses by his liberal bounties, and as if they were but one family, he exerted himself for the good and preservation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favours of this magnificent prince. Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's house, his indisposition was increased by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modest submission complained of the severity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41st year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and 30 days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears, and all looked upon themselves as deprived of the most benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian ascended the throne, not without incurring the suspicion of having hastened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of snow, where he expired. Domitian has also been accused of raising commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with severity upon the cruelties which Titus exercised against the Jews; but though certainly a disgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we must consider him as an instrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the punishment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joseph. B. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Suetonius—Dial., &c.

Titus Tatius, a king of the Sabines. Vid. Tatius.—Livius, a celebrated historian. Vid. Livius.—A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.—A friend of Coriolanus.—A native of Crotona, engaged in Catiline's conspiracy.

Titurus, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c.—A large mountain of Crete.

Tityus, a celebrated giant, son of Terra; or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched Tichius, a name given to the top of mount Ceta. Liv. 36, c. 16.

Ticida, a Roman poet a few years before the age of Cicero, who wrote epigrams, and praised his mistress Metella under the fictitious name of Petilla. Orid. Trist. 2, v. 433.

Ticinus, now Tesino, a river near Ticinum, a small town of Italy, where the Romans were defeated by Annibal. The town of Ticinum was also called Pavia. The Ticinus falls into the Po. Strab. 5.—Ital. 4, v. 81.

Tidius, a man who joined Pompey, &c.

Tiessa, a river of Laconia, falling into the Eurotas. Paus. 3, c. 18.

Tifata, a mountain of Campania, near Capua. Stat. Sylv. 4.

Tifernum, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them, for distinction's sake, is called Metaurense, near the Metaurus, in Umbria; the other, Tiberinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Sammniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.—Plin. 3, c. 14.—Plin. sec. 4, ep. 1.

Tiferus, a mountain and river in the country of the Samnites. Plin. 3, c. 12.—Liv. 10, c. 30.—Nela, 3, c. 4.

Tigras, a son of Hercules.

Tigellinus, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conspirators who had leagued against Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honours. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to destroy himself, 68 A.D. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 79.—Plut.—Juv. 1.

Tigellius, a native of Sardinia, who became the favourite of J. Caesar, of Cleopatra and Augustus, by his mimicry and facetiousness. He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous disposition, and of unpleasant manners, as Horace, 1, sat. 2, v. 3 et seq. insinuates.

Tigranes, a king of Armenia, who made himself master of Assyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war against the Romans. He despised these distant enemies, and even ordered the head of the messenger to be cut off who first told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was soon abated, and though he ordered the Roman consul Lucullus to be brought alive into his presence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was soon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally disheartened him; he refused to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even set a price upon his head. His mean submission to Pompey, the successor of Lucullus in Asia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, insured him on his throne, and he received a garrison in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His second son of the same name revolted against him, and attempted to dethrone him with the assistance of the king of Parthia, whose daughter he had married. This did not succeed, and the son had recourse to the Romans, by whom he was put in possession of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The son was afterwards sent in chains to Rome, for his insolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—Val. Max. 5, c. 1. Paterc. 2, c. 33 & 37.—Justin. 40, c. 1 & 2. Plut. in Luc. Pomp. &c.—A king of Armenia in the reign of Tiberius.

He was put to death. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 40.—One of the royal family of the Cappadocians, chosen by Tiberius to ascend the throne of Armenia.—A general of the Medes.—A man appointed king of Armenia by Nero. Tacit. A. 14, c. 26.

—A prince of Armenia in the age of Theodosius.

Tigranocerta, now Serad, the capital of Armenia, was built by Tigranes, during the Mithridatic war, on a hill between the springs of the Tigris and mount Taurus. Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immense riches, and no less than 8000 talents in ready money. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 9.

Tigres, a river of Peloponnesus, called also Harpys, from a person of the same name drowned in it. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Tigris, now Babilensa, a river of Asia, rising on mount Niphates in Armenia, and falling into the Persian gulf. It is the eastern boundary of Mesopotamia. The Tigris now falls into the Euphrates, though in the age of Pliny the two separate channels of these rivers could be easily traced. Plin. 6, c. 27.—Justin. 42, c. 3.—Luca. 3, v. 256.

Tigurini, a warlike people among the Helvetii, now forming the modern cantons of Solis, Zurich, Schaffhausen, and St. Gall. Their capital was Tigurnum. Cat. Bell. G.

Tilatesi, a people of Thrace. Thucyd. 2.

Tilavemptus, a river of Italy falling into the Adriatic at the west of Aquileia.

Tilfosius, a mountain of Bœotia.—Also a fountain at the tomb of Tiresias. Paus. Bœot. 33.

Tilium, a town of Sardinia, now Argentara.

Tillius Cimber. Vid. Tillius.

Tiliox, a north-west cape of Corsica.

Tilphusius, a mountain of Bœotia.

Timachus, a river of Messia falling into the Danube. The neighbouring people were called Timachi. Plin. 3, c. 26.

Timee, the wife of Agis king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom she had a son. This child was rejected in the succession to the throne, though Agis, on his death-bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

Timæus, a friend of Alexander, who came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Curt. 9, c. 5.—An historian of Sicily, who flourished about 265 B.C., and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Agromachus. He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compositions are lost. Plut. in Nic.—Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.—A writer who published some treatises concerning ancient philosophers. Diog. in Emp.—A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locri. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatise on the nature and the soul of the world, in the Doric dialect, still extant. Plato in Tim.—Plut.—An Athenian in the age of Alcibiades. Plut.—A sophist, who wrote a book called Lexicon vocum Platonicarum.

Timagènes, a Greek historian of Alexandria, 54 B.C., brought to Rome by Gabinius, and sold as a slave to the son of Sylla. His great abilities procured him his liberty, and gained the favours of the great, and of Augustus. The emperor discarded him for his impertinence; and Timagenes, to revenge himself on his patron, burnt the interesting history which he had composed of his reign. Plut.—Horat. l. ep. 19, v. 15.—Quintil.—An historian and rhetorician of Miletus.—A man who wrote an account of the life of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 5.—A general, killed at Cheronæa.

Timagoras, an Athenian, capriciously punished for paying homage to Darius, according to the Persian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was sent to Persia as ambassador. Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Suidas.—Another. Vid. Meles.

Timandra, a daughter of Leda, sister to Helen. She married Echemus of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 5.—A mistress of Alcibiades.

Timandrides, a Spartan celebrated for his virtues. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 32.

Timanthes, a painter of Sicily, in the reign of Philip the father of Alexander the Great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, he represented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his superior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep sorrows of the father. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his disappointments could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.—An athlete of Cleone, who burnt himself when he perceived that his strength began to fail. Paus. 6, c. 8.

Timarchus, a philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprodes the disciple of Socrates. Ding.—A rhetorician, who hung himself when accused of licentiousness by Æschines.—A Cretan, accused before Nero of oppression. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 20.—An officer in Ætolia, who burnt his ships to prevent the flight of his companions, and to ensure himself the victory. Polyan. 5.—A king of Salamis.—A tyrant of Miletus, in the age of Antiochus, &c.

Timasion, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, &c.

Timasitheus, a prince of Lipara, who obliged a number of pirates to spare some Romans who were going to make an offering of the spoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were dispossessed of Lipara, the same generosity was nobly extended to his descendants in the island. Diod. 14.—Plut. in Cam.

Timävus, a broad river of Italy rising from a mountain, and, after running a short space, falling by seven mouths, or, according to some, by one, into the Adriatic sea. There are, at the mouth of the Timävus, small islands with hot springs of water. Meles, 2, c. 4.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 6.—Æn. 1, v. 44 & 248.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

Timæus, a native of Clazomenæ, who began to build Abdera. He was prevented by the Thracians, but honoured as a hero at Abdera. Herodot. 1, c. 168.

Timochæris, an astronomer of Alexandria, 294 B.C. Vid. Aristillus.

Timoclea, a Theban lady, sister to Theogenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbade his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

Timocles, two Greek poets of Athens, who wrote some theatrical pieces, the one six, and the other 11, some verses of which are extant. Athen. 6.—A statuary of Athens. Paus. 10, c. 34.

Timocrates, a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity.—A Syracusan who married Arete when Dion had been banished into Greece by Dionysius. He commanded the forces of the tyrant.

Timocreon, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic, prizes at Olympia. He lived about 475 years before Christ, distinguished for his voracity, and for his resentment against Simonides and Themistocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:

Multa bibens, et multa vorans, mala denique dicens

Multis, hic jaceo Timocreon Rhodius.

Timodæmus, the father of Timoleon.

Timodæus, a Spartan, intimate with Philocæmen, &c.—A son of the celebrated Zenobia.—A general of Alexander, put to death by the Thebans.

Timoleon, a celebrated Corinthian, son of Timodemus and Demariste. He was such an enemy to tyranny, that he did not hesitate to murder his own brother Timophanes, when he attempted, against his representations, to make himself absolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleasure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the most inveterate aversion for her son, and for ever banished him from her sight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a settled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refused to accept of any offices in the state. When the Syracusans, oppressed with the tyranny of Dionysius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had solicited the assistance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been disregarded, if one of the magistrates had not awakened in him the sense of natural liberty. "Timoleon," says he, "if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer." This had due effect, and Timoleon sailed for Syracuse in 10 ships, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppose him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Ictæas, who had the possession of the city, was defeated, and Dionysius, who despaired of success, gave himself up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This success gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily; many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impostor, claimed his protection; and when he was at last master of Syracuse by the total overthrow of Ictæas and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the seat of tyranny, and erected on the spot a common hall. Syracuse was almost destitute of inhabitants, and at the solicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was sent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houses were sold for 1000 talents, which were appropriated to the use of the state, and deposited in the treasury. When Syracuse was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other states of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and banished from the island. A code of salutary laws was framed for the Syracusans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raise commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at last re-established. The gratitude of the Sicilians was shown everywhere to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applause in the public assemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuse: his advice was consulted on matters of importance, and his authority respected. He ridiculed the accusations of malevolence, and when some informers had charged him with oppression, he rebuked the Syracusans who were going to put the accusers to immediate death. A remarkable instance of his providential escape from the dagger of an assassin, has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a sacrifice to the gods after a victory, two assassins, sent by the enemies, approached his person in disguise. The arm of one of the assassins was already lifted up, when he was suddenly stabled by an unknown person, who made his escape from the camp. The other assassin, struck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confessed, in the presence of the army, the conspiracy that had been formed against his life. The unknown assassin was in the mean time pursued, and when he was found, he declared that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had stabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Inquiries were made, and his confessions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuse, about 337 years before the christian era. His body received an honourable burial, in a public place called from him Timoleonium; but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the institution of festivals and games yearly to be observed on the day of his death. C. Nep. & Plut. in Vitâ.—Polyæn. 5, c. 3.—Diod. 16.

Timolus. Vid. Timolus.

Timonachus, a painter of Byzantium, in the age of Sylla and Marius. His painting of Medea murdering her children, and his Ajax, were purchased for 80 talents by J. Cæsar, and deposited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35, c. 11.—A general of Athens, sent to assist the Thebans. Xenoph.

Timon, a native of Athens, called Misanthrope, for his unconquerable aversion to mankind and to all society. He was fond of Apemantus, another Athenian whose character was similar to his own, and he said that he had some partiality for Alcibiades, because he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public assembly, and told his countrymen that he had a fig tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raise a building on the spot, he advised all such as were inclined to destroy themselves, to hasten and go and hang themselves in his garden. Plut. in Alc., &c.—Lucan. in Tim.—Paus. 6, c. 12.—A Greek poet, son of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote several dramatic pieces, all now lost, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog.—Athen. 6 & 13.—An athlete of Elis. Paus. 6, c. 12.

Timophanes, a Corinthian, brother to Timo-

leon. He attempted to make himself tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary soldiers with whom he had fought against the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wished to convince him of the impropriety of his measures, and when he found him unmoved, he caused him to be assassinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim.—A man of Mitylene, celebrated for his riches, &c.

Timotheus, a poet and musician of Miletus, son of Thersander or Philopolis. He was received with hisses the first time he exhibited as musician in the assembly of the people; and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides discovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profession in which he afterwards gained so much applause. He received the immense sum of 1000 pieces of gold from the Ephesians, because he had composed a poem in honour of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the Great. There was also another musician of Boeotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the musician of Miletus. He was a great favourite of the conqueror of Darius. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 15.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—Plut. de music. de fort., &c.—An Athenian general, son of Conon. He signalized himself by his valour and magnanimity, and showed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He seized Corcyra, and obtained several victories over the Thebans, but his ill success in one of his expeditions disgusted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the rest of his noble predecessors, was fined a large sum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was so disinterested, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own use, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treasury of Athens with 1500 talents. Some of the ancients, to imitate his continual successes, have represented him sleeping by the side of Fortune, while the goddess drove cities into his net. He was intimate with Plato, at whose table he learned temperance and moderation. Athen. 10, c. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 29.—Plut. in Syll., &c.—Elian. V. H. 2, c. 10 & 18. 1, c. 16.—C. Nep.—A Greek statuary. Paus. 1, c. 32.—A tyrant of Heraclea, who murdered his father. Diod. 16.—A king of the Sarpæi.

Timoxenus, a governor of Sicily, who betrayed his trust, &c. Polyæn.—A general of the Achæans.

Tingis, now Tangiers, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania, built by the giant Antæus. Sertorius took it, and as the tomb of the founder was near the place, he caused it to be opened, and found in it a skeleton six cubits long. This increased the veneration of the people for their founder. Plut. in Sert.—Mela, 1, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 1.—Sil. 3, v. 258.

Tinta, a river of Umbria, now Topino, falling into the Clitumnus. Strab. 5.—Sil. 8, v. 454.

Tipa, a town of Boeotia, where Hercules had a temple. Ovid. ep. 6, v. 48.—Paus. 9, c. 32.

Tiphys, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts, was son of Hagnius, or, according to some, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was chosen in his place. Orph.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Apollon.—Val. Flacc.—Paus. 9, c. 32.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.

Tiphysa, a daughter of Thestius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Tiræias, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, son of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which some authors have called as long as seven generations of men, others six, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his sons sat on the throne of Thebes. It is said that in his youth he found two serpents in the act of copulation on mount Cyllene, and that when he had struck them with a stick to separate them, he found himself suddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again some serpents together in the same manner, and he recovered his original sex, by striking them a second time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tiresias had married, and it was from those reasons, according to some of the ancients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his decision, a dispute in which the deities wished to know which of the sexes received greater pleasure from the connubial state. Tiresias, who could speak from actual experience, decided in favour of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleasure which the female received was 10 times greater than that of the male. Juno, who supported a different opinion, and gave the superiority to the male sex, punished Tiresias by depriving him of his eyesight. But this dreadful loss was in some measure repaired by the humanity of Jupiter, who bestowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live seven times more than the rest of men. These causes of the blindness of Tiresias, which are supported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callinachus, Propertius, &c., who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a punishment, because he had seen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the severity with which her son was treated; but the goddess, who well knew that this was the irrevocable punishment inflicted by Saturn on such mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddess without her consent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tiresias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a staff which could conduct his steps with as much safety as if he had the use of his eyesight. During his lifetime, Tiresias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or the language of birds, in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity, with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on mount Tilphuses, and honoured as a god. His oracle at Orchoemenos was in universal esteem. Homer represents Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. *Apollod. 3. c. 6.—Theocrit. Tiribases, an officer of Artaxerxes killed by the guards for conspiring against the king's life, B.C. 394. Plut. in Art.

Tirida, a town of Thrace where Diomedes lived. Plin. 4. c. 11.

Tiridates, a king of Parthia, after the expulsion of Phraates by his subjects. He was soon after deposed, and fled to Augustus in Spain.

Horat. 1. ad. 26.—A man made king of Parthia by Tiberius, after the death of Phraates, in opposition to Artabanus. Tacit. Ann. 6. &c.—A keeper of the royal treasures at Persepolis, who offered to surrender to Alexander the Great. Curt. 5. c. 5. &c.—A king of Armenia, in the reign of Nero.—A son of Phraates, &c.

Tiria, a general of the Thracians, who opposed Antiochus. Polyan. 4.

Tiro Tullius, a freedman of Cicero, greatly esteemed by his master for his learning and good qualities. It is said that he invented shorthand writing among the Romans. He wrote the life of Cicero and other treatises now lost. Cic. ad Att. &c.

Tirynthia, a name given to Alcmena, because she lived at Tirynthus. Ovid. Met. 6.

Tirynthus, a town of Argolis in the Peloponnesus, founded by Tiryntion son of Argus. Hercules generally resided there, whence he is called Tiryntion Hercules. Paus. 2. c. 16 & 25.—Plin. 4. c. 5.—Strab. V. H. 3. c. 15 & 49.—Virg. Æn. 7. v. 662.—Sill. 3. v. 217.

Tisabum, a mountain of Thessaly. Polyb.

Tisagoras, a brother of Miltiades, called also Stesagoras. C. Nep. in Mil.

Tisamones, or Tisamonus, a son of Orestes and Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidae entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and he was obliged to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apollod. 2. c. 7.—Paus. 3. c. 1. l. 7. c. 1.—A king of Thebes, son of Thersander and grandson of Polynices. The Furies, who continually persecuted the house of Œdipus, permitted him to live in tranquillity, but they tormented his son and successor Autseion, and obliged him to retire to Duris. Paus. 3. c. 5. l. 9. c. 6.—A native of Elis, crowned twice at the Olympic games. Paus. 3. c. 11.

Tisandrus, one of the Greeks concealed with Ulysses in the wooden horse. Some suppose him to be the same as Thersander the son of Polynices. Virg. Æn. 2. v. 261.

Tisarchus, a friend of Agathocles, by whom he was murdered, &c. Polyan. 5.

Tisdra, a town of Africa. Cæs. Afr. 76.

Tislarus, a town of Africa.

Tisias, an ancient philosopher of Sicily, considered by some as the inventor of rhetoric, &c. Cic. de Inv. 2. c. 2. Orat. 1. c. 18.

Tisiphōne, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, who was the minister of divine vengeance upon mankind, and visited them with plagues and diseases, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's direction she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to retire to hell. Stat. Theb. 1. v. 50.—Virg. G. 3. 552. Æn. 6. v. 555.—Horat. 1. sat. 8. v. 34.—A daughter of Alcæon and Manto.

Tisiphōnus, a man who conspired against Alexander tyrant of Phœria, and seized the sovereign power, &c. Diod. 16.

Tissa, now Ranuzzo, a town of Sicily. Sill. 14. v. 268. Cic. Verr. 3. c. 18.

Tissamēnus. Vid. Tisamenus.

Tissaphernes, an officer of Darius.—A

satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes, at the battle of Cunaxa, against Cyrus. It was by his valour and intrepidity that the king's forces gained the victory, and for this he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B.C. C. Nep.—An officer in the army of Cyrus, killed by Artaxerxes at the battle of Cunaxa. Plut.

TITŌA, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

TITAN, or TITĀNUS, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus; but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and with the assistance of his brothers the Titans, he imprisoned him till he was replaced on the throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the ancient mythologists, such as Apollodorus, Hesiod, Hyginus, &c., have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian, to the sun by Virgil and Ovid, and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 10.—Juv. 14, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 11.—Orpheus, Hymn. 13.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 119.

TITĀNA, a town of Sicily in Peloponnesus. Titanus reigned there.—A man skilled in astronomy. Paus. 2, c. 11.

TITĀNES, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus six, and Hesiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The most known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus, to whom Horace adds Typhorus, Mimas, Porphyryon, Rhœtus, and Epœcladus, who are by other mythologists reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic stature, and with proportionable strength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitted their misfortunes, and armed them against their father. Saturn, with a scythe, cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himself to Terra, and threw them into the sea, and from the froth sprang a new deity, called Venus; as also Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn succeeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed by an oracle that he should be dethroned by them as a punishment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be observed, that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter. Hesiod. Theog. 135, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Æschyl. in Prom.—Callim. in Del. 17.—Diod. 1.—Hygin. pref. fab.

TITĀNIA, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as granddaughter of Titan, and likewise to Diana. Met. 1, v. 395, l. 2, &c.

and Rhea. Hesiod. Theog. 145, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

TITĀNUS, a river in Peloponnesus, with a town and mountain of the same name.

TITĀREUS, a river of Thessaly, called also Eurotas, flowing into the Teneus, but without mingling its thick and turbid waters with the transparent stream. From the unwholesomeness of its water, it was considered as deriving its source from the Styx. Lucan. 6, v. 376.—Homer. Il. 2, c. 258.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 18.

TITĀNUS, a river of Colchis, falling into the Euxine sea. Apollon. 4.

TITHEIDIA, a festival of Sparta, in which αἰνῆτες, τίθηνας, conveyed male infants entrusted to their charge to the temple of Diana, where they sacrificed young pigs. During the time of the solemnity, they generally danced and exposed themselves in ridiculous postures; there were also some entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a separate portion allotted him, together with a small loaf, a piece of new cheese, part of the entrails of the victims, and figs, beans, and green vetches, instead of sweetmeats.

TITHŌNUS, a son of Laomedon king of Troy, by Strymo the daughter of the Scamander. He was so beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Emeathion. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddess granted it; but as he had forgotten to ask the vigour, youth, and beauty which he then enjoyed, he soon grew old, infirm, and decrepit; and as life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddess changed him into a cicada, or grasshopper. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447.—Æn. 4, v. 585, l. 8, v. 784.—Hesiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 461, l. 9, v. 403.—Horat. 1, ad. 28, l. 2, ad. 16.

TITHRAUSTES, a Persian satrap, B.C. 395, ordered to murder Tissaphernes by Artaxerxes. He succeeded to the offices which the slaughtered favourite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Cimón.—An officer in the Persian court, &c.—The name was common to some of the superior officers of state in the court of Artaxerxes. Plut.—C. Nep. in Dat. & Conon.

TITIA, a deity among the Milesians.

TITIA lex, de magistratibus, by P. Titius the tribune, A.U.C. 710. It ordained that a triumvirate of magistrates should be invested with consular power to preside over the republic for five years. The persons chosen were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus.—Another, de provinciis, which required that the provincial questors, like the consuls and pretors, should receive their provinces by lot.

TITĀNA FLAVIA, the wife of the emperor Pertinax, disgraced herself by her debaucheries and incontinence. After the murder of her husband she was reduced to poverty, and spent the rest of her life in an obscure retreat.

TITĀNUS ATTIL., a noble Roman put to death, A.D. 156, by the senate for aspiring to the purple. He was the only one proscribed during the reign of Antoninus Pius.—A brother of Otho.

TITIL, priests of Apollo at Rome, who observed the flight of doves, and drew omens from it. Varro, de L. L. 4, c. 45.—Lucan. 1, v. 602.

Titinius, a tribune of the people in the first ages of the republic.—A friend of Cassius, who killed himself.—One of the slaves who revolted at Capua. He betrayed his trust to the Roman generals.

Titus Proculus, a Roman knight, appointed to watch Messalina. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 35.—A tribune of the people who enacted the Titian law.—An orator of a very dissolute character.—One of Pompey's murderers.—One of Antony's officers.—A man who foretold a victory to Sylla.—Septimius, a poet in the Augustan age, who distinguished himself by his lyric and tragic compositions, now lost. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 9.

Titormus, a shepherd of Ætolia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious strength. He was stronger than his contemporary, Milo of Crotona, as he could lift on his shoulders a stone which the Crotonian moved with difficulty. Ælian. V. 11, c. 22.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.

Titurius, a friend of Julia Silana, who informed against Agrippina. Æc. Tacit. Ann. 13.—A lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul, killed by Ambiorix.—Cæsar. Bell. G. 5, c. 29, &c.

Titus Vespasianus, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valour in the Roman armies, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem. In the 7th year of the christian era, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reason to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the house of Vespasian, Titus had been distinguished for his extravagance and incontinence; his attendants were the most abandoned and dissolute; and it seemed that he wished to be superior to the rest of the world in the gratification of every impure desire, and in every unnatural vice. From such a private character, which still might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected but tyranny and oppression? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wish to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his usual profligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardour, even to render himself despised by the Roman people, was dismissed from his presence. When raised to the throne, he thought himself bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty; and Titus is, perhaps, the only monarch who, when invested with uncontrollable power, bade adieu to those vices, those luxuries and indulgencies, which as a private man he never ceased to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refused the donations which were due to sovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and magnificent than Titus. All informers were banished from his presence, and even severely punished. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be postponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the sight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the sudden appearance of 5000 wild beasts brought into the circus for their amusement. To do good to his subjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no service, or granted no favour, one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of "My friends, I have lost a day!" A continual wish to be benevolent and kind, made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could say that he had rather die himself, than be the cause of the destruction of one of his subjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the senators conspired against his life, but the emperor disregarded their attempts; he made them his friends by kindness, and, like another Nerva, presented them with a sword to destroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, and the empire was visited by a pestilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conspicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their distresses by his liberal bounties, and as if they were but one family, he exerted himself for the good and preservation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favours of this magnificent prince. Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's house, his indisposition was increased by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modest submission complained of the severity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41st year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and 20 days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears, and all looked upon themselves as deprived of the most benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian ascended the throne, not without incurring the suspicion of having hastened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of snow, where he expired. Domitian has also been accused of raising commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with severity upon the cruelties which Titus exercised against the Jews; but though certainly a disgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we must consider him as an instrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the punishment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joseph. B. J. 7, c. 10, &c.—Suetonius.—Dio., &c.

Titus Tatius, a king of the Sabines. Vid. Tatius.—Livius, a celebrated historian. Vid. Livius.—A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.—A friend of Coriolanus.—A native of Crotona, engaged in Catiline's conspiracy.

Titus, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c.—A large mountain of Crete.

Tityus, a celebrated giant, son of Terra; or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched on the ground. He had a small chapel with an altar in the island of Euboea. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Pind. Pyth. 4.—Homer. Od. 7, v. 325. l. II, v. 575.—Apollon. Rh. 1, v. 182, &c.—*Virg. Tium, or Tion, a maritime town of Paphlagonia, built by the Milesians. Mela, 1, c. 9.

Tlepölemus, a son of Hercules and Astyoehia, born at Argos. He left his native country after the accidental murder of Licymnius, and retired to Rhodes, by order of the oracle, where he was chosen king, as being one of the sons of Hercules. He went to the Trojan war with nine ships, and was killed by Sarpedon. There were some festivals established at Rhodes in his honour, called Tlepolemia, in which men and boys contended. The victors were rewarded with poplar crowns. Homer. Il.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Hygin. Fab. 97.—One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Carmania at the general division of the Macedonian empire. Diod. 18.—An Egyptian general, who flourished B.C. 207.

Tmarus, a Rutulian in the wars of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 685.—A mountain of Thesprotia, called Tmarus by Pliny.

Tmolus, a king of Lydia, who married Omphale, and was son of Sipyllus and Chthoia. He offered violence to a young nymph called Arriphe, at the foot of Diana's altar, for which impiety he was afterwards killed by a bull. The mountain on which he was buried bore his name. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 11, Jab. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 191.—A town of Asia Minor, destroyed by an earthquake.—A mountain of Lydia, now Bousdag, on which the river Pactolus rises. The air was so wholesome near Tmolus, that the inhabitants generally lived to their 150th year. The neighbouring country was very fertile, and produced many vines, saffron, and odoriferous flowers. Strab. 13, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 84, &c.—Ovid. Met. 2, c. 5.—Sil. 7, v. 210.—*Virg. Togata, an epithet applied to a certain part of Gaul where the inhabitants were distinguished by the peculiarity of their dress. Vid. Gallia.

Togonius Gallus, a senator of ignoble birth, devoted to the interest of Tiberius, whom he flattered. See Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 2.

Tolbiacum, a town of Gallia Belgica, south of Juliers.

Tolenus, a river of Latium, now Salto, falling into the Velinus. Ovid. Fast. 9, v. 561.

Toletum, now Toledo, a town of Spain on the Tago.

Tolistoboli, a people of Galatia in Asia, descended from the Boii of Gaul. Plin. 5, 32.—Liv. 58, c. 15 & 16.

Tollentinum, a town of Picenum. Plin. 3, c. 13.

Toxmidès, an Athenian officer, defeated and killed in a battle in Bœotia, 477 B.C. Polyam. 7.

Tolosa, now Toulouse, the capital of Languedoc, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, which became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was afterwards celebrated for the cultivation of the sciences. Minerva had there a rich temple, which Cæpio the consul plundered, and as he was never after fortunate, the words annum Tolosanum became proverbial. Cæs. Bell. G.—Mela, 2, c. 5.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.

Toluxum, an augur in the army of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 429.—A king of Veii, killed by Cor. Cossus after he had ordered the ambassadors of Rome to be assassinated. Liv. 4, c. 19.

Tolus, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

Tomæum, a mountain of Peloponnesus. Thucyd.

Tomærus, or Tmarus. Vid. Tmarus.

Tomisa, a country between Cappadocia and Taurus. Strabo.

Tomos, or Toml, a town situate on the western shore of the Euxine sea, about 36 miles from the mouth of the Danube. The word is derived from τεμνω, seco, because Medea, as it is said, cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus there. It is celebrated as being the place where Ovid was banished by Augustus. Tomos was the capital of Lower Mæsia, founded by a Milesian colony, B.C. 633.—Strab. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 14, v. 59.—Trist. 3, el. 9, v. 33, &c.

Tomylis. Vid. Thomyris.

Tonea, a solemnity observed at Samos. It was usual to carry Juno's statue to the sea-shore, and to offer cakes before it, and afterwards to replace it again in the temple. This was in commemoration of the theft of the Tyrrhenians, who attempted to carry away the statue of the goddess, but were detained in the harbour by an invisible force.

Tongillius, an avaricious lawyer, &c. Juv. 7, v. 139.

Topæos, an island in the Arabian gulf, anciently called Ophioles from the quantity of serpents that were there. The valuable stone called topaz is found there. Plin. 6, c. 20.

Topiris, or Toporus, a town of Thrace.

Torini, a people of Scythia. Valer. 6.

Torone, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 45.—Of Epirus.

Torquata, one of the vestal virgins, daughter of C. Silanus. She was a vestal for 64 years. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 69.

Torquatus, a surname of Titus Manlius. Vid. Manlius.—Silanus, an officer put to death by Nero.—A governor of Oricum, in the interest of Pompey. He surrendered to J. Cæsar, and was killed in Africa. Hist. Afric. 56.—An officer in Sylla's army.—A Roman sent ambassador to the court of Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt.

Tortox, a surname of Apollo. He had a statue at Rome under that name.

Torus, a mountain of Sicily, near Agrigentum.

Torvæ, a small town near Actium. The word in the language of the country signifies a saddle, which gave Cleopatra occasion to make a pun when it fell into the hands of Augustus. Plin. in Ant.

Toxandri, a people of Gallia Belgica. Plin. 4, c. 7.

Toxaridia, a festival at Athens, in honour of Toxaris, a Scythian hero who died there.

Toxeus, a son of Cæneus, killed by his father. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Toxiarato, a daughter of Thespius.

Q. Trabea, a comic poet at Rome, in the age of Regulus. Some fragments of his poetry remain. Cic. in Pusc. 4, c. 31. Fin. 2, c. 4.

Trachinus M. Galerius, a consul in the reign of Nero, celebrated for his eloquence as an orator, and for a majestic and commanding aspect.

Quintil.—Tacit.—One of the friends and ministers of Otho.

Trachas, a town of Latium. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 717.

Tráchinia, a small country of Phthiotis, on the bay of Malea, near mount Œta. The capital was called Trachis, or Trachina, where Hercules went after he had killed Enomus. Strab. 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 769.

Trachonitis, a part of Judæa, on the other side of the Jordan. Plin. 5, c. 14.

Tragurium, a town of Dalmatia on the sea.

Tragus, a river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus. Paus. 8, c. 33.

Trajanopolis, a town of Thrace.—A name given to Selinus of Cilicia, where Trajan died.

Trajanus M. Ulpius Optimus, a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. His great virtues, and his private as well as public character, and his services to the empire, both as an officer, a governor, and a consul, recommended him to the notice of Nerva, who solemnly adopted him as his son; invested him during his lifetime with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Caesar and Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany and the banks of the Danube. The noble and independent behaviour of Trajan evinced the propriety and goodness of Nerva's choice, and the attachment of the legions; and the new emperor seemed calculated to ensure peace and domestic tranquillity to the extensive empire of Rome. All the actions of Trajan showed a good and benevolent prince, whose virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyrist has paid. The barbarians continued quiet, and the hostilities which they generally displayed at the election of a new emperor whose military abilities they distrusted, were now few. Trajan, however, could not behold with satisfaction and unconcern the insolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The sudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers awed the barbarians to peace; but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, soon began hostilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country, by throwing a bridge across the rapid stream of the Danube, and a battle was fought in which the slaughter was so great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dress the wounds of the soldiers. Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus, despairing of success, destroyed himself, and Dacia became a province of Rome. That the ardour of the Roman soldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool, an expedition was undertaken into the east, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan passed through the submissive kingdom of Armenia, and, by his well-directed operations, made himself master of the provinces of Assyria and Mesopotamia. He extended his conquests in the east, he obtained victories over unknown nations; and when on the extremities of India, he lamented that he possessed not the vigour and youth of an Alexander, that he might add unexplored provinces and kingdoms to the Roman empire. These successes in different parts of the world gained applause, and the senators were profuse in the honours they decreed to the conqueror. This, however, was but the blaze of transient glory. Trajan had no sooner signified his intentions of returning to Italy, than the conquered barbarians appeared again in arms, and the Roman empire did not acquire one single acre of territory from the conquest of her sovereign in the east. The return of the emperor towards Rome was hastened by indisposition; he stopped in Cilicia, and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, he was seized with a flux, and a few days after expired, in the beginning of August, A.D. 117, after a reign of 19 years, six months, and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was succeeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empress Plotina introduced to the Roman armies, as the adopted son of her husband. The ashes of Trajan were carried to Rome, and deposited under the stately column which he had erected a few years before. Under this emperor the Romans enjoyed tranquillity, and for a moment supposed that their prosperity was complete under a good and virtuous sovereign. Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The sounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily bestowed upon a prince who was equal to the greatest generals of antiquity, and who, to indicate his affability, and his wish to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, distinguished his palace by the inscription of the public palace. Like other emperors, he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends, but rose from his seat and went cordially to salute them. He refused the statues which the flattery of favourites wished to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold, inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people; he appeared on foot, and showed himself an enemy to parade and an ostentatious equipage. When in his camp, he exposed himself to the fatigues of war, like the meanest soldier, and crossed the most barren deserts and extensive plains on foot, and in his dress and food displayed all the simplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. All the oldest soldiers he knew by their own name; he conversed with them with great familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had visited the camp, and by a personal attendance convinced himself of the vigilance and the security of his army. As a friend he was not less distinguished than as a general. He had a select number of intimates, whom he visited with freedom and openness, and at whose tables he partook many a moderate repast without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others, was, perhaps, carried to excess. His favourite Sura had once been accused of attempts upon his life, but Trajan disregarded the informer, and as he was that same day invited to the house of the supposed conspirator, he went thither early. To try further the sincerity of Sura, he ordered himself to be shaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his surgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are also celebrated; he opened free and easy communications between the cities of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furnished Rome with all the corn and provisions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was by his directions that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is still to be seen at Rome, under the name of Trajan's column.

The area on which it stands was made by the labours of men, and the height of the pillar proves that a large hill, 144 feet high, was removed at a great expense, A.D. 114, to commemorate the victories of the reigning prince. His persecutions of the christians were stopped by the interference of the humane Pliny, but he was unusually severe upon the Jews, who had barbarously murdered 200,000 of his subjects, and even fed upon the flesh of the dead. His vices have been obscurely seen through a reign of continued splendour and popularity, yet he is accused of incontinence and many unnatural indulgencies. He was too much addicted to drinking, and his wish to be styled lord has been censured by those who admired the dissimulated moderation and the modest claims of an Augustus. Plin. Paneg., &c.—Dio. Cass.—Eutrop.—Amnian.—Spartian.—Joseph. Bell. J.—Victor.—The father of the emperor, who likewise bore the name of Trajan, was honoured with the consulship and a triumph, and the rank of a patrician by the emperor Vespasian.—A general of the emperor Valens.—A son of the emperor Decius.

Trajectus Rheni, now Utrecht, the capital of one of the provinces of Holland.

Trales, a town of Lydia, now Sultanhisar. Juv. 3, v. 70.—Liv. 32, c. 45.—A people of Illyricum.

Transiberina, a part of the city of Rome, on one side of the Tiber. Mount Vatican was in that part of the city. Mart. 1, ep. 109.

Trapēzus, a city of Pontus, built by the people of Sinope, now called Trebizond. It had a celebrated harbour on the Euxine sea, and became famous under the emperors of the eastern empire, of which it was for some time the magnificent capital. Tacit. H. 3, c. 47.—Plin. 6, c. 4.—A town of Arcadia near the Apherus. It received its name from a son of Lycaon. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

Trasimenus. Vid. Thrasymenus.

Trasullus, a man who taught Tiberius astrology at Rhodes, &c.

Travulus Montanus, a Roman knight, one of Messalina's favourites, put to death by Claudius. Tacit. A. 11, c. 36.

Treba, a town of the Æqui. Plin. 3, c. 12.

C. Trebatius Testas, a man banished by Julius Caesar for following the interest of Pompey, and recalled by the eloquence of Cicero. He was afterwards reconciled to Caesar. Trebatius was not less distinguished for his learning than for his integrity, his military experience, and knowledge of law. He wrote nine books on religious ceremonies, and treatises on civil law; and the verses that he composed proved him a poet of no inferior consequence. Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 4.

Trebellianus C. Annius, a pirate who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, A.D. 264. He was defeated and slain in Isauria, by the lieutenants of Gallienus.

Trebellianus Rufus, a pretor appointed governor of the children of king Cotys, by Tiberius.—A tribune who opposed the Gabinian law.—A Roman who numbered the inhabitants of Gaul. He was made governor of Britain. Tacit. A. 6, c. 39.

Trebellius Pollio, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the lives of the emperors. The beginning of this history is lost; part of the reign of Valerian, and the life of the two Gallieni, with the 30 tyrants, are the only fragments remaining. He flourished A.D. 305.

Trebia, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, rising in the Apennines, and falling into the Po, at the west of Placentia. It is celebrated for the victory which Annibal obtained there over the forces of L. Sempronius the Roman consul. Sil. 4, v. 486.—Lucan. 2, v. 46.—Liv. 21, c. 54 & 55.—A town of Latium. Liv. 2, c. 39.—Of Campania. Id. 23, c. 14.—Of Umbria. Plin. 3, c. 14.

Trebius, an officer in Caesar's army in Gaul.—A parasite in Domitian's reign. Juv. 4.

Trebonia lex, de provinciis, by L. Trebonius the tribune, A.U.C. 698. It gave Caesar the chief command in Gaul for five years longer than was enacted by the Vatinian law, and in this manner prevented the senators from recalling or superseding him.—Another, by the same, on the same year, conferred the command of the provinces of Syria and Spain on Cassius and Pompey for five years. Dio. Cass. 39.—Another, by L. Trebonius the tribune, A.U.C. 305, which confirmed the election of the tribunes in the hands of the Roman people. Liv. 3 & 5.

Trebonius, a soldier remarkable for his continence, &c.—Caius, one of Caesar's friends, made through his interest pretor and consul. He was afterwards one of his benefactor's murderers. He was killed by Dolabella at Smyrna. Cas. Bell. 5, c. 17.—Cic. in Phil. 11, c. 2.—Patere. 56 & 69.—Liv. 119.—Dio. 47.—Horat. 1, sat. 4, v. 14.—Garcianus, a governor of Africa, who put to death the proconsul Clodius Macer, by Galba's orders. Tacit. H. 1, c. 7.—A tribune who proposed a law at Rome, and imprisoned Cato, because he opposed it.—One of the adherents of Marius.—A man caught in adultery, and severely punished in the age of Horace.

Trebulia, a town of the Sabines, celebrated for cheese. The inhabitants were called Trebulani. Cic. in Agr. 2, c. 25.—Liv. 23.—Plin. 3, c. 5 & 12.—Martial. 5, ep. 72.—Another, in Campania. Liv. 23, c. 39.

Trores, a river of Latium, falling into the Liris.

Tres Tabernæ, a place on the Appian road, where travellers took refreshment. Cic. A. 1, ep. 13, l. 2, ep. 10 & 11.

Trevēri, a town and people of Belgium, now called Triers. Mela, 3, c. 2.

Triaria, a woman well known for her cruelty. She was the wife of L. Vitellius. Tacit. H. 1 & 3.

T. Triarius, an orator commended by Cicero.—A friend of Pompey. He had for some time the care of the war in Asia against Mithridates, whom he defeated, and by whom he was afterwards beaten. He was killed in the civil wars of Pompey and Caesar. Cas. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 5.

Triballi, a people of Thrace, or, according to some, of Lower Mæsia. They were conquered by Philip the father of Alexander; and some ages after, they maintained a long war against the Roman emperors. Plin.

Triboci, a people of Alsace in Gaul. Tacit. in Germ. 28.

Tribulim, a town of Dalmatia.

Tribuni Plebis, magistrates at Rome, created in the year U.C. 261, when the people after a quarrel with the senators had retired to Mons Sacer. The two first were C. Licinius and L. Albinus, but their number was soon after raised to five, and 37 years after to 10, which remained fixed. Their office was annual, and as the first had been created on the 4th of the ides of December, that day was ever after chosen for the election. Their power, though at first small, and granted by the patricians to appease the momentary seditions of the populace, soon became formidable, and the senators repented too late of having consented to elect magistrates, who not only preserved the rights of the people, but could summon assemblies, propose laws, stop the consultations of the senate, and even abolish their decrees by the word Veto. Their approbation was also necessary to confirm the senatus consulta, and this was done by affixing the letter T under it. If any irregularity happened in the state, their power was almost absolute; they criticized the conduct of all the public magistrates, and even dragged a consul to prison, if the measures he pursued were hostile to the peace of Rome. The dictator alone was their superior, but when that magistrate was elected, the office of tribune was not, like that of all other inferior magistrates, abolished while he continued at the head of the state. The people paid them so much deference, that their person was held sacred, and thence they were always called Sacrosancti. To strike them was a capital crime, and to interrupt them while they spoke in the assemblies, called for the immediate interference of power. The marks by which they were distinguished from other magistrates were not very conspicuous. They wore no particular dress, only a beadle called viator marched before them. They never sat in the senate, though, some time after, their office entitled them to the rank of senators. Yet, great as their power might appear, they received a heavy wound from their number, and as their consultations and resolutions were of no effect if they were not all unanimous, the senate often took advantage of their avarice, and by gaining one of them by bribes, they, as it were, suspended the authority of the rest. The office of tribune of the people, though at first deemed mean and servile, was afterwards one of the first steps that led to more honourable employments, and as no patrician was permitted to canvass for the tribuneship, we find many that descended among the plebeians to exercise that important office. From the power with which they were at last invested by the activity, the intrigues, and continual applications of those who were in office, they became almost absolute in the state, and it has been properly observed, that they caused far greater troubles than those which they were at first created to silence. Sylla, when raised to the dictatorship, gave a fatal blow to the authority of the tribunes, and by one of his decrees, they were no longer permitted to harangue and inflame the people; they could make no laws; no appeal lay to their tribunal; and such as had been tribunes were not permitted to solicit for the other offices of the state. This disgrace, however, was but momentary; at the death of the tyrant the tribunes recovered their privileges by means of Cotta and Pompey the Great. The office of tribune remained in full force till the age of Augustus, who, to make himself more absolute, and his person sacred, conferred the power and office upon himself, whence he was called tribunitiâ potestate donatus. His successors on the throne imitated his example, and as the emperor was the real and official tribune, such as were appointed to the office were merely nominal without power or privilege. Under Constantine the tribuneship was totally abolished. The tribunes were never permitted to sleep out of the city, except at the Feria Latine, when they went with other magistrates to offer sacrifices upon a mountain near Alba. Their houses were always open, and they received every complaint, and were ever ready to redress the wrongs of their constituents. Their authority was not extended beyond the walls of the city.—There were also other officers who bore the name of tribunes, such as the tribuni militum or militares, who commanded a division of the legions. They were empowered to decide all quarrels that might arise in the army; they took care of the camp, and gave the watch-word. There were only three at first, chosen by Romulus, but the number was at last increased to six in every legion. After the expulsion of the Tarquins, they were chosen by the consuls; but afterwards the right of electing them was divided between the people and the consuls. They were generally of senatorian and equestrian families, and the former were called latulavii, and the latter angustulavii, from their peculiar dress. Those that were chosen by the consuls were called Rutuli, because the right of the consuls to elect them was confirmed by Rutulus, and those elected by the people were called Comitiati, because chosen in the Comitia. They wore a golden ring, and were in office no longer than six months. When the consuls were elected, it was usual to choose 14 tribunes from the knights, who had served five years in the army, and who were called juniores, and 10 from the people who had been in 10 campaigns, who were called seniores.—There were also some officers called tribuni militum consulari potestate, elected instead of consuls, A.U.C. 310. They were only three originally, but the number was afterwards increased to six or more, according to the will and pleasure of the people and the emergencies of the state. Part of them were plebeians, and the rest of patrician families. When they had subsisted for about 70 years, not without some interruption, the office was totally abolished, as the plebeians were admitted to share the consulship, and the consuls continued at the head of the state till the end of the commonwealth.—The tribuni cohortium prætorianarum were entrusted with the person of the emperor, which they guarded and protected.—The tribuni ærarii were officers chosen from among the people, who kept the money which was to be applied to defray the expenses of the army. The richest persons were always chosen, as much money was requisite for the pay of the soldiers. They were greatly distinguished in the state, and they shared with the senators and Roman knights the privileges of judging. They were abolished by Julius Cæsar, but Augustus re-established them, and created 200 more, to decide causes of smaller importance.—The tribuni celerum had the command of the guard which Romulus chose for the safety of his person. They were 100 in number, distinguished for their probity, their opulence, and their nobility.—The tribuni voluptatum were commissioned to take care of the amusements which were prepared for the people, and that nothing might be wanting in the exhibitions. This office was also honourable.

Tricala, a fortified place at the south of Sicily, between Selinus and Agrigentum. Sil. 14, v. 271.

Tricasses, a people of Champagne in Gaul.
Tricastini, a people of Gallia Narbonensis. Sil. 3, v. 466.—Liv. 21, c. 31.

Tricoeo, a town of Thessaly, where Æsculapius had a temple. The inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Liv. 32, c. 13.—Homer. Il.—Plin. 4, c. 8.

Trichonium, a town of Ætolia.

Tricipitinus. Vid. Lucretius.

Triclaris, a yearly festival celebrated by the inhabitants of three cities in Jonis, to appease the anger of Diana Triclaris, whose temple had been defiled by the adulterous commerce of Menalippus and Cometho. It was usual to sacrifice a boy and a girl, but this barbarous custom was abolished by Euryphilus. The three cities were Aroe, Messatis, and Anthea, whose united labours had erected the temple of the goddess. Paus. 7, 19.

Tricorii, a people of Gaul, now Dauphiné. Liv. 21, c. 31.

Tricorythus, a town of Attica.

Tricræna, a place of Arcadia, where, according to some, Mercury was born. Paus. 8, c. 16.

Tridentum, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, now called Trent, and famous in history for the ecclesiastical council which sat there 18 years to regulate the affairs of the church, A. D. 1545.

Trieterica, festivals in honour of Bacchus celebrated every three years. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 392.

Tripanum, a place of Latium near Sinuessæ. Liv. 8, c. 11.

Tripollus, a mountain of Campania famous for wine. Mart. 13, ep. 204.—Plin. 14, c. 7.

Trigemina, one of the Roman gates, so called because the three Horatii went through it against the Curatii. Liv. 4, c. 26. L. 35, c. 41. L. 40, c. 51.

Trinæria, or Trinæria, one of the ancient names of Sicily from its triangular form. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 384, &c.

Trinuntium, a river of Italy falling into the Adriatic.

Trinobantes, a people of Britain in modern Essex and Middlesex. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 31.—Cæs. G. 5, c. 20.

Triocæla, or Triocæla, a town in the southern parts of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 271.

Triopas, or Triops, a son of Neptune by Canace the daughter of Eolus. He was father of Iphimedia and of Erisichthon, who is called on that account Triopæus, and his daughter Triopæia. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 754.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—A son of Phorbas, father to Agenor, Jasus, and Messene. Homer. Hymn. in Ap. 211.—A son of Piranthus.

Triphylia, one of the ancient names of Elis. Liv. 28, c. 8.—A mountain where Jupiter had a temple in the island Panchæia, whence he is called Triphylus.

Triopium, a town of Caria.

Trioplis, an ancient town of Phœnicia, built by the liberal contribution of Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus, whence the name.—A town of Pontus.—A district of Arcadia.—of Laconia. Liv. 35, c. 27.—Of Thessaly. Id. 47, c. 53.—A town of Lydia or Caria.—A district of Africa between the Syrtes.

Trippöllomus, a son of Oceanus and Terra, or, according to some, of Trochilus, a priest of Argos. According to the more received opinion he was son of Celeus king of Attica by Nereæ, whom some have called Metanira, Corhœa, Hyonæ, Melani, or Polymnia. He was born at Eleusis in

Attica, and was cured in his youth of a severe illness by the care of Ceres, who had been invited into the house of Celeus, by the monarch's children, as she travelled over the country in quest of her daughter. To repay the kindness of Celeus, the goddess took particular notice of his son. She fed him with her own milk, and placed him on burning coals during the night, to destroy whatever particles of mortality he had received from his parents. The mother was astonished at the uncommon growth of her son, and she had the curiosity to watch Ceres. She disturbed the goddess by a sudden cry, when Triptolemus was laid on the burning ashes, and as Ceres was therefore unable to make him immortal, she taught him agriculture, and rendered him serviceable to mankind, by instructing him how to sow corn, and make bread. She also gave him her chariot, which was drawn by two dragons, and in this celestial vehicle he travelled all over the earth, and distributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world. In Scythia the favourite of Ceres nearly lost his life; but Lyncus the king of the country, who had conspired to murder him, was changed into a lynx. At his return to Eleusis, Triptolemus restored Ceres her chariot, and established the Eleusinian festivals and mysteries in honour of the deity. He reigned for some time, and after death received divine honours. Some suppose that he accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition. *Diod.—Hygin. Triquætra a name given to Sicily by the Latins, for its triangular form. Lucret. 1, v. 78.

Tritia, a daughter of the river Triton, mother of Menalippus by Mars.—A town in Achaia, built by her son, bore her name. Paus. 7, c. 21.

Trigonus, a surname of Pallas. Hesiod.—Festus de V. Sig.

Triton, a sea deity, son of Neptune by Amphitrite, or, according to some, by Celæno, or Salacia. He was very powerful among the sea deities, and could calm the ocean and abate storms at pleasure. He is generally represented as blowing a shell. His body above the waist is like that of a man, and below a dolphin. Some represent him with the fore feet of a horse. Many of the sea deities are called Tritons, but the name is generally applied to those only who are half men and half fishes. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 930.—*Ovid. Tritonis, a lake and river of Africa, near which Minerva had a temple, whence she is surnamed Tritonis, or Tritonia. Herodot. 4, c. 178.—Paus. 9, c. 33.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 171.—Met. 1, c. 7.—Athens is also called Tritonis, because dedicated to Minerva.—Ovid. Met. 5.

Tritonum, a town of Doris. Liv. 28, c. 7.

Triventum, a town of the Sannites.

Trivia, a surname given to Diana, because she presided over all places where three roads met. At the new moon the Athenians offered her sacrifices, and a sumptuous entertainment, which was generally distributed among the poor. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13. l. 7, v. 774.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 416.—Fast. 1, v. 389.

Trivis antrum, a place in the valley of Arica, where the nymph Egeria resided. Mart. 6, c. 47.

Trivis lucus, a place of Campania, in the bay of Cumæ. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13.

Trivium, a town in the country of the Hirpini in Italy. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 79.

Triumviri, reipublicæ constituendæ, were three magistrates appointed equally to govern the Roman state with absolute power. These officers gave a fatal blow to the expiring independence of the Roman people, and became celebrated for their different pursuits, their ambition, and their various fortunes. The first triumvirate, B.C. 60, was in the hands of J. Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, who at the expiration of their office kindled a civil war. The second and last triumvirate, B.C. 43, was under Augustus, M. Antony, and Lepidus, and through them the Romans totally lost their liberty. Augustus disagreed with his colleagues, and after he had defeated them, he made himself absolute in Rome. The triumvirate was in full force at Rome for the space of about 12 years.—There were also officers who were called triumviri capitales, created A.U.C. 464. They took cognizance of murders and robberies, and everything in which slaves were concerned. Criminals under sentence of death were entrusted to their care, and they had then executed according to the commands of the pretors.—The triumviri nocturni watched over the safety of Rome in the night-time, and in case of fire were ever ready to give orders, and to take the most effectual measures to extinguish it.—The triumviri agrarii had the care of colonies that were sent to settle in different parts of the empire. They made a fair division of the lands among the citizens, and exercised over the new colony all the power which was placed in the hands of the consuls at Rome.—The triumviri monetales were masters of the mint, and had the care of the coin, hence their office was generally intimated by the following letters often seen on ancient coins and medals: H.V.I.R. A. A. F. F. I. e., Triumviri auro, argento, ære fiando, feriendo. Some suppose that they were created only in the age of Cicero, as those who were employed before them were called Denariorum feneratorum curatores.

—The triumviri valetudinis were chosen when Rome was visited by a plague or some pestiferous distemper, and they took particular care of the temples of health and virtue.—The triumviri senatus legendi were appointed to name those that were most worthy to be made senators from among the plebeians. They were first chosen in the age of Augustus, as before this privilege belonged to the kings, and afterwards devolved upon the consuls and the censors, A.U.C. 310.—The triumviri mensarii were chosen in the second Punic war, to take care of the coin and prices of exchange.

Triumvirorum insula, a place on the Rhine which falls into the Po, where the triumvirs Antony, Lepidus, and Augustus met to divide the Roman empire after the battle of Mutina. Dio. 46, c. 55.—Appian. Civ. 4.

Troades, the inhabitants of Troas.

Troas, a country of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, of which Troy was the capital. When Troas is taken for the whole kingdom of Priam, it may be said to contain Mysia and Phrygia Minor; but if only applied to that part of the country where Troy was situate, its extent is confined within very narrow limits. Troas was anciently called Dardania. Vid. Troja.

Trochois, a lake in the island of Delos, near which Apollo and Diana were born.

Trocmi, a people of Galatia. Liv. 38, c. 16.

Troesène a town of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, near the Saronicus Sinus, which received its name from Træzen the son of Pelops, who reigned there for some time. It is often called Thesæis, because Theseus was born there; and Potitonia, because Neptune was worshipped there. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 81.—Paus. 2, c. 50.—Plut. in Thest.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 556. l. 15, v. 296.—Another town at the south of the Peloponnesus.

Trogillus, three small islands near Samos.

Trogillum, a part of mount Mycale, projecting into the sea. Strab. 14.

Trogilus, a harbour of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 2, 59.

Troglodyte, a people of Æthiopia, who dwell in caves (τρογυραν σπεκος, δουμυ σπηλαι). They were all shepherds, and had their wives in common. Strab. 7.—Mela. 1, c. 4 & 8.—Plin. 1, c. 8. l. 37, c. 10.

Trogus Pompeius, a Latin historian, B.C. 41, born in Gaul. His father was one of the friends and adherents of J. Cæsar, and his ancestors had obtained privileges and honours from the most illustrious of the Romans. Trogus wrote a universal history of all the most important events that had happened from the beginning of the world to the age of Augustus, divided into 44 books. This history, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance, was epitomized by Justin, and is still extant. Some suppose that the epitome is the cause that the original of Trogus is lost. Justin. 47, c. 5.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 6.

Troja, a city, the capital of Troas, or, according to others, a country of which Ilium was the capital. It was built on a small eminence near mount Ida, and the promontory of Sigæum, at the distance of about four miles from the sea-shore. Dardanus the first king of the country built it, and called it Dardania, and from Troas, one of his successors, it was called Troja, and from Ilius, Ilium. Neptune is also said to have built, or more properly repaired, its walls, in the age of king Laomedon. This city has been celebrated by the poems of Homer and Virgil, and of all the wars which have been carried on among the ancients, that of Troy is the most famous. The Trojan war was undertaken by the Greeks, to recover Helen, whom Paris the son of Priam king of Troy had carried away from the house of Menelaus. All Greece united to avenge the cause of Menelaus, and every prince furnished a certain number of ships and soldiers. According to Euripides, Virgil, and Lycophron, the armament of the Greeks amounted to 1000 ships. Homer mentions them as being 1186, and Thucydides supposes that they were 1200 in number. The number of men which these ships carried is unknown; yet, as the largest contained about 120 men each, and the smallest 50, it may be supposed that no less than 100,000 men were engaged in this celebrated expedition. Agamemnon was chosen general of all these forces; but the princes and kings of Greece were admitted among his counsellors, and by them all the operations of the war were directed. The most celebrated of the Grecian princes that distinguished themselves in this war, were Achilles, Ajax, Menelaus, Ulysses, Diomedes, Protesilaus, Patroclus, Agamemnon, Nestor, Neoptolemus, &c. The Grecian army was opposed by a more numerous force. The king of Troy received assistance from the neighbouring princes in Asia Minor, and reckoned among his most active generals, Rhesus king of Thrace, and Memnon, who entered the field with 20,000 Assyrians and Ethiopians. Many of the adjacent cities were reduced and plundered before the Greeks approached their walls; but when the siege was begun, the enemies on both sides gave proofs of valour and intrepidity. The army of the Greeks, however, was visited by a plague, and the operations were not less retarded by the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles. The loss was great on both sides; the most valiant of the Trojans, and particularly of the sons of Priam, were slain in the field; and, indeed, so great was the slaughter, that the rivers of the country are represented as filled with dead bodies and suits of armour. After the siege had been carried on for 10 years, some of the Trojans, among whom were Æneas and Antenor, betrayed the city into the hands of the enemy, and Troy was reduced to ashes. The poets, however, support that the Greeks made themselves masters of the place by artifice. They secretly filled a large wooden horse with armed men, and led away their army from the plains, as if to return home. The Trojans brought the wooden horse into their city, and in the night, the Greeks that were confined within the sides of the animal rushed out and opened the gates to their companions, who had returned from the place of their concealment. The greatest part of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the others carried away by the conquerors. This happened, according to the Arundelian marbles, about 1184 years before the Christian era, in the 3530th year of the Julian period, on the night between the 11th and 12th of June, 408 years before the first Olympiad. Some time after, a new city was raised, about 30 stadia from the ruins of the old Troy; but though it bore the ancient name, and received ample donations from Alexander the Great, when he visited it in his Asiatic expedition, yet it continued to be small, and in the age of Strabo it was nearly in ruins. It is said that J. Cæsar, who wished to pass for one of the descendants of Æneas, and consequently to be related to the Trojans, intended to make it the capital of the Roman empire, and to transport there the senate and the Roman people. The same apprehensions were entertained in the reign of Augustus, and according to some, an ode of Horace, Iustum et tenacem propositi virum, was written purposely to dissuade the emperor from putting into execution so wild a project. Vid. Paris, Æneas, Antenor, Agamemnon, Ilium, Laomedon, Menelaus, &c. Virg. Æn. — Homer. — Ovid. — Diod., &c.

Trojani and Trojogènes, the inhabitants of Troy.

Trojandi ludii, games instituted by Æneas, or his son Ascanius, to commemorate the death of Anchises, and celebrated in the circus at Rome. Boys of the best families, dressed in a neat manner, and accoutred with suitable arms and weapons, were permitted to enter the list. Sylla exhibited them in his dictatorship, and under Augustus they were observed with unusual pomp and solemnity. A mock fight on horseback, or sometimes on foot, was exhibited. The leader of the party was called princeps juvenutis, and was generally the son of a senator, or the heir apparent to the empire. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 603. — Sueton. in Cas. & in Aug. — Plut. in Syll.

Troilus, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Achilles during the Trojan war. Apollod. 3, c. 12. — Horat., 2, od. 9, v. 16. — Virg. Æn. 1, v. 474.

Tromentina, one of the Roman tribes. Liv. 6, c. 5.

Tropsæ, a town of the Bruttii. — A stone monument on the Pyrenees, erected by Pompey. — Drusi, a town of Germany where Drusus died, and Tiberius was saluted emperor by the army.

Trophonius, a celebrated architect, son of Erginus king of Orchomenos in Bœotia. He built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the assistance of his brother Agamedes, and when he demanded of the god a reward for his trouble, he was told by the priestess to wait eight days, and to live during that time with all cheerfulness and pleasure. When the days were passed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. According to Pausanias, however, he was swallowed up alive in the earth; and when afterwards the country was visited by a great drought, the Bœotians were directed to apply to Trophonius for relief, and to seek him at Lebæda, where he gave oracles in a cave. They discovered this cave by means of a swarm of bees, and Trophonius told them how to ease their misfortunes. From that time Trophonius was honoured as a god; he passed for the son of Apollo, a chapel and a statue were erected to him, and sacrifices were offered to his divinity when consulted to give oracles. The cave of Trophonius became one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required, and the suppliant was obliged to make particular sacrifices, to anoint his body with oil, and to bathe in the waters of certain rivers. He was to be clothed in a linen robe, and, with a cake of honey in his hand, he was directed to descend into the cave by a narrow entrance, from whence he returned backwards after he had received an answer. He was always pale and dejected at his return, and thence it became proverbial to say of a melancholy man, that he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius. There were annually exhibited games in honour of Trophonius at Lebæda. Paus. 9, c. 37, &c. — Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47. — Plut. — Plin. 34, c. 7. — Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 45.

Tros, a son of Erichonius king of Troy, who married Callirhoe the daughter of the Scamander, by whom he had Ilius, Assaracus, and Ganymedes. He made war against Nantalus king of Phrygia, whom he accused of having stolen away the youngest of his sons. The capital of Phrygia was called Troja from him, and the country itself Troas. Virg. 3, G. v. 36. — Homer. Il. 20, v. 219. — Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Trossulum, a town of Etruria, which gave the name of Trossuli to the Roman knights who had taken it without the assistance of foot soldiers. Plin. 32, c. 2. — Senec. ep. 86 & 87. — Pers. 1, v. 82.

Trotillum, a town of Sicily. Thucyd. 6.
Trentum, or Truentinum, a river of Picenum, falling into the Adriatic. There is also a town of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 8, v. 434. — Meta, 2. — Plin. 3, c. 13.

Trypherus, a celebrated cook, &c. Yoo 11.
Tryphodorus, a Greek poet and grammarian of Egypt in the sixth century, who wrote a poem in 24 books on the destruction of Troy, from which he excluded the  $\alpha$  in the first book, the  $\beta$  in the second, and the  $\gamma$  in the third, &c.

Tryphon, a tyrant of Asamea in Syria, put to death by Antiochus. Justin. 36, c. 1.—A surname of one of the Ptolemies. Ælian. V. II. 14, v. 31.—A grammarian of Alexander in the age of Augustus.

Tubantes, a people of Germany. Tacit. 1, c. 41.

Tubero Q. Ælius, a Roman consul, son-in-law of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus. He is celebrated for his poverty, in which he seemed to glory as well as the rest of his family. Sixteen of the Tuberos, with their wives and children, lived in a small house, and maintained themselves with the produce of a little field, which they cultivated with their own hand. The first piece of silver plate that entered the house of Tubero was a small cup which his father-in-law presented to him after he had conquered the king of Macedonia.—A learned man.—A governor of Africa.—A Roman general who marched against the Germans under the emperors. He was accused of treason, and acquitted.

Turburbo two towns of Africa, called Major and Minor.

Tucca Plautius, a friend of Horace and Virgil. He was, with Varus and Plotius, ordered by Augustus, as some report, to revise the Æneid of Virgil, which remained uncorrected on account of the premature death of the poet. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 40, sat. 10, v. 84.—A town of Mauritania.

Tuccia, an immodest woman in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 64.

Tucia, a river near Rome. Sil. 13, v. 5.

Tuder, or Tudertina, an ancient town of Umbria. The inhabitants were called Tudertes. Sil. 4, v. 222.

Tudri, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

Tugia, now Toia, a town of Spain. Plin. 3, c. 1.

Tugini, or Tugēni, a people of Germany.

Tugurinus Jul., a Roman knight who conspired against Nero, &c. Tacit. H. 15, c. 70.

Tuisto, a deity of the Germans, son of Terra, and the founder of the nation. Tacit. de Germ. 2.

Tulcia, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean, now Francoli.

Tulingi, a people of Germany between the Rhine and the Danube. Cæs. 1, c. 5. B. G.

Tulla, one of Camilla's attendants in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 656.

Tullia, a daughter of Servius Tullius king of Rome. She married Tarquin the Proud, after she had murdered her first husband Arunx, and consented to see Tullius assassinated, that Tarquin might be raised to the throne. It is said that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown all mangled and bloody into one of the streets of Rome. She was afterwards banished from Rome with her husband. Ovid. in Ib. 363.—Another daughter of Servius Tullius, who married Tarquin the Proud. She was murdered by her own husband, that she might marry her ambitious sister of the same name.—A daughter of Cicero. Vid. Tulliola.—A debauched woman. Juv. 6, v. 306.

Tullia lex, de senatu, by M. Tullius Cicero, A.U.C. 689, enacted that those who had a libera legatio granted them by the senate, should hold it no more than one year. Such senators as had a libera legatio travelled through the provinces of the empire without any expense, as if they were employed in the affairs of the state.—Another, de ambitu, by the same, the same year. It forbade any person, two years before he canvassed for an office, to exhibit a show of gladiators, unless that case had devolved upon him by will. Senators guilty of the crime of ambitus were punished with the aque et ignis interdictio for 30 years, and the penalty inflicted on the commons was more severe than that of the Calpurnian law.

Tullianum, a subterraneous prison in Rome, built by Servius Tullius, and added to the other called Kober, where criminals were confined. Salsust. in B. Cattil.

Tulliola, or Tullia, a daughter of Cicero by Terentia. She married Caius Piso, and afterwards Furius Crassipes, and lastly P. Corn. Dolabella. With this last husband she had every reason to be dissatisfied. Dolabella was turbulent, and consequently the cause of much grief to Tullia and her father. Tullia died in child-bed, about 44 years before Christ. Cicero was so inconsolable on this occasion, that some have accused him of an unnatural partiality for his daughter. According to a ridiculous story which some of the moderns report, in the age of Pope Paul III., a monument was discovered on the Appian road with the superscription of Tulliola filie mee. The body of a woman was found in it, which was reduced to ashes as soon as touched; there was also a lamp burning, which was extinguished as soon as the air gained admission there, and which was supposed to have been lighted above 1500 years. Cic.—Plut. in Cic.

Tullius Cimber, the son of a freedman, rose to great honours, and followed the interest of Pompey. He was reconciled to J. Caesar, whom he murdered with Brutus. Plut.—Cicero, a celebrated orator. Vid. Cicero.—The son of the orator Cicero. Vid. Cicero.—Servius, a king of Rome. Vid. Servius.—Senecio, a man accused of conspiracy against Nero with Piso.—A friend of Otho.—One of the kings of Rome. Vid. Servius.

Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome after the death of Numa. He was of a warlike and active disposition, and signalized himself by his expedition against the people of Alba, whom he conquered, and whose city he destroyed after the famous battle of the Horatii and Curiatii. He afterwards carried his arms against the Latins and the neighbouring states with success, and enforced reverence for majesty among his subjects. He died with all his family, about 640 years before the Christian era, after a reign of 32 years. The manner of his death is not precisely known. Some suppose that he was killed by lightning, while he was performing some magical ceremonies in his own house; or, according to the more probable accounts of others, he was murdered by Ancus Martius, who set fire to the palace, to make it be believed that the impiety of Tullus had been punished by heaven. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 814.—Liv. 1, c. 22.—Paus.—A consul, A.U.C. 686. Horat. 3, od. 8, v. 12.

Tunēta, or Tunis, a town of Africa, near which Regulus was defeated and taken by Xanthippus. Liv. 30, c. 9.

Tungri, a name given to some of the Germans, supposed to live on the banks of the Maese, whose chief city, called Atuatuca, is now Tongeren. The river of the country is now the Spaw. Tacit. de Germ. 2.

C. Turanius, a Latin tragic poet in the age of Augustus. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 29.

Turba, a town of Gaul.

Turbo, a gladiator, mentioned Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 310. He was of small stature, but uncommonly courageous.—A governor of Pannonia, under the emperors.

Turdetani, or Turduti, a people of Spain, inhabiting both sides of the Bætis. Liv. 21, c. 6. l. 28, c. 39, l. 34, c. 17.

Turesis, a Thracian who revolted from Tiberius.

Turias, a river of Spain falling into the Mediterranean near Valencia, now the Guadalquivir.

Turicum, a town of Gaul, now Zurich, in Switzerland.

Turjosa, a town of Spain.

Turinus, a corrupt judge in the Augustan age.

Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 49.

Turnus, a king of the Rutuli, son of Daunus and Venilia. He made war against Æneas, and attempted to drive him away from Italy, that he might not marry the daughter of Latinus, who had been previously engaged to him. His efforts were attended with no success, though supported with great courage and a numerous army. He was conquered, and at last killed in a single combat by Æneas. He is represented as a man of uncommon strength. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 56, &c.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 49.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 879. Met. 14, v. 451.

Turones, a people of Gaul, whose capital, Cæsarodunum, is the modern Tours.

Turpio. Virg. Ambivivus.

Turris, a river of Italy falling into the Adriatic.

Turullius, one of Cæsar's murderers.

Turuntus, a river of Sarmatia, supposed to be the Dwina, or Duna.

Tuscania and Tuscia, a large country at the west of Rome, the same as Etruria. Virg. Etruria.

Tusci, the inhabitants of Etruria.—The villa of Pliny the younger near the sources of the Tiber. Plin. ep. 5 & 6.

Tusculanum, a country house of Cicero, near Tusculum, where, among other books, the orator composed his Questiones, concerning the contempt of death, &c., in five books. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 4. Att. 15, ep. 2. Div. 2, c. 1.

Tusculum, a town of Latium on the declivity of a hill, about 12 miles from Rome, founded by Telegonus the son of Ulysses and Circe. It is now called Frescati, and is famous for the magnificent villas in its neighbourhood. Cic. ad Attic.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 3, od. 23, v. 8, &c.

Tuscus, belonging to Etruria. The Tiber is called Tuscus Anisus, from its situation. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 199.

Tuscus vicus, a small village near Rome. It received this name from the Etrurians of Porsenna's army that settled there. Liv. 2, c. 14.

Tuscum mare, a part of the Mediterranean on the coast of Etruria. Virg. Tyrrhenum.

Tuta, a queen of Illyricum, &c. Virg. Teuta.

Tutia, a vestal virgin accused of incontinence. She proved herself to be innocent by carrying water from the Tiber to the temple of Vesta in a sieve, after a solemn invocation to the goddess. Liv. 20.—A small river six miles from Rome, where Annibal pitched his camp, when he retreated from the city. Liv. 26, c. 11.

Tuticum, a town of the Hirpini.

Tyana, a town at the foot of mount Taurus in Cappadocia, where Apollonius was born, whence he is called Tyanicus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 719.—Strab. 12.

Tyanitis, a province of Asia Minor, near Cappadocia.

Tybris. Virg. Tiberis.—A Trojan who fought in Italy with Æneas against Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 124.

Tibur, a town of Latium on the Anio. Virg. Tibur.

Tyche, one of the Oceanides. Hesiod. Theog. v. 360.—A part of the town of Syracuse. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 53.

Tychius, a celebrated artist of Hyle in Boeotia, who made Hector's shield, which was covered with the hides of seven oxen. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 823.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 7, v. 220.

Tyde, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis. Ital. 3, v. 367.

Tydeus, a son of Ceneus king of Calydon and Peribœa. He fled from his country after the accidental murder of one of his friends, and found a safe asylum in the court of Adrastus king of Argos, whose daughter Deiphyle he married. When Adrastus wished to replace his son-in-law Polynices on the throne of Thebes, Tydeus undertook to go and declare war against Eteocles, who usurped the crown; he challenged Eteocles and his officers to single combat, and defeated them. On his return to Argos he slew 50 of the Thebans who had conspired against his life, and lay in an ambush to surprise him; and only one of the number was permitted to return to Thebes, to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions. He was one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus, and during the Theban war he behaved with great courage. Many of the enemies expired under his blows, till he was at last wounded by Menalippus. Though the blow was fatal, Tydeus had the strength to dart at his enemy, and to bring him to the ground, before he was carried away from the fight by his companions. At his own request, the dead body of Menalippus was brought to him, and after he had ordered the head to be cut off, he began to tear out the brains with his teeth. The savage barbarity of Tydeus displeased Minerva, who was coming to bring him relief and to make him immortal, and the goddess left him to his fate, and suffered him to die. He was buried at Argos, where his monument was still to be seen in the age of Pausanias. He was father to Diomedes. Some suppose that the cause of his flight to Argos was the murder of the son of Melus, or, according to others, of Alcathous his father's brother, or perhaps his own brother Olenius. Homer. Il. 4, v. 365, 387.—Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 6.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Paus. 9, c. 18.—Diod. 2.—Eurip. in Sup.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 479.—Ovid. in Ib. 350, &c.

Tydidēs, a patronymic of Diomedes, as son of Tydeus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 101.—Horat. 1, od. 15, v. 28.

Tylos, a town of Peloponnesus near Tanarus, now Bahrain.

Tymber, a son of Daunus, who assisted Turnus. His head was cut off in an engagement by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 391, &c.

Tymolus, a mountain. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 15. Virg. Imolus.

Tympania, an inland town of Elis.

Tynphæsi, a people between Epirus and Thessaly.

Tyndáridæ, a patronymic of the children of Tyndarus, as Castor, Pollux, and Helen, &c. Ovid. Met. 8.—A people of Colchis.

Tyndáris, a patronymic of Helen daughter of Tyndarus. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 569.—A town of Sicily near Pelorus, founded by a Messenian colony. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 91.—Sil. 14, v. 209.—Horace gave this name to one of his mistresses, as best expressive of all female accomplishments, 1, od. 17, v. 10.—A name given to Cassandra. Ovid. A. A. 2, v. 408.—A town of Colchis on the Phasis-Plin.

Tyndárus, son of Cebalus and Gorgophone, or, according to some, of Perieres. He was king of Lacedæmon, and married the celebrated Leda, who bore him Timandra, Phitæon, &c., and also became mother of Pollux and Helen by Jupiter. Vid. Leda, Castor, Pollux, Clytemnestra, &c.

Tynlichus, a general of Heracles. Polyæn.

Typhæus, or Typhon, a famous giant, son of Tartarus and Terra, who had 100 heads like those of a serpent or a dragon. Flames of devouring fire were darted from his mouth and from his eyes, and he uttered horrid yells, like the dissonant shrieks of different animals. He was no sooner born, than, to avenge the death of his brothers the giants, he made war against heaven, and so frightened the gods that they fled away and assumed different shapes. Jupiter became a ram, Mercury an ibis, Apollo a crow, Juno a cow, Bacchus a goat, Diana a cat, Venus a fish, &c. The father of the gods at last resumed courage, and put Typhæus to flight with his thunderbolts, and crushed him under mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, or, according to some, under the island Inarime. Typhæus became father of Geryon, Cerberus, and Orches by his union with Echidna. Hygin. Fab. 152 & 196.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 325.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Hesiod. Theog. 820.—Homer. Hymn.—Herodot. 2, c. 156.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

Typhon, a giant whom Juno produced by striking the earth. Some of the poets make him the same as the famous Typhæus. Vid. Typhæus.—A brother of Osiris, who married Nephtys. He laid snares for his brother during his expedition, and murdered him at his return. The death of Osiris was avenged by his son Orus, and Typhon was put to death. Vid. Osiris. He was reckoned among the Egyptians to be the cause of every evil, and on that account generally represented as a wolf and a crocodile. Plut. in Is. & Os.—Diod. 1.

Tyrrannion, a grammarian of Pontus, intimate with Cicero. His original name was Theophrastus, and he received that of Tyrrannion, from his austerity to his pupils. He was taken by Lucullus, and restored to his liberty by Murena. He opened a school in the house of his friend Cicero, and enjoyed his friendship. He was extremely fond of books, and collected a library of about 30,000 volumes. To his care and industry the world is indebted for the preservation of Aristotle's works.—There was also one of his disciples called Diodes, who bore his name. He was a native of Phœnicia, and was made prisoner in the war of Augustus and Antony. He was bought by Dymes, one of the emperor's favourites, and afterwards by Terentia, who gave him his liberty. He wrote 68 different volumes, in one of which he proved that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek; and another in which Homer's poems were corrected, &c.

Tyrannus, a son of Pterelaus.

Tyras, or Tyra, a river of European Sarmatia, falling into the Euxine sea, between the Danube and the Borysthenes, and now called the Niester. Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 50.

Tyres, one of the companions of Æneas in his wars against Turnus. He was brother to Teuthras. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 403.

Tyridates, a rich man in the age of Alexander, &c. Curt.

Tyris, or Tyrus, a town of Magna Græcia.

Tyriotes, a eunuch of Darius, who fled from Alexander's camp, to inform his master of the queen's death. Curt. 4, c. 10.

Tyro, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmonis king of Elis and Alcideia. She was treated with great severity by her mother-in-law Sidero, and at last removed from her father's house by her uncle Cretheus. She became enamoured of the Enipeus; and as she often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune assumed the shape of her favourite lover, and gained her affections. She had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune, whom she exposed, to conceal her incontinence from the world. The children were preserved by shepherds, and when they had arrived at years of maturity, they avenged their mother's injuries by assassinating the cruel Sidero. Some time after her amour with Neptune, Tyro married her uncle Cretheus, by whom she had Amynthion, Pheres, and Ævion. Tyro is often called Salmonis from her father. *Homer. Tyros, an island of Arabia.—A city of Phœnicia. Vid. Tyrus.

Tyrrheidæ, a patronymic given to the sons of Tyrrheus, who kept the flocks of Latinius. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 484.

Tyrrhœni, the inhabitants of Etruria. Vid. Etruria.

Tyrrhœnum mare, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Etruria. It is also called Infernum, as being at the bottom or south of Italy.

Tyrrhœnus, a son of Atys king of Lydia, who came to Italy, where part of the country was called after him. Strab. 5.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 55.—Fabert. 1, c. 1.—A friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 612.

Tyrrheus, a shepherd of king Latinus, whose stag being killed by the companions of Ascanius, was the first cause of war between Æneas and the inhabitants of Latium. Hence the word Tyrrheidæ. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 485.—An Egyptian general, B.C. 91.

Tyrisis, a place in the Balearides, supposed to be the palace of Saturn.

Tyrteus, a Greek elegiac poet, born in Attica, son of Archimbrotus. In the second Messenian war, the Lacedæmonians were directed by the oracle to apply to the Athenians for a general, if they wished to finish their expedition with success, and they were contemptuously presented with Tyrteus. The poet, though ridiculed for his many deformities, and his ignorance of military affairs, animated the Lacedæmonians with martial songs, just as they wished to raise the siege of Ithome, and inspired them with so much courage, that they defeated the Messenians. For his services, he was made a citizen of Lacedæmon, and treated with great attention. Of the compositions of Tyrtæus nothing is extant but the fragments of four or five elegies. He flourished about 684 B.C. Justin. 2, c. 5.—Strab. 8.—Aristot. Polit. 5, c. 7.—*Horat. de Art. Tyrus, or Tyros, a very ancient city of Phœnicia, built by the Sidonians, on a small island at the south of Sidon, about 200 stadia from the shore, and now called Sur. There were, properly speaking, two places of that name, the old Tyros, called Palætyros, on the sea-shore, and the other in the island. It was about 10 miles in circumference, including Palætyros, but, without it, about four miles. Tyre was destroyed by the princes of Assyria, and afterwards rebuilt. It maintained its independence till the age of Alexander, who took it with much difficulty, and only after he had joined the island to the continent by a mole, after a siege of seven months, on the 20th of August, B.C. 332. The Tyrians were naturally industrious; their city was the emporium of commerce, and they were deemed the inventors of scarlet and purple colours. They founded many cities in different parts of the world, such as Carthage, Gades, Lepcis, Utica, &c., which on that account are often distinguished by the epithet Tyria. The buildings of Tyre were very splendid and magnificent; the walls were 150 feet high, with a proportionate breadth. Hercules was the chief deity of the place. It had two large and capacious harbours, and a powerful fleet, and was built, according to some writers, about 2760 years before the christian era. Strab. 16.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela, 1, c. 12.—Curt. 4, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 6, 359, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 1, &c. Met. 5 & 10.—Lucan. 3, &c.—A nymph, mother of Venus, according to some.

Tyrias, a man celebrated by Cicero. Vid. Titias.

VACATIONE (Lex de), was enacted concerning the exemption from military service, and contained this very remarkable clause, nisi bellum Gallicum exoritur, in which case the priests themselves were not exempted from service. This can intimate how apprehensive the Romans were of the Gauls, by whom their city had once been taken.

Vacca, a town of Numidia. Sallust. Jug.—A river of Spain.

Vaccœi, a people at the north of Spain. Liv. 21, c. 5. l. 35, c. 7. l. 46, c. 47.

Vaccus, a general, &c. Liv. 8, c. 19.

Vaccina, a goddess at Rome, who presided over repose and leisure, as the word indicates (vaccare). Her festivals were observed in the month of December. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 307.—Horat. 1, ep. 10, v. 49.

Vadimōnis lacus, now Bassano, a lake of Etruria, whose waters were sulphureous. The Etrurians were defeated there by the Romans, and the Gauls by Dolabella. Liv. 9, c. 39.—Florent. 1, c. 13.—Plin. 8, ep. 20.

Vaga, a town of Africa. Sil. 3, v. 259.

Vagedrissa, a river of Sicily between the towns of Camarina and Gela. Sil. 14, v. 229.

Vagellius, an obscene lawyer of Mutina. Juv. 16, v. 23.

Vagēni, or Vagienni, a people of Liguria, at the sources of the Po, whose capital was called Augusta Vagiennorum. Sil. 8, v. 066.

Vahālis, a river of modern Holland, now called the Waal. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6.

Vala C. Numonius, a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addressed 1, ep. 15.

Valens Flavius, a son of Gratian, born in Pannonia. His brother Valentinian took him as his colleague on the throne, and appointed him over the eastern parts of the Roman empire. The bold measures and the threats of the rebel Procopius frightened the new emperor; and if his friends had not interfered, he would have willingly resigned all his pretensions to the empire which his brother had entrusted to his care. By perseverance, however, Valens was enabled to destroy his rival, and to distinguish himself in his wars against the northern barbarians. But his lenity to these savage intruders proved fatal to the Roman power; and by permitting some of the Goths to settle in the provinces of Thrace, and to have free access to every part of the country, Valens encouraged them to make depredations on his subjects, and to disturb their tranquillity. His eyes were opened too late; he attempted to repel them, but he failed in the attempt. A bloody battle was fought, in which the barbarians obtained some advantage, and Valens was hurried away by the obscurity of the night, and the affection of the soldiers for his person, into a lonely house, which the Goths set on fire. Valens, unable to make his escape, was burnt alive in the 30th year of his age, after a reign of 13 years, A.D. 378. He has been blamed for his superstition and cruelty, in putting to death all such of his subjects whose name began by Theod, because he had been informed by his favourite astrologers that his crown would devolve upon the head of an officer whose name began with these letters. Valens did not possess any of the great qualities which distinguish a good and powerful monarch. He was illiterate, and of a disposition naturally indolent and inactive. Yet though timorous in the highest degree, he was warlike; and though fond of ease, he was acquainted with the character of his officers, and preferred none but such as possessed merit. He was a great friend to discipline, a pattern of chastity and temperance, and he showed himself always ready to listen to the just complaints of his subjects, though he gave an attentive ear to flattery and malevolent informations. Ammian., &c.

Valerius, a proconsul of Achaia, who proclaimed himself emperor of Rome, when Marcian, who had been invested with the purple in the east, attempted to assassinate him. He reigned only six months, and was murdered by his soldiers, A.D. 261.—Fabius, a friend of Vitellius, whom he saluted emperor, in opposition to Otho. He was greatly honoured by Vitellius, &c.—A general of the emperor Honorius.—The name of the second Mercury mentioned by Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 29, but considered as more properly belonging to Jupiter.

Valentia, one of the ancient names of Rome.—A town of Spain, a little below Saguntum, founded by J. Brutus, and for some time known by the name of Julia Colonia.—A town of Italy.—Another, in Sardinia.

Valentinianus I., a son of Gratian, raised to the imperial throne by his merit and valour. He kept the western part of the empire for himself, and appointed over the east his brother Valens. He gave the most convincing proof of his military valour in the victories which he obtained over the barbarians in the provinces of Gaul, the deserts of Africa, and on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. The insolence of the Quadi he punished with great severity; and when these desperate and indigent barbarians had deprecated the conqueror's mercy, Valentinian treated them with contempt, and upbraided them with every mark of resentment. While he spoke with such warmth, he broke a blood-vessel, and fell lifeless on the ground. He was conveyed into his palace by his attendants, and soon after died, after suffering the greatest agonies, from violent fits and contortions of his limbs, on the 17th of November, A.D. 375. He was then in the 55th year of his age, and had reigned 12 years. He has been represented by some as cruel and covetous in the highest degree. He was naturally of an inscible disposition, and he gratified his pride in expressing a contempt for those who were his equals in military abilities, or who shone for gracefulness or elegance of address. Ammian.

Valentinianus II., second son of Valentinian I., was proclaimed emperor about six days after his father's death, though only five years old. He succeeded his brother, Gratian, A.D. 383, but his youth seemed to favour dissension, and the attempts and the usurpations of rebels. He was robbed of his throne by Maximus, four years after the death of Gratian; and in this helpless situation he had recourse to Theodosius, who was then emperor of the east. He was successful in his applications; Maximus was conquered by Theodosius, and Valentinian entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by his benefactor. He was some time after strangled by one of his officers, a native of Gaul, called Arbogastes, in whom he had placed too much confidence, and from whom he expected more deference than the ambition of a barbarian could pay. Valentinian reigned nine years. This happened the 15th of May, A.D. 392, at Vienne, one of the modern towns of France. He has been commended for his many virtues, and the applause which the populace bestowed upon him was bestowed upon real merit. He abolished the greatest part of the taxes; and because his subjects complained that he was too fond of the amusements of the circus, he ordered all such festivals to be abolished, and all the wild beasts that were kept for the entertainment of the people to be slain. He was remarkable for his benevolence and clemency, not only to his friends, but even to such as had conspired against his life; and he used to say that tyrants alone are suspicious. He was fond of imitating the virtues and exemplary life of his friend and patron Theodosius, and if he had lived longer, the Romans might have enjoyed peace and security.

Valentinianus III., was son of Constantina and Placidia the daughter of Theodosius the Great, and therefore, as related to the imperial family, he was saluted emperor in his youth, and publicly acknowledged as such at Rome, the 3rd of October, A.D. 423, about the sixth year of his age. He was at first governed by his mother, and the intrigues of his generals and courtiers; and when he came to years of discretion, he disgraced himself by violence, oppression, and incontinence. He was murdered in the midst of Rome, A.D. 454, in the 36th year of his age, and 31st of his reign; by Petronius Maximus, to whose wife he had offered violence. The vices of Valentinian III. were conspicuous; every passion he wished to gratify at the expense of his honour, his health, and character; and as he lived without one single act of benevolence or kindness, he died lamented by none, though pitied for his imprudence and vicious propensities. He was the last of the family of Theodosius.

Valentinianus, a son of the emperor Gratian, who died when very young.

Valeria, a sister of Publicola, who advised the Roman matrons to go and deprecate the resentment of Coriolanus. Plut. in Cor.—A daughter of Publicola, given as a hostage to Porsenna by the Romans. She fled from the enemy's country with Cloelia, and swam across the Tiber. Plut. de Virt. Mul.—A daughter of Messala, sister to Hortensius, who married Sylla. —The wife of the emperor Valentinian. —The wife of the emperor Galerius, &c. —A road in Sicily, which led from Messina to Lilybæum. —A town of Spain. Plin. 3, c. 3.

Valeria lex, de provocacione, by P. Valerius Poplicola the sole consul, A.U.C. 245. It permitted the appeal from a magistrate to the people, and forbade the magistrate to punish a citizen for making the appeal. It further made it a capital crime for a citizen to aspire to the sovereignty of Rome, or to exercise any office without the choice and approbation of the people. Val. Max. 4, c. 1. —Liv. 2, c. 8. —Dion. Hal. 4. —Another, de debitoribus, by Valerius Flaccus. It required that all creditors should discharge their debtors, on receiving a fourth part of the whole sum. —Another, by M. Valerius Corvinus, A.U.C. 453, which confirmed the first Valerian law, enacted by Poplicola. —Another, called also Horatia, by L. Valerius and M. Horatius the consuls, A.U.C. 305. It revived the first Valerian law, which, under the triumvirate, had lost its force. —Another, de magistratibus, by P. Valerius Poplicola sole consul, A.U.C. 245. It created two questors to take care of the public treasure, which was for the future to be kept in the temple of Saturn. Plut. in Pop. —Liv. 2.

Valerianus Publius Licinius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the armies in Rhætia, A.D. 254. The virtues which shone in him when a private man, were lost when he ascended the throne. Formerly distinguished for his temperance, moderation, and many virtues, which fixed the uninfluenced choice of all Rome upon him, Valerian, invested with the purple, displayed inability and meanness. He was cowardly in his operations, and though acquainted with war, and the patron of science, he seldom acted with prudence, or favoured men of true genius and merit. He took his son Gallienus as his colleague in the empire, and showed the malevolence of his heart by persecuting the christians whom he had for a while tolerated. He also made war against the Goths and Scythians; but in an expedition which he undertook against Sapor king of Persia, his arms were attended with ill success. He was conquered in Mesopotamia, and when he wished to have a private conference with Sapor, the conqueror seized his person, and carried him in triumph to his capital, where he exposed him, and in all the cities of his empire, to the ridicule and insolence of his subjects. When the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, Valerian served as a footstool, and the many other insults which he suffered excited indignation even among the courtiers of Sapor. The monarch at last ordered him to be flayed alive, and salt to be thrown over his mangled body, so that he died in the greatest torments. His skin was tanned, and painted in red; and that the ignominy of the Roman empire might be lasting, it was nailed in one of the temples of Persia. Valerian died in the 71st year of his age, A.D. 260, after a reign of seven years.—A grandson of Valerian the emperor. He was put to death when his father, the emperor Gallienus, was killed.—One of the generals of the usurper Niger.—A worthy senator, put to death by Heliogabalus.

Valerius Publius, a celebrated Roman surname Poplicola, from his popularity. He was very active in assisting Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and he was the first that took an oath to support the liberty and independence of his country. Though he had been refused the consulship, and had retired with great dissatisfaction from the direction of affairs, yet he regarded the public opinion; and when the jealousy of the Romans inveighed against the towering appearance of his house, he acknowledged the reproach, and in making it lower, he showed his wish to be on a level with his fellow-citizens, and not to erect what might be considered as a citadel for the oppression of his country. He was afterwards honoured with the consulship, on the expulsion of Collatinus, and he triumphed over the Etrurians, after he had gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the sons of Tarquin had fallen. Valerius died after he had been four times consul, and enjoyed the popularity, and received the thanks and the gratitude, which people redeemed from slavery and oppression usually pay to their patrons and deliverers. He was so poor, that his body was buried at the public expense. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year. Plut. in Vitell. Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 3, c. 8, &c.—Corvinus, a tribune of the soldiers under Camillus. When the Roman army were challenged by one of the Senones, remarkable for his strength and stature, Valerius undertook to engage him, and obtained an easy victory, by means of a crow that assisted him, and attacked the face of the Gaul, whence his surname of Corvinus. Valerius triumphed over the Etrurians, and the neighbouring states that made war against Rome, and was six times honoured with the consulship. He died in the 100th year of his age, admired and regretted for many public and private virtues. Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Liv. 7, c. 27, &c.—Plut. in Mar.—Cic. in Cat.—Antias, an excellent Roman historian often quoted, and particularly by Livy.—Marcus Corvinus Messala, a Roman, made consul with Augustus. He distinguished himself by his learning as well as military virtues. He lost his memory about two years before his death, and according to some, he was even ignorant of his own name. Sueton. in Aug.—Cic. in Brut.—Soranus, a Latin poet in the age of Julius Cæsar, put to death for betraying a secret. He acknowledged no god, but the soul of the universe.—Maximus, a brother of Poplicola.—A Latin historian who carried arms under the sons of Pompey. He dedicated his time to study, and wrote an account of all the most celebrated sayings and actions of the Romans, and other illustrious persons, which is still extant, and divided into nine books.

It is dedicated to Tiberius. Some have supposed that he lived after the age of Tiberius, from the want of purity and elegance which so conspicuously appear in his writings, unworthy of the correctness of the golden age of the Roman literature. The best editions of Valerius are those of Torrenius, 4to, L. Bat. 1726, and of Vorstius, 8vo, Berolin. 1672.—Marcus, a brother of Poplicola, who defeated the army of the Sabines in two battles. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, to show the sense of his great merit, built him a house on mount Palatine, at the public expense.—Potius, a general who stirred up the people and army against the decemvirs, and Appius Claudius in particular. He was chosen consul, and conquered the Volsci and Æqui.—Flaccus, a Roman, intimate with Cato the censor, whose friendship he honourably shared. He was consul with him, and cut off an army of 10,000 of the Insubres and Boii in Gaul, in one battle. He was also chosen censor, and prince of the senate, &c.—A Latin poet who flourished under Vespasian. He wrote a poem in eight books on the Argonautic expedition, but it remained unfinished on account of his premature death. The Argonauts were there left on the sea in their return home. Some critics have been lavish in their praises upon Flaccus, and have called him the second poet of Rome, after Virgil. His poetry, however, is deemed by some frigid and languishing, and his style uncouth and inelegant. The best editions of Flaccus are those of Burman, L. Bat. 1724, and 12mo, Utr. 1702.—Asiaticus, a celebrated Roman, accused of having murdered one of the relations of the emperor Claudius. He was condemned by the intrigues of Messalina, though innocent, and he opened his veins, and bled to death. Tacit. Ann.—A friend of Vitellius.—Fabianus, a youth condemned under Nero, for counterfeiting the will of one of his friends, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 42.—Lævinus, a consul who fought against Pyrrhus during the Tarentine war. Vid. Lævinus.—Præconius, a lieutenant of Cæsar's army in Gaul, slain in a skirmish.—Paulinus, a friend of Vespasian, &c.

Valerius, a friend of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, 752.

Valgius Rufus, a Roman poet in the Augustan age, celebrated for his writings. He was very intimate with Horace. Tibull. 3, l. 1, v. 180.—Horat. l. sat. 10, v. 82.

Vandalli, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. c. 3.

Vangiones, a people of Germany. Their capital, Borbetomagus, is now called Worms. Lucan. 1, v. 431.—Cæs. G. 1, c. 51.

Vannia, a town of Italy, north of the Po, now called Civita.

Vannius, a king of the Suevi, banished under Claudius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 29.

Vapneum, a town of Gaul.

Varanes, a name common to some of the Persian monarchs, in the age of the Roman emperors.

Vardoli, a people of Dalmatia. Cic. Fam. 5, ep. 9.

Varia, a town of Latium.

Varia lex, de maiestate, by the tribune L. Varrus, A.U.C. 662. It ordained that all such as had assisted the confederates in their war against Rome, should be publicly tried.—Another, de civitate, by Q. Varius Hybrida. It punished all such as were suspected of having assisted or supported the people of Italy in their petition to become free citizens of Rome. Cic. pro. Mil. 36, in Brut. 56, 88, &c.

Varini, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Ger. 40.

Varini, a people of Germany.

Lucius Varius, or Varus, a tragic poet intimate with Horace and Virgil. He was one of those whom Augustus appointed to revise Virgil's Aeneid. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. Besides tragedies, he wrote a paenegyric on the emperor. Quintilian, says, l. 10, that his Thyestes was equal to any composition of the Greek poets. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 40.—A man who raised his reputation by the power of his oratory. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 25.—One of the friends of Antony, surnamed Cotylion.—A man in the reign of Otho, punished for his adulteries, &c.

Varro M. Terentius, a Roman consul defeated at Cannæ, by Annibal. Vid. Terentius. A Latin writer, celebrated for his great learning. He wrote no less than 500 different volumes, which are all now lost, except a treatise de Re Rusticâ, and another de Lingua Latina, in five books, written in his 80th year, and dedicated to the orator Cicero. He was Pompey's lieutenant in his piratical wars, and obtained a naval crown. In the civil wars he was taken by Cæsar and proscribed, but he escaped. He has been greatly commended by Cicero for his erudition, and St. Augustin says that it cannot but be wondered how Varro, who read such a number of books, could find time to compose so many volumes; and how he who composed so many volumes, could be at leisure to peruse such a variety of books, and gain so much literary information. He died B.C. 28, in the 88th year of his age. The best edition of Varro is that of Dordrac, 8vo, 1619. Cic. in Acad., &c. Quintil. 11.—Atacinus, a native of Gaul, in the age of J. Cæsar. He translated into Latin verse the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, with great correctness and elegance. He also wrote a poem entitled de Bello Sequanico, besides epigrams and elegies. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. He failed in his attempt to write satire. Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 46.—Ovid. Am. 1, v. 15.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Varronia villa, now Vicovaro, was situate on the Anio, in the country of the Sabines. Cic. Phil. 2, ep. 41.

Varus Quintilius, a Roman proconsul, descended from an illustrious family. He was appointed governor of Syria, and afterwards made commander of the armies in Germany. He was surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, a crafty and dissimulating chief, and his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that everything was lost, he killed himself, A.D. 10, and his example was followed by some of his officers. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus at Rome, by one of the barbarian chiefs, as also his body; and so great was the influence of this defeat upon the emperor, that he continued for whole months to show all the marks of dejection, and of deep sorrow, often exclaiming, "O Varus, restore me my legions!" The bodies of the slain were left in the field of battle, where they were found six years after by Germanicus, and buried with great pomp. Varus has been taxed with indolence and cowardice, and some have intimated, that if he had not trusted too much to the insinuations of the barbarian chiefs, he might have not only escaped ruin, but awed the Germans to their duty. His avarice was also conspicuous; he went poor to Syria, whence he returned loaded with riches. Horat. 1, od. 24.—Pater. 2, c. 117.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—A son of Varus, who married a daughter of Germanicus. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 6.—The father and grandfather of Varus, who was killed in Germany, slew themselves with their own swords, the one after the battle of Philippi, and the other in the plains of Pharsalia.

—Quintilian, a friend of Horace, and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a good judge of poetry, and a great critic, as Horace, Art. P. 438, seems to insinuate. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his first book to him, and in the 24th he mourns pathetically his death. Some suppose this Varus to be the person killed in Germany, while others believe him to be a man who devoted his time more to the muses than to war. Vid. Varius.—Lucius, an epicurean philosopher, intimate with J. Cæsar. Some suppose that it was to him that Virgil inscribed his sixth eclogue. He is commended by Quintil. 6, c. 3, 78.—Alfrenus, a Roman, who, though originally a shoemaker, became consul, and distinguished himself by his abilities as an orator. He was buried at the public expense, an honour granted to few, and only to persons of merit. Horat. 1, sat. 3.—Accius, one of the friends of Cato in Africa, &c.—A river which falls into the Mediterranean, to the west of Nice, after separating Liguria from Gallia Narbonensis. Lucean. 1, v. 404.

Vasates, a people of Gaul.

Vascones, a people of Spain, on the Pyrenees. They were so reduced by a famine by Metellus, that they fed on human flesh. Plin. 3, c. 3.—Anton. 2, v. 100.—Juv. 15, v. 93.

Vasio, a town of Gaul in modern Provence. Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 34.

Vaticanium, a hill at Rome, near the Tiber and the Janiculum, which produced wine of no great esteem. It was disregarded by the Romans on account of the unwholesomeness of the air, and the continual stench of the filth that was there, and of stagnated waters. Helioabalus was the first who cleared it of all disagreeable nuisances. It is now admired for ancient monuments and pillars, for a celebrated public library, and for the palace of the pope. Horat. 1, od. 20.

Vatitino, now Saterno, a river rising in the Alps and falling into the Po. Martial. 3, ep. 67.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

Vatinia lex, de provinciis, by the tribune P. Vatinus, A.U.C. 694. It appointed Cæsar governor of Gallia Cisalpinia and Illyricum, for five years, without a decree of the senate, or the usual custom of casting lots. Some persons were also appointed to attend him as lieutenants without the interference of the senate. His army was to be paid out of the public treasury, and he was empowered to plant a Roman colony in the town of Novocomum in Gaul.—Another by P. Vatinus the tribune, A.U.C. 694, de repretendis, for the better management of the trial of those who were accused of extortion.

Vatinus, an intimate friend of Cicero, once distinguished for his enmity to the orator. He hated the people of Rome for their great vices and corruption, whence excessive hatred became proverbial in the words Vatinianum odium. Catull. 14, v. 3.—A shoemaker, ridiculed for his deformities, and the oddity of his character. He was one of Nero's favourites, and he surpassed the rest of the couriers in battery, and in the commission of every impious deed. Large cups, of no value, are called Vatriniana from him, because he used one which was both ill-shaped and uncouth. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 34.—Juv.—Mart. 14, ep. 96.

Ubil, a people of Germany near the Rhine, transported across the river by Agrippa, who gave them the name of Agrippinenses, from his daughter Agrippina, who had been born in the country. Their chief town, Uborum oppidum, is now Cologne. Tacit. G. 28. Ann. 12, c. 27.—Plin. 4, c. 17.—Cas. 4, c. 30.

Ucllōgon, a Trojan chief, remarkable for his great age, and praised for the soundness of his counsels and his good intentions, though accused by some of betraying his country to the enemy. His house was first set on fire by the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312.—Homer. Il. 3, v. 148.

Ucœtia, a town of Gaul.

Ucubia, now Lucubi, a town of Spain. Hirtius.

Udina, or Vednum, now Udino, a town of Italy.

Vectis, the isle of Wight, south of Britain. Suet. Cl. 5.

Vectius, a rhetorician, &c. Juv. 7, v. 150.

Vectones. Id. Vectones.

Vedius Pollio, a friend of Augustus, very cruel to his servants, &c. Id. Pollio.—Aquila, an officer at the battle of Bebricum, &c. Tacit. H. 2, c. 44.

Vegetius, a Latin writer, who flourished B.C. 386. The best edition of his treatise de Re Militari, together with Modestus, is that of Paris, 4to, 1607.

Vegia, an island on the coast of Dalmatia.

Veia, a sorceress, in the age of Horace, ep. 5, v. 20.

Velanns, a gladiator, in the age of Horace, 1, ep. 1, v. 4.

Velantes, the inhabitants of Veii. They were carried to Rome, where the tribe they composed was called Velentina. Id. Veii.

Velento Fabr., a Roman, as arrogant as he was satirical. Nero banished him for his libellous writings. Juv. 3, v. 185.

Veii, a powerful city of Etruria, at the distance of about 12 miles from Rome. It sustained many long wars against the Romans, and was at last taken and destroyed by Camillus, after a siege of 20 years. At the time of its destruction, Veii was larger and far more magnificent than the city of Rome. Its situation was so eligible, that the Romans, after the burning of the city by the Gauls, were long inclined to migrate there, and totally abandon their native home; and this would have been carried into execution, if not opposed by the authority and eloquence of Camillus. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 195.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 44.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 143.—Liv. 5, c. 21, &c.

Veiovis, or Vejupiter, a deity of ill omen at Rome. He had a temple on the Capitoline hill built by Romulus. Some suppose that he was the same as Jupiter infant, or in the cradle, because he was represented without thunder, or a sceptre, and had only by his side the goat Amalthæa, and the Cretan nymph who fed him when young. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 430.

Velabrum, a marshy piece of ground on the side of the Tiber, between the Aventine, Palatine, and Capitoline hills, which Augustus drained, and where he built houses. The place was frequented as a market, where oil, cheese, and other commodities were exposed to sale. Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 220.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 401.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 33.—Plaut. 3, cap. 1, v. 29.

Velantius, one of Cæsar's officers in Gaul, &c.

Velauni, a people of Gaul.

Vellia, a maritime town of Lucania, founded by a colony of Phœceans, about 600 years after the coming of Æneas into Italy. The port in its neighbourhood was called Velinus portus. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Cic. Phil. 10, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 366.—An eminance near the Roman forum, where Poplicola built himself a house. Liv. 2, c. 6.—Cic. 7, Att. 15.

Vellica, or Vellica, a town of the Cantabri.

Vellina, a part of the city of Rome, adjoining mount Palatine. It was also one of the Roman tribes. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 52.—Cic. 4, ad Attic. ep. 15.

Velinus, a lake in the country of the Sabines, formed by the stagnant waters of the Velinus, between some hills near Reate. The river Velinus rises in the Apennines, and after it has formed the lake, it falls into the Nar, near Spoletium. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 517.—Cic. Div. 1, c. 36.

Vellocassi, a people of Gaul.

Veliterna, or Velitræ, an ancient town of Latium on the Appian road, 20 miles at the east of Rome. The inhabitants were called Veliterni. It became a Roman colony. Liv. 8, c. 12, &c.—Sueton. in Aug.—Ital. 8, v. 378, &c.

Vellari, a people of Gaul.

Vellanocturnum, a town of the Senones, now Beauve. Cas. 7, c. 11.

Velleda, a woman famous among the  Germans, in the age of Vespasian, and worshipped as a deity. Tacit. de Germ. 8.

Velleius Paterculus, a Roman historian, descended from an equestrian family of Campania. He was at first a military tribune in the Roman armies, and for nine years served under Tiberius in the various expeditions which he undertook in Gaul and Germany. Velleius wrote an epitome of the history of Greece, and of Rome, and of other nations of the most remote antiquity, but of this authentic composition there remain only fragments of the history of Greece and Rome from the conquest of Perseus, by Paulus, to the 17th year of the reign of Tiberius, in two books. It is a judicious account of celebrated men and illustrious cities; the historian is happy in his descriptions, and accurate in his dates; his pictures are true, and his narrations lively and interesting. The whole is candid and impartial, but only till the reign of the Cæsars, when the writer began to be influenced by the presence of the emperor, or the power of his favourites. Paterculus is deservedly censured for his invectives against Cicero and Pompey, and his encomiums on the cruel Tiberius, and the unfortunate Bejanus. Some suppose that he was involved in the ruin of this disappointed courtier, whom he had extolled as a pattern of virtue and morality. The best editions of Paterculus are those of Ruhnkenius, 8vo, a vols. L. Bat. 1779; of Barbous, Paris, 12mo, 1777; and of Burman, 8vo, L. Bat. 1719.—Caius, the grandfather of the historian of that name, was one of the friends of Livia. He killed himself when old and unable to accompany Livia in her flight.

Velocasses, the people of Paris, in Normandy. Cas. G. 2, c. 4.

Venâcrum, a town of Campania near Arpinum, abounding in olive trees. It became a Roman colony. Horat. 2. ad. 6. v. 16.—Martial. 13. p. 93.—Juv. 5. v. 86.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3. c. 5.

Venedi, a people of Germany, near the mouth of the Vistula, or gulf of Dantzig. Tacit. de Germ. 46.—Plin. 4. c. 13.

Venelli, a people of Gallia Celtica.

Veneti, a people of Italy in Cisalpine Gaul, near the mouth of the Po. They were descended from a nation of Paphlagonia, who settled there under Antenor some time after the Trojan war. The Venetians, who have been long a powerful and commercial nation, were originally very poor, whence a writer in the age of the Roman emperors said, they had no other fence against the waves of the sea but hurdles, no food but fish, no wealth besides their fishing-boats, and no merchandise but salt. Strab. 4. &c.—Liv. 1. c. 1.—Mela, 1. c. 2. l. 2. c. 4.—Cæs. Bell. G. 3. c. 8.—Lucan. 4. v. 134.—Ital. 8. v. 605.—A nation of Gaul, at the south of Armorica, on the western coast, powerful by sea. Their chief city is now called Vannes. Cæs. 3. G. 8.

Venëtia, a part of Gaul, on the mouths of the Po. Vid. Veneti.

Venetus Paulus, a centurion who conspired against Nero with Piso, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15. c. 50.—A lake through which the Rhine passes, now Bodenase or Constante. Mela, 3. c. 2.

Venilia, a nymph, sister to Amata, and mother of Turnus, by Daunus. Amphitrite the sea goddess is also called Venilia. Virg. Æn. 10. v. 76.—Ovid. Met. 14. v. 334.—Varro, de L. L. 4. c. 10.

Vennonæ, a people of the Rhaetian Alps.

Veniolus, an historian mentioned by Cic. ad Attic. 12. ep. 3. &c.

Venta Belgarum, a town of Britain, now Winchester.—Silurum, a town of Britain, now Caerwent, in Monmouthshire.—Icenorum, now Norwich.

Venti. The ancients, and especially the Athenians, paid particular attention to the winds, and offered them sacrifices as to deities, intent upon the destruction of mankind, by continually causing storms, tempests, and earthquakes. The winds were represented in different attitudes and forms. The four principal winds were Eurus, the south-east, who is represented as a young man flying with great impetuosity, and often appearing in a playful and wanton humour. Auster, the south wind, appeared generally as an old man with grey hair, a gloomy countenance, a head covered with clouds, a sable vesture, and dusky wings. He is the dispenser of rain, and of all heavy showers. Zephyrus is represented as the mildest of all the winds. He is young and gentle, and his lap is filled with vernal flowers. He married Flora the goddess, with whom he enjoyed the most perfect felicity. Boreas, or the north wind, appears always rough and shivering. He is the father of rain, snow, hail, and tempests, and is always represented as surrounded with impenetrable clouds. Those of inferior note were Solanus, whose name is seldom mentioned. He appeared as a young man holding fruit in his lap, such as peaches, oranges, &c. Africus, or south-west, is represented with black wings, and a melancholy countenance. Cornus, or north-west, drives clouds of snow before him, and Aquilo, the north-east, is equally dreadful in appearance. The winds, according to some mythologists, were confined in a large cave, of which

Eolus had the management; and without this necessary precaution, they would have overturned the earth, and reduced everything to its original chaos. Virg. Æn. 1. v. 57, &c.

Ventidius Bassus, a native of Picenum, born of an obscure family. When Acculum was taken, he was carried before the triumphant chariot of Pompeius Strabo, hanging on his mother's breast. A bold, aspiring soul, aided by the patronage of the family of Cæsar, raised him from the mean occupation of a chairman and muleteer to dignity in the state. He displayed valour in the Roman armies, and gradually arose to the offices of tribune, pretor, high priest, and consul. He made war against the Parthians, and conquered them in three great battles, B.C. 39. He was the first Roman ever honoured with a triumph over Parthia. He died greatly lamented by all the Roman people, and was buried at the public expense. Plin. in Anton.—Juv. 7. v. 199.—Cumanus, governor of Palestine, &c. Tacit. A. 13. c. 54.—Two brothers in the age of Pompey, who favoured Carbo's interest, &c. Plin.

Ventileius, a writer in the age of the emperor Alexander.—A friend of Verres. Cic. in Ver. 3. c. 47.

Ventilius, one of the Latin elders sent into Magna Græcia to demand the assistance of Diomedes, &c. Virg. Æn. 8. v. 9.

Vênus, one of the most celebrated deities of the ancients. She was the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of the graces and of pleasures, and the patroness of courtesans. Some mythologists speak of more than one Venus. Plato mentions two, Venus Urania the daughter of Uranus, and Venus Popularis the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Cicero speaks of four, a daughter of Cælus and Light, one sprung from the froth of the sea, a third, daughter of Jupiter and the Nereid Dione, and a fourth born at Tyre, and the same as the Astarte of the Syrians. Of these, however, the Venus sprung from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated part of the body of Uranus had been thrown there by Saturn, is the most known, and of her in particular ancient mythologists, as well as painters, make mention. She arose from the sea near the island of Cyprus, or, according to Hesiod, of Cythera, whither she was wafted by the zephyrs, and received on the sea-shore by the seasons, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. She was soon after carried to heaven, where all the gods admired her beauty, and all the goddesses became jealous of her personal charms. Jupiter attempted to gain her affections and even wished to offer her violence, but Venus refused, and the god, to punish her obstinacy, gave her in marriage to his ugly and deformed son Vulcan. This marriage did not prevent the goddess of Love from gratifying her favourite passions, and she defiled her husband's bed by her amours with the gods. Her intrigue with Mars is the most celebrated. She was caught in her lover's arms, and exposed to the ridicule and laughter of all the gods. Vid. Alectryon. Venus became mother of Hermione, Cupid, and Anteros by Mars; by Mercury she had Hermaphroditus; by Bacchus, Priapus; and by Neptune, Eryx. Her great partiality for Adonis made her abandon the seats of Olympus [Vid. Adonis], and her regard for Anchises obliged her often to visit the woods and solitary retreats of mount Ida. Vid. Anchises, Æneas. The power of Venus over the heart was supported and assisted by a celebrated girdle, called zone by the Greeks, and cincta by the Latins. This mysterious girdle gave beauty, grace, and elegance, when worn even by the most deformed; and it excited love and rekindled extinguished flames. Juno herself was indebted to this powerful ornament to gain the favours of Jupiter, and Venus, though herself possessed of every charm, no sooner put on her cestus, than Vulcan, unable to resist the influence of love, forgot all the intrigues and infidelities of his wife, and fabricated arms even for her illegitimate children. The contest of Venus for the golden apple of Discord is well known. She gained the prize over Pallas and Juno [Vid. Paris, Discordia], and rewarded her impartial judge with the hand of the fairest woman in the world. The worship of Venus was universally established; statues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom, and the ancients were fond of paying homage to a divinity who presided over generation, and by whose influence alone mankind existed. In her sacrifices and in the festivals celebrated in her honour, too much licentiousness prevailed, and public prostitution was often part of the ceremony. Victims were seldom offered to her, or her altars stained with blood, though we find Aspasia making repeated sacrifices. No pigs, however, or male animals were deemed acceptable. The rose, the myrtle, and the apple, were sacred to Venus; and among birds, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow, were her favourites; and among fishes, those called the aphyra and the lycostomus. The goddess of beauty was represented among the ancients in different forms. At Elis she appeared seated on a goat, with one foot resting on a tortoise. At Sparta and Cythera, she was represented armed like Minerva, and sometimes wearing chains on her feet. In the temple of Jupiter Olympius, she was represented by Phidias, as rising from the sea, received by love, and crowned by the goddess of persuasion. At Cnidos her statue, made by Praxiteles, represented her naked, with one hand hiding what modesty keeps concealed. Her statue at Elephantis was the same, with only a naked Cupid by her side. In Sicily she held a poppy in one hand, and in the other an apple, while on her head she had a crown, which terminated in a point, to intimate the pole. She is generally represented with her son Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves, or at other times by swans and sparrows. The surnames of the goddess are numerous, and only show how well established her worship was all over the earth. She was called Cypris, because particularly worshipped in the island of Cyprus, and in that character she was often represented with a beard, and the male parts of generation, with a sceptre in her hand, and the body and dress of a female, whence she is called duplex Amathusia by Catullus. She received the name of Paphia, because worshipped at Paphos, where she had a temple with an altar, on which rain never fell, though exposed in the open air. Some of the ancients called her Apostrophia or Epistrophia, as also Venus Urania, and Venus Pandemos. The first of these she received as presiding over wantonness and incestuous enjoyments; the second because she patronized pure love, and chaste and moderate gratifications; and the third because she favoured the propensities of the vulgar, and was fond of sensual pleasures. The Cnidians raised her temples under the name of Venus Acrea, of Doris, and of Euploea. In her temple under the name of Euploea, at Cnidos, was the most celebrated of her statues, being the most perfect piece of Praxiteles. It was made with white marble, and appeared so engaging, and so much like life, that, according to some historians, a youth of the place introduced himself in the night into her temple, and attempted to gratify his passions on the lifeless image. Venus was also surnamed Cytheraea, because she was the chief deity of Cythera; Exopolis, because her statue was without the city of Athens; Phallommeda, from her affection for the phallus; Philommedis, because the queen of laughter; Telestigama, because she presided over marriage; Callada, Colobis, or Colias, because worshipped on a promontory of the same name in Attica; Arca, because armed like Mars; Verticordia, because she could turn the hearts of women to cultivate chastity; Apaturia, because she deceived; Caiva, because she was represented bald; Ericynia, because worshipped at Eryx; Etaiva, because the patroness of courtesans; Acidalia, because of a fountain of Orpheomenos; Basilea, because the queen of love; Myrtea, because the myrtle was sacred to her; Libertina, from her inclinations to gratify lust; Mechanitis, in allusion to the many artifices practised in love, &c., &c. As goddess of the sea, because born in the bosom of the waters, Venus was called Pontia, Marina, Limnesia, Epipontia, Pelagia, Saligenia, Pontogenia, Aligena, Thalassia, &c., and as rising from the sea, the name of Anadyomene is applied to her, and rendered immortal by the celebrated painting of Apelles, which represented her as issuing from the bosom of the waves, and wringing her tresses on her shoulder. Vid. Anadyomene. *Cic. de Nat. Venus Pyrenæa, a town of Spain near the borders of Gaul.

Ventusia, or Ventustum, a town of Apulia, where Horace was born. Part of the Roman army fled thither after the defeat at Cannæ. The town, though in ruins, contains still many pieces of antiquity, especially a marble bust preserved in the great square, and said falsely to be an original representation of Horace. Ventusia was on the confines of Lucania, whence the poet said Lucanus an Apulius accepit, and it was founded by Diomedes, who called it Ventusia or Aphrodisia, after Venus, whose divinity he wished to appease. Strab. 5 & 6.—Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 35.—Liv. 27, c. 54.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

Veragri, a people between the Alps and the Allobroges. Liv. 21, c. 38.—Cæsar. G. 3, c. 1.

Verania, the wife of Piso Licinianus, whom Galba adopted.

Verantius, a governor of Britain under Nero. He succeeded Didius Gallus. Tacit. Ann. 14.

Verbänus lacus, now Majora, a lake of Italy, from which the Ticinus flows. It is in the modern duchy of Milan, and extends 50 miles in length from south to north, and five or six in breadth. Strab. 4.

Verbigentus, a village in the country of the Celts.

Verbinum, a town in the north of Gaul.

Vercellæ, a town on the borders of Insubria, where Marius defeated the Cimbræ. Plin. 3, c. 17. — Cic. Fam. 11, ep. 19. — Sil. 8, v. 508.

Vercingetorix, a chief of the Gauls, in the time of Cæsar. He was conquered and led in triumph, &c. Cæsar, Bell. G. 7, c. 4. — Flor. 3, c. 50.

Versis, a small river of Latium falling into the Anio.

Vergasillanus, one of the generals and friends of Vercingetorix. Cæsar, Bell. G.

Vergas, a town of the Brutii. Liv. 30, c. 19.

Vergellus, a small river near Cannæ, falling into the Aufidus, over which Annibal made a bridge with the slaughtered bodies of the Romans. Flor. 2, c. 6. — Val. Max. 9, c. 11.

Vergilia, the wife of Coriolanus, &c.

Vergilia, a town of Spain, supposed to be Murcia.

Vergilæ, seven stars, called also Pleiades. When they set, the ancients began to sow their corn. They received their name from the spring, quia vera orientantur. Propert. 1, el. 8, v. 18. — Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 44.

Verginius, one of the officers of the Roman troops in Germany, who refused the absolute power which his soldiers offered to him. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 6. — A rhetorician in the age of Nero, banished on account of his great fame. Id. Ann. 15, c. 71.

Vergium, a town of Spain.

Vergobretus, one of the chiefs of the Ædui, in the age of Cæsar, &c. Cæsar, G. 1, c. 16.

Veritas (truth), was not only personified by the ancients, but also made a deity, and called the daughter of Saturn and the mother of Virtue. She was represented like a young virgin, dressed in white apparel, with all the marks of youthful diffidence and modesty. Democritus used to say that she hid herself at the bottom of a well, to intimate the difficulty with which she is found.

Verodootius, one of the Helvetii. Cæsar, G. 2, c. 7.

Veromandus, a people of Gaul, the modern Vermandois. The capital is now St. Quentin. Cæsar, G. 2, c. 7.

Vérona, a town of Venetia, on the Athesis, in Italy, founded, as some suppose, by Brennus, the leader of the Gauls. C. Nepos, Catullus, and Pliny the elder were born there. It was adorned with a circus and an amphitheatre by the Roman emperors, which still exist, and it still preserves its ancient name. Plin. 9, c. 22. — Strab. 5. — Ovid. Am. 3, el. 15, v. 7.

Vérones, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis. Sil. 3, v. 578.

Verreclinum, a town in the country of the Volsci. Liv. 4, c. 1, &c. — Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

C. Verres, a Roman who governed the province of Sicily as pretor. The oppression and rapine of which he was guilty, while in office, so offended the Sicilians, that they brought an accusation against him before the Roman senate. Cicero undertook the cause of the Sicilians, and pronounced those celebrated orations which are still extant. Verres was defended by Hortensius, but as he despaired of the success of his defence, he left Rome without waiting for his sentence, and lived in great affluence in one of the provinces. He was at last killed by the soldiers of Antony the triumvir, about 30 years after his voluntary exile from the capital. Cic. 18 Ver. — Plin. 34, c. 2. — Laclant. 2, c. 4.

Verritus, a general of the Frisii in the age of Nero, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 54.

Verrius Flaccus, a freedman and grammarian famous for his powers in instructing. He was appointed over the grandchildren of Augustus, and also distinguished himself by his writings. Cæll. 4, c. 5. — Suet. de Gram. — A Latin critic, B.C. 4, whose works have been edited with Dacier's and Clerk's notes, 4to. Amst. 1699.

Verrugo, a town in the country of the Volsci. Liv. 4, c. 1.

Vertioo, one of the Nervii who deserted to Cæsar's army, &c. Cæsar, B. G. 6, c. 45.

Verticordia, one of the surnames of Venus, the same as the Aphrodisia of the Greeks, because her assistance was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman matrons, and teach them to follow virtue and modesty. Val. Max. 8.

Vertiscus, one of the Rhemi, who commanded a troop of horse in Cæsar's army. Cæsar, B. G. 8, c. 12.

Vertumnus, a deity among the Romans, who presided over the spring and over orchards. He endeavoured to gain the affections of the goddess Pomona; and to effect this, he assumed the shape and dress of a fisherman, of a soldier, a peasant, a reaper, &c., but all to no purpose, till, under the form of an old woman, he prevailed upon his mistress and married her. He is generally represented as a young man crowned with flowers, covered up to the waist, and holding in his right hand fruit, and a crown of plenty in his left. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 642, &c. — Propert. 4, el. 2, v. 2. — Horat. 2, sat. 7, v. 14.

Verule, a town of the Hernici. Liv. 9, c. 42.

Verulanus, a lieutenant under Corbulo, who drove away Tiridates from Media, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 26.

Verus Lucius Ceionius Commodus, a Roman emperor, son of Ælius and Domitia Lucilla. He was adopted in the 7th year of his age by M. Aurelius, at the request of Adrian, and he married Lucilla the daughter of his adopted father, who also took him as his colleague on the throne. He was sent by M. Aurelius to oppose the barbarians in the east. His arms were attended with success, and he obtained a victory over the Parthians. He was honoured with a triumph at his return home, and soon after he marched with his imperial colleague against the Marcomanni in Germany. He died in this expedition of an apoplexy, in the 39th year of his age, after a reign of eight years and some months. His body was brought back to Rome, and buried by M. Aurelius with great pomp and solemnity. Verus has been greatly censured for his debaucheries, which appeared more enormous and disgusting, when compared with the temperance, meekness, and popularity of Aurelius. The example of his father did not influence him, and he often retired from the frugal and moderate repast of Aurelius, to the profuse banquets of his own palace, where the night was spent in riot and debauchery, with the meanest of the populace, with stugedancers, buffoons, and lascivious courtisans. At one entertainment alone, where there were no more than 22 guests, the emperor spent no less than six millions of sesterces, or about 32,000 sterling. But it is to be observed, that whatever was most scarce and costly was there; the guests never drank twice out of the same cup; and whatever vessels they had touched, they received as a present from the emperor when they left the palace. In his Parthian expedition, Verus did not check his vicious propensities; for four years he left the care of the war to his officers, while he retired to the voluptuous retreats of Daphne, and the luxurious banquets of Antioch. His fondness for a horse has been faithfully recorded. The animal had a statue of gold, he was fed with almonds and raisins by the hand of the emperor, he was clad in purple, and kept in the most splendid of the halls of the palace, and when dead, the emperor, to express his sorrow, raised him a magnificent monument on mount Vatican. Some have suspected M. Aurelius of despatching Verus to rid the world of his debaucheries and guilty actions, but this seems to be the report of malevolence.—L. Annæus, a son of the emperor Aurelius, who died in Palestine.—The father of the emperor Verus. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian, but like his son he disgraced himself by his debaucheries and extravagance. He died before Adrian.

Vesbins, or Vesubius. Vid. Vesuvius.

Vesentio, a town of Gaul, now Besancon. Caes. G. 38.

Vesentium, a town of Tuscany.

Veseris, a river near mount Vesuvius. Liv. 8, c. 8.—Cic. Off. 3, c. 31.

Vesvius and Vesvius. Vid. Vesuvius.

Vesidia, a town of Tuscany.

Vesonna, a town of Gaul, now Perignen.

Vespacie, a small village of Umbria, near Nursia. Suet. Vesp. 1.

Vespasianus Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor, descended from an obscure family at Reate. He was honoured with the consulship, not so much by the influence of the imperial courtiers, as by his own private merit, and his public services. He accompanied Nero into Greece, but he offended the prince by falling asleep while he repeated one of his poetical compositions. This momentary resentment of the emperor did not prevent Vespasian from being sent to carry on a war against the Jews. His operations were crowned with success; many of the cities of Palestine surrendered, and Vespasian began the siege of Jerusalem. This was, however, achieved by the hands of his son Titus, and the death of Vitellus and the affection of his soldiers hastened his rise, and he was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. The choice of the army was approved by every province of the empire; but Vespasian did not betray any signs of pride at so sudden and so unexpected an exaltation, and though once employed in the mean office of a horse-doctor, he behaved, when invested with the imperial purple, with all the dignity and greatness which became a successor of Augustus. In the beginning of his reign Vespasian attempted to reform the manners of the Romans, and he took away an appointment which he had a few days before granted to a young nobleman who approached him to return him thanks, all smelling of perfumes and covered with ointment, adding, "I had rather you had smelt of garlic." He repaired the public buildings, embellished the city, and made the great roads more spacious and convenient. After he had reigned with great popularity for 10 years, Vespasian died with a pain in his bowels, A.D. 79, in the 70th year of his age. He was the first Roman emperor that died a natural death, and he was also the first who was succeeded by his own son on the throne. Vespasian has been admired for his great virtues. He was clement, he gave no ear to flattery, and for a long time refused the title of father of his country, which was often bestowed upon the most worthless and tyrannical of the emperors. He despised informers, and rather than punish conspirators, he rewarded them with great liberality. When the king of Parthia addressed him with the subscription of "Arsaces king of kings to Flavius Vespasianus," the emperor was no way dissatisfied with the pride and insolence of the monarch, and answered him again in his own words, "Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces king of kings." To men of learning and merit, Vespasian was very liberal: 100,000 sesterces were annually paid from the public treasury to the different professors that were appointed to encourage and promote the arts and sciences. Yet in spite of this apparent generosity, some authors have taxed Vespasian with avarice. According to their accounts, he loaded the provinces with new taxes, he bought commodities, that he might sell them to a greater advantage, and even laid an impost upon urine, which gave occasion to Titus to ridicule the meanness of his father. Vespasian, regardless of his son's observation, was satisfied to show him the money that was raised from so productive a tax, asking him at the same time whether it smelt offensive. His ministers were the most avaricious of his subjects, and the emperor used very properly to remark that he treated them as sponges, by wetting them when dry, and squeezing them when they were wet. He has been accused of selling criminals their lives, and of condemning the most opulent to make himself master of their possessions. If, however, he was guilty of these meaner practices, they were all under the name of one of his concubines, who wished to enrich herself by the avarice and credulity of the emperor. Sueton. in Vitis.—Tacit. Hist. 4.

Vesper, or Vespërus, a name applied to the planet Venus when it was the evening star. Virg.

Vessa, a town of Sicily.

Vesta, a goddess, daughter of Rhea and Saturn, sister to Ceres and Juno. She is often confounded by the mythologists with Rhea, Ceres, Cybele, Proserpine, Hecate, and Tellus. When considered as the mother of the gods, she is the mother of Rhea and Saturn; and when considered as the patroness of the vestal virgins and the goddess of fire, she is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Under this last name she was worshipped by the Romans. Æneas was the first who introduced her mysteries into Italy, and Numa built her a temple where no males were permitted to go. The palladium of Troy was supposed to be preserved within her sanctuary, and a fire was continually kept lighted by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of the goddess. Vid. Vestales. If the fire of Vesta was ever extinguished, it was supposed to threaten the republic with some sudden calamity. The virgin by whose negligence it had been extinguished, was severely punished, and it was kindled again by the rays of the sun. The temple of Vesta was of a round form, and the goddess was represented in a long, flowing robe, with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared vessel, and in the other a javelin, or sometimes a palladium. On some medals she appears holding a drum in one hand, and a small figure of victory in the other. *Hesiod. Theog. v. 454.—Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 12.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 296.—Diod. 5.—Ovid. Vestâles, priestesses among the Romans, consecrated to the service of Vesta, as their name indicates. This office was very ancient, as the mother of Romulus was one of the vestals. Aeneas is supposed to have first chosen the vestals. Numa first appointed four, to which number Tarquin added two. They were always chosen by the monarchs, but after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the high priest was entrusted with the care of them. As they were to be virgins, they were chosen young, from the age of six to ten; and if there was not a sufficient number that presented themselves as candidates for the office, so virgins were selected, and they upon whom the lot fell were obliged to become priestesses. Plebeians as well as patricians were permitted to propose themselves, but it was required that they should be born of a good family, and be without blemish or deformity, in every part of their body. For 30 years they were to remain in the greatest continence; the 10 first years were spent in learning the duties of the order; the 10 following were employed in discharging them with fidelity and sanctity, and the 10 last in instructing such as had entered the novitiate. When the 30 years were elapsed, they were permitted to marry, or if they still preferred celibacy, they waited upon the rest of the vestals. As soon as a vestal was initiated, her head was shaved, to intimate the liberty of her person, as she was then free from the shackles of parental authority, and she was permitted to dispose of her possessions as she pleased. The employment of the vestals was to take care that the sacred fire of Vesta was not extinguished, for if it ever happened, it was deemed the prognostic of great calamities to the state; the offender was punished for her negligence, and severely scourged by the high priest. In such a case all was consternation at Rome, and the fire was again kindled by glasses with the rays of the sun. Another equally particular charge of the vestals was to keep a sacred pledge, on which depended the very existence of Rome, which, according to some, was the palladium of Troy, or some of the mysteries of the gods of Samothrace. The privileges of the vestals were great; they had the most honourable seats at public games and festivals; a licitor with the fasces always preceded them when they walked in public; they were carried in chariots when they pleased; and they had the power of pardoning criminals when led to execution, if they declared that their meeting was accidental. Their declarations in trials were received without the formality of an oath; they were chosen as arbiters in causes of moment and in the execution of wills, and so great was the deference paid them by the magistrates, as well as by the people, that the consuls themselves made way for them, and bowed their fasces when they passed before them. To insult them was a capital crime, and whoever attempted to violate their chastity, was beaten to death with scourges. If any of them died while in office, their body was buried within the walls of the city, an honour granted to few. Such of the vestals as proved incontinent were punished in the most rigorous manner. Numa ordered them to be stoned, but Tarquin the elder dug a large hole under the earth, where a bed was placed with a little bread, wine, water, and oil, and a lighted lamp, and the guilty vestal was stripped of the habit of her order, and compelled to descend into the subterraneous cavity, which was immediately shut, and she was left to die through hunger. Few of the vestals were guilty of incontinence, and for the space of 1000 years, during which the order continued established from the reign of Numa, only 18 were punished for the violation of their vow. The vestals were abolished by Theodosius the Great, and the fire of Vesta extinguished. The dress of the vestals was peculiar; they wore a white vest with purple borders, a white linen surplice called lincium supernum, above which was a great purple mantle which flowed to the ground, and which was tucked up when they offered sacrifices. They had a close covering on their head, called infula, from which hung ribands, or vitta. Their manner of living was sumptuous, as they were maintained at the public expense, and though originally satisfied with the simple diet of the Romans, their tables soon after displayed the luxuries and the superfluities of the great and opulent. Liv. 2, &c.—Plut. in Num., &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 30.—Flor. 1.—Propert. 4, el. 11.—Tacit. 4, c. 10.

Vestâlia, festival in honour of Vesta, observed at Rome on the 9th of June. Banquets were then prepared before the houses, and meat was sent to the vestals to be offered to the gods; millionaires were decked with garlands, and the asses that turned them were led round the city covered with garlands. The ladies walked in the procession bare-footed to the temple of the goddess, and an altar was erected to Jupiter surnamed Pastor. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 305.

Vestâlium Mater, a title given by the senate to Livia the mother of Tiberius, with the permission to sit among the vestal virgins at plays. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 16.

Vestia Oppia, a common prostitute of Capua. Vesticius Spurina, an officer sent by Otho to the borders of the Po, &c. Tacit.

Vestilius Sextus, a pretorian disgraced by Tiberius, because he was esteemed by Drusus. He killed himself. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 16.

Vestilla, a matron of a patrician family, who declared publicly before the magistrates that she was a common prostitute. She was banished to the island of Seriphos for her immodesty.

Vestini, a people of Italy near the Sabines, famous for the making of cheese. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Martial. 13, ep. 31.—Strab. 5.

L. Vestinus, a Roman knight appointed by Vespasian to repair the capitol, &c. Tacit. H. 4, c. 53.—Liv. 8, c. 29.—A consul put to death by Nero in the time of Piso's conspiracy.

Vesuvius. Vid. Vesuvius.
Vesdus, now Vise, a large mountain of Liguria, near the Alps, where the Po takes its rise. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 768.—Plin. 3, c. 19.

Vesulvius, a mountain of Campania, about six miles at the east of Naples, celebrated for its volcano, and now called Mount Soma. The ancients, particularly the writers of the Augustan age, spoke of Vesuvius as a place covered with orchards and vineyards, of which the middle was dry and barren. The first eruption of this volcano was in the 79th year of the christian era under Titus. It was accompanied by an earthquake, which overturned several cities of Campania, particularly Pompeii and Herculaneum, and the burning ashes which it threw up were carried not only over the neighbouring country, but as far as the shores of Egypt, Libya, and Syria. This eruption proved fatal to Pliny the naturalist. From that time the eruptions have been frequent. Vesuvius continually throws up a smoke, and sometimes ashes and flames. The perpendicular height of this mountain is 3780 feet. Dio. Cass. 46.—Varro, de R. 1, c. 6.—Liv. 23, c. 39.—Strab. 5.—*Tacit. Vetora castra, a Roman encampment in Germany, which became a town, now Santen, near Cleves. Tacit. H. 4, c. 18. Ann. 1, c. 45.

Vettius Sp., a Roman senator who was made interrex at the death of Romulus, till the election of another king. He nominated Numa, and resigned his office. Plut. in Num.—A man who accused Caesar of being concerned in Catiline's conspiracy.—Cato, one of the officers of the allies in the Marston war. He defeated the Romans, and was at last betrayed and murdered.—A Roman knight who became enamoured of a young female at Capua, and raised a tumult among the slaves who proclaimed him king. He was betrayed by one of his adherents, upon which he laid violent hands upon himself.

Vettona, a town of Umbria. Plin. 3, c. 14.
Vettones, Vetones, or Vectones, an ancient nation of Spain. Sil. 3, v. 378.—Plin. 25, c. 8.

Vetulonia, one of the chief cities of Etruria, whose hot waters were famous. The Romans were said to derive the badges of their magisterial offices from thence. Plin. 2, c. 203. l. 3, c. 3.—Ital. 8, v. 484.

Veturia, one of the Roman tribes, divided into two branches of the Junii and Sentii. It received its name from the Veturian family, which was originally called Vetustian. Liv. 36.—The mother of Coriolanus. She was solicited by all the Roman matrons to go to her son with her daughter-in-law, and entreat him not to make war against his country. She went and prevailed over Coriolanus, and for her services to the state, the Roman senate offered to reward her as she pleased. She only asked to raise a temple to the goddess of female fortune, which was done on the very spot where she had pacified her son. Liv. 2, c. 40.—Dionys. Hal. 7, &c.

Veturius, a Roman artist who made shields for Numa. Vid. Mamurium.—Caius, a Roman consul, accused before the people, and fined because he had acted with imprudence while in office.—A Roman who conspired against Galba. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 25.—A consul appointed one of the decemvirs.—Another consul defeated by the Samnites, and obliged to pass under the yoke with great ignominy.—A tribune of the people, &c.

L. Vetus, a Roman who proposed to open a communication between the Mediterranean and the German ocean by means of a canal. He was put to death by order of Nero.—A man accused of adultery, &c.

Ufens, a river of Italy near Tarracina. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 892.—Another river of Picenum. Liv. 5, c. 35.—A prince who assisted Turnus against Æneas. The Trojan monarch made a vow to sacrifice his four sons to appease the manes of his friend Pallas, in the same manner as Achilles is represented killing some Trojan youths on the tomb of Patroclus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 745. l. 10, v. 518. He was afterwards killed by Gyas. Id. 12, v. 460.

Ufentina, a Roman tribe first created A.U.C. 435, with the tribe Falerina, in consequence of the great increase of population at Rome. Liv. 9, c. 20.—Festus.

Via Æmylia, a celebrated road, made by the consul M. Æmylius Lepidus, A.U.C. 567. It led with the Flaminian road to Aquileia. There was also another of the same name in Etruria, which led from Pisa to Derthona.—Appia, was made by the censor Appius, and led from Rome to Capua, and from Capua to Brundisium, to the distance of 330 miles, which the Romans call a five days' journey. It passed successively through the towns and stages of Aricia, Forum Appii, Tarracina, Fundi, Minturnæ, Sinuessa, Capua, Caudium, Beneventum, Equotuticum, Herdonia, Canusium, Barium, Egnatia, to Brundisium. It was called, by way of eminence, regius viarum, made so strong, and the stones so well cemented together, that it remained entire for many hundred years. Some parts of it are still to be seen in the neighbourhood of Naples. Appius carried it only 130 miles, as far as Capua, A.U.C. 442, and it was finished as far as Brundisium by Augustus.—There was also another road called Minucia or Numicia, which led to Brundisium, but by what places is now uncertain.—Flaminia, was made by the censor Flaminius, A.U.C. 533. It led from the Campus Martius to the modern town of Rimini, on the Adriatic, through the country of the Osci and Etrurians, at the distance of about 360 miles.—Lata, one of the ancient streets of Rome.—Valeria, led from Rome to the country of the Marsi, through the territories of the Sabines. There were, besides, many streets and roads of inferior note, such as the Aurelia, Cassia, Campania, Argentina, Laticana, Domitiana, Ostiensis, Prænestina, &c., all of which were made and constantly kept in repair at the public expense.

Vindrus, the classical name of the Oder, which rises in Moravia, and falls by three mouths into the Baltic. Ptol.

Vibidia, one of the vestal virgins in the favour of Messalina, &c. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 32.

Vibidius, a friend of Mæcenæus. Horat. 2, sat. 8, v. 22.

Vibius, a Roman who refused to pay any attention to Cicero when banished, though he had received from him the most unbounded favours.—Siculus. Vid. Sica.—A proconsul of Spain, banished for ill conduct.—A Roman knight accused of extortion in Africa, and banished.—A man who poisoned himself at Capua.—Sequester, a Latin writer, whose treatise de Fluminibus, &c., is best edited by Oberlin, 8vo, Argent. 1778.

Vibo, a town of Lucania, anciently called Hippotionum and Hippo. Cic. ad Att. 3, c. 3.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—A town of Spain, of the Bruttii.

Vibulenus Agrippa, a Roman knight accused of treason. He attempted to poison himself, and was strangled in prison, though almost dead. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 40.—A mutinous soldier in the army of Germanicus, &c.

Vibullius Rufus, a friend of Pompey, taken by Cæsar, &c. Plut.—Cic. in ep.—A pretor in Nero's reign.

Vica Pota, a goddess at Rome, who presided over victory (à vincere et potiri). Liv. 2, c. 7.

Vicellius, a friend of Galba, who brought him news of Nero's death.

Vicentia, or Vicetia, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, at the north-west of the Adriatic. Tacit. Hist. 3.

Victor Sext. Aurelius, a writer in the age of Constantius. He gave the world a concise history of the Roman emperors, from the age of Augustus to his own time, or A.D. 360. He also wrote an abridgment of the Roman history before the age of Julius Cæsar, which is now extant, and ascribed by different authors to C. Nepos, to Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, &c. Victor was greatly esteemed by the emperors, and honoured with the consulship. The best editions of Victor are that of Pitiscus, 8vo, Utr. 1666; and that of Arzæmus, 4to, Amst. 1733.

Victoria, one of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Vice, supposed to be the daughter of the giant Pallas, or of Titan and Styx. The goddess of victory was sister to Strength and Valour, and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. She was greatly honoured by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. Sylla raised her a temple at Rome, and instituted festivals in her honour. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm tree in her hand. A golden statue of this goddess, weighing 320 pounds, was presented to the Romans by Hiero king of Syracuse, and deposited in the temple of Jupiter, on the Capitoline hill. Liv. 22.—Varro, de L. L.—Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin. pref. fab.—Suet.

Victorius, a man of Aquitain, who, A.D. 463, invented the paschal cycle of 532 years.

Victorina, a celebrated matron who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grandson of the same name, were declared emperors, but when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites called Tetricus. She was some time after poisoned, A.D. 269, and according to some by Tetricus himself.

Victorinus, a christian writer, who composed a worthless epic poem on the death of the seven children mentioned in the Maccabees, and distinguished himself more by the active part he took in his writings against the Arians.

Victumvise, a small town of Insubria near Placentia. Liv. 21, c. 45.

Vicus longus, a street at Rome, where an altar was raised to the goddess Pudicitia, or the modesty of the plebeians. Liv. 10, c. 23.—Cyprius, a place on the Esquiline hill, where the Sabinæ dwelt.

Viducasses, a people of Normandy. Plin. 4, c. 18.

Villio lex, annalis or annaria, by L. Villius the tribune, A.U.C. 574, defined the proper age required for exercising the office of a magistrate, 25 years for the questorship, 27 or 28 for the edileship or tribuneship, for the office of pretor 30, and for that of consul 43. Liv. 11, c. 44.

Villius, a tribune of the people, author of the Villian law, and thence called Annalis, a surname borne by his family. Liv. 11, c. 44.—Publius, a Roman ambassador sent to Antiochus. He held a conference with Antiochus, who was at that monarch's court.—A man who disgraced himself by his criminal amours with the daughter of Sylla. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 64.

Viminalis, one of the seven hills on which Rome was built, so called from the number of osiers (vimines) which grew there. Servius Tullius first made it part of the city. Jupiter had a temple there, whence he was called Viminalis. Liv. 1, c. 44.—Varro, L. L. 4, c. 8.

Vinalia, festivals at Rome in honour of Jupiter and Venus.

Vicentius, one of the christian fathers, A.D. 434, whose works are best edited by Baluzius, Paris, 1669.

Vincius, a Roman knight, condemned under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 40.—An officer in Germany.

Vindalius, a writer in the reign of Constantius, who wrote 10 books on agriculture.

Vindelici, an ancient people of Germany, between the heads of the Rhine and the Danube. Their country, which was called Vindelicia, forms now part of Swabia and Bavaria, and their chief town, Augusta Vindelicorum, is now Ausburg. Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 18.

Vindemiator, a constellation that rose about the nodes of March. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 407.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

Vindex Julius, a governor of Gaul, who revolted against Nero, and determined to deliver the Roman empire from his tyranny. He was followed by a numerous army, but at last defeated by one of the emperor's generals. When he perceived that all was lost he laid violent hands upon himself, 68 A.D. Sentent. in Gall.—Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 51.—Plin. 9, ep. 10.

Vindicatus, a slave who discovered the conspiracy which some of the most noble of the Roman citizens had formed to restore Tarquin to his throne. He was amply rewarded and made a citizen of Rome. Liv. 2, c. 5.—Plut. in Popl.

Vindili, a nation of Germany. Plin. 4, c. 14.

Vindonissa, now Wendisch, a town of the Helvetii on the Aar, in the territory of Berne. Tacit. 4, Hist. 61 & 70.

Viniolus, a Roman consul poisoned by Messalina, &c.—A man who conspired against Nero, &c.

Vindius, a miser mentioned by Horace, 1, sat. 1, v. 95. Some manuscripts read Numidius and Umidius.

T. Vinus, a commander in the pretorian guards, intimate with Galba, of whom he became the first minister. He was honoured with the consulship, and some time after murdered. Tacit. H. 1, c. 11, 42 & 48.—Plut.—A man who revolted from Nero.

Vinnius Asella, a servant of Horace, to whom ep. 13 is addressed, as injunctions how to deliver to Augustus some poems from his master.

Vipsania, a daughter of M. Agrippa, mother of Drusus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She was married to Tiberius when a private man, and when she had been repudiated, she married Asinius Gallus. Tacit. A. 1, c. 12. l. 3, c. 19.

Virbius (qui inter viros bis fuit), a name given to Hippolytus, after he had been brought back to life by Æsculapius, at the instance of Diana, who pitied his unfortunate end. Virgil makes him son of Hippolytus. Æn. 7, v. 762—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 544—Hygin. fab. 251.

Publ. Virgilius Maro, called the prince of the Latin poets, was born at Andes, a village near Mantua, about 70 years before Christ, on the 15th of October. His first years were spent at Cremona, where his taste was formed, and his rising talents first exercised. The distribution of the lands of Cremona to the soldiers of Augustus, after the battle of Philippi, nearly proved fatal to the poet, and when he attempted to dispute the possession of his fields with a soldier, Virgil was obliged to save his life from the resentment of the lawless veteran, by swimming across a river. This was the beginning of his greatness; he with his father repaired to Rome, where he soon formed an acquaintance with Mæcenas, and recommended himself to the favours of Augustus. The emperor restored his lands to the poet, whose modest muse knew so well how to pay the tribute of gratitude, and his first bucolic was written to thank the patron, as well as to tell the world that his favours were not unworthily bestowed. The 10 bucolics were written in about three years. The poet showed his countrymen that he could write with graceful simplicity, with elegance, delicacy of sentiments, and with purity of language. Some time after, Virgil undertook the Georgics, a poem the most perfect and finished of all Latin compositions. The Æneid was begun, as some suppose, at the particular request of Augustus, and the poet, while he attempted to prove that the Julian family was lineally descended from the founder of Lavinium, visibly described in the pious and benevolent character of his hero the amiable qualities of his imperial patron. The great merit of this poem is well known, and it will ever remain undecided which of the two poets, either Homer or Virgil, is more entitled to our praise, our applause, and our admiration. The writer of the Iliad stood as a pattern to the favourite of Augustus. The voyage of Æneas is copied from the Odyssey; and for his battles, Virgil found a model in the wars of Troy, and the animated descriptions of the Iliad. The poet died before he had revised this immortal work, which had already engaged his time for 11 successive years. He had attempted to attend his patron in the east, but he was detained at Naples on account of his ill health. He, however, went to Athens, where he met Augustus in his return, but he soon after fell sick at Megara, and though indisposed, he ordered himself to be removed to Italy. He landed at Brundisium, where a few days after he expired, the 22nd of September, in the 51st year of his age, B.C. 19. He left the greatest part of his immense possessions to his friends, particularly to Mæcenas, Tucca, and Augustus, and he ordered, as his last will, his unfinished poem to be burnt. These last injunctions were disobeyed; and according to the words of an ancient poet, Augustus saved his favourite Troy from a second and more dismal conflagration. The poem was delivered by the emperor to three of his literary friends. They were ordered to revise and to expunge whatever they deemed improper; but they were strictly enjoined not to make any additions, and hence, as some suppose, the causes that so many lines of the Æneid are unfinished, particularly in the last books. The body of the poet, according to his own directions, was conveyed to Naples, and interred with much solemnity in a monument, erected on the road that leads from Naples to Puteoli. The following modest distich was engraved on the tomb, written by the poet some few moments before he expired:

Mantua me genuit; Calabri rapuere; tenet nunc Parthenope: cecini pascua, rura, duces.

The Romans were not insensible of the merit of their poet. Virgil received much applause in the capital, and when he entered the theatre, he was astonished and delighted to see the crowded audience rise up to him as to an emperor, and welcome his approach by reiterated plaudits. He was naturally modest, and of a timorous disposition. When people crowded to gaze upon him, or pointed at him with the finger with rapture, the poet blushed, and stole away from them, and often hid himself in shops to be removed from the curiosity and the admiration of the public. The most liberal and gratifying marks of approbation he received were from the emperor and from Octavia. He attempted in his Æneid to paint the virtues, and to lament the premature death of the son of Octavia, and he was desired by the emperor to repeat the lines in the presence of the afflicted mother. He had no sooner begun O male, &c., than Octavia burst into tears; he continued, but he had artfully suppressed the name of her son, and when he repeated in the 16th line the well-known words, Tu Marcellus eris, the princess swooned away, and the poet withdrew, but not without being liberally rewarded. Octavia presented him 10 sesterces for every one of his verses in praise of her son, the whole of which was equivalent to 2000l. English money. As an instance of his modesty, the following circumstance has been recorded. Virgil wrote this distich, in which he compared his patron to Jupiter,

Nocte pluit tota, redeunt spectacula mane, Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet, and placed it in the night on the gates of the palace of Augustus. Inquiries were made for the author by order of Augustus, and when Virgil had the diffidence not to declare himself, Bathyllus, a contemptible poet of the age, claimed the verses as his own, and was liberally rewarded. This displeased Virgil; he again wrote the verses near the palace and under them with the beginning of another line in these words,

Hæc ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores;

Sic vos non vobis,

four times repeated. Augustus wished the lines to be finished. Bathyllus seemed unable, and Virgil at last, by completing the stanza in the following order—

*Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves;
Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis oves;
Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves;*

proved himself to be the author of the distich, and the poetical usurper became the sport and ridicule of Rome. In the works of Virgil we can find a more perfect and satisfactory account of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Romans, than in all the other Latin poets, Ovid excepted. Everything he mentions is founded upon historical truth, and though he borrowed much from his predecessors, and even whole lines from Ennius, yet he has had the happiness to make it all his own. He was ungenerously severe in revising his own poetry, and he used often to compare himself to a bear that licks her cubs into shape. In his connections, Virgil was remarkable; his friends enjoyed his unbounded confidence, and his library and possessions seemed to be the property of the public. Like other great men, he was not without his enemies and detractors in his lifetime, but from their aspersions he received additional lustre. Among the very numerous and excellent editions of Virgil, these few may be collected as the best: that of Massivius, 2 vols. 4to, Leovardie, 1717; of Baskerville, 4to, Birmingham, 1757; of the Variator, in 8vo, L. Bat. 1691; of Heyne, 4 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1767; of Edinburgh, 2 vols. 12mo, 1755; and of Glasgow, 12mo, 1758. Pater. 2, c. 36.—Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 40.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 61.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 51.—Mart. 3, ep. 56.—Juv. 11, v. 178.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 3, ep. 21.—

Caius, a pretor of Sicily, who, when Cicero was banished, refused to receive the exiled orator, though his friend, for fear of the resentment of Clodius. Cic. ad Q. Frat.

Virginia, a daughter of the centurion L. Virginius. Appius Claudius the decemvir became enamoured of her, and attempted to remove her from the place where she resided. She was claimed by one of his favourites as the daughter of a slave, and Appius, in the capacity and with the authority of judge, had pronounced the sentence, and delivered her into the hands of his friend, when Virginius, informed of his violent proceedings, arrived from the camp. The father demanded to see his daughter, and when this request was granted, he snatched a knife and plunged it into Virginia's breast, exclaiming, "This is all, my dearest daughter, I can give thee, to preserve thy chastity from the lust and violence of a tyrant." No sooner was the blow given, than Virginius ran to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The soldiers were astonished and incensed, not against the murderer, but the tyrant that was the cause of Virginia's death, and they immediately marched to Rome. Appius was seized, but he destroyed himself in prison, and prevented the execution of the law. Spurius Oppius, another of the decemvirs who had not opposed the tyrant's views, killed himself also, and Marcus Claudius the favourite of Appius was put to death, and the decemviral power abolished, about 449 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 44, &c.—Juv. 10, v. 294.

Virgilius, the father of Virginia, made tribune of the people. Vid. Virginia.—A tribune of the people who accused Q. Cæso the son of Cincinnatus. He increased the number of the tribunes to 10, and distinguished himself by his seditions against the patricians.—Another tribune in the age of Camillus, fined for his opposition to a law which proposed going to Veii.—An augur who died of the plague.—Caius, a pretor of Sicily, who opposed the entrance of Cicero into his province, though under many obligations to the orator. Some read Virgilius.—A tribune who encouraged Clivia to criminate Sylla.—One of the generals of Nero in Germany. He made war against Vindex and conquered him. He was treated with great coldness by Galba, whose interest he had supported with so much success. He refused all dangerous stations, and though twice offered the imperial purple, he rejected it with disdain. Plut.—A Roman orator and rhetorician.

Viriathus, a mean shepherd of Lusitania, who gradually rose to power, and by first heading a gang of robbers, saw himself at last followed by a numerous army. He made war against the Romans with uncommon success, and for 14 years enjoyed the envied title of protector of public liberty in the provinces of Spain. Many generals were defeated, and Pompey himself was ashamed to find himself beaten. Cæpio was at last sent against him. But his despair of conquering him by force of arms, obliged him to have recourse to artifice, and he had the meanness to bribe the servants of Viriathus to murder their master, B.C. 40. Flor. 2, c. 17.—Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 52 & 54.

Viridomarus, a young man of great power among the Adui. Cæsar greatly honoured him, but he fought at last against the Romans. Cæsar. Bell. G. 7, c. 39, &c.

Viriopläca, a goddess among the Romans who presided over the peace of families, whence her name (virum placare). If any quarrel happened between a man and his wife, they generally repaired to the temple of the goddess, which was erected on the Palatine mount, and came back reconciled. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.

Virro, a fictitious name introduced in Juvenal's fifth sat.

Virtus. All virtues were made deities among the Romans. Marcellus erected two temples, one to Virtue, and the other to Honour. They were built in such a manner, that to see the temple of Honour it was necessary to pass through that of Virtue; a happy allegory among a nation free and independent. The principal Virtues were distinguished, each by their attire. Prudence was known by her rule, and her pointing to a globe at her feet; Temperance had a bridle; Justice had an equal balance, and Fortitude leant against her sword; Honesty was clad in a transparent vest; Modesty appeared veiled; Clemency wore an olive branch, and Devotion threw incense upon an altar; Tranquility was seen to lean on a column; Health was known by her serpent, Liberty by her cap, and Gaiety by her myrtle. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 23.—Plaut. in Amph. Prof.—Liv. 29, c. 11.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 20.

Visargis, a river of Germany, now called the Weser, and falling into the German ocean. Varus and his legions were cut to pieces there by the Germans. Vell. 2, c. 105.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 70, l. 2, c. 9.

Viscella, now Wells, a town of Noricum, between the Ens and Mure. Cic. Am. 11.

Visellia lex, was made by Visellius Varro the consul, A.U.C. 776, to restrain the introduction of improper persons into the offices of the state.

L. Visellius Varro, a lieutenant in Germany under Tiberius. Tacit. Am. 3, c. 41. l. 4, c. 17.

Visellus, a man whose father-in-law the commentators of Horace believe to have been afflicted with a hermia, on their observations on this verse (1. sat. 1, v. 105), Est inter Tanaisim quiddam, sœcerumque Viselli.

Vistula, a river falling into the Baltic, the eastern boundary of ancient Germany.

Vitellia, a Roman colony on the borders of the Aequi. Liv. 5, c. 29.

Vitellius Aulus, a Roman raised by his vices to the throne. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families of Rome, and as such he gained an easy admission to the palace of the emperors. The greatest part of his youth was spent at Capræ, where his willingness and compliance to gratify the most vicious propensities of Tiberius raised his father to the dignity of consul and governor of Syria. The applause he gained in this school of debauchery was too great and flattering to induce Vitellius to alter his conduct, and no longer to be one of the votaries of vice. Caligula was pleased with his skill in driving a chariot. Claudius loved him because he was a great gamester, and he recommended himself to the favours of Nero by wishing him to sing publicly in the crowded theatre. With such an insinuating disposition, it is not to be wondered that Vitellius became so great. He did not fall with his patrons, like the other favourites, but the death of an emperor seemed to raise him to greater honours, and to procure him fresh applause. He passed through all the offices of the state, and gained over the soldiery by donations and liberal promises. He was at the head of the Romans legions in Germany when Otho was proclaimed emperor, and the exaltation of his rival was no sooner heard in the camp, than he was likewise invested with the purple by his soldiers. He accepted with pleasure the dangerous office, and instantly marched against Otho. Three battles were fought, and in all Vitellius was conquered. A fourth, however, in the plains between Mantua and Cremona, left him master of the field and of the Roman empire. He feasted his eyes in viewing the bodies of the slain and the ground covered with blood, and regardless of the insalubrity of the air, proceeding from so many carcases, he told his attendants that the smell of a dead enemy was always sweet. His first care was not like that of a true conqueror, to alleviate the distresses of the conquered, or patronize the friends of the dead, but it was to insult their misfortunes, and to intoxicate himself with the companions of his debauchery in the field of battle. Each successive day exhibited a scene of greater extravagance. Vitellius feasted four or five times a day, and such was his excess that he often made himself vomit to begin his repast afresh, and to gratify his palate with more luxury. His food was of the most rare and exquisite nature; the deserts of Libya, the shores of Spain, and the waters of the Carpathian sea, were diligently searched to supply the table of the emperor. The most celebrated of his feasts was that with which he was treated by his brother Lucius. The table, among other meats, was covered with 2000 different dishes of fish, and 7000 of fowls, and so expensive was he in everything, that above seven millions sterling were spent in maintaining his table in the space of four months; and Josephus has properly observed, that if Vitellius had reigned long, the great opulence of all the Roman empire would have been found insufficient to defray the expenses of his banquets. This extravagance, which delighted the favourites, soon raised the indignation of the people. Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the army, and his minister Primus was sent to destroy the imperial glutton. Vitellius concealed himself under the bed of the porter of his palace, but this obscure retreat betrayed him; he was dragged naked through the streets, his hands were tied behind his back, and a drawn sword was placed under his chin to make him lift his head. After suffering the greatest insults from the populace, he was at last carried to the place of execution, and put to death with repeated blows. His head was cut off and fixed to a pole, and his mutilated body dragged with a hook and thrown into the Tiber, A. D. 69, after a reign of one year, except 12 days. Suet.—Tacit. Hist. 2.—Entrop.—Dio.—Plut.—Lucius, the father of the emperor, obtained great honours by his flattery to the emperors. He was made governor of Syria, and in this distant province he obliged the Parthians to sue for peace. His adulation to Messalina is well known, and he obtained as a particular favour the honourable office of pulling off the shoes of the empress, &c. Suet., &c.—A brother of the emperor, who enjoyed his favours by encouraging his gluttony, &c.—Publius, an uncle of the emperor of that name. He was accused under Nero of attempts to bribe the people with money from the treasury against the emperor. He killed himself before his trial.—One of the flatterers of Tiberius.—An officer of the pretorians under Otho.—A son of the emperor Vitellius, put to death by one of his father's friends.—Some of the family of the Vitellii conspired with the Aquilii and other illustrious Romans to restore Tarquin to his throne. Their conspiracy was discovered by the consuls, and they were severely punished. Plut., &c.

Viterbum, a town of Tuscany, where Fanum Volturæ stood. It is not mentioned by classical writers. Liv. 4, c. 23 & 61. l. 5, c. 17.

Vitia, a mother put to death by Tiberius for weeping at the death of her son, &c. Tacit. Ann. 7, c. 10.

Vitræus, a surname of Mars. Ovid.

M. Vitruvius Pollio, a celebrated architect in the age of Augustus, born at Fonniz. He is known only by his writings, and nothing is recorded in history of his life or private character. He wrote a treatise on his profession, which he dedicated to Augustus, and it is the only book on architecture now extant written by the ancients. In this work he plainly shows that he was master of his profession, and that he possessed both genius and abilities. The best edition of Vitruvius is that of De Laet, Amst. 1649.

Vitulia, a deity among the Romans who presided over festivals and rejoicings. Macrob. 3, c. 2.

Vituliana via, a road in the country of Arpinum. Cic. Q. fr. 3, ep. 1.

Ulpia Trajana, a Roman colony planted in Sarmatia by Trajan.

Ulpianus Domitius, a lawyer in the reign of Alexander Severus, of whom he became the secretary and principal minister. He raised a persecution against the christians, and was at last murdered by the pretorian guards, of which he had the command, A. D. 226. There are some fragments of his compositions on civil law still extant. The Greek commentaries of Ulpian on Demosthenes were printed in fol. 1527, apud Aldum.—Marcellus, an officer in the age of Commodus.—Julianus, a man sent to oppose Heliogabalus, &c.

Ulbæra, a small town of Latium on the river Astura, where Augustus was educated. Juv. 10, v. 102.—Horat. l. 1, ep. 11.

Ulysses, a king of the islands of Ithaca and Dulichium, son of Anticlea and Laertes, or, according to some, of Sisyphus. Vid. Sisyphus and Anticlea. He became, like the other princes of Greece, one of the suitors of Helen, but as he despaired of success in his applications, on account of the great numbers of his competitors, he solicited the hand of Penelope the daughter of Icarus. Tyndarus the father of Helen favoured the addresses of Ulysses, as by him he was directed to choose one of his daughter's suitors without offending the others, and to bind them all by a solemn oath, that they would unite together in protecting Helen if any violence was ever offered to her person. Ulysses had no sooner obtained the hand of Penelope, than he returned to Ithaca, where his father resigned him the crown, and retired to peace and rural solitude. The rape of Helen, however, by Paris, did not long permit him to remain in his kingdom, and as he was bound to defend her against every intruder, he was summoned to the war with the other princes of Greece. Pretending to be insane, not to leave his beloved Penelope, he yoked a horse and a bull together, and ploughed the seashore, where he sowed salt instead of corn. This dissimulation was soon discovered, and Palamedes, by placing before the plough of Ulysses his infant son Telemachus, convinced the world that the father was not mad who had the providence to turn away the plough from the furrow, not to hurt his child. Ulysses was therefore obliged to go to the war, but he did not forget him who had discovered his pretended insanity. Vid. Palamedes. During the Trojan war, the king of Ithaca was courted for his superior prudence and sagacity. By his means Achilles was discovered among the daughters of Lycomedes king of Scyros (Vid. Achilles), and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos, and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. Vid. Philoctetes. He was not less distinguished for his activity and valour. With the assistance of Diomedes he murdered Rhesus, and slaughtered the sleeping Thracians in the midst of their camp, (Vid. Rhesus and Dolon), and he introduced himself into the city of Priam, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans. Vid. Palladium. For these eminent services he was universally applauded by the Greeks, and he was rewarded with the arms of Achilles, which Ajax had disputed with him. After the Trojan war Ulysses embarked on board his ships to return to Greece, but he was exposed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coasts of Africa, and visited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. Polyphemus, who was the king of the Cyclops, seized Ulysses with his companions, five of whom he devoured (Vid. Polyphemus), but the prince of Ithaca intoxicated him and put out his eye, and at last escaped from the dangerous cave where he was confined, by tying himself under the belly of the sheep of the Cyclops when led to pasture. In Æolia he met with a friendly reception, and Æolus gave him, confined in bags, all the wind which could obstruct his return to Ithaca, but the curiosity of his companions to know what the bags contained proved nearly fatal. The winds rushed with impetuosity, and all the fleet was destroyed, except the ship which carried Ulysses. From thence he was thrown upon the coasts of the Læstrygonæ, and of the island Ææa, where the magician Circe changed all his companions into pigs for their voluptuousness. He escaped their fate by means of an herb which he had received from Mercury, and after he had obliged the magician by force of arms to restore his companions to his original shape, he yielded to her charms, and made her mother of Telegonus. He visited the infernal regions and consulted Tiresias how to regain his country in safety; and after he had received every necessary information, he returned on earth. He passed along the coasts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe (Vid. Sirens), and escaped the whirlpools and shoals of Scylla, and Charybdis. On the coast of Sicily his companions stole and killed some oxen that were sacred to Apollo, for which the god destroyed the ships, and all were drowned except Ulysses, who saved himself on a plank, and swam to the island of Calypso, in Oxygia. There, for seven years, he forgot Ithaca, in the arms of the goddess, by whom he had two children. The gods at last interfered, and Calypso, by order of Mercury, suffered him to depart, after she had furnished him with a ship, and everything requisite for the voyage. He had almost reached the island of Corcyra, when Neptune, still mindful that his son Polyphemus had been robbed of his sight by the perfidy of Ulysses, raised a storm and sunk his ship. Ulysses swam with difficulty to the island of the Phæacians, where the kindness of Nausicaa, and the humanity of her father king Alcinoüs, entertained him for a while. He related the series of his misfortunes to the monarch, and at last, by his benevolence, he was conducted in a ship to Ithaca. The Phæacians laid him on the sea-shore as he was asleep, and Ulysses found himself safely restored to his country after a long absence of 30 years. He was well informed that his palace was besieged by a number of suitors, who continually disturbed the peace of Penelope, and therefore he assumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and made himself known to his son, and his faithful shepherd Eumæus. With them he took measures to re-establish himself on his throne; he went to the palace, and was personally convinced of the virtues and of the fidelity of Penelope. Before his arrival was publicly known, all the importuning suitors were put to death, and Ulysses restored to the peace and bosom of his family. Vid. Laertes, Penelope, Telemachus, Eumæus. He lived about 16 years after his return, and was at last killed by his son Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca, with the hopes of making himself known to his father. This unfortunate event had been foretold to him by Tiresias, who assured him that he should die by the violence of something that was to issue from the bosom of the sea. Vid. Telegonus. According to some authors, Ulysses went to consult the oracle of Apollo after his return to Ithaca, and he had the meanness to seduce Eriippe the daughter of a king of Epirus, who had treated him with great kindness. Eriippe had a son by him whom she called Euryalus. When come to years of puberty, Euryalus was sent to Ithaca by his mother, but Penelope no sooner knew who he was than she resolved to destroy him. Therefore, when Ulysses returned, he put to immediate death his unknown son on the crimination of Penelope his wife, who accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The adventures of Ulysses in his return to Ithaca from the Trojan war are the subject of Homer's Odyssey. *Homer. Il. & Od.—Virg. Æn. 2, 3, 8c.—Dictys. Cræ. 1, 8c.—Ovid. Met. 13. Ulyseum, a promontory of Sicily, west of Fachinus.

- Umbra, a lake of Umbria near the Tiber. Probert. 4. cl. 1. v. 124.
- Umbra Pompeia, a portico of Pompey at Rome. Mart. 5. ep. 10.
- Umbria, a country of Italy, separated from Etruria by the Tiber, bounded on the north by the Adriatic sea, east by Picenum and the country of the Sabines, and south by the river Nar. Some derive the word Umbria ab imbribus, the frequent showers that were supposed to fall there, or from the shadow (umbra) of the Apennines which hung over it. Umbria had many cities of note. The Umbrians opposed the Romans in the infancy of their empire, but afterwards they became their allies, about the year U.C. 434. Catull. 40. v. 11.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3. c. 12.—Dionys. Hal.
- Umbrigiugus, a soothsayer, who foretold approaching calamities to Galba. Juv. 3. v. 21.—Tacit. H. 1. c. 27.
- Umbro, a navigable river of Italy. Plin. 3. c. 5.—A general who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and was killed during the war. He could assuage the fury of serpents by his songs, and counteract the poisonous effects of their bite. Virg. Æn. 7. v. 752. l. 10. v. 544.
- Unca, a surname of Minerva among the Phœnicians and Thebans.
- Uncha, a town of Mesopotamia.
- Undecemviri, magistrates at Athens, to whom such as were publicly condemned were delivered to be executed. C. Nep. in Phoc.
- Unelli, a people of Cotantin in Gaul, conquered by Cæsar. Cæs. Bell. G. 2. c. 34.
- Unigēna, a surname of Minerva, as sprung of Jupiter alone.
- Unxia, a surname of Juno, derived from ungere, to anoint, because it was usual among the Romans for the bride to anoint the threshold of her husband, and from this necessary ceremony wives were called Unxores, and afterwards Uxores, from Unxia, who presided over them. Arnob. 3.
- Voconius, part of mount Jura in Gaul. Tacit. H. 1. c. 68.
- Vocōnia lex, de testamentis, by Q. Voconius Saxa the tribune, A.U.C. 584, enacted that no woman should be left heir to an estate, and that no rich person should leave by his will more than the fourth part of his fortune to a woman. This step was taken to prevent the decay of the noblest and most illustrious of the families of Rome. This law was abrogated by Augustus.
- Voconii forum, a town of Gaul, between Antibes and Marseilles. Cic. 10. Fam. 17.
- Vocōnius Victor, a Latin poet. Æc. Martialis. 7. ep. 28.—Saxa, a tribune who made a law.—An officer of Lucullus in Asia.
- Vocontia, now Vasio. Sil. 3. v. 167.
- Vogēsus, now Vauge, a mountain of Belgic Gaul, which separates the Sequani from the Lingones. Lucan. 1. v. 397.—Cæs. G. 4. c. 10.
- Volse, a city of the Æqui. Liv. 4. c. 49.
- Volaginius, a soldier who assassinated one of his officers. Æc. Tacit. H. 2. c. 75.
- Volana, a town of the Samnites.
- Volandum, a fortified place of Armenia.
- Volaterra, an ancient town of Etruria, famous for hot baths. Perseus the satirist was born there. Liv. 10. c. 12.—Strab. 5.—Cic. 15. Fam. 4.
- Volcæ, or Volgæ, a people of Gaul between the Garonne and the Rhone. Liv. 21. c. 26.—Mela. 2. c. 5.
- Volci, an inland town of Lucania, now Lauria. Liv. 27. c. 15.—A town of Etruria. Plin. 3. c. 5.
- Vologēsēs, a name common to many of the kings of Parthia, who made war against the Roman emperors. Tacit. 12. Ann. 14.
- Volscens, a Latin chief who discovered Nisus and Euryalus as they returned from the Rutulian camp loaded with spoils. He killed Euryalus, and was himself immediately stabbed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9. v. 370 & 442.
- Volsci, or Volci, a people of Latium, whose territories are bounded on the south by the Tyrrhene sea, north by the country of the Hernici and Marsi, west by the Latins and Rutulians, and east by Campania. Their chief cities were Antium, Circeii, Anxur, Corioli, Fregellæ, Arpinum, &c. Ancus king of Rome made war against them, and in the time of the republic they became formidable enemies, till they were at last conquered with the rest of the Latins. Liv. 3 & 4.—Virg. G. 2. v. 168. Æn. 9. v. 505. l. 11. v. 546, &c.—Strab. 5.—Mela. 2. c. 4 & 5.
- Volturnum, a town of Etruria in Italy, destroyed, according to Pliny 2. c. 53, by fire from heaven. The inhabitants numbered their years by fixing nails in the temple of Nortia, a Tuscan goddess. Liv. 5. c. 31. L. 7. c. 3.—Juv. 15. v. 191.—Tacit. Ann. 4.
- Volturna, one of the Roman tribes.
- Volubilis, a town of Africa, supposed Fez, the capital of Morocco. Plin. 5. c. 1.
- Volumnæ Fanum, a temple in Etruria, sacred to the goddess Volumna, who presided over the will and over compliance, where the states of the country used to assemble. Viterbo now stands on the spot. Liv. 4. c. 23. l. 5. c. 17. l. 6. c. 2.
- Volumnia, the wife of Coriolanus. Liv. 2. c. 40.—The freedwoman of Volumnius Eutrapelus. Cic. Phil. 2. c. 24.
- Volumnus and Volumna, two deities who presided over the will. They were chiefly invoked at marriages to preserve concord between the husband and wife. They were particularly worshipped by the Etrurians. Liv. 4. c. 61.
- T. Volumnius, a Roman famous for his friendship towards M. Lucullus, whom M. Antony had put to death. His great lamentations were the cause that he was dragged to the triumvir, of whom he demanded to be conducted to the body of his friend, and there to be put to death. His request was easily granted. Liv. 124. c. 20.—A mimic whom Brutus put to death.—An Etrurian who wrote tragedies in his own native language.—A consul who defeated the Samnites and the Etrurians, &c. Liv. 9.—A friend of M. Brutus. He was preserved when that great republican killed himself, and he wrote an account of his death and of his actions, from which Plutarch selected some remarks.—A prefect of Syria, B.C. 11.—A Roman knight put to death by Catiline.
- Voluptas and Voluptia, the goddess of sensual pleasures, worshipped at Rome, where she had a temple. She was represented as a young and beautiful woman, well dressed, and elegantly adorned, seated on a throne, and having virtue under her feet. Cic. de N. D. 2. c. 25.—Macrob. 1. c. 10.—Aug. de Civ. D. 4. c. 8.
- C. Volusenus, a military tribune in Cæsar's army, &c. Cæs. Bell. G. 3.
- Volusianus, a Roman taken as colleague on the imperial throne, by his father Gallus. He was killed by his soldiers.

Vidius, a poet of Patavia, who wrote, like Ennius, the annals of Rome in verse. Seneca, ep. 94. Catull. 97, v. 7.—Saturinus, a governor of Rome, who died in the 93rd year of his age, beloved and respected, under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 13.—Causus, a soldier at the siege of Cremona, &c.—One of Nero's officers. *Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 51.

Volusus, a friend of Turnus. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 403.

Volux, a son of Bocchus, whom the Romans defeated. Sylla suspected his fidelity, &c. Sallust. Jug. 105.

Vomanius, a river of Picenum in Italy. Plin. 3, c. 13.—Sil. It. 8, v. 438.

Vonones, a king of Parthia expelled by his subjects, and afterwards placed on the throne of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 14.—Another king of Armenia.—A man made king of Parthia by Augustus.

Vopiscus, a native of Syracuse, 303, A.D. who wrote the life of Aurelian, Lactius, Florianus, Probus, Firmus, Carus, &c. He is one of the six authors who are called Historie Auguste scriptores, but he excels all others in the elegance of his style, and the manner in which he relates the various actions of the emperors. He is not, however, without his faults, and we look in vain for the purity or perspicuity of the writers of the Augustan age.

Voranus, a freedman of Q. Lutatius Catulus, famous for his robberies as well as his cunning, &c. Horat. 1, sat. 8, v. 39.

Votienus Montanus, a man of learning, banished to one of the Balesares for his malevolent reflections upon Tiberius. Ovid has celebrated him as an excellent poet. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 42.

Upis, the father of one of the Dianas, mentioned by the ancients, from which circumstance Diana herself is called Upia. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Callim. in Dian.

Urania, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, who presided over astronomy. She is generally called mother of Linus by Apollo, and of the god Hymenæus by Bacchus. She was represented as a young virgin dressed in an azure-coloured robe, crowned with stars, and holding a globe in her hands, and having many mathematical instruments placed round. Hesiod. Theog. 77.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 162.—A surname of Venus, the same as Celestial. She was supposed, in that character, to preside over beauty and generation, and was called daughter of Uranus or Cælus by the Light. Her temples in Asia, Africa, Greece, and Italy were numerous. Plato in Symp. —Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Paus. 2, c. 24, &c. L. 7, c. 26, &c.—A town of Cyprus.

Uranii, or Urii, a people of Gant.

Uranopolis, a town at the top of Athos.

Uranus, or Ouranus, a deity, the same as Cælus, the most ancient of all the gods. He married Tithæa or the Earth, by whom he had Cæus, Creus, Hyperion, Mnemosyne, Cottus, Phoebe, Briareus, Thetis, Saturn, Gyges, called from their mother Titans. His children conspired against him, because he confined them in the bosom of the earth, and his son Saturnus intimated him, and drove him from his throne.

Urba, now Orbe, a town of the Helvetii, on a river of the same name.

Urbicus, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis.

Urbicus, an actor at Rome, in Domitian's reign. Juv. 6.

Urbium, now Urbino, a town of Umbria.

Plin. 3, c. 14.

Urge, now Gorgona, an island in the bay of Pisa, 25 miles west of Leghorn, famous for anchovies. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Uria, a town of Calabria, built by a Cretan colony, and called Uria Hyria. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Strab. 6.—Of Apulia.

Uritea, a people of Italy. Liv. 42, c. 48.

Ursentium, a town of the Bruui, now Orzo. Plin. 3, c. 11.

Ursidius, an adulterer. Juv. 6, v. 38.

Uscana, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 43, c. 18.

Usceta, a town of Africa Propria. Hist. Af. 89.

Useudama, a town of Thrace. Antrop. 6, c. 8.

Uspites, or Uspiji, a people of Germany. Cæs. Bell. G. 4, c. 1, &c.

Ustica, a town in an island on the coast of Sicily, near Panormum. Horat. 1, sat. 17, v. 11.

Utens, a river of Gaul, now Umbone, falling into the Adriatic by Ravenna. Liv. 5, c. 35.

Utica, now Sancer, a celebrated city of Africa, on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the same bay as Carthage, founded by a Tyrian colony above 287 years before Carthage. It had a large and commodious harbour, and it became the metropolis of Africa, after the destruction of Carthage in the third Punic war, and the Romans granted it all the lands situate between Hippo and Carthage. It is celebrated for the death of Cato, who from thence is called Uticensis, or of Utica. Strab. 17.—Lucan. 6, v. 306.—Justin. 18, c. 4.—Plin. 16, c. 40.—Liv. 25, c. 31.—Sil. 3, v. 242.—Horat. 1, ep. 20, v. 513.

Vulcanalia, festivals in honour of Vulcan, brought to Rome from Præneste, and observed in the month of August. The streets were illuminated, fires kindled everywhere, and animals thrown into the flames, as a sacrifice to the deity. Varro, de L. L. 5.—Dion. Hal. 1.—Columell. 11.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

Vulcâni Insula, or Vulcania, a name given to the islands between Sicily and Italy, now called Lipari. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 422. They received it because there were there subterraneous fires, supposed to be excited by Vulcan the god of fire.

Vulcanius Terentianus, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the life of the three Gordians, &c.

Vulcânus, a god of the ancients who presided over fire, and was the patron of all artists who worked iron and metal. He was son of Juno alone, who in this wished to imitate Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brains. According to Homer, he was son of Jupiter and Juno, and the mother was so disgusted with the deformities of her son, that she threw him into the sea as soon as born, where he remained for nine years. According to the more received opinion, Vulcan was educated in heaven with the rest of the gods, but his father kicked him down from Olympus, when he attempted to deliver his mother, who had been fastened by a golden chain for her insolence. He was nine days in coming from heaven upon earth, and he fell in the island of Lemnos, where, according to Lucian, the inhabitants, seeing him in the air, caught him in their arms. He, however, broke his leg by the fall, and ever after remained lame of one foot. He fixed his residence in Lemnos, where he built himself a palace, and raised forges to work metals. The inhabitants of the island became sensible of his industry, and were taught all the useful arts which could civilize their rude manners, and render them serviceable to the good of society. The first work of Vulcan was, according to some, a throne of gold with secret springs, which he presented to his mother to avenge himself for her want of affection towards him. Juno no sooner was seated on the throne, than she found herself unable to move. The gods attempted to deliver her by breaking the chains which held her, but to no purpose, and Vulcan alone had the power to set her at liberty. Bacchus intoxicated him, and prevailed upon him to come to Olympus, where he was reconciled to his parents. Vulcan has been celebrated by the ancient poets for the ingenious works and automatical figures which he made, and many speak of two golden statues, which not only seemed animated, but which walked by his side, and even assisted him in the working of metals. It is said that, at the request of Jupiter, he made the first woman that ever appeared on earth, well known under the name of Pandora. Vid. Pandora. The Cyclops of Sicily were his ministers and attendants, and with him they fabricated not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but also arms for the gods and the most celebrated heroes. His forges were supposed to be under mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, as well as in every part of the earth where there were volcanoes. The most known of the works of Vulcan which were presented to mortals are the arms of Achilles, those of Æneas, the shield of Hercules described by Hesiod, a collar given to Herminie the wife of Cadmus, and a sceptre, which was in the possession of Agamemnon king of Argos and Mycenæ. The collar proved fatal to all those that wore it, but the sceptre, after the death of Agamemnon, was carefully preserved at Cheronæa, and regarded as a divinity. The amours of Vulcan are not numerous. He demanded Minerva from Jupiter, who had promised him in marriage whatever goddess he should choose, and when she refused his addresses, he attempted to offer her violence. Minerva resisted with success, though there remained on her body some marks of Vulcan's passion, which she threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool. Vid. Erichthonius. This disappointment in his love was repaired by Jupiter, who gave him one of the Graces. Venus is universally acknowledged to have been the wife of Vulcan; but her infidelity is well known, as well as her amours with Mars, which were discovered by Phobus, and exposed to the gods by her own husband. Vid. Alectryon. The worship of Vulcan was well established, particularly in Egypt, at Athens, and at Rome. It was usual, in the sacrifices that were offered to him, to burn the whole victim, and not reserve part of it, as in the immolations to the rest of the gods. A calf and a boar pig were the principal victims offered. Vulcan was represented as covered with sweat, blowing with his nervous arm the fires of his forges. His breast was hairy, and his forehead was blackened with smoke. Some represent him lame and deformed, holding a hammer raised in the air, ready to strike; while with the other hand he turns, with pincers, a thunderbolt on his anvil, for which an eagle waits by his side to carry it to Jupiter. He appears on some monuments with a long beard, dishevelled hair, half naked, and a small round cap on his head, while he holds a hammer and pincers in his hand. The Egyptians represented him under the figure of a monkey. Vulcan has received the names of Mulciber, Pamphalanus, Clytotechnes, Pandamator, Cyllopodes, Chalaipoda, &c., all expressive of his lameness and his profession. He was father of Cupid by Venus; of Cæculus, Cecrops, Cacus, Periphetes, Cercyon, Oeris, &c. Cicero speaks of more than one deity of the name of Vulcan. One he calls son of Cœlus and father of Apollo by Minerva; the second he mentions is son of the Nile, and called Phyas by the Egyptians; the third was the son of Jupiter and Juno, and fixed his residence in Lemnos; and the fourth who built his forges in the Lipari islands was son of Menalius. Vulcan seems to have been admitted into heaven more for ridicule than any other purpose. He seems to be the great cuckold of Olympus, and even his wife is represented as laughing at his deformities, and mimicking his lameness to gain the smiles of her lovers. Hesiod. Theog. & in Scut. Herc. 140 & 120.—Apollod. 1. c. 3. &c.—Homer. Il. 1. v. 57. & l. 15. v. 18. l. 22. v. 397. &c.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 1. c. 20. l. 3. c. 17.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3. c. 22.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Varro, de L. L.—Virg. Æn. 7, &c.

Vulcātius, a Roman knight, who conspired with Piso against Nero, &c. Tacit.—A senator in the reign of Diocletian, who attempted to write a history of all such as had reigned at Rome, either as lawful sovereigns or by usurpation. Of his works nothing is extant but an account of Avidius Cassius, who revolted in the east during the reign of M. Aurelius, which some ascribe to Spartianus.

Vulturnum, a town of Etruria. Vid. Volturninum.

Vulso, a Roman consul who invaded Africa with Regulus.—Another consul. He had the provinces of Asia while in office, and triumphed over the Galatians.

Vultira, or Vulturaria, a mountain on the borders of Apulia. Horat. 3. od. 4. v. 9.—Lucan. 9. v. 183.

Vulturius, a man who conspired against his country with Catiline.

Vulturinus, a surname of Apollo. Vid. Vulturinus.

Vulturnum, a town of Campania, near the mouth of the Vulturnus. Liv. 25. c. 20.—Plin. 3. c. 5.—Also an ancient name of Capua. Liv. 4. c. 37.

Vulturnus, a river of Campania rising in the Apennines, and falling into the Tyrrhene sea, after passing by the town of Capua. Lucret. 5. 664.—Virg. Æn. 7. v. 720.—The god of the Tiber was also known by that name. Varro, de L. L. 4. c. 5.—The wind, which received the name of Vulturnus when it blew from the side of the Vulturnus, highly incommoded the Romans at the battle of Cannæ. Liv. 22. c. 43 & 45.—A surname of Apollo on mount Lissus in Ionia, near Ephesus. The god received this name from a shepherd who raised him a temple after he had been drawn out of a subterraneous cavern by vultures.

Vulsinium, a town of Etruria, where Sejanus was born.

Uxama, a town of Spain on the Iberus. Sil. 3. v. 384.

Uxantia, now Ushant, an island on the coast of Britany.

Uxellodunum, a town of Gaul defended by steep rocks, now Puech d'Issou. Cæs. B. G. 8, c. 33.

Xentam, a town of Calabria, now Ugento.
Uxi, mountains of Armenia, with a nation of the same name, conquered by Alexander. The Tigris rises in their country. Strab.—Diod.
Uxisama, an island in the western ocean.
Uzita, an inland town of Africa destroyed by Cæsar. Hist. de Afric. 41, &c.

XANTHE, one of the Oceanides. Heriod. Theog. 4, 266.

Xanthia Phocæus, a Roman whom Horace addresses in his 7, od. 4, and of whom he speaks as enamoured of a servant-maid.

Xanthica, a festival observed by the Macedonians in the month called Xanthicus, the same as April. It was then usual to make a lustration of the army with great solemnity. A bitch was cut into two parts, and one half of the body placed on one side, and the other part on the other side, after which the soldiers marched between, and they imitated a real battle by a sham engagement.

Xanthippe, a daughter of Dorus. Vid. Xanthippe.

Xanthippus, a son of Melas killed by Tydeus. Vid. Xanthippus.

Xantho, one of Cyrene's attendant nymphs. Virg. G. 4, v. 336.

Xanthus, or Xanthos, a river of Troas, in Asia Minor. It is the same as the Scamander, but, according to Homer, it was called Xanthus by the gods and Scamander by men. Vid. Scamander.

—A river of Lycia, anciently called Sirbes. It was sacred to Apollo, and fell into the sea near Patara. Homer. Il. 6, v. 172.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 143.—Metas. 1, c. 15.—One of the horses of Achilles, who spoke to his master when chid with severity, and told him he must soon be killed. Homer. Il. 19.—One of the horses given to Juno by Neptune, and afterwards to the sons of Leda.

—An historian of Sardes in the reign of Darius. —A Greek historian of Lydia, who wrote an account of his country, of which some fragments remain. Dionys. Hal.—A king of Lesbos. —A king of Bzozia, who made war against the Athenians. He was killed by the artifice of Melanthus. Vid. Apaturia. —A Greek poet. Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 26.—Suidas.

—A philosopher of Samos, in whose house Æsop lived some time as servant. —A town of Lycia, on the river of the same name, at the distance of about 15 miles from the sea-shore. The inhabitants were celebrated for their love of liberty and national independence. Brutus laid siege to their city, and when at last they were unable longer to support themselves against the enemy, they set fire to their houses and destroyed themselves. The conqueror wished to spare them, but though he offered rewards to his soldiers if they brought any of the Xanthians alive into his presence, only 150 were saved, much against their will. Appian. 4.—Plut. in Brut.

Xanticles, one of the leaders of the 20,000 Greeks, after the battle of Cunaxa.

Xantippe, a daughter of Dorus, who married

Pleuron, by whom she had Agenor, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—The wife of Socrates, remarkable for her ill humour and peevish disposition, which are become proverbial. Some suppose that the philosopher was acquainted with her moroseness and insolence before he married her, and that he took her for his wife to try his patience, and inure himself to the malevolent reflections of mankind. She continually tormented him with her impertinence; and one day, not satisfied with using the most bitter invectives, she emptied a vessel of dirty water on his head, upon which the philosopher coolly observed, "After thunder there generally falls rain." Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 10. l. 9, c. 7. l. 11, c. 12.—Diog. in Socrat.

Xantippus, a Lacedæmonian general who assisted the Carthaginians in the first Punic war. He defeated the Romans, 256 B.C., and took the celebrated Regulus prisoner. Such signal services deserved to be rewarded, but the Carthaginians looked with envious jealousy upon Xantippus, and he retired to Corinth after he had saved them from destruction. Some authors support that the Carthaginians ordered him to be assassinated, and his body to be thrown into the sea as he was returning home; while others say that they had prepared a leaky ship to convey him to Corinth, which he artfully avoided. Liv. 18 & 28, c. 43.—Appian. de Pun. —An Athenian general who defeated the Persian fleet at Mycale with Leotychides. A statue was erected to his honour at the citadel of Athens. He made some conquests in Thrace, and increased the power of Athens. He was father to the celebrated Pericles by Agariste the niece of Clisthenes, who expelled the Pisistratidæ from Athens. Paus. 3, c. 7. l. 8, c. 52.—A son of Pericles who disgraced his father by his disobedience, his ingratitude, and his extravagance. He died of the plague in the Peloponnesian war. Plut.

Xenagoras, an historian. Dionys. Hal.—A philosopher who measured the height of mount Olympus.

Xenarchus, a comic poet.—A peripatetic philosopher of Seleucia, who taught at Alexandria and at Rome, and was intimate with Augustus. Sirab. 14.—A pretor of the Achean league, who wished to favour the interest of Perseus king of Macedonia against the Romans.

Xenares, an intimate friend of Cleomenes king of Sparta.

Xenetus, a rich Locrian, whose daughter Doris married Dionysius of Sicily, &c. Arist. Pol. 5, c. 7.

Xenous, a Chian writer who composed a history of his country.

Xeniades, a Corinthian who went to buy Diogenes the Cynic when sold as a slave. He asked him what he could do; upon which the Cynic answered, "Command freemen." This noble answer so pleased Xenias, that he gave the Cynic his liberty, and entrusted him with the care and education of his children. Diog.—Gell. 2, c. 18.

Xenus, a surname given to Jupiter as the god of hospitality.

Xenocles, a priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi, from whom Hercules extorted an oracle by force, when she refused to answer him because he was not purified of the blood and death of Iphitus. Paus. 10, c. 13.

Xenocles, a tragic writer, who obtained four times a poetical prize in a contention in which Euripides was competitor, either through the ignorance or by the bribery of his judges. The names of his tragedies which obtained the victory were Oedipus, Lycæon, Bacchæ, Athanas Satyricus, against the Alexander, Palamedes, Trojani, and Sisyphus Satyricus of Euripides. His grandson bore also the name of Xenocles, and excelled in tragical compositions. Elian. V. H. 2, c. 8.—A Spartan officer in the expedition which Agesilaus undertook against the Persians.—An architect of Fleusis.—A friend of Aratus.—One of the friends of Cicero.—A celebrated rhetorician of Adramyttium. Strab. 13.

Xenocrates, an ancient philosopher born at Chalcedonia, and educated in the school of Plato, whose friendship he gained, and whose approbation he merited. Thought of a dull and sluggish disposition, he supplied the defects of nature by unwearied attention and industry, and was at last found capable of succeeding in the school of Plato after Speusippus, about 339 years before Christ. He was remarkable as a disciplinarian, and he required that his pupils should be acquainted with mathematics before they came under his care, and he even rejected some who had not the necessary qualification, saying that they had not yet found the key of philosophy. He recommended himself to his pupils not only by precepts, but more powerfully by example, and since the wonderful change he had made upon the conduct of one of his auditors (vid. Polemon), his company was as much shunned by the dissolute and extravagant, as it was courted by the virtuous and benevolent. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no success. Alexander in this imitated his father, and sent some of his friends with 50 talents for the philosopher. They were introduced, and supped with Xenocrates. The repast was small, frugal, and elegant, without ostentation. On the morrow, the officers of Alexander wished to pay down the 50 talents, but the philosopher asked them whether they had not perceived from the entertainment of the preceding day that he was not in want of money. "Tell your master," said he, "to keep his money; he has more people to maintain than I have." Yet, not to offend the monarch, he accepted a small sum, about the 200th part of one talent. His character was not less conspicuous in every other particular, and he has been cited as an instance of virtue from the following circumstance: The courtesan Lais had pledged herself to forfeit an immense sum of money, if she did not triumph over the virtue of Xenocrates. She tried every art, assumed the most captivating looks, and used the most tempting attitudes to gain the philosopher, but in vain; and she declared at last that she had not lost her money, as she had pledged herself to conquer a human being, not a lifeless stone. Though so respected and admired, yet Xenocrates was poor, and he was dragged to prison, because he was unable to pay a small tribute to the state. He was delivered from confinement by one of his friends. His integrity was so well known, that when he appeared in the court as a witness, the judges dispensed with his oath. He died B.C. 314, in his 82nd year, after he had presided in the academy for above 25 years. It is said that he fell in the night with his head into a basin of water, and that he was suffocated. He had written above 60 treatises on different subjects, all now lost. He acknowledged no other deity but heaven, and the seven planets. Diog.—Cic. ad

Allin. 10, ep. 1, &c. Tusc. 5, c. 32.—Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Lucian.—A physician in the age of Nero, not in great esteem. His Greek treatise, de alimento ex aquatilibus, is best edited by Franzius Lips. 8vo, 1774.—An excellent painter. Plin. 34, c. 8.

Xenodamus, an illegitimate son of Menelaus by Gnossia. Apollod. 3, c. 11.—An athlete of Anticyra. Paus. 10, c. 36.

Xenodice, a daughter of Syleus, killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—A daughter of Minos and Pasiphae. Id. 3, c. 1.

Xenodochus, a Messenian crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 4, c. 5.—A native of Cardia, &c.

Xenophanes, a Greek philosopher of Colophon, disciple of Archelaus, B.C. 535. He wrote several poems and treatises, and founded a sect which was called the Eleatic, in Sicily. Wild in his opinions about astronomy, he supposed that the stars were extinguished every morning, and rekindled at night; that eclipses were occasioned by the temporary extinction of the sun; that the moon was inhabited, and 18 times bigger than the earth; and that there were several suns and moons for the convenience of the different climates of the earth. He further imagined that God and the world were the same, and he credited the eternity of the universe, but his incoherent opinion about the divinity raised the indignation of his countrymen, and he was banished. He died very poor, when about 100 years old. Cic. Quest. 4, c. 37. De Div. 1, c. 3. De Nat. D. 1, c. 11.—Lactant. Div. Inst. 3, c. 23.—A governor of Olbus, in the age of M. Antony. Strab. 14.—One of the ministers of Philip, who went to Annibal's camp, and made a treaty of alliance between Macedonia and Carthage.

Xenophilus, a Pythagorean philosopher, who lived to his 170th year, and enjoyed all his faculties to the last. He wrote upon music, and thence he was called the musician. Lucian. de Macrob.—Plin. 7, c. 50.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—One of Alexander's generals. Curt. 5, c. 2.—A robber of whom Aratus hired some troops.

Xenophon, an Athenian, son of Gryllus, celebrated as a general, an historian, and a philosopher. In the school of Socrates he received those instructions and precepts which afterwards so eminently distinguished him at the head of an army, in literary solitude, and as the prudent father of a family. He was invited by Proxenus, one of his intimate friends, to accompany Cyrus the younger in an expedition against his brother Artaxerxes king of Persia; but he refused to comply without previously consulting his venerable master, and inquiring into the propriety of such a measure. Socrates strongly opposed it, and observed that it might raise the resentment of his countrymen, as Sparta had made an alliance with the Persian monarch; but, however, before he proceeded further, he advised him to consult the oracle of Apollo. Xenophon paid due deference to the injunctions of Socrates, but as he was ambitious of glory, and eager to engage in a distant expedition, he hastened with precipitation to Sardis, where he was introduced to the young prince, and treated with great attention. In the army of Cyrus, Xenophon showed that he was a true disciple of Socrates, and that he had been educated in the warlike city of Athens. After the decisive battle in the plains of Cunaxa, and the fall of young

Cyrus, the prudence and vigour of his mind were called into action. The 10,000 Greeks who had followed the standard of an ambitious prince were now at the distance of above 600 leagues from their native home, in a country surrounded on every side by a victorious enemy, without money, without provisions, and without a leader. Xenophon was selected from among the officers to superintend the retreat of his countrymen, and though he was often opposed by malevolence and envy, yet his persuasive eloquence and his activity convinced the Greeks that no general could extricate them from every difficulty better than the disciple of Socrates. He rose superior to danger, and though under continual alarms from the sudden attacks of the Persians, he was enabled to cross rapid rivers, penetrate through vast deserts, gain the tops of mountains, till he could rest secure for a while and refresh his tired companions. This celebrated retreat was at last happily effected; the Greeks returned home after a march of 155 parasangs, or leagues, which was performed in 215 days, after an absence of 15 months. The whole, perhaps, might now be forgotten, or at least obscurely known, if the great philosopher who planned it had not employed his pen in describing the dangers which he escaped, and the difficulties which he surmounted. He was no sooner returned from Cunaxa, than he sought new honours in following the fortune of Agesilaus in Asia. He enjoyed his confidence, he fought under his standard, and conquered with him in the Asiatic provinces, as well as at the battle of Coronæa. His fame, however, did not escape the aspersions of jealousy; he was publicly banished from Athens for accompanying Cyrus against his brother, and being now without a home, he retired to Scillus, a small town of the Lacedæmonians, in the neighbourhood of Olympia. In this solitary retreat he dedicated his time to literary pursuits, and as he had acquired riches in his Asiatic expeditions, he began to adorn and variegate by the hand of art, for his pleasure and enjoyment, the country which surrounded Scillus. He built a magnificent temple to Diana, in imitation of that of Ephesus, and spent part of his time in rural employments, or in hunting in the woods and mountains. His peaceful occupations, however, were soon disturbed. A war arose between the Lacedæmonians and Elis, and the sanctity of Diana's temple, and the venerable age of the philosopher, who lived in the delightful retreats of Scillus, were disregarded, and Xenophon, driven by the Elians from his favourite spot, where he had composed and written for the information of posterity, and the honour of his country, retired to the city of Corinth. In this place he died in the 90th year of his age, 359 years before the christian era. The works of Xenophon are numerous. He wrote an account of the expedition of Cyrus, called the Anabasis, and as he had no inconsiderable share in the enterprise, his description must be authentic, as he was himself an eye-witness. Many, however, have accused him of partiality. He appeared often too fond of extolling the virtues of his favourite Cyrus, and while he describes with contempt the imprudent operations of the Persians, he does not neglect to show that he was a native of Greece. His Cyropædia, divided into eight books, has given rise to much criticism, and while some warmly maintain that it is a faithful account of the life and the actions of Cyrus the Great, and declare that it is supported by the authority of Scripture, others as vehemently deny its authenticity. According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropædia of Xenophon was a moral romance, and these venerable philosophers support that the historian did not so much write what Cyrus had been, as what every true, good, and virtuous monarch ought to be. His Hæclemica were written as a continuation of the history of Thucydides; and in his Memorabilia of Socrates, and in his Apology, he has shown himself, as Valerius Maximus observes, a perfect master of the philosophy of that great man, and he has explained his doctrines and moral precepts with all the success of persuasive eloquence and conscious integrity. These are the most famous of his compositions, besides which there are other small tracts, his eulogium given on Agesilaus, his economics, on the duties of domestic life, the dialogue entitled Hiero, in which he happily describes and compares the misery which attended the tyrant, with the felicity of a virtuous prince; a treatise on hunting, the symposium of the philosophers, on the government of Athens and Sparta, a treatise on the revenues of Attica, &c. The simplicity and the elegance of Xenophon's diction have procured him the name of the Athenian muse, and the bee of Greece, and they have induced Quintilian to say that the graces dictated his language, and that the goddess of persuasion dwelt upon his lips. His sentiments, as to the divinity and religion, were the same as those of the venerable Socrates; he supported the immortality of the soul, and exhorted his friends to cultivate those virtues which ensure the happiness of mankind, with all the zeal and fervour of a christian. He has been quoted as an instance of tenderness and of resignation on Providence. As he was offering a sacrifice, he was informed that Gryllus his eldest son had been killed at the battle of Mantinea. Upon this he tore the garland from his head, but when he was told that his son had died like a Greek, and had given a mortal wound to Epaminondas, the enemy's general, he replaced the flowers on his head, and continued the sacrifice, exclaiming that the pleasure he derived from the valour of his son was greater than the grief which his unfortunate death occasioned. The best editions of Xenophon are those of Leunclavius, fol. Francof. 1596, of Ernesti, 4 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1763, and the Glasgow edition, 12mo; of the Cyropædia, 1767, the expedition of Cyrus, 1764, the Memorabilia, 1761, and the history of Greece, 1762, and likewise the edition of Zeonius, published at Leipsic, in 8vo, in 6 vols., between the years 1778 and 1791. Cic. in Orat. 19.—*Val. Xora, a town of Spain, now Xerx, where the Moors gained a battle over Roderic king of the Goths, and became masters of the country.

Xerolibya, a part of Africa between Egypt and Cyrene.

Xerxena, a part of Armenia. Strab. 11.

Xerxes I., succeeded his father Darius on the throne of Persia, and though but the second son of the monarch, he was preferred to his elder brother Artabazanes. The causes alleged for this preference were, that Artabazanes was son of Darius when a private man, and that Xerxes was born, after his father had been raised on the Persian throne, of Atossa the daughter of Cyrus. Xerxes continued the warlike preparations of his father, and added the revolted kingdom of Egypt to his extensive possessions. He afterwards invaded Europe, and entered Greece with an army which, together with the numerous retinue of servants, eunuchs, and women that attended it, amounted to no less than 5,283,200 souls. This multitude, which the fidelity of the historians has not exaggerated, was stopped at Thermopylæ, by the valour of 300 Spartans, under king Leonidas. Xerxes, astonished that such a handful of men should dare to oppose his progress, ordered some of his soldiers to bring them alive into his presence; but for three successive days the most valiant of the Persian troops were repeatedly defeated in attempting to execute the monarch's injunctions, and the courage of the Spartans might perhaps have triumphed longer, if a Trachinian had not led a detachment to the top of the mountain, and suddenly fallen upon the devoted Leonidas. The king himself nearly perished on this occasion, and it has been reported that, in the night, the desperate Spartans sought, for a while, the royal tent, which they found deserted, and wandered through the Persian army, slaughtering thousands before them. The battle of Thermopylæ was the beginning of the disgrace of Xerxes. The more he advanced, it was to experience new disappointments; his fleet was defeated at Artemision and Salamis, and though he burnt the deserted city of Athens, and trusted to the artful insinuations of Themistocles, yet he found his millions unable to conquer a nation that was superior to him in the knowledge of war and maritime affairs. Mortified with the ill success of his expedition, and apprehensive of imminent danger in an enemy's country, Xerxes hastened to Persia, and in 30 days he marched over all that territory which before he had passed with much pomp and parade in the space of six months. Mardonius, the best of his generals, was left behind with an army of 300,000 men, and the rest that had survived the ravages of war, of famine, and pestilence, followed their timid monarch into Thrace, where his steps were marked by the numerous birds of prey that hovered round him, and fed upon the dead carcases of the Persians. When he reached the Hellespont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats which he had erected there totally destroyed by the storms, and he crossed the straits in a small fishing vessel. Restored to his kingdom and safety, he forgot his dangers, his losses, and his defeats, and gave himself up to riot and debauchery. His indolence and luxurious voluptuousness offended his subjects, and Artabanus, the captain of his guards, conspired against him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 27th year of his reign, about 44 years before the christian era. The personal accomplishments of Xerxes have been commended by ancient authors, and Herodotus observes that there was not one man among the millions of his army that was equal to the monarch in comeliness or stature, or that was as worthy to preside over a great and extensive empire. The picture is finished, and the character of Xerxes completely known, when we hear Justin exclaim that the vast armament which invaded Greece was without a head. Xerxes has been cited as an instance of humanity. When he reviewed his millions from a stately throne in the plains of Asia, he suddenly shed a torrent of tears on the recollection that the multitude of men he saw before his eyes in 100 years should be no more. His pride and insolence have been deservedly censured; he ordered chains to be thrown into the sea, and the waves to be whipped, because the first bridge he had laid across the Hellespont had been destroyed by a storm. He cut a channel through mount Athos, and saw his fleet sail in a place which before was dry ground. The very rivers were dried up by his army as he advanced towards Greece, and the cities which he entered reduced to want and poverty. Herodot. 1, c. 183. l. 7, c. 2, &c.—Diod. 11.—Strab. 9.—Atian. 3, V. Xerxes II., succeeded his father Artaxerxes Longimanus on the throne of Persia, 425 B.C., and was assassinated in the first year of his reign by his brother Sogdianus.

Xerxes, a painter of Heracles, who made a beautiful representation of Venus.

Xenoxes, an officer of Antiochus the Great king of Syria.

Xilino, a town of Colchis.

Xiphonia, a promontory of Sicily at the north of Syracuse, now Cruce. Strab. 6.—Also a town near it, now Augusta.

Kols, an island formed by the mouths of the Nile. Strab. 17.

Kuthia, the ancient name of the plains of Leontium in Sicily. Diod. 5.

Kuthus, a son of Hellen, grandson of Deucalion. He was banished from Thessaly by his brothers, and came to Athens, where he married Creusa the daughter of king Erechtheus, by whom he had Achæus and Ion. He retired after the death of his father-in-law into Achaia, where he died. According to some, he had no children, but adopted Ion, the son whom Creusa, before her marriage, had borne to Apollo. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 7, c. 1.—Euripid. in Ion. 1, sc. 1.

Kyobus, a Macedonian who told Philip of his cruelty when he had put his son Demetrius to death, at the instigation of Perseus.

Kylenopolis, a town at the mouth of the Indus, built by Alexander, supposed to be Lakeri. Plin. 6, c. 23.

Kyline, a town of Pamphylia. Liv. 38, a. 15.

Kylopölis, a town of Macedonia. Plin. 4, c. 10.

Kynias, a lake of Thessaly, or, according to some, of Bœotia. Liv. 32, c. 13. l. 33, c. 3.

Kynoichia, an anniversary day observed at Athens in honour of Minerva, and in commemoration of the time in which the people of Attica left their country seats, and, by advice of Theseus, all united in one body.

ZABATUS, a river of Media, falling into the Tigris, near which the 10,000 Greeks stopped in their return. Xenophon.

Zabdicōne, a province of Persia.

Zabirna, a town of Libya, where Bacchus destroyed a large beast that infested the country. Diod. 3.

Zabus, a river of Assyria, falling into the Tigris.

Zacynthus, a native of Bœotia, who accompanied Hercules when he went into Spain to destroy Geryon. At the end of the expedition he was entrusted with the care of Geryon's flocks by the hero, and ordered to conduct them to Thebes. As he went on his journey, he was bit by a serpent, and some time after died. His companions carried his body away, and buried it in an island of the Ionian sea, which from that time was called Zacynthus. The island of Zacynthus, now called Zante, is situate at the south of Cephalenia, and at the west of the Peloponnesus. It is about 60 miles in circumference. *Liv. 26, c. 24.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 2, c. 8.—Met. 2, c. 7.—Hom. Od. 1, v. 246. l. 9, v. 24.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2, v. 437.—Paus. 4, c. 23.—Virg. Zadris, a town of Colchis.

Zagræus, a son of Jupiter and Proserpine, the same as the first Bacchus, of whom Cicero speaks. Some say that Jupiter obtained Proserpine's favours in the form of a serpent in one of the caves of Sicily, where her mother had concealed her from his pursuits, and that from this union Zagræus was born.

Zagrus, a mountain on the confines of Media and Babylonia. Strab. 11.

Zalates, an effeminate youth brought to Rome from Armenia as a hostage, &c. Juv. 20, v. 264.

Zaleucus, a lawgiver of the Locrians in Italy, and one of the disciples of Pythagoras, 550 B.C. He was very humane, and at the same time very austere, and he attempted to enforce his laws more by inspiring shame than dread. He had wisely decreed that a person guilty of adultery should lose both his eyes. His philosophy was called to a trial when he was informed that his son was an adulterer. He ordered the law to be executed; the people interferred, but Zaleucus resisted, and rather than violate his own institutions, he commanded one of his own eyes, and one of those of his son, to be put out. This made such an impression upon the people, that while Zaleucus presided over the Locrians, no person was again found guilty of adultery. *Val. Max. 1, c. 2. l. 6, c. 5.—Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 6. Ad. Zameis, a debauched king of Assyria, son of Semiramis and Ninus, as some report. He reigned 38 years.

Zamolxis, or Zalmoxis, a slave and disciple of Pythagoras. He accompanied his master in Egypt, and afterwards retired into the country of the Getæ, which had given him birth. He began to civilize his countrymen, and the more easily to gain reputation, he concealed himself for three years in a subterraneous cave, and afterwards made them believe that he was just raised from the dead. Some place him before the age of Pythagoras. After death he received divine honours. Diod.—Herodot. 4, c. 19, &c.

Zancle, a town of Sicily, on the straits which separate that island from Italy. It received its name from its appearing like a scythe, which was called ζακλαος in the language of the country, or, as others say, because the scythe with which Saturn mutilated his father fell there, or because, as Diodorus reports, a person named Zanculus had either built it or exercised its sovereignty. Zancle fell into the hands of the Samians 497 years before the christian era, and three years after it was recovered by Anaxilax the Messenian tyrant of Rhegium, who gave it the name of his native country, and called it Messana. It was founded, as most chronologers support, about 1038 years before the christian era, by the pirates of Cumæ in Italy, and peopled by Samians, Ionians, and Chalcidians. *Strab. 6.—Diod. 4.—Ital. 1, v. 662.—Ovid. Zarax, a town of Peloponnesus.

Zarbiônus, a petty monarch of Asia, who was gained to the interest of the Romans by one of the officers of Lucullus. Tigranes put him to death for his desertion, and his funeral was celebrated with great magnificence by the Roman general. Plut. in Luc.

Zariaspes, a Persian who attempted to revolt from Alexander, &c. Curt. 9, c. 10.—A river, now Dehaski, on which Bactria, the capital of Bactriana, was built. It is called Bactrus by Curtius, 7, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 15 & 16.

Zathes, a river of Armenia.

Zauces, a people of Libya. Herodot. 4, c. 193.

Zebina Alexander, an impostor who usurped the throne of Syria, at the instigation of Ptolemy Physcon.

Zela, or Zelia, a town of Pontus near the river Lycus, where Cæsar defeated Pharnaces son of Mithridates. In expressing this victory, the general used the words, Veni, vidi, vici. Suet. Cæs. 37.—Hirt. Alex. 71.—A town of Troas at the foot of Ida.—Another in Lycia.

Zelæum, a promontory of Thessaly. Liv. 31, c. 46.

Zelus, a town of Spain.

Zelus, a daughter of Pallas.

Zeno, a philosopher of Elia or Velia in Italy, the disciple, or, according to some, the adopted son of Parmenides, and the supposed inventor of dialectic. His opinions about the universe, the unity, incomprehensibility, and immutability of all things, were the same with those of Xenophanes and the rest of the Eleatic philosophers. It is said that he attempted to deliver his country from the tyranny of Nearchus. His plot was discovered, and he was exposed to the most excruciating torments to reveal the name of his accomplices, but this he bore with unparalleled fortitude, and not to be at last conquered by tortures, he cut off his tongue with his teeth, and spit it into the face of the tyrant. Some say that he was pounded alive in a mortar, and that in the midst of his torments he called to Nearchus, as if to reveal something of importance; the tyrant approached him, and Zeno, as if willing to whisper to him, caught his ear with his teeth, and bit it off. Cic. Tus. 2, c. 22. De Nat. D. 3, c. 32.—Diog. in Frag.—Val. Max. 3, c. 3.—Diog. 9.—The founder of the sect of the stoics, born at Citium in the island of Cyprus. The first part of his life was spent in commercial pursuits, but he was soon called to more elevated employments. As he was returning from Phœnicia, a storm drove his ship on the coast of Attica, and he was shipwrecked near the Piræus. This moment of calamity he regarded as the beginning of his fame. He entered the house of a bookseller, and, to dissipate his melancholy reflections, he began to read. The book was written by Xenophon; and the merchant was so pleased and captivated by the eloquence and beauties of the philosopher, that from that time he renounced the pursuits of a busy life, and applied himself to the study of philosophy. Ten years were spent in frequenting the school of Crates, and the same number under Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon. Perfect in every branch of knowledge, and improved from experience as well as observation, Zeno opened a school at Athens, and soon saw himself attended by the great, the learned, and the powerful. His followers were called Stoics, because they received the instructions of the philosopher in the portico called stoa. He was so respected during his lifetime, that the Athenians publicly decreed him a brazen statue and a crown of gold, and engraved their decree, to give it more publicity, on two columns in the academy, and in the Lyceum. His life was an example of sobriety and moderation: his manners were austere, and to his temperance and regularity he was indebted for the continual flow of health which he always enjoyed. After he had taught publicly for 48 years, he died in the 98th year of his age, B.C. 264, a stranger to diseases, and never incommoded by a real indisposition. He was buried in that part of the city called Ceramicus, where the Athenians raised him a monument. The founder of the stoic philosophy shone before his followers as a pure example of imitation. Virtue he perceived to be the ultimate aim of his researches. He wished to live in the world as if nothing was properly his own; he loved others, and his affections were extended even to his enemies. He felt a pleasure in being kind, benevolent, and attentive, and he found that these sentiments of pleasure were reciprocal. He saw a connection and dependence in the system of the universe, and perceived that from thence arose the harmony of civil society, the tenderness of parents, and filial gratitude. In the attainment of virtue the goods of the mind were to be preferred to those of the body, and when that point was once gained, nothing could equal our happiness and perfection, and the stoic could view with indifference health or sickness, riches or poverty, pain and pleasure, which could neither move nor influence the serenity of his mind. Zeno recommended resignation; he knew that the laws of the universe cannot be changed by man, and therefore he wished that his disciples should not in prayer deprecate impending calamities, but rather beseech Providence to grant them fortitude to bear the severest trials with pleasure and due resignation to the will of Heaven. An arbitrary command over the passions was one of the rules of stoicism; to assist our friends in the hour of calamity was our duty, but to give way to childish sensations was unbecoming our nature. Pity, therefore, and anger, were to be banished from the heart, propriety and decorum were to be the guides in everything, and the external actions of men were the best indications of their inward feelings, their secret inclinations, and their character. It was the duty of the stoic to study himself; in the evening he was enjoined to review with critical accuracy the events of the day, and to regulate his future conduct with more care, and always to find an impartial witness within his own breast. Such were the leading characters of the stoic philosophy, whose followers were so illustrious, so perfect, and so numerous, and whose effects were productive of such exemplary virtues in the annals of the human mind. Zeno in his maxims used to say, that with virtue man could live happy under the most pressing calamities. He said that nature had given us two ears, and only one mouth, to tell us that we ought to listen more than speak. He compared those whose actions were dissonant with their professions, to the coin of Alexandria, which appeared beautiful to the eye, though made of the basest metals. He acknowledged only one God, the soul of the universe, which he conceived to be the body, and therefore he believed that those two together united, the soul and the body, formed one perfect animal, which was the god of the stoics. Amongst the most illustrious followers of his doctrine, and as the most respectable writers, may be mentioned Epictetus, Seneca, the emperor Antoninus, &c. Cic. Acad. 1, c. 12. De Nat. D. 1, c. 14. l. 2, c. 8 & 24. l. 3, c. 24. Pro. Mar. de Orat. 32, &c. Fimb. —Seneca.—Epictetus.—Arrian.—Elian. V. D. 1, c. 21 & 34.—A rhetorician, father to Polemon, who was made king of Pontus.—The son of Polemon, who was king of Armenia, was also called Zeno. Strab. 12.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 56.—A native of Lepreus, son of Caliteles, crowned at the Olympic games, and honoured with a statue in the grove of Jupiter, and at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 15.—A general of Antiochus.—A philosopher of Tarsus, B.C. 207.—The name of Zeno was common to some of the Roman emperors on the throne of Constantinople, in the fifth and sixth centuries.

Zenobia, a queen of Iberia, wife to Rhadamistus. She accompanied her husband when he was banished from his kingdom by the Armenians; but as she was unable to follow him on account of her pregnancy, she entreated him to murder her. Rhadamistus long hesitated, but fearful of her falling into the hands of his enemy, he obeyed, and threw her body into the Araxes. Her clothes kept her up on the surface of the water, where she was found by some shepherds, and as the wound was not mortal, her life was preserved, and she was carried to Tigrdates, who acknowledged her as queen. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 51.—Septimia, a celebrated princess of Palmyra, who married Odenatus, whom Gallienus acknowledged as his partner on the Roman throne. After the death of her husband, which, according to some authors, she is said to have hastened, Zenobia reigned in the east as regent of her infant children, who were honoured with the title of Cæsars. She assumed the name of Augusta, and she appeared in imperial robes, and ordered herself to be styled the queen of the east. The troubles which at that time agitated the western parts of the empire, prevented the emperor from checking the insolence and ambition of this princess.

who boasted to be sprung from the Ptolemies of Egypt. Aurelian was no sooner invested with the imperial purple than he marched into the east, determined to punish the pride of Zenobia. He well knew her valour, and he was not ignorant that in her wars against the Persians she had distinguished herself no less than Odenatus. She was the mistress of the east; Egypt acknowledged her power, and all the provinces of Asia Minor were subject to her command. When Aurelian approached the plains of Syria, the Palmyrean queen appeared at the head of 700,000 men. She bore the labours of the field like the meanest of her soldiers, and walked on foot fearless of danger. Two battles were fought; the courage of the queen gained the superiority, but an imprudent evolution of the Palmyrean cavalry ruined her cause; and while they pursued with spirit the flying enemy, the Roman infantry suddenly fell upon the main body of Zenobia's army, and the defeat was inevitable. The queen fled to Palmyra, determined to support a siege. Aurelian followed her, and after he had almost exhausted his stores, he proposed terms of accommodation, which were rejected with disdain by the warlike princess. Her hopes of victory, however, soon vanished, and though she harassed the Romans night and day by continual sallies from her walls, and the working of her military engines, she despaired of success when she heard that the armies which were marching to her relief from Armenia, Persia, and the east, had partly been defeated and partly bribed from her allegiance. She fled from Palmyra in the night, but Aurelian, who was apprised of her escape, pursued her, and she was caught as she was crossing the river Euphrates. She was brought into the presence of Aurelian, and though the soldiers were clamorous for her death, she was reserved to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. She was treated with great humanity, and Aurelian gave her large possessions near Tibur, where she was permitted to live the rest of her days in peace, with all the grandeur and majesty which became a queen of the east, and a warlike princess. Her children were patronized by the emperor, and married to persons of the first distinction at Rome. Zenobia has been admired not only for her military abilities, but also for her literary talents. She was acquainted with every branch of useful learning, and spoke with fluency the language of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Latins. She composed an abridgment of the history of the oriental nations, and of Egypt, which was greatly commended by the ancients. She received no less honour from the patronage she afforded to the celebrated Longinus, who was one of her favourites, and who taught her the Greek tongue. She has also been praised for her great chastity, and her constancy, though she betrayed too often her propensities to cruelty and intoxication when in the midst of her officers. She fell into the hands of Aurelian about the 273rd year of the christian era. Aur. Vict.—Zos., &c.—A town of Syria on the Euphrates.

Zenobii insulæ, small islands at the mouth of the Arabian gulf.

Zenodorus, a sculptor in the age of Nero. He made a statue of Mercury, as also a colossus for the emperor, which was 110 or 120 feet high, and which was consecrated to the sun. The head of this colossus was some time after broken by Vespasian, who placed there the head of an Apollo surrounded with seven beams, each of which was seven feet and a half long. From this famous colossus the modern coliseum, whose ruins are now so much admired at Rome, took its name. Plin. 34, c. 7.

Zenodotia, a town of Mesopotamia, near Nicephorium. Plin. in Crass.

Zenodotus, a native of Trozene, who wrote a history of Umbria. Dion. Hal. 2.—A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of Ptolemy Soter, by whom he was appointed to take care of the celebrated library of Alexandria. He died B.C. 245.

Zenothemis, a Greek writer. Ælian. V. H. 17, c. 30.

Zephyrium, a promontory of Magna Græcia towards the Ionian sea, whence, according to some, the Locrians are called Epizephyria.—A town of Cilicia. Liv. 33, c. 20.—A cape of Crete, now San Zuane.—Of Pontus, &c.

Zephyrum, a promontory in the island of Cyprus, where Venus had a temple built by Ptolemy Philadelphus, whence she was called Zephyria. It was in this temple that Arsinoe made an offering of her hair to the goddess of beauty.

Zephyrus, one of the winds, son of Astræus and Aurora, the same as the Fætonius of the Latins. He married a nymph called Chloris, or Flora, by whom he had a son called Carpos. Zephyr was said to produce flowers and fruits by the sweetness of his breath. He had a temple at Athens, where he was represented as a young man of delicate form, with two wings on his shoulders, and with his head covered with all sorts of flowers. He was supposed to be the same as the west wind. Herod. Theog. 377.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 135. l. 2, v. 417. l. 4, v. 223, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 64. l. 15, v. 700.—Propert. 1, el. 16, v. 34, &c.

Zerynthus, a town of Samothrace, with a cave sacred to Hecate. The epithet of Zerynthus is applied to Apollo, and also to Venus. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 19.—Liv. 38, c. 47.

Zethes, Zetes, or Zetus, a son of Boreas king of Thrace and Orithyia, who accompanied, with his brother Calais, the Argonauts to Colchis. In Bithynia, the two brothers, who are represented with wings, delivered Phineus from the continual persecution of the Harpies, and drove these monsters as far as the islands called Strophades, where at last they were stopped by Iris, who promised them that Phineus should no longer be tormented by them. They were both killed, as some say, by Hercules during the Argonautic expedition, and were changed into those winds which generally blow eight or ten days before the dog-star appears, and are called Prodrromi by the Greeks. Their sister Cleopatra married Phineus king of Bithynia. Orpheus, Arg.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Hygin. Fab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 716.—Paus. 3, c. 18.—Val. Flacc.

Zetta, a town of Africa, near Thapsus, now Zerbi. Strab. 17.—Hirt. Afr. 68.

Zetus, or Zethus, a son of Jupiter and Antiope, brother to Amphion. The two brothers were born on mount Cithæron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of her father Nyctæus. When they had attained the years of manhood, they collected a number of their friends to avenge the injuries which their mother had suffered from Lycus, the successor of Nyctæus on the throne of Thebes, and from his wife Dirce. Lycus was put to death, and his wife tied to the tail of a wild bull, that dragged her over rocks and precipices till she died. The crown of Thebes was seized by the two brothers, not only as the reward of this victory, but as their inheritance, and Zethus surrounded the capital of his dominions with a strong wall, while his brother amused himself with playing on his lyre. Music and verses were disagreeable to Zethus, and, according to some, he prevailed upon his brother no longer to pursue so unproductive a study. Hygin. Fab. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 6, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 & 10.—Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 41.

Zeuqis, a portion of Africa, in which Carthage was. The other division was called Byzacium. Isidor. 14, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

Zeuqma, a town of Mesopotamia, on the western bank of the Euphrates, where was a well-known passage across the river. It was the eastern boundary of the Roman empire, and in Pliny's age a chain of iron was said to extend across it. Plin. 5, c. 24.—Strab. 16.—Curt. 3, c. 7.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 12.—A town of Dacia.

Zeus, a name of Jupiter among the Greeks, expressive of his being the father of mankind, and by whom all things live. Diod. 5.

Zeuqidamius, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidae. He was father of Archidamus and grandson of Theopompus, and was succeeded by his son Archidamus. Paus. 3, c. 7.

Zeuqidias, a pretor of the Achaean league, deposed because he had promised to his countrymen an alliance with the Romans.

Zeuqippe, a daughter of Eridanus, mother of Butes, one of the Argonauts, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A daughter of Laomedon. She married Sicyon, who after his father-in-law's death became king of that city of Peloponnesus, which from him has been called Sicyon. Paus. 2, c. 6.

Zeuxis, a celebrated painter, born at Heraclea, which some suppose to be the Heraclea of Sicily. He flourished about 468 years before the christian era, and was the disciple of Apollodorus, and contemporary with Parrhasius. In the art of painting he surpassed not only all his contemporaries, but also his master, and became so sensible, and at the same time so proud, of the value of his pieces, that he refused to sell them, observing that no sum of money, however great, was sufficient to buy them. His most celebrated paintings were his Jupiter sitting on a throne, surrounded by the gods; his Hercules strangling the serpents in the presence of his afflicted parents; his modest Penelope; and his Helen, which was afterwards placed in the temple of Juno Lacinia, in Italy. This last piece he had painted at the request of the people of Crotona, and that he might not be without a model, they sent him the most beautiful of their virgins. Zeuxis examined their naked beauties, and retained five, from whose elegance and graces united, he conceived in his mind the form of the most perfect woman in the universe, which his pencil at last executed with wonderful success. His contest with Parrhasius is well known [vid. Parrhasius]; but though he represented nature in such perfection, and copied all her beauties with such exactness, he often found himself deceived. He painted grapes, and formed an idea of the goodness of his piece from the birds which came to eat the fruit on the canvas. But he soon acknowledged that the whole was an ill-executed piece, as the figure of the man who carried the grapes was not done with sufficient expression to terrify the birds. According to some, Zeuxis died from laughing at a comical picture which he had made of an old woman. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 1.—Plut. in Par., &c.—Quintil.

Zimara, a town of Armenia Minor, 12 miles from the sources of the Euphrates. Plin. 5, c. 24.

Zingis, a promontory of Ethiopia, near the entrance of the Red sea, now cape Orfui.

Ziobris, a river of Hyrcania, whose rapid course is described by Curt. 6, c. 4.

Zipotes, a king of Bithynia, who died in his 70th year, B.C. 279.

Zitha, a town of Mesopotamia.

Ziza, a town of Arabia.

Zoilus, a sophist and grammarian of Amphipolis, B.C. 259. He rendered himself known by his severe criticisms on the works of Isocrates and Plato, and the poems of Homer, for which he received the name of Hemerostastic, or the chastiser of Homer. He presented his criticisms to Ptolemy Philadelphus, but they were rejected with indignation, though the author declared that he starved for want of bread. Some say that Zoilus was cruelly stoned to death, or exposed on a cross by order of Ptolemy, while others support that he was burnt alive at Smyrna. The name of Zoilus is generally applied to austere critics. The works of this unfortunate grammarian are lost. Etian. V. H. 15, c. 10.—Dionys. Hal.—Ovid. de Rem. Am. 266.—An officer in the army of Alexander.

Zoippus, a son-in-law of Hiero of Sicily.

Zona, a town of Africa. Dio. 48.—Of Thrace, on the Egean sea, where the woods are said to have followed the strains of Orpheus. Meta, 2, c. 2.—Herodot.

Zonaras, one of the Byzantine historians, whose Greek Annals were edited, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1686.

Zopyrio, one of Alexander's officers left in Greece when the conqueror was in Asia, &c. Curt. 10, c. 1.

Zopyrion, a governor of Pontus, who made war against Scythia, &c. Justin. 2, c. 3.

Zopyrus, a Persian, son of Megabyzus, who, to show his attachment to Darius the son of Hystaspes, while he besieged Babylon, cut off his ears and nose, and fled to the enemy, telling them that he had received such a treatment from his royal master because he had advised him to raise the siege, as the city was impregnable. This was credited by the Babylonians, and Zopyrus was appointed commander of all their forces. When he had totally gained their confidence, he betrayed the city into the hands of Darius, for which he was liberally rewarded. The regard of Darius for Zopyrus could never be more strongly expressed than in what he used often to say, that he had rather have Zopyrus not mutilated than 20 Babylons. Herodot. 3, c. 154, &c.—Plut. in Apoph. Reg. 3.—Justin. 1, c. 10.—An orator of Clazomenae. Quintil. 3, c. 6.—A physician in the age of Mithridates. He gave the monarch a description of an antidote which would prevail against all sorts of poisons. The experiment was tried upon criminals, and succeeded.—A physician in the age of Plutarch.—An officer of Argos, who cut off the head of Pyrrhus. Plut.—A man appointed master of Alcibiades, by Pericles. Plut.—A physiognomist. Cic. de Nat. 5.—A rhetorician of Colophon. Dio.

Zoroanda, a part of Taurus between Mesopotamia and Armenia, near which the Tigris flows. Plin. 6, c. 27.

Zoroaster, a king of Bactria, supposed to have lived in the age of Ninus king of Assyria, some time before the Trojan war. According to Justin, he first invented magic, or the doctrines of the Magi, and rendered himself known by his deep and acute researches in philosophy, the origin of the world, and the study of astronomy. He was respected by his subjects and contemporaries for his abilities as a monarch, a lawgiver, and a philosopher, and though many of his doctrines are puerile and ridiculous, yet his followers are still found in numbers in the wilds of Persia, and the extensive provinces of India. Like Pythagoras, Zoroaster admitted no visible object of devotion except life, which he considered as the most proper emblem of a supreme being; which doctrines seem to have been preserved by Numa, in the worship and ceremonies which he instituted in honour of Vesta. According to some of the moderns, the doctrines, the laws, and regulations of this celebrated Bactrian are still extant, and they have been lately introduced in Europe in a French translation by M. Anquetil. The age of Zoroaster is so little known that many speak of two, three, four, and even six lawgivers of that name. Some authors, who suppose that two persons only of this name flourished, describe the first as an astronomer living in Babylon, 2450 years B.C., whilst the era of the other, who is supposed to have been a native of Persia, and the restorer of the religion of the Magi, is fixed 582, and by some 519 years B.C. Justin. 1. c. 1.—August. de Civ. 21, c. 14.—Oros. 1.—Plin. 7, c. 10. l. 30, c. 1.

Zosimus, an officer in the reign of Theodosius the younger, about the year 410 of the christian era. He wrote the history of the Roman emperors in Greek, from the age of Augustus to the beginning of the fifth century, of which only the five best books, and the beginning of the sixth, are extant. In the first of those he is very succinct in his account from the time of Augustus to the reign of Diocletian, but in the succeeding he becomes more diffuse and interesting. His composition is written with elegance, but not much fidelity, and the author showed his malevolence against the christians in his history of Constantine, and some of his successors. The best editions of Zosimus are that of Celarius, 8vo. Jenæ, 1728, and that of Reicmier, 8vo. Lips. 1784.

Zosine, the wife of king Tigranes, led in triumph by Pompey. Plut.

Zoster, a town, harbour, and promontory of Attica. Cic. ad Att. 5, ep. 12.

Zosteria, a surname of Minerva. She had two statues under that name in the city of Thebes, in Bœotia. The word signified girl, or armed for battle, words synonymous among the ancients. Paus. 9, c. 17.—Horn. Il. 2, v. 478. l. 11, v. 15.

Zotale, a place near Antiochia in Margiana, where the Margus was divided into small streams. Plin. 6, c. 16.

Zothraustes, a lawgiver among the Arimaspi. Diod.

Zuchis, a lake to the east of the Syrtis Minor, with a town of the same name, famous for a purple dye, and salt-fish. Strab. 17.

Zygantes, a people of Africa.

Zygia, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage (a ζυγισμῷ junctio). She is the same as the Pronuba of the Latins. Pindar.—Pollux. 3, c. 3.

Zygit, a savage nation at the north of Colchis. Strab. 11.

Zygonolis, a town of Cappadocia, on the borders of Colchis. Strab. 12.

Zygitæ, a nation of Libya.

The Grecian square measures were the plethron, or acre, containing 1444, as some say, or as others report, 10,000 square feet; the aroura, which was half the plethron. The aroura of the Egyptians was the square of 100 cubits.

The Roman square measure was the jugerum, which, like their libra and their as, was divided into twelve parts called uncia, as the following table shows:—

		Unciae:	Square feet.	Scruples.	English foods.	Square poles.	Square feet.

N.B. The Actus Major was 14,400 square feet, equal to a Semis. The Clima was 3600 square feet, equal to a sestuncia, or an uncia and a half, and the actus minimus was equal to a sextans.

The Roman as or as was called so because it was made of brass.

The Romans divided the Sextarius, like the libra, into 12 equal parts, called Cyathi, and therefore their calices were called sextantes, quadrantes, trientes, &c., according to the number of cyathi which they contained.

N. B. The Roman ounce is the English avoirdupois ounce, which was anciently divided into seven denarii, and eight drachmae, and as they reckoned the denarius equal to an Attic drachma, the Attic weights were one-eighth heavier than the correspondent weights among the Romans.

The Greeks divided their obolus into chalci and smaller proportions; some into six chalci, and every chalcus into seven smaller parts; and others divided into eight chalci, and each chalcus into eight parts.

N.B. There was also another Attic talent which consisted of 80, or, according to some, of 100 mina. It must, however, be remembered, that every mina contains 100 drachmae, and every talent 60 mina. The talents differ according to the different standard of their mina and drachmae, as the following table indicates:—

The Roman gold coin was the aureus, which generally weighed double the denarius. £ s. d. q.
 The value of it, according to the first proportion of coinage mentioned by Pliny, was ... 1 4 3 3
 Or according to the proportion of coinage at present ... 2 0 9
 According to the decuple proportion mentioned by Livy and Julius Pollux ... 0 12 11
 According to Tacitus, as it was afterwards valued and exchanged for 25 denarii ... 0 16 1 3

The value of coin underwent many changes during the existence of the Roman republic, and stood, as Pliny mentions it, as follows :

In the reign of Servius	...	...	...	} The as weighed of brass	{	1 pound
A. U. C. 495	...	...	...			2 ounces
A. U. C. 537	...	...	...			1 ounce
A. U. C. 585	...	...	...			1/2 ounce
A. U. C. 485	...	...	...			16 asses
A. U. C. 537	...	...	...	for	10 asses
A. U. C. 547.	a scruple of gold was worth 20 sestertii ; coined afterwards of the pound of gold, 20 denarii aurei ; and in Nero's reign of the pound of gold, 45 denarii aurei .

N. B. In the above tables of money, it is to be observed that the silver has been reckoned at 5s. and gold at £4 per ounce.

A talent of gold among the Jews was worth £5475, and one of silver £342 3s. 9d.

The greater talent of the Romans was worth £99 6s. 8d., and the less £60, or, as some say, £75, and the great talent £1125.

The value of the Roman pondo is not precisely known, though some suppose it equivalent to an Attic mina, or £3 4s. 7d. It is used indifferently by ancient authors for as, as, and mina, and was supposed to consist of 100, or 96 denarii. It is to be observed, that whenever the word pondo is joined to numbers, it signifies the same as libra, but when it is used with other words it bears the same signification as the σταβιον or σταβιον of the Greeks, or the fontus of the Latins. The word nummus, when mentioned as a sum of money, was supposed to be equivalent to a sestertius, and though the words sestertius and nummus are often joined together, yet their signification is the same, and they intimate no more than either does separately.

We must particularly remark, that in reckoning their sesterties, the Romans had an art which can be rendered intelligible by the observation of these rules : If a numeral noun agreed in case, gender, and number with the word sestertius, it denoted precisely as many sestertii; as for example, decem sestertii was ten sestertii. If a numeral noun of another case was joined with the genitive plural of sestertius, it denoted so many thousand, as decem sestertium signifies so many thousand sestertii. If the adverb numeral was joined, it denoted so many hundred thousand, as decies sestertium was ten hundred thousand sestertii. If the numeral adverb was put by itself, the signification was not altered : therefore decies, vigies, &c., in a sentence, imply as many hundred thousand sestertii, or hundred sestertia, as if the word sestertium was expressed.

The denarius, which was the chief silver coin used at Rome, received its name because it contained denas aëris, ten asses.

The as is often expressed by an L, because it was one pound weight ; and the sestertius, because it was equivalent to two pounds and a half of brass, is frequently denoted by H. S. or L. L. S.

The Roman libra contained twelve ounces of silver, and was worth about £3 sterling.

The Roman talent was supposed to be equivalent to twenty-four sestertia, or nearly £193 sterling.
