Flevus, the right branch of the Rhine, which formed a large lake on its falling into the sea called Flevo, now Zuider-Zee. It was afterwards called Hellum, now Ulle, when its breadth became more contracted, and a fort erected there obtained the name of Fleum Pristorum. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6. 1, 4, v. 73.—Plin. 4, c. 15.—Mela, 3, c. 2.

Flora, the goddess of flowers and gardens among the Romans, the same as the Chloris of the Greeks. Some suppose that she was originally a common courtesan, who left to the Romans the immense riches which she had acquired by prostitution and lasciviousness, in remembrance of which a yearly festival was instituted in her honour. She was worshipped even among the Sabines, long before the foundation of Rome, and likewise among the Phœacians, who built Marseilles long before the existence of the capital of Italy. Tattius was the first who raised her a temple in the city of Rome. It is said that she married Zephyrus, and that she received from him the privilege of presiding over flowers, and of enjoying perpetual youth. Vid. Floralia. She was represented as crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the horn of plenty. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 195, &c. Varro de R. R. 1.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.—A celebrated courtesan passionately loved by Pompey the Great. She was so beautiful, that when the temple of Castor and Pollux at Rome was adorned with paintings, her picture was drawn and placed amongst the rest.—Another courtesan, &c. Juv. 2, v. 49.

Floralia, games in honour of Flora at Rome. They were instituted about the age of Romulus, but they were not celebrated with regularity and proper attention till the year U.C. 580. They were observed yearly, and exhibited a scene of the most unbounded licentiousness. It is reported that Cato wished once to be present at the celebration, and that when he saw that the deference for his presence interrupted the feast, he retired, not choosing to be the spectator of the prostitution of naked women in a public theatre. This behaviour so captivated the degenerate Romans, that the venerable senator was treated with the most uncommon applause as he retired. Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Varr. de L. L. 1.—Paterc. c. 1.—Plin. 18, c. 29.

Florentia, a town of Italy on the Arno, now Florence, the capital of Tuscany. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 79.—Flor. 3, c. 21.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Florinus, a man who wore the imperial purple at Rome only for two months, A. D. 276.

Florus L. Annæus Julius, a Latin historian of the same family which produced Seneca and Lucan, A. D. 116. He wrote an abridgment of Roman annals in four books, composed in a florid and poetical style, and rather a panegyric on many of the great actions of the Romans than a faithful and correct recital of their history. He also wrote poetry, and entered the lists against the emperor Adrian, who satirically reproached him with frequenting taverns and places of dissipation. The best editions of Florus are Duker's, 9 vols. 8vo, L. Bat. 1723 & 1744; and that of J. Frid. Fischer, 8vo, Lips. 1760.—Julius, a friend of Horace, who accompanied Claudius Nero in his military expeditions. The poet has addressed two epistles to him.

Fluēnia, a surname of Juno Lucina, who under that appellation was invoked by the Roman matrons to stop excessive discharges of blood. Fest. de V. Sig.

Folia, a woman of Ariminum, famous for her knowledge of poisonous herbs and for her petulance. Horat. ep. 5, v. 42.

Fons solis, a fountain in the province of Cyrene, cool at mid-day, and warm at the rising and setting of the sun. Herodot. 4, c. 181.

Fontanus, a poet mentioned by Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 16.

Fontēia, a vestal virgin. Cic.

Fontēnus Capito, an intimate friend of Horace. 1, sat. 5, v. 32.—A Roman who raised commotions in Germany after the death of Nero. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 7.—A man who conducted Cleopatra into Syria by order of Antony. Plut. in Ant.

Formia, a maritime town of Campania at the south-east of Caieta. It was anciently the abode of the Læstrygonæ, and it became known for its excellent wines, and was called Mamurrarum urbs, from a family of consequence and opulence who lived there. Liv. 8, c. 14. l. 38, c. 36.—Horat. 1, od. 20, v. 11. l. 3, od. 17; 1, sat. 5, v. 37.—Plin. 16, c. 6.

Formilinum, a villa of Cicero near Formia, near which the orator was assassinated. Cic. Fam. 11, ep. 27. l. 16, ep. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 10.

Formio, now Riccano, a river of Istria, the ancient boundary of Italy eastward, afterwards extended to the Arno. Plin. 3, c. 18 & 19.

Formax, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the baking of bread. Her festivals, called Formacalia, were first instituted by Numa. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 525.

Foro Appii, a people of Italy, whose capital was called Forum Appii. Plin. 3, c. 5.

Fortuna, a powerful deity, among the ancients, daughter of Oceanus according to Homer, or one of the Færæ according to Pindar. She was the goddess of fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleasures and misfortunes, blessings and pains. She was worshipped in different parts of Greece, and in Achaia her statue held the horn of plenty in one hand, and had a winged Cupid at its feet. In Bœotia she had a statue which represented her as holding Plutus the god of riches in her arms, to intimate that fortune is the source whence wealth and honours flow. Bupalus was the first who made a statue of Fortune for the people of Smyrna, and he represented her with the polar star upon her head, and the horn of plenty in her hand. The Romans paid particular attention to the goddess of Fortune, and had no less than eight different temples erected to her honour in their city. Tullius Hostilius was the first who built her a temple, and from that circumstance it is easily known when her worship was first introduced among the Romans. Her most famous temple in Italy was at Antium, in Latium, where presents and offerings were regularly sent from every part of the country. Fortune has been called Phereopolis the protectress of cities, and Acrea from the temple of Corinth on an eminence, Asopos. She was called Prænestine at Prænest in Italy, where she had also a temple. Besides, she was worshipped among the Romans under different names, such as Female fortune, Virile fortune, Equestrian, Evil, Peaceful, Virgin, &c. On the 1st of April, which was consecrated to Venus among the Romans, the Italian widows and marriageable virgins assembled in the temple of Virile fortune, and after burning incense and stripping themselves of their garments, they entreated the goddess to hide from the eyes of their husbands whatever defects there might be on their bodies. The goddess of fortune is represented on ancient monuments with a horn of plenty, and sometimes two in her hands. She is blindfolded, and generally holds a wheel in her hands as an emblem of her inconstancy. Sometimes she appears with wings, and treads upon the prow of a ship, and holds a rudder in her hands. Dionys. Hal. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 459.—Plut. in fort. Rom. & in Cor.—Cic. de Div. 2.—Liv. 10.—Augustin. de Civ. D. 4.—Flor. 1.—Val. Max. 1, c. 5.—Lucan. 3, c. 8.

Fortūnæ insule, islands at the west of Mauritania in the Atlantic sea. They are supposed to be the Canary isles of the moderns, thought to be only two in number, at a little distance one from the other, and 10,000 stadia from the shores of Læbya. They were represented as the seats of the blessed, where the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. The air was wholesome and temperate, and the earth produced an immense number of various fruits without the labours of men. When they had been described to Sertorius in the most enchanting colours, that celebrated general expressed a wish to retire thither, and to remove himself from the noise of the world, and the dangers of war. Strab. 1.—Plut. in Sertor.—Horat. 4, od. 8, v. 27. Epod. 16.—Plin. 6, c. 31 & 32.

Fortili, a town of the Sabines, built on a stony plain. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 714.

Forum appii, a town of Latium on the Appia Via. Cic. 1, Att. 10.—Horat. 1, sat. 3, v. 3.—Augustum, a place at Rome. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 552.—Alieni, a town of Italy, now Ferrara. Tacit. H. 3, c. 6.—Aurelia, a town of Etruria, now Montalto. Cic. Cat. 1, c. 9.—Claudii, another in Etruria, now Orsileo.—Cornelii, another, now Imola, in the Pope's dominions. Plin. 3, c. 16.—Cic. Fam. 12, ep. 5.—Domitii, a town of Gaul, now Frontignan, in Languedoc.—Voconii, a town of Gaul, now Gonstaron, between Antibes and Marseilles. Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 17.—

Lepidi, a town of ancient Gaul, south of the Po.—Popili, another at the south of Ravenna, on the Adriatic.—Flaminii, a town of Umbria, now San Giovanni. Plin. 3, c. 14.—Gallorum, a town of Gaul Togata, now Castel Franco, in the Bolognese. Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 30.—Also a town of Venice called Forojulianis urbs, now Friuli. Cic. Fam. 12, ep. 26.—Julium, a town of Gaul Narbonensis, now Frejus, in Provence. Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 17.—Strab. 4.—Lebnum, a town of Insubria. Polyb.—Sempronii, a town of Umbria, &c. Many other places bore the name of Forum wherever there was a public market, or rather where the pretor held his court of justice (Forum vel conventus), and thence they were called sometimes conventus as well as fora, into which provinces were generally divided under the administration of a separate governor. Cic. Verr. 2, c. 20. l. 4, c. 48. l. 5, c. 11. Vatin. 5. Fam. 3, ep. 6 & 8. Attic. 5, ep. 21.

Fosi, a people of Germany near the Elbe, considered as the Saxons of Ptolemy. Tacit. G. 36.
Fossa, the straits of Bonifacio between Corsica and Sardinia, called also Taphros. Plin. 3, c. 6.—Drusi, or Drusiana, a canal eight miles in length, opened by Drusus from the Rhine to the Issel, below the separation of the Waal. Suet. Claud. 1.—Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 23.—Mariana, a canal cut by Marius from the Rhone to Marseilles during the Cimbric war, and now called Galejon. Sometimes the word is used in the plural, Fossae, as if more than one canal had been formed by Marius. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 5.

Fossae Philistinae, one of the mouths of the Po. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 9.

Franci, a people of Germany and Gaul, whose country was called Francia. Claudian.

Fraus, a divinity worshipped among the Romans, daughter of Orcus and Night. She presided over treachery, &c.

Fregella, a famous town of the Volsci, in Italy, on the Liris, destroyed for revolting from the Romans. Ital. 5, v. 452.—Liv. 8, c. 22. l. 27, c. 10, &c.—Cic. Fam. 13, ep. 76.

Fregens, a town of Etruria. Plin. 3, c. 5.

Frentani, a people of Italy, near Apulia, who received their name from the river Frento, now Fortora, which runs through the eastern part of their country, and falls into the Adriatic opposite the islands of Diomedea. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 9, c. 45.—Sil. 8, v. 520.

Fretum (the sea), is sometimes applied by eminence to the Sicilian sea, or the straits of Messina. Cæs. C. 1, c. 29.—Flor. 1, c. 26.—Cic. 2, Att. 1.

Frigidus, a river of Tuscany.

Frisii, a people of Germany near the Rhine, now the Frisons of Friesland. Tacit. A. 1, c. 60. Hist. 4, c. 15 & 12. G. 34.

Sex. Jul. Frontinus, a celebrated geometer, who made himself known by the books which he wrote on aqueducts and stratagems dedicated to Trajan. He ordered at his death that no monument should be raised to his memory, saying memoria nostri durabit, si vitam meruerimus. The best edition of Frontinus is that of Oudendorp, 8vo, L. Bat. 1779.

Fronto, a preceptor of M. Antoninus, by whom he was greatly esteemed.—Julius, a learned Roman, who was so partial to the company of poets, that he lent them his house and gardens, which continually re-echoed the compositions of his numerous visitors. Juv. 1, sat. v. 12.

Fruino, a small town of the Volsci on one of the branches of the Liris. Juv. 3, v. 293.—Liv. 10, c. 1.—Sil. 8, v. 399.—Cic. Att. 11, ep. 4 & 13.

Fulvius, a lake of Italy in the country of the Marsi, at the north of the Liris, attempted to be drained by J. Cæsar and afterwards by Claudius, by whom 30,000 men were employed for 11 years to perforate a mountain to convey the water into the Liris, but with no permanent success. The lake, surrounded by a ridge of high mountains, is now called Celano, and is supposed to be 47 miles in circumference, and not more than 12 feet deep on an average. Plin. 36, c. 15.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 36.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 759.

Fulvidius, a wretched usurer, &c. Horat. 1, sat. 2.

Fulvius Geminus, a man greatly promoted by the interest of Livius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 1 & 2.

Fugalia, festivals at Rome to celebrate the flight of the Tarquins.

Fulginatee (sing. Fulginate), a people of Umbria, whose chief town was Fulginum, now Foligno. Sil. 16, v. 462.—Plin. 1, c. 4. l. 3, c. 14.

Q. Fulvius, a brave officer in Cæsar's legions, &c. Cæs. Bell. Civ.

Fulgura, a goddess at Rome who presided over lightning. She was addressed to save her votaries from the effects of violent storms of thunder. Aug. de Civ. D. 6, c. 10.

Fullinum and Fulginum, a small town of Umbria.

Fulvia lex, was proposed but rejected A. U. C. 628, by Flaccus Fulvius. It tended to make all the people of Italy citizens of Rome.

Fulvia, a bold and ambitious woman who married the tribune Clodius, and afterwards Curio, and at last M. Antony. She took a part in all the intrigues of her husband's triumvirate, and showed herself cruel as well as revengeful. When Cicero's head had been cut off by order of Antony, Fulvia ordered it to be brought to her, and with all the insolence of barbarity, she bored the orator's tongue with her golden bodkin. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra, upon which she attempted to avenge her wrongs, by persuading Augustus to take up arms against her husband. When this scheme did not succeed, she raised a faction against Augustus, in which the engaged L. Antonius her brother-in-law, and when all her attempts proved fruitless, she retired into the east, where her husband received her with great coldness and indifference. This unkindness totally broke her heart, and she soon after died, about 40 years before the christian era. Plut. in Cic. & Anton.—A woman who discovered to Cicero the designs of Catiline upon his life. Plut. in Cic.

Fulvius, a Roman senator, intimate with Augustus. He disclosed the emperor's secrets to his wife, who made it public to all the Roman matrons, for which he received so severe a reprimand from Augustus, that he and his wife hanged themselves in despair.—A friend of C. Gracchus, who was killed in a sedition with his son. His body was thrown into the river, and his widow was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Plut. in Gracch.—Flaccus Censor, a Roman who plundered a marble temple of Juno, to finish the building of one which he had erected to Fortune. He was always unhappy after this sacrifice. Liv. 25, c. 2.—Ser. Nobilior, a Roman consul who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. After he had acquired much glory against the Carthaginians, he was shipwrecked at his return with 206 Roman ships. His grandson Marcus was sent to Spain, where he greatly signalized himself. He was afterwards rewarded with the consulship.

Fundanus, a lake near Fundi in Italy, which discharges itself into the Mediterranean. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 96.

Fundi, a town of Italy near Caieta, on the Appian road, at the bottom of a small deep bay called Lacus Fundanus. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 34.—Liv. 8, c. 14 & 19. l. 38, c. 36.—Plin. 3, 5.—Cic. Rull. 2, c. 25.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 39.—Strab. 5.

Furios, the three daughters of Nox and Acheron, or of Pluto and Proserpine, according to some. Vid. Eumenides.

Furii, a family which migrated from Medulla in Latium, and came to settle at Rome under Romulus, and was admitted among the patricians. Camillus was of this family, and it was he who first raised it to distinction. Plin. in Camil.

Furia lex, de Testamentis, by C. Furius the tribune. It forbade any person to leave as a legacy more than 1000 asses, except to the relations of the master who manumitted, with a few more exceptions. Cic. 1, Verr. 4.—Liv. 35.

Furina, the goddess of robbers, worshipped at Rome. Some say that she is the same as the Jes. Her festivals were called Furinalia. Cic. de Nat. 3, c. 8.—Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

Furinus, a military tribune with Camillus. He was sent against the Tuscans by his colleague.—A Roman slave who obtained his freedom, and applied himself with unremitting attention to cultivate a small portion of land which he had purchased. The uncommon fruits which he reaped from his labours rendered his neighbours jealous of his prosperity. He was accused before a Roman tribunal of witchcraft, but honourably acquitted.—M. Bibaculus, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in Iambic verse, and was universally celebrated for the wit and humour of his expressions. It is said that Virgil imitated his poetry, and even borrowed some of his lines. Horace, however, has not failed to ridicule his verses. Quintil. 8, c. 6, &c.—Horat. 2, sat. 5, v. 40.

Furnius, a man accused of adultery with Claudia Pulchra, and condemned, &c. Tacit. Hist. 4, v. 52.—A friend of Horace, who was consul, and distinguished himself by his elegant historical writings. 1, sat. 10, v. 36.

Arist. Fuscos, a friend of Horace, as conspicuous for the integrity and propriety of his manners, as for his learning and abilities. The poet addressed his 22d Od. Lib. 1 & 2 Ep. 10, to him.—Corn., a pretor sent by Domitian against the Daci, where he perished. Juv. 4, v. 112.

Fusis lex, de Comitibus, A.U.C. 527, forbade any business to be transacted at the public assemblies on certain days, though among the fasti.—Another, A.U.C. 690, which ordained that the votes in a public assembly should be given separately.—Caninia, another by Camillus and C. Caninius Galbus, A.U.C. 751, to check the manumission of slaves.

Fusius, a Roman orator. Cic. 2, de Orat. c. 22.—A Roman, killed in Gaul, while he presided there over one of the provinces. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 3.—A Roman actor, whom Horace ridicules, 2, sat. 3, v. 60. He intoxicated himself; and when on the stage he fell asleep whilst he personated Ilium, where he ought to have been roused and moved by the cries of a ghost; but in vain.

GABALES, a people of Aquitain. Plin. 4, c. 19.

Gabasa, a country of Asia, near Sogdiana. Curt. 8, c. 4.

Gabellus, now La Secchia, a river falling in a northern direction into the Po, opposite the Mincius. Plin. 3, c. 16.

Gabene and Gabiene, a country of Persia. Diod. 19.

Gabia and Gabina. Vid. Gabia.
Gabinius, a friend of Augustus, beheaded by order of Sext. Pompey. It is maintained that he spoke after death.

Gabil, a city of the Volsci, built by the kings of Alba, but now no longer in existence. It was taken by the artifice of Sextus the son of Tarquin, who gained the confidence of the inhabitants by deserting to them, and pretending that his father had ill-treated him. Romulus and Remus were educated there, as it was the custom at that time to send there the young nobility, and Juno was the chief deity of the place. The inhabitants had a peculiar mode of tucking up their dress, whence Gabinus cinctus. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 772. l. 7, v. 612 & 682.—Liv. 5, c. 46. l. 6, c. 20. l. 8, c. 9. l. 10, c. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 709.—Plin. in Romul.

Gabina, the name of Juno, worshipped at Gabii. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 682.

Gabinia lex, de Comitibus, by A. Gabinus the tribune, A.U.C. 614. It required that in the public assemblies for electing magistrates, the votes should be given by tablets, and not vivâ voce.—Another, for convening daily the senate, from the calends of February to those of March.—Another, de Comitibus, which made it a capital punishment to convene any clandestine assembly, agreeable to the old law of the 12 tables.—Another, de Militiâ, by A. Gabinus the tribune, A.U.C. 685. It granted Pompey the power of carrying on the war against the pirates, during three years, and of obliging all kings, governors, and states to supply him with all the necessaries he wanted, over all the Mediterranean sea, and in the maritime provinces, as far as 400 stadia from the sea.—Another, de Usuris, by Aul. Gabinus the tribune, A.U.C. 685. It ordained that no action should be granted for the recovery of any money borrowed upon small interest, to be lent upon larger. This was a usual practice at Rome, which obtained the name of verusum facere.—Another, against fornication.

Gabinianus, a rhetorician in the reign of Vespasian.

Gabinus, a Roman historian.—Aulus, a Roman consul, who made war in Judea, and re-established tranquillity there. He suffered himself to be bribed, and replaced Ptolemy Auletes on the throne of Egypt. He was accused, at his return, of receiving bribes. Cicero, at the request of Pompey, ably defended him. He was banished, and died about 40 years before Christ, at Salona.—A lieutenant of Antony.—A consul, who behaved with uncommon rudeness to Cicero.

Gades (ium), Gadis (is), and Gadira, a small island in the Atlantic, on the Spanish coast, 25 miles from the columns of Hercules. It was some time called Taressus and Erythia, according to Pliny, and is now known by the name of Cádiz. Geryon, whom Hercules killed, fixed his residence there. Hercules, surnamed Gaditanus, had there a celebrated temple, in which all his labours were engraved with excellent workmanship. The inhabitants were called Gaditani, and their women were known for their agility of body, and their incontinency. Horat. 2, ad. 2, v. 11.—Stat. 3, Sylv. 1, v. 183.—Liv. 21, c. 22. l. 24, c. 40. l. 26, c. 43.—Plin. 4, c. 23.—Strab. 3.—Cic. pro Gab.—Justin. 44, c. 4.—Paus. 1, c. 35.—Plat. 2, c. 4.—Paeterc. 1, c. 2.

GADITAE, a people on the Rhone, who assisted the Senones in taking and plundering Rome under Brennus. Strab. 5.

GADULLA, a country of Libya, near the Garamantes, which formed part of king Masinissa's kingdom. The country was the favourite retreat of wild beasts, and is now called Bildwigerid. Salust. in Jug.—Sil. 3, v. 287.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

GADULUS, ON, LENTULUS, an officer in the age of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 42.—A poet who wrote some epigrams in which he displayed great genius, and more wit, though he often indulged in indelicate expressions.

GALA, father of Masinissa, was king of Numidia.

GALKHRII, a nation near Thracæ.

GALACTOPHAGI, a people of Asiatic Scythia. Homær. 11, 3.

GALANUS. Vid. Galerius.

GALANTHIS, a servant-maid of Alcmena, whose sagacity eased the labours of her mistress. When Juno resolved to retard the birth of Hercules, and hasten the labours of the wife of Scephelus, she solicited the aid of Lucina; who immediately repaired to the house of Alcmena, and in the form of an old woman, sat near the door with her legs crossed, and her fingers joined. In this posture she uttered some magical words, which served to prolong the labours of Alcmena, and render her state the more miserable. Alcmena had already passed some days in the most excruciating torments, when Galanthus began to suspect the jealousy of Juno, and concluded that the old woman, who continued at the door always in the same unchanged posture, was the instrument of the anger of the goddess. With such suspicions Galanthus ran out of the house, and with a countenance expressive of joy, she informed the old woman that her mistress had just brought forth. Lucina, at the words, rose from her posture, and that instant Alcmena was safely delivered. The uncommon laugh which Galanthus raised upon this, made Lucina suspect that she had been deceived. She seized Galanthus by the hair, and threw her on the ground; and while she attempted to resist, she was changed into a weasel, and condemned to bring forth her young, in the most agonizing pains, by the mouth, by which she had uttered falsehood. This transformation alludes to a vulgar notion among the ancients, who believed this of the weasel, because she carries her young in her mouth, and continually shifts from place to place. The Boeotians paid great veneration to the weasel, which, as they supposed, facilitated the labours of Alcmena. Ælian. H. Anim. 2.—Ovid. Mét. 9, fab. 6.

GALITA, a town of Syria.—An island near Sicily.—A town of Sicily.—A mountain of Phœcia.

GALITÆE, the inhabitants of Galatia. Vid. Galatia.

GALITRÆE and GALATHRÆE, a sea-nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doria. She was passionately loved by the Cyclops Polyphemus, whom she treated with coolness and disdain; while Acis, a shepherd of Sicily, enjoyed her unbounded affection. The happiness of these two lovers was disturbed by the jealousy of the Cyclops, who crushed his rival to pieces with a piece of a broken rock, while he sat in the bosom of Galathea. Galathea was inconsolable for the loss of Acis, and as she could not restore him to life, she changed him into a fountain. Ovid. Mét. 13, v. 780.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 103.—The daughter of a Celtic king, from whom the Gauls were called Galatæ. Ammian. 15.—A country girl, &c. Virg. Ecl. 3.

GALATIÆ, or GALLOGRÆCIA, a country of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, the Euxine, Cappadocia, and Bithynia. It received its name from the Gauls, who migrated there under Brennus, some time after the sacking of Rome. Strab. 12.—Justin. 37, c. 4.—Liv. 38, c. 12, 40.—Lucan. 7, v. 540.—Cic. 6, Att. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 22.—Plat. 5, c. 4.—The name of ancient Gaul among the Greeks.

GALAXIA, a festival, in which they boiled a mixture of barley, pulse, and milk, called Galactia by the Greeks.

GALBA, a surname of the first of the Sulpicii, from the smallness of his stature. The word signifies a small worm, or according to some, it implies, in the language of Gaul, fatness, for which the founder of the Sulpician family was remarkable.

—A king among the Gauls, who made war against J. Cæsar. Cæs. Bell. Gall. 2, c. 4.—A brother of the emperor Galba, who killed himself, &c.—A mean buffoon, in the age of Tiberius. Juv. 5, v. 4.

—Servius, a lawyer at Rome, who defended the cause of adulterers with great warmth, as being one of the fraternity. Horace ridicules him, 1, sat. 2, v. 46.—Servius Sulpicius, a Roman who rose gradually to the greatest offices of the state, and exercised his power in the provinces with equity and unremitting diligence. He dedicated the greatest part of his time to solitary pursuits, chiefly to avoid the suspicions of Nero. His disapprobation of the emperor's oppressive command in the provinces, was the cause of new disturbances. Nero ordered him to be put to death, but he escaped from the hands of the executioner, and was publicly saluted emperor. When he was seated on the throne, he suffered himself to be governed by favourites, who exposed to sale the goods of the citizens to gratify their avarice. Exemptions were sold at a high price, and the crime of murder was blotted out, and impunity purchased with a large sum of money. Such irregularities in the emperor's ministers greatly displeased the people; and when Galba refused to pay the soldiers the money which he had promised them when he was raised to the throne, they assassinated him in the 73d year of his age, and in the eighth of his reign, and proclaimed Otho emperor in his room, January 16th, A.D. 69. The virtues which had shone so bright in Galba, when a private man, totally disappeared when he ascended the throne; and he who showed himself the most impartial judge, forgot the duties of an emperor, and of a father of his people. Sueton. de Flav. in Vill.—Tacit.—A learned man, grandfather to the emperor of the same name. Suet. in Galb. 4.—Servius, a celebrated orator before the age of Cicero. He showed his sons to the Roman people, and implored their protection by which means he saved himself from the punishment which either his guilt or the persuasive eloquence of his adversaries, M. Cato and L. Scribonius, urged as due to him. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 53. Ad. Her. 4, c. 5.

Galenus Claudius, a celebrated physician in the age of M. Antoninus and his successors, born at Pergamus, the son of an architect. He applied himself with unremitting labour to the study of philosophy, mathematics, and chiefly of physic. He visited the most learned seminaries of Greece and Egypt; and at last came to Rome, where he soon rendered himself famous by his profession. Many, astonished at his cures, attributed them to magic, and said that he had received all his knowledge from enchantments. He was very intimate with Marcus Aurelius the emperor, after whose death he returned to Pergamus, where he died, in his 90th year, A.D. 193. He wrote no less than 300 volumes, the greatest part of which were burnt in the temple of Peace at Rome, where they had been deposited. Galenus confessed himself greatly indebted to the writings of Hippocrates for his medical knowledge, and bestowed great encomiums upon him. To the diligence, application, and experiments of these two celebrated physicians, the moderns are indebted for many useful discoveries; yet often their opinions are ill-grounded, their conclusions hasty, and their reasoning false. What remains of the works of Galen has been published, without a Latin translation, in 3 vols. fol. Basil. 1538. Galen was likewise edited, together with Hippocrates, by Charterius, 13 vols. fol. Paris, 1670, but very incorrect.

Galeois, certain prophets in Sicily. Cic.
Galeria, one of the Roman tribes.—The wife of Vitellius. Car. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 60.—Faustina, the wife of the emperor Antoninus Pius.

Galerius, a native of Dacia, made emperor of Rome by Diocletian. Vid. Maximianus.

Galerus, now Galeo, a river of Calabria, flowing into the bay of Tarentum. The poets have celebrated it for the shady groves in its neighbourhood, and the fine sheep which feed on its fertile banks, and whose fleeces were said to be rendered soft when they bathed in the stream. Martial. 2, ep. 43, l. 4, ep. 28.—Virg. G. 4, v. 126.—Horat. 2, ad. G. v. 10.—A rich person of Latium, killed as he attempted to make a reconciliation between the Trojans and Rutulians, when Ascanius had killed the favourite stag of Tyrrhus; which was the prelude to all the enmities between the hostile nations. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 335.

Gallima, a celebrated country of Syria, often mentioned in Scripture.

Galinthiadia, a festival at Thebes, in honour of Galinthia, a daughter of Pterus. It was celebrated before the festival of Hercules, by whose orders it was first instituted.

Gall, a nation of Europe, naturally fierce, and inclined to war. They were very superstitious, and in their sacrifices they often immolated human victims. In some places they had large statues made with twigs, which they filled with men, and reduced to ashes. They believed themselves descended from Pluto; and from that circumstance they always reckoned their time not by the days, as other nations, but by the nights. Their obsequies were splendid, and not only the most precious things, but even slaves and oxen, were burnt on the funeral pile. Children, among them, never appeared in the presence of their fathers, before they were able to bear arms in the defence of their country. Caes. Bell. G.—Strab. 4.—Tacit. Vid. Gallia.—The priests of Cybele, who received that name from the river Gallus, in Phrygia, where they celebrated the festivals. They mutilated themselves, before they were admitted to the priesthood, in imitation of Arys the favourite of Cybele. Vid. Arys. The chief among them was called Archigallus, who in his dress resembled a woman, and carried suspended to his neck a large collar, with two representations of the head of Arys. Vid. Corybantes, Dactyli, &c. Diad. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 36.—Lucan. 1, v. 466.—Lucian. de Deo Syria.

Gallia, a large country of Europe, called Gallia by the Greeks. The inhabitants were called Galli, Celtiberi, and Celtiogetha, by themselves Celte, by the Greeks Golatae. Ancient Gaul was divided into four different parts by the Romans, called Gallia Belgica, Narbonensis, Aquitania, and Celtica. Gallia Belgica was the largest province, bounded by Germany, Gallia Narbonensis, and the German ocean; and contained the modern country of Alsace, Lorraine, Picardy with part of the Low Countries, and of Champagne, and of the isle of France. Gallia Narbonensis, which contained the provinces now called Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, Savoy, was bounded by the Alps and Pyrenean mountains, by Aquitania, Belgium, and the Mediterranean. Aquitania Gallia, now called the provinces of Poitou, Santonge, Guienne, Berry, Perigord, Quercy, Limousin, Gascony, Auvergne, &c., was situated between the Garumna, the Pyrenean mountains, and the ocean. Gallia Celtica, or Lugdunensis, was bounded by Belgium, Gallia Narbonensis, the Alps, and the ocean. It contained the country at present known by the name of Lyonsais, Touraine, Franche Comté, Senonais, Switzerland, and part of Normandy. Besides these great divisions, there is often mention made of Gallia Cisalpinga, or Citerior; Transalpinga, or Uterior, which refers to that part of Italy which was conquered by some of the Gauls who crossed the Alps. By Gallia Cisalpinga, the Romans understood that part of Gaul which lies in Italy; and by Transalpinga, that which lies beyond the Alps, in regard only to the inhabitants of Rome. Gallia Cispadana, and Transpadana, is applied to a part of Italy, conquered by some of the Gauls, and then it means the country on this side of the Po, or beyond the Po, with respect to Rome. By Gallia Togata, the Romans understood Cisalpine Gaul, where the Roman gowns, toga, were usually worn, as the inhabitants had been admitted to the rank of citizenship at Rome. Gallia Narbonensis was called Braccata, on account of the peculiar covering of the inhabitants for their thighs. The epithet of Comata is applied to Gallia Celtica, because the people suffered their hair to grow to an uncommon length. The inhabitants were great warriors; and their valour overcame the Roman armies, took the city of Rome, and invaded Greece, in different ages. They spread themselves over the greatest part of the world. They were very superstitious in their religious ceremonies, and revered the sacerdotal order as if they had been gods. Vid. Druides. They long maintained a bloody war against the Romans; and Caesar resided 10 years in their country before he could totally subdue them. Caes. Bell. Gall.—Paus. 7, c. 6.—Strab. 5, &c.

Gallioanus mons, a mountain of Campania. Gallions ager, was applied to the country between Picenum and Ariminum, whence the Galli Senones were banished, and which was divided among the Roman citizens. Liv. 23, c. 14, l. 39, c. 44.—Cic. Cat. 2.—Caes. Civ. 1, c. 29.—Sinus, a part of the Mediterranean on the coast of Gaul, now called the gulf of Lyons.

Gallienus Publ. Lucianus, a son of the emperor Valerian. He reigned conjointly with his father for seven years, and ascended the throne as sole emperor, A. D. 260. In his youth he showed his activity and military character, in an expedition against the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the purple, he delivered himself up to pleasure and indolence. His time was spent in the greatest debauchery; and he indulged himself in the grossest and most lascivious manner, and his palace displayed a scene, at once of effeminacy and shame, voluptuousness and immorality. He often appeared with his hair powdered with golden dust; and enjoyed tranquillity at home, while his provinces abroad were torn by civil quarrels and seditions. He heard of the loss of a rich province, and of the execution of a malefactor, with the same indifference; and when he was apprised that Egypt had revolted, he only observed, that he could live without the produce of Egypt. He was of a disposition naturally inclined to raillery and the ridicule of others. When his wife had been deceived by a jeweller, Gallienus ordered the malefactor to be placed in the circus, in expectation of being exposed to the ferocity of a lion. While the wretch trembled at the expectation of instant death, the executioner, by order of the emperor, let loose a capon upon him. An uncommon laugh was raised upon this, and the emperor observed, that he who had deceived others should expect to be deceived himself. In the midst of these ridiculous diversions, Gallienus was alarmed by the revolt of two of his officers, who had assumed the imperial purple. This intelligence roused him from his lethargy; he marched against his antagonists, and put all the rebels to the sword, without allowing the least favour either to rank, sex, or age. These cruelties irritated the people and the army; emperors were elected, and no less than 30 tyrants aspired to the imperial purple. Gallienus resolved boldly to oppose his adversaries; but in the midst of his preparations he was assassinated at Milan by some of his officers, in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 268.

Gallinaria sylva, a wood near Cumæ in Italy, famous as being the retreat of robbers. Juv. 3, v. 307.

Gallipolis, a fortified town of the Salentines, on the Ionian sea.

Gallogroecia, a country of Asia Minor, near Bithynia and Cappadocia. It was inhabited by a colony of Gauls, who assumed the name of Gallogroeci, because a number of Greeks had accompanied them in their emigration. Strab. 2.

G. Gallonius, a Roman knight appointed over Gades, &c.

F. Gallonius, a luxurious Roman, who, as was observed, never dined well, because he was never hungry. Cic. de Fin. 2, c. 8 & 28.

Gallus. Vid. Alectryon. — A general of Otho, &c. Plut. — A lieutenant of Sylla. — An officer of M. Antony, &c. — Caius, a friend of the great Africanus, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, and his exact calculation of eclipses. Sic. de Senect. — Elius, the third governor of Egypt in the age of Augustus. — Cornelius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself famous by his poetical, as well as military talents. He was passionately fond of the slave Lycoris, or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. She proved ungrateful, and forsook him to follow M. Antony, which gave occasion to Virgil to write his tenth eclogue. Gallus, as well as the other poets of his age, was in the favour of Augustus, by whom he was appointed over Egypt. He became forgetful of the favours he received; he pillaged the province, and even conspired against his benefactor, according to some accounts, for which he was banished by the emperor. This disgrace operated so powerfully upon him, that he killed himself in despair, A. D. 26. Some few fragments remain of his poetry, and it seems that he particularly excelled in elegiac compositions. It is said that Virgil wrote a eulogium on his poetical friend, and inserted it at the end of his Georgics; but that he totally suppressed it, for fear of offending his imperial patron, of whose favours Gallus had shown himself so undeserving, and instead of that he substituted the beautiful episode about Aristæus and Eurydice. This eulogium, according to some, was suppressed at the particular desire of Augustus. Quintil. 10, c. 8. — Virg. Ecl. 6 & 10. — Ovid. Amat. 3, el. 15, v. 29. — Vibius Gallus, a celebrated orator of Gaul in the age of Augustus, of whose orations Seneca has preserved some fragments. — A Roman who assassinated Decius the emperor, and raised himself to the throne. He showed himself indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces, and the invasion of his empire, by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, A. D. 253. — Flavius Claudius Constantinus, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne under the title of Cæsar, by Constantius his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was publicly condemned to be beheaded, A. D. 354. — A small river of Phrygia, whose waters were said to be very efficacious, if drunk in moderation, in curing madness. Plin. 30, c. 2. — Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 361.

Gamarius, an Indian prince, brought in chains before Alexander for revolting.

Gamellia, a surname of Juno, as Gamelius was of Jupiter, on account of their presiding over marriages. — A festival privately observed at three different times. The first was the celebration of a marriage, the second was in commemoration of a birthday, and the third was an anniversary of the death of a person. As it was observed generally on the 1st of January, marriages on that day were considered as of a good omen, and the month was called Gemellion among the Athenians. Cic. de Fin. 2, c. 31.

Gangama, a place near the Palus Mæotis.

Gangarides, a people near the mouths of the Ganges. They were so powerful that Alexander did not dare to attack them. Some attributed this to the weariness and indolence of his troops. They were placed by Valer. Flaccus among the deserts of Scythia. Juv. 12, c. 8. — Curr. 9, c. 2. — Virg. Æn. 3, v. 27. — Flacc. 6, v. 67.

Ganges, a large river of India, falling into the Indian ocean, said by Lucan to be the boundary of Alexander's victories in the east. It inundates the adjacent country in the summer. Like other rivers, it was held in the greatest veneration by the inhabitants, and this superstition is said to exist still in some particular instances. The Ganges is now discovered to rise in the mountains of Thibet, and to run upwards of 2000 miles before it reaches the sea, receiving in its course the tribute of several rivers, 11 of which are superior to the Thames, and often equal to the great body of the waters of the Rhine. Lucan. 3, v. 230. — Strab. 5. — Plin. 6, c. 87. — Curr. 8, c. 9. — Mela. 3, c. 7. — Virg. Æn. 9, v. 21.

Gannascus, an ally of Rome, put to death by Corbulo the Roman general, &c. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 18.

Ganymede, a goddess, better known by the name of Hebe. She was worshipped under this name in a temple at Philus in Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 13.

Ganymedes, a beautiful youth of Phrygia, son of Tros, and brother to Ilius and Assaracus. According to Lucan, he was son of Dardanus. He was taken up to heaven by Jupiter as he was hunting, or rather tending his father's flocks on mount Ida, and he became the cup-bearer of the gods in the place of Hebe. Some say that he was carried away by an eagle, to satisfy the shameful and unnatural desires of Jupiter. He is generally represented sitting on the back of a flying eagle in the air. Paus. 5, c. 94.—Homer. Il. 24, v. 231.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 252.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 135.—Horat. 4, od. 4.

Garethoun, a town of Africa.

Garkimantes (sing. Garamas), a people in the interior parts of Africa, now called the deserts of Zara. They lived in common, and acknowledged as their own only such children as resembled them, and scarce clothed themselves, on account of the warmth of their climate. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 198, l. 6, v. 195.—Lucan. 4, v. 334.—Strab. 2.—Plin. 5, c. 8.—Sil. It. 1, v. 142, l. 12, v. 181.

Garkimantis, a nymph who became mother of Iarbas, Phileus, and Pitunus by Jupiter. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 198.

Garkmas, a king of Libya, whose daughter was mother of Ammon by Jupiter.

Garktas, a river of Arcadia, near Tegea, on the banks of which Pan had a temple. Paus. 8, c. 44.

Gareetes, a people of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 45.

Garethyra, a town of Cappadocia. Strab. 12.

Garganus, now St. Angelo, a lofty mountain of Apulia, which advances in the form of a promontory into the Adriatic sea. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 457.—Lucan. 5, v. 880.

Gargaphia, a valley near Platæa, with a fountain of the same name, where Actæon was torn to pieces by his dogs. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 156.

Gargaris, a king of the Curetes, who first found the manner of collecting boney. He had a son by his daughter, whom he attempted in vain to destroy. He made him his successor. Justin. 44, c. 44.

Gargarus (plur. a, orum), a town and mountain of Troas, near mount Ida, famous for its fertility. Virg. G. 1, v. 103.—Macrob. 5, c. 20.—Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 30.

Gargettus, a village of Attica, the birthplace of Epicurus. Cic. Fam. 15, ep. 16.

Gargilius Martialis, an historian.—A celebrated hunter. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 57.

Gargittius, a dog which kept Geryon's flocks. He was killed by Hercules.

Garites, a people of Aquitain, in Gaul.

Garunna, a river of Gaul, now called Garonne, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and separating Gallia Celtica from Aquitania. It falls into the bay of Biscay, and has, by the persevering labours of Lewis XIV., a communication with the Mediterranean by the canal of Languedoc, carried upwards of 100 miles through hills, and over valleys. Mela. 3, c. 2.

Gastron, a general of Lacedæmon, &c. Poly. a.

Gathese, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 34.

Gathestas, a river of Arcadia. Id. ib.

Gangamela, a village near Arbela, beyond the Tigris, where Alexander obtained his third victory over Darius. Curt. 4, c. 9.—Strab. 2 & 16.

Gaulus and Guleon, an island in the Mediterranean sea, opposite Libya. It produces no venomous creatures. Plin. 3, c. 8.

Gaurus, a mountain of Campania, famous for its wines. Lucan. 2, v. 667.—Sil. 12, v. 150.—Stat. 3, Sylv. 5, v. 99.

Gaus and Gæon, a man who followed the interest of Artaxerxes, from whom he revolted, and by whom he was put to death. Diod. 15.

Gaza, a famous town of Palestine, once well fortified, as being the frontier place on the confines of Egypt. Alexander took it after a siege of two months. Diod. 17.

Gebenna, a town and mountain of Gaul. Lucan. 2, v. 435.

Gedrosia, a barren province of Persia near India. Strab. 2.

Gegani, a family of Alba, part of which migrated to Rome, under Romulus. One of the daughters, called Gegania, was the first of the vestals created by Numa. Plut. in Num.

Gela, a town on the southern parts of Sicily, about 10 miles from the sea, according to Ptolemy, which received its name from a small river in the neighbourhood, called Gelas. It was built by a Rhodian and Cretan colony, 713 years before the christian era. After it had continued in existence 404 years, Phintias tyrant of Agrigentum carried the inhabitants to Phintias, a town in the neighbourhood, which he had founded, and he employed the stones of Gela to beautify his own city. Phintias was also called Gela. The inhabitants were called Gelenses, Geloi, and Gelani. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 702.—Paus. 8, c. 46.

Gelænor, a king of Argos, who succeeded his father, and was deprived of his kingdom by Danaus the Egyptian. Paus. 2, c. 16. Vid. Danaus.

Gellia Cornelia lex de Civitate, by L. Gellius and Cn. Cornel. Lentulus, A.U.C. 682. It enacted that all those who had been presented with the privilege of citizens of Rome by Pompey should remain in the possession of that liberty.

Gellias, a native of Agrigentum, famous for his munificence and his hospitality. Diod. 13.—Val. Max. 4, c. 8.

Gellius, a censor, &c. Plut. in Pomp.—A consul who defeated a party of Germans, in the interest of Spartacus. Plut.

Aulus Gellius, a Roman grammarian in the age of M. Antonius, about 130 A.D. He published a work which he called Noctes Atticæ, because he composed it at Athens during the long nights of the winter. It is a collection of incongruous matter, which contains many fragments from the ancient writers, and often serves to explain antique monuments. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, and abounds with many grammatical remarks. The best editions of A. Gellius are that of Gronovius, 4to. L. Bæ. 1706, and that of Conrad, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1762.

Gelo and Gelon, a son of Dinomenes, who made himself absolute at Syracuse, 493 years before the christian era. He conquered the Carthaginians at Himera, and made his oppression popular by his great equity and moderation. He reigned seven years, and his death was universally lamented at Syracuse. He was called the father of his people, and the patron of liberty, and honoured as a demigod. His brother Hiero succeeded him. Paus. 8, c. 42.—Herodot. 7, c. 153, &c.—Diad. 11.—A man who attempted to poison Pyrrhus.—A governor of Bœotia.—A son of Hiero the younger. Paus. 6, c. 9.—A general of Phocia, destroyed with his troops by the Thessalians. Paus. 10, c. 1.

Geloi, the inhabitants of Gela. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 702.

Gelōnes and Gelōni, a people of Scythia, injured from their youth to labour and fatigue. They painted themselves to appear more terrible in battle. They were descended from Gelonus, a son of Hercules. Virg. G. 2, v. 15. Æn. 8, v. 725. —Mela, 1, c. 1.—Claudius in Ruf. 1, v. 375.

Gelos, a port of Caira. Mela, 1, c. 16.

Gemini, a sign of the zodiac which represents Castor and Pollux, the twin sons of Leda.

Geminus, a Roman, who acquainted M. Antony with the situation of his affairs at Rome, &c.—An inveterate enemy of Marius. He seized the person of Marius, and carried him to Minturnæ. Plut. in Mario.—A friend of Pompey, from whom he received a favourite mistress called Flora. Plut.

Geminus, an astronomer and mathematician of Rhodes, B.C. 77.

Gemoniæ, a place at Rome where the carcasses of criminals were thrown. Suet. Tib. 53 & 61.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 74.

Gembium, a town of Gaul, now Orleans, on the Loire. Cæs. B. C. 7, c. 3.—Lucan. 1, v. 440.

Genauini, a people of Vindelicia. Herat. 4, ad. 14, v. 20.

Genève, an ancient, populous, and well-fortified city in the country of the Allobroges on the lake Lemanus, now of Geneva.

Genitus, a man of Cyzicus, killed by the Argonauts, &c. Flacc. 3, v. 45.

Genius, a spirit or demon, which, according to the ancients, presided over the birth and life of every man. Vid. Dæmon.

Genetric, a famous Vandal prince, who passed from Spain to Africa, where he took Carthage. He laid the foundation of the Vandal kingdom in Africa, and in the course of his military expeditious invaded Italy, and sacked Rome in July, 455.

Genitius, a king of Illyricum, who imprisoned the Roman ambassadors at the request of Perseus king of Macedonia. This offence was highly resented by the Romans, and Genitius was conquered by Anicinus, and led in triumph with his family, B.C. 169. Liv. 43, c. 19, &c.

Genua, now Genoa, a celebrated town of Liguria, which Annibal destroyed. It was rebuilt by the Romans. Liv. 21, c. 32. l. 28, c. 45. l. 30, c. 1.

Genulium, a tribute of the people.—A consul.

Genusis, now Senoio, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Adriatic above Apollonia. Lucan. 5, v. 462.

Genutia lex, de magistratibus, by L. Genutius the tribune, A.U.C. 417. It ordained that no person should exercise the same magistracy within 10 years, or be invested with two offices in one year.

Georgica, a poem of Virgil in four books. The first treats of ploughing the ground; the second of sowing it; the third speaks of the management of cattle, &c.; and in the fourth, the poet gives an account of bees, and of the manner of keeping them among the Romans. The word is derived from γεω terra, and ργος opus, because it particularly treats of husbandry. The work is dedicated to Mæcenæ, the great patron of poetry in the age of Virgil. The author was seven years in writing and polishing it, and in that composition he showed how much he excelled all other writers. He imitated Hesiod, who wrote a poem nearly on the same subject, called Opera et Dies.

Georgius Pisida. Vid. Pisida.

Gephyra, one of the cities of the Seleucidae in Syria. Strab. 9.

Gephyraei, a people of Phœnicia, who passed with Cadmus into Bœotia, and from thence into Artica. Herodot. 5, c. 57.

Gerastus, a port of Eubœa. Liv. 37, c. 45.

Gerania, a mountain between Megara and Corinth.

Geranthres, a town of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 2.

Geresticus, a harbour of Teios in Ionis. Liv. 37, c. 27.

Gergithum, a town near Cumæ in Æolia. Plin. 5, c. 30.

Gergovia, a town of Gaul. Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 9.

Gerlon, an ancient augur.

Germania, an extensive country of Europe, at the east of Gaul. Its inhabitants were warlike, fierce, and uncivilized, and always proved a watchful enemy against the Romans. Cæsar first entered their country, but he rather checked their fury than conquered them. His example was followed by his imperial successors or their generals, who sometimes entered the country to chastise the insolence of the inhabitants. The ancient Germans were very superstitious, and, in many instances, their religion was the same as that of their neighbours the Gauls; whence some have concluded that these two nations were of the same origin. They paid uncommon respect to their women, who, as they believed, were endowed with something more than human. They built no temples to their gods, and paid great attention to the heroes and warriors whom the country had produced. Their rude institutions gradually gave rise to the laws and manners which still prevail in the countries of Europe, which their arms invaded or conquered. Tacitus, in whose age even letters were unknown among them, observed their customs with nicety, and has delineated them with the genius of an historian and the reflection of a philosopher. Tacit. de Morib. Germ.—Mela, 1, c. 3. l. 3, c. 3.—Cæs. Bell. G.—Strab. 4.

Germanicus Cæsar, a son of Drusus and Antonia the niece of Augustus. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and raised to the most important offices of the state. When his grandfather Augustus died, he was employed in a war in Germany, and the affection of the soldiers unanimously saluted him emperor. He refused the unseasonable honour, and appeased the tumult which his indifference occasioned. He continued his wars in Germany, and defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return to Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the east, and sent him to appease the seditious of the Armenians. But the success of Germanicus in the east was soon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius, and his death was meditated. He was secretly poisoned at Daphne near Antioch by Piso, A.D. 19, in the 34th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest grief and the most bitter lamentations, and Tiberius seemed to be the only one who rejoiced in the fall of Germanicus. He had married Agrippina, by whom he had nine children, one of whom, Calpurnia, disgraced the name of his illustrious father. Germanicus has been commended not only for his military accomplishments, but also for his learning, humanity, and extensive benevolence. In the midst of war, he devoted some moments to study, and he favoured the world with two Greek comedies, some epigrams, and a translation of Aratus in Latin verse. Sueton.—This name was common in the age of the emperors, not only to those who had obtained victories over the Germans, but even to those who had entered the borders of their country at the head of an army. Domitian applied the name of Germanicus, which he himself had vainly assumed, to the month of September, in honour of himself. Suet. in Dom. 13.—Martial. 9, ep. 2, v. 4.

Germanii, a people of Persia. Herodot. 1, c. 125.

Geronthrae, a town of Laconia, where a yearly festival, called Geronthraea, was observed in honour of Mars. The god had there a temple with a grove, into which no woman was permitted to enter during the time of the solemnity. Paus. Lacon.

Gerhae, a people of Scythia, in whose country the Borysthenes rises. The kings of Scythia were generally buried in their territories. Id. 4, c. 71.

Gerus and Gerrius, a river of Scythia. Id. 4, c. 56.

Geryon and Geryones, a celebrated monster, born from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoe, and represented by the poets as having three bodies and three heads. He lived in the island of Gades, where he kept numerous flocks, which were guarded by a two-headed dog, called Orthos, and by Eurythion. Hercules, by order of Eurystheus, went to Gades and destroyed Geryon, Orthos, and Eurythion, and carried away all his flocks and herds to Tirynthus. Hesiod. Theog. 187.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 661. l. 8, v. 202.—Ital. 1, v. 277.—Apol. l. 2.—Lucret. 5, v. 28.

Gessoricorum, a town of Gaul, now Boulogne, in Picardy.

Gessos, a river of Ionia.

Geta, a man who raised seditious at Rome in Nero's reign, &c. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 72.—Septimius, a son of the emperor Severus, brother to Caracalla. In the eighth year of his age he was moved with compassion at the fate of some of the partisans of Niger and Albinus, who had been ordered to be executed; and his father, struck with his humanity, retracted his sentence. After his father's death he reigned at Rome, conjointly with his brother; but Caracalla, who envied his virtues, and was jealous of his popularity, ordered him to be poisoned; and when this could not be effected, he murdered him in the arms of his mother Julia, who, in the attempt of defending the fatal blows from his body, received a wound in her arm from the hand of her son, the 28th of March, A.D. 212. Geta had not reached the 23rd year of his age, and the Romans had reason to lament the death of so virtuous a prince, whilst they groaned under the cruelties and oppression of Caracalla.

Getæ (sing. Getæ), a people of European Scythia, near the Daci. Ovid, who was banished in their country, describes them as a savage and warlike nation. The word Geticus is frequently used for Thracian. Ovid. de Pont. Trist. 5, el. v. 111.—Strab. 7.—Stat. 2, Sylv. 2, v. 61. l. 3, & 2, v. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 54. l. 3, v. 95.

Getulia. Vid. Getulia.

Gigantes, the sons of Coelus and Terra, who, according to Hesiod, sprang from the blood of the wound which Coelus received from his son Saturn; whilst Hyginus calls them sons of Tartarus and Terra. They are represented as men of uncommon stature, and with strength proportioned to their gigantic size. Some of them, as Coelus, Briareus, and Gyges, had 50 heads and 100 arms, and serpents instead of legs. They were of a terrible aspect; their hair hung loose about their shoulders, and their beards were suffered to grow untouched. Pallene and its neighbourhood was the place of their residence. The defeat of the Titans, with whom they are often ignorantly confounded, and to whom they were nearly related, incensed them against Jupiter, and they all conspired to dethrone him. The god was alarmed, and called all the deities to assist him against a powerful enemy who made use of rocks, oaks, and burning woods for their weapons, and who had already heaped mount Ossa upon Pelion, to scale with more facility the walls of heaven. At the sight of such dreadful adversaries, the gods fled with the greatest consternation into Egypt, where they assumed the shape of different animals to screen themselves from their pursuers. Jupiter, however, remembered that they were not invincible, provided he called a mortal to his assistance; and by the advice of Pallas, he armed his son Hercules in his cause. With the aid of this celebrated hero, the giants were soon put to flight and defeated. Some were crushed to pieces under mountains, or buried in the sea, and others were flayed alive, or beaten to death with clubs. Vid. Enceladus, Aloides, Porphyrion, Typhon, Otus, Titanes, &c. The existence of giants has been supported by all the writers of antiquity, and received as an undeniable truth. Homer tells us that Tityus, when extended on the ground, covered nine acres; and that Polyphemus ate two of the companions of Ulysses at once, and walked along the shores of Sicily, leaning on a staff which might have served for the mast of a ship. The Grecian heroes, during the Trojan war, and Turnus in Italy, attacked their enemies by throwing stones, which four men of the succeeding ages would have been unable to move. Ptolemy also mentions, in support of the gigantic stature, that Sertorius opened the grave of Annæus in Africa, and found a skeleton which measured six cubits in length. Apol. l. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 1, c. 2, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 151.—Plut. in Sertor.—Hygin. fab. 28, &c.—Homer. Od. 9 & 10.—Virg. G. 1, v. 280. Æn. 6, v. 580.

Gigartum, a town of Phœnicia.

Gigia, one of the female attendants of Parysatis, who was privy to the poisoning of Statira. Plut. in Artax.

Gildo, a governor of Africa in the reign of Arcadius. He died A.D. 398.

Gillo, an infamous adulterer in Juvenal's age. Juv. s. v. 40.

Gindanes, a people of Libya, who fed on the leaves of the lotus. Herodot. 4, c. 176.

Gindes, a river of Albania, flowing into the Cyren.——Another of Mesopotamia. Tibul. 4, el. 1, v. 141.

Ginge. Vid. Gigia.

Gingulum, a mountain of Umbria.

Gippius, a Roman who pretended to sleep, that his wife might indulge her adulterous propensities, &c.

Gisop, son of Himilcon the Carthaginian general, was banished from his country by the influence of his enemies. He was afterwards recalled, and empowered by the Carthaginians to punish in what manner he pleased those who had occasioned his banishment. He was satisfied to see them prostrate on the ground and to place his foot on their neck, showing that independence and forgiveness are two of the most brilliant virtues of a great mind. He was made a general soon after, in Sicily, against the Corinthians, about 309 years before the Christian era; and by his success and intrepidity he obliged the enemies of his country to sue for peace.

Gladiatori ludii, combats originally exhibited on the grave of deceased persons at Rome. They were first introduced at Rome by the Bruti, upon the death of their father, A.U.C. 488. It was supposed that the ghosts of the dead were rendered propitious by human blood; therefore at funerals, it was usual to murder slaves in cool blood. In succeeding ages, it was reckoned less cruel to oblige them to kill one another like men, than to slaughter them like brutes, therefore the barbarity was covered by the specious show of pleasure and voluntary combat. Originally captives, criminals, or disobedient slaves were trained up for combat; but when the diversion became more frequent, and was exhibited on the smallest occasion, to procure esteem and popularity, many of the Roman citizens enlisted themselves among the gladiators, and Nero, at one show, exhibited no less than 400 senators and 600 knights. The people were treated with these combats not only by the great and opulent, but the very priests had their Ludi pontificales, and Ludi sacerdotales. It is supposed that there were no more than three pair of gladiators exhibited by the Bruti. Their numbers, however, increased with the luxury and power of the city; and the gladiators became so formidable, that Spartacus, one of their body, had courage to take up arms, and the success to defeat the Roman armies, only with a train of his fellow-sufferers. The more prudent of the Romans were sensible of the dangers which threatened the state by keeping such a number of desperate men in arms, and therefore many salutary laws were proposed to limit their number, as well as to settle the time in which the show could be exhibited with safety and convenience. Under the emperors, not only senators and knights, but even women engaged among the gladiators, and seemed to forget the inferiority of their sex. When there were to be any shows, hand-bills were circulated to give notice to the people, and to mention the place, number, time, and every circumstance requisite to be known. When they were first brought upon the arena, they walked round the place with great pomp and solemnity, and after that they were matched in equal pairs with great nicety. They first had a skirmish with wooden files, called ruas or arma luvoria. After this the effective weapons, such as swords, daggers, &c., called arma decretoria, were given them, and the signal for the engagement was given by the sound of a trumpet. As they had all previously sworn to fight till death, or suffer death in the most excruciating torments, the fight was bloody and obstinate, and when one signified his submission by surrendering his arms, the victor was not permitted to grant him his life without the leave and approbation of the multitude. This was done by clenching the fingers of both hands between each other, and holding the thumbs upright close together, or by bending back their thumbs. The first of these was called pollicem premere, and signified the wish of the people to spare the life of the conquered. The other sign, called pollicem vertere, signified their disapprobation, and ordered the victor to put his antagonist to death. The victor was generally rewarded with a palm, and other expressive marks of the people's favour. He was most commonly presented with a pilleus and rudis. When one of the combatants received a remarkable wound, the people exclaimed habet, and expressed their exultation by shouts. The combats of gladiators were sometimes different either in weapons or dress, whence they were generally distinguished into the following orders: The secutores were armed with a sword and buckler, to keep off the net of their antagonist, the retiaris. These last endeavoured to throw their net over the head of their antagonist, and in that manner to entangle him, and prevent him from striking. If this did not succeed, they betook themselves to fight. Their dress was a short coat, with a hat tied under the chin with a broad ribbon. They wore a trident in their left hand. The Thracas, originally Thracians, were armed with a falchion, and small round shield. The myrmillones, called also Galli, from their Gallic dress, wore much the same as the secutores. They wore, like them, armed with a sword, and on the top of the head-piece they wore the figure of a fish embossed, called muromphos, whence their name. The Hoplomachi were completely armed from head to foot, as their name implies. The Samnites, armed after the manner of the Samnites, wore a large shield broad at the top, and growing more narrow at the bottom, more conveniently to defend the upper parts of the body. The Essedarii generally fought from the essedum, or chariot used by the ancient Gauls and Britons. The andabata, avabata, fought on horseback, with a helmet that covered and defended their faces and eyes. Hence andabata were more ingenue, is to fight blindfolded. The meridiani engaged in the afternoon. The postulati were men of great skill and experience, and such as were generally produced by the emperors. The faciales were maintained out of the emperor's treasury, Acus. The dimachari fought with two swords in their hands, whence their name. After these cruel exhibitions had been continued for the amusement of the Roman populace, they were abolished by Constantine the Great, near 600 years after their first institution. They were, however, revived under the reign of Constantine and his two successors, but Honorius for ever put an end to these cruel barbarities.

Glans, a river of Canan, — of Iberia, — of Italy. Ibid. 8, v. 454.

Glanum, a town of Gazi, now St. Roms, in Provence.

Glaphyre and Glaphyra, a daughter of Archelaus the high priest of Beldina in Cappadocia, celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. She obtained the kingdom of Cappadocia for her two sons from M. Antony, whom she corrupted by defiling the bed of her husband. This amour of Antony with Glaphyra highly displeased his wife Fulvia, who wished Augustus to avenge his infidelity by receiving from her the same favours which Glaphyra received from Antony. — Her granddaughter bore the same name. She was a daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and married Alexander, a son of Herod, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Alexander, she married her brother-in-law Archelaus.

Glaphyrus, an infamous adulterer. Juv. 6, v. 77.

Glauce, the wife of Actæus, daughter of Cythereus. Apollod. — A daughter of Cretheus, mother of Telamon. — One of the Nereides. — A daughter of Croon, who married Jason. Vid. Creusa. — One of the Danaides. Apollod.

Cic. Orat. 3.

Glaucippus, a Greek who wrote a treatise concerning the sacred rites observed at Athens.

Glaucion, a writer of dialogues at Athens. Diog. in Vit.

Glaucus, a son of Hippolchus the son of Belleophon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the simplicity to exchange his golden suit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one, whence came the proverb of Glaucus et Diomedis permutatio, to express a foolish purchase. He behaved with much courage, and was killed by Ajax. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—Martial. 9, ep. 96.—Hom. Il. 6.—A fisherman of Anthedon in Bœotia, son of Neptune and Nais, or, according to others, of Polybius the son of Mercury. As he was fishing, he observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass received fresh vigour as they touched the ground, and immediately escaped from him by leaping into the sea.

He attributed the cause of it to the grass, and by tasting it, he found himself suddenly moved with a desire of living in the sea. Upon this he leaped into the water, and was made a sea deity by Oceanus and Tethys, at the request of the gods. After this transformation he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whose ingratitude was severely punished by Circe. Vid. Scylla. He is represented like the other sea deities, with a long beard, dishevelled hair, and shaggy eyebrows, and with the tail of a fish. He received the gift of prophecy from Apollo, and according to some accounts he was the interpreter of Nereus. He assisted the Argonauts in their expedition, and foretold them that Hercules and the two sons of Leda would one day receive immortal honours. The fable of his metamorphosis has been explained by some authors, who observe that he was an excellent diver, who was devoured by fishes as he was swimming in the sea. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 905, &c.—Hygin. fab. 199.—Athen. 7.—Apollon. 1.—Diad. 4.—Aristot. de Rep. Del.—Paus. 9, c. 32.—A son of Sisyphus king of Corinth, by Merope the daughter of Atlas, born at Potnia, a village of Bœotia. He prevented his mares from having any commerce with the stallions, in the expectation that they would become swifter in running, upon which Venus inspired the mares with such fury, that they tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games which Adrastus had celebrated in honour of his father. He was buried at Potnia. Hygin. fab. 250.—Virg. G. 3, v. 367.—Apollod. 1 & 2.—A son of Minos II and Pasiphae, who was smothered in a cask of honey. His father, ignorant of his fate, consulted the oracle to know where he was, and received for answer, that the soothsayer who best described him an ox, which was of three different colours among his flocks, would best give him intelligence of his son's situation. Polyidus was found superior to all the other soothsayers, and was commanded by the king to find the young prince. When he had found him, Minos confined him with the dead body, and told him that he never would restore him his liberty if he did not restore his son to life. Polyidus was struck with the king's severity, but while he stood in astonishment, a serpent suddenly came towards the body and touched it. Polyidus killed the serpent, and immediately a second came, who seeing the other without motion or signs of life, disappeared, and soon after returned with a certain herb in his mouth. This herb he laid on the body of the dead serpent, which was immediately restored to life. Polyidus, who had attentively considered what passed, seized the herb, and with it he rubbed the body of the dead prince, who was instantly raised to life. Minos received Glaucus with gratitude, but he refused to restore Polyidus to liberty, before he taught his son the art of divination and prophecy. He consented with great reluctance, and when he was at last permitted to return to Argolis his native country, he desired his pupil to spit in his mouth. Glaucus willingly consented, and from that moment he forgot all the knowledge of divination and healing which he had received from the instructions of Polyidus. Hyginus ascribes the recovery of Glaucus to Æsculapius. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Hygin. 136 & 251, &c.—A son of Epytus, who succeeded his father on the throne of Messenia, about 10 centuries before the Augustan age. He introduced the worship of Jupiter among the Dorians, and was the first who offered sacrifices to Machaon the son of Æsculapius. Paus. 4, c. 3.—A son of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon. Dictys. Crest. 4.—An Argonaut, the only one of the crew who was not wounded in a battle against the Tyrrhenians. Athen. 7, c. 20.—A son of Imbrabus, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 343.—A son of Hippolytus, whose descendants reigned in Ionia.—An athlete of Eubœa. Paus. 6, c. 9.—A son of Priam. Apollod. 3.—A physician of Cleopatra. Plut. in Anton.—A warrior in the age of Phœon. Id. in Phœ.—A physician exposed on a cross, because Hephæstion died while under his care. Id. in Alex.—An artist of Chios. Paus.—A Spartan. Id.—A grove of Bœotia. Id.—A bay of Caria, now the gulf of Maeri. Id.—An historian of Rhegium in Italy.—A bay and river of Libya,—of Peloponnesus,—of Colchis, falling into the Phæsis.

Gonocessa, a town of Troas. Senec. in Troad.

Gordisei, mountains in Armenia, where the Tigris rises, supposed to be the Ararat of scripture.

Gordianus M. Antonius Africanus, a son of Metius Marcellus, descended from Trajan by his mother's side. In the greatest affluence, he cultivated learning, and was an example of piety and virtue. He applied himself to the study of poetry, and composed a poem in 30 books upon the virtues of Titus, Antoninus, and M. Aurelius. He was such an advocate for good breeding and politeness, that he never sat down in the presence of his father-in-law Annius Severus, who paid him daily visits, before he was promoted to the pretorship. He was some time after elected consul, and went to take the government of Africa in the capacity of proconsul. After he had attained his 80th year in the greatest splendour and domestic tranquillity, he was roused from his peaceful occupations by the tyrannical reign of the Maximini, and he was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death gained his compliance. Maximinus marched against him with the greatest indignation; and Gordian sent his son, with whom he shared the imperial dignity, to oppose the enemy. Young Gordian was killed; and the father, worn out with age, and grown desperate on account of his misfortunes, strangled himself at Carthage, before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire, A.D. 236. He was universally lamented by the army and people.—

M. Antonius Africanus, son of Gordianus, was instructed by Serenus Sammaticus, who left him his library, which consisted of 62,000 volumes. His enlightened understanding, and his peaceful disposition, recommended him to the favour of the emperor Heliogabalus. He was made prefect of Rome, and afterwards consul, by the emperor Alexander Severus. He passed into Africa, in the character of lieutenant to his father, who had obtained that province; and seven years after he was elected emperor, in conjunction with him. He marched against the partisans of Maximinus, his antagonist in Mauritania, and was killed in a bloody battle on the 25th of June, A.D. 236, after a reign of about six weeks. He was of an amiable disposition, but he has been justly blamed by his biographers on account of his lascivious propensities, which reduced him to the weakness and infirmities of old age, though he was but in his 46th year at the time of his death.—M. Antoninus Pius, grandson to the first Gordian, was but 12 years old when he was honoured with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor in the 16th year of his age, and his election was attended with universal marks of approbation. In the 18th year of his age, he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina daughter of Mithreus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Mithreus was entrusted with the most important offices of the state by his son-in-law, and his administration proved how deserving he was of the confidence and affection of his imperial master. He corrected the various abuses which prevailed in the state, and restored the ancient discipline among the soldiers. By his prudence and political sagacity, all the chief towns in the empire were stored with provisions, which could maintain the emperor and a large army during 15 days upon any emergency. Gordian was not less active than his father-in-law; and when Sapor the king of Persia had invaded the Roman provinces in the east, he boldly marched to meet him, and in his way defeated a large body of Goths, in Mæsia. He conquered Sapor, and took many flourishing cities in the east from his adversary. In this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Mithreus as the guardian of the republic. Gordian was assassinated in the east, A.D. 244, by the means of Philip, who had succeeded to the virtuous Mithreus, and who usurped the sovereign power by murdering a warlike and amiable prince. The senate, sensible of his merit, honoured him with a most splendid funeral on the confines of Persia, and ordered that the descendants of the Gordians should ever be free, at Rome, from all the heavy taxes and burdens of the state. During the reign of Gordianus, there was an uncommon eclipse of the sun, in which the stars appeared in the middle of the day.

Gordium, a town of Phrygia. Justin. 11, c. 7.—Liv. 38, c. 18.—Curt. 3, c. 1.

Gordius, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne. During a sedition, the Phrygians consulted the oracle, and were told that all their troubles would cease as soon as they chose for their king the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter, mounted on a chariot. Gordius was the object of their choice, and he immediately consecrated his chariot in the temple of Jupiter. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught tree, was made in such an artful manner that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumstance a report was soon spread, that the empire of Asia was promised by the oracle to him that could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium; and as he wished to leave nothing undone which might inspire his soldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword; and from that circumstance asserted that the oracle was really fulfilled, and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified. Justin. 11, c. 7.—Curt. 3, c. 1.—Arrian. 1.—A tyrant of Corinth. Aristol.

Gorgæus, a man who received divine honours at Phene in Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 30.

Gorge, a daughter of Cæneus king of Calydon, by Althea daughter of Thestius. She married Andromon, by whom she had Oedipus, who headed the Heraclidae when they made an attempt upon Peloponnesus. Her tomb was seen at Amphissa in Locris. Paus. 10, c. 38.—Apollod. 1 & 2.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 542.—One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Gorgias, a celebrated sophist and orator, son of Carmentides surnamed Leontinus, because born at Leontium in Sicily. He was sent by his countrymen to solicit the assistance of the Athenians against the Syracusans, and was successful in his embassy. He lived to his 80th year, and died B.C. 400. Only two fragments of his compositions are extant. Paus. 6, c. 17.—Cic. in Orat. 22, Ec. Socrat. 15, in Brut. 15.—Quintil. 3 & 18.—An officer of Antiochus Epiphanes.—An Athenian, who wrote an account of all the prostitutes of Athens. Athen. 8.—A Macedonian, forced to war with Amyntas, Æc. Cæsar. 7, c. 1.

Gorgo, the wife of Leonidas king of Sparta, &c.—The name of the ship which carried Perseus, after he had conquered Medusa.

Gorgones, three celebrated sisters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whose names were Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa, all immortal except Medusa. According to the mythologists, their heads were entwined with serpents, their hands were of brass, their wings of the colour of gold, their body was covered with impenetrable scales, and their teeth were as long as the tusks of a wild boar, and they turned to stones all those on whom they fixed their eyes. Medusa alone had serpents in her hair, according to Ovid, and this proceeded from the resentment of Minerva, in whose temple Medusa had gratified the passion of Neptune, who was enamoured of the beautiful colour of her locks, which the goddess changed into serpents. Æschylus says that they had only one tooth and one eye between them, of which they had the use each in her turn; and accordingly it was at the time that they were exchanging the eye, that Perseus attacked them, and cut off Medusa's head. According to some authors, Perseus, when he went to the conquest of the Gorgons, was armed with an instrument like a scythe by Mercury, and provided with a looking-glass by Minerva, besides winged shoes, and a helmet of Pluto, which rendered all objects clearly visible and open to the view, while the person who wore it remained totally invisible. With weapons like these, Perseus obtained an easy victory; and after his conquest, returned his arms to the different deities whose favours and assistance he had so recently experienced. The head of Medusa remained in his hands; and after he had finished all his laborious expeditions, he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her eggs, with which she tussled into stones all such as fixed their eyes upon it. It is said, that after the conquest of the Gorgons, Perseus took his flight in the air towards Æthiopia; and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Medusa's head were changed into serpents, which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. The horse Pegasus also arose from the blood of Medusa, as well as Chrysaor with his golden sword. The residence of the Gorgons was beyond the ocean towards the west, according to Hesiod. Æschylus makes them inhabit the eastern parts of Scythia; and Ovid, as the most received opinion, supports that they lived in the inland parts of Libya, near the lake of Triton, or the gardens of the Hesperides. Diodorus and others explain the fable of the Gorgons, by supposing that they were a warlike race of women near the Amazons, whom Perseus, with the help of a large army, totally destroyed. Hesiod. Theog. & Scut.—Apollod. 4.—Apollod. 2, c. 1 & 2, &c.—Hom. Il. 5 & 11.—*Virg. Gorgonia, a surname of Pallas, because Perseus, armed with her shield, had conquered the Gorgon, who had polluted her temple with Neptune.

Gorgonius, a man ridiculed by Horace for his ill smell. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 27.

Gorgophōna, a daughter of Perseus and Andromeda, who married Perieres king of Messenia, by whom she had Aphareus and Leucippus. After the death of Perieres, she married Cebalus, who made her mother of Icarus and Tyndarus. She is the first whom the mythologists mention as having had a second husband. Paus. 4, c. 2.—Apollod. 1, 2 & 3.—One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Gorgophānus, a son of Electryon and Anaxo. Apollod. 2, c. 4.

Gorgophōra, a surname of Minerva, from her eggs, on which was the head of the Gorgon Medusa. Cic.

Gorgus, the son of Aristomenes the Messenian. He was married, when young, to a virgin, by his father, who had experienced the greatest kindnesses from her humanity, and had been enabled to conquer seven Cretans who had attempted his life, &c. Paus. 4, c. 19.—A son of Theon tyrant of Agrigatum.—A man whose knowledge of metals proved very serviceable to Alexander, &c.

Gorythion, a son of Priam, killed by Teucer. Hom. Il. 8.

Gortus, a people of Eubœa, who fought with the Medes at the battle of Arbela. Cæsar. 4, c. 12.

Gortyn, Gortys, and Gortyna, an inland town of Crete. It was on the inhabitants of this place that Annibal, to save his money, practised an artifice recorded in C. Nep. in Ann. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 6, v. 224, L. 7, v. 224—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 773.

Gortyna, a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Gothai, a celebrated nation of Germany, called also Gothones, Gutones, Gythones, and Guttones. They were warriors by profession, as well as all their savage neighbours. They extended their power over all parts of the world, and chiefly directed their arms against the Roman empire. Their first attempt against Rome was on the provinces of Greece, whence they were driven by Cosmasine. They plundered Rome, under Alaric, one of their most celebrated kings, A.D. 410. From becoming the enemies of the Romans, the Goths gradually became their mercenaries; and as they were powerful and united, they soon distated to their imperial masters, and introduced disorder, anarchy, and revolutions in the west of Europe. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 2, &c.

Gracchus T. Sempronius, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, twice consul, and once censor, was distinguished by his integrity as well as his probity and superior ability, both in the senate and at the head of the armies. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Sempronis, of the family of the Scipios, a woman of great virtue, piety, and learning. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48. Their children, Tiberius and Caius, who had been educated under the watchful eye of their mother, rendered themselves famous for their eloquence, seditions, and an obstinate attachment to the interests of the populace, which at last proved fatal to them. With a winning eloquence, affected moderation, and uncommon popularity, Tiberius began to renew the Agrarian law, which had already caused such dissensions at Rome. Vid. Agraria. By the means of violence, his proposition passed into a law, and he was appointed commissioner, with his father-in-law Appius Claudius and his brother Caius, to make an equal division of the lands among the people. The riches of Attalus, which were left to the Roman people by will, were distributed without opposition; and Tiberius enjoyed the triumph of his successful enterprise, when he was assassinated in the midst of his adherents by P. Nasica, while the populace were all unanimous to re-elect him to serve the office of tribune the following year. The death of Tiberius checked for a while the friends of the people; but Caius, spurred by ambition and furious zeal, attempted to remove every obstacle which stood in his way by force and violence. He supported the cause of the people with more vehemence, but less moderation than Tiberius; and his success served only to awaken his ambition, and animate his resentment against the nobles. With the privileges of a tribune, he soon became the arbiter of the republic, and treated the patricians with contempt. This behaviour hastened the ruin of Caius, and in the tumult he fled to the temple of Diana, where his friends prevented him from committing suicide. This increased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Opimius, B.C. 127, about 13 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber, and his wife was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Caius has been accused of having stained his hands in the blood of Scipio Africanus the younger, who was found murdered in his bed. Plut. in Vit. Cic. in Cat. 1. Lucan. 6, v. 796. Flor. 2, c. 17. l. 3, c. 14. &c.—Sempronius, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia the daughter of Augustus. He was assassinated by order of Tiberius, after he had been banished 14 years. Julia also shared his fate. Tact. Ann. 1, c. 53.—A general of the Sabines, taken by Q. Cincinnatus.—A Roman consul, defeated by Annibal, &c. C. Nep. in Ann.

GRADIVUS, a surname of Mars among the Romans, perhaps from spadarius, brandishing a spear. Though he had a temple without the walls of Rome, and though Numa had established the Salii, yet his favourite residence was supposed to be among the fierce and savage Thracians and Getæ, over whom he particularly presided. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 35.—Hom. Il.—Liv. 1, c. 20. l. 2, c. 45.

GREECE, the inhabitants of Greece. Vid. Græcia. GRÆCIA, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the west by the Ionian sea, south by the Mediterranean sea, east by the Ægean, and north by Thrace and Dalmatia. It is generally divided into four large provinces: Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia or Hellas, and Peloponnesus. This country has been reckoned superior to every other part of the earth, on account of the salubrity of the air, the temperature of the climate, the fertility of the soil, and above all, the fame, learning, and arts of its inhabitants. The Greeks have severally been called Achæans, Argians, Danaï, Dolopes, Hellenians, Ionians, Myræidons, and Pelægians. The most celebrated of their cities were Athens, Sparta, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, Sicyon, Mycenæ, Delphi, Trœzene, Salamis, Megara, Pylos, &c. The inhabitants, whose history is darkened in its primitive ages with fabulous accounts and traditions, supported that they were the original inhabitants of the country, and born from the earth where they dwelt; and they heard with contempt the probable conjectures which traced their origin among the first inhabitants of Asia, and the colonies of Egypt. In the first periods of their history, the Greeks were governed by monarchs; and there were as many kings as there were cities. The monarchical power gradually decreased; and the love of liberty established the republican government; and no part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an absolute sovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts first rendered the Greeks respectable among their neighbours; and in the succeeding age, the wars of Thebes and Troy gave opportunity to their heroes and demi-gods to display their valour in the field of battle. The simplicity of the ancient Greeks rendered them virtuous; and the establishment of the Olympic games, in particular, where the noble reward of the conqueror was a laurel crown, contributed to their aggrandizement, and made them ambitious of fame, and not the slaves of riches. The austerity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Laocœdemon, rendered them brave and active, insensible to bodily pain, fearless and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Platæa, and Mycæle sufficiently show what superiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undisciplined barbarians. After many signal victories over the Persians, they became elated with their success; and when they found no one able to dispute their power abroad, they turned their arms one against the other, and leagued with foreign states to destroy the most flourishing of their cities. The Messenian and Peloponnesian wars are examples of the dreadful calamities which arise from civil discord and long prosperity, and the success with which the gold and the sword of Philip and of his son corrupted and enslaved Greece, fatally proved that when a nation becomes indolent and dissipated at home, it ceases to be respectable in the eyes of the neighbouring states. The annals of Greece, however, abound with singular proofs of heroism and resolution. The bold retreat of the 10,000, who had assisted Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes, reminded their countrymen of their superiority over all other nations; and taught Alexander that the conquest of the east might be effected with a handful of Grecian soldiers. While the Greeks rendered themselves so illustrious by their military exploits, the arts and sciences were assisted by conquest, and received fresh lustre from the application and industry of their professors. The labours of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a composition was determined by the applause or disapprobation of a multitude. Their generals were orators; and eloquence seemed to be so nearly connected with the military profession, that he was despised by his soldiers who could not address them upon any emergency with a spirited and well-delivered oration. The learning as well as the virtues of Socrates procured him a name; and the writings of Aristotle have, perhaps, gained him a more lasting fame than all the conquests and trophies of his royal pupil. Such were the occupations and accomplishments of the Greeks. Their language became almost universal, and their country was the receptacle of the youths of the neighbouring states, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue. The Greeks planted several colonies, and totally peopled the western coasts of Asia Minor. In the eastern parts of Italy there were also many settlements made; and the country received from its Greek inhabitants the name of Magna Græcia. For some time Greece submitted to the yoke of Alexander and his successors; and at last, after a spirited though ineffectual struggle in the Achaean league, it fell under the power of Rome, and became one of its dependant provinces, governed by a procurator.

Græcia magna, a part of Italy where the Greeks planted colonies, whence the name. Its boundaries are very uncertain; some say that it extended on the southern parts of Italy, and others suppose that Magna Græcia comprehended only Campania and Lucania. To these some add Sicily, which was likewise peopled by Greek colonies. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 64.—Strab., &c.

Grædinus, a senator put to death by Caligula, because he refused to accuse Sejanus, &c. Senec. de Benef. 2.

Grædus, a man from whom some suppose that Greece received its name. Aristot.

Græus, an inhabitant of Greece.

Grampinus mons, the Grampian mountains in Scotland. Tacit. Agric. 29.

Granicus, a river of Bithynia, famous for the battle fought there between the armies of Alexander and Darius, and of May, B.C. 334, when 600,000 Persians were defeated by 30,000 Macedonians. Diad. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin.—Curt. 4, c. 1.

Granius Petronius, an officer who, being taken by Pompey's generals, refused the life which was tendered to him; observing that Caesar's soldiers received not, but granted, life. He killed himself. Plut. in Cæs.—A questor whom Sylla had ordered to be strangled, only one day before he died a natural death. Plut.—A son of the wife of Marius, by a former husband.—Quintus, a man intimate with Crassus and other illustrious men of Rome, whose vices he lashed with an unsparring hand. Cic. Brut. 43 & 46. Orat. 9, c. 66.

Grætes, three goddesses. Vid. Charites.

Gratiannus, a native of Pannonia, father to the emperor Valentinian I. He was raised to the throne, though only eight years old; and after he had reigned for some time conjointly with his father, he became sole emperor in the 16th year of his age. He soon after took, as his imperial colleague, Theodosius, whom he appointed over the eastern parts of the empire. His courage in the field was as remarkable as his love of learning, and fondness of philosophy. He slaughtered 30,000 Germans in a battle, and supported the tottering state by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the Pagan superstition of his subjects proved his ruin; and Maximinus, who undertook the defence of the worship of Jupiter and of all the gods, was joined by an infinite number of discontented Romans, and met Gratian near Paris in Genl. Gratian was forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, and was murdered by the rebels, A.D. 383, in the 24th year of his age.—A Roman soldier, invested with the imperial purple by the rebellious army in Britain, in opposition to Honorius. He was assassinated four months after by those very troops to whom he owed his elevation, A.D. 407.

Gratidia, a woman at Neapolis, called Canidia by Horace, epod. 3.

Gratton, a giant killed by Diana.

Gratius Faliscus, a Latin poet contemporary with Ovid, and mentioned only by him among the more ancient authors. He wrote a poem on courting, called Cynegeticum, much commended for its elegance and perspicuity. It may be compared to the Georgics of Virgil, to which it is nearly equal in the number of verses. The latest edition is of Amst. 4to, 1728. Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 34.

Gravil, a people of Spain. Ital. 3, v. 366.

Graviscæ, now Erema de St. Augustina, a maritime town of Etruria, which assisted Æneas against Turnus. The air was unwholesome, on account of the marshes and stagnant waters in its neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 184.—Liv. 40, c. 29. l. 41, c. 16.

Gravius, a Roman knight of Patroli, killed at Dyrachium, &c. Cæs. Bell. Civ.

Gregorius Theod. Thaumaturgus, a disciple of Origen, afterwards bishop of Neocesarea, the place of his birth. He died A.D. 266, and it is said he left only 17 idolaters in his diocese, where he had found only 17 christians. Of his works, are extant his congratulatory oration to Origen, a canonical epistle, and other treatises in Greek, the best edition of which is that of Paris, fol. 1622.—Nazianzen, surnamed the Divinus, was bishop of Constantinople, which he resigned on its being disputed. His writings rival those of the most celebrated orators of Greece in eloquence, sublimity, and variety. His sermons are more for philosophers than common hearers, but replete with seriousness and devotion. Erasmus said that he was afraid to translate his works, from the apprehension of not transfusing into another language the smartness and acumen of his style, and the stateliness and happy diction of the whole. He died A.D. 380. The best edition is that of the Benedictines, the first volume of which, in fol., was published at Paris, 1778.—A bishop of Nyssa, author of the Nicene creed. His style is represented as allegorical and affected; and he has been accused of mixing philosophy too much with theology. His writings consist of commentaries on scripture, moral discourses, sermons on mysteries, dogmatical treatises, panegyrics on saints; the best edition of which is that of Morell, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1615. The bishop died, A.D. 396.—Another christian writer, whose works were edited by the Benedictines, in 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1705.

Grinnes, a people among the Batavians. Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 10.

Grosphus, a man distinguished as much for his probity as his riches, to whom Horace addressed a od. 16.

Grudil, a people tributary to the Nervii, supposed to have inhabited the country near Tournay or Bruges in Flanders. Cæs. G. 5, c. 38.

Gramantum, now Armento, an inland town of Lucania on the river Aciris. Liv. 23, c. 37. l. 27, c. 41.

Gryllus, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain, at the battle of Mantua, B.C. 363. His father was offering a sacrifice when he received the news of his death, and he threw down the garland which was on his head; but he replaced it when he heard that the enemy's general had fallen by his hands; and he observed, that his death ought to be celebrated with every demonstration of joy, rather than of lamentation. Aristot.—Pans. 8, c. 11, &c.—One of the companions of Ulysses, changed into a swine by Circe. It is said that he refused to be restored to his human shape, and preferred the indolence and inactivity of this squalid animal.

Gryneum and Grynium, a town near Clazomenae, where Apollo had a temple with an oracle, on account of which he is called Grynaeus. Strab. 13.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 72. Æn. 4, v. 345.

Gryneus, one of the Centaurs, who fought against the Lapithæ, &c. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 260.

Gyarus and Gyaros, an island in the Ægean sea, near Delos. The Romans were wont to send their culprits there. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 409.

Gyas, one of the companions of Æneas, who distinguished himself at the games exhibited after the death of Anchises in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 118, &c.—A part of the territories of Syracuse, in the possession of Dionysius.—A Rutulium, son of Melampus, killed by Æneas in Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 318.

Gyæus, a lake of Lydia, 40 stadia from Sardis. Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 18.

Gyge, a maid of Parysatis.

Gyges, or Gyges, a son of Coelus and Terra, represented as having 50 heads and 100 hands. He, with his brothers, made war against the gods, and was afterwards punished in Tartarus. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 7, v. 18.—A Lydian, to whom Candaules king of the country showed his wife naked. The queen was incensed at this instance of imprudence and infirmity in her husband, that she ordered Gyges, either to prepare for death himself, or to murder Candaules. He chose the latter, and married the queen, and ascended the vacant throne, about 718 years before the christian era. He was the first of the Mermaidæ who reigned in Lydia. He reigned 38 years, and distinguished himself by the immense presents which he made to the oracle of Delphi. According to Plato, Gyges descended into a chasma of the earth, where he found a brazen horse, whose sides he opened, and saw within the body the carcase of a man of uncommon size, from whose finger he took a famous brazen ring. This ring, when put on his finger, rendered him invisible; and by means of its virtue, he introduced himself to the queen, murdered her husband, and married her, and usurped the crown of Lydia. Herodot. 1, c. 8.—Plut. Dial. 20, de rep.—Val. Max. 7, c. 1.—Cic. Offic. 3, 9.—A man killed by Turnus in his wars with Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 762.—A beautiful boy of Chidus in the age of Horace. Horat. 2, od. 5, v. 30.

Gylippus, a Lacedæmonian sent, B.C. 414, by his countrymen to assist Syracuse against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, the enemy's generals, and obliged them to surrender. He accompanied Lysander in his expedition against Athens, and was present at the taking of that celebrated town. After the fall of Athens, he was entrusted by the conqueror with the money which had been taken in the plunder, which amounted to 1500 talents. As he conveyed it to Sparta, he had the meanness to unsew the bottom of the bags which contained it, and secreted about 300 talents. His theft was discovered; and to avoid the punishment which he deserved, he fled from his country, and by this act of meanness tarnished the glory of his victorious actions. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 190.—Plut. in Nicia.—An Arcadian in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 272.

Gynnisia, a large city near Colchis. Diod. 14.

Gynnisium, a place among the Greeks, where all the public exercises were performed, and where not only wrestlers and dancers exhibited, but also philosophers, poets, and rhetoricians repeated their compositions. The room was high and spacious, and could contain many thousands of spectators. The laborious exercises of the Gymnasium were running, leaping, throwing the quoit, wrestling, and boxing, which was called by the Greeks επειθαλον, and by the Romans gymnastica. In riding, the athlete led a horse, on which he sometimes was mounted, conducting another by the bridle, and jumping from the one upon the other. Whoever came first to the goal and jumped with the greatest agility, obtained the prize. In running afoot the athletes were sometimes armed, and he who came first was declared victorious. Leaping was a useful exercise; its primary object was to teach the soldiers to jump over ditches, and to pass over eminences during a siege, or in the field of battle. In throwing the quoit, the prize was adjudged to him who threw it furthest. The quoits were made either with wood, stone, or metal. The wrestlers employed all their dexterity to bring their adversary to the ground, and the boxers had their hands armed with gauntlets, called also cestus. Their blows were dangerous, and often ended in the death of one of the combatants. In wrestling and boxing, the athletes were often naked, whence the word Gymnasium, γυμνασιον, whence. They anointed themselves with oil to brace their limbs, and to render their bodies slippery and more difficult to be grasped. Plin. 2, cap. 17.—C. Nep. 20, c. 5.

Gymnisia, two islands near the Iberus in the Mediterranean, called Bœlears by the Greeks. Plin. 5, c. 8.—Strab. 2.

Gymnates, a people of Æthiopia, who lived almost naked. Plin. 5, c. 8.

Gymnia, a town of Colchis. Xenoph. Anab. 4.

Gymnosophistes, a certain sect of philosophers in India, who, according to some, placed their εὐνομιστον business in pleasure, and their εὐνομιστον business in pain. They lived naked, as their name implies, and for 37 years they exposed themselves in the open air, to the heat of the sun, the inclemency of the seasons, and the coldness of the night. They were often seen in the fields fixing their eyes full upon the disc of the sun from the time of its rising till the hour of its setting. Sometimes they stood whole days upon one foot in burning sand without moving, or showing any concern for what surrounded them. Alexander was astonished at the sight of a sect of men who seemed to despise bodily pain, and who injured themselves to suffer the greatest tortures without uttering a groan, or expressing any marks of fear. The conqueror condescended to visit them, and his astonishment was increased when he saw one of them ascend a burning pile with firmness and unconcern, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and stand upright on one leg and unmoved, whilst the flames surrounded him on every side. Virg. Calanus. The Brachmans were a branch of the sect of the Gymnosophistes. Virg. Brachmanes. Strab. 15, &c.—Plin. 7, c. 2.—Cic. Tusc. 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 240.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Dion.

Gynsœas, a woman said to have been the wife of Faunus, and the mother of Bacchus and of Midas.

Gynæothonas, a name of Mars at Tegea, on account of a sacrifice offered by the women without the assistance of the men, who were not permitted to appear at this religious ceremony. Paus. 8, c. 48.

Gyndes, now Zindak, a river of Assyria, full ing into the Tigris. When Cyrus marched against Babylon, his army was stopped by this river, in which one of his favourite horses was drowned. This so irritated the monarch that he ordered the river to be conveyed into 360 different channels by his army, so that after this diversion it hardly reached the knee. Herodot. 1, c. 189 & 202.

Gythium, a seaport town of Laconia, at the mouth of the Eurotas in Peloponnesus, built by Hercules and Apollo, who had there desisted from their quarrels. The inhabitants were called Gythiatae. Cic. Offic. 3, c. 11.

HABIS, a king of Spain, who first taught his subjects agriculture, &c. Justin. 44, c. 4.

Hadrinopolis, a town of Thrace, on the Hebrus.

Hadrianus, a Roman emperor. Virg. Adrianus.—C. Fabius, a pretor in Africa, who was burnt by the people of Utica for conspiring with the slaves. Cic. Verr. 1, c. 27, l. 5, c. 26.

Hadriaticum mare. Virg. Adriaticum.

Hæmon, a Theban youth, son of Creon, who was so captivated with the beauty of Antigone, that he killed himself on her tomb, when he heard that she had been put to death by his father's orders. Propert. 2, el. 8, v. 21.—A Rutulian engaged in the wars of Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 685.—A friend of Æneas against Turnus. He was a native of Lycia. Id. 10, v. 126.

Hæmônia. Virg. Æmônia.

Hæmus, a mountain which separates Thrace from Thessaly, so high that from its top are visible the Euxine and Adriatic seas, though this, however, is denied by Strabo. It receives its name from Hæmus son of Boreas and Orithyia, who married Rhodope, and was changed into this mountain for aspiring to divine honours. Strab. 7, p. 313.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 89.—A stage-player. Juv. 3, v. 99.

Hæges, a brother of king Porus, who opposed Alexander, &c. Curt. 8, c. 5 & 14.—One of Alexander's flatterers.—A man of Cyzicus, killed by Pollux. Flacc. 3, v. 191.

Hægro, a nymph.—A fountain of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Hæmagora, a sister of Aristomenes. Paus.

Hæmæmon and Hæléus, a son of Agamæmon by Briseis or Clytemnestra. When he was driven from home, he came to Italy, and settled on mount Mæssicus in Campania, where he built Falisci, and afterwards assisted Turnus against Æneas. He was killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 724, l. 10, v. 352.—A river near Colophon in Asia Minor. Plin. 5, c. 20.

Hælaia, a village at the foot of mount Taurus.

Hælese, a town of Sicily. Cic. Verr. 2, c. 7, Fam. 13, ep. 32.

Hælestus, a mountain and river near Ætna, where Proserpine was gathering flowers when she was carried away by Pluto. Colum.

Hælia, one of the Nereides. Apollod.—A festival at Rhodes in honour of the sun.

Hæliacmon, a river which separates Thessaly from Macedonia, and falls into the Sinus Thermæicus. Car. Civ. 3, c. 36.—Plin. 31, c. 2.—Herodot. 7, c. 127.

Hæliartus, a town of Boeotia, founded by Hæliartus the son of Thersander. The monuments of Pandion king of Athens, and of Lysander the Lacedæmonian general, were seen in that town. Liv. 42, c. 44 & 63.—Paus. 9, c. 32.—A town of Peloponnesus.

Hælicarnæsus, now Bodrum, a maritime city of Caria, in Asia Minor, where the mausoleum, one of the seven wonders of the world, was erected. It was the residence of the sovereigns of Caria, and was celebrated for having given birth to Herodotus, Dionysius, Heraclitus, &c. *Maxim. Hælois, a town of Argolis.

Hælimede, a Nereid.

Hælirothius, a son of Neptune and Euryte, who ravished Alcippe daughter of Mars, because she slighted his addresses. This violence offended Mars, and he killed the ravisher. Neptune cited Mars to appear before the tribunal of justice to answer for the murder of his son. The cause was tried at Athens, in a place which has been called from thence Areopagus (Agros Mars, and wayos village), and the murderer was acquitted. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 27.

Hælithersus, an old man, who foretold Penelope's suitors the return of Ulysses, and their own destruction. Homer. Od. 1.

Hælius, a son of Alcinoüs, famous for his skill in dancing. Homer. Od. 8, v. 120 & 360.—A Trojan, who came with Æneas into Italy, where he was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

Hæliônes, a people of Paphlagonia. Strab. 14.

Hælmus, a son of Sisyphus, father to Chrysopeus. He reigned in Orchomenos. Paus. 9, c. 23.

Hælmýdæsus, a town of Thrace. Mela, 2, c. 2.

Hælorêtæ, a son of Hercules and Olympusa. Apollod.

Hælône, an island of Propontis, opposite Cyzicus. Plin. 5, c. 31.

Hælonnêsus, an island on the coast of Macedonia, at the bottom of the Sinus Thermæicus. It was inhabited only by women, who had slaughtered all the males, and they defended themselves against an invasion. Mela, 2, c. 7.

Hælotia, a festival in Tegea. Paus.

Hælotus, a eunuch, who used to taste the meat of Claudius. He poisoned the emperor's food by order of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 66.

Hælus, a city of Achaia,—of Thessaly,—of Parthia.

Hælymetus, a man changed into a bird of the same name. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 176.

Hælyattes. Virg. Alyattes.

Hælyous, now Platani, a river at the south of Sicily.

Hælys, now Kizil-ermak, a river of Asia Minor, rising in Cappadocia, and falling into the Euxine sea. It received its name αἰὼ τοῦ ἁλῶτος from salt, because its waters are of a salt and bitter taste, from the nature of the soil over which they flow. It is famous for the defeat of Croesus king of Lydia.

who was mistaken by the ambiguous words of this oracle:

Χρῆστος ἄλυν διαβάσει μεγάλην ἔρχην διαλύσει.

If Cræsus passes over the Halys, he shall destroy a great empire.

That empire was his own. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 56.—Curt. 4, c. 11.—Strab. 12.—Lucan. 3, v. 272.—Herodot. 1, c. 28.—A man of Cynicus, killed by Pollux. Val. Fl. 3, v. 157.

Halysia, a town of Epirus near the Achelous, where the Athenians obtained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians.

Hæmætrides, nymphs who lived in the country, and presided over trees, with which they were said to live and die. The word is derived from ἕμα simul, and ἕρις quercus. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 647.

Hammon, the Jupiter of the Africans. Vid. Ammon.

Hanno. Vid. Anno.

Haroldo, a man famous for his knowledge of poisonous herbs, &c. He touched the most venomous serpents and reptiles without receiving the smallest injury. Sil. 1, v. 406.

Harmatelia, a town of the Braohmanes in India, taken by Alexander. Diod. 17.

Harmatris, a town of Æolia.

Hæmillus, an infamous debauchee. Juv. 10, v. 324.

Harmodius, a friend of Aristogiton, who delivered his country from the tyranny of the Pisistratides, B.C. 510. Vid. Aristogiton. The Athenians, to reward the patriotism of these illustrious citizens, made a law that no one should ever bear the name of Aristogiton and Harmodius. Herodot. 5, c. 35.—Plin. 24, c. 8.—Senec. 1, r. 2.

Harmônica, or Hermionica (Vid. Hermione), a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. It is said that Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made her a present of a vestment dyed in all sorts of crimes, which, in some measure, inspired all the children of Cadmus with wickedness and impiety. Pass. 9, c. 16, &c.

Harmônides, a Trojan beloved by Minerva. He built the ships in which Paris carried away Helen. Hom. Il. 5.

Harpæus, a general of Cyrus. He conquered Asia Minor after he had revolted from Astyages, who had cruelly forced him to eat the flesh of his son, because he had disobeyed his orders in not putting to death the infant Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 108.—Justin. 1, c. 5 & 6.—A river near Colchis. Diod. 14.

Harpælion, a son of Pyliæmenes king of Paphlagonia, who assisted Priam during the Trojan war, and was killed by Merion. Hom. Il. 13, v. 643.

Harpæus, a man entrusted with the treasures of Babylon by Alexander. His hopes that Alexander would perish in his expedition rendered him dissipate, negligent, and vicious. When he heard that the conqueror was returning with great resentment, he fled to Athens, where, with his money, he corrupted the orators, among whom was Demosthenes. When brought to justice, he escaped with impunity to Crete, where he was at last assassinated by Thimbron, B.C. 325. Plut. in Phoc.—Diod. 17.—A robber who scorned the gods. Cic. 3, de Nat. D.—A celebrated astronomer of Greece, 480 years B.C.

Harpælyce, the daughter of Harpalyceus king of Thrace. Her mother died when she was but a child, and her father fed her with the milk of cows and mares, and inured her early to sustain the fatigues of hunting. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus the son of Achilles, she repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened soon after in a sedition, rendered her disconsolate; she fled the society of mankind, and lived in the forests upon plunder and rapine. Every attempt to secure her proved fruitless, till her great swiftness was overcome by intercepting her with a net. After her death the people of the country disputed their respective right to the possessions which she acquired by rapine, and they soon after appeased her manes, by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æm. 1, v. 321.—Hygin. fab. 193 & 252.—A beautiful virgin, daughter of Clymenus and Epicaste of Argos. Her father became enamoured of her, and gained her confidence, and enjoyed her company by means of her nurse, who introduced him as a stranger. Some time after she married Alastor; but the father's passion became more violent and uncontrollable in his daughter's absence, and he murdered her husband to bring her back to Argos. Harpalyce, inconsolable for the death of her husband, and ashamed of her father's passion, which was then made public, resolved to revenge her wrongs. She killed her younger brother, or, according to some, the fruit of her incest, and served it before her father. She begged the gods to remove her from the world, and she was changed into an owl, and Clymenus killed himself. Hygin. fab. 253, &c.—Parthen. in Evol.—A mistress of Iphiclus son of Thestius. She died through despair on seeing herself despised by her lover. This mournful story was composed in poetry, in the form of a dialogue called Harpalyce. Athen. 14.

Harpælyceus, one of the companions of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 675.—The father of Harpalyce, king of part of Thrace.

Harpæssa, a town of Caria.

Harpæssa, a river of Caria. Liv. 38, c. 13.

Harpocrætes, a divinity, supposed to be the same as Orus the son of Isis among the Egyptians. He is represented as holding one of his fingers on his mouth, and from thence he is called the god of silence, and intimates that the mysteries of religion and philosophy ought never to be revealed to the people. The Romans placed his statues at the entrance of their temples. Catal. 75.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 10.

Harpocrator, a Platonic philosopher of Argos, from whom Stobæus compiled his eclogues. —A sophist, called also Ælius.—Valerius a rhetorician of Alexandria, author of a Lexicon on 10 orators.—Another, surnamed Caius.

Harpyles, winged monsters, who had the face of a woman, with the body of a vulture, and had their feet and fingers armed with sharp claws. They were three in number, Aëto, Cycopte, and Celeno, daughters of Neptune and Terra. They were sent by Juno to plunder the tables of Phineus, whence they were driven to the islands called Strophades by Zethus and Calais. They emitted an infectious smell, and spoiled whatever they touched by their filth and excrement. They plundered

Æneas during his voyage towards Italy, and predicted many of the calamities which attended him. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 212. l. 6, v. 289.—Hesiod. Theog. 265.

Harudes, a people of Germany. Cæs. G. 1, c. 31.

Haruspex, a soothsayer at Rome, who drew omens by consulting the entrails of beasts that were sacrificed. He received the name of Aruspex, ab aris aspicieudis, and that of Extispex, ab extis inspicieudis. The order of Aruspices was first established at Rome by Romulus, and the first Haruspices were Tuscans by origin, as they were particularly famous in that branch of divination. They had received all their knowledge from a boy named Tages, who, as was commonly reported, sprung from a clod of earth. Vid. Tages. They were originally three, but the Roman senate yearly sent six noble youths, or, according to others, 12, to Etruria, to be instructed in all the mysteries of the art. The office of the Haruspices consisted in observing these four particulars: the beast before it was sacrificed; its entrails; the flames which consumed the sacrifice; and the flour, frankincense, &c., which was used. If the beast was led up to the altar with difficulty, if it escaped from the conductor's hands, roared when it received the blow, or died in agonies, the omen was unfortunate. But, on the contrary, if it followed without compulsion, received the blow without resistance, and died without groaning, and after much effusion of blood, the Haruspex foretold prosperity. When the body of the victim was opened, each part was scrupulously examined. If anything was wanting, if it had a double liver, or a lean heart, the omen was unfortunate. If the entrails fell from the hands of the Haruspex, or seemed besmeared with too much blood, or if no heart appeared, as for instance it happened in the two victims which J. Cæsar offered a little before his death, the omen was equally unlucky. When the flame was quickly kindled, and when it violently consumed the sacrifice, and arose pure and bright, and like a pyramid, without any paleness, smoke, sparkling, or crackling, the omen was favourable. But the contrary augury was drawn when the fire was kindled with difficulty, and was extinguished before the sacrifice was totally consumed, or when it rolled in circles round the victim with intermediate spaces between the flames. In regard to the frankincense, meal, water, and wine, if there was any deficiency in the quantity, if the colour was different, or the quality was changed, or if anything was done with irregularity, it was deemed inauspicious. This custom of consulting the entrails of victims did not originate in Tuscany, but it was in use among the Chaldeans, Greeks, Egyptians, &c., and the more enlightened part of mankind well knew how to render it subservient to their wishes or tyranny. Agesilaus, when in Egypt, raised the drooping spirits of his soldiers by a superstitious artifice. He secretly wrote in his hand the word Victory, in large characters, and holding the entrails of a victim in his hand till the impression was communicated to the flesh, he showed it to the soldiers, and animated them by observing that the gods signified their approaching victories even by marking it in the body of the sacrificed animals. Cic. de Div.

Hasdrubal. Vid. Asdrubal.

Haterius, a patrician and orator at Rome under the first emperors: He died in the 90th year of his age. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 61.—Agrippa, a senator in the age of Tiberius, hated by the tyrant for his independence. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 4.—Antoninus, a dissipated senator, whose extravagance was supported by Nero. Id. 13, c. 34.

Hautastus, a man who conspired with Bassus against Darius, &c. Curt. 8, c. 5.

Hebdöle. Vid. Ebdome.

Hebe, a daughter of Jupiter and Juno. According to some she was the daughter of Juno only, who conceived her after eating lettuce. As she was fair, and always in the bloom of youth, she was called the goddess of youth, and made by her mother cup-bearer to all the gods. She was dismissed from her office by Jupiter, because she fell down in an indecent posture as she was pouring nectar to the gods at a grand festival, and Gany-medes the favourite of Jupiter succeeded her as cup-bearer. She was employed by her mother to prepare her chariot, and to harness her peacocks whenever requisite. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god he was reconciled to Juno by marrying her daughter Hebe, by whom he had two sons, Alexiars and Anicetus. As Hebe had the power of restoring gods and men to the vigour of youth, she, at the instance of her husband, performed that kind office to Iolas his friend. Hebe was worshipped at Sicily, under the name of Dia, and at Rome under the name of Juventas. She is represented as a young virgin crowned with flowers, and arrayed in a variegated garment. Paus. 1, c. 19. l. 2, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 400. Fast. 9, v. 76.—Apollod. 1, c. 3. l. 2, c. 7.

Hëbëus, a Rutulian, killed in the night by Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 344.

Hebrus, now Mariusa, a river of Thrace, which was supposed to roll its waters upon golden sands. It falls into the Ægean sea. The head of Orpheus was thrown into it, after it had been cut off by the Ciconian women. It received its name from Hebrus son of Cassandra, a king of Thrace, who was said to have drowned himself there. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 7.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 453.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 50.—A youth of Lipara, beloved by Neobule. Horat. 3, od. 12.—A man of Cyzicus, killed by Pollux. Flacc. 3, c. 149.—A friend of Æneas son of Dolichon, killed by Mezentius in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 606.

Heclæ, a poor old woman who kindly received Theseus as he was going against the bull of Marathon, &c. Plut. in Thest.—A town of Attica.

Hecaleia, a festival in honour of Jupiter of Hecale, instituted by Theseus, or in commemoration of the kindness of Hecale, which Theseus had experienced when he went against the bull of Marathon, &c.

Hecamæde, a daughter of Arsinous, who fell to the lot of Nestor after the plunder of Tenedos by the Greeks. Homer. Il. 11, v. 603.

Hecate fanum, a celebrated temple sacred to Hecate at Stratonice in Caria. Strab. 14.

Hecateus, an historian of Miletus, born 549 years before Christ, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. Herodot. 2, c. 143.—A Macedonian intimate with Alexander. Diod. 17.—A Macedonian brought to the army against his will by Amyntas, &c. Curt. 7, c. 1.

Hecate, a daughter of Perses and Asteria, the same as Proserpine or Diana. She was called Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell, whence her name of Diva triformis, tergemina, triplex. She was supposed to preside over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented like a woman with three heads, that of a horse, a dog, or a boar; and sometimes she appeared with three different bodies, and three different faces only with one neck. Dogs, lambs, and honey were generally offered to her, especially in highways and cross-roads, whence she obtained the name of Trivina. Her power was extended over heaven, the earth, sea, and hell; and to her kings and nations supposed themselves indebted for their prosperity. Ovid. 7. Met. v. 94.—Hesiod. Theog.—Horn. 3. od. 23.—Paus. 2. c. 29.—Virg. Æn. 4. v. 511.

Hecateïsia, a yearly festival observed by the Stratoniceans in honour of Hecate. The Athenians paid also particular worship to this goddess, who was deemed the patroness of families and of children. From this circumstance, the statues of the goddess were erected before the doors of the houses, and upon every new moon a public supper was always provided at the expense of the richest people, and set in the streets, where the poorest of the citizens were permitted to retire and feast upon it, while they reported that Hecate had devoured it. There were also expiatory offerings to supplicate the goddess to remove whatever evils might impend on the head of the public, &c.

Hecato, a native of Rhodes, pupil to Pansetrus. He wrote on the duties of man, &c. Cic. 3. Off. 15.

Hecatombola, a festival celebrated in honour of Juno by the Argians and people of Ægina. It receives its name from écarov, and βωv, a sacrifice of 100 bulls, which were always offered to the goddess, and the flesh distributed amongst the poorest citizens. There were also public games, first instituted by Archimides, a king of Argos, in which the prize was a shield of brass with a crown of myrtle.

Hecatompheia, a solemn sacrifice offered by the Messenians to Jupiter, when any of them had killed 100 enemies. Paus. 4. c. 19.

Hecatompolis, an epithet applied to Crete, from the 100 cities which it once contained.

Hecatompyles, an epithet applied to Thebes in Egypt on account of its 100 gates. Ammian. 22. c. 16.—Also the capital of Parthia, in the reign of the Arsacidae. Plut. 6. c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Plin. 6. c. 15 & 25.

Hecatonnēsi, small islands between Lesbos and Asia. Strab. 13.

Hector, son of king Priam and Hecuba, was the most valiant of all the Trojan chiefs that fought against the Greeks. He married Andromache the daughter of Etion, by whom he had Astyanax. He was appointed captain of all the Trojan forces, when Troy was besieged by the Greeks; and the valour with which he behaved, showed how well qualified he was to discharge that important office. He engaged with the bravest of the Greeks, and according to Hyginus, no less than 31 of the most valiant of the enemy perished by his hand. When Achilles had driven back the Trojans towards the city, Hector, too great to fly, waited the approach of his enemy near the Scœan gates, though his father and mother, with tears in their eyes, blamed his rashness, and entreated him to retire. The sight of Achilles terrified him, and he fled before him in the plain. The Greek pursued, and Hector was killed, and his body was dragged in cruel triumph by the conqueror round the tomb of Patroclus, whom Hector had killed. The body, after it had received the grossest of insults, was ransomed by old Priam, and the Trojans obtained from the Greeks a truce of some days to pay the last offices to the greatest of their leaders. The Thetans boasted in the age of the geographer Pausanias, that they had the ashes of Hector preserved in an urn, by order of an oracle; which promised them undisturbed felicity if they were in possession of that hero's remains. The epithet of Hectorius is applied by the poets to the Trojans, as best expressive of valour and intrepidity. Homer. Il. 1. 80.—Virg. Æn. 1. 80.—Ovid. Met. 12 & 13.—Dionys. Crat.—Dares Phryg.—Hygin. fab. 90 & 112.—Paus. 1. 3 & 9. c. 18.—Quintill. Smyrn. 1 & 3.—A son of Farosio drowned in the Nile. Alexander honoured his remains with a magnificent funeral. Cæsar. 4. t. 8. l. 6. c. 9.

Hecuba, daughter of Dymas, a Phrygian prince, or, according to others, of Cisseus, a Thracian king, was the second wife of Priam king of Troy, and proved the chastest of women, and the most tender and unfortunate of mothers. When she was pregnant of Paris, she dreamed that she had brought into the world a burning torch which had reduced her husband's palace and all Troy to ashes. So alarming a dream was explained by the soothsayers, who declared that the son she should bring into the world would prove the ruin of his country. When Paris was born she exposed him on mount Ida to avert the calamities which threatened her family; but her attempts to destroy him were fruitless, and the prediction of the soothsayers was fulfilled. Vid. Paris. During the Trojan war she saw the greatest part of her children perish by the hands of the enemy, and like a mother she confessed her grief by her tears and lamentations, particularly at the death of Hector her eldest son. When Troy was taken, Hecuba, as one of the captives, fell to the lot of Ulysses, a man whom she hated for his perfidy and avarice, and she embarked with the conquerors for Greece. The Greeks landed in the Thracian Chersonesus, to load with fresh honours the grave of Achilles. During their stay the hero's ghost appeared to them, and demanded, to ensure the safety of their return, the sacrifice of Polyxena, Hecuba's daughter. They complied, and Polyxena was torn from her mother to be sacrificed. Hecuba was inconsolable, and her grief was still more increased at the sight of the body of her son Polydorus washed on the shore, who had been recommended by his father to the care and humanity of Polymnestor king of the country. Vid. Polydorus. She determined to revenge the death of her son, and with the greatest indignation went to the house of his murderer and tore his eyes, and attempted to deprive him of his life. She was hindered from executing her bloody purpose by the arrival of some Thracians, and she fled with the female companions of her captivity. She was pursued, and when she ran after the stones that were thrown at her, she found herself suddenly changed into a bitch, and when she attempted to speak, found that she could only bark. After this metamorphosis she threw herself into the sea, according to Hyginus, and that place was, from that circumstance, called Cynæm. Hecuba had a great number of children by Priam, among whom were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Pammon, Helenus, Polytes, Antiphon, Hippocoon, Polydorus, Troilus, and among the daughters, Creusa, Ilione, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Ovid. Met. 12. v. 761. l. 13. v. 512.—Hygin. fab. 111.—Virg. Æn. 3. v. 44.—Juv. 10. v. 271.—Strab. 13.—Dionys. Crat. 4 & 5.—Apollod. 3. c. 12.

Hecubæ Sepulchrum, a promontory of Thrace.

Hedusa, a poetess of Sæson.

Hedonæum, a village of Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 31.

Hedui. Vid. Adni.

Hedymæia, an admired musician in Domitian's age. The word signifies raised music. Juv. 6, v. 382.

Hegalochus, a general of 6000 Athenians sent to Mantinea to stop the progress of Epaminondas. Diad. 15.—An Egyptian general who flourished B.C. 328.

Hegemon, a Thasian poet in the age of Alcibiades. He wrote a poem called Gigantomachia, besides other works. Æliam. V. H. 4, c. 22.—Another poet, who wrote a poem on the battle of Leucæ, &c. Æliam. V. H. 8, c. 11.

Hegesthæus, an historian of Alexandria, who wrote an account of the Trojan war.

Hegesias, a tyrant of Ephesus under the patronage of Alexander. Polyem. 6.—A philosopher who so eloquently convinced his auditors of their failings and follies, and persuaded them that there were no dangers after death, that many were guilty of suicide. Ptolemy forbade him to continue his doctrines. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 34.—An historian.

—A famous orator of Magnesia, who corrupted the elegant diction of Attica by the introduction of Asiatic idioms. Cic. Orat. 67, 69. Brut. 83.—Strab. 9.—Plut. in Alex.

Hegesibolus, one of the chief magistrates of Rhodes in the reign of Alexander and his father Philip.—Another native of Rhodes, 171 years before the christian era. He engaged his countrymen to prepare a fleet of 40 ships to assist the Romans against Perseus king of Macedonia.

Hegesinus, a man who wrote a poem on Attica. Paus. 7, c. 99.

Hegesinus, a philosopher of Pergamus, of the second academy. He flourished B.C. 199.

Hegesippus, an historian who wrote some things upon Palestine, &c.

Hegesipyle, a daughter of Olorus king of Thrace, who married Miltiades and became mother of Cimon. Plut.

Hegesistratus, an Ephesian who consulted the oracle to know in what particular place he should fix his residence. He was directed to settle where he found peasants dancing with crowns of olives. This was in Asia, where he founded Elee, &c.

Hegetorides, a Thasian, who, upon seeing his country besieged by the Athenians, and a law forbidding any one on pain of death to speak of peace, went to the market-place with a rope about his neck, and boldly told his countrymen to treat him as they pleased, provided they saved the city from the calamities which the continuation of the war seemed to threaten. The Thasians were awakened, the law was abrogated, and Hegetorides pardoned, &c. Polyem.

Helena, the most beautiful woman of her age, sprung from one of the eggs which Leda the wife of king Tyndarus brought forth after her amour with Jupiter metamorphosed into a swan. Vid. Leda. According to some authors, Helen was daughter of Nemesis by Jupiter, and Leda was only her nurse; and to reconcile this variety of opinions, some imagine that Nemesis and Leda are the same persons. Her beauty was so universally admired, even in her infancy, that Theseus, with his friend Pirithous, carried her away before she had attained her 10th year, and concealed her at Aphidna, under the care of his mother Æthra. Her brothers Castor and Pollux recovered her by force of arms, and she returned safe and unpolished to Sparta, her native country. There existed, however, a tradition recorded by Pausanias, that Helen was of noble years when carried away by Theseus, and that she had a daughter by her ravisher, who was entrusted to the care of Clytemnestra. This violence offered to her virtue did not in the least diminish, but it rather augmented, her fame, and her hand was eagerly solicited by the young princes of Greece. The most celebrated of her suitors were Ulysses son of Laertes, Antilochus son of Nestor, Stenelus son of Capaneus, Diomedes son of Tydeus, Amphiloehus son of Cœneus, Megeus son of Phileus, Agapenor son of Ancus, Thalypius son of Enrytus, Mnestheus son of Pæseus, Schedius son of Epistrophus, Polyxenes son of Agasthenes, Amphiloehus son of Amphiaræus, Ascalaphus and Ialmus sons of the god Mars, Ajax son of Oileus, Eumelus son of Admetus, Polyperetes son of Pirithous, Elpheus son of Chalcodon, Podalirius and Machaon sons of Æsculapius, Leonteus son of Corœus, Philocretus son of Pezan, Protesilæus son of Iphiclus, Eurypius son of Evemon, Ajax and Teucer sons of Telamon, Patroclus son of Menœteus, Menelaus son of Atreus, Thoas, Idomeneus, and Merion. Tyndarus was rather alarmed than pleased at the sight of such a number of illustrious princes who eagerly solicited each to become his son-in-law. He knew that he could not prefer one without displeasing all the rest, and from this perplexity he was at last drawn by the artifice of Ulysses, who began to be already known in Greece by his prudence and sagacity. This prince, who clearly saw that his pretensions to Helen would not probably meet with success in opposition to so many rivals, proposed to extricate Tyndarus from all his difficulties if he would promise him his niece Penelope in marriage. Tyndarus consented, and Ulysses advised the king to bind, by a solemn oath, all the suitors, that they would approve of the un-influenced choice which Helen should make of one among them; and engage to unite together to defend her person and character, if ever any attempts were made to ravish her from the arms of her husband. The advice of Ulysses was followed, the princes consented, and Helen fixed her choice upon Menelaus and married him. Hermione was the early fruit of this union, which continued for three years with mutual happiness. After this, Paris, son of Priam king of Troy, came to Lacedæmon on pretence of sacrificing to Apollo. He was kindly received by Menelaus, but shamefully abused his favours, and in his absence in Crete he corrupted the fidelity of his wife Helen, and persuaded her to follow him to Troy, B.C. 1198. At his return Menelaus, highly sensible of the injury which he had received, assembled the Grecian princes, and remanded them of their solemn promises. They resolved to make war against the Trojans, but they previously sent ambassadors to Priam to demand the restitution of Helen. The influence of Paris at his father's court prevented the restoration, and the Greeks returned home without receiving the satisfaction they required. Soon after their return their combined forces assembled and sailed for the coast of Asia. The behaviour of Helen during the Trojan war is not clearly known. Some assert that she had willingly followed Paris, and that she warmly supported the cause of the Trojans; while others believe that she always sighed after her husband, and cursed the day in which she had proved faithless to his bed. Homer represents her as in the last instance, and some have added that she often betrayed the schemes and resolutions of the Trojans, and secretly favoured the cause of Greece. When Paris was killed in the ninth year of the war, she voluntarily married Deiphobus, one of Priam's sons, and when Troy was taken she made no scruple to betray him, and to introduce the Greeks into his chamber, to ingratiate herself with Menelaus. She returned to Sparta, and the love of Menelaus forgave the errors which she had committed. Some, however, say that she obtained her life even with difficulty from her husband, whose resentment she had kindled by her infidelity. After she had lived for some years in Sparta, Menelaus died, and she was driven from Peloponnesus by Megapenthes and Nicostratus, the illegitimate sons of her husband, and she retired to Rhodes, where at that time Polyxo, a native of Argos, reigned over the country. Polyxo remembered that her widowhood originated in Helen, and that her husband Tlepolemus had been killed in the Trojan war, which had been caused by the debaucheries of Helen, therefore she meditated revenge. While Helen retired one day to bathe in the river, Polyxo disguised her attendants in the habits of furies, and sent them with orders to murder her enemy. Helen was tied to a tree and strangled, and her misfortunes were afterwards remembered, and the crimes of Polyxo expiated by the temple which the Rhodians raised to Helen Dendritis, or Helen to a tree. There is a tradition mentioned by Herodotus, which says that Paris was driven, as he returned from Sparta, upon the coast of Egypt, where Proteus king of the country expelled him from his dominions for his ingratitude to Menelaus, and confined Helen. From that circumstance, therefore, Priam informed the Grecian ambassadors that neither Helen nor her possessions were in Troy, but in the hands of the king of Egypt. In spite of this assertion the Greeks besieged the town and took it after 10 years' siege, and Menelaus by visiting Egypt, as he returned home, recovered Helen at the court of Proteus, and was convinced that the Trojan war had been undertaken on very unjust and unpardonable grounds. Helen was honoured after death as a goddess, and the Spartans built her a temple at Therapne, which had the power of giving beauty to all the deformed women that entered it. Helen, according to some, was carried into the island of Leuce after death, where she married Achilles, who had been one of her warmest admirers. The age of Helen has been a matter of deep inquiry among the chronologists. If she was born of the same eggs as Castor and Pollux, she accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition against Colchis about 35 years before the Trojan war, according to some, she was no less than 60 years old when Troy was reduced to ashes, supposing that her brothers were only 15 when they embarked with the Argonauts. But she is represented by Homer so incomparably beautiful during the siege of Troy, that though seen at a distance she influenced the counsellors of Priam by the brightness of her charms; therefore we must suppose, with others, that her beauty remained long undiminished, and was extinguished only at her death. Pent. 3, c. 19, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 20, &c.—*Hygin. HELENIA, a festival in Laconia, in honour of Helen, who received three divine honours. It was celebrated by virgins riding upon mules, and in chariots made of reeds and bulrushes.

HELIOR, a Lydian prince who accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and was killed by the Rutulians. His mother's name was Lycymnia. Virg. Aen. 9, v. 444, &c.

HELIUS, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Priam and Hecuba, greatly respected by all the Trojans. When Deiphobus was given in marriage to Helen in preference to himself, he resolved to leave his country, and he retired to mount Ida, where Ulysses took him prisoner by the advice of Calchas. As he was well acquainted with futurity, the Greeks made use of prayers, threats, and promises, to induce him to reveal the secrets of the Trojans, and either the fear of death or gratification of resentment seduced him to disclose to the enemies of his country, that Troy could not be taken whilst it was in possession of the Palladium, nor before Philoctetes came from his retreat at Lemnos and assisted to support the siege. After the ruin of his country, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, and saved his life by warning him to avoid the dangerous tempest which in reality proved fatal to all those who set sail. This endeared him to Pyrrhus, and he received from his hand Andromache the widow of his brother Hector, by whom he had a son called Cestrinus. This marriage, according to some, was consummated after the death of Pyrrhus, who lived with Andromache as his wife. Helius was the only one of Priam's sons who survived the ruin of his country. After the death of Pyrrhus, he reigned over part of the Epirus, which he called Chaonia, in memory of his brother Chaon, whom he had inadvertently killed. Helius received Aeneas as he voyaged towards Italy, and forestold him some of the calamities which attended his fleet. The manner in which he received the gift of prophecy is doubtful. Vid. Cassandra. Homer. Il. 6, v. 76. l. 7, v. 47.—Virg. Aen. 3, v. 295, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 11. l. 2, c. 37.—*Ovid. HELES, or Hales, a river of Lucania near Vella. Cic. ad Att. 10, ep. 7. Fam. 7, ep. 20.

HELIODES, the daughters of the sun and Clymene. They were three in number, Lampete, Phaetusa, and Lampethusa, or seven, according to Hyginus: Merope, Helie, Egla, Lampete, Phoebe, Aetheria, and Dioxippe. They were so afflicted at the death of their brother Phaeton (Vid. Phaeton), that they were changed by the gods into poplars, and their tears into precious amber, on the banks of the river Po. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 340.—Hygin. Fab. 154.—The first inhabitants of Rhodes. This island being covered with mud when the world was first created, was warmed by the cherishing beams of the sun, and from thence sprang seven men, which were called Heliodes, oro vom ἡλιος, from the sun. The eldest of these, called Ochimus, married Hegestor, one of the nymphs of the island, and his brothers fled from the country for having put to death, through jealousy, one of their number. Diad. 5.

Heliastæa, a name given to the judges of the most numerous tribunal at Athens. They consisted of 1000, and sometimes of 1500 they were seldom assembled, and only upon matters of the greatest importance. Demosth. contr. Tim.—Diog. in Sol.

Helicæon, a Trojan prince, son of Antenor. He married Laodice the daughter of Priam, whose form Iris assumed to inform Helen of the state of the rival armies before Troy. Helicæon was wounded in a night engagement, but his life was spared by Ulysses, who remembered the hospitality which he had received from his father Antenor. Homer. Il. 2, v. 123.

Heliœe, a star near the north pole, generally called Ursa Major. It is supposed to receive its name from the town of Helicœ, of which Calisto, who was changed into the Great Bear, was an inhabitant. Lucan. 2, v. 237. A town of Achaia, on the bay of Corinth, overwhelmed by the inundation of the sea. *Plin. 2, c. 98.—Ovid. Heliœon, now Zagari-Vouni, a mountain of Bœotia, on the borders of Phocis. It was sacred to the muses, who had there a temple. The fountain Hippocrene flowed from this mountain. Strab. 8.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 219.—Paus. 9, c. 28, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 641.—A river of Macedonia near Dium. Paus. 9, c. 30.

Heliœoniades, a name given to the Muses because they lived upon mount Helicœon, which was sacred to them.

Heliœonis, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.
Heliœodorus, one of the favourites of Seleucus Philopator king of Syria. He attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews, about 176 years before Christ, by order of his master, &c. —A Greek mathematician of Larissa. —A famous sophist, the best editions of whose entertaining romance, called Æthiopia, are by Commelin, 8vo, 1596, and Bourdelot, 8vo, Paris, 1619. —A learned Greek rhetorician in the age of Horace. —A man who wrote a treatise on tombs. —A poet. —A geographer. —A surgeon at Rome in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 372.

Heliogabalus, a deity among the Phœniciana. —M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, son of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogabalus, because he had been priest of that divinity in Phœnicia. After the death of Macrinus he was invested with the imperial purple, and the senate, however unwilling to submit to a youth only 14 years of age, approved of his election, and bestowed upon him the title of Augustus. Heliogabalus made his grandmother Meza and his mother Semias his colleagues on the throne; and to bestow more dignity upon the sex, he chose a senate of women, over which his mother presided, and prescribed all the modes and fashions which prevailed in the empire. Rome, however, soon displayed a scene of cruelty and debauchery; the imperial palace was full of prostitution, and the most infamous of the populace became the favourites of the prince. He raised his horse to the honours of the consulship, and obliged his subjects to pay adoration to the god Heliogabalus, which was no other than a large black stone, whose figure resembled that of a con. To this ridiculous deity temples were raised at Rome, and the altars of the gods plundered to deck those of the new divinity. In the midst of his extravagances Heliogabalus married four wives, and not satisfied with following the plain laws of nature, he professed himself to be a woman, and gave himself up to one of his officers, called Hierocles. In this ridiculous farce he suffered the greatest indignities from his pretended husband without dissatisfaction, and Hierocles, by stooping to infamy, became the most powerful of the favourites, and enriched himself by selling favours and offices to the people. Such licentiousness soon displeased the populace, and Heliogabalus, unable to appease the seditious of his soldiers, whom his rapacity and debaucheries had irritated, hid himself in the fifth and excrements of the camp, where he was found in the arms of his mother. His head was severed from his body the 10th of March, A.D. 217, in the 18th year of his age, after a reign of three years, nine months, and four days. He was succeeded by Alexander Severus. His cruelties were as conspicuous as his licentiousness. He burdened his subjects with the most oppressive taxes; his halls were covered with carpets of gold and silver tissue, and his mats were made with the down of hares, and with the soft feathers which were found under the wings of partridges. He was fond of covering his shoes with precious stones, to draw the admiration of the people as he walked along the streets, and he was the first Roman who ever wore a dress of silk. He often invited the most common of the people to share his banquet, and made them sit down on large bellows full of wind, which, by suddenly emptying themselves, threw the guests on the ground, and left them a prey to wild beasts. He often tied some of his favourites on a large wheel, and was particularly delighted to see them whirled round like Ixions, and sometimes suspended in the air, or sunk beneath the water.

Heliôpolis, now Mataræa, a famous city of Lower Egypt, in which was a temple sacred to the sun. The inhabitants worshipped a bull called Mnevis, with the same ceremonies as the Apis of Memphis. Apollo had an oracle there. *Cic. N. Hellusius, a river of Cos.

Hellanice, a sister of Clitus, who was nurse to Alexander. Curt. 8, c. 2.

Hellanicus, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He wrote a history of the ancient kings of the earth, with an account of the founders of the most famous towns in every kingdom, and died B.C. 421, in the 85th year of his age. *Paus. 2, c. 3.—Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 53.—Aul. Hellanoerates, a man of Larissa, &c. Aristot. Polit. 5, c. 10.

Hellas, an ancient name of Thessaly, more generally applied to the territories of Acarnania, Attica, Ætolia, Doris, Locris, Bœotia, and Phocis, and also to all Greece. It received this name from Deucalion, and now forms a part of Livadia. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 20. —A beautiful woman, mentioned by Horace as beloved by Marius: the lover killed her in a fit of passion, and afterwards destroyed himself. Horat. a. sat. 3, v. 277.

Helle, a daughter of Athamas and Nephele, sister of Phryxus. She fled from her father's house, with her brother, to avoid the cruel oppression of her mother-in-law Ino. According to some accounts she was carried through the air on a golden ram, which her mother had received from Neptune, and in her passage she became giddy, and fell from her seat into that part of the sea which from her received the name of Hellespont. Others say that she was carried on a cloud, or rather upon a ship, from which she fell into the sea and was drowned. Phryxus, after he had given his sister a burial on the neighbouring coasts, pursued his journey and arrived safe in Colchus. *Vid. Phryxus. Ovid. Heroid. 13, 8cc. Met. 4, fab. 14.—Pindar. 4, Pyth. Hellen, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned in Phthiotis about 1495 years before the Christian era, and gave the name of Hellenians to his subjects. He had by his wife Orseis three sons, Aeolus, Dorus, and Xuthus, who gave their names to the three different nations known under the name of Aeolians, Dorians, and Ionians. These last derive their name from Ion son of Xuthus, and from the difference either of expression or pronunciation in their respective languages, arose the different dialects well known in the Greek language. Pass. 3, c. 20, l. 7, c. 1.—Diod. 5.

Hellènes, the inhabitants of Greece. Vid. Hellen.

Hellespontus, now the Dardanelles, a narrow strait between Asia and Europe, near the Propontis, which received its name from Helle, who was drowned there in her voyage to Colchis. Vid. Helle. It is about 60 miles long, and in the broadest parts, the Asiatic coast is about three miles distant from the European, and only half a mile in the narrowest, according to modern investigation; so that people can converse one with the other from the opposite shores. It was celebrated for the love and death of Leander [Vid. Hero], and for the bridge of boats which Xerxes built over it when he invaded Greece. The folly of this great prince is well known in beating and fettering the waves of the sea, whose impetuosity destroyed his ships, and rendered all his labours ineffectual. *Strab. 13.—Plin. 8, c. 32.—Herodot. 7, c. 24.—Polyb.—Mela, 1, c. 1.—Ptole. 5, c. 2.—Ovid. Hellopia, a small country of Euboea. The people were called Hellopiæ. The whole island bore the same name, according to Strabo, 10.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Hellotis, two festivals, one of which was observed in Crete, in honour of Europa, whose bones were then carried in solemn procession, with a myrtle garland no less than 20 cubits in circumference, called ἡλαῶρα. The other festival was celebrated at Corinth with games and races, where young men entered the lists and generally ran with burning torches in their hands. It was instituted in honour of Minerva, surnamed Hellotis, ἑὸ τοῦ ἑλλοῦ, from a certain pond of Marathon, where one of her statues was erected, or ἑὸ τοῦ ἑλλοῦ τοῦ ἑλλοῦ, because by her assistance Belierophon took and managed the horse Pegasus, which was the original cause of the institution of the festival. Others derive the name from Hellotis, a Corinthian woman, from the following circumstance: When the Dorians and the Heraclidae invaded Peloponnesus, they took and burnt Corinth; the inhabitants, and particularly the women, escaped by flight, except Hellotis and her sister Eurytion, who took shelter in Minerva's temple, relying for safety upon the sanctity of the place. When this was known, the Dorians set fire to the temple, and the two sisters perished in the flames. This wanton cruelty was followed by a dreadful plague; and the Dorians, to alleviate the misfortunes which they suffered, were directed by the oracle to appease the manes of the two sisters, and therefore they raised a new temple to the goddess Minerva, and established the festivals which bore the name of one of the unfortunate women.

Heloris, a general of the people of Rhegium, sent to besiege Messana, which Dionysius the tyrant defended. He fell in battle, and his troops were defeated. Diod. 14.

Holorum and Holorus, now Muri Ucci, a town and river of Sicily, whose swollen waters generally inundate the neighbouring country. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 608.—Ital. 11, v. 270.—A river of Magna Græcia.

Helos, a place of Arcadia. *Pass. 8, c. 36.—*A town of Laconia, taken and destroyed by the Lacedæmonians under Agis III., of the race of the Heraclidae, because they refused to pay the tribute which was imposed upon them. The Lacedæmonians carried their resentment so far, that, not satisfied with the ruin of the city, they reduced the inhabitants to the lowest and most miserable slavery, and made a law which forbade their masters either to give them their liberty, or to sell them in any other country. To complete their infamy, all the slaves of the state and the prisoners of war were called by the mean appellation of Helots. Not only the servile offices in which they were employed denoted their misery and slavery, but they were obliged to wear peculiar garments, which exposed them to greater contempt and ridicule. They never were instructed in the liberal arts, and their cruel masters often obliged them to drink to excess, to show the free-born citizens of Sparta the baseness and disgrace of intoxication. They once every year received a number of stripes, that by this wanton flagellation they might recollect that they were born and died slaves. The Spartans even declared war against them; but Plutarch, who, from interested motives, endeavours to palliate the guilt and cruelty of the people of Lacedæmon, declares that it was because they had assisted the Messenians in their war against Sparta, after it had been overthrown by a violent earthquake. This earthquake was supposed by all the Greeks to be a punishment from heaven for the cruelties which the Lacedæmonians had exercised against the Helots. In the Peloponnesian war, these miserable slaves behaved with uncommon bravery, and were rewarded with their liberty by the Lacedæmonians, and appeared in the temples and at public shows crowned with garlands, and with every mark of festivity and triumph. This exultation did not continue long, and the sudden disappearance of these 2000 manumitted slaves was attributed to the inhumanity of the Lacedæmonians. *Thucyd. 4.—Ptole. 3, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—Plin. in Lyc. &c.—Aristot. Hemithæa, a daughter of Cynus and Procles. She was so attached to her brother Teneas, that she refused to abandon him when his father Cynus exposed him on the sea. They were carried by the wind to Tenedos, where Hemithæa long enjoyed tranquility, till Achilles, captivated by her charms, offered her violence. She was rescued from his embrace by her brother Teneas, who was instantly slaughtered by the offended hero. Hemithæa could not have been rescued from the attempts of Achilles, had not the earth opened and swallowed her, after she had fervently entreated the assistance of the gods. Vid. Teneas. Paus. 10, c. 14.—Diod. 4.

Hephestia, the capital town of Lemnos.—A festival in honour of Vulcanus (Hephesteros) at Athens. There was then a race with torches between three young men. Each in his turn ran a race with a lighted torch in his hand, and whoever could carry it to the end of the course before it was extinguished, obtained the prize. They delivered it one to the other after they finished their course, and from that circumstance we see many allusions in ancient authors who compare the vicissitudes of human affairs to this delivering of the torch, particularly in these lines of Lucretius :

Et quasi cursores vitæ lampada tradunt.*

Hephestiades, a name applied to the Liparides as sacred to Vulcan.

Hephestii, mountains in Lycia which are set on fire by the lightest touch of a burning torch. Their very stones burnt in the middle of water, according to Pliny, 6, c. 106.

Hephestion, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria in the age of the emperor Verus. There remains of his compositions a treatise entitled Enchiridion de metris & poemate, the best edition of which is that of Passo, 4to, Ultras. 1736.

Hephestion, a Macedonian famous for his intimacy with Alexander. He accompanied the conqueror in his Asiatic conquests, and was so faithful and attached to him, that Alexander often observed that Craterus was the friend of the king, but Hephestion the friend of Alexander. He died at Ecotana 325 years before the christian era, according to some from excess of drinking, or eating. Alexander was so inconsolable at the death of this faithful subject, that he shed tears at the intelligence, and ordered the sacred fire to be extinguished, which was never done but at the death of a Persian monarch. The physician who attended Hephestion in his illness was accused of negligence, and by the king's order inhumanly put to death, and the games were interrupted. His body was entrusted to the care of Perdiccas, and honoured with the most magnificent funeral at Babylon. He was so like the king in features and stature, that he was often saluted by the name of Alexander. Curt.—Arrian. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 8.

Hepstaphōnos, a poetico, which received this name, because the voice was re-echoed seven times in it. Plin. 36, c. 15.

Hepstapōlis, a country of Egypt, which contained seven cities.

Hepstapyllos, a surname of Thebes in Boeotia, from its seven gates.

Hera, the name of Juno among the Greeks.—A daughter of Neptune and Ceres when transformed into a mare. Apollod. 3.—A town of Æolia and of Arcadia. Paus. 6, c. 9.—A town of Sicily, called also Hybla. Cic. ad Attic. 2, c. 1.

Heraclæa, an ancient town of Sicily, near Agrigentum. Minos planted a colony there when he pursued Diodorus; and the town, anciently known by the name of Macara, was called from him Minos. It was called Heraclæa after Hercules, when he obtained a victory over Eryx.—A town of Macedonia.—Another in Pontus, celebrated for its naval power and its consequence among the Asiatic states. The inhabitants conveyed home in their ships the 10,000 at their return.—Another in Creta.—Another in Parthia.—Another in Bithynia.—Another in Phthiotis, near Thermopylae, called also Frachina, to distinguish it from others.—Another in Lucania. Cic. Arch. 4.—Another in Syria.—Another in Chersonesus Taurica.—Another in Thrace, and three in Egypt, &c.—There were no less than 40 cities of that name in different parts of the world, all built in honour of Hercules, whence the name is derived.—A daughter of Hiero tyrant of Sicily, &c.

Heraclia, a festival at Athens celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Hercules. The Thians and Thebans in Boeotia observed a festival of the same name, in which they offered apples to the god. This custom of offering apples arose from this: It was always usual to offer sheep, but the overflowing of the river Asopus prevented the votaries of the god from observing it with the ancient ceremony; and as the word μηλα signifies both an apple and a sheep, some youths, acquainted with the ambiguity of the word, offered apples to the god, with much sport and festivity. To represent the sheep, they raised an apple upon four sticks as the legs, and two more were placed at the top to represent the horns of the victim. Hercules was delighted at the ingenuity of the youths, and the festivals were ever continued with the offering of apples. Pollux, 8, c. 9. There was also a festival at Sicyon in honour of Hercules. It continued two days; the first was called εργασίας, the second επαλειών.—At a festival of the same name at Cos, the priest officiated with a mitre on his head, and in woman's apparel.—At Lindus, a solemnity of the same name was also observed, and at the celebration nothing was heard but execrations and profane words, and whosoever accidentally dropped any other words, was accused of having profaned the sacred rites.

Heraclium, a promontory of Cappadocia.—A town of Egypt near Canopus, on the western mouth of the Nile, to which it gave its name. Diod. 1.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 60.—Strab. 2 & 17.—The port town of Gnossus in Crete.

Heracléotes, a surname of Dionysius the philosopher.—A philosopher of Heraclea, who, like his master Zeno, and all the Stoics, firmly believed that pain was not an evil. A severe illness, attended with the most acute pains, obliged him to renounce his principles, and at the same time the philosophy of the Stoics, about 264 years before the christian era. He became afterwards one of the Cyrenaic sect, which placed the summum bonum in pleasure. He wrote some poetry, and chiefly treatises of philosophy. Diog. in Vit.

Heraclides, the descendants of Hercules, greatly celebrated in ancient history. Hercules at his death left to his son Hyllus all the rights and claims which he had upon the Peloponnesus, and permitted him to marry Iole, as soon as he came of age. The posterity of Hercules were not more kindly treated by Eurystheus than their father had been, and they were obliged to retire for protection to the court of Ceyx king of Trachinia. Eurystheus pursued them thither; and Ceyx, afraid of his resentment, begged the Heraclides to depart from his dominions. From Trachinia they came to Athens, where Theseus the king of the country, who had accompanied their father in some of his expeditions, received them with great humanity, and assisted them against their common enemy Eurystheus. Eurystheus was killed by the hand of Hyllus himself, and his children perished with him, and all the cities of the Peloponnesus became the undisputed property of the Heraclides. Their triumph, however, was short; their numbers were lessened by a pestilence, and the oracle informed them that they had taken possession of the Peloponnesus, before the gods permitted their return. Upon this they abandoned Peloponnesus, and came to settle in the territories of the Athenians, where Hyllus, obedient to his father's commands, married Iole the daughter of Eurystus. Soon after he consulted the oracle, anxious to recover the Peloponnesus, and the ambiguity of the answer determined him to make a second attempt. He challenged to single combat Atreus the successor of Eurystheus on the throne of Mycenæ, and it was mutually agreed that the undisputed possession of the Peloponnesus should be ceded to whosoever defeated his adversary. Echemus accepted the challenge for Atreus, and Hyllus was killed, and the Heraclides a second time departed from Peloponnesus. Cleodæus the son of Hyllus made a third attempt, and was equally unsuccessful, and his son Aristomachus some time after met with the same unfavourable reception, and perished in the field of battle. Aristodimus, Temenus, and Chresphonos, the three sons of Aristomachus, encouraged by the more expressive and less ambiguous word of an oracle, and desirous to revenge the death of their progenitors, assembled a numerous force, and with a fleet invaded all Peloponnesus. Their expedition was attended with success, and after some decisive battles they became masters of all the peninsula, which they divided among themselves two years after. The recovery of the Peloponnesus by the descendants of Hercules forms an interesting epoch in ancient history, which is universally believed to have happened 80 years after the Trojan war, or 1104 years before the christian era. This conquest was totally achieved about 120 years after the first attempt of Hyllus. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 26.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—Plat. 1, c. 2.—Clemens Alex. Strom. 1.—Thucyd. 1, c. 12, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—Aristot. de Rep. 7, c. 26.

Heraclides, a philosopher of Heraclea in Pontus, for some time disciple of Senuippus and Aristotle. He wished it to be believed that he was carried into heaven the very day of his death, and the more firmly to render it credible, he begged one of his friends to put a serpent in his bed. The serpent disappointed him, and the noise which the number of visitors occasioned, frightened him from the bed before the philosopher had expired. He lived about 335 years before the christian era. Cic. Tusc. 5, ad Quint. 3.—Diog. in Pyth.—An historian of Pontus surnamed Lembus, who flourished B.C. 177.—A man who, after the retreat of Dionysius the younger from Sicily, raised cabals against Dion, in whose hands the sovereign power was lodged. He was put to death by Dion's order. C. Neg. in Dion.—A youth of Syracuse, in the battle in which Nicias was defeated.—A son of Agathocles.—A man placed over a garrison at Athens by Demetrius.—A sophist of Lycia, who opened a school at Smyrna in the age of the emperor Severus.—A painter of Macedonia in the reign of king Perseus.—An architect of Tarentum, intimate with Philip king of Macedonia. He fled to Rhodes on pretence of a quarrel with Philip, and set fire to the Rhodian fleet. Polysem.—A man of Alexandria.

Heraclitus, a celebrated Greek philosopher of Ephesus, who flourished about 500 years before the christian era. His father's name was Hyson, or Heracion. Naturally of a melancholy disposition, he passed his time in a solitary and unsocial manner, and received the appellation of the obscure philosopher, and the mourner, from his unconquerable custom of weeping at the follies, frailty, and vicissitudes of human affairs. He employed his time in writing different treatises, and one particularly, in which he supported that there was a fatal necessity, and that the world was created from fire, which he deemed a god omnipotent and omniscient. His opinions about the origin of things were adopted by the Stoics, and Hippocrates entertained the same notions of a supreme power. Heraclitus deserves the appellation of man-hater, for the rusticity with which he answered the polite invitations of Darius king of Persia. To remove himself totally from the society of mankind, he retired to the mountains, where for some time he fed on grass in common with the wild inhabitants of the place. Such a diet was soon productive of a dropsical complaint, and the philosopher condescended to revisit the town. The enigmatical manner in which he consulted the physicians made his applications unintelligible, and he was left to depend for cure only upon himself. He fixed his residence on a dunghill, in hopes that the continual warmth which proceeded from it might dissipate the watery accumulation and restore him to the enjoyment of his former health. Such a remedy proved ineffectual, and the philosopher, despairing of a cure by the application of ox-dung, suffered himself to die in the 60th year of his age. Some say that he was torn to pieces by dogs. Diog. in Vita.—Clem. Alex. Str. 5.—A lyric poet.—A writer of Halicarnassus, intimate with Callimachus. He was remarkable for the elegance of his style.

—A native of Lesbos, who wrote a history of Macedonia.—A writer of Sicily, &c. Plut.

Heraclitus, a river of Greece. Paus. 10, c. 37.
—A brother of Constantine, &c.—A Roman emperor, &c.

Heraea, a town of Arcadia.—Festivals at Argos in honour of Juno, who was the patroness of that city. They were also observed by the colonies of the Argives which had been planted at Samos and Ægina. There were always two processions to the temple of the goddess without the city walls. The first was of the men in armour, the second of the women, among whom the priestess, a woman of the first quality, was drawn in a chariot by white oxen. The Argives always reckoned their years from her priesthood, as the Athenians from their archons, and the Romans from their consuls. When they came to the temple of the goddess they offered a hecatomb of oxen. Hence the sacrifice is often called καταρμύθια, and sometimes λεχέρια, from λεχέρ, a heifer, because Juno presided over marriages, births, &c. There was a festival of the same name in Elis, celebrated every fifth year, in which 16 matrons wove a garment for the goddess.—There were also others instituted by Hippodamia, who had received assistance from Juno when she married Pelops. Sixteen matrons, each attended by a maid, presided at the celebration. The contenders were young virgins, who being divided in classes, according to their age, ran races each in their order, beginning with the youngest. The habit of all was exactly the same; their hair was dishevelled, and their right shoulder bare to the breast, with coats reaching no lower than the knee. She who obtained the victory was rewarded with crowns of olives, and obtained a part of the ox that was offered in sacrifice, and was permitted to dedicate her picture to the goddess.—There was also a solemn day of mourning at Corinth which bore the same name, in commemoration of Medea's children, who were buried in Juno's temple. They had been slain by the Corinthians; who, as it is reported, to avert the scandal which accompanied so barbarous a murder, presented Euripides with a large sum of money to write a play, in which Medea is represented as the murderer of her children.—Another festival of the same name at Pallene, with games in which the victor was rewarded with a garment.

Heraeum, a temple and grove of Juno, situate between Argos and Mycenæ.—A town of Thrace.

Herbasus, a town of Sicily at the north of Ariguntum, built by a Phœnician or Carthaginian colony. Sil. 14, v. 205.

Herbita, an inland town of Sicily. Cic. Verr. 2, c. 64, l. 3, c. 32.

Herculeus, an epithet given to Jupiter. Ovid. Ib. 286.—Lucan. 9, v. 979.

Herculeana via, a mound raised between the Lucrine lake and the sea, called also Herculeum iter. Sil. 12, v. 118.

Herculaneum, a town of Campania, swallowed up, with Pompeii, by an earthquake, produced from an eruption of mount Vesuvius, August 24th, A.D. 79, in the reign of Titus. After being buried under the lava for more than 1600 years, these famous cities were discovered in the beginning of the 18th century; Herculaneum in 1733, about 24 feet underground, by labourers digging for a well, and Pompeii 40 years after, about 12 feet below the surface, and from the houses and the streets, which in a great measure remain still perfect, have been drawn busts, statues, manuscripts, paintings, and utensils, which do not a little contribute to enlarge our notions concerning the ancients, and develop many classical obscurities. The valuable antiquities, so miraculously recovered, are preserved in the museum of Portici, a small town in the neighbourhood, and the engravings, &c., ably taken from them have been magnificently presented to the different learned bodies of Europe. Seneca, Nat. Q. 6, c. 1 & 26.—Cic. Att. 7, ep. 3.—Mela, c. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 16.

Hercules, a celebrated hero, who, after death, was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours. According to the ancients there were many persons of the same name. Diodorus mentions three, Cicero six, and some authors extend the number to no less than 43. Of all these the son of Jupiter and Alcmena, generally called the Theban, is the most celebrated, and to him, as may easily be imagined, the actions of the others have been attributed. The birth of Hercules was attended with many miraculous and supernatural events; and it is reported that Jupiter, who introduced himself to the bed of Alcmena, was employed for three nights in forming a child whom he intended to be the greatest hero the world ever beheld. Vid. Alcmena. Hercules was brought up at Thyrtus, or, according to Diodorus, at Thebes, and before he had completed his eighth month, the jealousy of Juno, intent upon his destruction, sent two snakes to devour him. The child, not terrified at the sight of the serpents, boldly seized them in both his hands and squeezed them to death, while his brother Iphidius alarmed the house with his frightful shrieks. Vid. Iphidius. He was early instructed in the liberal arts, and Castor the son of Tyndarus taught him how to fight, Eurytus how to shoot with a bow and arrows, Autolycus to drive a chariot, Linus to play on the lyre, and Eumolpus to sing. He, like the rest of his illustrious contemporaries, soon after became the pupil of the centaur Chiron, and under him he perfected and rendered himself the most valiant and accomplished of the age. In the 18th year of his age he resolved to deliver the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron from a huge lion which preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon his supposed father, and which laid waste the adjacent country. He went to the court of Thespius king of Thespiæ, who shared the general calamity, and he received there a tender treatment, and was entertained during 50 days. The 50 daughters of the king became all mothers by Hercules, during his stay at Thespiæ, and some say that it was effected in one night. After he had destroyed the lion of mount Cithæron, he delivered his country from the annual tribute of 100 oxen which it paid to Erginus. Vid. Erginus. Such public services became universally known, and Creon, who then sat on the throne of Thebes, rewarded the patriotic deeds of Hercules by giving him his daughter in marriage, and entrusting him with the government of his kingdom. As Hercules by the will of Jupiter was subject to the power of Eurystheus (Vid. Eurystheus), and obliged to obey him in every respect, Eurystheus, acquainted with his successes and rising power, ordered him to appear at Mycenæ and perform the labours which by priority of birth he was empowered to impose upon him. Hercules refused, and Juno, to punish his disobedience, rendered him so delirious that he killed his own children by Megara, exposing them to be the offspring of Eurystheus. Vid. Megara. When he recovered the use of his senses, he was so struck with the misfortunes which had proceeded from his insanity, that he concealed himself and retired from the society of men for some time. He afterwards consulted the oracle of Apollo, and was told that he must be subservient for 12 years to the will of Eurystheus, in compliance with the commands of Jupiter; and that after he had achieved the most celebrated labours, he should be reckoned in the number of the gods. So plain and expressive an answer determined him to go to Mycenæ, and to bear with fortitude whatever gods or men imposed upon him. Eurystheus, seeing so great a man totally subjected to him, and apprehensive of so powerful an enemy, commanded him to achieve a number of enterprises the most difficult and arduous ever known, generally called the 12 labours of Hercules. The favours of the gods had completely armed him when he undertook his labours. He had received a coat of arms and helmet from Minerva, a sword from Mercury, a horse from Neptune, a shield from Jupiter, a bow and arrows from Apollo, and from Vulcan a golden cuirass and brazen buskins, with a celebrated club of brass according to the opinion of some writers, but more generally supposed to be of wood, and cut by the hero himself in the forest of Nemea. The first labour imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus, was to kill the lion of Nemea, which ravaged the country near Mycenæ. The hero, unable to destroy him with his arrows, boldly attacked him with his club, pursued him to his den, and after a close and sharp engagement he choked him to death. He carried the dead beast on his shoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after clothed himself with the skin. Eurystheus was so astonished at the sight of the beast, and at the courage of Hercules, that he ordered him never to enter the gates of the city when he returned from his expeditions, but to wait for his orders without the walls. He even made himself a brazen vessel, into which he retired whenever Hercules returned. The second labour of Hercules was to destroy the Lernean hydra, which had seven heads according to Apollodorus, so according to Simonides, ten according to Diodorus. This celebrated monster he attacked with his arrows, and soon after he came to a close engagement, and by means of his heavy club he destroyed the heads of his enemy. But this was productive of no advantage, for as soon as one head was beaten to pieces by the club, immediately two sprang up, and the labour of Hercules would have remained unfinished had he not commanded his friend Iolaus to burn, with a hot iron, the root of the head which he had crushed to pieces. This succeeded (Vid. Hydra), and Hercules became victorious, opened the belly of the monster, and dipped his arrows in the gall to render the wounds which he gave fatal and incurable. He was ordered in his third labour to bring alive and unhurt into the presence of Eurystheus a stag, famous for its incredible swiftness, its golden horns, and brazen feet. This celebrated animal frequented the neighbourhood of Cæne, and Hercules was employed for a whole year in continually pursuing it, and at last he caught it in a trap, or when tired, or according to others, by slightly wounding it and lessening its swiftness. As he returned victorious, Diana snatched the goat from him, and severely reprimanded him for molesting an animal which was sacred to her. Hercules pleaded necessity, and by representing the commands of Eurystheus, he appeased the goddess and obtained the beast. The fourth labour was to bring alive to Eurystheus a wild boar which ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he destroyed the centaurs (Vid. Centaur), and caught the boar by closely pursuing him through the deep snow. Eurystheus was so frightened at the sight of the boar, that, according to Diodorus, he hid himself in his brazen vessel for some days. In his fifth labour Hercules was ordered to clean the stables of Augias, where 3000 oxen had been confined for many years. Vid. Augias. For his sixth labour he was ordered to kill the carnivorous birds which ravaged the country near the lake Strymonia in Arcadia. Vid. Strymonia. In his seventh labour he brought alive into Peloponnesus a prodigious wild bull which laid waste the island of Crete. In his eighth labour he was employed in obtaining the mares of Diomedes, which fed upon human flesh. He killed Diomedes, and gave him to be eaten by his mares, which he brought to Eurystheus. They were sent to mount Olympus by the king of Mycenæ, where they were devoured by the wild beasts; or, according to others, they were consecrated to Jupiter, and their breed still existed in the age of Alexander the Great. For his ninth labour, he was commanded to obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. Vid. Hippolyte. In his tenth labour he killed the monster Geryon king of Gades, and brought to Argos his numerous flocks, which fed upon human flesh. Vid. Geryon. The eleventh labour was to obtain apples from the garden of the Hesperides. Vid. Hesperides. The twelfth and last, and most dangerous of his labours, was to bring upon earth the three-headed dog Cerberus. This was cheerfully undertaken by Hercules, and he descended into hell by a cave on mount Tæmarus. He was permitted by Pluto to carry away his friends Theseus and Pirithous, who were condemned to punishment in hell: and Cerberus also was granted to his prayers, provided he made use of no arms, but only force, to drag him away. Hercules, as some report, carried him back to hell, after he had brought him before Eurystheus. Besides these arduous labours, which the jealousy of Eurystheus imposed upon him, he also achieved others of his own accord, equally great and celebrated. Vid. Cacus, Antæus, Busiris, Eryx, &c. He accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis before he delivered himself up to the king of Mycenæ. He assisted the gods in their war against the giants, and it was through him alone that Jupiter obtained a victory. Vid. Gigantes. He conquered Lamedon, and pillaged Troy. Vid. Lamedon. When Iole, the daughter of Eurystus king of Cæchia, of whom he was deeply enamoured, was refused to his entreaties, he became the prey of a second fit of insanity, he murdered Iphitus, the only one of the sons of Eurystus who favoured his addresses to Iole. Vid. Iphitus. He was some time after purified of the murder, and his insanity ceased; but the gods persecuted him more, and he was visited by a disorder which obliged him to apply to the oracle of Delphi for relief. The boldness with which the Pythia received him irritated him, and he resolved to plunder Apollo's temple, and carry away the sacred tripod. Apollo opposed him, and a severe conflict was begun, which nothing but the interference of Jupiter with his thunderbolts could have prevented. He was upon this told by the oracle that he must be sold as a slave, and remain three years in the most abject servitude to recover from his disorder. He complied; and Mercury, by order of Jupiter, conducted him to Omphale queen of Lydia, to whom he was sold as a slave. Here he cleared all the country from robbers; and Omphale, who was astonished at the greatness of his exploits, restored him to liberty, and married him. Hercules had Agelaus, and Lamon according to others, by Omphale, from whom Croesus king of Lydia was descended. He became also enamoured of one of Omphale's female servants, by whom he had Alceus. After he had completed the years of his slavery, he returned to Peloponnesus, where he re-established on the throne of Sparta Tyndarus, who had been expelled by Hippocoon. He became one of Dejanira's suitors, and married her, after he had overcome all his rivals. Virg. Achelous. He was obliged to leave Calydon, his father-in-law's kingdom, because he had inadvertently killed a man with a blow of his fist, and it was on account of this expulsion that he was not present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar. From Calydon he retired to the court of Ceyx king of Trachiniae. In his way he was stopped by the swollen streams of the Evenus, where the centaur Nessus attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, under the perfidious pretence of conveying her over the river. Hercules perceived the distress of Dejanira, and killed the centaur, who, as he expired, gave her a tunic, which, as he observed, had the power of recalling a husband from unlawful love. Virg. Dejanira. Ceyx king of Trachiniae received him and his wife with great marks of friendship, and purified him of the murder which he had committed at Calydon. Hercules was still mindful that he had once been refused the hand of Iole, he therefore made war against her father Eurystus, and killed him with three of his sons. Iole fell into the hands of her father's murderer, and found that she was loved by Hercules as much as before. She accompanied him to mount Ceta, where he was going to raise an altar and offer a solemn sacrifice to Jupiter. As he had not then the tunic which he arrayed himself to offer a sacrifice, he sent Lichas to Dejanira in order to provide himself a proper dress. Dejanira, informed of her husband's tender attachment to Iole, sent him a philtre, or more probably the tunic which she had received from Nessus, and Hercules, as soon as he had put it on, fell into a desperate distemper, and found the poison of the Lernaean hydra penetrate through his bones. He attempted to pull off the fatal dress, but it was too late, and in the midst of his pains and tortures he inveighed in the most bitter imprecations against the credulous Dejanira, the cruelty of Eurystheus, and the jealousy and hatred of Juno. As the distemper was incurable, he implored the protection of Jupiter, and gave his bow and arrows to Philoctetes, and erected a large burning pile on the top of mount Ceta. He spread on the pile the skin of the Nemean lion, and laid himself down upon it as on a bed, leaning his head on his club. Philoctetes, or according to others, Pizan or Hyllus, was ordered to set fire to the pile, and the hero saw himself on a sudden surrounded with the flames, without betraying any marks of fear or astonishment. Jupiter saw him from heaven, and told to the surrounding gods that he would raise to the skies the immortal parts of a hero who had cleared the earth from so many monsters and tyrants. The gods applauded Jupiter's resolution; the burning pile was suddenly surrounded with a dark smoke, and after the mortal parts of Hercules were consumed, he was carried up to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horses. Some loud claps of thunder accompanied his elevation, and his friends, unable to find either his bones or ashes, showed their gratitude to his memory by raising an altar where the burning pile had stood. Menestius the son of Actor offered him the sacrifice of a bull, a wild boar, and a goat, and enjoined the people of Opus yearly to observe the same religious ceremonies. His worship soon became as universal as his fame, and Juno, who had once persecuted him with such inveterate fury, forgot her resentment, and gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage. Hercules has received many surnames and epithets, either from the place where his worship was established, or from the labours which he achieved. His temples were numerous and magnificent, and his divinity revered. No dogs or flies ever entered his temple at Rome, and that of Gades, according to Strabo, was always forbidden to women and pigs. The Phoenicians offered quails on his altars, and as it was supposed that he presided over dreams, the sick and infirm were sent to sleep in his temples, that they might receive in their dreams the agreeable presages of their approaching recovery. The white poplar was particularly dedicated to his service. Hercules is generally represented naked, with strong and well-proportioned limbs; he is sometimes covered with the skin of the Nemean lion, and holds a knotted club in his hand, on which he often leans. Sometimes he appears crowned with the leaves of the poplar, and holding the horn of plenty under his arm. At other times he is represented standing with Cupid, who instantly breaks to pieces his arrows and his club, to intimate the passion of love in the hero, who suffered himself to be beaten and ridiculed by Omphale, who dressed herself in his armour while he was sitting to spin with her female servants. The children of Hercules are as numerous as the labours and difficulties which he underwent, and indeed they became so powerful soon after his death, that they alone had the courage to invade all Peloponnesus. Virg. Heraclidae. He was father of Deicoon and Therimachus by Megara, of Ctesippus by Astydamia, of Palemon by Autonoe, of Evers by Partenope, of Glycisonetes, Gynens, and Odites by Dejanira, of Thestalus by Chalciopis, of Thestalus by Epicaste, of Teipolemus by Atreus, of Agathyrus, Gelon, and Scythia by Echidna, &c. Such are the most striking characteristics of the life of Hercules, who is said to have supported for a while the weight of the heavens upon his shoulders (Virg. Atlas), and to have separated by the force of his arm the celebrated mountains which were afterwards called the boundaries of his labours. Virg. Aetna. He is held out by the ancients as a true pattern of virtue and piety, and as his whole life had been employed for the common benefit of mankind, he was deservedly rewarded with immortality. His judicious choice of virtue in preference to pleasure, as described by Xenophon, is well known. Diad. 1 & 4. — *Cic. de Nat. Hercynia, a celebrated forest of Germany, which, according to Caesar, required nine days' journey to cross it; and which on some parts was found without any boundaries, though travelled over for 60 days successively. It contained the modern countries of Switzerland, Basil, Spire, Transylvania, and a great part of Russia. In length of time the trees were rooted up, and when population increased the greatest part of it was made inhabitable. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 24.—Mela.—Liv. 5, c. 24.—Tacit. G. 30.

Herdonius, a man put to death by Tarquin, because he had boldly spoken against him in an assembly, &c.

Herea, a town of Arcadia on an eminence, the bottom of which was watered by the Alpheus. It was built by Hereus the son of Lycaon, and was said to produce a wine possessed of such unusual properties, as to give fecundity to women, and cause madness in men. Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 6.—Plin. 14, c. 18.—Paus. 8, c. 24.—Ptol. 3, c. 16.

Herennius Senecio, a Roman historian under Domitian. Tacit. Agric. 2, &c.—An officer of Sertorius defeated by Pompey, &c. Plut.—A centurion sent in pursuit of Cicero by Antony. He cut off the orator's head. Plut. in Cic.—Caius, a man to whom Cicero dedicates his book de Rhetorica, a work attributed by some to Cornificius.—A Samnite general, &c.—Philo, a Phœnician who wrote a book on Adrian's reign. He also composed a treatise divided into 12 parts, concerning the choice of books, &c.

Hereus, a son of Lycaon, who founded a city in Arcadia, called Herea. Paus. 8, c. 24.

Herculius, a philosopher of Chalcedon, disciple to Zeno. Dig.

Herilus, a king of Præneste, son of the nymph Feronia. As he had three lives, he was killed three times by Evander. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 563.

Hermachus, a native of Mitylene, successor and disciple of Epicurus. B. C. 267.

Hermæ, statues of Mercury in the city of Athens. Cic. ad Att. 1, ep. 4 & 8.—C. Nep. in Alcib.—Two youths who attended those who consulted the oracle of Trophonius. Paus. 9, c. 39.

Hermæa, a festival in Crete, when the masters waited upon the servants. It was also observed at Athens and Babylon. Paus. 8, c. 14.

Hermæum, a town of Arcadia.—A promontory at the east of Carthage, the most northern point of all Africa, now cape Bon. Liv. 29, c. 27.—Strab. 17.

Hermagoras Rholdes, a famous rhetorician, who came to Rome in the age of Augustus.—A philosopher of Amphipolis.—A famous orator and philosopher.

Hermanthica, a town of the Vaccæi in Spain. Liv. 21, c. 5.—Polyb. 3.

Hermanthuri, a people of Germany, called also Hermunduri.

Hermannii, a people of Germany.

Hermaphroditus, a son of Venus and Mercury, educated on mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of 15 he began to travel to gratify his curiosity. When he came to Caria, he bathed himself in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who presided over it, became enamoured of him and attempted to seduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all entreaties and offers; and Salmacis, endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied by prayers, closely embraced him, and entreated the gods to make them two, but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, now two in one body, still preserved the characteristics of both their sexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 347.—Hygin. fab. 271.

Hermas, an ancient father of the church, in or near the age of the apostles.

Hermathena, a statue which represented Mercury and Minerva in the same body. This statue was generally placed in schools where eloquence and philosophy were taught, because these two deities presided over the arts and sciences.

Hermæus, a tyrant of Mysia who revolted from Artaxerxes Ochus. B. C. 350.—A general of Antiochus, &c.

Hermelas, a native of Methymna who wrote a history of Sicily.

Hermes, the name of Mercury among the Greeks. Vid. Mercurius.—A famous gladiator. Marzial. 5, ep. 25.—An Egyptian philosopher. Vid. Mercurius Trismegistus.

Hermesianax, an elegiac poet of Colophon, son of Agoneus. He was publicly honoured with a statue. Paus. 6, c. 17.—A native of Cyprus, who wrote a history of Phrygia. Plut.

Hermias, a Galatian philosopher in the second century. His irrisio philosophorum gentiliū was printed with Justin Martyr's works, fol. Paris. 1615 & 1636, and with the Oxford edition of Tatian, 8vo, 1790.

Hermīnius, a general of the Hermanni, &c.—A Roman who defended a bridge with Cocles against the army of Porcenna. Liv. 2, c. 10.—A Trojan killed by Catullus in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 622.

Hermiōne, a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. The gods, except Juno, honoured her nuptials with their presence, and she received, as a present, a rich veil and a splendid necklace which had been made by Vulcan. She was changed into a serpent with her husband Cadmus, and placed in the Elysian fields. Vid. Harmonia. Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13.—A daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She was privately promised in marriage to Orestes the son of Agamemnon; but her father, ignorant of this pre-engagement, gave her hand to Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, whose services he had experienced in the Trojan war. Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione, tenderly attached to her cousin Orestes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addresses of Pyrrhus with pleasure, and even reproached Andromache his concubine with stealing his affections from her. Her jealousy for Andromache, according to some, induced her to unite herself to Orestes, and to destroy Pyrrhus. She gave herself to Orestes after this murder, and received the kingdom of Sparta as a dowry. Homer. Od. 4.—Eurip. in Andr. & Orest.—Ovid. Heroid. 8.—Propert. 1.—A town of Argolis, where Ceres had a famous temple. The inhabitants lived by fishing. The descent to hell from their country was considered so short that no money, according to the usual right of burial, was put into the mouth of the dead to be paid to Charon for their passage. The sea on the neighbouring coast was called Hermionicus sinus. Plin. 4, c. 5.—Virg. in Cir. 472.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ptol. 3, c. 16.—Paus. 2, c. 34.

Hermiōniās, a city near the Rhipæan mountains. Orph. in Arg.

Hermiōnicus sinus, a bay on the coast of Argolis near Hermione. Strab. 1 & 8.

Hermippus, a freedman, disciple of Philo, in the reign of Adrian, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He wrote five books upon dreams.—A man who accused Aspasia the mistress of Pericles of impiety and prostitution. He was son of Lysis, and distinguished himself as a poet by 40 theatrical pieces and other compositions, some of which are quoted by Athenæus. Plat.—A peripatetic philosopher of Smyrna, who flourished B.C. 210.

Hermocrātes, a general of Syracuse, against Nicias the Athenian. His lenity towards the Athenian prisoners was looked upon as treacherous. He was banished from Sicily without even a trial, and he was murdered as he attempted to return back to his country, B.C. 408.—Plin. in Nic., &c.—A sophist celebrated for his rising talents. He died in the 28th year of his age, in the reign of the emperor Severus.—The father-in-law of Dionysius tyrant of Sicily.—A Rhodian employed by Antiochus to corrupt the Grecian states, &c.—A sophist, preceptor to Faustianus the murderer of Philip. Diod. 16.

Hermocrōrus, a Sicilian, pupil to Plato.—A philosopher of Ephesus, who is said to have assisted, as interpreter, the Roman decemvirs in the composition of the 10 tables of laws, which had been collected in Greece. Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 36.—Plin. 34, c. 5.—A native of Salamis, contemporary with Philo the Athenian architect. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 14.—A poet who wrote a book called Notitia on the laws of different nations.

Hermocrōnes, an architect of Alabanda in Caria, employed in building the temple of Diana at Magnesia. He wrote a book upon his profession.—A rhetorician in the second century, the best editions of whose rhetorica are that of Sturmæus, 3 vols. 12mo, Argent. 1571, and of Laurentius, Genev. 1614. He died A.D. 161, and it is said that his body was opened, and his heart found hairy and of an extraordinary size. At the age of 25, as is reported, he totally lost his memory.—A lawyer in the age of Diocletian.—A musician. Horat. 1, sat. 3, v. 129.—A sophist of Tarsus, of such brilliant talents, that at the age of 15 he excited the attention and gained the patronage of the emperor M. Antoninus.

Hermolāus, a young Macedonian among the attendants of Alexander. As he was one day hunting with the king he killed a wild boar which was coming towards him. Alexander, who followed close behind him, was so disappointed because the beast had been killed before he could dart at it, that he ordered Hermolāus to be severely whipped. This treatment irritated Hermolāus, and he conspired to take away the king's life, with others who were displeased with the cruel treatment he had received. The plot was discovered by one of the conspirators, and Alexander seized them, and asked what had compelled them to conspire to take his life. Hermolāus answered for the rest, and observed that it was unworthy of Alexander to treat his most faithful and attached friends like slaves, and to shed their blood without the least mercy. Alexander ordered him to be put to death. Curt. 8, c. 6.

Hermopolis, two towns of Egypt, now Ashmunein and Demenhur. Plin. 5, c. 9.

Hermotimus, a famous prophet of Clazomenæ. It is said that his soul separated itself from his body and wandered in every part of the earth to explain futurity, after which it returned again and animated his frame. His wife, who was acquainted with the frequent absence of his soul, took advantage of it and burnt his body, as if totally dead, and deprived the soul of its natural receptacle. Hermotimus received divine honours in a temple at Clazomenæ, into which it was unlawful for women to enter. Plin. 7, c. 51, &c.—Lucian.

Hermunduri, a people of Germany, subdued by Aurelius. They were at the north of the Danube, and were considered by Tacitus as a tribe of the Suevi, but called, together with the Suevi, Hermiones by Pliny, 4, c. 14.—Tacit. Ann. 13, extra.—Vell. 2, c. 106.

Hermus, a river of Asia Minor, whose sands, according to the poets, were covered with gold. It flows near Sardes, and receives the waters of the Pactolus and Hyllus, after which it falls into the Ægean sea. It is now called Kedous or Sarabat. Virg. G. 2, v. 137.—Lucan. 3, v. 210.—Martial. 8, ep. 78.—Sil. 1, v. 159.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

Hernioi, a people of Campania celebrated for their inveterate enmity to the rising power of Rome. Liv. 9, c. 47 & 44.—Sil. 4, v. 226.—Juv. 14, v. 183.—Dionys. Hal. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 684.

Hero, a beautiful priestess of Venus at Sctetus, greatly enamoured of Leander, a youth of Abydos.

These two lovers were so faithful to one another, that Leander in the night escaped from the vigilance of his family, and swam across the Hellespont, while Hero in Sestos directed his course by holding a burning torch on the top of a high tower. After many interviews of mutual affection and tenderness, Leander was drowned in a tempestuous night as he attempted his usual course, and Hero in despair threw herself down from her tower and perished in the sea.—Musæus de Leand. & Hero.—Ovid. Heroid. 17 & 18.—Virg. G. 3, v. 258.

HERODES, surnamed the Great and Ascalonite, followed the interest of Brutus and Cassius, and afterwards that of Antony. He was made king of Judæa by means of Antony, and after the battle of Actium he was continued in his power by his flattery and submission to Augustus. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty, and as he knew that the day of his death would become a day of mirth and festivity, he ordered the most illustrious of his subjects to be confined and murdered the very moment that he expired, that every eye in the kingdom might seem to shed tears at the death of Herod. He died in the 70th year of his age, after a reign of 40 years. Josephus.—Antiqu. a son of Herod the Great, governor of Galilee, &c.—Agrippa, a Jew intimate with the emperor Caligula, &c.—This name was common to many of the Jews. Josephus.—Atticus. Vid. Atticus.

HERODIANUS, a Greek historian, who flourished A.D. 247. He was born at Alexandria, and he was employed among the officers of the Roman emperors. He wrote a Roman history in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius to Maximianus. His style is peculiarly elegant, but it wants precision, and the work too plainly betrays that the author was not a perfect master of geography. He is accused of being too partial to Maximianus, and too severe upon Alexander Severus. His book comprehends the history of 68 or 70 years, and he asserts that he has been an eye-witness of whatever he has written. The best editions of his history are that of Politian, 4to, Douv. 1565, who afterwards published a very valuable Latin translation, and that of Oxford, 8vo, 1708.

HERODIUS, a physician surnamed Gymnastic, who flourished B.C. 443.—A grammarian surnamed Cratæus, B.C. 123.

HERODOTUS, a celebrated historian of Halicarnassus, whose father's name was Lyxes, and that of his mother Dryo. He fled to Samos when his country laboured under the oppressive tyranny of Lygdamis, and travelled over Egypt, Italy, and all Greece. He afterwards returned to Halicarnassus, and expelled the tyrant; which patriotic deed, far from gaining the esteem and admiration of the populace, displeased and irritated them, so that Herodotus was obliged to fly to Greece from the public resentment. To procure a lasting fame he publicly repeated at the Olympic games the history which he had composed, in his 36th year, B.C. 445. It was received with such universal applause, that the names of the nine Muses were unanimously given to the nine books into which it is divided. This celebrated composition, which has procured its author the title of father of history, is written in the Ionic dialect. Herodotus is among the historians what Homer is among the poets, and Demosthenes among the orators. His style abounds with elegance, ease, and sweetness; and if there is any of the fabulous or incredible, the author candidly informs the reader that it is introduced upon the narration of others. The work is a history of the wars of the Persians against the Greeks, from the age of Cyrus to the battle of Mycale in the reign of Xerxes, and besides this, it gives an account of the most celebrated nations in the world. Herodotus had written another history of Assyria and Arabia, which is not extant. The life of Homer, generally attributed to him, is supposed by some not to be the production of his pen. Plutarch has accused him of malevolence towards the Greeks, an imputation which can easily be refuted. The two best editions of this great historian are that of Wesseling, fol. Amsterdam, 1763; and that of Glasgow, 9 vols. 8mo, 1761. Cic. de leg. 1, de orat. 2.—Diogen. Hal. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. de Mal. Herod.—A man who wrote a treatise concerning Epicurus. Diog.—A Theban wrestler of Megara, in the age of Demetrius son of Antigonus. He was six feet and a half in height, and he ate generally 30 pounds of flesh, with bread in proportion, at each of his meals. Athen. 16.—Another, whose victories are celebrated by Pindar.

HEROES, a name which was given by the ancients to such as were born from a god, or to such as had signalled themselves by their actions, and seemed to deserve immortality by the services which they had rendered their country. The heroes which Homer describes, such as Ajax, Achilles, &c., were of such prodigious strength, that they could lift up and throw stones which the united force of four or five men of his age could not have moved. The heroes were supposed to be interested in the affairs of mankind after death, and they were invoked with much solemnity. As the statues of the gods were crowded with sacrifices and libations, so the heroes were often honoured with a funeral solemnity, in which their great exploits were enumerated. The origin of heroism might proceed from the opinions of some philosophers, who taught that the souls of great men were often raised to the stars, and introduced among the immortal gods. According to the notions of the stoics, the ancient heroes inhabited a pure and serene climate, situate above the moon.

HERÛSIA, a festival, celebrated every ninth year by the Delphians, in honour of a heroine. There were in the celebration a great number of mysterious rites, with a representation of something like Semæ's resurrection.

HERON, two mathematicians, one of whom is called the ancient and the other the young. The former, who lived about 100 years before Christ, was disciple to Cononius, and wrote a curious book translated into Latin, under the title of Spiritu-alium Liber; the only edition of which is that of Baldui, Aug. Vind. 1616.

HEROÛLIS, a town of Egypt on the Arabic gulf.

HERÛPHILA, a Sybil, who, as some suppose, came to Rome in the reign of Tarquin. Vid. Sibyllæ. Pærs. 10, v. 32.

HEROPHILIUS, an impostor in the reign of J. Caesar, who pretended to be the grandson of Marius. He was banished from Rome by Cæsar for his seditions, and was afterwards strangled in prison.—A Greek physician, about 570 years before the Christian era. He was one of the first who dissected bodies. Phny, Cicero, and Plutarch have greatly commended him.

HEROSTRATUS. Vid. Erostratus.

HERSE, a daughter of Cecrops king of Athens, beloved by Mercury. The god disclosed his love to Aglauros, Herse's sister, in hopes of procuring an easy admission to Herse; but Aglauros, through jealousy, discovered the amplex. Mercury was so offended at her behaviour, that he struck her with his caduceus and changed her into a snake. Herse became mother of Cephelus by Mercury, and after death she received divine honours at Athens. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 559, &c.—A wife of Danaus. Apollod.

HEMEROPHONIA, festivals of Athens in honour of Minerva, or more probably of Herse.

HERALIA, one of the Sabine, carried away by the Romans at the celebration of the Consualia. She was given and married to Romulus, though, according to some, she married Hostus, a youth of Latium, by whom she had Hostus Hostilius. After death she was presented with immortality by Juno, and received divine honours under the name of Ora. Liv. 1, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 832.

HERTHA and HERTA, a goddess among the Germans, supposed to be the same as the earth. She had a temple and a shrine dedicated to her service in a remote island, and was supposed to visit the earth at stated times, when her coming was celebrated with the greatest rejoicings and festivity. Tacit. de Germ.

HERULI, a savage nation in the northern parts of Europe, who attacked the Roman power in its decline.

HESSANUS, a mountain near Ptoemia.

HECÆDÆUS, a celebrated poet, born at Asca in Bœotia. His father's name was Dias, and his mother's Pycnæde. He lived in the age of Homer, and even obtained a poetical prize in competition with him, according to Vasso and Ptolearch. Quintilian, Philostratus, and others maintain that Hecædæus lived before the age of Homer; but Val. Paterculus and others support that he flourished about 200 years after him. Hecædæus is the first who wrote a poem on agriculture. This composition is called The Works and the Days; and besides the instructions which are given to the cultivator of the field, the reader is pleased to find many moral reflections worthy of a refined Socrates or a Plato. His Theogony is a miscellaneous narration executed without art, precision, choice, judgment, or connection, yet it is the more valuable for the faithful account it gives of the gods of antiquity. His Shield of Hercules is but a fragment of a larger poem, in which it is supposed he gave an account of the most celebrated heroes among the ancients. Hecædæus, without being master of the fire and sublimity of Homer, is admired for the elegance of his diction, and the sweetness of his poetry. Besides those poems he wrote others, now lost. Pausanias says that, in his age, Hecædæus's verses were still written on tablets in the temple of the Muses, of which the poet was a priest. If we believe Clem. Alexand. 6, Strom., the poet borrowed much from Musæus. One of Lucian's dialogues bears the name of Hecædæus, and in it the poet is introduced as speaking of himself. Virgil, in his Georgics, has imitated the compositions of Hecædæus, and taken his opora and thesa for model, as he acknowledges. Cicero strongly commends him, and the Greeks were so partial to his poetry and moral instructions, that they ordered their children to learn all by heart. Hecædæus was murdered by the sons of Ganyxer of Naupactum, and his body was thrown into the sea. Some dolphins brought back the body to the shore, which was immediately known, and the murderers were discovered by the poet's dogs, and thrown into the sea. If Hecædæus flourished in the age of Homer, he lived 607 B.C. The best editions of this poet are that of Robinson, 4to, Oxon, 1777; that of Loesner, Bres, Lipsa 1778; and that of Parma, 4to, 1785. Cic. Fam. 6, ep. 18.—Paus. 9, c. 3, &c.—Quintil. 10, c. 2.—Pater.—Vasso.—Plut. de 7, Sup. & de Anim. Sag.

HESIONE, a daughter of Laomedon king of Troy, by Strymo the daughter of Scamander. It fell to her lot to be exposed to a sea monster, to whom the Trojans yearly presented a marriageable virgin, to appease the resentment of Apollo and Neptune, whom Laomedon had offended; but Hercules promised to deliver her, provided he received as a reward six beautiful horses. Laomedon consented, and Hercules attacked the monster just as he was going to devour Hesionë, and he killed him with his club. Laomedon, however, refused to reward the hero's services; and Hercules, incensed at his treachery, besieged Troy, and put the king and all his family to the sword, except Podarces, or Priam, who had advised his father to give the promised horses to his sister's deliverer. The conqueror gave Hesionë in marriage to his friend Telamon, who had assisted him during the war, and he established Priam upon his father's throne. The removal of Hesionë to Greece proved at last fatal to the Trojans; and Priam, remembering with indignation that his sister had been forcibly given to a foreigner, sent his son Paris to Greece to reclaim the possessions of Hesionë, or more probably to revenge his injuries upon the Greeks by carrying away Helen, which gave rise, soon after, to the Trojan war. Lycophron mentions that Hercules threw himself, armed from head to foot, into the mouth of the monster to which Hesionë was exposed, and that he tore his belly to pieces, and came out safe only with the loss of his hair, after a confinement of three days. Hom. Il. 3, v. 638.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 212.—The wife of Nauplius.

HESPERIA, a large island of Africa, once the residence of the Amazons. Diod. 3.—A name common to both Italy and Spain. It is derived from Hesper or Vesper, the setting sun, or the evening, whence the Greeks called Italy Hesperia, because it was situated at the setting sun, or in the west. The same name, for similar reasons, was applied to Spain by the Latins. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 634, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 34, v. 4. l. 1, od. 27, v. 28.—Sil. 7, v. 15.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 252.—A daughter of the Cæberus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 759.

HESPERIDES, three celebrated nymphs, daughters of Hesperus. Apollodorus mentions four, Hègè, Erythra, Vesta, and Arethusa; and Diodorus confounds them with the Atlantides, and supposes that they were the same number. They were appointed to guard the golden apples which Juno gave to Jupiter on the day of their nuptials; and the place of their residence, placed beyond the ocean by Hesiod, is more universally believed to be near mount Atlas in Africa, according to Apollodorus. This celebrated place or garden abounded with fruits of the most delicious kind, and was carefully guarded by a dreadful dragon, which never slept. It was one of the labours of Hercules to procure some of the golden apples of the Hesperides. The hero, ignorant of the situation of this celebrated garden, applied to the nymphs in the neighbourhood of the Po for information, and was told that Neræus the god of the sea, if properly managed [Vid. Neræus], would direct him in his pursuits. Hercules seized Neræus as he was asleep, and the sea god, unable to escape from his grasp, answered all the questions which he proposed. Some say that Neræus sent Hercules to Prometheus, and that from him he received all his information. When Hercules came into Africa, he repaired to Atlas, and demanded of him three of the golden apples. Atlas unloaded himself and placed the burden of the heavens on the shoulders of Hercules, while he went in quest of the apples. At his return Hercules expressed his wish to ease the burden by putting something on his head, and when Atlas assisted him to remove his inconvenience, Hercules artfully left the burden, and seized the apples, which Atlas had thrown on the ground. According to other accounts, Hercules gathered the apples himself, without the assistance of Atlas, and he previously killed the watchful dragon which kept the tree. These apples were brought to Eurystheus, and afterwards carried back by Minerva into the garden of the Hesperides, as they could be preserved in no other place. Hercules is sometimes represented gathering the apples, and the dragon which guarded the tree appears bowing down his head, as having received a mortal wound. This monster, as it is supposed, was the offspring of Typhon, and it had two heads and as many voices. This number, however, is reduced by some to only one head. Those that attempt to explain mythology, observe that the Hesperides were certain persons who had an immense number of flocks, and that the ambiguous word μηνορ, which signifies an apple and a sheep, gave rise to the fable of the golden apples of the Hesperides. Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 637, &c. l. 9, v. 20.—Hygin. Fab. 30.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 215, &c.

Hesperia. Vid. Hesperus. — A town of Cyrenaica, now Beritic or Bengasi, where most authors have placed the garden of the Hesperides.

Hesperis, a country of Africa. Diod. 4.

Hesperus, a son of Japetus, brother to Atlas. He came to Italy, and the country received the name of Hesperia from him, according to some accounts. He had a daughter called Hesperia, who married Atlas, and became mother of seven daughters, called Atlantides or Hesperides. Diod. 4. — The name of Hesperus was also applied to the planet Venus, when it appeared after the setting of the sun. It was called Phosphorus or Lucifer when it preceded the sun. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 2.—Senec. de Hippol. 749. Id. in Med. 71.

Hesus, a deity among the Gauls, the same as the Mars of the Romans. Lucan. 1, v. 445.

Hesychia, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

Hesychius, the author of a Greek lexicon in the beginning of the third century, a valuable work which has been learnedly edited by Albert, 2 vols. Jul. L. Bat. 1746.

Hetracodium, now Latarico, a town in the country of the Brutii. Liv. 30, c. 10.

Hetruria and Etruria, a celebrated country of Italy, at the west of the Tiber. It originally contained 22 different nations, which had each their respective monarch, called Lucumon. Their names were: Veientes, Clusini, Perusini, Cortoneses, Arretini, Vetuloni, Volaterrani, Rusellani, Volscini, Tarquini, Falisci, and Cacretani. The inhabitants were particularly famous for their superstition, and great confidence in omens, dreams, auguries, &c. They all proved powerful and resolute enemies to the rising empire of the Romans, and were conquered only after much effusion of blood. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 5.—Plut. in Rom.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Heurippa, a surname of Diana.

Hexapylum, a gate at Syracuse. The adjoining place of the city, or the wall, bore the same name. Diod. 11 & 14.—Liv. 24, c. 21. l. 25, c. 24. l. 32, c. 39.

Hiarbas, or Iarbas, a king of Gætulia. Vid. Iarbas.

Hiber, a name applied to a Spaniard, as living near the river Hiberus or Iberus. Vid. Iberus.

Hibernia and Hybernia, a large island at the west of Britain, now called Ireland. Some of the ancients have called it Ibernia, Juverna, Iris, Hierna, Ogygia, Ivernina. Juv. 2, v. 160.—Strab. 4.—Orpheus.—Aristot.

Hibridæ, an Athenian general. Dionys. Hal. 7.

Hicetion, a son of Laomedon, brother to Priam and father of Menalippus. Homer. Il. 3. — The father of Thymetes, who came to Italy with Aeneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 133.

Hicetas, a philosopher of Syracuse, who believed that the earth moved, and that all the heavenly bodies were stationary. Diag. in Phil. — A tyrant of Syracuse. Vid. Ictetas.

Hiempsal, a king of Numidia, &c. Vid. Hiempsal. Plut.

Hiera, a woman who married Telephus king of Mysia, and who was said to surpass Helen in beauty. — The mother of Pandarus and Bitias by Alcanor. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 673. — One of the Lipari islands, called also Theresia, now Vulcano. Paus. 10, c. 11.

Hierapollis, a town of Syria, near the Euphrates. — Another of Phrygia, famous for hot baths, now Bambukkalari. — Another of Crete.

Hierax, a youth who awoke Argus, to inform him that Mercury was stealing Io. Mercury killed him, and changed him into a bird of prey. Apollod. 2, c. 9. — Antiochus, king of Syria and brother to Seleucus, received the surname of Hierax. Jus-tin. 37, c. 3. — An Egyptian philosopher in the third century.

Hierichus (untis), the name of Jericho in the Holy Land, called the city of palm trees, from its abounding in dates. Plin. 5, c. 14.—Tacit. H. 5, c. 6.

Hiero I., a king of Syracuse, after his brother Gelon, who rendered himself odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war against Theron the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He obtained three different crowns at the Olympic games, two in horse-races, and one at a chariot-race. Pindar has celebrated him as being victorious at Olympia. In the latter part of his reign the conversation of Simonides, Epicharmus, Pindar, &c., softened in some measure the roughness of his morals and the severity of his government, and rendered him the patron of learning, genius, and merit. He died, after a reign of 18 years, B.C. 467, leaving the crown to his brother Tharasbulus, who disgraced himself by his vices and tyranny. Diod. 11. — The second of that name, king of Syracuse, was descended from Gelon. He was unanimously elected king by all the states of the island of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war against the Carthaginians. He joined his enemies in besieging Messana, which had surrendered to the Romans, but he was beaten by Appius Claudius the Roman consul, and obliged to retire to Syracuse, where he was soon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory lost, he made peace with the Romans, and proved so faithful to his engagements during the 59 years of his reign, that the Romans never had a more firm or more attached ally. He died in the 94th year of his age, about 225 years B.C. He was universally regretted, and all the Sicilians showed by their lamentations that they had lost a common father and a friend. He liberally patronized the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country. He wrote a book on agriculture, now lost. He was succeeded by Hieronymus. Ælian. V. H. 4. 8. Justin. 23. c. 4. Flor. 2. c. 2. Liv. 16.—An Athenian, intimate with Nicias the general. Plut. in Nic.—A Partian, &c. Tacit. Hierosolyma, a town of Lydia. Tacit. Ann. 2. c. 47. l. 3. c. 62.

Hierocopia, an island near Paphos in Cyprus. Hierocles, a persecutor of the christians under Diocletian, who pretended to find inconsistencies in Scripture, and preferred the miracles of Thyaneus to those of Christ. His writings were refuted by Lactantius and Eusebius.—A Platonic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, and wrote a book on providence and fate, fragments of which are preserved by Photius; a commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras; and facetious moral verses. He flourished A.D. 485. The best edition is that of Asheton and Warren, 8vo, London, 1742.—A general in the interest of Demetrius. Polyan. 5.—A governor of Bithynia and Alexandria, under Diocletian.—An officer. Vid. Heliogabalus.

Hierodulum, a town of Libya. Hieronica law, by Hiero tyrant of Sicily, to settle the quantity of corn, the price and time of receiving it, between the farmers of Sicily and the collector of the corn tax at Rome. This law, on account of its justice and candour, was continued by the Romans when they became masters of Sicily. Hieronimus, a tyrant of Sicily, who succeeded his father or grandfather Hiero, when only 15 years old. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty, oppression, and debauchery. He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had observed with so much honour and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family was overwhelmed in his fall, and totally extirpated, B.C. 214.—An historian of Rhodes, who wrote an account of the actions of Demetrius Poliorcetes, by whom he was appointed over Bœotia, B.C. 254. Plut. in Dem.—An Athenian set over the fleet, while Conon went to the king of Persia.—A christian writer commonly called St. Jerome, born in Pannonia, and distinguished for his zeal against heretics. He wrote commentaries on the prophets, St. Matthew's gospel, &c., a Latin version known by the name of Vulgate, polemical treatises, and an account of ecclesiastical writers before him. Of his works, which are replete with lively animation, sublimity, and erudition, the best edition is that of Vallerius, fol. Veronæ, 1734 to 1740, 10 vols. Jerome died A.D. 420, in his 92d year.

Hierophilus, a Greek physician. He instructed his daughter Agnodice in the art of midwifery, &c. Vid. Agnodice.

Hierosolyma, a celebrated city of Palestine, the capital of Judæa, taken by Pompey, who, on that account, is surnamed Hierosolymarius. Titus also took it and destroyed it, the 8th of September, A.D. 70, according to Josephus, 2177 years after its foundation. In the siege by Titus, 110,000 persons are said to have perished, and 97,000 to have been made prisoners, and afterwards either sold for slaves, or wantonly exposed, for the sport of their insolent victors, to the fury of wild beasts. Joseph. Bell. J. 7. c. 16. &c. Cic. ad Attic. 2. ep. 2. Flacc. 88.

Hignatia via, a large road, which led from the Ionian sea to the Hellespont, across Macedonia, about 530 miles. Strab. 7.

Hilaria, a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice. As she and her sister Phœbe were going to marry their cousins Lynceus and Idas, they were carried away by Castor and Pollux, who married them. Hilaria had Anagon by Castor, and she, as well as her sister, obtained after death the honours which were generally paid to heroes. Apollod. 3. Propert. 1. el. 2. v. 16.—Paus. 2. c. 22. l. 3. c. 19. Festivals at Rome in honour of the mother of the gods.

Hilarius, a bishop of Poitiers in France, who wrote several treatises, the most famous of which is on the Trinity, in 12 books. The only edition is that of the Benedictine monks, fol. Paris, 1693. Hilary died A.D. 372, in his 80th year.

Hilleviõnes, a people of Scandinavia. Plin. 4. c. 13.

Himella, now Aia, a small river in the country of the Sabines. Virg. Æn. 7. v. 714.

Himæra, a city of Sicily built by the people of Zancle, and destroyed by the Carthaginians 240 years after. Strab. 6.—There were two rivers of Sicily of the same name, the one, now Fiumi de Termini, falling at the east of Panormus into the Tuscan sea, with a town of the same name at its mouth, and also celebrated baths. Cic. Verr. 4. c. 33. The other, now Fiume Salso, running in a southern direction, and dividing the island in almost two parts. Liv. 24. c. 6. l. 25. c. 49.—The ancient name of the Eurotas. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2. c. 7.—Polyb.

Himilco, a Carthaginian sent to explore the western parts of Europe. Fest. Avien.—A son of Amilcar, who succeeded his father in the command of the Carthaginian armies in Sicily. He died with his army by a plague, B.C. 398. Justin. 19. c. 2.

Hippagoras, a man who wrote an account of the republic of Carthage. Athen. 14.

Hippalimus, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, who was among the Argonauts.

Hippalus, the first who sailed in open sea from Arabia to India. Arrian. in Perip.

Hipparchia, a woman in Alexander's age, who became enamoured of Crates the Cynic philosopher, because she heard him discourse. She married him, though he at first disdain'd her addresses, and represented his poverty and meanness. She was so attached to him that she was his constant companion, and was not ashamed publicly to gratify his impure desires. She wrote some things, now lost. Vid. Crates. Diog. 6.—Suidas.

Hipparchus, a son of Pisistratus, who succeeded his father as tyrant of Athens, with his brother Hippias. He patronized some of the learned men of the age, and distinguished himself by his fondness for literature. The seduction of a sister of Harmodius raised him many enemies, and he was at last assassinated by a desperate band of conspirators, with Harmodius and Aristogiton at their head, 513 years before Christ. Ælian. V. H. 8. c. 2.—One of Antony's freedmen.—The first person who was banished by ostracism at Athens.—The father of Asclepiades.—A mathematician and astronomer of Nicæa. He first discovered that the interval between the vernal and the autumnal equinox is 186 days, seven days longer than between the autumnal and vernal, occasioned by the eccentricity of the earth's orbit. He divided the heavens into 49 constellations, 12 in the ecliptic, 21 in the northern, and 16 in the southern hemisphere.

Hippodamia, a daughter of Pelops, who was married to her father's enemy, Phœbus, by the intervention of the gods.

Hippodamia, a daughter of Pelops, who was married to her father's enemy, Phœbus, by the intervention of the gods.

Hippodamia, a daughter of Pelops, who was married to her father's enemy, Phœbus, by the intervention of the gods.

Hippodamia, a daughter of Pelops, who was married to her father's enemy, Phœbus, by the intervention of the gods.

and gave names to all the stars. He makes no mention of comets. From viewing a tree on a plain from different situations, which changed its apparent position, he was led to the discovery of the parallax of the planets, or the distance between their real or apparent position, viewed from the centre and from the surface of the earth. He determined the longitude and latitude, and fixed the first degree of longitude at the Canaries. He likewise laid the first foundations of trigonometry, so essential to facilitate astronomical studies. He was the first who, after Thales and Sulpicius Gallus, found out the exact time of eclipses, of which he made a calculation for 600 years. After a life of labour in the service of science and astronomy, and after publishing several treatises and valuable observations on the appearance of the heavens, he died 125 years before the christian era. Plin. 7, c. 26, &c.—An Athenian who conspired against Heraclides, who kept Athens for Demetrius, &c. Polyem. 5.

Hipparrinus, a son of Diemysius, who ejected Calippus from Syracuse, and seized the sovereign power for 27 years. Polyem. 5.—The father of Dion.

Hipparkion, one of Dion's sons.

Hippasus, a son of Ceyx, who assisted Hercules against Eurystus. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A pupil of Pythagoras, born at Metapontum. He supposed that everything was produced from fire. Diog.—A centaur killed at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 352.—An illegitimate son of Priam. Hygin. fab. 90.

Hippi, four small islands near Erythrae.

Hippia, a lascivious woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 82.—A surname of Minerva, and also of Juno. Paus. 5, c. 15.

Hippias, a philosopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue consisted in not being in want of the assistance of men. At the Olympic games, he boasted that he was master of all the liberal and mechanical arts; and he said that the ring upon his finger, the tunic, cloak, and shoes, which he then wore, were all the work of his own hands. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 32.—A son of Pisistratus, who became tyrant of Athens after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He was willing to revenge the death of his brother, who had been assassinated, and for this violent measure he was driven from his country. He fled to king Darius in Persia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting against the Athenians, B.C. 490. He had five children by Myrrhae the daughter of Callias. Herodot. 6.—Thucyd. 7.

Hippis, an historian and poet of Rhegium, in the reign of Xerxes. Alcian. H. An. 8, c. 33.

Hippius, a surname of Neptune, from his having raised a horse (i.e. eo) from the earth in his contest with Minerva concerning the giving a name to Athens.

Hippo, a daughter of Scodanus, who, upon being ravished by the ambassadors of Sparta, killed herself, cursing the city that gave birth to such men. Paus. 9, c. 12.—A celebrated town of Africa, on the Mediterranean. Ital. 3, v. 253.

Strabo, 17, says that there are two of the same name in Africa, one of which, by way of distinction, is called Regius. Plin. 5, c. 1, 9, c. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Liv. 29, c. 3 & 20.—Also a town of Spain. Liv. 29, c. 30.—Of the Brutii.

Hippobotes, a large meadow near the Caspian sea, where 50,000 horses could graze.

Hippobotus, a Greek historian, who composed a treatise on philosophers. Diog. in Pyth.

Hippocentaurs, a race of monsters who dwelt in Thessaly. Virg. Aen. 10.

Hippocoon, a son of Cebalus, brother to Tyndarus. He was put to death by Hercules, because he had driven his brother from the kingdom of Lacedaemon. He was at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 2, &c. 1, 3, c. 10.—Paus. Lacon.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 374.—A friend of Aeneas, son of Hyrtacus, who distinguished himself in the funeral games of Sicily. Virg. Aen. 3, v. 492, &c.

Hippocorystes, a son of Egyptus, — of Hippocoon. Apollod.

Hippocrate, a daughter of Thestius. Apollod.

Hippocrates, a celebrated physician of Cos, one of the Cyclades. He studied physic, in which his grandfather Nebus was so eminently distinguished; and he improved himself by reading the tablets in the temples of the gods, where each individual had written down the diseases under which he had laboured, and the means by which he had recovered. He delivered Athens from a dreadful pestilence in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and he was publicly rewarded with a golden crown, the privileges of a citizen of Athens, and the initiation at the grand festivals. Skillful and diligent in his profession, he openly declared the measures which he had taken to cure a disease, and candidly confessed, that of 42 patients which were entrusted to his care, only 17 had recovered, and the rest had fallen a prey to the distemper in spite of his medical applications. He devoted all his time for the service of his country; and when Artaxerxes invited him, even by force of arms, to come to his court, Hippocrates firmly and modestly answered, that he was born to serve his countrymen, and not a foreigner. He enjoyed the rewards which his well-directed labours claimed, and while he lived in the greatest popularity, he was carefully employed in observing the symptoms and the growth of every disorder, and from his judicious remarks, succeeding physicians have received the most valuable advantages. The experiments which he had used upon the human frame increased his knowledge, and from his consummate observations, he knew how to moderate his own life as well as to prescribe to others. He died in the 99th year of his age, B.C. 362, free from all disorders of the mind and body; and after death he received, with the name of Great, the same honours which were paid to Hercules. His writings, few of which remain, have procured him the epithet of divine, and show that he was the Homer of his profession. According to Galen, his opinion is as respectable as the voice of an oracle. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, at the advice of Democritus, though he was a Dorian. His memory is still venerated at Cos, and the present inhabitants of the island show a small house, which Hippocrates, as they mention, once inhabited. The best editions of his works are that of Fessius, Geneva, fol. 1657; of Linden, 2 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1665; and that of Mackius, 2 vols. fol. Vienna, 1743. His treatises, especially the Aphorisms, have been published separately. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—An Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war. Plut.—A mathematician.—An officer of Chalcidon, killed by Alcibiades. Plut. in Alex.—A Syracusan defeated by Marcellus.—The father of Pisistratus.—A tyrant of Gela.

Hippocratis, a festival in honour of Neptune, in Arcadia.

Hippocrène, a fountain of Bœotia, near mount Helicon, sacred to the muses. It first rose from the ground, when struck by the feet of the horse Pegasus, whence the name ἵππος ὕδωρ, the horse's fountain. Ovid. Met. 5. v. 266.

Hippodamas, a son of the Acheolus, — of Priam. Apollod.

Hippodame and Hippodamia, a daughter of Cœnomus king of Pisa, in Elis, who married Pelops son of Tantalus. Her father, who was either enamoured of her himself, or afraid lest he should perish by one of his daughter's children, according to an oracle, refused to marry her, except to him who could overcome him in a chariot-race. As the beauty of Hippodamia was greatly celebrated, many courted her, and accepted her father's conditions, though death attended a defeat. Thirteen had already been conquered, and forfeited their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia and entered the lists. Pelops previously bribed Mytilus the charioteer of Cœnomus, and ensnared himself the victory. In the race, Cœnomus mounted on a broken chariot, which the corrupted Mytilus had purposely provided for him, was easily overcome, and was killed in the course; and Pelops married Hippodamia, and avenged the death of Cœnomus, by throwing into the sea the perfidious Mytilus, who claimed for the reward of his treachery the favour which Hippodamia could grant only to her husband. Hippodamia became mother of Atreus and Thyestes, and it is said that she died of grief for the death of her father, which her guilty correspondence with Pelops and Mytilus had occasioned. Virg. Met. 12. — Plut. in These. — A daughter of Danaus. Apollod. — A mistress of Achilles, daughter of Brises. — A daughter of Anchises, who married Alcathous. Hom. Il. 13. v. 429.

Hippodamus, a man of Miletus, who settled a republic without any previous knowledge of government. Aristot. 2. Polit. — A Pythagorean philosopher. — An Athenian who gave his house to his country, when he knew such a concession would improve the port of the Piræus. — An Athenian archon. — A man famous for his voracious appetite.

Hippodromus, a son of Hercules. Ed. — A Thessalian, who succeeded in a school at Athens, in the age of M. Antony. Philost. — A place where horse-races were exhibited. Martial. 10. ep. 50.

Hippola, a town of Peloponnesus. Paus. 3. c. 26.

Hippolochus, a son of Bellerophon, father to Glaucus, who commanded the Lycians during the Trojan war. — A son of Glaucus also bore the same name. Hom. Il. 6. v. 119. — A son of Antimachus, slain in the Trojan war. Id. 11. v. 122.

Hippolyte, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theseus by Hercules, who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Eurystheus. Virg. Hercules. She had a son by Theseus, called Hippolytus. Plut. in These. — Propert. 4. el. 3. — The wife of Acastus, who fell in love with Pelene, who was in exile at her husband's court. She accused him of incontinence, and of attempts upon her virtue, before Acastus, only because he refused to gratify her desires. She is also called Aspychia. Virg. Acastus. — A daughter of Cretheus. Apollod.

Hippolytus, a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, famous for his virtues and his misfortunes. His stepmother Phædra fell in love with him, and when he refused to pollute his father's bed, she accused him of offering violence to her person before Theseus. Her accusation was readily believed, and Theseus entreated Neptune severely to punish the incontinence of his son. Hippolytus fled from the resentment of his father, and as he pursued his way along the sea-shore, his horses were so frightened at the noise of sea-calves, which Neptune had purposely sent them, that they ran among the rocks till his chariot was broken and his body torn to pieces. Temples were raised in his memory, particularly at Trœzene, where he received divine honours. According to some accounts, Diana restored him to life. Ovid. Fast. 3. v. 268. Met. 15. v. 469. — Virg. Æn. 7. v. 761, &c. — A son of Kopalus king of Sicily, greatly beloved by Apollo. Plut. in Numa. — A giant killed by Mercury. — A son of Egyptus. Apollod. 1 & 2. — A Christian writer in the third century, whose works have been edited by Fabricius. Hamb. fol. 176.

Hippolytus, a musician, who severely rebuked one of his pupils because he was praised by the multitude, and observed that it was the greatest proof of his ignorance. Ælian. K. H. 2. c. 6.

Hippolydon, a son of Nisæmachus and Mythiside, who was one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. He was killed by Ismarus son of Acastus. Apollod. 3. c. 6. — Paus. 2. c. 36.

Hippomedusa, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.

Hippomedes, an Athenian archon, who exposed his daughter Limone to be devoured by horses, because guilty of adultery. Ovid. in Ib. 459. — A son of Macareus and Merope, who married Atalanta (Virg. Atalanta), with the assistance of Venus. These two fond lovers were changed into lions by Cybele, whose temple they had profaned in their impatience to consummate their nuptials. Ovid. Met. 10. v. 585, &c. — The father of Megaricus.

Hippomolgi, a people of Scythia, who, as the name implies, lived upon the milk of horses. Hippocrates has given an account of their manner of living. De Aquâ & Aer. 44. — Diosc. Perieg.

Hippon and Hippo, a town of Africa.

Hippota, a goddess who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in horses' stables. Juv. 8. v. 187.

Hippanax, a Greek poet born at Ephesus, 540 years before the christian era. He cultivated the same satirical poetry as Archilochus, and was not inferior to him in the beauty or vigour of his lines. His satirical raillery obliged him to fly from Ephesus. As he was naturally deformed, two brothers, Buphalus and Anthermus, made a statue of him, which, by the deformity of its features, exposed the poet to universal ridicule. Hippanax resolved to avenge the injury, and he wrote such bitter invectives and satirical lampoons against them, that they hanged themselves in despair. Cic. ad Famil. 7. ep. 24.

Hippionates, a bay in the country of the Bruttii.

Hippionum, a city in the country of the Bruttii, where Agathocles built a dock. Strab.

Hipponus, the father of Periboea and Capaneus. He was killed by the thunderbolts of Jupiter before the walls of Thebes. Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 1.—The first name of Bellerophon.—A son of Priam.

Hippodotes, a people of Scythia, who have horres feci. Dionys. Perieg.

Hippostratus, a favourite of Laius.
Hippotades, the patronymic of Æolus, grandson to Hippotas by Segesta, as also of Amastrus his son, who was killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 674.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 431.

Hippotas, or Hippotes, a Trojan prince, changed into a river. Virg. Crinias.—The father of Æolus, who from thence is called Hippotades. Horn. Od. 10, v. 2.—Ovid. Her. 18, v. 46. Met. 14, v. 224.

Hippothoe, a daughter of Mestor and Lyandice, carried away to the islands called Echinades by Neptune, by whom she had a son named Taphius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—One of the Nereides. Id. 2, c. 2.—A daughter of Peleus. Id.

Hippothoon, a son of Neptune and Alope daughter of Cercyon, exposed in the woods by his mother, that her amours with the god might be concealed from her father. Her shame was discovered, and her father ordered her to be put to death. Neptune changed her into a fountain, and the child was preserved by swans, whence his name, and when grown up, placed on his grandfather's throne by the friendship of Theseus. Hygin. fab. 187.—Paus. 1, c. 38.

Hippothoonis, one of the 12 Athenian tribes, which received its name from Hippothoon.

Hippothous, a son of Lethus, killed by Ajax in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 9 & 17.—A son of Priam. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—A son of Ægyptus. Id.—One of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 307.

Hippotion, a prince who assisted the Trojans, and was killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13 & 14.

Hippuris, one of the Cyclades. Mela. 2, c. 7.

Hippus, a river falling into the Phasis.

Hippides, a Macedonian; &c. Curt. 7, c. 7.

Hira, a maritime town of Peloponnesus. Homer. Il. 12.

Hirpini, a people of the Samnites. Sil. 8, v. 560.

Q. Hirpinus, a Roman, to whom Horace dedicated his 2 od. 11, and also 1, ep. 16.

Hirtus, a debauched fellow, &c. Juv. 10, v. 222.

Hirtia lex de magistratibus, by A. Hirtius. It required that none of Pompey's adherents should be raised to any office or dignity in the state.

Hirtius Aulus, a consul with Pansa, who assisted Brutus when besieged at Mutina by Antony. They defeated Antony, but were both killed in battle B.C. 43. Suet. in Aug. 10.—An historian to whom the eighth book of Caesar's history of the Gallic wars, as also that of the Alexandrian and Spanish wars, is attributed. The style is inferior to that of Caesar's Commentaries. The author, who was Caesar's friend, and Cicero's pupil, is supposed to be no other than the consul of that name.

Hisbon, a Rutulian, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 384.

Hispalis, an ancient town of Spain, now called Seville. Plin. 3, c. 2.—Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 30.

Hispānia, or Hispāniæ, called by the poets Iberia, Hesperia, and Hesperia Ultima, a large country of Europe, separated from Gaul by the Pyrenean mountains, and bounded on every other side by the sea. Spain was first known to the merchants of Phœnicia, and from them passed to the Carthaginians, to whose power it long continued in subjection. The Romans became sole masters of it at the end of the second Punic war, and divided it at first into citerior and ulterior, which last was afterwards separated into Bætica and Lusitania by Augustus. The Hispania citerior was also called Tarracōnensis. The inhabitants were naturally warlike, and they often destroyed a life which was become useless, and even burdensome, by its infirmities. Spain was famous for its rich mines of silver, which employed 40,000 workmen, and daily yielded to the Romans no less than 20,000 drachms. These have long since failed, though, in the flourishing times of Rome, Spain was said to contain more gold, silver, brass, and iron than the rest of the world. It gave birth to Quintilian, Lucan, Martial, Mela, Silius, Seneca, &c. Justin. 44.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 1 & 20.

Hispānus, a native of Spain. The word Hispaniensis was also used, but generally applied to a person living in Spain and not born there. Martial. 12, pra.

Hispallum, a town of Umbria.

Hispo, a noted debaucher, &c. Juv. 2, v. 50.

Hispulla, a lascivious woman. Juv. 6, v. 74.

Histaspes, a relation of Darius III., killed in a battle, &c. Curt. 4, c. 4.

Histor, a river. Virg. Ister.

Hister Paouinus, a man distinguished as much by his vices as his immense riches. Juv. 2, v. 58.

Histiæa, a city of Eubœa, anciently called Talantia. It was near the promontory called Cœneum. Homer. Il. 2.

Histiæotis, a country of Thessaly, situate below mount Olympus and mount Ossa, anciently called Doris, from Dorus the son of Deucalion, and inhabited by the Pelasgi. The Pelasgi were driven from the country by the Cadmeans, and these last were also dispossessed by the Perrhæbeans, who gave to their newly acquired possessions the name of Histæotis, or Estiæotis, from Estiæa, or Histæa, a town of Eubœa, which they had then lately destroyed, and whose inhabitants they had carried to Thessaly with them. Strab.—Herodot. 4.—A small country of Eubœa, of which Histæa, or Estiæa, was the capital.

Histiæus, a tyrant of Miletus, who excited the Greeks to take up arms against Persia. Herodot. 5, &c.—An historian of Miletus.

Hodius, a herald in the Trojan war.

Holōron, a mountain of Macedon.

Homēromastix, a surname given to Zoilus the critic.

Hōmērus, a celebrated Greek poet, the most ancient of all the profane writers. The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose it to be about 168 years after the Trojan war, or, according to others, 160 years before the foundation of Rome. According to Paterculus, he flourished 968 years before the christian era, or 864, according to Herodotus, who supposes him to be contemporary with Hesiod. The Arundelian Marbles fix his era 907 years before Christ, and make him also contemporary with Hesiod. This diversity of opinions proves the antiquity of Homer: and the uncertainty prevails also concerning the place of his nativity. No less than seven illustrious cities disputed the right of having given birth to the greatest of poets, as it is well expressed in these lines :

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodos, Argos, Athene.

He was called Malesigenes, because supposed to be born on the borders of the river Meles. There prevailed a report that he had established a school at Chios in the latter part of his life; and, indeed, this opinion is favoured by the present inhabitants of the island, who still glory in showing to travellers the seats where the venerable master and his pupils sat in the hollow of a rock, at the distance of about four miles from the modern capital of the island. These difficulties and doubts have not been removed, though Aristotle, Herodotus, Plutarch, and others have employed their pen in writing his life. In his two celebrated poems, called the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer has displayed the most consummate knowledge of human nature, and rendered himself immortal by the sublimity, the fire, sweetness, and elegance of his poetry. He deserves a greater share of admiration when we consider that he wrote without a model, and that none of his poetical imitators have been able to surpass, or, perhaps, to equal their great master. If there are any faults found in his poetry, they are to be attributed to the age in which he lived, and not to him; and we must observe that the world is indebted to Homer for his happy successor Virgil. In his Iliad, Homer has described the resentment of Achilles, and its fatal consequences in the Grecian army, before the walls of Troy. In the Odyssey, the poet has chosen for his subject the return of Ulysses into his country, with the many misfortunes which attended his voyage after the fall of Troy. These two poems are each divided into 24 books, the same number as the letters of the Greek alphabet, and though the Iliad claims an uncontested superiority over the Odyssey, yet the same force, the same sublimity and elegance, prevail, though divested of its most powerful fire; and Longinus, the most refined of critics, beautifully compares the Iliad to the mid-day, and the Odyssey to the setting sun, and observes, that the latter still preserves its original splendour and majesty, though deprived of its meridian heat. The poetry of Homer was so universally admired, that, in ancient times, every man of learning could repeat with facility any passage in the Iliad or Odyssey; and, indeed, it was a sufficient authority to settle disputed boundaries, or to support any argument. The poems of Homer are the compositions of a man who travelled and examined with the most critical accuracy whatever deserved notice and claimed attention. Modern travellers are astonished to see the different scenes which the pen of Homer described about 3000 years ago, still existing in the same unvaried form, and the sailor who steers his course along the Ægean, sees all the promontories and rocks which appeared to Nestor and Menelaus, when they returned victorious from the Trojan war. The ancients had such veneration for Homer, that they not only raised temples and altars to him, but offered sacrifices, and worshipped him as a god. The inhabitants of Chios celebrated festivals every fifth year in his honour, and medals were struck, which represented him sitting on a throne, holding his Iliad and Odyssey. In Egypt his memory was consecrated by Ptolemy Philopator, who erected a magnificent temple, within which was placed a statue of the poet, beautifully surrounded with a representation of the seven cities which contended for the honour of his birth. The inhabitants of Cos, one of the Sporades, boasted that Homer was buried in their island; and the Cyprians claimed the same honour, and said that he was born of Themisto, a female native of Cyprus. Alexander was so fond of Homer, that he generally placed his compositions under his pillow, with his sword; and he carefully deposited the Iliad in one of the richest and most valuable caskets of Darius, observing that the most perfect work of human genius ought to be preserved in a box the most valuable and precious in the world. It is said that Pisistratus tyrant of Athens was the first who collected and arranged the Iliad and Odyssey in the manner in which they now appear to us; and that it is to the well-directed pursuits of Lycurgus that we are indebted for their preservation. Many of the ancients have written the life of Homer, yet their inquiries and labours have not much contributed to prove the native place, the patronage and connections, of a man whom some have represented as deprived of sight. Besides the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer wrote, according to the opinion of some authors, a poem upon Amphiarus's expedition against Thebes, besides the Phœois, the Cercopes, the small Iliad, the Epicichlides, and the Batrachomyomachia, and many hymns to some of the gods. The merit of originality is taken, very improperly perhaps, from Homer, by those who suppose, with Clemens Alex. 6 Strom., that he borrowed from Orpheus, or that, according to Suidas [ voce Corinnus], he took his plan of the Iliad from Corinnus, an epic poet, who wrote on the Trojan war, at the very time the Greeks besieged that famed city. Agathon, an ancient painter, according to Ælian, represented the merit of the poet in a manner so bold as it was indelicate. Homer was represented as vomiting, and all other poets as swallowing what he ejected. Of the numerous commentaries published on Homer, that of Eustathius bishop of Thessalonica is by far the most extensive and erudite. The best editions of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey may, perhaps, be found to be by Barnes, 2 vols. 4to, Cantab. 1751; that of Glasgow, 2 vols. fol. 1758; that of Berglerus, 2 vols. 12mo, Amst. 1707; that of Dr. Clarke of the Iliad, 2 vols. 4to, 1720, and that of the Odyssey, 1740; and that of Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo, 1780, containing the scholia, hymns, and an index. Hærod. 2, c. 53.—Theocr. 16.—Aristot. Hal.—Plut. in Alex., &c.—One of the Greek poets called Piræides, born at Hierapolis, B.C. 263. He wrote 45 tragedies, all lost.—There were seven other poets, of inferior note, who bore the name of Homer.

HOMÏLE, a lofty mountain of Thessaly, once the residence of the Centaurs. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.

HOMÏLEA, a mountain of Magnesia.

HOMOLOIDES, one of the seven gates of Thebes. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 252.

HOMONADENSES, a people of Cilicia.

HONORIUS, an emperor of the western empire of Rome, who succeeded his father Theodosius the Great, with his brother Arcadius. He was neither bold nor vicious, but he was of a modest and timid disposition, unfit for enterprise, and fearful of danger.

He conquered his enemies by means of his generals, and suffered himself and his people to be governed by ministers who took advantage of their imperial master's indolence and inactivity. He died of a dropsy in the 30th year of his age, 15th of August, A. D. 423. He left no issue, though he married two wives. Under him and his brother the Roman power was divided into two different empires. The successors of Honorius, who fixed their residence at Rome, were called the emperors of the west, and the successors of Arcadius, who sat on the throne of Constantinople, were distinguished by the name of emperors of the eastern Roman empire. This division of power proved fatal to both empires, and they soon looked upon one another with indifference, contempt, and jealousy.

HONOUR, a virtue worshipped at Rome. Her first temple was erected by Scipio Africanus, and another was afterwards built by Claud. Marcellus. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 23.

HORA, a goddess at Rome, supposed to be Hersilia, who married Romulus. She was said to preside over beauty. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 825.

HORAIAS, a people near Ilyricum.

HORAPOLLO, a Greek writer, whose age is unknown. His Hieroglyphica, a curious and entertaining book, has been edited by Corn. de Pauw. 4to, Ultraj. 1727.

HORAE, three sisters, daughters of Jupiter and Themis, according to Hesiod called Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. They were the same as the seasons who presided over the spring, summer, and winter, and were represented by the poets as opening the gates of heaven and of Olympus. Hom. Il. 5, v. 749. — Paus. 5, c. 11. — Herod. Theog. v. 902.

HORATII, the sister of Horatius, killed by her brother for mourning the death of the Curatii. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 20.

HORATIUS COCOLES. Vid. Cocles.—Q. Flaccus, a celebrated poet, born at Venusia. His father was a freedman, and though poor in his circumstances, he liberally educated his son, and sent him to learn philosophy at Athens, after he had received the lessons of the best masters at Rome. Horace followed Brutus from Athens, and the timidity which he betrayed at the battle of Philippi so effectually discouraged him, that he for ever abandoned the profession of arms, and at his return to Rome he applied himself to cultivate poetry. His rising talents claimed the attention of Virgil and Varius, who recommended him to the care of Mecenas and Augustus, the most celebrated patrons of literature. Under the fostering patronage of the emperor and of his minister, Horace gave himself up to indolence and refined pleasure. He was a follower of Epicurus, and while he liberally indulged his appetites, he neglected the calls of ambition, and never suffered himself to be carried away by the tide of popularity or public employments. He even refused to become the secretary of Augustus, and the emperor was not offended at his refusal. He lived at the table of his illustrious patrons as if he were in his own house; and Augustus, while sitting at his meals with Virgil at his right hand, and Horace at his left, often ridiculed the short breath of the former, and the watery eyes of the latter, by observing that he sat between tears and sighs, Ego sum inter suspiria et lacrymas. Horace was warm in his friendship, and if ever any ill-judged reflection had caused offence, the poet immediately made every concession which could effect a reconciliation, and not destroy the good purposes of friendly society. Horace died in the 57th year of his age, B. C. 8.

His gaiety was suitable to the liveliness and dissipation of a court; and his familiar intimacy with Mecenas has induced some to believe that the death of Horace was violent, and that he hastened himself out of the world to accompany his friend. The 17th ode of his second book, which was written during the last illness of Mecenas, is too serious to be considered as a poetical rhapsody or unmeaning effusion, and indeed the poet survived the patron only three weeks, and ordered his bones to be buried near those of his friend. He left all his possessions to Augustus. The poetry of Horace, so much commended for its elegance and sweetness, is deservedly censured for the licentious expressions and indelicate thoughts which he too frequently introduces. In his odes he has imitated Pindar and Anacreon; and if he has confessed himself to be inferior to the former, he has shown that he bears the palm over the latter by his more ingenious and refined sentiments, by the ease and melody of his expressions, and by the pleasing variety of his numbers. In his satires and epistles, Horace displays much wit, and much satirical humour, without much poetry, and his style, simple and unadorned, differs little from prosaic composition. In his art of poetry he has shown much taste and judgment, and has rendered in Latin hexameters what Aristotle had, some ages before, delivered to his pupils in Greek prose. The poet gives judicious rules and useful precepts to the most powerful and opulent citizens of Rome, who, in the midst of peace and enjoyment, wished to cultivate poetry and court the muses. The best editions of Horace will be found to be that of Basil, fol. 1580, illustrated by 80 commentators; that of Barter's, edited by Gesner, 8vo; Lips. 1752; and that of Glasgow, 1750, 1744. Suet. in Aug.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 43.—Three brave Romans, born at the same birth, who fought against the three Curatii, about 667 years before Christ. This celebrated fight was fought between the hostile camps of the people of Alba and Rome, and on their success depended the victory. In the first attack two of the Horatii were killed, and the only surviving brother, by joining artifice to valor, obtained an honourable trophy. By pretending to fly from the field of battle, he easily separated his antagonists, and, in attacking them one by one, he was enabled to conquer them all. As he returned victorious to Rome, his sister reproached him with the murder of one of the Curatii, to whom she was promised in marriage. He was incensed at the rebuke, and killed his sister. This violence raised the indignation of the people; he was tried and capitally condemned. His eminent services, however, pleaded in his favour; the sentence of death was exchanged for a more moderate, but more ignominious punishment, and he was only compelled to pass under the yoke. A trophy was raised in the Roman forum, on which he suspended the spoils of the conquered Curatii. Cic. de Invent. 2, c. 26. — Liv. 1, c. 24, &c. — Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 3.—A Roman consul, who defeated the Sabines.—A consul, who dedicated the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. During the ceremony he was informed of the death of his son, but he did not forget the sacred character he then bore for the feelings of a parent, and continued the dedication after ordering the body to be buried. Liv. 2.

HORMIADIA, a name which some of the Persian kings bore in the reign of the Roman emperors.

HORENTI, a people of Britain, supposed to be the inhabitants of Eskdale, now in Scotland. Tacit. Ag. 38.

Horratius, a Macedonian soldier, who fought with another private soldier in the sight of the whole army of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 9.

Hortensia, a celebrated Roman lady daughter of the orator Hortensius, whose eloquence she had inherited in the most eminent degree. When the triumvirs had obliged 14,000 women to give upon oath an account of their possessions, to defray the expenses of the state, Hortensia undertook to plead their cause, and was so successful in her attempt, that 1000 of her female fellow-sufferers escaped from the avails of the triumvirate. Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

Hortensia lex, by Q. Hortensius the dictator, A.U.C. 697. It ordered the whole body of the Roman people to pay implicit obedience to whatever was enacted by the commons. The nobility, before this law was enacted, had claimed an absolute exemption.

Horta, a divinity among the Romans, who presided over youth, and patronised all exhortations to virtue and honourable deeds. She is the same as Hernalia.

Horta, or Hortunum, a town of the Sabines, on the confines of the Nar and the Tiber. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.

Q. Hortensius, a celebrated orator, who began to distinguish himself by his eloquence, in the Roman forum, at the age of 19. His friend and successor Cicero speaks with great eulogium of his oratorical powers, and mentions the uncommon extent of his memory. The affected actions of Hortensius at the bar procured him the ridiculous surname of Dionysius, a celebrated stage-dancer at the time. He was pretor and consul, and died 30 years before Christ, in his 63d year. His orations are not extant. Quintilian mentions them as undervaluing the great commendations which Cicero had so liberally bestowed upon them. Hortensius was very rich, and not less than 10,000 estates of Arvianian wine were found in his cellar after his death. He had written pieces of amorous poetry, and amials, all lost. Cic. in Brut. Ad Attic. De Orat., &c.—Varro de R. R. 3, c. 15.—Corbio, a grandson of the orator of the same name, famous for his lasciviousness.—A rich Roman, who asked the elder Cato his wife, to procure children. Cato gave his wife to his friend, and took her again after his death. This behaviour of Cato was highly censured at Rome, and it was observed, that Cato's wife had entered the house of Hortensius very poor, but that she returned to the bed of Cato in the greatest opulence. Plut. in Cat.—A Roman, slain by Antony on his brother's tomb. Id.—A pretor, who gave up Macedonia to Brasias. Id.—One of Sylla's lieutenants. Id.—A Roman, the first who introduced the eating of peasecks at Rome. This was at the feast which he gave: when he was created augur.

Hortona, a town of Italy, on the confines of the Ægæ. Strab. 3, c. 30.

Horus, a son of Isis, one of the deities of the Egyptians.—A king of Assyria.

Hospitalis, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans as the god of hospitality.

Hostilia lex, was enacted A.U.C. 583. By it such as were among the enemies of the republic, or absent when the state required their assistance, were guilty of rapine.

Hostilia, a large town on the Po. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 40.—Plin. 31, c. 12.

Hostius Hostilius, a warlike Roman, presented with a crown of boughs by Romulus, for his intrepid behaviour in a battle. Dionys. Hal.—A consul.—A Latin poet in the age of J. Cæsar, who composed a poem on the wars of Istria. Macrobi. Sat. 4, c. 3 & 5.

Hunni, a people of Sarmatia, who invaded the empire of Rome in the fifth century, and settled in Pannonia, to which they gave the name of Hungary.

Hyacinthis, an annual solemnity at Amyclæ, in Laconia, in honour of Hyacinthus and Apollo. It continued for three days, during which time the grief of the people was so great for the death of Hyacinthus, that they did not adorn their hair with garlands during their festivals, nor eat bread, but fed only upon sweetmeats. They did not even sing peans in honour of Apollo, or observe any of the solemnities which were usual at other sacrifices. On the second day of the festival there were a number of different exhibitions. Youths, with their garments girt about their, entertained the spectators, by playing sometimes upon the flute, or upon the harp, and by singing anapestic songs, in loud, echoing voices, in honour of Apollo. Others passed across the theatre mounted upon horses richly adorned, and, at the same time, choirs of young men came upon the stage singing their uncouth rustic songs, and accompanied by persons who danced at the sound of vocal and instrumental music, according to the ancient custom. Some virgins were also introduced in chariots of wood, covered at the top and magnificently adorned. Others appeared in race chariots. The city began then to be filled with joy, and immense numbers of victims were offered on the altars of Apollo, and the votaries liberally entertained their friends and slaves. During this latter part of the festivity, all were eager to be present at the games, and the city was almost left without inhabitants. Athen. 4.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 219.—Paus. 3, c. 1 & 19.

Hyacinthus, a son of Amyclæ and Diomedæ, greatly beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the former's love, and Zephyrus, incensed at his coldness and indifference, resolved to punish his rival. As Apollo, who was entrusted with the education of Hyacinthus, once played at quoit with his pupil, Zephyrus flew the quoit, as soon as it was thrown by Apollo, upon the head of Hyacinthus, and he was killed with the blow. Apollo was so disconsolate at the death of Hyacinthus, that he changed his blood into a flower, which bore his name, and placed his body among the constellations. The Spartans also established yearly festivals in honour of the nephew of their king. Vid. Hyacinthis. Paus. 3, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 185, &c.—Apollod. 3, &c.

Hyades, five daughters of Atlas king of Mauritania, who were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed by a wild boar, that they pined away and died. They became stars after death, and were placed near Taurus, one of the 12 signs of the Zodiac. They received the name of Hyades from their brother Hyas. Their names are Phœla, Ambrosia, Eudora, Coronis, and Polyxo. To these some have added Thione and Prodicæ, and they maintained that they were daughters of Hyas and Æthra, one of the Oceanides. Euripides calls them daughters of Erechtheus. The ancients supposed that the rising and setting of the Hyades were always attended with much rain, whence the name (see pluv.) Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 165.—Hygin. Fab. 182.—Eurip. in Ixon.

Hyagnis, a Phrygian, father of Mærsyas. He invented the flute. Plut. de Music.

Hyäla, a city at the mouth of the Indus, where the government is the same as at Sparta.—One of Diana's attendant nymphs. Ovid.

Hyanthes, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Boeotia, from king Hyas. Cadmus is sometimes called Hyantius, because he was king of Boeotia. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 147.

Hyantia, an ancient name of Boeotia.

Hyarbita, a man who endeavoured to imitate Timogenes, &c. Horat. 1, ep. 19, v. 15.

Hyas, a son of Atlas of Mauritania by Æthra. His extreme fondness for shooting proved fatal to him, and in his attempts to rob a lioness of her whelps, he was killed by the enraged animal. Some say that he died by the bite of a serpent, and others that he was killed by a wild boar. His sisters mourned his death with such constant lamentations, that Jupiter, in compassion for their sorrow, changed them into stars. Vid. Hyades. Hygin. fab. 192.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 170.

Hybla, a mountain in Sicily, called afterwards Megara, where thyme and odoriferous flowers of all sorts grew in abundance. It is famous for its honey. There is at the foot of the mountain a town of the same name. There is also another near mount Ætna, close to Catania. Paus. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cic. Verr. 3, c. 43, l. 5, c. 25.—Sil. 14, v. 26.—Stat. 14, v. 901.—A city of Attica bears also the name of Hybla.

Hybræas, an orator of Caria, &c. Strab. 13.

Hybrianes, a people near Thrace.

Hyocaron (plur. a), a town of Sicily, the native place of Laïs.

Hyda and Hyde, a town of Lydia, under mount Timolus, which some suppose to be the same as Sardes.

Hydara, a town of Armenia. Strab. 12.

Hydarnes, one of the seven noble Persians who conspired to destroy the usurper Smerdis, &c. Herodot. 3 & 6.—Strab. 11.

Hydaspes, a river of Asia, flowing by Susa. Virg. G. 4, v. 211.—Another in India, now Bekul or Chelum, the boundaries of Alexander's conquests in the east. It falls into the Indus. Curt. 5, c. 2.—Lucan. 8, v. 227.—Horat. 1, ad. 22, v. 7.—Strab. 15.—A friend of Æneas, killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 747.

Hydra, a celebrated monster, which infested the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna in Peloponnesus. It was the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. It had two heads, according to Diodorus; 50, according to Simonides; and nine, according to the more received opinion of Apollodorus, Hyginus, &c. As soon as one of these heads was cut off, two immediately grew up if the wound was not stopped by fire. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy this dreadful monster, and this he easily effected with the assistance of Iolaus, who applied a burning iron to the wounds as soon as one head was cut off. While Hercules was destroying the hydra, Juno, jealous of his glory, sent a sea-crab to bite his foot. This new enemy was soon despatched; and Juno, unable to succeed in her attempts to lessen the fame of Hercules, placed the crab among the constellations, where it is now called the Cancer. The conqueror dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, and, from that circumstance, all the wounds which he gave proved incurable and mortal. Herod. Theog.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Paus. 5, c. 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 69.—Horat. 4, ad. 4, v. 61.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 276, l. 7, v. 638.

Hydrates, a river of India, crossed by Alexander.

Hydrothöria, a festival observed at Athens, called äro tou pöpeiv idäp, from carrying water. It was celebrated in commemoration of those who perished in the deluge of Deucalion and Ogyges.

Hydruntum and Hydrus, a city of Calabria, 50 miles south of Brundisium. As the distance from thence to Greece was only 50 miles, Pyrrhus, and afterwards Varro, Pompey's lieutenant, meditated the building here a bridge across the Adriatic. Though so favourably situated, Hydrus, now called Otranto, is but an insignificant town, scarce containing 3000 inhabitants. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Cic. 15, Att. 21, l. 16, ep. 5.—Lucan. 5, v. 375.

Hydrusa, a town of Attica. Strab. 9.

Hyäla, a town of Lucania. Strab. 6.

Hyompaal, a son of Micipsa, brother to Adherbal, murdered by Jugurtha, after the death of his father. Sallust. de Jug. Bell.

Hyettus, a town of Boeotia. Paus. 9, c. 24.

Hygeia, or Hygiea, the goddess of health, daughter of Æsculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients. Her statues represented her with a veil, and the matrons usually consecrated their locks to her. She was also represented on monuments as a young woman holding a serpent in one hand, and in the other a cup, out of which the serpent sometimes drank. According to some authors, Hygeia is the same as Miüerva, who received that name from Pericles, who erected her a statue, because in a dream she had told him the means of curing an architect, whose assistance he wanted to build a temple. Plat. in Pericl.—Paus. 7, c. 23.

Hygiæna, a town of Peloponnesus.

C. Jul. Hyginus, a grammarian, one of the freedmen of Augustus. He was a native of Alexandria; or, according to some, he was a Spaniard, very intimate with Ovid. He was appointed librarian to the library of mount Palatine, and he was able to maintain himself by the liberality of C. Licinius. He wrote a mythological history, which he called fables, and Poeticæ Astronomicæ, besides treatises on the cities of Italy, on such Roman families as were descended from the Trojans, a book on agriculture, commentaries on Virgil, the lives of great men, &c., now lost. The best edition of Hyginus is that of Munkers, 2 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1681. These compositions have been greatly mutilated, and their incorrectness and their bad Latinity have induced some to suppose that they are spurious. Sueton. de Gram.

Hyä and Hyäla, a river of Mysia, where Hylas was drowned. Virg. G. 3, v. 6.—A colony of Phocis.

Hylæus, a name given to some centaurs, one of whom was killed by Hercules on mount Pholoe. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 294.—Another, by Theseus, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Stat. Th. 7, v. 267.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 378.—Another, killed by Bacchus. Stat. Th. 6, v. 530.—Virg. G. 9, v. 457.—A fourth, killed by Atalanta. Apollod. 3.—One of Actæon's dogs.

Hylas, a son of Thiodamas king of Mysia and Menedice, stolen away by Hercules, and carried on board the ship Argos to Colchis. On the Asiatic coast the Argonauts landed to take a supply of fresh water, and Hylas, following the example of his companions, went to the fountain with a pitcher, and fell into the water and was drowned. The poets have embellished this tragical story, by saying that the nymphs of the river, enamoured of the beautiful Hylas, carried him away; and that Hercules, disconsolate at the loss of his favourite youth, filled the woods and mountains with his complaints, and at last abandoned the Argonautic expedition to go and seek him. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 271.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—Propert. 1, el. 20.—A river of Bithynia. Plin. 5, c. 32.

Hylax, a dog mentioned in Virg. Ecl. 8.

Hylas, a river of Magna Græcia.

Hyllaion, a part of Peloponnesus, near Messenia.

Hyllus, a son of Hercules and Dejanira, who, soon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was persecuted by the envy of Eurystheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponnesus. The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the rest of the Heraclidae, and marched against Eurystheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Eurystheus, and sent his head to Alcmena his grandmother. Some time after he attempted to recover the Peloponnesus with the Heraclidae, and was killed in single combat by Echemus king of Arcadia. Vid. Heraclidae, Hercules. Herodot. 7, c. 204, &c.—Strab. 9.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 279.—A river of Lydia, flowing into the Hærnus. It is called also Phryx. Liv. 37, c. 38.—Herodot. 1, c. 180.

Hylonome, the wife of Cyllarus, who killed herself the moment her husband was murdered by the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 405.

Hylôphagi, a people of Æthiopia. Diod. 3.

Hymenæus and Hymen, the god of marriage among the Greeks, was son of Bacchus and Venus, or, according to others, of Apollo and one of the muses. Hymenæus, according to the more received opinions, was a young Athenian of extraordinary beauty, but ignoble origin. He became enamoured of the daughter of one of the richest and noblest of his countrymen, and, as the rank and elevation of his mistress removed him from her presence and conversation, he contented himself to follow her wherever she went. In a certain procession, in which all the matrons of Athens went to Eleusis, Hymenæus, to accompany his mistress, disguised himself in woman's clothes, and joined the religious troop. His youth, and the fairness of his features, favoured his disguise. A great part of the procession was seized by the sudden arrival of some pirates, and Hymenæus, who shared the captivity of his mistress, encouraged his female companions, and assassinated their ravishers while they were asleep. Immediately after this, Hymenæus repaired to Athens, and promised to restore to liberty the matrons who had been enslaved, provided he was allowed to marry one among them who was the object of his passion. The Athenians consented, and Hymenæus experienced so much felicity in his marriage state, that the people of Athens instituted festivals in his honour, and solemnly invoked him at their nuptials, as the Latins did their Thalassius. Hymen was generally represented as crowned with flowers, chiefly with marjoram or roses, and holding a burning torch in one hand, and in the other a vest of a purple colour. It was supposed that he always attended at nuptials; for, if not, matrimonial connections were fatal, and ended in the most dreadful calamities; and hence people ran about calling aloud, "Hymen! Hymen!" &c. Ovid. Metab. Met. 12, v. 215.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Catull. ep. 62.

Hymettus, a mountain of Attica, about 22 miles in circumference, and about two miles from Athens, still famous for its bees and excellent honey. There was also a quarry of marble there. Jupiter had there a temple; whence he is called Hymetticus. Strab. 9.—Ital. 2, v. 228. l. 14, v. 200.—Plin. 36, c. 3.—Horat. 2, od. 18, v. 3. l. 2, sat. 2, v. 15.—Cic. 2, Fin. 34.

Hypæpa, or Ipepa, now Berki, a town of Lydia, sacred to Venus, between mount Tmolus and the Caystrus. Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 152.

Hypæsia, a country of Peloponnesus.

Hypænia, a river of European Scythia, now called Bog, which falls into the Borysthenes, and with it into the Euxine. Herodot. 4, c. 52, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 285.—A river of India.—Another of Pontus. Cic. Tusc. 2, c. 39.—A Trojan who joined himself to Æneas, and was killed by his own people, who took him for one of the enemy in the night that Troy was burned by the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 428.

Hyparinus, a son of Dion, who reigned at Syracuse for two years after his father.—The father of Dion.

Hypætes, a river of Sicily, near Camarina. Ital. 14, v. 237.

Hypætha, a town of Thessaly. Liv. 47, c. 95.

Hypatia, a native of Alexandria celebrated for her beauty, her virtues, and her great erudition. She was assassinated 415 A.D.

Hypenor, a Trojan killed by Diomedes at Troy. Homer. Il. 5, v. 144.

Hyperbatus, a pretor of the Achæans, B.C. 274.

Hyperbius, a son of Ægyptus. Apollod.

Hyperborei, a nation in the northern parts of Europe and Asia, who were said to live to an incredible age, even to 1000 years, and in the enjoyment of all possible felicity. The sun was said to rise and set to them but once a year, and therefore, perhaps, they are placed by Virgil under the north pole. The word signifies people who inhabit beyond the wind Boreas. Thrace was the residence of Boreas, according to the ancients. Whenever the Hyperboreans made offerings they always sent them towards the south, and the people of Dodona were the first of the Greeks who received them. The word Hyperboreans is applied, in general, to all those who inhabit any cold climate. Plin. 4, c. 12. l. 6, c. 17.—Mela. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 240. l. 3, v. 169 & 381.—Herodot. 4, c. 13, &c.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 23. l. 4, c. 12.

Hyperæa and Hyperia, a fountain of Thessaly, with a town of the same name. Strab. 9.—Another in Messenia, in Peloponnesus. Flacc. 1, v. 375.

Hyperæa, a town of Achaia. Strab. 8.

Hyperides, an Athenian orator, disciple to Plato and Socrates, and long the rival of Demosthenes. His father's name was Glaucippus. He distinguished himself by his eloquence and the active part which he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the unfortunate battle of Crænon, he was taken alive, and, that he might not be compelled to betray the secrets of his country, he cut off his tongue. He was put to death by order of Antipater, B.C. 322. Only one of his numerous orations remains, admired for the sweetness and elegance of his style. It is said that Hyperides once defended the courtesan Phryne who was accused of impiety, and that when he saw his eloquence ineffectual, he unveiled the bosom of his client, upon which the judges, influenced by the sight of her beauty, acquitted her. Plut. in Demost.—Cic. in Orat. 1, 8c.—Quintil. 10, 8c.

Hyperion, a son of Coelus and Terra, who married Thes, by whom he had Aurora, the sun, and moon. Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the sun itself. Herod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1 & 2.—Homer. Hym. ad Ap.—A son of Pitan. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Hypermnestra, one of the 50 daughters of Danaus, who married Lynceus son of Egyptus. She disobeyed her father's bloody commands, who had ordered her to murder her husband the first night of her nuptials, and suffered Lynceus to escape unhurt from the bridal bed. Her father summoned her to appear before a tribunal for her disobedience, but the people acquitted her, and Danaus was reconciled to her and her husband, to whom he left his kingdom at his death. Some say that Lynceus returned to Argos with an army, and that he conquered and put to death his father-in-law, and usurped his crown. Virg. Danaides. Pans. 2, c. 19.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.—A daughter of Thestius. Apollod.

Hyperochus, a man who wrote a poetical history of Cuma. Pans. 10, c. 12.

Hyperæus, a mountain of Campania. Plut. in Syll.

Hypsa, now Belici, a river of Sicily, falling into the Cranusus, and then into the Mediterranean near Selinus. Ital. 14, v. 208.

Hypsa, a Roman matron, of the family of the Plautii. She was blind, according to Horace; or, perhaps, was partial to some lover, who was recommended neither by personal nor mental excellence. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 91.

Hypseor, a priest of the Scamander, killed during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.

Hypseus, a son of the river Peneus.—A pleader at the Roman bar before the age of Cicero. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 36.

Hypsiarctia, the wife of Mithridates, who accompanied her husband in man's clothes, when he fled before Pompey. Plut. in Pomp.

Hypsiarctes, a Phœnician who wrote a history of his country, in the Phœnician language. This history was saved from the flames of Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and translated into Greek.

Hypsipides, a Macedonian in Alexander's army, famous for his friendship for Menedemus, &c. Curt. 7, c. 7.

Hypsipyle, a queen of Lemnos, daughter of Thoas and Myrine. During her reign, Venus, whose altars had been universally slighted, punished the Lemnian women, and rendered their mouths and breath so extremely offensive to the smell, that their husbands abandoned them, and gave themselves up to some female slaves, whom they had taken in a war against Thracæ. This contempt was highly resented by all the women of Lemnos, and they resolved on revenge, and all unanimously put to death their male relations, Hypsipyle alone excepted, who spared the life of her father Thoas. Soon after this cruel murder, the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, in their expedition to Colchis, and remained for some time in the island. During their stay the Argonauts rendered the Lemnian women mothers, and Jason, the chief of the Argonautic expedition, left Hypsipyle pregnant at his departure, and promised her eternal fidelity. Hæmi- pyle brought twins, Euneus and Nebrophonus, whom some have called Deiphilus or Thoas. Jason forgot his vows and promises to Hypsipyle, and the unfortunate queen was soon after forced to leave her kingdom by the Lemnian women, who conspired against her life, still mindful that Thoas had been preserved by means of his daughter. Hypsipyle, in her flight, was seized by pirates, and sold to Lycurgus king of Nemea. She was entrusted with the care of Archimorus the son of Lycurgus; and, when the Argives marched against Thebes, they met Hypsipyle, and obliged her to show them a fountain, where they might quench their thirst. To do this more expeditiously, she laid down the child on the grass, and in her absence he was killed by a serpent. Lycurgus attempted to revenge the death of his son, but Hypsipyle was screened from his resentment by Adrastus the leader of the Argives. Ovid. Heroid. 6.—Apollon. 1.—Stat. 5, Theb.—Plac. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3. c. 6.—Hygin. Fab. 15, 74, &c. Virg. Archimorus.

Hyrcania, a large country of Asia, at the north of Parthia, and at the west of Media, abounding in serpents, wild beasts, &c. It is very mountainous, and unfit for drawing a cavalry in order of battle. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 367.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 45.—Strab. 2 & 11.—A town of Lydia, destroyed by a violent earthquake in the age of Tiberius. Liv. 37, c. 38.

Hyrcanum mare, a large sea, called also Caspian. Virg. Caspium mare.

Hyrcanus, a name common to some of the high priests of Judea. Josephus.

Hyria, a country of Bœotia, near Aulis, with a lake, river, and town of the same name. It is more probably situate near Tempe. It received its name from Hyrie, a woman who wept so much for the loss of her son, that she was changed into a fountain. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 372.—Heroid. 7, c. 170.—A town of Iauria, on the Calycadnus.

Hyrieus, or Hyron, a peasant, or, as some say, a prince of Tanagra, son of Neptune and Alcione, who kindly entertained Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury, when travelling over Bœotia. Being childless, he asked of the gods to give him a son without his marrying, as he promised his wife, who was lately dead, and whom he tenderly loved, that he never would marry again. The gods, to reward the hospitality of Hyrieus, made water in the hide of a bull, which had been sacrificed the day before to their divinity, and they ordered him to wrap it up and bury it in the ground for nine months. At the expiration of the nine months, Hyrieus opened the earth, and found a beautiful child in the bull's hide, whom he called Orion. Virg. Orion.

Hyrimina, a town of Elis in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8.

Hyrrneto and Hyrrnetho, a daughter of Temanus king of Argos, who married Deyphon son of Coleus. She was the favourite of her father, who greatly enriched her husband. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Pans. 2, c. 19.

Hyrrinthium, a plain of Argos, near Epidaurus, fertile in olives. Strab. 6.

Hyrtæus, a Trojan of mount Ida, father to Nisus, one of the companions of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 177 & 466. Hence the patronymic of Hyrtæides is applied to Nisus. It is also applied to Hippocoon. Id. 5, v. 459.

Hyria, a town of Bœotia, built by Nycteus, Antipes father.—A village of Argos.—A city of Arcadia.—The royal residence of the king of Parthia.

Hyspa, a river of Sicily. Ital. 24, v. 228.
Hysanus and Hysal, a port and river of Capadocia on the Euxine sea.

Hystaspes, a noble Persian, of the family of the Achæmenides. His father's name was Arsames. His son Darius reigned in Persia after the murder of the usurper Smerdis. It is said by Ctesias that he wished to be carried to see the royal monument which his son had built between two mountains. The priests who carried him, as reported, slipped the cord with which he was suspended in ascending the mountain, and he died of the fall. Hystaspes was the first who introduced the learning and mysteries of the Indian Brachmans into Persia, and to his researches in India the sciences were greatly indebted, particularly in Persia. Darius is called Hystaspes, or son of Hystaspes, to distinguish him from his royal successors of the same name. Herodot. 1, c. 209. l. 5, c. 83.—Ctesias, Fragm.

Hysticus. Vid. Histicus.

JA, the daughter of Midas, who married Atys, &c.

Iacchus, a surname of Bacchus, ab iaxiv, from the noise and shouts which the bacchanals raised at the festivals of this deity. Virg. Ecl. 6, G. 1, v. 166.—Ovid. Met. 4, 15.—Some suppose him to be a son of Ceres; because in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries, the word Iacchus was frequently repeated. Herodot. 8, c. 65.—Paus. 1, c. 2.

Iader, a river of Dalmatia.

Ialmus, a wretched singer, son of the muse Calliope. Athen. 14.

Ialmenus, a son of Mars and Astyoche, who went to the Trojan war with his brother Ascalaphus, with 30 ships, at the head of the inhabitants of Orchomeno and Arpedona, in Bœotia. Paus. 2, c. 37.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 19.

Ialysus, a town of Rhodes, built by Ialysus, of whom Protegenes was making a beautiful painting when Demetrius Poliorcetes took Rhodes. The Telchines were born there. Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 9.—Plin. 33, c. 6.—Cic. 2, ad Attic. ep. 22.—Plut. in Dom.—Ælian. 12, c. 5.

Iambe, a servant-maid of Metanira, wife of Cœlus king of Eleusis, who tried to exhilarate Ceres, when she travelled over Attica in quest of her daughter Proserpine. From the jokes and stories which she made use of, free and satirical verses have been called Iambicæ. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Iamblicus, a Greek author who wrote the life of Pythagoras, and the history of his followers, an exhortation to philosophy, a treatise against Porphyry's letter on the mysteries of the Egyptians, &c. He was a great favourite with the emperor Julian, and died A.D. 303.

Iamonus, a Trojan killed by Leonteus. Homer. Il. 12, v. 139 & 193.

Iamides, certain prophets among the Greeks, descended from Iamus, a son of Apollo, who received the gift of prophecy from his father, which remained among his posterity. Paus. 6, c. 2.

Janiculum and Janicularius mons, one of the seven hills at Rome joined to the city by Ancus Martius, and made a kind of citadel, to protect the place against an invasion. This hill [Vid. Jannal, which was on the opposite shore of the Tiber, was joined to the city by the bridge Subicius, the first ever built across the river, and perhaps in Italy. It was less inhabited than the other parts of the city, on account of the grossness of the air, though from its top the eye could have a commanding view of the whole city. It is famous for the burial of king Numa and of the poet Ialcius. Porcenna king of Etruria pitched his camp on mount Janiculum, and the senators took refuge there in the civil wars, to avoid the resentment of Octavius. Liv. 1, c. 33, &c.—Dio. 47.—Ovid. 1, Fast. v. 246.—Virg. 8, v. 358.—Mart. 4, ep. 64. l. 7, ep. 16.

Janira, one of the Nereides.

Janthe, a girl of Crete, who married Iphis. Vid. Iphis. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 714, &c.

Janthes, one of the Oceanides.—One of the Nereides. Paus. 4, c. 30.—Homer. Il. 8, v. 47.

Janus, the most ancient king who reigned in Italy. He was a native of Thessaly, and son of Apollo, according to some. He came to Italy, where he planted a colony and built a small town on the river Tiber, which he called Janiculum. Some authors make him son of Cœlus and Hecate; and others make him a native of Athens. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his son Jupiter, came to Italy, where Janus received him with much hospitality, and made him his colleague on the throne. Janus is represented with two faces, because he was acquainted with the past and the future; or, according to others, because he was taken for the sun, who opens the day at his rising, and shuts it at his setting. Some statues represented Janus with four heads. He sometimes appeared with a beard, and sometimes without. In religious ceremonies, his name was always invoked the first, because he presides over all gates and avenues, and it is through him only that prayers can reach the immortal gods. From that circumstance he often appears with a key in his right hand, and a rod in his left. Sometimes he holds the number of 300 in one hand, and in the other 65, to show that he presides over the year, of which the first month bears his name. Some suppose that he is the same as the world, or Cœlus; and from that circumstance they call him Janus, ab œvndo, because of the revolution of the heavens. He was called by different names, such as Conversus, a conversendo, because he presided over generation; Quirinus or Martialis, because he presided over war. He is also called Patuleius and Classius, because the gates of his temples were open during the time of war, and shut in time of peace. He was chiefly worshipped among the Romans, where he had many temples, some erected to Janus Bifrons, others to Janus Quadrifrons. The temples of Quadrifrons were built with four equal sides, with a door and three windows on each side. The four doors were the emblems of the four seasons of the year, and the three windows in each of the sides the three months in each season, and, all together, the 12 months of the year. Janus was generally represented in statues as a young man. After death Janus was ranked among the gods, for his popularity and the civilisation which he had introduced among the wild inhabitants of Italy. His temple, which was always open in times of war, was shut only three times during above 700 years, under Numa, 234 B.C., and under Augustus; and during that long period of time, the Romans were continually employed in war. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 65, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 607.—Varro de L. L. 1.—Macrob. Sat. 1.—A street at Rome near the temple of Janus. It was generally frequented by usurers and money-brokers, and booksellers also kept their shops there. Horat. 1, ep. 1.

Japetides, a musician at the nuptials of Perseus and Andromeda. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 121.

Japetus, a son of Coelus or Titan by Terra, who married Asia, or, according to others, Clymene, by whom he had Atlas, Menestius, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. The Greeks looked upon him as the father of all mankind, and therefore from his antiquity old men were frequently called Japeti. His sons received the patronymic of Japetionides. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 631.—Hesiod. Theog. 126 & 508.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

Japis, an Ætolian, who founded a city upon the banks of the Timavus. Virg. G. 3, v. 475.—A Trojan, favourite of Apollo, from whom he received the knowledge of the power of medicinal herbs. Id. Æn. 12, v. 307.

Japygia, a district of Illyricum, now Carniola. Liv. 43, c. 5.—Tibull. 4, v. 109.—Cic. Balb. 14.

Japygia, a country on the confines of Italy, situated in the peninsula, between Tarentum and Brundisium. It is called by some Messapia, Pewcetta, and Salentinum. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Strab. 6.

Japyx, a son of Dædalus, who conquered a part of Italy, which he called Japygia. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 458.—A wind which blows from Apulia, and is favourable to such as sail from Italy towards Greece. It was nearly the same as the Caurus of the Greeks. Horat. 1, od. 3, v. 4, l. 3, od. 7, v. 20.

Iarbas, a son of Jupiter and Garamantis, king of Gætulia, from whom Dido bought land to build Carthage. He courted Dido, but the arrival of Æneas prevented his success, and the queen, rather than marry Iarbas, destroyed herself. Vid. Dido. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 36, &c.—Justin. 18, c. 6.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 552.

Iarchas and Jarchas, a celebrated Indian philosopher. His seven rings are famous for their power of restoring old men to the bloom and vigour of youth, according to the tradition of Philostr. in Apoll.

Iardanus, a Lydian, father of Omphale the mistress of Hercules. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—A river of Arcadia.—Another in Crete. Homer. Il. 7.

Iasides, a patronymic given to Palinurus, as descended from a person of the name of Jasius. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 843.—Also of Jasus. Id. 12, v. 392.

Iasion and Iæsius, a son of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, who reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himself to agriculture. He married the goddess Cybele or Ceres, and all the gods were present at the celebration of his nuptials. He had by Ceres two sons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom some have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worship and mysteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had also a daughter, whom he exposed as soon as born, saying that he would raise only male children. The child, who was suckled by a she-bear and preserved, rendered herself famous afterwards under the name of Atalanta. Jasion was killed with a thunderbolt of Jupiter, and ranked among the gods after death by the inhabitants of Arcadia. Herod. Theog. 973.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 168.—Hygin. Poet. 2, c. 4.

Iæsis, a name given to Atalanta daughter of Jasion.

Iasius, a son of Abas king of Argos.—A son of Jupiter. Vid. Iasion.

JASON, a celebrated hero, son of Alcimede daughter of Phylacus, by Æson the son of Cretheus and Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, before her connection with Cretheus the son of Æolus, had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune. Æson was king of Iolchos, and at his death the throne was usurped by Pelias, and Æson the lawful successor was driven to retirement and obscurity. The education of young Jason was entrusted to the care of the centaur Chiron, and he was removed from the presence of the usurper, who had been informed by an oracle that one of the descendants of Æolus would dethrone him. After he had made the most rapid progress in every branch of science, Jason left the centaur, and by his advice went to consult the oracle. He was ordered to go to Iolchos his native country, covered with the spoils of a leopard, and dressed in the garments of a Magneſian. In his journey he was stopped by the inundation of the river Evenus or Empeus, over which he was carried by Juno, who had changed herself into an old woman. In crossing the stream he lost one of his sandals, and at his arrival at Iolchos, the singularity of his dress and the fairness of his complexion attracted the notice of the people, and drew a crowd around him in the market-place. Pelias came to see him with the rest, and as he had been warned by the oracle to beware of a man who should appear at Iolchos with one foot bare and the other shod, the appearance of Jason, who had lost one of his sandals, alarmed him. His terrors were soon after augmented. Jason, accompanied by his friends, repaired to the palace of Pelias, and boldly demanded the kingdom which he had unjustly usurped. The boldness and popularity of Jason intimidated Pelias; he was unwilling to abdicate the crown, and yet he feared the resentment of his adversary. As Jason was young and ambitious of glory, Pelias, at once to remove his immediate claims to the crown, reminded him that Ætes king of Colchis had severely treated and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus. He observed that such a treatment called aloud for punishment, and that the undertaking would be accompanied with much glory and fame. He further added, that his old age had prevented him from avenging the death of Phryxus, and that if Jason would undertake the expedition, he would resign to him the crown of Iolchos, when he returned victorious from Colchis. Jason readily accepted a proposal which seemed to promise such military fame. His intended expedition was made known in every part of Greece, and the youngest and the bravest of the Greeks assembled to accompany him, and share his toils and glory. They embarked on board a ship called Argo, and after a series of adventures they arrived at Colchis. Vid. Argonautæ. Ætes promised to restore the golden fleece, which was the cause of the death of Phryxus, and of the voyage of the Argonauts, provided they submitted to his conditions. Jason was to tame bulls which breathed flames, and which had feet and horns of brass, and to plough with them a field sacred to Mars. After this he was to sow in the ground the teeth of a serpent, from which armed men would arise, whose fury would be converted against him who ploughed the field. He was also to kill a monstrous dragon which watched night and day at the foot of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended. All were concerned for the fate of the Argonauts; but Juno, who watched with an anxious eye over the safety of Jason, extricated them from all these difficulties. Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with Jason, and as her knowledge of herbs, enchantments, and incantations was uncommon, she pledged herself to deliver her lover from all his dangers if he promised her eternal fidelity. Jason, not insensible to her charms and to her promise, vowed eternal fidelity in the temple of Hecate, and received from Medea whatever instruments and herbs could protect him against the approaching dangers. He appeared in the field of Mars, he tamed the fury of the oxen, ploughed the plain, and sowed the dragon's teeth. Immediately an army of men sprang from the field, and ran towards Jason. He threw a stone among them, and they fell one upon the other till all were totally destroyed. The vigilance of the dragon was lulled to sleep by the power of herbs, and Jason took from the tree the celebrated golden fleece, which was the sole object of his voyage. These actions were all performed in the presence of Æetes and his people, who were all equally astonished at the boldness and success of Jason. After this celebrated conquest, Jason immediately set sail for Europe with Medea, who had been so instrumental in his preservation. Upon this Æetes, desirous to revenge the perfidy of his daughter Medea, sent his son Absyrtus to pursue the fugitives. Medea killed her brother, and strewed his limbs in her father's way, that she might more easily escape, while he was employed in collecting the mangled body of his son. Vid. Absyrtus. The return of the Argonauts in Thessaly was celebrated with universal festivity; but Æson, Jason's father, was unable to attend on account of the infirmities of old age. This obstruction was removed, and Medea, at the request of her husband, restored Æson to the vigour and sprightliness of youth. Vid. Æson. Pelias the usurper of the crown of Iolchos wished also to see himself restored to the flower of youth, and his daughters, persuaded by Medea, who wished to avenge her husband's wrongs, cut his body to pieces, and placed his limbs in a cauldron of boiling water. Their credulity was severely punished. Medea suffered the flesh to be consumed to the bones, and Pelias was never restored to life. This inhuman action drew the resentment of the populace upon Medea, and she fled to Corinth with her husband Jason, where they lived in perfect union and love during 10 successive years. Jason's partiality for Glauce the daughter of the king of the country afterwards disturbed their matrimonial happiness, and Medea was divorced, that Jason might more freely indulge his amorous propensities. This infidelity was severely revenged by Medea [Vid. Glauce], who destroyed her children in the presence of their father. Vid. Medea. After this separation from Medea, Jason lived an unsettled and melancholy life. As he was one day reposing himself by the side of the ship which had carried him to Colchis, a beam fell upon his head, and he was crushed to death. This tragical event had been predicted to him before by Medea, according to the relation of some authors. Some say that he afterwards returned to Colchis, where he seized the kingdom, and reigned in great security. *Eurip. in Med.—Ovid. Ibærus, a river of Spain, now called Ebro, which, after the conclusion of the first Punic war, separated the Roman from the Carthaginian possessions in that country. Lucan. 4, v. 335.—Plin. 3, c. 3.—Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 50.—A river of Iberia in Asia, flowing from mount Caucasus into the Cyrus. Strab. 3.—A fabulous king of Spain.

Ibi, an Indian nation.

Ibis, a poem of the poet Callimachus, in which he bitterly satirizes the ingratitude of his pupil the poet Apollonius. Ovid had also written a poem which bears the same name, and which, in the same satirical language, seems, according to the opinion of some, to inveigh bitterly against Hyginus the supposed hero of the composition. Suidas.

Ibycus, a lyric poet of Rhegium, about 540 years before Christ. He was murdered by robbers, and at the moment of death he implored the assistance of some cranes which at that moment flew over his head. Some time after, as the murderers were in the market-place, one of them observed some cranes in the air, and said to his companions, αἱ ἰβυκοὶ ἐβόων ὑμῶν, there are the birds that are conscious of the death of Ibycus. These words and the recent murder of Ibycus raised suspicions in the people; the assassins were seized and tortured, and they confessed their guilt. Cic. Tus. 4, c. 43.—Ælian. V. H.—The husband of Chloris, whom Horace ridicules. 3, od. 15.

Icaria, a small island in the Ægean sea, between Chio, Samos, and Myconus, where the body of Icarus was thrown by the waves, and buried by Hercules. Plin. 5, c. 2.—Meta, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 10 & 14.

Icaris and Icarotlis, a name given to Penelope as daughter of Icarus.

Icarium mare, a part of the Ægean sea near the islands of Mycone and Gyarus. Vid. Icarus.

Iocrisus, an Athenian, father of Erigone. He gave wine to some peasants, who drank it with the greatest avidity, ignorant of its intoxicating nature. They were soon deprived of their reason, and the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbours were immediately turned upon Icarus, who perished by their hands. After death he was honoured with public festivals, and his daughter was led to discover the place of his burial by means of his faithful dog Mæra. Erigone hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation called Virgo. Icarus was changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mæra into the star Canis. Hygin. Fab. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—A son of Cæhalus of Lacedæmon. He gave his daughter Penelope in marriage to Ulysses, king of Ithaca, but he was so tenderly attached to her, that he wished her husband to settle at Lacedæmon. Ulysses refused, and when he saw the earnest petitions of Icarus, he told Penelope as they were going to embark, that she might choose freely either to follow him to Ithaca, or to remain with her father. Penelope blushed in the deepest silence, and covered her head with her veil. Icarus upon this permitted his daughter to go to Ithaca, and immediately erected a temple to the goddess of modesty, on the spot where Penelope had covered her blushes with her veil. Hom. Od. 16, v. 435.

Icarus, a son of Dædalus, who, with his father, flew with wings from Crete to escape the resentment of Minos. His flight being too high, proved fatal to him; the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into that part of the Ægean sea which was called after his name. Vid. Dædalus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 178, &c.—A mountain of Attica.

Icius, a lieutenant of Agrippa in Sicily. Horace writes to him, 1, od. 29, and ridicules him for abandoning the pursuits of philosophy and the muses for military employments.—One of the R. 2, in Gaul, ambassador to Cæsar. Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 3.

Ictios, one of the seas of Somnus, who changed himself into all sorts of animals, whence the name (ικτιος, similit.). Ovid. Met. 11, v. 640.

Iceni, a people of Britain who submitted to the Roman power. They inhabited the modern counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, &c. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 21.—Cæs. G. 3, c. 21.

Ictas, a man who obtained the supreme power at Syracuse after the death of Dion. He attempted to assassinate Timoleon, for which he was conquered, &c., B.C. 340. C. Nep. in Tim.

Ichnæ, a town of Macedonia, whence Themis and Nemesis are called Ichnæa. Hom. in Apoll.

Ichnissa, an ancient name of Sardinia, which it received from its likeness to a human foot. Paus. 10, c. 17.—Ital. 12, v. 358.—Plin. 3, c. 7.

Ichonophys, a priest of Heliopolis, at whose house Eudoxus resided when he visited Egypt with Plato. Diog.

Ichthyophagi, a people of Æthiopia, who received this name from their eating fishes. There was also an Indian nation of the same name, who made their houses with the beams of fishes. Diod. 3.—Strab. 2 & 12.—Plin. 6, c. 27. L. 15, c. 7.

Ichthys, a promontory of Elis in Achaia. Strab. 11.

L. Icilius, a tribune of the people who made a law, A.U.C. 397, by which mount Aventine was given to the Roman people to build houses upon. Liv. 3, c. 54.—A tribune who made a law, A.U.C. 261, that forbade any man to oppose or interrupt a tribune while he was speaking in an assembly. Liv. 2, c. 58.—A tribune who signalized himself by his inveterate enmity against the Roman senate. He took an active part in the management of affairs after the murder of Virginia, &c.

Ictus, a harbour in Gaul, on the modern straits of Dover, from which Cæsar crossed into Britain.

Iconium, the capital of Lycaonia, now Ko-niack. Plin. 5, c. 27.

Icos, a small island near Eubœa. Strab. 9.

Ictinus, a celebrated architect, 430 years B.C. He built a famous temple to Minerva at Athens, &c.

Iotumulorum vicus, a place at the foot of the Alps, abounding in gold mines.

Iculinna, a town of Gaul, now Angoulesme, on the Charente.

Ida, a nymph of Crete, who went into Phrygia, where she gave her name to a mountain of that country. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 177.—The mother of Mings II.—A celebrated mountain, or more properly a ridge of mountains in Troas, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Troy. The abundance of its waters became the source of many rivers, and particularly of the Simois, Scamander, Æsepus, Granicus, &c. It was on mount Ida that the shepherd Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to the goddess Venus. It was covered with green woods, and the elevation of its top opened a fine extensive view of the Hellespont and the adjacent countries, from which reason the poets say that it was frequented by the gods during the Trojan war. Strab. 13.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Hom. Il. 14, v. 283.—Virg. Æn. 3, l. 5, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 79.—Horat. 3, od. 11.—A mountain of Crete, the highest in the island, where it was reported that Jupiter was educated by the Corybantæ, who, on that account, were called Idaei. Strab. 10.

Idæa, the surname of Cybele, because she was worshipped on mount Ida. Lucret. 2, v. 611.

Idæus, a surname of Jupiter.—An arm-bearer and charioteer of king Priam, killed during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 487.—One of the attendants of Ascanius. Id. 9, v. 500.

Idalis, the country round mount Ida. Lucan. 3, v. 204.

Idælus, a mountain of Cyprus, at the foot of which is Idalium, a town with a grove sacred to Venus, who was called Idæa. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 685.—Cæsar. 27 & 66.—Propert. 2, el. 13.

Idanthyrus, a powerful king of Scythia, who refused to give his daughter in marriage to Darius I. king of Persia. This refusal was the cause of a war between the two nations, and Darius marched against Idanthyrus, at the head of 700,000 men. He was defeated, and retired to Persia, after an inglorious campaign. Strab. 13.

Idarnes, an officer of Darius, by whose negligence the Macedonians took Miletus. Curt. 4, c. 5.

Idas, a son of Aphareus and Arane, famous for his valour and military glory. He was among the Argonauts, and married Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus king of Etolia. Marpessa was carried away by Apollo, and Idas pursued his wife's ravisher with bows and arrows, and obliged him to restore her. Vid. Marpessa. According to Apollodorus, Idas, with his brother Lynceus, associated with Pollux and Castor to carry away some flocks; but when they had obtained a sufficient quantity of plunder, they refused to divide it into equal shares. This provoked the sons of Leda. Lynceus was killed by Castor, and Idas, to revenge his brother's death, immediately killed Castor, and in his turn perished by the hand of Pollux. According to Ovid and Pausanias, the quarrel between the sons of Leda and those of Aphrodite arose from a more tender cause. Idas and Lynceus, as they say, were going to celebrate their nuptials with Phoebe and Hilaria the two daughters of Leucippus; but Castor and Pollux, who had been invited to partake the common festivity, offered violence to the brides, and carried them away. Idas and Lynceus fell in the attempt to recover their wives. Hom. Il. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 100, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 700.—Apollod. 1. 8. 3.—Paus. 4. c. 2. l. 5, c. 18.—A son of Agrippus.—A Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 575.

Idea, or Idaea, a daughter of Dardanus, who became the second wife of Phineus king of Bithynia, and abused the confidence reposed in her by her husband. Virg. Phineus.—The mother of Tenebris by Scamander. Apollod.

Idessa, a town of Iberia on the confines of Colchis. Strab. 11.

Idice, a small river of Italy, near Idice, near Boeotia.

Idistawiana, a plain, now Hastenbeck, where Germanicus defeated Arminius, near Oldendorf, on the Weser, in Westphalia. Tact. A. 9, c. 25.

Idmon, son of Apollo and Asteria, or, as some say, of Cyrene, was the prophet of the Argonauts. He was killed in hunting a wild boar in Bithynia, where his body received a magnificent funeral. He had predicted the time and manner of his own death. Apollod. 1, c. 2.—Oppian.—A dyer of Colophon, father to Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 8.—A man of Cynicis, killed by Hercules. Æn. 3.—A son of Agrippus, killed by his wife. Virg. Danaides.

Idoneia, a daughter of Phereus, who married Amythaon.

Idonemonis, succeeded his father Democleon on the throne of Crete, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, with a fleet of 90 ships. During this celebrated war he rendered himself famous by his valour, and slaughtered many of the enemy. At his return he made a vow to Neptune in a dangerous tempest, that if he escaped from the fury of the seas and storms, he would offer to the god whatever living creature first presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. This was no other than his own son, who came to congratulate his father upon his safe return. Idonemonis performed his promise to the god, and the inhumanity and rancour of his sacrifice rendered him as odious in the eyes of his subjects, that he left Crete, and migrated in quest of a settlement. He came to Italy, and founded a city on the coast of Calabria, which he called Salernum. He died in an extreme old age, after he had had the satisfaction of seeing his new kingdom flourish, and his subjects happy. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophan, v. 1217, Idonemonis, during his absence in the Trojan war, entrusted the management of his kingdom to Leucos, to whom he promised his daughter Clitethera in marriage at his return. Leucos at first governed with moderation; but he was persuaded by Nauplius king of Eubœa to put to death Medea the wife of his master, with her daughter Clitethera, and to seize the kingdom. After these violent measures, he strengthened himself on the throne of Crete; and Idonemonis, at his return, found it impossible to expel the usurper. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 358.—Hygin. 99.—Hom. Il. 11, &c. Od. 19.—Paus. 5, c. 25.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 122.—A son of Priam.

—A Greek historian of Lampsacus, in the age of Epicurus. He wrote a history of Samothrace, the life of Socrates, &c.

Idothea, a daughter of Proetus king of Argos. She was restored to her senses with her sisters, by Melampus. Virg. Prætidæ. Hom. Od. 11.—A daughter of Proetus, the god who told Menelaus how he could return to his country in safety. Hom. Od. 4, v. 363.—One of the nymphs who educated Jupiter.

Idrius, the son of Eucrotes of Caria, brother to Artimisia, who succeeded to Mausolus, and invaded Cyprus. Diod. 16.—Polyem. 7.

Idubeda, a river and mountain of Spain. Strab. 3.

Idume and Idumæa, a country of Syria, famous for palm trees. Gaza is its capital, where Cambyses deposited his riches, as he was going to Egypt. Lucan. 3, v. 216.—Sil. 5, v. 600.—Virg. G. 3, v. 12.

Idya, one of the Oceanides, who married Æetes king of Colchis, by whom she had Medea, &c. Hygin.—Herod.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

Idymus, a town of Syria. Herodot. 3, c. 5.

Iericho, a city of Palestine, besieged and taken by the Romans, under Vespasian and Titus. Plin. 5, c. 14.—Strab.

Ierna, a name of Ireland. Strab. 1.

Jeromus and Jeronymus, a Greek of Cordia, who wrote a history of Alexander.—A native of Rhodes, disciple of Aristotle, of whose compositions some few historical fragments remain. Dionys. Hal. 1.

Jerusalem, the capital of Judæa. Virg. Hierosolyma.

Jeta, a place of Sicily. Ital. 14, v. 272.

Jeglitum, now Giglio, an island of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Tuscany. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cas. B. G. 1, c. 34.

Ignatius, an officer of Crassus in his Parthian expedition.—A bishop of Antioch, torn to pieces in the amphitheatre at Rome, by lions, during a persecution, A.D. 107. His writings were letters to the Ephesians, Romans, &c., and he supported the divinity of Christ, and the propriety of the episcopal order, as superior to priests and deacons. The best edition of his work is that of Oxon, in 8vo, 1708.

Igruvium, a town of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia, now Gubbio. Cic. ad Att. 7, ep. 13.—Sil. 8, v. 460.

Iliara, or Hilaria, a daughter of Leucippus, carried away with her sister Phoebe, by the sons of Leda, as she was going to be married, &c.

Ilbs, more properly Iva, an island of the Tyrrhene sea, two miles from the continent. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 175.

Ilesones and Ilesonenses, a people of Spain. Liv. 32, c. 21.

Ilerda, now Lovida, a town of Spain, the capital of the Ilargetes, on an eminence on the right bank of the river Sicoris in Catalonia. Liv. 21, c. 23, l. 22, c. 21.—Lucan. 4, v. 13.

Iliotes. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 175.

Iliu, or Ehea, a daughter of Numitor king of Alba, consecrated by her uncle Amulius to the service of Vesta, which required perpetual chastity, that she might not become a mother to dispossess him of his crown. He was, however, disappointed; violence was offered to Iliu, and she brought forth Romulus and Remus, who drove the usurper from his throne, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor, its lawful possessor. Iliia was buried alive by Amulius for violating the laws of Vesta; and because her tomb was near the Tiber, some supposed that she married the god of that river. Horat. 1, ad. 2.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 277.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 598.—A wife of Sylla.

Iliaci ludii, games instituted by Augustus, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over Antony and Cleopatra. They are supposed to be the same as the Trojan ludii and the Actia; and Virgil says they were celebrated by Æneas, and not because they were instituted at the time when he wrote his poem, but because he wished to compliment Augustus by making the founder of Lavinium solemnize games on the very spot which was, many centuries after, to be immortalized by the trophies of his patron. During these games were exhibited horse-races, and gymnastic exercises. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 280.

Iliacus, an epithet applied to such as belong to Troy. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 101.

Iliades, a surname given to Romulus, as son of Iliia. Ovid.—A name given to the Trojan women. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 484.

Iliad, a celebrated poem composed by Homer, upon the Trojan war. It delineates the wrath of Achilles, and all the calamities which befall the Greeks, from the refusal of that hero to appear in the field of battle. It finished at the death of Hector, whom Achilles had sacrificed to the shades of his friend Patroclus. It is divided into 24 books. Vid. Homerus.—A surname of Minerva, from a temple which she had at Daulis in Phocia.

Ilienses, a people of Sardinia. Liv. 43, c. 19, l. 41, c. 6 & 12.

Ilion, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 27. Vid. Ilium.

Iliône, the eldest daughter of Priam, who married Polymnestor king of Thracia. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 657.

Iliôneus, a Trojan, son of Phorbas. He came into Italy with Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 525.—A son of Artabanus, made prisoner by Parmenio, near Damascus. Curt. 3, c. 13.—One of Niobe's sons. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Ilipe, a town of Bœotia. Liv. 35, c. 1.

Iliissus, a small river of Attica, falling into the sea near the Piræus. There was a temple on its banks sacred to the muses. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 52.

Iliithya, a goddess, called also Juno Lucina. Some suppose her to be the same as Diana. She presided over the travails of women; and in her temple at Rome, it was usual to carry a small piece of money as an offering. This custom was first established by Servius Tullius, who, by enforcing it, was enabled to know the exact number of the Roman people. Herod. Th. 450.—Homer. Il. 11, ad. 19.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.—Horat. Carm. Sacul.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 283.

Ilium, or Iliou, a citadel of Troy, built by Ilius, one of the Trojan kings, from whom it received its name. It is generally taken for Troy itself; and some have supposed that the town was called Ilium, and the adjacent country Troja. Vid. Troja. Liv. 35, c. 43, l. 37, c. 9 & 37.—Virg. Æn. 1, c. 2.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 505.—Horat. 3, ed. 3.—Justin. 11, c. 5, l. 31, c. 8.

Iliberis, a town of Gaul, through which Hannibal passed as he marched into Italy.

Ilice, now Elche, a town of Spain, with a harbour and bay, Sinus et Portus Ilicitanus, now Ilicitant. Plin. 3, c. 3.

Iliptila, two towns of Spain, one of which is called Major, and the other Minor.

Iliurgis, Iliurgus, or Iliurgia, a city of Spain, near the modern Andujar, on the river Bætis, destroyed by Scipio, for having revolted to the Carthaginians. Liv. 23, c. 49, l. 24, c. 41, l. 26, c. 17.

Ilorala, now Lorra, a town of Spain. Plin. 3, c. 3.

Ilyricum, Ilyria, and Ilyria, a country bordering on the Adriatic sea, opposite Italy, whose boundaries have been different at different times. It became a Roman province, after Gentius its king had been conquered by the pretor Anicius; and it now forms part of Croatia, Bosnia, and Slavonia. Strab. 2 & 7.—Paus. 4, c. 35.—Mela, 2, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 1, 2, &c.

Ilyrius sinus, that part of the Adriatic which is on the coast of Illyricum.

Ilyrius, a son of Cadmus and Hermione, from whom Illyricum received its name. Apollod.

Ilius, now Elba, an island in the Tyrrhene sea, between Italy and Corsica, celebrated for its iron mines. The people are called Iliaster. Liv. 30, c. 39.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 173.—Plin. 3, c. 6, l. 34, c. 14.

Iluo, now Oleron, a town of Gascony in France.

Ilus, the fourth king of Troy, was son of Troas by Callirhoe. He married Eurydice the daughter of Adrastus, by whom he had Themis, who married Capys, and Laomedon the father of Priam. He built, or rather embellished, the city of Ilium, called also Troy, from his father Troas. Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated statue of Minerva, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, so long would the town remain impregnable. When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ius rushed into the middle of the fire to save the Palladium, for which action he was deprived of his sight by the goddess; though he recovered it some time after. Homer. Il.—Strab. 13.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 33, l. 6, v. 459.—A name of Ascanius, while he was at Troy. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 272.—A friend of Turnus, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 400.

Imaus, a large mountain of Scythia, which is part of mount Taurus. It divides Scythia, which is generally called Intus Imaus, and Extra Imaus. It extends, according to some, as far as the boundaries of the eastern ocean. Plin. 6, c. 17.—Strab. 1.

Imbræus, a part of mount Taurus in Armenia.

Imbræides, a patronymic given to Asius, as son of Imbræus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 123.

Imbræidos, a patronymic given to Glaucus and Lades, as sons of Imbræus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 343.

Imbræus, or Parthenius, a river of Samos. Juno, who was worshipped on its banks, received the surname of Imbræia. Paus. 7, c. 4.—The father of Pirus, the leader of the Thracians during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 10 & 12.—Homer. Il. 4, v. 520.

Imbreus, one of the Centaurs, killed by Dryas at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 310.

Imbrex C. Licinius, a poet. Vid. Licinius.

Imbrivus, a Trojan, killed by Teucer son of Mentor. He had married Medesicaste, Priam's daughter. Homer. Il. 13.

Imbrivium, a place of Samnium.

Imbros, now Embro, an island of the Ægean sea, near Thrace, 32 miles from Samothrace, with a small river and town of the same name. Imbros was governed for some time by its own laws, but afterwards subjected to the power of Persia, Athens, Macedonia, and the kings of Pergamus. It afterwards became a Roman province. The divinities particularly worshipped there were Ceres and Mercury. Thucyd. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Homer. Il. 13.—Strab. 2.—Meis. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Trist. 10, v. 18.

Ἰνάχια, a name given to the Greeks, particularly the Argives, from king Inachus.

Inacolia, a name given to Peloponnesus, from the river Inachus.—A festival in Crete in honour of Inachus; or, according to others, of Ino's misfortunes.—A courtesan in the age of Horace. Epod. 12.

Ἰνάχιδæ, the name of the eight first successors of Inachus, on the throne of Argos.

Inachides, a patronymic of Epaphus, as grandson of Inachus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 704.—Also of Peneus, descended from Inachus. Id. 4, fab. 11.

Inachia a patronymic of Io, as daughter of Inachus. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 454.

Inachium, a town of Peloponnesus.

Inachus a son of Oceanus and Tethys, father of Io, and also of Phoroneus and Ægialeus. He founded the kingdom of Argos, and was succeeded by Phoroneus B.C. 1809, and gave his name to a river of Argos, of which he became the tutelary deity. He reigned 60 years. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.—Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 15.—A river of Argos.—Another in Epirus.

Inachides, a river in the east of Asia, as far as which Semiramis extended her empire. Polyan.

Inarime, an island near Campania, with a mountain under which Jupiter confined the giant Typhæus. It is now called Ischia, and is remarkable for its fertility and population. There was formerly a volcano in the middle of the island. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

Inarus, a town of Egypt, in whose neighbourhood the town of Naucratis was built by the Milesians.—A tyrant of Egypt, who died B.C. 456.

Incitatus, a horse of the emperor Caligula, made highpriest.

Indathyrus. Vid. Idanthyrus.

India, the most celebrated and opulent of all the countries of Asia, bounded on one side by the Indus, from which it derives its name. It is situate at the south of the kingdoms of Persia, Parthia, &c., along the maritime coasts. It has always been reckoned famous for the riches it contains; and so persuaded were the ancients of its wealth, that they supposed that its very sands were gold. It contained 9000 different nations, and 9000 remarkable cities, according to geographers. Bacchus was the first who conquered it. In more recent ages, part of it was tributary to the power of Persia. Alexander invaded it; but his conquest was checked by the valour of Porus, one of the kings of the country, and the Macedonian warrior was unwilling or afraid to engage another. Semiramis also extended her empire far in India. The Romans knew little of the country, yet their power was so universally dreaded, that the Indians paid homage by their ambassadors to the emperors Antoninus, Trajan, &c. India is divided into several provinces. There is an India extra Gangem, an India intra Gangem, and an India propria; but these divisions are not particularly noticed by the ancients, who, even in the age of Augustus, gave the name of Indians to the Æthiopian nations. Diod. 1.—Strab. 1, &c.—Meis. 3, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 28.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Justin. 1, c. 2. l. 12, c. 7.

Indibillis, a princess of Spain betrothed to Albutus.

Indigetes, a name given to those deities who were worshipped only in some particular places, or who were become gods from men, as Hercules, Bacchus, &c. Some derive the word from Inde et geniti, born at the same place where they received their worship. Virg. G. 1, v. 498.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 608.

Indigēti, a people of Spain.

Indus, now Sinde, a large river of Asia, from which the adjacent country has received the name of India. It falls into the Indian ocean by two mouths. According to Plato, it was larger than the Nile; and Pliny says that 19 rivers discharge themselves into it, before it falls into the sea. *Cic. N. D. 2, c. 52.—Strab. 15.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Diod. 2.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 720.—Plin. 6, c. 20.—A river of Caria. *Liv. 28, c. 14.

Indutiomarus, a Gaul, conquered by Cæsar, &c. Cæs. B. G.

Inferum mare, the Tuscan sea.

Ino, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, who nursed Bacchus. She married Athamas king of Thebes, after he had divorced Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. Ino became mother of Melicerta and Learchus, and soon conceived an implacable hatred against the children of Nephele, because they were to ascend the throne in preference to her own. Phryxus and Helle were informed of Ino's machinations, and they escaped to Colchis on a golden ram. Vid. Phryxus. Juno, jealous of Ino's prosperity, resolved to disturb her peace; and more particularly because she was of the descendants of her greatest enemy, Venus. Tisiphone was sent, by order of the goddess, to the house of Athamas; and she filled the whole palace with such fury, that Athamas, taking Ino to be a lioness, and her children whelps, pursued her, and dashed her son Learchus against a wall. Ino escaped from the fury of her husband, and from a high rock she threw herself into the sea, with Melicerta in her arms. The gods pitied her fate, and Neptune made her a sea deity, which was afterwards called Leucothoe. Melicerta became also a sea god, known by the name of Palaemon. Homer. Od. 5.—Cic. Tus. de Nat. D. 3, c. 48.—Plin. Symp. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13; &c.—Paus. 1, 2, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 12, 14, & 15.

Inoa, festivals in memory of Ino, celebrated yearly with sports and sacrifices at Corinth. An anniversary sacrifice was also offered to Ino at Megara, where she was first worshipped, under the name of Leucothoe.—Another in Laconia, in honour of the same. It was usual at the celebration to throw cakes of flour into a pond, which, if they sunk, were presages of prosperity; but if they swam on the surface of the waters, they were inauspicious and very unlucky.

Inous, a patronymic given to the god Palaemon, as son of Ino. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 823.

Indopus, a river of Delos, which the inhabitants suppose to be the Nile, coming from Egypt under the sea. It was near its banks that Apollo and Diana were born. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Flacc. 5, v. 105.—Strab. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 4.

Insubres, the inhabitants of Insubria, a country near the Po, supposed to be of Gallic origin. They were conquered by the Romans, and their country became a province, where the modern towns of Milan and Pavia were built. Strab. 5.—Tacit. A. 11, c. 23.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Liv. 5, c. 34.—Ptol. 3, c. 1.

Intaphernes, one of the seven Persian noblemen who conspired against Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia. He was so disappointed for not obtaining the crown, that he fomented seditions against Darius, who had been raised to the throne after the death of the usurper. When the king had ordered him and all his family to be put to death, his wife, by frequently visiting the palace, excited the compassion of Darius, who pardoned her, and permitted her to redeem from death any one of her relations whom she pleased. She obtained her brother; and when the king expressed his astonishment, because she preferred him to her husband and children, she replied that she could procure another husband, and children likewise; but that she could never have another brother, as her father and mother were dead. Intaphernes was put to death. Herodot. 3.

Intemelium, a town at the west of Liguria, on the sea-shore. Cic. Dio. 8, c. 14.

Interamna, an ancient city of Umbria, the birthplace of the historian Tacitus, and of the emperor of the same name. It is situate between two branches of the Nar (interamnus), whence its name. Varro. L. L. 4, c. 5.—Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 64.—A colony on the confines of Samnium, on the Liris.

Intercatia, a town of Spain.

Intrex, a supreme magistrate at Rome, who was intrusted with the care of the government after the death of a king, till the election of another. This office was exercised by the senators alone, and none continued in power longer than five days, or, according to Plutarch, only 12 hours. The first interrex mentioned in Roman history, is after the death of Romulus, when the Romans quarrelled with the Sabines concerning the choice of a king. There was sometimes an interrex during the consular government; but this happened only to hold assemblies in the absence of the magistrates, or when the election of any of the acting officers was disputed. Liv. 1, c. 17.—Dionys. 2, c. 15.

Inui castrum. Vid. Castrum Inui. It received its name from Inuus, a divinity supposed to be the same as the Faunus of the Latins, and worshipped in this city.

Inyous, a city of Sicily. Herodot.

Io, daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jasus or Pirenes, was priestess of Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno, jealous of his intrigues, discovered the object of his affections, and surprised him in the company of Io, though he had shrouded himself in all the obscurity of clouds and thick mists. Jupiter changed his mistress into a beautiful heifer; and the goddess, who well knew the fraud, obtained from her husband the animal whose beauty she had condescended to commend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter, anxious for the situation of Io, sent Mercury to destroy Argus, and to restore her to liberty. Vid. Argus. Io, freed from the vigilance of Argus, was now persecuted by Juno; who sent one of the furies, or rather a malicious insect, to torment her. She wandered over the greatest part of the earth, and crossed over the sea, till at last she stopped on the banks of the Nile, still exposed to the uncessing torments of Juno's insect. Here she entreated Jupiter to restore her to her ancient form; and when the god had changed her from a heifer into a woman, she brought forth Epaphus. Afterwards she married Telegonus king of Egypt, or Oairis, according to others, and she treated her subjects with such mildness and humanity, that after death she received divine honours, and was worshipped under the name of Isia. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phoenician merchants, who wished to make reprisals for Europa, who had been stolen from them by the Greeks. Some suppose that Io never came to Egypt. She is sometimes called Phoronis, from her brother Phoronos. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 748.—Paus. 1, c. 25, l. 3, c. 18.—Moachus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 789.—Hygin. fab. 145.

Iobates and Jobates, a king of Lycia, father of Stenobea, the wife of Proetus king of Argos. He was succeeded on the throne by Belleophon, to whom he had given one of his daughters, called Philonoe, in marriage. Vid. Belleophon. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 57.

Iobes, a son of Hercules by a daughter of Thespius. He died in his youth. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Joasta, a daughter of Menoecus, who married Laius king of Thebes, by whom she had Œdipus. She afterwards married her son Œdipus, without knowing who he was, and had by him Eteocles, Polynices, &c. Vid. Laius, Œdipus. When she discovered that she had married her own son, and had been guilty of incest, she hanged herself in despair. She is called Epicasta by some mythologists. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 42.—Senec. & Sappho. in Œdip.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Hom. Od. 11.

Iolais, a festival at Thebes, the same as that called Heraclia. It was instituted in honour of Hercules and his friend Iolas, who assisted him in conquering the hydra. It continued during several days, on the first of which were offered solemn sacrifices. The next day horse-races and athletic exercises were exhibited. The following day was set apart for wrestling; the victors were crowned with garlands of myrtle, generally used at funeral solemnities. They were sometimes rewarded with tripods of brass. The place where the exercises were exhibited was called Iolaision, where there were to be seen the monument of Amphitryon, and the cenotaph of Iolas, who was buried in Iardinia. These monuments were strewn with garlands and flowers on the day of the festival.

Iolas, or Iolæus, a son of Iphiclus king of Thessaly, who assisted Hercules in conquering the hydra, and burnt with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent its growth of others. Vid. Hydra. He was restored to his youth and vigour by Hebe, at the request of his friend Hercules. Some time afterwards, Iolas assisted the Heraclides against Eurystheus, and killed the tyrant with his own hand. According to Plutarch, Iolas had a monument in Bœotia and Phocis, where lovers used to go and bind themselves by the most solemn oaths of fidelity, considering the place as sacred to love and friendship. According to Diodorus and Pausanias, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia, where he had gone to make a settlement at the head of the sons of Hercules by the 50 daughters of Thespius. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 390.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 10, c. 17.—A compiler of a Phœnician history.—A friend of Rhesus, killed by Castellus in the Rutulian wars. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 60.—A son of Antipater, cup-bearer to Alexander. Plut.

IOLCHON, a town of Magnesia, above Demetrias, where Jason was born. It was founded by Cretheus son of Æolus and Enaretta. Mela mentions it as at some distance from the sea, though all the other ancient geographers place it on the seashore. Paus. 4, c. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Lucian, 3, v. 102.

IOLÉ, a daughter of Eurytus king of Cœchalia. Her father promised her in marriage to Hercules, but he refused to perform his engagements, and Iolé was carried away by force. Vid. Eurytus. It was to extinguish the love of Hercules for Iolé that Dejanira sent him the poisoned tunic, which caused his death. Vid. Hercules and Dejanira. After the death of Hercules, Iolé married his son Hylas by Dejanira. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Orist. Met. 9, v. 279.

ION, a son of Xuthus and Creusa daughter of Erechtheus, who married Helice, the daughter of Selinus king of Ægiale. He succeeded on the throne of his father-in-law, and built a city, which he called Helice, on account of his wife. His subjects from him received the name of Ionians, and the country that of Ionis. Vid. Iones and Ionis. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 7, c. 1.—Strab. 7.—Herodot. 7, c. 94 l. 8, c. 44.—A tragic poet of Chios, whose tragedies, when represented at Athens, met with universal applause. He is mentioned and greatly commended by Aristophanes and Athenæus, &c. Athen. 10, &c.—A native of Ephesus, introduced in Plato's dialogues as reasoning with Socrates.

IONÆA, a name originally given to the subjects of Ion, who dwelt at Helice. In the age of Ion the Athenians made a war against the people of Eleusis, and implored his aid against their enemies. Ion conquered the Eleusinians and Eumolpus, who was at their head; and the Athenians, sensible of his services, invited him to come and settle among them; and the more strongly to show their affection, they assumed the name of Ionians. Some suppose that, after this victory, Ion passed into Asia Minor, at the head of a colony. When the Achæans were driven from Peloponnesus by the Heraclides, 80 years after the Trojan war, they came to settle among the Ionians, who were then masters of Ægialius. They were soon dispossessed of their territories by the Achæans, and went to Attica, where they met with a cordial reception. Their migration from Greece to Asia Minor was about 60 years after the return of the Heraclides, B.C. 1044, and 80 years after the departure of the Æolians; and they therefore finally settled themselves, after a wandering life of about 30 years.

IONIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Æolia, on the west by the Ægean and Ionian seas, on the south by Caria, and on the east by Lydia and part of Caria. It was founded by colonies from Greece, and particularly Attica, by the Ionians, or subjects of Ion. Ionis was divided into 12 small states, which formed a celebrated confederacy, often mentioned by the ancients. These 12 states were Priene, Miletus, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Ephesus, Lebedos, Teos, Phocæa, Erythræ, Smyna, and the capitals of Samos and Chios. The inhabitants of Ionis built a temple, which they called Pan Ionium; from the concourse of people that flocked there from every part of Ionis. After they had enjoyed for some time their freedom and independence, they were made tributary to the power of Lydia by Croesus. The Athenians assisted them to shake off the slavery of the Asiatic monarchs; but they soon forgot their duty and relation to their mother country, and joined Xerxes when he invaded Greece. They were delivered from the Persian yoke by Alexander, and restored to their original independence. They were reduced by the Romans under the dictator Sylla. Ionis has been always celebrated for the salubrity of the climate, the fruitfulness of the ground, and the genius of its inhabitants. Herodot. 1, c. 6 & 28.—Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 1.—An ancient name given to Hellas, or Achaia, because it was for some time the residence of the Ionians.

IONIAN MARE, a part of the Mediterranean sea, at the bottom of the Adriatic, lying between Sicily and Greece. That part of the Ægean sea which lies on the coast of Ionis, in Asia, is called the sea of Ionis, and not the Ionian sea. According to some authors, the Ionian sea receives its name from Io, who swam across there, after she had been metamorphosed into a heifer. Strab. 7, &c.—Dionys. Perieg.

IOPAS, a king of Africa, among the suitors of Dido. He was an excellent musician, poet, and philosopher, and he exhibited his superior abilities at the entertainment which Dido gave to Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 744.

IOPÉ and JOPPE, now Jafa, a famous town of Phœnicia, more ancient than the deluge, according to some traditions. It was about 40 miles from the capital of Judæa, and was remarkable for a seaport much frequented, though very dangerous on account of the great rocks that lie before it. Strab. 16, &c.—Propert. 2, el. 28, v. 51.—A daughter of Iphicles, who married Theseus. Plut.

IOPHON, a son of Sophocles, who accused his father of imprudence in the management of his affairs, &c. Lucian. de Mocrab.—A poet of Gnosus, in Crete. Paus. 1, c. 34.

JORDANÆA, a river of Judæa, illustrious in sacred history. It rises near mount Libanus, and after running through the lake Samachonitis, and that of Tiberias, it falls, after a course of 150 miles, into the Dead sea. Strab. 16.

JORNANDÆUS, an historian who wrote a book on the Goths. He died A.D. 552.

ION, now Nis, an island in the Myrtoan sea, at the south of Naxos, celebrated, as some say, for the tomb of Homer, and the birth of his mother. Plin. 4, c. 12.

JOSEPHUS FLAVIUS, a celebrated Jew, born in Jerusalem, who signalized his military abilities in supporting a siege of 47 days against Vespasian and Titus, in a small town of Judæa. When the city surrendered, there were not found less than 40,000 Jews slain, and the number of captives amounted to 1200. Josephus saved his life by flying into a cave, where 40 of his countrymen had also taken refuge. He dissuaded them from committing suicide, and when they had all drawn lots to kill one another, Josephus fortunately remained the last, and surrendered himself to Vespasian. He gained the conqueror's esteem, by foretelling that he would become one day the master of the Roman empire. Josephus was present at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and received all the sacred books which it contained from the conqueror's hands. He came to Rome with Titus, where he was honoured with the name and privileges of a Roman citizen. Here he made himself esteemed by the emperors Vespasian and Titus, and dedicated his time to study. He wrote the history of the wars of the Jews, first in Syriac, and afterwards translated it into Greek. This composition so pleased Titus, that he authenticated it by placing his signature upon it, and preserving it in one of the public libraries. He finished another work, which he divided into 30 books, containing the history of the Jewish antiquities, in some places subversive of the authority and miracles mentioned in the scriptures. He also wrote two books to defend the Jews against Apion their greatest enemy; besides an account of his own life, &c. Josephus has been admired for his lively and animated style, the bold propriety of his expressions, the exactness of his descriptions, and the persuasive eloquence of his orations. He has been called the Livy of the Greeks. Though in some cases inimical to the christians, yet he has commended our Saviour so warmly, that St. Jerome calls him a christian writer. Josephus died A.D. 93, in the 50th year of his age. The best editions of his works are Hudson's, 2 vols. fol. Oxon. 1730, and Havercamp's, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1736. Sæction. in Vesp., &c.

Jovianus Flavius Claudius, a native of Pannonia, elected emperor of Rome by the soldiers after the death of Julian. He at first refused to be invested with the imperial purple, because his subjects followed the religious principles of the late emperor; but they removed his groundless apprehensions, and when they assured him that they were warm for christianity, he accepted the crown. He made a disadvantageous treaty with the Persians, against whom Julian was marching with a victorious army. Jovian died seven months and 20 days after his ascension, and was found in his bed suffocated by the vapour of charcoal, which had been lighted in the room, A.D. 364. Some attribute his death to intemperance, and say that he was the son of a baker. He burned a celebrated library at Antioch. Marcellin.

Iphianassa, a daughter of Proetus king of Argos, who, with her sisters Iphinoe and Lysippe, ridiculed Juno, &c. Virg. Proetides.—The wife of Endymion.

Iphiclus, or Iphicles, a son of Amphitryon and Alcmena, born at the same birth with Hercules. As these two children were together in the cradle, Juno, jealous of Hercules, sent two large serpents to destroy him. At the sight of the serpents, Iphicles alarmed the house; but Hercules, though not a year old, boldly seized them, one in each hand, and squeezed them to death. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Theocrit.—A king of Phylace, in Phthiotis, son of Phylacus and Clymene. He had bulls famous for their bigness, and the monster which kept them, Melampus, at the request of his brother [Virg. Melampus], attempted to steal them away, but he was caught in the act, and imprisoned. Iphicles soon received some advantages from the prophetic knowledge of his prisoner, and not only restored him to liberty, but also presented him with the oxen. Iphicles, who was childless, learned from the soothsayer how to become a father. He had married Automedusa, and afterwards a daughter of Creon king of Thebes. He was father to Podarce and Proteusilus. Hom. Od. 11. 13.—Apollod. 2, c. 9.—Paus. 4, c. 36.—A son of Thestius king of Pleuron. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Iphicrætes, a celebrated general of Athens, who, though son of a shoemaker, rose from the lowest station to the highest offices in the state.

He made war against the Thracians, obtained some victories over the Spartans, and assisted the Persian king against Egypt. He changed the dress and arms of his soldiers, and rendered them more alert and expeditious in using their weapons. He married a daughter of Cotys king of Thrace, by whom he had a son called Mnestheus, and died 380 B.C. When he was once reproached for the meanness of his origin, he observed that he would be the first of his family, but that his detractor would be the last of his own. C. Nep. in Iphic.—A sculptor of Athens.—An Athenian sent to Darius III. king of Persia, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Iphidæmus, a son of Antenor and Theano, killed by Agamemnon. Hom. Il. 11.

Iphidæmia, a Thessalian woman, ravished by the Naxians, &c.

Iphigenia, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by one of the soothsayers, that to appease the gods, they must sacrifice Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, to Diana. Virg. Agamemnon. The father, who had provoked the goddess by killing her favourite stag, heard this with the greatest horror and indignation, and rather than to shed the blood of his daughter, he commanded one of his heralds, as chief of the Grecian forces, to order all the assembly to depart each to his respective home. Ulysses and the other generals interfered, and Agamemnon consented to immolate his daughter for the common cause of Greece. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks sent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. Clytemnestra gladly permitted her departure, and Iphigenia came to Aulis: here she saw the bloody preparations for the sacrifice; she implored the forgiveness and protection of her father, but tears and entreaties were unavailing. Calchas took the knife in his hand, and as he was going to strike the fatal blow, Iphigenia suddenly disappeared, and a goat of uncommon size and beauty was found in her place for the sacrifice. This supernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind suddenly became favourable, and the combined fleet set sail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had raised the compassion of the goddess on whose altar she was going to be sacrificed, and she carried her to Taurica, where she entrusted her with the care of her temple. In this sacred office Iphigenia was obliged, by the command of Diana, to sacrifice all the strangers who came into that country. Many had already been offered as victims on the bloody altar, when Orestes and Pylades came to Taurica. Their mutual and unparalleled friendship [Virg. Pylades and Orestes] disclosed to Iphigenia that one of the strangers whom she was going to sacrifice was her brother; and, upon this, she conspired with the two friends to fly from the barbarous country, and carry away the statue of the goddess. They successfully effected their enterprise, and murdered Thoas, who enforced the human sacrifices. According to some authors, the Iphigenia who was sacrificed at Aulis was not a daughter of Agamemnon, but a daughter of Helen by Theseus. Homer does not speak of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, though very minute in the description of the Grecian forces, adventures, &c. The statue of Diana, which Iphigenia brought away, was afterwards placed in the grove of Aricia in Italy. Paus. 2, c. 22. 1, 3, c. 16.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 31.—Virg. Æn. 2, c. 116.—Æschyl.—Euripid.

Iphimédia, a daughter of Tropæus, who married the giant Alocus. She fled from her husband, and had two sons, Orus and Ephialtes, by Neptune, her father's father. Hom. Od. 11, v. 124.—Paus. 9, c. 22.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Iphimodon, a son of Eurytheus, killed in a war against the Athenians and Heraclidae. Apollod.

Iphinoe, one of the principal women of Lemnos, who conspired to destroy all the males of the island after their return from a Thracian expedition. Flacc. 2, v. 163.—One of the daughters of Proetus. She died of a disease while under the care of Melampus. Vid. Proetides.

Iphis, son of Alektor, succeeded his father on the throne of Argos. He advised Polyneices, who wished to engage Amphiarus in the Theban war, to bribe his wife Eriphyle, by giving her the golden collar of Harmonia. This succeeded, and Eriphyle betrayed her husband. Apollod. 3.—Flacc. 1, 3, & 7.—A beautiful youth of Salamis, of ignoble birth. He became enamoured of Anaxarete, and the coldness and contempt he met with rendered him so desperate that he hung himself. Anaxarete saw him carried to his grave without emotion, and was instantly changed into a stone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 703.—A daughter of Theseus. Apollod.

A mistress of Patroclus, given him by Achilles. Hom. Il. 9.—A daughter of Ligdus and Teletusa, of Crete. When Teletusa was pregnant, Ligdus ordered her to destroy her child, if it proved a daughter, because his poverty could not afford to maintain a useless charge. The severe orders of her husband alarmed Teletusa, and she would have obeyed, had not Isis commanded her in a dream to spare the life of her child. Teletusa brought forth a daughter, which was given to a nurse, and passed for a boy under the name of Iphis. Ligdus continued ignorant of the deceit, and when Iphis was come to the years of puberty, her father resolved to give her in marriage to Lanthe, the beautiful daughter of Telestes. A day to celebrate the nuptials was appointed, but Teletusa and her daughter were equally anxious to put off the marriage; and, when all was unavailing, they implored the assistance of Isis, by whose advice the life of Iphis had been preserved. The goddess was moved; she changed the sex of Iphis, and, on the morrow, the nuptials were consummated with the greatest rejoicings. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 666, &c.

Iphition, an ally of the Trojans, son of Otrytheus and Nais, killed by Achilles. Hom. Il. 20, v. 382.

Iphitus, a son of Eurytus king of Cechalia. When his father had promised his daughter Iole to him who could overcome him or his sons in drawing the bow, Hercules accepted the challenge, and came off victorious. Eurytus refused his daughter to the conqueror, observing that Hercules had killed one of his wives in a fury, and that Iole might perhaps share the same fate. Some time after, Antiochus stole away the oxen of Eurytus, and Hercules was suspected of the theft. Iphitus was sent in quest of the oxen, and in his search he met with Hercules, whose good favours he had gained by advising Eurytus to give Iole to the conqueror. Hercules assisted Iphitus in seeking the lost animals; but when he recollected the ingratitude of Eurytus, he killed Iphitus by throwing him down from the walls of Tirynthus. Hom. Od. 22.—

Apollod. 2, c. 6.—A Trojan, who survived the ruin of his country, and fled with Aeneas to Italy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 340, &c.—A king of Elis, son of Praxionides, in the age of Lycurgus. He re-established the olympic games 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the christian era. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as everything previous to it seems involved in fabulous obscurity. Pater. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 5, c. 4.

Iphthime, a sister of Penelope, who married Eumelus. She appeared, by the power of Minerva, to her sister in a dream, to comfort her in the absence of her son Telemachus. Hom. Od. 4, v. 795.

Ipsaa, the mother of Medea. Ovid. Heroid. 17, v. 232.

Ipsus, a place of Phrygia, celebrated for a battle which was fought there, about 301 years before the christian era, between Antigonus and his son, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander. The former led into the field an army of above 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with 75 elephants. The latter's forces consisted of above 64,000 infantry, besides 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, and 120 armed chariots. Antigonus and his son were defeated. Plut. in Demetr.

Ira, a city of Messenia, which Agamemnon promised to Achilles, if he would resume his arms to fight against the Trojans. This place is famous in history, as having supported a siege of 11 years against the Lacedæmonians. Its capture, B.C. 671, put an end to the second Messenian war. Hom. Il. 9, v. 150 & 192.—Strab. 7.

Irenæus, a native of Greece, disciple of Polycarp, and bishop of Lyons in France. He wrote on different subjects; but, as what remains is in Latin, some suppose that he composed in that language, and not in the Greek. Fragments of his works in Greek are, however, preserved, which prove that his style was simple, though clear and often animated. His opinions concerning the soul are curious. He suffered martyrdom, A.D. 202. The best edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. fol. 1702.

Irene, a daughter of Cratinus the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.—One of the seasons among the Greeks, called by the moderns Horæ. Her two sisters were Dia and Eupomia, all daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

Ireus, a delightful spot in Libya, near Cyrene, where Battus fixed his residence. The Egyptians were once defeated there by the inhabitants of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 158, &c.

Iris, a daughter of Thaumias and Electra, one of the Oceanides, messenger of the gods, and more particularly of Juno. Her office was to cut the thread which seemed to detain the soul in the body of those that were expiring. She is the same as the rainbow, and, from that circumstance, she is represented with wings, with all the variegated and beautiful colours of the rainbow, and appears sitting behind Juno ready to execute her commands. She is likewise described as supplying the clouds with water to deluge the world. Heroid. Theog. v. 266.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 271 et seq. l. 4, v. 481. l. 10, v. 85.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 694.—A river of Asia Minor, rising in Cappadocia, and falling into the Euxine sea. Flacc. 5, v. 221.—A river of Pontus.

Irus, a beggar of Ithaca, who executed the commissions of Penelope's suitors. When Ulysses returned home, disguised in a beggar's dress, Irus hindered him from entering the gates, and even challenged him. Ulysses brought him to the ground with a blow, and dragged him out of the house. From his poverty originates the proverb, lro pau-pis. Homer. Od. 8, v. 1 & 35.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 7, v. 42.—A mountain of India.

Is, a small river falling into the Euphrates. Its waters abound with bitumen. Herodot. 1, c. 179.—A small town on the river of the same name. Id. ib.

Isadas, a Spartan, who, upon seeing the Thebans entering the city, stripped himself naked, and with a spear and sword engaged the enemy. He was rewarded with a crown for his valour. Plut.

Issus, one of the Nereides.

Issus, an orator of Chalcis, in Euboea, who came to Athens, and became there the pupil of Lysias, and soon after the master of Demosthenes. Some suppose that he reformed the dissipation and imprudence of his early years by frugality and temperance. Demosthenes imitated him in preference to Isocrates, because he studied force and energy of expression rather than floridness of style. Ten of his 64 orations are extant. Æv. 3, v. 74.—Plut. de 10 Orat.—Dem.—Another Greek orator, who came to Rome, A.D. 17. He is greatly recommended by Pliny the younger, who observes that he always spoke extempore, and wrote with elegance, unlaboured ease, and great correctness.

Isamnia, a river of India.

Isander, a son of Bellerophon, killed in the war which his father made against the Solymi. Homer. Il. 6.

Isaplis, a river of Umbria. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

Isar and Isara, the Isore, a river of Gaul, where Fabius routed the Allobroges. It rises at the east of Savoy, and falls into the Rhone near Valence. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 399.—Another called the Oysse, which falls into the Seine below Paris.

Isar and Issus, a river of Vindictia. Strab. 4.

Isarachus, an Athenian archon, B.C. 424.

Issura (s, or orum), the chief town of Issuria. Plin. 5, c. 27.

Issuria, a country of Asia Minor, near mount Taurus, whose inhabitants were bold and warlike. The Roman emperors, particularly Probus and Gallus, made war against them and conquered them. Flor. 3, c. 6.—Strab.—Cic. 15, Fam. 2.

Issuricus, a surname of P. Servilius, from his conquest over the Issurians. Ovid. 1, Fast. 594.—Cic. 5, Att. 21.

Issurius, a river of Umbria, falling into the Adriatic.—Another in Magna Græcia. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

Ischenia, an annual festival at Olympia, in honour of Ischenus the grandson of Mercury and Hera, who, in a time of famine, devoted himself for his country, and was honoured with a monument near Olympia.

Ischolaus, a brave and prudent general of Sparta, &c. Polyam.

Ischomachus, a noble athlete of Crotona, about the consulship of M. Valerius and P. Posthumus.

Ischopollis, a town of Pontus.

Isola. Id. Cænotides.

Isidoreides, a king of Persia, appointed by the will of Arcadius, guardian to Theodosius II. He died in his 31st year, A.D. 408.

Isis, certain festivals observed in honour of Isis, which continued nine days. It was usual to carry vessels full of wheat and barley, as the goddess was supposed to be the first who taught mankind the use of corn. These festivals were adopted by the Romans, among whom they soon degenerated into licentiousness. They were abolished by a decree of the senate, A.U.C. 696. They were introduced again, about 200 years after, by Commodus.

Isiadorum portus, a harbour on the shore of the Euxine, near Dacia.

Isidorus, a native of Chama, in the age of Ptolemy Lagus, who wrote some historical treatises, besides a description of Parthia.—A disciple of Chrysostom, called Pelmista, from his living in Egypt. Of his epistles 2012 remain written in Greek, with conciseness and elegance. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1638.—A Christian Greek writer, who flourished in the seventh century. He is surnamed Hypolemus. His works have been edited, fol. de Breul, Paris, 1607.

Isis, a celebrated deity of the Egyptians, daughter of Saturn and Rhea, according to Diodorus of Sicily. Some suppose her to be the same as Io, who was changed into a cow, and restored to her human form in Egypt, where she taught agriculture, and governed the people with mildness and equity, for which reason she received divine honours after death. According to some traditions mentioned by Ptolemy, Isis married her brother Osiris, and was pregnant by him even before she had left her mother's womb. These two ancient deities, as some authors observe, comprehended all nature, and all the gods of the heathens. Isis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleusis, the Proserpina of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. Osiris and Isis reigned conjointly in Egypt; but the rebellion of Typhon the brother of Osiris proved fatal to this sovereignty. Id. Osiris and Typhon. The ox and cow were the symbols of Osiris and Isis, because these deities, while on earth, had diligently applied themselves in cultivating the earth. Id. Apis. As Isis was supposed to be the moon, and Osiris the sun, she was represented as holding a globe in her hand, with a vessel full of ears of corn. The Egyptians believed that the yearly and regular inundations of the Nile proceeded from the abundant tears which Isis shed for the loss of Osiris, whom Typhon had basely murdered. The word Isis, according to some, signifies ancient, and, on that account, the inscriptions on the statues of the goddess were often in these words: I am all that has been, that shall be, and none among mortals has hitherto taken off my veil.

The worship of Isis was universal in Egypt; the priests were obliged to observe perpetual chastity, their head was closely shaven, and they always walked barefooted, and clothed themselves in linen garments. They never ate onions, they abstained from salt with their meat, and were forbidden to eat the flesh of sheep and of dogs. During the night they were employed in continual devotion near the statue of the goddess. Cleopatra the beautiful queen of Egypt was wont to dress herself like this goddess, and affected to be called a second Isis. Cic. de Div. 1.—Plut. de Isid. & Osirid.—Diod. 1.—Diogen. Hal. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 59.—Lucan. 1, v. 821.

Isimarus (Isimira, plur.), a rugged mountain of Thrace, covered with vines and olives, near the Hebrus, with a town of the same name. Its wines are excellent. The word Isimarus is indiscriminately used for Thracian. Homer. Od. 9.—Virg. G. 2, v. 37. Æm. 10, v. 351.—A Theban, son of Aetacus.—A son of Xumolpus. Apollod.—A Lydian who accompanied Aneas to Italy, and fought with great vigour against the Rutuli. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 139.

Ismène, a daughter of Œdipus and Jocasta, who, when her sister Antigone had been condemned to be buried alive by Creon, for giving burial to her brother Polynices against the tyrant's positive orders, declared herself as guilty as her sister, and insisted upon being equally punished with her. This instance of generosity was strongly opposed by Antigone, who wished not to see her sister involved in her calamities. Sophocl. in Antig.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—A daughter of the river Asopus, who married the hundred-eyed Argus, by whom she had Jasus. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Isménias, a celebrated musician of Thebes. When he was taken prisoner by the Scythians, Acheas the king of the country observed that he liked the music of Isménias better than the playing of an ass. Plut. in Apoph.—A Theban, bribed by Timocrates of Rhodes, that he might use his influence to prevent the Athenians and some other Grecian states from assisting Lacedæmon, against which Xerxes was engaged in war. Paus. 3, c. 9.—A Theban general, sent to Persia with an embassy by his countrymen. As none were admitted into the king's presence without prostrating themselves at his feet, Isménias had recourse to artifice to avoid doing an action which would have proved disgraceful to his country. When he was introduced he dropped his ring, and the motion he made to recover it from the ground was mistaken for the most submissive homage, and Isménias had a satisfactory audience of the monarch.—A river of Bœotia, falling into the Eurippus, where Apollo had a temple, from which he was called Isménias. A youth was yearly chosen by the Bœotians to be the priest of the god, an office to which Hercules was once appointed. Paus. 9, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 2.—Strab. 9.

Isménides, an epithet applied to the Theban women, as being near the Isménus, a river of Bœotia. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 32.

Isménus, a surname of Apollo at Thebes, where he had a temple on the borders of the Isménus.

Isménus, a son of Apollo and Mælia; one of the Nereides, who gave his name to the Lation, a river of Bœotia, near Thebes, falling into the Asopus, and thence into the Eurippus. Paus. 9, c. 10.—A son of Asopus and Metope. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—A son of Amphion and Niobe, killed by Apollo. Id. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Isôcrates, a celebrated orator, son of Theodoras, a rich musical instrument maker at Athens. He was taught in the schools of Georgias and Prodicus, but his oratorical abilities were never displayed in public, and Isocrates was prevented by an unconquerable timidity from speaking in the popular assemblies. He opened a school of eloquence at Athens, where he distinguished himself by the number, character, and fame of his pupils, and by the immense riches which he amassed. He was intimate with Philip of Macedon, and regularly corresponded with him; and to his familiarity with that monarch the Athenians were indebted for some of the few peaceful years which they passed. The aspiring ambition of Philip, however, displeased Isocrates, and the defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæa had such an effect upon his spirits, that he did not survive the disgrace of his country, but died, after he had been four days without taking any aliment, in the 99th year of his age, about 338 years before Christ. Isocrates has always been much admired for the sweetness and graceful simplicity of his style, for the harmony of his expressions, and the dignity of his language. The remains of his orations extant inspire the world with the highest veneration for his abilities as a moralist, an orator, and, above all, as a man. His merit, however, is lessened by those who accuse him of plagiarism from the works of Thucydides, Lyfias, and others, seen particularly in his panegyric. He was so studious of correctness, that his lines are sometimes poetry. The severe conduct of the Athenians against Socrates highly displeased him, and, in spite of all the undeserved unpopularity of that great philosopher, he put on mourning the day of his death. About 31 of his orations are extant. Isocrates was honoured after death with a brazen serpent by Timotheus, one of his pupils, and Aphanates his adopted son. The best editions of Isocrates are that of Battie, 2 vols. 8vo, Cantab. 1729, and that of Auger, 3 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1782. Plut. de 10 Orat., &c.—*Cic. Issa, now Lissa, an island in the Adriatic sea, on the coast of Dalmatia.—A town of Illyricum. Meta. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 1, &c.—Marcell. 26, c. 25.

Issæ, a daughter of Macareus the son of Lycæon. She was beloved by Apollo, who, to obtain her confidence, changed himself into the form of a shepherd, to whom she was attached. This metamorphosis of Apollo was represented on the web of Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 124.

Issus, now Aliss, a town of Cilicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander the Great and the Persians under Darius their king, in October, B.C. 333, in consequence of which it was called Nicopolis. In this battle the Persians lost, in the field of battle, 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and the Macedonians only 300 foot and 150 horse, according to Diodorus Siculus. The Persian army, according to Justin, consisted of 400,000 foot and 100,000 horse, and 61,000 of the former and 10,000 of the latter were left dead on the spot, and 40,000 were taken prisoners. The loss of the Macedonians, as he further adds, was no more than 120 foot and 150 horse. According to Curtius, the Persians slain amounted to 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse; and those of Alexander to 32 foot and 150 horse killed, and 304 wounded. This spot is likewise famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, A.D. 194. Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 9.—Curt. 3, c. 7.—Arrian. Diod. 17.—Cic. 5, Att. 20. Fam. 2, ep. 10.

Ister and Istrus, an historian, disciple to Callimæchus. Diog.—A large river of Europe, falling into the Euxine sea, called also the Danube. Vid. Danubius.—A son of Ægyptus. Apollod.

Isthmia, sacred games among the Greeks, which received their names from the Isthmus of Corinth, where they were observed. They were celebrated to commemorate of Melicerta, who was changed into a sea deity, when his mother Ino had thrown herself into the sea with him in her arms. The body of Melicerta, according to some traditions, when cast upon the sea-shore, received an honourable burial, in memory of which the Isthmian games were instituted, B.C. 1326. They were interrupted after they had been celebrated with great regularity during some years, and Theseus at last reinstated them in honour of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father. These games were observed every third, or rather fifth, year, and held so sacred and inviolate that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was destroyed by Mummius the Roman general, they were observed with the usual solemnity, and the Sicyonians were entrusted with the superintendence, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. Combats of every kind were exhibited, and the victors were rewarded with garlands of pine leaves. Some time after the custom was changed, and the victor received a crown of dry and withered parsley. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Isthmian games, as among the Romans from the consular government. Paus. 1, c. 44. l. 2, c. 1 & 2.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Plut. in Thes.

Isthmus, a king of Messenia, &c. Paus. 4, c. 3.

Isthmus, a small neck of land which joins one country to another, and prevents the sea from making them separate, such as that of Corinth, called often the Isthmus by way of eminence, which joins Peloponnesus to Greece. Nero attempted to cut it across and make a communication between the two seas, but in vain. It is now called Hexamithi. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 101.

Istisotis, a country of Greece, near Ossa. Vis. Histisotis.

Iatria, a province at the west of Illyricum, at the top of the Adriatic sea, whose inhabitants were originally pirates, and lived on plunder. They were not subjected to Rome till six centuries after the foundation of that city. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Lin. 10, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 19.—Justin. 9, c. 2.

Istropolis, a city of Thrace near the mouth of the Ister, founded by a Milesian colony. Plin. 4, c. 11.

Iteus and Antiphys, sons of Priam, the latter by Hecuba, and the former by a concubine. They were seized by Achilles, as they fed their father's flocks on mount Ida; but they were redeemed by Priam, and fought against the Greeks. They were both killed by Agamemnon. Hom. Il. 11.—A city of Boetia. Strab. 9.

Italia, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded by the Adriatic and Tyrrhene seas, and by the Alpine mountains. It has been compared, and with some similitude, to a man's leg. It has borne, at different periods, the different names of Saururia, Enotria, Hesperia, Ausonia, and Tyrrhenia, and it received the name of Italy either from Iteus, a king of the country, or from Italos, a Greek word which signifies an ox, an animal very common in that part of Europe. The boundaries of Italy appear to have been formed by nature itself, which seems to have been particularly careful in supplying this country with whatever may contribute not only to the support, but also to the pleasures and luxuries of life. It has been called the garden of Europe; and the panegyric which Pliny bestows upon it seems not in any degree exaggerated. The ancient inhabitants called themselves Aborigines, offspring of the soil, and the country was soon after peopled by colonies from Greece. The Pelasgi and the Arcadians made settlements there, and the whole country was divided into as many different governments as there were towns, till the rapid increase of the Roman power (Vis. Roma) changed the face of Italy, and united all its states in support of one common cause. Italy has been the mother of arts as well as of arms, and the immortal monuments which remain of the eloquence and poetical abilities of its inhabitants are universally known. It was divided into 11 small provinces or regions by Augustus, though sometimes known under the three greater divisions of Cisalpine Gaul, Italy properly so called, and Magna Græcia. The sea above was called Superum, and that at the south Inferum. Ptol. 3, c. 1.—Dionys. Hal.—Diod. 4.—Justin. 4, &c.—C. Nep. in Dion. Alcibi. &c.—Liv. 1, c. 2, &c.—Varr. de *R. Italica, a town of Italy, called also Corfinium. —A town of Spain, now Sevilla la Vieja, built by Scipio for the accommodation of his wounded soldiers. Gell. 16, c. 13.—Appian. Hisp.

Italus, a son of Telegonus. Hygin. fab. 127. —An Arcadian prince, who came to Italy, where he established a kingdom, called after him. It is supposed that he received divine honours after death, as Æneas calls upon him among the deities to whom he paid his adoration when he entered Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 178.—A prince, whose daughter Roma by his wife Leucaria is said to have married Æneas or Ascanius. Plut. in Rom.

—A king of the Cherusci, &c. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 16.

Itargris, a river of Germany.

Ites, a daughter of Danaus. Hygin. fab. 170.

Itemales, an old man who exposed Œdipus on mount Cithæron, &c. Hygin. fab. 65.

Ithæos, a celebrated island in the Ionian sea, on the western parts of Greece, with a city of the same name, famous for being part of the kingdom of Ulysses. It is very rocky and mountainous, measures about 95 miles in circumference, and is now known by the name of Isola del Compare, or Thiuchi. Hom. Il. 2, v. 129. Od. 1, v. 186. l. 4, v. 601. l. 9, v. 80.—Strab. 1 & 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

Ithacesias, three islands opposite Vibo, on the coast of the Bruttii.—Baia was called also Ithacenia, because built by Bajus the pilot of Ulysses. Sil. 8, v. 540. l. 12, v. 113.

Ithobalus, a king of Tyre, who died B.C. 995. Jacopinus.

Ithome, a town of Phthiotia. Hom. Il. 2.

—Another of Messenia, which surrendered, after 10 years' siege, to Lacedæmon, 794 years before the Christian era. Jupiter was called Ithomater, from a temple which he had there, where games were also celebrated, and the conqueror rewarded with an oak crown. Paus. 4, c. 32.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 179.—Strab. 8.

Ithomalia, a festival in which musicians contended, observed at Ithome, in honour of Jupiter, who had been nursed by the nymphs Ithome and Neda, the former of whom gave her name to a city, and the latter to a river.

Ithyphallus, an obscene name of Priapus. Columell. 10.—Diod. 1.

Itius Portus, a town of Gaul, now Wetsand, or Boulogne, in Picardy. Cæsar set sail from thence on his passage into Britain. Cæsar. G. 4, c. 21. l. 5, c. 2 & 5.

Itionia, a surname of Minerva, from a place in Boetia, where she was worshipped.

Itionus, a king of Thessaly, son of Deucalion, who first invented the manner of polishing metals. Lucan. 6, v. 400.

Ituna, a river of Britain, now Eden, in Cumberland.

Ituræa, a country of Palestine, whose inhabitants were very skilful in drawing the bow. Lucan. 7, v. 230 & 514.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 448.—Strab. 17.

Iturum, a town of Umbria.

Ityrus, a son of Zebulus and Ædon, killed by his mother. Vid. Ædon. Hom. Od. 19, v. 462.

Ityræa, a people of Palestine. Vid. Ituræa.

Ityrs, a son of Teresus king of Thrace by Procne, daughter of Pandion king of Athens. He was killed by his mother when he was about six years old, and served up as meat before his father. He was changed into a pheasant, his mother into a swallow, and his father into an owl. Vid. Philomeia. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 620. Amor. 2, l. 14, v. 29.—Horat. 4, od. 12.—A Trojan who came to Italy with Æneas, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

Juba, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who succeeded his father Hiempsal, and favoured the cause of Pompey against J. Caesar. He defeated Curio, whom Caesar had sent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharsalia, he joined his forces to those of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapsus, and totally abandoned by his subjects. He killed himself with Petreius, who had shared his good fortune and his adversity. His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. Plut. in Pomp. & Cas.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Suet. in Cas. c. 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela. 1, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, l. 2.—Caes. de Bell. Civ. 2.—Pat. 2. c. 54.—The second of that name was the son of Juba I. He was led among the captives to Rome, to adorn the triumph of Caesar.

His captivity was the source of the greatest honours, and his application to study procured him more glory than he could have obtained from the inheritance of a kingdom. He gained the hearts of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and Augustus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king, and making him master of all the territories which his father once possessed. His popularity was so great, that the Mauritians rewarded his benevolence by making him one of their gods. The Athenians raised him a statue, and the Ethiopians worshipped him as a deity. Juba wrote a history of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commanded by the ancients, but of which only a few fragments remain. He also wrote on the history of Arabia and the antiquities of Assyria, chiefly collected from Berosus. Besides these he composed some treatises upon the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c., now lost. Strab. 17.—Suet. in Cal. 26.—Plin. 5, c. 25 & 32.—Dion. 51, &c.

Judaophilus, a native of Asculum celebrated for his patriotism, in the age of Pompey, &c.

Judeea, a famous country of Assyria, bounded by Arabia, Egypt, Phœnicia, the Mediterranean sea, and part of Syria. The inhabitants, whose history is best collected from the Holy Scriptures, were chiefly governed after their Babylonish captivity by the high priests, who raised themselves to the rank of princes, B.C. 153, and continued in the enjoyment of regal power till the age of Augustus. Plut. de Ossir.—Strab. 16.—Dion. 36.—Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 6.—Lucan. 2, v. 593.

Jugilla, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage. Festus de V. Sig.

Jugantes, a people of Britain. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 32.

Jugarius, a street in Rome, below the Capitol.

Jugurtha, the illegitimate son of Manastabal the brother of Micipsa. Micipsa and Manastabal were the sons of Masinissa king of Numidia. Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew with his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal; but, as he was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were frustrated; Jugurtha showed himself brave and active, and endeared himself to the Roman general. Micipsa appointed him successor to his kingdom with his two sons, but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha destroyed Hiempsal, and stripped Adherbal of his possessions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for safety. The Romans listened to the well-grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators, and the suppliant monarch, forsaken in his distress, perished by the snares of his enemy. Cæcilius Metellus was at last sent against Jugurtha, and his firmness and success soon reduced the crafty Numidian, and obliged him to fly among his savage neighbours for support. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father-in-law Bocchus, from whom he claimed assistance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of five years. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger, B.C. 106. The name and the wars of Jugurtha have been immortalized by the pen of Sallust. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Pat. 2. c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Mar. & Syll.—Eutrop. 4, c. 3.

Julia lex, prima de provinciis, by J. Caesar, A.U.C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magistrates should act there as judges, and that the towns and villages through which the Roman magistrates and ambassadors passed should maintain them during their stay; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, should leave a scheme of their accounts in two cities of their province, and deliver a copy of it at the public treasury; that the provincial governors should not accept of a golden crown unless they were honoured with a triumph by the senate; that no supreme commander should go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman senate and people.—Another, de sumptibus, in the age of Augustus. It limited the expense of provisions on the dies profecti, or days appointed for the transaction of business, to 200 sesterces; on common calendar festivals to 300; and on all extraordinary occasions, such as marriages, births, &c., to 1000.—Another, de provinciis, by J. Caesar Dictator. It ordained that no pretorian province should be held more than one year, and a consular province more than two years.—Another, called also Campana agraria, by the same, A.U.C. 691. It required that all the lands of Campania, formerly rented according to the estimation of the state, should be divided among the plebeians, and that all the members of the senate should bind themselves by an oath to establish, confirm, and protect that law.—Another, de civitate, by L. J. Caesar, A.U.C. 664. It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all such as, during the civil wars.

had remained the constant friends of the republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free denizens, and composed eight new tribes.—Another, de judicibus, by J. Cæsar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be chosen from the richest people in every contury, allowing the senators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni ærarii.—Another, de ambibus, by Augustus. It restrained the illicit measures used at elections, and restored to the comitia their ancient privileges, which had been destroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Cæsar.—Another, by Augustus, de adulterio & pudicitia. It punished adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Journal, sat. s. v. 30, allude to it.—Another, called also Papia, or Papia Poppæa, which was the same as the following, only enlarged by the consuls Papius and Poppæus, A.U.C. 762.—Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Augustus. It proposed rewards to such as engaged in matrimony, of a particular description. It inflicted punishment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the senators and sons of senators excepted, to intermarry with the libertines, or children of those that had been liberti, or servants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he speaks of lex marita.—Another, de majestate, by J. Cæsar. It punished with æque & ignis interdictio all such as were found guilty of the crimen majestatis, or treason against the state.

Julia, a daughter of J. Cæsar, by Cornelia, famous for her personal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable disposition more strongly cemented the friendship of the father and of the son-in-law; but her sudden death in child-bed, B.C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationship, and soon produced a civil war. Plut.—The mother of M. Antony, whose humanity is greatly celebrated in saving her brother-in-law J. Cæsar from the cruel prosecutions of her son.—An aunt of J. Cæsar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.—The only daughter of the emperor Augustus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus; after whose death she was given to Agrippa, by whom she had five children. She became a second time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her lasciviousness and debaucheries so disgusted her husband, that he retired from the court of the emperor; and Augustus, informed of her lustful propensities and infamy, banished her from his sight, and confined her in a small island on the coast of Causpasia. She was starved to death, A.D. 14, by order of Tiberius, who had succeeded to Augustus as emperor of Rome. Plut.—A daughter of the emperor Titus, who prostituted herself to her brother Domitian.—A daughter of Julia the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidas, and was banished for her licentiousness.—A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the island of Lesbos, A.D. 17. She married a senator called M. Vinicius, at the age of 16, and enjoyed the most unbounded favours in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accused of being her first seducer. She was banished by Caligula on suspicion of conspiracy. Claudius recalled her; but she was soon after banished by the powerful intrigues of Messalina, and put to death about the 24th year of her age. She was no stranger to the debaucheries of the age, and she prostituted herself as freely to the meanness of the people as to the nobler companions of her brother's extravagance. Seneca, as some suppose, was banished to Corsica for having seduced her.—A celebrated woman, born in Phœnicia. She is also called Domna. She applied herself to the study of geometry and philosophy, &c., and rendered herself conspicuous, as much by her mental as by her personal charms. She came to Rome, where her learning recommended her to all the literati of the age. She married Septimius Severus, who, 30 years after this matrimonial connection, was invested with the imperial purple. Severus was guided by the prudence and advice of Julia, but he was blind to her foibles, and often punished with the greatest severity those vices which were enormous in the empress. She is even said to have conspired against the emperor, but she resolved to blot out, by patronizing literature, the spots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for some time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two sons and successors. Geta at last, however, fell a sacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while she attempted to screen her favourite son from his brother's dagger. According to some, Julia committed incest with her son Caracalla, and publicly married him. She starved herself when her ambitious views were defeated by Macrinus, who aspired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.—A town of Gallia Togata.

Juliacum, a town of Germany, now Jüllers.
Julianus, the son of Julius Constantius, the brother of Constantine the Great, born at Constantinople. The massacre which attended the elevation of the sons of Constantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrines of the christian religion, and exhorted to be modest, temperate, and to despise the gratification of all sensual pleasures. Gallus received the instructions of his pious teachers with deference and submission, but Julian showed his dislike for christianity by secretly cherishing a desire to become one of the votaries of paganism. He gave sufficient proofs of this propensity when he went to Athens in the 24th year of his age, where he applied himself to the study of magic and astrology. He was some time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæsar, by Constantius, and there he showed himself worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valour, and the numerous victories which he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildness, as well as his condescension, gained him the hearts of his soldiers; and when Constantius, to whom Julian was become suspected, ordered him to send him part of his forces to go into the east, the army immediately manifested, and promised immortal fidelity to their leader, by refusing to obey the order of Constantius. They even compelled Julian, by threats and entreaties, to accept of the title of independent emperor and of Augustus; and the death of Constantius, which soon after happened, left him sole master of the Roman empire, A.D. 361. Julian then disclosed his religious sentiments, and publicly disavowed the doctrines of christianity, and offered solemn sacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religious opinion was attributed to the austerity with which he received the precepts of christianity, or, according to others, to the literary conversation and persuasive eloquence of some of the Athenian philosophers. From this circumstance, therefore, Julian has been called Apostate. After he had made his public entry at Constantinople, he determined to continue the Persian war, and check those barbarians, who had for 60 years derided the indolence of the Roman emperors. When he had crossed the Tigris, he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldness into the enemy's country. His march was that of a conqueror; he met with no opposition from a weak and indigent enemy; but the country of Assyria had been left desolate by the Persians, and Julian, without corn or provisions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his fleet again over the streams of the Tigris, he took the resolution of marching up the source of the river, and imitating the bold return of the 10,000 Greeks. As he advanced through the country he defeated the officers of Sapor the king of Persia; but an engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his soldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A.D. 363 in the 32d year of his age. His last moments were spent in a conversation with a philosopher about the immortality of the soul, and he breathed his last without expressing the least sorrow for his fate, or the suddenness of his death. Julian's character has been admired by some and censured by others, but the malevolence of his enemies arises from his apostasy. As a man and as a monarch he demands our warmest commendations; but we must blame his idolatry, and despise his bigoted principles. He was moderate in his successes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He abolished the luxuries which reigned in the court of Constantinople, and dismissed with contempt the numerous officers who waited upon Constantius, to anoint his head or perfume his body. He was frugal in his meals and slept little, reposing himself on a skin spread on the ground. He awoke at midnight, and spent the rest of the night in reading or writing, and issued early from his tent to pay his daily visit to the guards around the camp. He was not fond of public amusements, but rather dedicated his time to study and solitude. When he passed through Antioch in his Persian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious sentiments, ridiculed his person and lampooned him in satirical verses. The emperor made use of the same arms for his defence, and rather than destroy his enemies by the sword, he condescended to expose them to derision, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in a humorous work, which he called Misopogon, or beard-hater. He imitated the virtuous example of Scipio and Alexander, and laid no temptation for his virtue by visiting some female captives that had fallen into his hands. In his matrimonial connections, Julian rather consulted policy than inclination, and his marriage with the sister of Constantius arose from his unwillingness to offend his benefactor, rather than to obey the laws of nature. He was buried at Tarsus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Constantinople. He distinguished himself by his writings, as well as by his military character. Besides his Misopogon, he wrote the history of Gaul. He also wrote two letters to the Athenians; and, besides, there are now extant 64 of his letters on various subjects. His Cæsars is the most famous of all his compositions, being a satire upon all the Roman emperors from J. Cæsar to Constantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author severely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius, whom he had proposed to himself as a pattern, and speaks in scurrilous and abusive language of his relation Constantine. It has been observed of Julian that, like Cæsar, he could employ at the same time his hand to write, his ear to listen, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. The best edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Leips. 1696; and of the Cæsars, that of Heusinger, 8vo, Gothæ, 1741. Julian.—Socrat.—Eutrop.—Amm.—Liban. &c. —A son of Constantine.—A maternal uncle of the emperor Julian.—A Roman emperor. Vid. Didius.—A Roman, who proclaimed himself emperor in Italy during the reign of Diocletian, &c. —A governor of Africa.—A counsellor of the emperor Adrian.—A general in Dacia, in Domitian's reign.

Julii, a family of Alba, brought to Rome by Romulus, where they soon rose to the greatest honours of the state. J. Cæsar and Augustus were of this family; and it was said, perhaps through flattery, that they were lineally descended from Æneas the founder of Lavinium.

Juliomagus, a city of Gaul, now Angers, in Anjou.

Juloppolis, a town of Bithynia, supposed by some to be the same as Tarsus of Cilicia.

Julis, a town of the island of Cos, which gave birth to Simonides, &c. The walls of this city were all marble, and there are now some pieces remaining entire above 75 feet in height, as the monuments of its ancient splendour. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Julius Cæsar. Vid. Cæsar.—Agricola, a governor of Britain. A.C. 80, who first discovered that Britain was an island by sailing round it. His son-in-law, the historian Tacitus, has written an account of his life. Tacit. in Agric.—Obsequens, a Latin writer who flourished A.D. 214. The best edition of his book de prodigiis is that of Oudendorp, 8vo, L. Ann.* 15, c. 71.—Solinus, a writer. Vid. Solinus.—Titianus, a writer in the age of Diocletian. His son became famous for his oratorical powers, and was made preceptor in the family of Maximinus. Julius wrote a history of all the provinces of the Roman empire, greatly commended by the ancients. He also wrote some letters, in which he happily imitated the style and elegance of Cicero, for which he was called the ape of his age.—Africanus, a chronologer, who flourished A.D. 320.—Constantius, the father of the emperor Julian, was killed at the accession of the sons of Constantine to the throne, and his son nearly shared his fate.—Pollux, a grammarian of Naupactus, in Egypt. Vid. Pollux.—Cæsar, a celebrated Roman, put to death by order of Caracalla. He bore the undeserved punishment inflicted on him with the greatest resignation, and even pleasure.—Proculus, a Roman, who solemnly declared to his countrymen, after Romulus had disappeared, that he had seen him above a human shape, and that he had ordered him to tell the Romans to honour him as a god. Julius was believed. Plut. in Rom.—Ovid.—Florus. Vid. Florus.—L. Cæsar, a Roman consul, uncle to Antony the triumvir the father of Cæsar the dictator. He died as he was putting on his shoes.—Celsus, a tribune imprisoned for conspiring against Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 24.—Maximianus, a Theseus at last reinstated them in honour of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father. These games were observed every third, or rather fifth, year, and held so sacred and inviolable that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was destroyed by Mummius the Roman general, they were observed with the usual solemnity, and the Sicyonians were entrusted with the superintendence, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. Combats of every kind were exhibited, and the victors were rewarded with garlands of pine leaves. Some time after the custom was changed, and the victor received a crown of dry and withered parsley. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Isthmian games, as among the Romans from the consular government. Paus. 1, c. 44. l. 2, c. 1 & 2.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Plut. in Thest.

Isthmius, a king of Messenia, &c. Paus. 4, c. 3.

Isthmus, a small neck of land which joins one country to another, and prevents the sea from making them separate, such as that of Corinth, called often the Isthmus by way of eminence, which joins Peloponnesus to Greece. Nero attempted to cut it across and make a communication between the two seas, but in vain. It is now called Hexamili. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 101.

Istisæotis, a country of Greece, near Ossa. Vid. Histisæotis.

Istria, a province at the west of Illyricum, at the top of the Adriatic sea, whose inhabitants were originally pirates, and lived on plunder. They were not subjected to Rome till six centuries after the foundation of that city. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Liv. 10, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 19.—Justin. 9, c. 2.

Istropolis, a city of Thrace near the mouth of the Ister, founded by a Milesian colony. Plin. 4, c. 11.

Iteus and Antiphus, sons of Priam, the latter by Hecuba, and the former by a concubine. They were seized by Achilles, as they fed their father's flocks on mount Ida; but they were redeemed by Priam, and fought against the Greeks. They were both killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11.—A city of Bœotia. Strab. 9.

Italia, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded by the Adriatic and Tyrrhene seas, and by the Alpine mountains. It has been compared, and with some similitude, to a man's leg. It has borne, at different periods, the different names of Saturnia, Ænotria, Hesperia, Ausonia, and Tyrrhena, and received the name of Italy either from Italus, a king of the country, or from Italos, a Greek word which signifies an ox, an animal very common in that part of Europe. The boundaries of Italy appear to have been formed by nature itself, which seems to have been particularly careful in supplying this country with whatever may contribute not only to the support, but also to the pleasures and luxuries of life. It has been called the garden of Europe; and the panegyric which Pliny bestows upon it seems not in any degree exaggerated. The ancient inhabitants called themselves Aborigines, offspring of the soil, and the country was soon after peopled by colonies from Greece. The Pelasgi and the Arcadians made settlements there, and the whole country was divided into as many different governments as there were towns, till the rapid increase of the Roman power [Vid. Roma] changed the face of Italy, and united all its states in support of one common cause. Italy has been the mother of arts as well as of arms, and the immortal monuments which remain of the eloquence and poetical abilities of its inhabitants are universally known. It was divided into 11 small provinces or regions by Augustus, though sometimes known under the three greater divisions of Cisalpine Gaul, Italy properly so called, and Magna Græcia. The sea above was called Superum, and that at the south Inferum. Plin. 3, c. 1.—Dionys. Hal.—Diod. 4.—Justin. 4, &c.—C. Nep. in Dion. Alcib., &c.—Liv. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Varro de R. Itallosus, a poet. Vid. Silius.

Italus, a son of Telegonus. Hygin. fab. 127. —An Arcadian prince, who came to Italy, where he established a kingdom, called after him. It is supposed that he received divine honours after death, as Æneas calls upon him among the deities to whom he paid his adoration when he entered Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 178.—A prince, whose daughter Roma by his wife Leucaria is said to have married Æneas or Ascanius. Plut. in Rom. —A king of the Cherusci, &c. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 16.

Itargris, a river of Germany.

Itea, a daughter of Danaus. Hygin. fab. 170.

Itemales, an old man who exposed Ædipus on mount Cithæron, &c. Hygin. fab. 65.

Ithaca, a celebrated island in the Ionian sea, on the western parts of Greece, with a city of the same name, famous for being part of the kingdom of Ulysses. It is very rocky and mountainous, measures about 25 miles in circumference, and is now known by the name of Isola del Compare, or Thiacki. *Homer. Ithacæsis, three islands opposite Vibo, on the coast of the Bruttii.—Baia was called also Ithacæsis, because built by Bajus the pilot of Ulysses. Sil. 8, v. 540. l. 12, v. 113.

Ithobalus, a king of Tyre, who died B.C. 595. Josephus.

Ithome, a town of Phthiotis. Homer. Il. 2. —Another of Messenia, which surrendered, after 10 years' siege, to Lacedæmon, 794 years before the Christian era. Jupiter was called Ithomates, from a temple which he had there, where games were also celebrated, and the conqueror rewarded with an oak crown. Paus. 4, c. 32.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 179.—Strab. 8.

Ithomæia, a festival in which musicians contended, observed at Ithome, in honour of Jupiter, who had been nursed by the nymphs Ithome and Neda, the former of whom gave her name to a city, and the latter to a river.

Ithyphallus, an obscene name of Priapus. Columell. 10.—Diod. 1.

Itius Portus, a town of Gaul, now Wetsand, or Boulogne, in Picardy. Cæsar set sail from thence on his passage into Britain. Cæsar. G. 4, c. 21. l. 5, c. 2 & 5.

Itionia, a surname of Minerva, from a place in Bœotia, where she was worshipped.

Itionus, a king of Thessaly, son of Deucalion, who first invented the manner of polishing metals. Lucan. 6, v. 402.

Ituna, a river of Britain, now Edes, in Cumberland.

Ituræa, a country of Palestine, whose inhabitants were very skillful in drawing the bow. Lucan. 7, v. 230 & 514.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 448.—Strab. 17.

Iturum, a town of Umbria.

Itylus, a son of Zethus and Aëdon, killed by his mother. Vid. Aëdon. Homer. Od. 19, v. 462.

Ityræa, a people of Palestine. Vid. Ituræa.

Itys, a son of Tereus king of Thrace by Procne, daughter of Pandion king of Athens. He was killed by his mother when he was about six years old, and served up as meat before his father. He was changed into a pheasant, his mother into a swallow, and his father into an owl. Vid. Philomela. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 690. Amor. 2, el. 14, v. 20.—Horat. 4, ed. 12.—A Trojan who came to Italy with Aeneas, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

Juba, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who succeeded his father Hiempsal, and favoured the cause of Pompey against J. Cæsar. He defeated Curio, whom Cæsar had sent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharsalia, he joined his forces to those of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapsus, and totally abandoned by his subjects. He killed himself with Petreus, who had shared his good fortune and his adversity. His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Suet. in Cæs. c. 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela, 1, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, &c.—Cæsar. de Bell. Civ. 2.—Paterc. 2, c. 54.—The second of that name was the son of Juba I. He was led among the captives to Rome, to adorn the triumph of Cæsar. His captivity was the source of the greatest honours, and his application to study procured him more glory than he could have obtained from the inheritance of a kingdom. He gained the hearts of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and Augustus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king, and making him master of all the territories which his father once possessed. His popularity was so great, that the Mauritians rewarded his benevolence by making him one of their gods. The Athenians raised him a statue, and the Æthiopians worshipped him as a deity. Juba wrote a history of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commended by the ancients, but of which only a few fragments remain. He also wrote on the history of Arabia and the antiquities of Assyria, chiefly collected from Berosus. Besides these he composed some treatises upon the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c., now lost. Strab. 17.—Suet. in Cal. 36.—Plin. 5, c. 25 & 32.—Dion. 51, &c.

Judacillus, a native of Asculum celebrated for his patriotism, in the age of Pompey, &c.

Judea, a famous country of Assyria, bounded by Arabia, Egypt, Phœnicia, the Mediterranean sea, and part of Syria. The inhabitants, whose history is best collected from the Holy Scriptures, were chiefly governed after their Babylonian captivity by the high priests, who raised themselves to the rank of princes, B.C. 539, and continued in the enjoyment of regal power till the age of Augustus. Plut. de Civ.—Strab. 16.—Dion. 36.—Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 6.—Lucan. 2, v. 293.

Jugillia, a surname of Juno, because she presided over marriage. Festus de V. Sig.

Jugantes, a people of Britain. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 32.

Jugartus, a street in Rome, below the Capitol.

Jugurtha, the illegitimate son of Manastabal the brother of Micipsa. Micipsa and Manastabal were the sons of Masinissa king of Numidia. Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew with his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal; but, as he was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were frustrated; Jugurtha showed himself brave and active, and endeared himself to the Roman general. Micipsa appointed him successor to his kingdom with his two sons, but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha destroyed Hiempsal, and stripped Adherbal of his possessions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for safety. The Romans listened to the well-grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators, and the suppliant monarch, forsaken in his distress, perished by the snares of his enemy. Cæcilius Metellus was at last sent against Jugurtha, and his firmness and success soon reduced the crafty Numidian, and obliged him to fly among his savage neighbours for support. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father-in-law Boochus, from whom he claimed assistance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of five years. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger, B.C. 106. The name and the wars of Jugurtha have been immortalized by the pen of Sallust. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Mar. & Syll.—Eutrop. 4, c. 3.

Julia lex, prima de provinciis, by J. Cæsar, A.U.C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magistrates should act there as judges, and that the towns and villages through which the Roman magistrates and ambassadors passed should maintain them during their stay; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, should leave a scheme of their accounts in two cities of their province, and deliver a copy of it at the public treasury; that the provincial governors should not accept of a golden crown unless they were honoured with a triumph by the senate; that no supreme commander should go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman senate and people.—Another, de sumptibus, in the age of Augustus. It limited the expense of provisions on the dies profecti, or days appointed for the transaction of business, to 200 sesterces; on common calendar festivals to 300; and on all extraordinary occasions, such as marriages, births, &c., to 1000.—Another, de provinciis, by J. Cæsar Dictator. It ordained that no pretorian province should be held more than one year, and a consular province more than two years.—Another, called also Campana agraria, by the same, A.U.C. 691. It required that all the lands of Campania, formerly rented according to the estimation of the state, should be divided among the plebeians, and that all the members of the senate should bind themselves by an oath to establish, confirm, and protect that law.—Another, de civitate, by L. J. Cæsar, A.U.C. 664. It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all such as, during the civil wars had remained the constant friends of the republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free citizens, and composed eight new tribes.—Another, de iudiciis, by J. Caesar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be chosen from the richest people in every century, allowing the senators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni arvani.—Another, de ambitu, by Augustus. It restrained the illicit measures used at elections, and restored to the comitia their ancient privileges, which had been destroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Caesar.—Another, by Augustus, de adulterio & pudicitia. It punished adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Juvenal, sat. 8, v. 30, alludes to it.—Another, called also Papia, or Papia Poppæa, which was the same as the following, only enacted by the consuls Papius and Poppæus, A.U.C. 762.—Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Augustus. It proposed rewards to such as engaged in matrimony, of a particular description. It inflicted punishment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the senators and sons of senators excepted, to intermarry with the libertini, or children of those that had been liberti, or servants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he speaks of lex marita.—Another, de maiestate, by J. Caesar. It punished with agnæ & ignis interdictio all such as were found guilty of the crimen maiestatis, or treason against the state.

Julia, a daughter of J. Caesar, by Cornelia, famous for her personal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable disposition more strongly cemented the friendship of the father and of the son-in-law; but her sudden death in child-bed, B.C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationship, and soon produced a civil war. Plut.—The mother of M. Antony, whose humanity is greatly celebrated in saving her brother-in-law J. Caesar from the cruel prosecutions of her son.—An aunt of J. Caesar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.—The only daughter of the emperor Augustus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus; after whose death she was given to Agrippa, by whom she had five children. She became a second time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her lasciviousness and debaucheries so disgraced her husband, that he retired from the court of the emperor; and Augustus, informed of her lustful propensities and infamy, banished her from his sight, and confined her in a small island on the coast of Campania. She was starved to death, A.D. 24, by order of Tiberius, who had succeeded to Augustus as emperor of Rome. Plut.—A daughter of the emperor Trajan, who prostituted herself to her brother Domitian.—A daughter of Julia the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidas, and was banished for her licentiousness.—A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the island of Lesbos, A.D. 17. She married a senator called M. Vinicius, at the age of 16, and enjoyed the most unbounded favours in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accused of being her first seducer. She was banished by Caligula on suspicion of conspiracy. Claudius recalled her; but she was soon after banished by the powerful intrigues of Messalina, and put to death about the 24th year of her age. She was no stranger to the debaucheries of the age, and she prostituted herself as freely to the meanness of the people as to the nobler companions of her brother's extravagance. Seneca, as some suppose, was banished to Corsica for having seduced her.—A celebrated woman, born in Phœnicia. She is also called Domana. She applied herself to the study of geometry and philosophy, &c., and rendered herself conspicuous, as much by her mental as by her personal charms. She came to Rome, where her learning recommended her to all the literati of the age. She married Septimius Severus, who, 30 years after this matrimonial connection, was invested with the imperial purple. Severus was guided by the prudence and advice of Julia, but he was blind to her foibles, and often punished with the greatest severity those vices which were enormous in the empress. She is even said to have conspired against the emperor, but she resolved to blot out, by patronizing literature, the spots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for some time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two sons and successors. Geta at last, however, fell a sacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while she attempted to screen her favourite son from his brother's dagger. According to some, Julia committed incest with her son Caracalla, and publicly married him. She starved herself when her ambitious views were defeated by Macrinus, who aspired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.—A town of Gælia Togata.

Juliacum, a town of Germany, now Juliers.
Julianus, a son of Julius Constantius, the brother of Constantine the Great, born at Constantinople. The massacre which attended the elevation of the sons of Constantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrines of the christian religion, and exhorted to be modest, temperate, and to despise the gratification of all sensual pleasures. Gallus received the instructions of his pious teachers with deference and submission, but Julian showed his dislike for christianity by secretly cherishing a desire to become one of the votaries of paganism. He gave sufficient proofs of this propensity when he went to Athens in the 24th year of his age, where he applied himself to the study of magic and astrology. He was some time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæsar, by Constant, and there he showed himself worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valour, and the numerous victories which he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildness, as well as his condescension, gained him the hearts of his soldiers; and when Constant, to whom Julian was become suspected, ordered him to send him part of his forces to go into the east, the army immediately mutinied, and promised immortal fidelity to their leader, by refusing to obey the order of Constant. They even compelled Julian, by threats and entreaties, to accept of the title of independent emperor and of Augustus; and the death of Constant, which soon after happened, left him sole master of the Roman empire, A.D. 324. Julian then disclosed his religious sentiments, and publicly disavowed the doctrines of christianity, and offered solemn sacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religious opinion was attributed to the austerity with which he received the precepts of christianity, or, according to others, to the literary conversation and persuasive eloquence of some of the Athenian philosophers. From this circumstance, therefore, Julian has been called Apostate. After he had made his public entry at Constantinople, he determined to continue the Persian war, and check those barbarians, who had for 60 years derided the indolence of the Roman emperors. When he had crossed the Tigris, he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldness into the enemy's country. His march was that of a conqueror; he met with no opposition from a weak and indigent enemy; but the country of Assyria had been left desolate by the Persians, and Julian, without corn or provisions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his fleet again over the streams of the Tigris, he took the resolution of marching up the source of the river, and imitating the bold return of the 10,000 Greeks. As he advanced through the country he defeated the officers of Sapor the king of Persia; but an engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his soldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A.D. 363 in the 32nd year of his age. His last moments were spent in a conversation with a philosopher about the immortality of the soul, and he breathed his last without expressing the least sorrow for his fate, or the suddenness of his death. Julian's character has been admired by some and censured by others, but the malevolence of his enemies arises from his apostasy. As a man and as a monarch he demands our warmest commendations; but we must blame his idolatry, and despise his bigoted principles. He was moderate in his successes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He abolished the luxuries which reigned in the court of Constantinople, and dismissed with contempt the numerous officers who waited upon Constantius, to anoint his head or perfume his body. He was frugal in his meals and slept little, reposing himself on a skin spread on the ground. He awoke at midnight, and spent the rest of the night in reading or writing, and issued early from his tent to pay his daily visit to the guards around the camp. He was not fond of public amusements, but rather dedicated his time to study and solitude. When he passed through Antioch in his Persian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious sentiments, ridiculed his person and lampooned him in satirical verses. The emperor made use of the same arms for his defence, and rather than destroy his enemies by the sword, he condescended to expose them to derision, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in a humorous work, which he called Misopogon, or beard-hater. He imitated the virtuous example of Scipio and Alexander, and laid no temptation for his virtue by visiting some female captives that had fallen into his hands. In his matrimonial connections, Julian rather consulted policy than inclination, and his marriage with the sister of Constantius arose from his unwillingness to offend his benefactor, rather than to obey the laws of nature. He was buried at Tarsus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Constantinople. He distinguished himself by his writings, as well as by his military character. Besides his Misopogon, he wrote the history of Gaul. He also wrote two letters to the Athenians; and, besides, there are now extant 64 of his letters on various subjects. His Cæsars is the most famous of all his compositions, being a satire upon all the Roman emperors from J. Cæsar

to Constantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author severely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius, whom he had proposed to himself as a pattern, and speaks in scurrilous and abusive language of his relation Constantine. It has been observed of Julian that, like Cæsar, he could employ at the same time his hand to write, his ear to listen, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. The best edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Leips. 1699; and of the Cæsars, that of Heusinger, 8vo. Götting, 1741. Julian.—Socrat.—Entrop.—Ann.—Liban., &c.—A son of Constantine.—A maternal uncle of the emperor Julian.—A Roman emperor. Vid. Didius.—A Roman, who proclaimed himself emperor in Italy during the reign of Diocletian, &c.—A governor of Africa.—A counsellor of the emperor Adrian.—A general in Dacia, in Domitian's reign.

Julii, a family of Alba, brought to Rome by Romulus, where they soon rose to the greatest honours of the state. J. Cæsar and Augustus were of this family; and it was said, perhaps through flattery, that they were linearly descended from Æneas the founder of Lavinium.

Juliomagus, a city of Gaul, now Angers, in Anjou.

Juliopepla, a town of Bithynia, supposed by some to be the same as Tarsus of Cilicia.

Julis, a town of the island of Cos, which gave birth to Simonides, &c. The walls of this city were all marble, and there are now some pieces remaining entire above 12 feet in height, as the monuments of its ancient splendour. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Julius Cæsar. Vid. Cæsar.—Agriola, a governor of Britain A.C. 80, who first discovered that Britain was an island by sailing round it. His son-in-law, the historian Tacitus, has written an account of his life. Tacit. in Agric.—Obsequens, a Latin writer who flourished A.D. 214. The best edition of his book de prodigiis is that of Oudendorp, 8vo, L. Bat. 1720.—S., a pretor, &c. Cic. ad Her. 2, c. 13.—Agrippa, banished from Rome by Nero, after the discovery of the Pisonian conspiracy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 71.—Solinus, a writer. Vid. Solinus.—Titianus, a writer in the age of Diocletian. His son became famous for his oratorical powers, and was made preceptor in the family of Maximianus. Julius wrote a history of all the provinces of the Roman empire, greatly commended by the ancients. He also wrote some letters, in which he happily imitated the style and elegance of Cicero, for which he was called the ape of his age.—Africanus, a chronologer, who flourished A.D. 200.—Constantius, the father of the emperor Julian, was killed at the accession of the sons of Constantine to the throne, and his son nearly shared his fate.—Pollux, a grammarian of Naupactus, in Egypt. Vid. Pollux.—Canus, a celebrated Roman, put to death by order of Caracalla. He bore the undeserved punishment inflicted on him with the greatest resignation, and even pleasure.—Proculus, a Roman, who solemnly declared to his countrymen, after Romulus had disappeared, that he had seen him above a human shape, and that he had ordered him to tell the Romans to honour him as a god. Julius was believed. Plut. in Rom.—Uvid.—Florus. Vid. Florus.—L. Cæsar, a Roman consul, uncle to Antony the triumvir the father of Cæsar the dictator. He died as he was putting on his shoes.—Celsus, a tribune imprisoned for conspiring against Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 14.—Maximianus, a Thracian, who, from a shepherd, became an emperor of Rome. Vid. Maximianus.

IULIUS, the name of Ascanius the son of Æneas. Vid. Ascanius.—A son of Ascanius, born in Lavinium. In the succession to the kingdom of Alba, Æneas Sylvius the son of Æneas and Lavinia was preferred to him. He was, however, made chief priest. Dionys. i.—Virg. Æn. i. v. 271.—A son of Antony the triumvir and Fulvia. Vid. Antonius Julius.

JUNIA lex, Sacrata, by L. Junius Brutus the first tribune of the people, A.U.C. 260. It ordained that the person of the tribune should be held sacred and inviolable; that an appeal might be made from the consuls to the tribunes; and that no senator should be able to exercise the office of a tribune.—Another, A.U.C. 627, which excluded all foreigners from enjoying the privileges or names of Roman citizens.

JUNIA, a niece of Cato of Utica, who married Cassius, and died 64 years after her husband had killed himself at the battle of Philippi.—Calpurnia, a beautiful Roman lady, accused of incest with her brother Silanus. She was descended from Augustus. She was banished by Claudius, and recalled by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 4.

JUNIUS Blæsus, a proconsul of Africa under the emperors. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 35.—Lupus, a senator who accused Vitellius of aspiring to the sovereignty, &c. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 42.—D. Silanus, a Roman who committed adultery with Julia the granddaughter of Augustus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 24.—Brutus. Vid. Brutus.

JUNO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, daughter of Saturn and Ops. She was sister to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Vesta, Ceres, &c. She was born at Argos, or, according to others, in Samos, and was entrusted to the care of the Seasons, or, as Homer and Ovid mention, to Oceanus and Tethys. Some of the inhabitants of Argolis supposed that she had been brought up by the three daughters of the river Asterion; and the people of Stymphalus, in Arcadia, maintained that she had been educated under the care of Temenus the son of Pelasgus. Juno was devoured by Saturn, according to some mythologists; and according to Apollodorus she was again restored to the world by means of a pottage which Metis gave to Saturn, to make him throw up the stone which his wife had given him to swallow instead of Jupiter. Vid. Saturnus. Jupiter was not insensible to the charms of his sister; and the more powerfully to gain her confidence he changed himself into a cuckoo, and raised a great storm, and made the air unusually chill and cold. Under this form he went to the goddess, all shivering. Juno pitied the cuckoo, and took him into her bosom. When Jupiter had gained these advantages, he resumed his original form, and obtained the gratification of his desires, after he had made a solemn promise of marriage to his sister. The nuptials of Jupiter and Juno were celebrated with the greatest solemnity: the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. Chelone, a young woman, was the only one who refused to come, and who derided the ceremony. For this impiety Mercury changed her into a tortoise, and condemned her to perpetual silence; from which circumstance the tortoise has always been used as a symbol of silence among the ancients. By her marriage with Jupiter, Juno became the queen of all the gods, and mistress of heaven and earth. Her conjugal happiness, however, was frequently disturbed by the numerous amours of her husband, and she showed herself jealous and inexorable in the highest degree. Her severity to the mistresses and illegitimate children of her husband was unparalleled. She persecuted Hercules and his descendants with the most inveterate fury; and her resentment against Paris, who had given the golden apple to Venus in preference to herself, was the cause of the Trojan war, and of all the miseries which happened to the unfortunate house of Priam. Her severities to Alcmena, Ino, Athamas, Semele, &c., are also well known. Juno had some children by Jupiter. According to Hesiod she was mother of Mars, Hebe, and Ilithyia, or Lucina; and besides these, she brought forth Vulcan, without having any commerce with the other sex, but only by smelting a certain plant. This was in imitation of Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brain. According to others, it was not Vulcan, but Mars, or Hebe, whom she brought forth in this manner, and this was after eating some lettuce at the table of Apollo. The daily and repeated debaucheries of Jupiter at last provoked Juno to such a degree, that she retired to Eubœa, and resolved for ever to forsake his bed. Jupiter produced a reconciliation, after he had applied to Cithæron for advice, and after he had obtained forgiveness by fraud and artifice. Vid. Dædala. This reconciliation, however cordial in might appear, was soon dissolved by new offences; and, to stop the complaints of the jealous Juno, Jupiter had often recourse to violence and blows. He even punished the cruelties which she had exercised upon his son Hercules, by suspending her from the heavens by a golden chain, and tying a heavy anvil to her feet. Vulcan was punished for assisting his mother in this degrading situation, and he was kicked down from heaven by his father, and broke his leg by the fall. This punishment rather irritated than pacified Juno. She resolved to revenge it, and she engaged some of the gods to conspire against Jupiter and to imprison him, but Thetis delivered him from this conspiracy, by bringing to his assistance the famous Briareus. Apollo and Neptune were banished from heaven for joining in the conspiracy, though some attribute their exile to different causes. The worship of Juno was universal, and even more than that of Jupiter, according to some authors. Her sacrifices were offered with the greatest solemnity. She was particularly worshipped at Argos, Samos, Carthage, and afterwards at Rome. The ancients generally offered on her altars a ewe lamb and a sow the first day of every month. No cows were ever immolated to her, because she assumed the nature of that animal when the gods fled into Egypt in their war with the giants. Among the birds, the hawk, the goose, and particularly the peacock, often called Junonia avis (Vid. Argus), were sacred to her. The dittany, the poppy, and the lily were her favourite flowers. The latter flower was originally of the colour of the crocus; but, when Jupiter placed Hercules to the breasts of Juno while asleep, some of her milk fell down upon earth, and changed the colour of the lilies from purple to a beautiful white. Some of the milk also dropped in that part of the heavens which, from its whiteness, still retains the name of the milky way, lactea via. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, she often made use of the goddess Minerva as her messenger, and even had the privilege of hurling the thunder of Jupiter when she pleased. Her temples were numerous, the most famous of which were at Argos, Olympia, &c. At Rome, no woman of debauched character was permitted to enter her temple, or even to touch it. The surnames of Juno are various; they are derived either from the function or things over which she presided, or from the places where her worship was established. She was the queen of the heavens; she protected cleanliness, and presided over marriage and child-birth, and particularly patronized the most faithful and virtuous of the sex, and severely punished incontinence and lewdness in matrons. She was the goddess of all power and empire, and she was also the patroness of riches. She is represented sitting on a throne with a diadem on her head and a golden sceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally sat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her sceptre, while Iris behind her displayed the thousand colours of her beautiful rainbow. She is sometimes carried through the air in a rich chariot drawn by peacocks. The Roman consuls, when they entered upon office, were always obliged to offer her a solemn sacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana. She was generally represented as veiled from head to foot, and the Roman matrons always imitated this manner of dressing themselves, and deemed it indecent in any married woman to leave any part of her body but her face uncovered. She has received the surnames of Olympia, Sarua, Lacedaemonia, Argiva, Telchinea, Candrea, Rescinthes, Prosymna, Imbrasia, Acraea, Cithæronia, Bunea, Ammonia, Fluonia, Anthea, Migale, Gemella, Tropeia, Boopis, Parthenos, Telea, Xera, Egophage, Hyperchinia, Juga, Iithyia, Lucina, Pronuba, Caprotina, Mena, Populonia, Lacinia, Sospita, Moneta, Curis, Domiduca, Februa, Opigenia, &c. *Cic. de Nat. JUNONĀLIA and JUNONIA, festivals at Rome in honour of Juno, the same as the Heræa of the Greeks. Virg. Heræa. Liv. 27, c. 37.

JUNŌNES, a name of the protecting genii of the women among the Romans. They generally swore by them, as the men by their genii. There were altars often erected to their honour. Plin. 2, c. 7. — Seneca, ep. 110.

JUNŌNIA, two islands, supposed to be among the Fortunæ Islands.—A name which Gracchus gave to Carthage, when he went with 6000 Romans to rebuild it.

JUNONIGĒNA, a surname of Vulcan, as son of Juno. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 173.

JUNŌNIS PROMONTORIUM, a promontory of Peloponnesus.—Lacinia templum, a temple of Juno in Italy, between Crotona and the Lacinian promontory.

JUPĪTER, the most powerful of all the gods of the ancients. According to Varro, there were no less than 300 persons of that name; Diodorus mentions two; and Cicero three, two of Arcadia, and one of Crete. To that of Crete, who passed for the son of Saturn and Ops, the actions of the rest have been attributed. According to the opinion of the mythologists, Jupiter was saved from destruction by his mother, and entrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn, who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan, on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born; but Ops, offended at her husband's cruelty, secreted Jupiter, and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child. Jupiter was educated in a cave on mount Ida, in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthea, or upon honey, according to others. He received the name of Jupiter, quasi jovans pater. His cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals and drums, which the Corybantes beat at the express command of Ops. Virg. Corybantes. As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found him sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by the hands of his son. Saturn, however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was, for this treachery, driven from his kingdom, and obliged to fly for safety into Latium. Jupiter, now become the sole master of the empire of the world, divided it with his brothers. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto. The peaceful beginning of his reign was soon interrupted by the rebellion of the giants, who were sons of the earth, and who wished to revenge the death of their relations the Titans. They were so powerful that they hurled rocks, and heaped up mountains upon mountains, to scale heaven, so that all the gods, to avoid their fury, fled to Egypt, where they escaped from the danger by assuming the form of different animals. Jupiter, however, animated them, and by the assistance of Hercules, he totally overpowered the gigantic race, which had proved such tremendous enemies. Virg. Gigantes. Jupiter, now freed from every apprehension, gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasures. He married Metis, Themis, Eurynome, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno. Virg. Juno. He became a Proteus to gratify his passions. He introduced himself to Danae in a shower of gold; he corrupted Antiope in the form of a satyr, and Leda in the form of a swan; he became a bull to seduce Europa, and he enjoyed the company of Ægina in the form of a flame of fire. He assumed the habit of Diana to corrupt Callisto, and became Amphitryon to gain the affections of Alcmena. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 3, he was father of the Seasons, Irene, Eunomia, the Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos by Themis; of Venus by Dione; of the Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, by Eurynome the daughter of Oceanus; of Proserpine by Styx; of the nine muses by Mnemosyne, &c. Virg. Niobe, Laodamia, Pyrrha, Protophonia, Electra, Maia, Semele, &c. The worship of Jupiter was universal; he was the Amun of the Africans, the Belus of Babylon, the Osiris of Egypt, &c. His surnames were numerous, many of which he received from the place or function over which he presided. He was severally called Jupiter Feretrius, Inventor, Elicius, Capitolinus, Latiarius, Pistor, Sponsor, Hercæus, Anxurus, Victor, Maximus, Opimus, Olympius, Fluvialis, &c. The worship of Jupiter surpassed that of the other gods in solemnity. His altars were not, like those of Saturn and Diana, stained with the blood of human victims, but he was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak was sacred to him because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented as sitting upon a golden or ivory throne, holding in one hand thunderbolts just ready to be hurled, and in the other, a sceptre of cypress. His looks express majesty, his beard flows long and neglected, and the eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. He is sometimes represented with the upper parts of his body naked, and those below the waist carefully covered, as if to show that he is visible to the gods above, but that he is concealed from the sight of the inhabitants of the earth. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon, in Libya. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities, and everything was subservient to his will, except the Fates. From him mankind received their blessings and their miseries, and they looked upon him as acquainted with everything past, present, and future. He was represented at Olympia with a crown like olive branches; his mantle was variegated with different flowers, particularly by the lily, and the eagle perched on the top of the sceptre which he held in his hand. The Cretans represented Jupiter without ears, to signify that the sovereign master of the world ought not to give a partial ear to any particular person, but be equally candid and propitious to all. At Lacedæmon he appeared with four heads, that he might seem to hear with greater readiness the different prayers and solicitations which were daily poured to him from every part of the earth. It is said that Minerva came all armed from his brains when he ordered Vulcan to open his head. Paus. 1, 2, &c. — Liv. 1, 4, 5, &c. — Diod. 1 & 3. — Homer. II. 1, 5, &c. Od. 1, 4, &c. Hymn. ad Jov. — Orpheus. — *Callimac. Jura, a high ridge of mountains separating the Helvetii from the Sequani, or Switzerland from Burgundy. Cæsar. G. 1, c. 2.

Justinus M. Junianus, a Latin historian in the age of Antoninus, who epitomized the history of Trogus Pompeius. This epitome, according to some traditions, was the cause that the comprehensive work of Trogus was lost. It comprehends the history of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, Macedonia, and Roman empires, &c., in a neat and elegant style. It is replete with many judicious reflections and animated harangues; but the author is often too credulous, and sometimes examines events too minutely, while others are related only in a few words too often obscure. The indecency of many of his expressions is deservedly censured. The best editions of Justin are that of Ab. Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1719, that of Hearne, 8vo, Oxon. 1703, and that of Barbon, 12mo, Paris, 1770. — Martyr, a Greek father, formerly a Platonic philosopher, born at Palestine. He died in Egypt, and wrote two apologies for the Christians, besides his dialogue with a Jew; two treatises, &c., in a plain, unadorned style. The best editions of Justin Martyr are that of Paris, fol. 1636; that of his apologies, 2 vols. 8vo, 1700 & 1703; and Jebb's dialogue with Trypho, published in London, 1722. — An emperor of the east, who reigned nine years, and died A. D. 566. — Another, who died A. D. 564, after a reign of 38 years. — Another, who died 577 A. D., after a reign of 13 years.

Juturna, a sister of Turnus king of the Rutuli. She heard with contempt the addresses of Jupiter, or, according to others, she was not unfavourable to his passion, so that the god rewarded her love with immortality. She was afterwards changed into a fountain of the same name near the Numicus, falling into the Tiber. The waters of that fountain were used in sacrifices, and particularly in those of Vesta. They had the power to heal diseases. Varro de L. L. 1, c. 10. — Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 708. L. 2, v. 585. — Virg. Æn. 12, v. 139. — Cic. Cluent. 36.

Juvenalis Decius Junius, a poet born at Aquinum in Italy. He came early to Rome, and passed some time in declaiming; after which he applied himself to write satires, 16 of which are extant. He spoke with virulence against the partiality of Nero for the pantomime Paris, and though all his satire and declamation were pointed against this ruling favourite of the emperor, yet Juvenal lived in security during the reign of Nero. After the death of Nero, the effects of the resentment of Paris were severely felt, and the satirist was sent by Domitian as governor on the frontiers of Egypt. Juvenal was then in the 80th year of his age, and he suffered much from the trouble which attended his office, or rather his exile. He returned, however, to Rome, after the death of Paris, and died in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 108. His writings are fiery and animated, and they abound with humour. He is particularly severe upon the vice and dissipation of the age he lived in; but the gross and indecent manner in which he exposed to ridicule the follies of mankind, rather encourages than disarms the debauched and licentious. He wrote with acrimony against all his adversaries, and whatever displeased or offended him was exposed to his severest censure. It is to be acknowledged that Juvenal is far more correct than his contemporaries, a circumstance which some have attributed to his judgment and experience, which were uncommonly mature, as his satires were the productions of old age. He may be called, and with reason, perhaps, the last of the Roman poets. After him poetry decayed, and nothing more claims our attention as a perfect poetical composition. The best editions are those of Casaubon, 4to, L. Bat. 1695, with Persius, and of Hawkey, Dublin, 12mo, 1746, and of Grævius, cum notis variorum, 8vo, L. Bat. 1684.

Juventas, or Juventus, a goddess at Rome who presided over youth and vigour. She is the same as the Hebe of the Greeks, and represented as a beautiful nymph, arrayed in variegated garments. Liv. 5, c. 54. L. 21, c. 62. L. 36, c. 36. — Ovid. ex Pont. 1, ep. 9, v. 12.

Juverna, or Hibernia, an island at the west of Britain, now called Ireland. Juv. v. 2, v. 160.

Ixibates, a people of Pontus.

Ixion, a king of Thessaly, son of Phlegas, or, according to Hyginus, of Leontes, or, according to Diodorus, of Antion, by Perimela daughter of Amythaon. He married Dia daughter of Eioneus or Deioneus, and promised his father-in-law a valuable present for the choice he had made of him to be his daughter's husband. His unwillingness, however, to fulfil his promises obliged Deioneus to have recourse to violence to obtain it, and he stole away some of his horses. Ixion concealed his resentment under the mask of friendship; he invited his father-in-law to a feast at Larissa, the capital of his kingdom, and when Deioneus was come, according to the appointment, he threw him into a pit, which he had previously filled with wood and burning coals. This premeditated treachery so irritated the neighbouring princes, that all of them refused to perform the usual ceremony, by which a man was then purified of murder, and Ixion was shunned and despised by all mankind. Jupiter had compassion upon him, and he carried him to heaven, and introduced him at the table of the gods. Such a favour, which ought to have awakened gratitude in Ixion, served only to inflame his lust; he became enamoured of Juno, and attempted to seduce her. Juno was willing to gratify the passion of Ixion, though according to others she informed Jupiter of the attempts which had been made upon her virtue. Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno, and carried it to the place where Ixion had appointed to meet Juno. Ixion was caught in the snare and from his embrace with the cloud, he had the Centaurs, or, according to others, Centaurus. Vid. Centauri. Jupiter, displeased with the insolence of Ixion, banished him from heaven; but when he heard that he had seduced Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in hell which continually whirls round. The wheel was perpetually in motion, therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal. Diod. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 62.—Pindar. 2, Pyth. 2.—Virg. G. 4, v. 484. Æn. 6, v. 601.—Ovid. Mét. 12, v. 210 & 338.—Philost. 6, c. 3.—Lactant. in Th. 7.—One of the Heraclids, who reigned at Corinth for 57 or 37 years. He was son of Alethes.

Ixiônides, the patronymic of Pirithous son of Ixion. Propert. 2, el. 1, v. 38.

LAANDER, a youth, brother to Nicocrates tyrant of Cyrene &c.—Polyan. 8.

Laarclaus, the guardian of Battus of Cyrene. He usurped the sovereign power for some time, and endeavoured to marry the mother of Battus, the better to establish his tyranny. The queen gave him a friendly invitation, and caused him to be assassinated, and restored the power to Battus. Polyan.

Labaris, a king of Egypt after Sesostria.
Labda, a daughter of Amphion, one of the Bacchiads, born lame. She married Ertyon, by whom she had a son whom she called Cypselus because she saved his life in a coffer. Vid. Cypselus. This coffer was preserved at Olympia. Herodot. 5, c. 99.—Aristot. Polit. 5.

Labdaoides, a name given to Œdipus, as descended from Labdacus.

Labdæus, a son of Polydorus by Nycteis, the daughter of Nycteus king of Thebes. His father and mother died during his childhood, and he was left to the care of Nycteus, who at his death left his kingdom in the hands of Lycus, with orders to restore it to Labdacus as soon as of age. He was father to Laius. It is unknown whether he ever sat on the throne of Thebes. According to Statius his father's name was Phoenix. His descendants were called Labdacides. Stat. Theb. 6, v. 451.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 8, c. 6, l. 9, c. 5.

Labdalon, a promontory of Sicily, near Syracuse. Diod. 13.

Labællis, a lake in Dalmatia, now Scutari, of which the neighbouring inhabitants were called Labæates. Liv. 44, c. 31. l. 45, c. 86.

Labæo Antistius, a celebrated lawyer in the age of Augustus, whose views he opposed, and whose offers of the consulship he refused. His works are lost. He was wont to enjoy the company and conversation of the learned for six months, and the rest of the year was spent in writing and composing. His father, of the same name, was one of Caesar's murderers. He killed himself at the battle of Philippî. Horace 1, sat. 3, v. 82, has unjustly taxed him with insanity because, no doubt, he invigiled against his patrons. Appian. Alex. 4.—Suet. in Aug. 45.—A tribune of the people at Rome, who condemned the censor Metellus to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, because he had expelled him from the senate. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the interference of another of the tribunes.—Q. Fabius, a Roman consul, A.U.C. 571, who obtained a naval victory over the Ree' of the Cretans. He assisted Terence in composing his comedies, according to some.—Actius, an obscure poet who recommended himself to the favour of Nero by an incorrect translation of Homer into Latin. The work is lost, and only this curious line is preserved by an old scholiast, Persius, 1, v. 4, Crudum mamducus Priamum, Priamique Pitinnos.

Labértius J. Decimus, a Roman knight famous for his poetical talents in writing pantomimes. J. Caesar compelled him to act one of his characters on the stage. The poet consented with great reluctance, but he showed his resentment during the acting of the piece by throwing severe aspersions upon J. Caesar, by warring the audience against his tyranny, and by drawing upon him the eyes of the whole theatre. Caesar, however, restored him to the rank of knight which he had lost by appearing on the stage; but to his mortification, when he went to take his seat among the knights, no one offered to make room for him, and even his friend Cicero said, Receptissem te nisi angustè sederem. Laberius was offended at the affectation and insolence of Cicero, and reflected upon his unsettled and pusillanimous behaviour during the civil wars of Caesar and Pompey, by the reply of Mirum si angustè sedes, qui soles duabus sellis sedere. Laberius died 10 months after the murder of J. Caesar. Some fragments remain of his poetry. Macrob. Sat. 2, c. 3 & 7.—Horat. 1, sat. 10.—Senec. de Controv. 18.—Suet. in Caes. 39.—Q. He was conquered by the officers of Augustus. Strab. 12 & 14.—Dio. 48.—Titus, an historian and orator at Rome in the age of Augustus, who admired his own compositions with all the pride of superior genius and incomparable excellence. The senate ordered his papers to be burnt on account of their seditious contents; and Labienus, unable to survive the loss of his writings, destroyed himself. Suet. in Cal. 16.—Senec.

Labînētus, or Labynētus, a king of Babylon, &c. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

Labotas, a river near Antioch in Syria. Strab. 16.—A son of Echestratus, who made war against Argos, &c.

Labradæus, a surname of Jupiter in Caria. The word is derived from labrys, which in the language of the country signifies a hatchet, which Jupiter's statue held in his hand. Plut.

Labron, a part of Italy on the Mediterranean, supposed to be Leghorn. Cic. 2, ad Pm. 6.

Labyrinth, a building whose numerous passages and perplexing windings render the escape from it difficult, and almost impracticable. There were four very famous among the ancients; one near the city of Crocodiles or Arsinoe, another in Crete, a third at Lemnos, and a fourth in Italy, built by Porsenna. That of Egypt was the most ancient, and Herodotus, who saw it, declares that the beauty and art of the building were almost beyond belief. It was built by 12 kings, who at one time reigned in Egypt, and it was intended for the place of their burial, and to commemorate the actions of their reign. It was divided into 12 halls, or, according to Pliny, into 16, or, as Strabo mentions, into 27. The halls were vaulted, according to the relation of Herodotus. They had each six doors, opening to the north, and the same number to the south, all surrounded by one wall. The edifice contained 3000 chambers: 1500 in the upper part, and the same number below. The chambers above were seen by Herodotus, and astonished him beyond conception, but he was not permitted to see those below, where were buried the holy crocodiles and the monarchs whose munificence had raised the edifice. The roofs and walls were encrusted with marble, and adorned with sculptured figures. The halls were surrounded with stately and polished pillars of white stone, and, according to some authors, the opening of the doors was artfully attended with a terrible noise like peals of thunder. The labyrinth of Crete was built by Dædalus, in imitation of that of Egypt, and it is the most famous of all in classical history. It was the place of confinement for Dædalus himself, and the prison of the Minotaur. According to Pliny the labyrinth of Lemnos surpassed the others in grandeur and magnificence. It was supported by 40 columns of uncommon height and thickness, and equally admirable for their beauty and splendour. Modern travellers are still astonished at the noble and magnificent ruins which appear of the Egyptian labyrinth, at the south of the lake Mœris, about 30 miles from the ruins of Arsinoe. Mela, i. c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Diod. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 148.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 588.

Læona, an epithet applied to a female native of Laconia, and, among others, to Helen. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 511.

Lacedæmon, a son of Jupiter and Taygeta the daughter of Atlas, who married Sparta the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he had Amyclas and Eurydice the wife of Acrisius. He was the first who introduced the worship of the Graces in Laconia, and who first built them a temple. From Lacedæmon and his wife, the capital of Laconia was called Lacedæmon and Sparta. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. Fab. 155.—Paus. 3, c. 1.—A noble city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia called also Sparta, and now known by the name of Mittra. It has been severally known by the name of Legia, from the Leleges the first inhabitants of the country, or from Lelex one of their kings; and Ebalia, from Ebalus the sixth king from Eurotas. It was also called Hecatompolis from the 100 cities which the whole province once contained. Lelex is supposed to have been the first king. His descendants, 13 in number, reigned successively after him, till the reign of the sons of Orestes, when the Heraclidae recovered the Peloponnesus, about 80 years after the Trojan war. Procles and Eurysthenes, the descendants of the Heraclidae, enjoyed the crown together, and after them it was decreed that the two families should always sit on the throne together. Vid. Eurysthenes. These two brothers began to reign B.C. 1100. Their successors in the family of Procles were called Proclidae, and afterwards Euryponitidae, and those of Eurysthenes, Eurysthenidae, and afterwards Agidae. The successors of Procles on the throne began to reign in the following order: Sous 1060 B.C., after his father had reigned 42 years; Eurypon, 1028; Prytanis, 1021; Eunomus, 986; Polydectes, 907; Lycurgus, 898; Charilaus, 873; Nicander, 809; Theopompus, 770; Zeuxidamus, 723; Anaxidamus, 690; Archidamus, 651; Agasicles, 605; Ariston, 564; Demaratus, 526; Leotyichides, 491; Archidamus, 469; Agis, 427; Agesilus, 397; Archidamus, 361; Agis II., 338; Eudamidas, 330; Archidamus, 295; Eudamidas II., 268; Agis, 244; Archidamus, 230; Euclidus, 225; Lycurgus, 210. The successors of Eurysthenes were Agis, 1059; Echestratus, 1058; Labotas, 1023; Doryssus, 986; Agesilus, 957; Archelaus, 913; Teleclus, 853; Alcámenes, 823; Polydorus, 775; Eurycrates, 723; Anaxander, 687; Eurycrates II., 644; Leon, 609; Anaxandrides, 563; Cleomenes, 530; Leonidas, 491; Plistarchus, under guardianship of Pausanius, 480; Plistonax, 466; Pausanius, 408; Agesipolis, 397; Cleombrotus, 380; Agesipolis II., 371; Cleomenes II., 370; Aretus or Areus, 309; Acrotatus, 265; Areus II., 264; Leonidas, 257; Cleombrotus, 243; Leonidas restored, 241; Cleomenes, 235; Agesipolis, 219. Under the two last kings, Lycurgus and Agesipolis, the monarchical power was abolished, though Mithridates the tyrant made himself absolute, B.C. 210, and Nabis, 206, for 14 years. In the year 191 B.C. Lacedæmon joined the Achaean league, and about three years after the walls were demolished by order of Philipomen. The territories of Laconia shared the fate of the Achaean confederacy, and the whole was conquered by Mummius, 147 B.C., and converted into a Roman province. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon have rendered themselves illustrious for their courage and intrepidity, for their love of honour and liberty, and for their aversion to sloth and luxury. They were inured from their youth to labour, and their laws commanded them to make war their profession. They never applied themselves to any trade, but their only employment was arms, and they left everything else to the care of their slaves. Vid. Helotæ. They hardened their body by stripes and other manly exercises, and accustomed themselves to undergo hardships, and even to die, without fear or regret. From their valour in the field, and their moderation and temperance at home, they were courted and revered by the neighbouring princes, and their assistance was severally implored to protect the Sicilians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Egyptians, Cyreneans, &c. They were forbidden by the laws of their country [Vid. Lycurgus] to visit foreign states, lest their morals should be corrupted by an intercourse with effeminate nations. The austere manner in which their children were educated, rendered them undaunted in the field of battle, and from this circumstance, Leonidas, with a small band, was enabled to resist the millions of the army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ. The women were as courageous as the men, and many a mother has celebrated with festivals the death of her son who had fallen in battle, or has coolly put him to death, if, by a shameful fight or loss of his arms, he brought disgrace upon his country. As to domestic manners, the Lacedæmonians as widely differed from their neighbours as in political concerns, and their noblest women were not ashamed to appear on the stage hired for money.

In the affairs of Greece, the interest of the Lacedæmonians was often powerful, and obtained the superiority for 500 years. Their jealousy of the power and greatness of the Athenians is well known. The authority of their monarchs was checked by the watchful eye of the Ephori, who had the power of imprisoning the kings themselves if guilty of misdemeanours. Vid. Ephori. The Lacedæmonians are remarkable for the honour and reverence which they paid to old age. The names of Lacedæmon and Sparta are promiscuously applied to the capital of Laconia, and often confounded together. The latter was applied to the metropolis, and the former was reserved for the inhabitants of the suburbs, or rather of the country contiguous to the walls of the city. This propriety of distinction was originally observed, but in process of time it was totally lost, and both appellatives were soon synonymous, and indiscriminately applied to the city and country. Vid. Sparta, Laconia. The place where the city stood is now called Paleo Chori (the old town), and the new one erected on its ruins at some distance on the west is called Alisatra. Liv. 34, c. 33. l. 45, c. 28.—Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 1.—Paus. 3.—Justin. 2, 3, 8c.—Herodot. 2, 8c.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—Diad.—Mela. 2.—There were some festivals celebrated at Lacedæmon, the names of which are not known. It was customary for the women to drag all the old bachelors round the altars, and beat them with their fists, that the shame and ignominy to which they were exposed might induce them to marry, &c. Athen. 23.

Lacedæmoniæ and Lacedæmones, the inhabitants of Lacedæmon. Vid. Lacedæmon.

Lacedæmonius, a son of Cimón by Clitória. He received this name from his father's regard for the Lacedæmonians. Plut.

Lacerta, a soothsayer in Domitian's age, who acquired immense riches by his art. Juv. 7, v. 114.

Lacotania, a district at the north of Spain. Liv. 27, c. 23.

Lachares, a man who seized the supreme power at Athens when the city was in discord, and was banished B.C. 296. Polyan. 4.—An Athenian three times taken prisoner. He deceived his keepers, and escaped, &c. Id. 3.—A son of Mithridates king of Bosphorus. He was received into alliance by Lucullus.—A robber condemned by M. Antony.—An Egyptian, buried in the labyrinth near Arsinoe.

Laches, an Athenian general in the age of Epaminondas. Diad. 12.—An Athenian sent with Carias at the head of a fleet in the first expedition undertaken against Sicily in the Peloponnesian war. Justin. 4, c. 3.—An artist who finished the Colossus of Rhodes.

Lachesis, one of the Parcæ, whose name is derived from λαχεν, to measure out by lot. She presided over futurity, and was represented as spinning the thread of life, or, according to others, holding the spindle. She generally appeared covered with a garment variegated with stars, and holding spindles in her hand. Vid. Parcæ. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 249.—Martial. 4, ep. 54.

Lacidus, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, who flourished B.C. 241. His father's name was Alexander. He was disciple of Arcesilaus, whom he succeeded in the government of the second academy. He was greatly esteemed by king Attalus, who gave him a garden where he spent his hours in study. He taught his disciples to suspend their judgment, and never speak decisively. He disgraced himself by the magnificent funeral with which he honoured a favourite goose. He died through excess of drinking. Diog. 4.

Lacides, a village near Athens, which derived its name from Laciús, an Athenian hero, whose exploits are unknown. Here Zephyrus had an altar sacred to him, and likewise Ceres and Proserpine a temple. Paus. 1, c. 37.

Lacina, a surname of Juno from her temple at Lacinium in Italy, which the Crotonians held in great veneration, and where there was a famous statue of Helen by Zeuxis. Vid. Zeuxis. On an altar near the door were ashes which the wind could not blow away. Fulvius Flaccus took away a marble piece from this sacred place, to finish a temple that he was building at Rome to Fortuna Equestris; and it is said that, for this sacrifice, he afterwards led a miserable life, and died in the greatest agonies. Strab. 6.—Ovid. Mét. 15, v. 12 & 702.—Liv. 42, c. 3.—Val. Mar. 1, c. 1.

Lacinienses, a people of Liburnia.

Lacinium, a promontory of Magna Græcia, now called Colonna, the southern boundary of Tarentum in Italy, where Juno Lacinia had a temple held in great veneration. It received its name from Lacinius, a famous robber killed there by Hercules. Liv. 24, c. 3. l. 27, c. 5. l. 30, c. 20.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 522.

Lacmon, a part of mount Pindus where the Inachus flows. Herodot. 9, c. 93.

Laoo, a favourite of Galba, mean and cowardly in his character. He was put to death.—An inhabitant of Laconia or Lacedæmon.

Lacobriga, a city of Spain, where Sertorius was besieged by Metellus.

Lacônia, Lacônia, and Lacedæmon, a country in the southern parts of Peloponnesus, having Argos and Arcadia on the north, Messenia on the west, the Mediterranean on the south, and the bay of Argos at the east. Its extent from north to south was about 50 miles. It is watered by the river Eurotas. The capital is called Sparta, or Lacedæmon. The inhabitants never went on an expedition or engaged an enemy but at the full moon. Vid. Lacedæmon. The brevity with which they always expressed themselves is now become proverbial, and by the epithet of Laconic we understand whatever is concise and not loaded with unnecessary words. The word Laconicum is applied to some hot baths used among the ancients, and first invented at Lacedæmon. Cic. 4, Att. 10.—Strab. 1.—Plut. 3, c. 16.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

Lacrotés, a Theban, general of a detachment sent by Artaxerxes to the assistance of the Egyptians. Diad. 16.

Lacrones, a Lacedæmonian ambassador to Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 152.

Lactantius, a celebrated christian writer, whose principal works are de ira divini, de dei operibus, and his divine institutions, in seven books, in which he proves the truth of the christian religion, refutes objections, and attacks the illusions and absurdities of paganism. The expressive purity, elegance, and energy of his style have gained him the name of the christian Cicero. He died A.D. 325.—The best editions of his works are that of Sparke, 8vo, Oxon. 1684; that of Bineman, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1739; and that of Du Fresnoy, 2 vols. 4to, Paris, 1748.

Lacter, a promontory of the island of Cos.

Lacydes, a philosopher. Vid. Lacidus.

Lacydus, an effeminate king of Argos.

Ladas, a celebrated courier of Alexander, born at Sicily. He was honoured with a brazen statue, and obtained a crown of Olympia. Martial 10, ep. 10.—Juv. 13, v. 97.

Lade, an island of the Ægean sea, on the coast of Asia Minor, where was a naval battle between the Persians and Ionians. Herodot. 6, c. 7.—Paus. 1, c. 35.—Strab. 17.

Lades, a son of Imbrabus, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 343.

Ladocæa, a village of Arcadia. Paus.
Ladon, a river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus. The metamorphosis of Daphne into a laurel, and of Syrinx into a reed, happened near its banks. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 8, c. 25.—*Ovid. Lelaps, one of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3.—The dog of Cephalus, given him by Procius. Vid. Lelaps, &c. Id. Met. 7.

Lellia, a vestal virgin.
Lælianus, a general, proclaimed emperor in Gaul by his soldiers, A.D. 268, after the death of Gallienus. His triumph was short; he was conquered and put to death after a few months' reign by another general called Posthumus, who aspired to the imperial purple as well as himself.

C. Lælius, a Roman consul, A.U.C. 614, surnamed Sapiens, so intimate with Africanus the younger, that Cicero represents him in his treatise De Amicitia, as explaining the real nature of friendship, with its attendant pleasures. He made war with success against Viriathus. It is said that he assisted Terence in the composition of his comedies. His modesty, humanity, and the manner in which he patronized letters, are as celebrated as his greatness of mind and integrity in the character of a statesman. Cic. de Orat.—Another consul, who accompanied Scipio Africanus the elder in his campaigns in Spain and Africa.—Archelaus, a famous grammarian. Suet.

Læna and Læna, the mistress of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Being tortured because she refused to discover the conspirators, she bit off her tongue, totally to frustrate the violent efforts of her executioners.—A man who was acquainted with the conspiracy formed against Cæsar.

Læna, a surname of the Popilii at Rome.
Læneus, a river of Crete, where Jupiter brought the ravished Europa. Strab.

Lapsa Magna, a town of Spain. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Laertes, a king of Ithaca, son of Arctesius and Chalconedusa, who married Anticlea the daughter of Autolycus. Anticlea was pregnant by Sisyphus when she married Laertes, and eight months after her union with the king of Ithaca, she brought forth a son called Ulysses. Vid. Anticlea. Ulysses was treated with paternal care by Laertes, though not really his son, and Laertes ceded to him his crown and retired into the country where he spent his time in gardening. He was found in this mean employment by his son at his return from the Trojan war, after 20 years' absence, and Ulysses, at the sight of his father, whose dress and old age declared his sorrow, long hesitated whether he should suddenly introduce himself as his son, or whether he should, as a stranger, gradually awaken the paternal feelings of Laertes, who had believed that his son was no more. This last measure was preferred, and when Laertes had burst into tears at the mention which was made of his son, Ulysses threw himself on his neck, exclaiming, "O father, I am he for whom you weep." This welcome declaration was followed by a recital of all the hardships which Ulysses had suffered, and immediately after the father and son repaired to the palace of Penelope the wife of Ulysses, whence all the suitors who daily importuned the princess were forcibly removed. Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, c. 9. Homer. Od. 11 & 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 32. Heroid. 1, v. 98.—A city of Cilicia, which gave birth to Diogenes, surnamed Laertius from the place of his birth.

Laertius Diogenes, a writer born at Laertes. Vid. Diogenes.

Lastrygones, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily. Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclopes. They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts, they sunk his ships and devoured his companions. Vid. Amphipates. They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer, who, however, does not mention their country, but only speaks of Lamus as their capital. A colony of them, as some suppose, passed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formia, whence the epithet of Lastrygonia is often used for that of Formiana. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 233. &c. Fast. 4, ex Pont. 4, ep. 10.—Tæts. in Lycophr. v. 66a & 81b.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 81.—Sil. 7, v. 276.

Læta, the wife of the emperor Gratian, celebrated for her humanity and generous sentiments.

Lætoria lex, ordered that proper persons should be appointed to provide for the security and the possession of such as were insane, or squandered away their estates. It made it a high crime to abuse the weakness of persons under such circumstances. Cic. de Offic. 3.

Lætus, a Roman whom Commodus condemned to be put to death. This violence raised Lætus against Commodus; he conspired against him, and raised Pertinax to the throne.—A general of the emperor Severus, put to death for his treachery to the emperor; or, according to others, on account of his popularity.

Lævi, the ancient inhabitants of Gallia Transpadana.

Lævinus, a Roman consul sent against Pyrrhus, A.U.C. 474. He informed the monarch that the Romans would not accept him as an arbitrator in the war with Tarentum, and feared him not as an enemy. He was defeated by Pyrrhus.—P. Val., a man despised at Rome, because he was distinguished by no good quality. Horat. 1, sat. 6, v. 12.

Lagaria, a town of Lucania.
Lagia, a name of the island Delos. Vid. Delos.

Lagides. Vid. Lagus.
Lagina, a town of Caria.

Lagus, a Macedonian of mean extraction. He received in marriage Arsinoe the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant by king Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, fed him with her prey, and sheltered him with her wings against the inclemency of the air. This uncommon preservation was divulged by Lagus, who adopted the child as his own, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been so miraculously preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts Arsinoë was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not considered as dishonourable, because he was opulent and powerful. The first of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the name of Lagides to all other appellations. It is even said that he established a military order in Alexandria, which was called Lagetion. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's mistress. Plutarch mentions an anecdote which serves to show how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, says the historian, once displaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the presence of Ptolemy, the king suddenly interrupted him with the question of "Pray tell me, sir, who was the father of Peleus?" "Tell me," replied the grammarian, without hesitation, "tell me, if you can, O king! who the father of Lagus was." This reflection on the meanness of the monarch's birth did not in the least irritate his resentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praised the humour of the grammarian, and showed his moderation and the mildness of his temper by taking him under his patronage. *Paus. Lagissa, an island in the Pamphylian sea.—Another near Crete. Strab. 10.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

Lagyna, a city of Taurica Chersonesus.

Laidies, a patronymic of Oedipus son of Laius. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 18.

Lains, a king of Arcadia, who succeeded his father Cypselus, &c. Paus. 8, c. 5.—A king of Elis, &c.

Lais, a celebrated courtesan, daughter of Timandra the mistress of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She first began to sell her favours at Corinth, for 20,000 drachmas, and the immense number of princes, noblemen, philosophers, orators, and plebeians who courted her embraces, show how much commendation is owed to her personal charms. The expenses which attended her pleasures gave rise to the proverb of Non curio hinc contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demosthenes himself visited Corinth for the sake of Lais, but when he was informed by the courtesans that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous sum of about 300*l.* English money, the orator departed, and observed that he would not buy repentance at so dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demosthenes to Corinth, had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais saw the philosopher unmoved by her beauty, she visited his house herself; but there she had no reason to boast of the licentiousness or easy submission of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmest admirers, and though filthy in his dress and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her most unbounded favours. The sculptor Mycon also solicited the favours of Lais, but he met with coldness; he, however, attributed the cause of his ill reception to the whiteness of his hair, and dyed it of a brown colour, but to no purpose. "Fool that thou art," said the courtesan, "to ask what I refused yesterday to thy father." Lais ridiculed the austerity of philosophers, and laughed at the weakness of those who pretend to have gained a superiority over their passions, by observing that the sages and philosophers of the age were not above the rest of mankind, for she found them at her door as often as the rest of the Athenians. The success which her debaucheries met at Corinth encouraged Lais to pass into Thessaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favourite youth called Hippostratus. She was, however, disappointed: the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, assassinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the christian era. Some suppose that there were two persons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Lic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, el. 5.—Plut. in Alcib.—Paus. 2, c. 2.

Laius, a son of Labdacus, who succeeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycæus had left to the care of his brother Lycus, till his grandson came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incensed against Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had suffered. He was afterwards restored, and married Jocasta the daughter of Creon. An oracle informed him that he should perish by the hand of his son, and in consequence of this dreadful intelligence he resolved never to approach his wife. A day spent in debauch and intoxication made him violate his vow, and Jocasta brought forth a son. The child as soon as born was given to a servant, with orders to put him to death. The servant was moved with compassion, and only exposed him on mount Cithæron, where his life was preserved by a shepherd. The child, called Oedipus, was educated in the court of Polybus, and an unfortunate meeting with his father in a narrow road proved his ruin. Oedipus ordered his father to make way for him without knowing who he was. Laius refused, and was instantly murdered by his irritated son. His armour-bearer or charioteer shared his fate. Vid. Oedipus. Sophoc. in Oedip.—Hygin. 9 & 66.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 9, c. 5 & 26.—Plut. de Curios.

Lalassis, a river of Isauria.

Lamachus, a son of Xenophanes, sent into Sicily with Nicias. He was killed B.C. 414, before Syracuse, where he had displayed much courage and intrepidity. Plut. in Alcib.—A governor of Heraclea in Pontus, who betrayed his trust to Mithridates, after he had invited all the inhabitants to a sumptuous feast.

Lamaron, a large mountain of Æthiopia.

Lambrani, a people of Italy near the Lambrus. Suet. in Cæs.

Lambrus, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Po.

Lamia, a town of Thessaly at the bottom of the Sinus Maliacus or Læticus, and north of the river Sperchius, famous for a siege which it supported after Alexander's death. *Vid. Lamiacum. Diod. 16, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 6.—A river of Greece opposite mount Ceta.—A daughter of Neptune, mother of Hierophile, an ancient Sibyl, by Jupiter. Paus. 10, c. 12.—A famous courtesan, mistress to Demetrius Poliorcetes. Plut. in Dem.—Athen. 23.—*Bliss. V. H. 12 c. 9.

Lamia and Auxesia, two deities of Crete, whose worship was the same as at Eleusis. The Epicurians made them two statues of an olive tree given them by the Athenians, provided they came to offer a sacrifice to Minerva at Athens. Paus. 2, c. 30, &c.

Lamiscum bellum, happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians, incited by their orators, came to free Greece from the garrisons of the Macedonians. Leosthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched against Antipater, who then presided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Thessaly at the head of 13,000 foot and 600 horse, and was beaten by the superior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates. Antipater after this blow fled to Lamia, B.C. 323, where he resolved, with all the courage and sagacity of a careful general, to maintain a siege with about the 8000 or 9000 men that had escaped from the field of battle. Leosthenes, unable to take the city by storm, began to make a regular siege. His operations were delayed by the frequent sallies of Antipater; and Leosthenes being killed by the blow of a stone, Antipater made his escape out of Lamia, and soon after, with the assistance of the army of Craterus brought from Asia, he gave the Athenians battle near Cranon, and though only 500 of their men were slain, yet they became so dispirited, that they sued for peace from the conqueror. Antipater at last with difficulty consented, provided they raised taxes in the usual manner, received a Macedonian garrison, defrayed the expenses of the war, and lastly, delivered into his hands Demosthenes and Hyperides, the two orators, whose prevailing eloquence had excited their countrymen against him. These disadvantageous terms were accepted by the Athenians, yet Demosthenes had time to escape and poison himself. Hyperides was carried before Antipater, who ordered his tongue to be cut off, and afterwards put him to death. Plut. in Demost.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 11, &c.

Lamiae, small islands in the Aegean, opposite Troas. Plin. 5, c. 37.—A celebrated family at Rome, descended from Lamus.—Certain monsters of Africa, who had the face and breast of a woman, and the rest of their body like that of a serpent. They assured strangers to come to them, that they might devour them; and though they were not endowed with the faculty of speech, yet their hissings were pleasing and agreeable. Some believed them to be witches, or rather evil spirits, who, under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them. According to some, the fable of the Lamia is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful woman called Lamia, whom the jealousy of Juno rendered deformed, and whose children she destroyed; upon which Lamia became insane, and so desperate that she ate up all the children that came in her way. They are also called Lemures. Vid. Lemures. Philostr. in Ap.—Horat. Art. Poet. v. 340.—Plut. de Curios.—Dion.

Lamias Aelius, a governor of Syria under Tiberius. He was honored with a public funeral by the senate; and as having been a respectable and useful citizen, Horace has dedicated his od. 26, lib. 1, to his praises, as also 3, od. 17.—Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 27.—Another during the reign of Domitian, put to death, &c.

Lamirus, a son of Hercules by Iole.

Lampédo, a woman of Lacedæmon, who was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king. She lived in the age of Alcibiades. Agrippina the mother of Claudius could boast the same honours. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 22 & 37.—Plut. in Ag.—Plato in 1. Alc.—Plin. 7, c. 41.

Lampétia, a daughter of Apollo and Neera. She, with her sister Phæusa, guarded her father's flocks in Sicily when Ulysses arrived on the coasts of that island. These flocks were 14 in number, seven herds of oxen, and seven flocks of sheep, consisting each of 50. They fed by night as well as by day, and it was deemed unlawful and sacrilegious to touch them. The companions of Ulysses, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their sanctity, or to the threats and entreaties of their chief; but they carried away and killed some of the oxen. The watchful keepers complained to their father, and Jupiter, at the request of Apollo, punished the offence of the Greeks. The hides of the oxen appeared to walk, and the flesh, which was roasting by the fire, began to bellow, and nothing was heard but dreadful noises and loud lowings. The companions of Ulysses embarked on board their ships, but here the resentment of Jupiter followed them. A storm arose, and they all perished except Ulysses, who saved himself on the broken piece of a mast. Homer. Od. 12, c. 119.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—According to Ovid. Met. 2, v. 349, Lampetia is one of the Heliades, who was changed into a poplar tree at the death of her brother Phaeton.

Lampeto and Lampedo, a queen of the Amazons, who boasted herself to be the daughter of Mars. She gained many conquests in Asia, where she founded several cities. She was surprised afterwards by a band of barbarians, and destroyed with her female attendants. Justin. 2, c. 4.

Lampeus and Lampis, a mountain of Arcadia. Stat. 8.

Lampon, Lampos, or Lampus, one of the horses of Diomedes,—of Hector,—of Aurora. Homer. Il. 8, od. 23.—A son of Laomedon, father of Dolops.—A southsayer of Athens in the age of Socrates. Plut. in Pericl.

Lampônia and Lampônium, a city of Troas. Herodot. 5, c. 16.—An island on the coast of Thrace. Strab. 13.

Lampônium, an Athenian general, sent by his countrymen to attempt the conquest of Sicily. Justin. 4, c. 3.

Lampridius Aelius, a Latin historian in the fourth century, who wrote the lives of some of the Roman emperors. His style is inelegant, and his arrangements injudicious. His life of Commodus, Heliogabalus, Alexander Severus, &c., is still extant, and to be found in the works of the Historia Auguste Scriptores.

Lamprus, a celebrated musician, &c.—C. Nep. in Epam.

Lampsacus and Lampsacum, now Lampsaké, a town of Asia Minor on the borders of the Propontis, at the north of Abydos. Priapus was the chief deity of the place, of which he was reckoned by some the founder. His temple there was the asylum of lewdness and debauchery, and exhibited scenes of the most unnatural lust, and hence the epithet Lampsacus is usual to express immodesty and wantonness. Alexander resolved to destroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, and more probably for its firm adherence to the interest of Persia. It was, however, saved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes. Vid. Anaximenes. It was formerly called Pityusa, and received the name of Lampsacus, from Lampsoo, a daughter of Mandon, a king of Phrygia, who gave information to some Phœacians who dwell there, that the rest of the inhabitants had conspired against their life. This timely information saved them from destruction. The city afterwards bore the name of their preserver. The wine of Lampsacus was famous and therefore a tribute of wine was granted from the city by Xerxes to maintain the table of Thestocles. Mela, 1 c. 19.—Strab. 13.—Paus. 9 c. 31.—Herodot. 5, c. 117.—*C. Lampæra, a town of Phœcia in Ionia. Liv. 37, c. 21.

Lampæria, a festival at Pellene, in Achaia, in honour of Bacchus, who was surnamed Lampæter, from λαμπρῶν, to shine, because, during this solemnity, which was observed in the night, the worshippers went to the temple of Bacchus, with lighted torches in their hands. It was also customary to place vessels full of wine in several parts of every street in the city. Paus. 4, c. 21.

Lampus a son of Ægyptus.—A man of Elis.—A son of Proetus.

Lampus, a king of the Læstrygones, who is supposed by some to have founded Formia in Italy. The family of the Lamie at Rome was, according to the opinion of some, descended from him. Horat. 3, ad. 17.—A son of Hercules and Omphale, who succeeded his mother on the throne of Lydia. Ovid. Heroid. 9, v. 54.—A Latin chief killed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 334.—A river of Ætolia. Paus. 9, c. 31.—A Spartan general hired by Nectanebus king of Egypt. Diod. 16.—A city of Cilicia.—A town near Formia built by the Læstrygones.

Lampyrus, buffoon, a surname of one of the Ptolemies.—One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 334.

Lanassa, a daughter of Cleodæus, who married Pyrrhus the son of Achilles by whom she had eight children. Plut. in Pyrr.—Justin. 17, c. 3.—A daughter of Agathocles, who married Pyrrhus, whom she soon after forsook for Demetrius. Plut.

Lancœa, a fountain, &c. Paus.

Lancia, a town of Lusitania. Flor. 4, c. 12.

Landi, a people of Germany conquered by Cæsar.

Langia, a river of Peloponnesus, falling into the bay of Corinth.

Langobardi, a warlike nation of Germany, along the Spree, called improperly Lombards by some. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 45. G. 40.

Langobriga, a town of Lusitania.

Lantivium, a town of Latium, about 16 miles from Rome on the Appian road. Juno had there a celebrated temple, which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans, whose consuls on first entering upon office offered sacrifices to the goddess. The statue of the goddess was covered with a goat's skin, and armed with a buckler and spear, and wore shoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. Cic. pro Mur. de Nat. D. 1, c. 29. Pro Milon. 10.—Liv. 8, c. 14.—Ital. 13, v. 364.

Laobotas, or Læbotas, a Spartan king, of the family of the Agidae, who succeeded his father Echestratus, B.C. 1023. During his reign war was declared against Argos, by Sparta. He sat on the throne for 37 years, and was succeeded by Doryssus his son. Paus. 3, c. 2.

Læcoon, a son of Priam and Hecuba, or, according to others, of Antenor, or of Cypus. As being priest of Apollo, he was commissioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious. During the sacrifice two enormous serpents issued from the sea, and attacked Læcoon's two sons, who stood next to the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his sons, but the serpents, falling upon him, squeezed him in their complicated wreaths, so that he died in the greatest agonies. This punishment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horse which the Greeks had consecrated to Minerva, as also for his impiety in hurling a javelin against the sides of the horse as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage against the consent of Apollo, or, according to others, for his polluting the temple by his commerce with his wife Antiope before the statue of the god. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 41 & 201.—Hygin. fab. 135.

Laodamas, a son of Alcinoüs king of the Phœacians, who offered to wrestle with Ulysses, while at his father's court. Ulysses, mindful of the hospitality of Alcinoüs, refused the challenge of Laodamas. Homer. Od. 7, v. 170.—A son of Eteocles king of Thebes. Paus. 9, c. 15.

Læodamia, a daughter of Acæstus and Astydania, who married Proteusilaüs, the son of Iphiclus king of a part of Thessaly. The departure of her husband for the Trojan war was the source of grief to her, but when she heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector, her sorrow was increased. To keep alive the memory of her husband whom she had tenderly loved, she ordered a wooden statue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. This was seen by one of her servants, who informed Iphiclus that his daughter's bed was daily defiled by an unknown stranger. Iphiclus watched his daughter, and when he found that the intelligence was false, he ordered the wooden image to be burned, in hopes of dissipating his daughter's grief. He did not succeed. Laodamia threw herself into the flames with the image and perished. This circumstance has given occasion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention that Proteusilaüs was restored to life, and to Laodamia, for three hours, and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions, he persuaded his wife to accompany him. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Ovid. Her. ep. 13.—Hygin. fab. 104.—Propert. 1, el. 19.—A daughter of Bellerophon, by Achemone the daughter of king Iobates. She had a son by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herself to the service of Diana, and hunted with her; but her haughtiness proved fatal to her, and she perished by the arrows of the goddess. Homer. Il. 6, 12 & 16.—A daughter of Alexander king of Epirus, by Olympia the daughter of Pyrrhus. She was assassinated in the temple of Diana, where she had fled for safety during a sedition. Her murderer, called Milo, soon after turned his dagger against his own breast and killed himself. Justin. 28, c. 3.

Læodice, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acamas son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes from the Greeks to Troy with an embassy to demand the restoration of Helen. She obtained an interview and the gratification of her desires at the house of Phœbia, the wife of a governor of a small town of Throa, which the Greek ambassador had visited. She had a son by Acamas, whom she called Munitus. She afterwards married Helicon, son of Antenor and at Sicily. He was honoured with a brazen statue, and obtained a crown of Olympia. Martial. 10, ep. 10.—Juv. 13, v. 97.

Lade, an island of the Ægean sea, on the coast of Asia Minor, where was a naval battle between the Persians and Ionians. Herodot. 6, c. 7.—Paus. 1, c. 35.—Strab. 17.

Lades, a son of Imbrasmus, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 343.

Ladooes, a village of Arcadia. Paus.

Ladon, a river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus. The metamorphosis of Daphne into a laurel, and of Syrinx into a reed, happened near its banks. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 8, c. 25.—*Ovid. Laelaps, one of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3.—The dog of Cephalus, given him by Procius. Vid. Laelaps, &c. Id. Met. 7.

Laelia, a vestal virgin.

Laelianus, a general, proclaimed emperor in Gaul by his soldiers, A.D. 268, after the death of Gallienus. His triumph was short; he was conquered and put to death after a few months' reign by another general called Posthumus, who aspired to the imperial purple as well as himself.

O. Laelius, a Roman consul, A.U.C. 614, surnamed Sapiens, so intimate with Africanus the younger, that Cicero represents him in his treatise De Amicitia, as explaining the real nature of friendship, with its attendant pleasures. He made war with success against Viriathus. It is said that he assisted Terence in the composition of his comedies. His modesty, humanity, and the manner in which he patronized letters, are as celebrated as his greatness of mind and integrity in the character of a statesman. Cic. de Orat.—Another consul, who accompanied Scipio Africanus the elder in his campaigns in Spain and Africa.—Archelaus, a famous grammarian. Suet.

Læna and Læna, the mistress of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Being tortured because she refused to discover the conspirators, she bit off her tongue, totally to frustrate the violent efforts of her executioners.—A man who was acquainted with the conspiracy formed against Cæsar.

Lænas, a surname of the Popilii at Rome.

Læneus, a river of Crete, where Jupiter brought the ravished Europa. Strab.

Læpa Magna, a town of Spain. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Laertes, a king of Ithaca, son of Arcesius and Chalconmedusa, who married Anticlea the daughter of Autolycus. Anticlea was pregnant by Sisyphus when she married Laertes, and eight months after her union with the king of Ithaca, she brought forth a son called Ulysses. Vid. Anticlea. Ulysses was treated with paternal care by Laertes, though not really his son, and Laertes ceded to him his crown and retired into the country where he spent his time in gardening. He was found in this mean employment by his son at his return from the Trojan war, after 20 years' absence, and Ulysses, at the sight of his father, whose dress and old age declared his sorrow, long hesitated whether he should suddenly introduce himself as his son, or whether he should, as a stranger, gradually awaken the paternal feelings of Laertes, who had believed that his son was no more. This last measure was preferred, and when Laertes had burst into tears at the mention which was made of his son, Ulysses threw himself on his neck, exclaiming, "O father, I am he for whom you weep." This welcome declaration was followed by a recital of all the hardships which Ulysses had suffered, and immediately after the father and son repaired to the palace of Penelope the wife of Ulysses, whence all the suitors who daily importuned the princess were forcibly removed. Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, c. 9. Homer. Od. 11 & 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 32. Herod. 1, v. 98.—A city of Cilicia, which gave birth to Diogenes, surnamed Laertius from the place of his birth.

Laertius Diogenes, a writer born at Laertes. Vid. Diogenes.

Læstrygones, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily. Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclopes. They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts, they sunk his ships and devoured his companions. Vid. Antiphates. They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer, who, however, does not mention their country, but only speaks of Lamus as their capital. A colony of them, as some suppose, passed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formia, whence the epithet of Læstrygia is often used for that of Formiana. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 233, &c. Fast. 4, ex Pont. 4, ep. 10.—Tæta, in Lycophr. v. 662 & 818.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 81.—Sil. 7, v. 276.

Læta, the wife of the emperor Gratian, celebrated for her humanity and generous sentiments.

Lætoria lex, ordered that proper persons should be appointed to provide for the security and the possession of such as were insane, or squandered away their estates. It made it a high crime to abuse the weakness of persons under such circumstances. Cic. de Offic. 3.

Lætus, a Roman whom Commodus condemned to be put to death. This violence raised Lætus against Commodus; he conspired against him, and raised Pertinax to the throne.—A general of the emperor Severus, put to death for his treachery to the emperor; or, according to others, on account of his popularity.

Lævi, the ancient inhabitants of Gallia Transpadana.

Lævinus, a Roman consul sent against Pyrrhus, A.U.C. 474. He informed the monarch that the Romans would not accept him as an arbitrator in the war with Tarentum, and feared him not as an enemy. He was defeated by Pyrrhus.—P. Val., a man despised at Rome, because he was distinguished by no good quality. Horat. 1, sat. 6, v. 12.

Lagaria, a town of Lucania.

Lagria, a name of the island Delos. Vid. Delos.

Lagides. Vid. Lagus.

Lagina, a town of Caria.

Lagus, a Macedonian of mean extraction. He received in marriage Arsinoe the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant by king Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, fed him with her prey, and sheltered him with her wings against the inclemency of the air. This uncommon preservation was divulged by Lagus, who adopted the child as his own, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been so miraculously preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts Aristoeus was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not considered as dishonourable, because he was opulent and powerful. The first of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the name of Lagides to all other appellations. It is even said that he established a military order in Alexandria, which was called Lageion. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's mistress. Plutarch mentions an anecdote which serves to show how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, says the historian, once displaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the presence of Ptolemy, the king suddenly interrupted him with the question of "Pray tell me, sir, who was the father of Peleus?" "Tell me," replied the grammarian, without hesitation, "tell me, if you can, O king! who the father of Lagus was." This reflection on the meanness of the monarch's birth did not in the least irritate his resentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praised the humour of the grammarian, and showed his moderation and the mildness of his temper by taking him under his patronage. Paus. Attic.—Justin. 13.—Curt. 4.—Plut. de Isid. Cohib.—Lucan. 1, v. 684.—Ital. 1, v. 196.—A. Rutilian, killed by Pallas son of Evander. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 381.

Lagusa, an island in the Pamphylian sea.—Another near Crete. Strab. 10.—Plin. 5, c. 35.

Lagysa, a city of Taurica Chersonesus.

Laiades, a patronymic of Œdipus son of Laius. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 18.

Laius, a king of Arcadia, who succeeded his father Cypselus, &c. Paus. 8, c. 5.—A king of Elis, &c.

Lais, a celebrated courtesan, daughter of Timandrus the mistress of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She first began to sell her favours at Corinth, for 10,000 drachmas, and the immense number of princes, noblemen, philosophers, orators, and plebeians who courted her embraces, show how much commendation is owed to her personal charms. The expenses which attended her pleasures gave rise to the proverb of Non curvis homines contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demosthenes himself visited Corinth for the sake of Lais, but when he was informed by the courtesans that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous sum of about 3000 English money, the orator departed, and observed that he would not buy repentance at so dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demosthenes to Corinth, had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais saw the philosopher unmoved by her beauty, she visited his house herself; but there she had no reason to boast of the licentiousness or easy submission of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmest admirers, and though filthy in his dress and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her most unbounded favours. The sculptor Mycon also solicited the favours of Lais, but he met with coldness; he, however, attributed the cause of his ill reception to the whiteness of his hair, and dyed it of a brown colour, but to no purpose. "Foot that thou art," said the courtesan, "to ask what I refused yesterday to thy father." Lais ridiculed the austerity of philosophers, and laughed at the weakness of those who pretend to have gained a superiority over their passions, by observing that the sages and philosophers of the age were not above the rest of mankind, for she found them at her door as often as the rest of the Athenians. The success which her debaucheries met at Corinth encouraged Lais to pass into Thessaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favourite youth called Hippostratus. She was, however, disappointed: the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, assassinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the Christian era. Some suppose that there were two persons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, el. 5.—Plut. in Alcib.—Paus. 2, c. 2.

Laius, a son of Laladacus, who succeeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycteus had left to the care of his brother Lycus, till his grandson came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incensed against Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had suffered. He was afterwards restored, and married Jocasta the daughter of Creon. An oracle informed him that he should perish by the hand of his son, and in consequence of this dreadful intelligence he resolved never to approach his wife. A day spent in debauch and intoxication made him violate his vow, and Jocasta brought forth a son. The child as soon as born was given to a servant, with orders to put him to death. The servant was moved with compassion, and only exposed him on mount Cithæron, where his life was preserved by a shepherd. The child, called Œdipus, was educated in the court of Polybus, and an unfortunate meeting with his father in a narrow road proved his ruin. Œdipus ordered his father to make way for him without knowing who he was. Laius refused, and was instantly murdered by his irritated son. His armour-bearer or charioteer shared his fate. *Vid. Lalage, one of Horace's favourite mistresses. Horat. 1, ad. 22, &c.—Propert. 4, el. 7.—A woman censured for her cruelty. Martial. 2, ep. 66.

Lalassia, a river of Isauria.

Lamachus, a son of Xenophanes, sent into Sicily with Nicias. He was killed B.C. 414, before Syracuse, where he had displayed much courage and intrepidity. Plut. in Alcib.—A governor of Heraclea in Pontus, who betrayed his trust to Mithridates, after he had invited all the inhabitants to a sumptuous feast.

Lamallion, a large mountain of Æthiopia.

Lambrani, a people of Italy near the Lambrus. Suet. in Cæs.

Lambrus, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Po.

Lamia, a town of Thessaly at the bottom of the Sinus Maliacus or L. lacus, and north of the river Sperchius, famous for a siege which it supported after Alexander's death. Vid. Lamium. Diod. 16, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 6.—A river of Greece opposite mount Ceta.—A daughter of Neptune, mother of Hierophile, an ancient Sibyl, by Jupiter. Paus. 10, c. 12.—A famous courtesan, mistress to Demetrius Poliorcetes. Plut. in Dem.—Athen. 13.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 9.

Lamia and Auxesia, two deities of Crete, whose worship was the same as at Eleusis. The Epidaurians made them two statues of an olive tree given them by the Athenians, provided they came to offer a sacrifice to Minerva at Athens. Paus. 7, c. 30, &c.

Lamikonium bellum, happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians, incited by their orators, resolved to free Greece from the garrisons of the Macedonians. Leosthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched against Antipater, who then presided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Thessaly at the head of 13,000 foot and 600 horse, and was beaten by the superior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates. Antipater after this blow fled to Lamia, B.C. 323, where he resolved, with all the courage and sagacity of a careful general, to maintain a siege with about the 8000 or 9000 men that had escaped from the field of battle. Leosthenes, unable to take the city by storm, began to make a regular siege. His operations were delayed by the frequent sallies of Antipater; and Leosthenes being killed by the blow of a stone, Antipater made his escape out of Lamia, and soon after, with the assistance of the army of Craterus brought from Asia, he gave the Athenians battle near Cranon, and though only 500 of their men were slain, yet they became so dispirited, that they sued for peace from the conqueror. Antipater at last with difficulty consented, provided they raised taxes in the usual manner, received a Macedonian garrison, defrayed the expenses of the war, and lastly, delivered into his hands Demosthenes and Hyperides, the two orators, whose prevailing eloquence had excited their countrymen against him. These disadvantageous terms were accepted by the Athenians, yet Demosthenes had time to escape and poison himself. Hyperides was carried before Antipater, who ordered his tongue to be cut off, and afterwards put him to death. Plut. in Demost.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 11, &c.

Lamiae, small islands in the Aegean, opposite Troas. Plin. 5, c. 31.—A celebrated family at Rome, descended from Lamus.—Certain monsters of Africa, who had the face and breast of a woman, and the rest of their body like that of a serpent. They allured strangers to come to them, that they might devour them; and though they were not endowed with the faculty of speech, yet their hissings were pleasing and agreeable. Some believed them to be witches, or rather evil spirits, who, under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them. According to some, the fable of the Lamiae is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful woman called Lamia, whom the jealousy of Juno rendered deformed, and whose children she destroyed; upon which Lamia became insane, and so desperate that she ate up all the children that came in her way. They are also called Lemures. Virg. Lemures. Philostr. in Ap.—Horat. Art. Poet. v. 340.—Plut. de Curios.—Dion.

Lamias Aelius, a governor of Syria under Tiberius. He was honored with a public funeral by the senate; and as having been a respectable and useful citizen, Horace has dedicated his od. 26, lib. 1, to his praises, as also 3, od. 17.—Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 27.—Another during the reign of Domitian, put to death, &c.

Lamirus, a son of Hercules by Iole.

Lampêdo, a woman of Laedemon, who was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king. She lived in the age of Alcibiades. Agrippina the mother of Claudius could boast the same honours. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 22 & 37.—Plut. in Ag.—Plato in 1. Alc.—Plin. 7, c. 41.

Lampêtia, a daughter of Apollo and Nereia. She, with her sister Phaetusa, guarded her father's flocks in Sicily when Ulysses arrived on the coasts of that island. These flocks were 14 in number, seven herds of oxen, and seven flocks of sheep, consisting each of 50. They fed by night as well as by day, and it was deemed unlawful and sacrilegious to touch them. The companions of Ulysses, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their sanctity, or to the threats and entreaties of their chief; but they carried away and killed some of the oxen. The watchful keepers complained to their father, and Jupiter, at the request of Apollo, punished the offence of the Greeks. The hides of the oxen appeared to walk, and the flesh, which was roasting by the fire, began to bellow, and nothing was heard but dreadful noises and loud lowings. The companions of Ulysses embarked on board their ships, but here the resentment of Jupiter followed them. A storm arose, and they all perished except Ulysses, who saved himself on the broken piece of a mast. Homer. Od. 12, c. 119.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—According to Ovid. Met. 2, v. 349, Lampetia is one of the Heliades, who was changed into a poplar tree at the death of her brother Phaeton.

Lampeto and Lampedo, a queen of the Amazons, who boasted herself to be the daughter of Mars. She gained many conquests in Asia, where she founded several cities. She was surprised afterwards by a band of barbarians, and destroyed with her female attendants. Justin. 2, c. 4.

Lampeus and Lampis, a mountain of Arcadia. Stat. 8.

Lampon, Lampo, or Lampus, one of the horses of Diomedes,—of Hector,—of Aurora. Homer. Il. 8, od. 23.—A son of Laomedon, father of Dolops.—A soothsayer of Athens in the age of Socrates. Plut. in Pericl.

Lampônia and Lampônium, a city of Troas. Herodot. 5, c. 26.—An island on the coast of Thrace. Strab. 73.

Lamponius, an Athenian general, sent by his countrymen to attempt the conquest of Sicily. Justin. 4, c. 3.

Lampridius Aelius, a Latin historian in the fourth century, who wrote the lives of some of the Roman emperors. His style is inelegant, and his arrangements injudicious. His life of Commodus, Heliothalas, Alexander Severus, &c., is still extant, and to be found in the works of the Historia Augusta Scriptores.

Lamprus, a celebrated musician, &c.—C. Nep. in Eban.

Lampiscus and Lampiscum, now Lampusa, a town of Asia Minor on the borders of the Propontis, at the north of Abydos. Priapus was the chief deity of the place, of which he was reckoned by some the founder. His temple there was the asylum of lewdness and debauchery, and exhibited scenes of the most unnatural lust, and hence the epithet Lampiscus is usual to express immodesty and wantonness. Alexander resolved to destroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, and more probably for its firm adherence to the interest of Persia. It was, however, saved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes. Virg. Anaximenes. It was formerly called Pityusa, and received the name of Lampsacus, from Lampsace, a daughter of Mandon, a king of Phrygia, who gave information to some Phœceans who dwelt there, that the rest of the inhabitants had conspired against their life. This timely information saved them from destruction. The city afterwards bore the name of their preserver. The wine of Lampsacus was famous and therefore a tribute of wine was granted from the city by Xerxes to maintain the table of Themistocles. Mela, 1 c. 19.—Strab. 13.—Paus. 9 c. 31.—Herodot. 5, c. 117.—*C. Lampæteræ, a town of Phœcia in Ionia. Liv. 37, c. 21.

Lamptæria, a festival at Pellene, in Achaia, in honour of Bacchus, who was surnamed Lampter, from λαμπερῶν, to shine, because, during this solemnity, which was observed in the night, the worshippers went to the temple of Bacchus, with lighted torches in their hands. It was also customary to place vessels full of wine in several parts of every street in the city. Paus. 4, c. 21.

Lampus a son of Ægyptus.—A man of Elis.—A son of Prolaus.

Læmus, a king of the Læstrygones, who is supposed by some to have founded Formia in Italy. The family of the Lamie at Rome was, according to the opinion of some, descended from him. Horat. 3, od. 17.—A son of Hercules and Omphale, who succeeded his mother on the throne of Lydia. Ovid. Heroid. 9, v. 54.—A Latin chief killed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 334.—A river of Ætolia. Paus. 9, c. 31.—A Spartan general hired by Nectanebus king of Egypt. Diod. 16.—A city of Cilicia.—A town near Formia built by the Læstrygones.

Læmyrus, oufboom, a surname of one of the Ptolemies.—One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 334.

Lanassa, a daughter of Cleodæus, who married Pyrrhus the son of Achilles by whom she had eight children. Plut. in Pyrr.—Justin. 17, c. 3.—A daughter of Agathocles, who married Pyrrhus, whom she soon after forsook for Demetrius. Plut.

Lanosa, a fountain, &c. Paus.

Lancia, a town of Lusitania. Flor. 4, c. 12.

Landi, a people of Germany conquered by Cæsar.

Langia, a river of Peloponnesus, falling into the bay of Corinth.

Langobardi, a warlike nation of Germany, along the Spyrh, called improperly Lombards by some. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 45. G. 40.

Langobriga, a town of Lusitania.

Lanuvium, a town of Latium, about 16 miles from Rome on the Appian road. Juno had there a celebrated temple, which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans, whose consuls on first entering upon office offered sacrifices to the goddess. The statue of the goddess was covered with a goat's skin, and armed with a buckler and spear, and wore shoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. Cic. pro Mur. de Nat. D. 1, c. 29. Pro Milon. 10.—Liv. 8, c. 14.—Nat. 12, v. 364.

Laobotas, or Læbotas, a Spartan king, of the family of the Agidas, who succeeded his father Echestratus, B.C. 1023. During his reign war was declared against Argos, by Sparta. He sat on the throne for 37 years, and was succeeded by Dorystus his son. Paus. 3, c. 2.

Læboon, a son of Priam and Hecuba, or, according to others, of Antenor, or of Capys. As being priest of Apollo, he was commissioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious. During the sacrifice two enormous serpents issued from the sea, and attacked Læboon's two sons, who stood next to the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his sons, but the serpents, falling upon him, squeezed him in their complicated wreaths, so that he died in the greatest agonies. This punishment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horse which the Greeks had consecrated to Minerva, as also for his impiety in hurling a javelin against the sides of the horse as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage against the consent of Apollo, or, according to others, for his polluting the temple by his commerce with his wife Antiope before the statue of the god. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 41 & 201.—Hygin. fab. 135.

Laodamas, a son of Alcinous king of the Phœaciens, who offered to wrestle with Ulysses, while at his father's court. Ulysses, mindful of the hospitality of Alcinous, refused the challenge of Laodamas. Homer. Od. 7, v. 170.—A son of Eteocles king of Thebes. Paus. 9, c. 15.

Læodamia, a daughter of Acæstus and Astydamia, who married Proteus, the son of Iphiclus king of a part of Thessaly. The departure of her husband for the Trojan war was the source of grief to her, but when she heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector, her sorrow was increased. To keep alive the memory of her husband whom she had tenderly loved, she ordered a wooden statue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. This was seen by one of her servants, who informed Iphiclus that his daughter's bed was daily defiled by an unknown stranger. Iphiclus watched his daughter, and when he found that the intelligence was false, he ordered the wooden image to be burned, in hopes of dissipating his daughter's grief. He did not succeed. Laodamia threw herself into the flames with the image and perished. This circumstance has given occasion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention that Proteus was restored to life, and to Laodamia, for three hours, and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions, he persuaded his wife to accompany him. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Ovid. Her. ep. 13.—Hygin. fab. 104.—Propert. 1, el. 19.—A daughter of Bellerophon, by Achæmonë the daughter of king Iobates. She had a son by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herself to the service of Diana, and hunted with her; but her haughtiness proved fatal to her, and she perished by the arrows of the goddess. Homer. Il. 6, 12 & 16.—A daughter of Alexander king of Epirus, by Olympia the daughter of Pyrrhus. She was assassinated in the temple of Diana, where she had fled for safety during a sedition. Her murderer, called Milo, soon after turned his dagger against his own breast and killed himself. Justin. 28, c. 3.

Læodice, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acæmas son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes from the Greeks to Troy with an embassy to demand the restoration of Helen. She obtained an interview and the gratification of her desires at the house of Phœbia, the wife of a governor of a small town of Troas, which the Greek ambassador had visited. She had a son by Acæmas, whom she called Munitus. She afterwards married Helicæon, son of Antenor and Telephus king of Mysia. Some call her Astyoche. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, Laodice threw herself down from the top of a tower and was killed, when Troy was sacked by the Greeks. Dictys Cret. 1.—Paus. 13, c. 26.—Homer. II. 3 & 6.—One of the Oceanides.—A daughter of Cinyras, by whom Elatus had some children. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—A daughter of Agamemnon, called also Electra. Homer. II. 9.—A sister of Mithridates, who married Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and afterwards her own brother Mithridates. During the secret absence of Mithridates, she prostituted herself to her servants, in hopes that her husband was dead; but when she saw her expectations frustrated, she attempted to poison Mithridates, for which she was put to death.—A queen of Cappadocia, put to death by her subjects for poisoning five of her children.—A sister and wife of Antiochus II. She put to death Beronice, whom her husband had married. Vit. Antiochus II. She was murdered by order of Ptolemy Evergetes, B.C. 246.—A daughter of Demetrius, shamefully put to death by Ammonius, the tyrannical minister of the vicious Alexander Bala king of Syria.—A daughter of Seleucus.—The mother of Seleucus. Nine months before she brought forth she dreamt that Apollo had introduced himself into her bed, and had presented her with a precious stone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to her son as soon as born. This dream appeared the more wonderful, when in the morning she discovered in her bed a ring answering the same description. Not only the son that she brought forth, called Seleucus, but also all his successors of the house of the Seleucidae, had the mark of an anchor upon their thigh. Justin. Appian. in Syr. mentions this anchor, though in a different manner.

Laodicea, now Ladik, a city of Asia, on the borders of Caria, Phrygia, and Lydia, celebrated for its commerce, and the fine soft and black wool of its sheep. It was originally called Diospolis, and afterwards Rhoas; and received the name of Laodicea, in honour of Laodice the wife of Antiochus. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 12.—Mela. 1, c. 22.—Cic. 5, Att. 15, pro Flacc.—Another in Media, destroyed by an earthquake in the age of Nero.—Another in Syria, called by way of distinction Laodicea Cabasia, or ad Libanum.—Another on the borders of Coelosyria. Strab.

Laodicea, a province of Syria, which receives its name from Laodicea, its capital.

Laodochus, a son of Antenor, whose form Minerva borrowed to advise Pandarus to break the treaty which subsisted between the Greeks and Trojans. Homer. II. 4.—An attendant of Antiochus.—A son of Priam. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—A son of Apollo and Phthia. Id. 1, c. 7.

Laogonus, a son of Bias, brother to Dardanus, killed by Achilles at the siege of Troy. Hom. II. 20, v. 461.—A priest of Jupiter, killed by Merion in the Trojan war. Homer. II. 16, v. 604.

Laogoras, a king of the Dryopes, who accustomed his subjects to become robbers. He plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi, and was killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 4.

Laogore, a daughter of Cinyras and Metharme daughter of Pygmalion. She died in Egypt. Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Laomedon, son of Ilus king of Troy, married Strymon, called by some Placia, or Leucippe, by whom he had Podarces, afterwards known by the name of Priam, and Hesione. He built the walls of Troy, and was assisted by Apollo and Neptune, whom Jupiter had banished from heaven, and condemned to be subservient to the will of Laomedon for one year. When the walls were finished, Laomedon refused to reward the labours of the gods, and soon after his territories were laid waste by the god of the sea, and his subjects were visited by a pestilence sent by Apollo. Sacrifices were offered to the offended divinities, but the calamities of the Trojans increased; and nothing could appease the gods, according to the words of the oracle, but annually to expose to a sea monster a Trojan virgin. Whenever the monster appeared, the marriageable maidens were assembled, and the lot decided which of them was doomed to death for the good of her country. When this calamity had continued for five or six years, the lot fell upon Hesione, Laomedon's daughter. The king was unwilling to part with a daughter whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, but his refusal would irritate more strongly the wrath of the gods. In the midst of his fears and hesitations, Hercules came and offered to deliver the Trojans from this public calamity, if Laomedon promised to reward him with a number of fine horses. The king consented, but when the monster was destroyed, he refused to fulfil his engagements, and Hercules was obliged to besiege Troy and take it by force of arms. Laomedon was put to death after a reign of 29 years, his daughter Hesione was given in marriage to Telamon, one of the conqueror's attendants, and Podarces was ransomed by the Trojans, and placed upon his father's throne. According to Hyginus, the wrath of Neptune and Apollo was kindled against Laomedon, because he refused to offer on their altars, as a sacrifice, all the first-born of his cattle, according to a vow which he had made. Homer. II. 21.—Virg. Æn. 2 & 9.—Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 7, c. 80.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Hygin. 89.—A demagogue of Messina in Sicily.—A satrap of Phœnicia, &c. Curt. 10, c. 10.—An Athenian, &c. Plut.—An Orchomenian. Id.

Laomedonteus, an epithet applied to the Trojans from their king Laomedon. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 542. l. 7, v. 105. l. 8, v. 18.

Laomedontiades, a patronymic given to the Trojans from Laomedon their king. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 248.

Laonome, the wife of Polyphemus, one of the Argonauts.

Laonome, a daughter of Thespius, by whom Hercules had two sons, Teles and Menipides, and two daughters, Lysidice and Stenedice. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Laothoe, a daughter of Altes, a king of the Leleges, who married Priam and became mother of Lycaon and Polydorus. Homer. II. 21, v. 85.—One of the daughters of Thespius, mother of Antidus by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Laous, a river of Lacedaemon.

Lapathus, a city of Cyprus.

Laphria, a surname of Diana at Patrae in Achaia, where she had a temple with a statue of gold and ivory, which represented her in the habit of a huntress. The statue was made by Menecmus and Soidas, two artists of celebrity. This name was given to .oe goddess from Laphrus the son of Delphus, who consecrated the statue to her. There was a festival of the goddess there, called also Laphria, of which Paus. ., c. 18, gives an account.

Laphystium, a mountain in Boeotia, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was called Læ- phystius. It was here that Athamas prepared to immolate Phryxus and Helle, whom Jupiter saved by sending them a golden ram; whence the surname, and the homage paid to the god. Paus. 9, c. 34.

Lapideus, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans.

Lapithæ, a people of Thessaly. Virg. Lapithus, a city of Cyprus.

Lapithus, a son of Apollo by Stilbe. He was brother to Centaurus, and married Orsinoe daughter of Euronymus, by whom he had Phorbas and Periphas. The name of Lapithæ was given to the numerous children of Phorbas and Periphas, or rather to the inhabitants of the country, of which they had obtained the sovereignty. The chief of the Lapithæ assembled to celebrate the nuptials of Pirithous, one of their number, and among them were Theseus, Dryas, Hopelus, Mopsus, Phalerus, Exadius, Proclochus, Titaresius, &c. The Centaurs were also invited to partake the common festivity, and the amusements would have been harmless and innocent, had not one of the intoxicated Centaurs offered violence to Hippodamia the wife of Pirithous. The Lapithæ resented the injury, and the Centaurs supported their companions, upon which the quarrel became universal, and ended in blows and slaughter. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and they at last were obliged to retire. Theseus among the Lapithæ showed himself brave and intrepid in supporting the cause of his friends, and Nestor also was not less active in the protection of chastity and innocence. This quarrel arose from the resentment of Mars, whom Pirithous forgot or neglected to invite among the other gods at the celebration of his nuptials, and therefore the divinity punished the insult by sowing dissension among the festive assembly. Virg. Centauri. Hesiod has described the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, as also Ovid in a more copious manner. The invention of bits and bridles for horses is attributed to the Lapithæ. Virg. G. 3, v. 115. Æn. 6, v. 601. l. 7, v. 305. — Ovid. Met. 12, v. 530. l. 14, v. 670. — Hesiod. in Scut. — Diad. 4. — Pind. 2, Pyth. — Strab. 9. — Stat. Theb. 7, v. 304.

Lapithæum, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 3, c. 20.

Lara, or Laranda, one of the Naisds, daughter of the river Almon in Latium, famous for her beauty and her loquacity, which her parents long endeavoured to correct, but in vain. She revealed to Juno the amours of her husband Jupiter with Juturna, for which the god cut off her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her to the infernal regions. The messenger of the gods fell in love with her by the way, and gratified his passion. Lara became mother of two children, to whom the Romans have paid divine honours, according to the opinion of some, under the name of Lares. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 599.

Larentia and Laurentia, a courtesan in the first ages of Rome. Virg. Æn.

Lares, gods of inferior power at Rome, who presided over houses and families. They were two in number, sons of Mercury by Lara. Virg. Æn. In process of time their power was extended not only over houses, but also over the country and the sea, and we find Lares Urbanis to preside over the cities, Familiares over houses, Rustici over the country, Compliales over crosses-roads, Marini over the sea, Viales over the roads, Patellarii, &c. According to the opinion of some, the worship of the gods Lares, who are supposed to be the same as the manes, arises from the ancient custom among the Romans and other nations of burying their dead in their houses, and from their belief that their spirits continually hovered over their houses, for the protection of the inhabitants. The statues of the Lares resembling monkeys, and covered with the skin of a dog, were placed in a niche behind the doors of the houses, or around the hearths. At the feet of the Lares was the figure of a dog barking, to intimate their care and vigilance. Incense was burnt on their altars, and a sow was also offered on particular days. Their festivals were observed at Rome in the month of May, when their statues were crowned with garlands of flowers, and offerings of fruit presented. The word Lares seems to be derived from the Etruscan word Lars, which signifies conductor, or leader. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 129. — Juv. B. v. 8. — Plut. in Quest. Rom. — Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10. — Horat. 3, od. 23. — Plant. in Aul. 5, Cist.

Largus, a Latin poet, who wrote a poem on the arrival of Antenor in Italy, where he built the town of Padua. He composed with ease and elegance. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 16, v. 17.

Larides, a son of Daucus or Daunus, who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and had his hand cut off with one blow by Pallas the son of Evander. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 391.

Larina, a virgin of Italy, who accompanied Camilla in her war against Boeas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 655.

Larinum, or Larina, now Larino, a town of the Frentani on the Tiferis, before it falls into the Adriatic. The inhabitants were called Larinates. Ital. 15, v. 565. — Cic. Clu. 63, 4. Att. 12, l. 7, ep. 13. — Liv. 22, c. 18. l. 27, c. 40. — Car. C. 1, c. 23.

Larissa, a daughter of Pelagius, who gave her name to some cities in Greece. Paus. 2, c. 23. — A city between Palestine and Egypt, where Pompey was murdered and buried, according to some accounts. — A large city on the banks of the Tigris. It had a small pyramid near it, greatly inferior to those of Egypt. — A city of Asia Minor, on the southern confines of Troas. Strab. 13. — Another in Æolia, 70 stadia from Cyme. It is surnamed Phriconis by Strabo, by way of distinction. Strab. 13. — Hom. Il. 2, v. 640. — Another near Ephesus. — Another on the borders of the Peneus in Thessaly, also called Cremaste from its situation (Pennis), the most famous of all the cities of that name. It was here that Acrisius was inadvertently killed by his grandson Perseus. Jupiter had there a famous temple, on account of which he is called Larissæus. The same epithet is also applied to Achilles, who reigned there. It is still extant, and bears the same name. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 542. — Virg. Æn. 2, v. 107. — Lucan. 6. — Liv. 31, c. 46. l. 42, c. 56. — A citadel of Argos, built by Danaus.

Larissæus Virg. Æn.

Larissus, a river of Peloponnesus flowing between Elis and Achaia. Strab. 8. — Liv. 27, c. 31. — Paus. 8, c. 43.

Larius, a large lake of Cisalpine Gaul, through which the Addua runs in its way into the Po, above Cremona. Virg. G. 2, v. 159.

Larnos, a small desolate island on the coast of Thrace.

Laronia, a shameless courtesan in Juvenal's age. Juv. 2, v. 86.

Lars Tolumnius, a king of the Veientes, conquered by the Romans, and put to death, A.U.C. 329. Liv. 4, c. 17 & 19.

T. Lartius Flavius, a consul who appeased a sedition raised by the poorer citizens, and was the first dictator ever chosen at Rome, B.C. 498. He made Spurius Cassius his master of horse. Liv. 2, c. 18.—Spurius, one of the three Romans who alone withstood the fury of Porcenna's army at the head of a bridge, while the communication was cutting down behind them. His companions were Cocles and Herminius. Val. Cocles. Liv. 2, c. 10 & 18.—Dionys. Hal.—Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—The name of Lartius has been common to many Romans.

Lartolantani, a people of Spain.

Larvæ, a name given to the wicked spirits and apparitions which, according to the notions of the Romans, issued from their graves in the night and came to terrify the world. As the word larva signifies a mask, whose horrid and uncouth appearance often serves to frighten children, that name has been given to the ghosts or spectres which superstition believes to hover around the graves of the dead. Some call them Lemures. Servius in Virg. Æn. 5, v. 64, l. 6, v. 152.

Larymnæ, a town of Bœotia, where Bacchus had a temple and a statue.—Another in Caria. Strab. 9 & 16.—Mela, 1, c. 16. l. 2, c. 3.

Larysium, a mountain of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 29.

Lassia, an ancient name of Andros.

Lassus, or Lausus, a dithyrambic poet, born at Hermione, in Peloponnesus, about 500 years before Christ, and reckoned among the wise men of Greece by some. He is particularly known by the answer he gave to a man who asked him what could best render life pleasant and comfortable? "Experience." He was acquainted with music. Some fragments of his poetry are to be found in Athenæus. He wrote an ode upon the Centaurs, and a hymn to Ceres, without inserting the letter S in the composition. Athen. 10.

Lasthènes, a governor of Olynthus, corrupted by Philip king of Macedonia.—A Cretan demagogue, conquered by Metellus the Roman general.—A cruel minister at the court of the Seleucidæ, kings of Syria.

Lasthénia, a woman who disguised herself to come and hear Plato's lectures. Diog.

Latægus, a king of Pontus, who assisted Æetes against the Argonauts, and was killed by Durapes. Flacc. 5, v. 584.—One of the companions of Æneas, killed by Mercurius. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 697.

Latorænus Plantus, a Roman consul elect, A.D. 65. A conspiracy with Piso against the emperor Nero proved fatal to him. He was led to execution, where he refused to confess the associates of the conspiracy, and did not even frown at the executioner who was as guilty as himself; but when a first blow could not sever his head from his body, he looked at the executioner, and shaking his head, he returned it to the hatchet with the greatest composure, and it was cut off. There exists now a celebrated palace at Rome, which derives its name from its ancient possessors the Latoræni.

Latorium, the villa of Q. Cicero at Arpinum, near the Liris. Cic. ad Attic. 10, ep. 1, l. 4, ep. 7. Ad. fr. 3, ep. 1.—Plin. 15, c. 15.

Latiælis, a surname of Jupiter, who was worshipped by the inhabitants of Latium upon mount Albanus at stated times. The festivals, which were first instituted by Tarquin the Proud, lasted 15 days. Liv. 21. Vid. Feriæ Latine.

Latini, the inhabitants of Latium. Vid. Latium.

Latinius Latianus, a celebrated informer, &c. Tacit.

Latinus, a son of Faunus by Marica, king of the Aborigines in Italy, who from him were called Latini. He married Amata, by whom he had a son and a daughter. The son died in his infancy, and the daughter, called Lavinia, was secretly promised in marriage by her mother to Turnus king of the Rutuli, one of her most powerful admirers. The gods opposed this union, and the oracles declared that Lavinia must become the wife of a foreign prince. The arrival of Æneas in Italy seemed favourable to this prediction, and Latinus, by offering his daughter to the foreign prince, and making him his friend and ally, seemed to have fulfilled the commands of the oracle. Turnus, however, disapproved of the conduct of Latinus; he claimed Lavinia as his lawful wife, and prepared to support his cause by arms. Æneas took up arms in his own defence, and Latium was the seat of the war. After mutual losses it was agreed that the quarrel should be decided by the two rivals, and Latinus promised his daughter to the conqueror. Æneas obtained the victory and married Lavinia. Latinus soon after died, and was succeeded by his son-in-law. Virg. Æn. 9, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, &c. Fast. 2, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 13.—Liv. 1, c. 1, &c.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—A son of Sylvius Æneas, surnamed also Sylvius. He was the fifth king of the Latins, and succeeded his father. He was father to Alba his successor. Dionys. 1, c. 15.—Liv. 2, c. 3.—A son of Ulysses and Circe also bore this name.

Latium, a country of Italy near the river Tiber. It was originally very circumscribed, extending only from the Tiber to Circeii, but afterwards it comprehended the territories of the Volsci, Æqui, Hernici, Ausones, Umbri, and Rutuli. The first inhabitants were called Aborigines, and received the name of Latini, from Latinus their king. According to others the word is derived from latæo, to conceal, because Saturn concealed himself there when flying the resentment of his son Jupiter. Laurentum was the capital of the country in the reign of Latinus, Lavinium under Æneas, and Alba under Ascanius. Vid. Alba. The Latins, though originally known only among their neighbours, soon rose in consequence when Romulus had founded the city of Rome in their country. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 38, l. 8, v. 322.—Strab. 5.—Dionys. Hal.—Justin. 20, c. 1.—Plut. in Romul.—Plin. 3, c. 12.—Tacit. 4, Ann. 5.

Latius, a surname of Jupiter at Rome. Stat. 5, Sylv. 2, v. 399.

Latmus, a mountain of Caria near Miletus. It is famous for the residence of Endymion, whom Diana regularly visited in the night, whence he is often called Latmius Heros. Vid. Endymion. Mela, 1, c. 17.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 299.—Art. Am. 3, v. 83.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 14.—Cic. 1, Tusc. 28.

Latobius, the god of health among the Corinthians.

Latobrigi, a people of Belgic Gaul.

Latonia, a name of Diana, as being the daughter of Latona.—A country house near Ephesus.

Latoniae. Vid. Latumia.

Latonia, a daughter of Coeus the Titan and Phœbe, or, according to Homer, of Saturn. She was admired for her beauty, and celebrated for the favours which she granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her husband's amours, made Latona the object of her vengeance, and sent the serpent Python to disturb her peace and persecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of her pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra, influenced by Juno, refused to give her a place where she might find rest and bring forth. Neptune, moved with compassion, struck with his trident, and made immovable the island of Delos, which before wandered in the Ægean, and appeared sometimes above, and sometimes below, the surface of the sea. Latona, changed into a quail by Jupiter, came to Delos, where she resumed her original shape, and gave birth to Apollo and Diana, leaning against a palm tree or an olive. Her repose was of short duration. Juno discovered the place of her retreat, and obliged her to fly from Delos. She wandered over the greatest part of the world, and in Caria, where her fatigue compelled her to stop, she was insulted and ridiculed by peasants of whom she asked for water, while they were weeding a marsh. Their refusal and insolence provoked her, and she intreated Jupiter to punish their barbarity. They were all changed into frogs. She was exposed to repeated insults by Niobe, who boasted herself greater than the mother of Apollo and Diana, and ridiculed the presents which the piety of her neighbours had offered to Latona. Vid. Niobe. Her beauty proved fatal to the giant Tityus, whom Apollo and Diana put to death. Vid. Tityus. At last Latona, though persecuted and exposed to the resentment of Juno, became a powerful deity, and saw her children receive divine honours. Her worship was generally established where her children received adoration, particularly at Argos, Delos, &c., where she had temples. She had an oracle in Egypt, celebrated for the true, decisive answers which it gave. Diod. 5.—Herodot. 2, c. 155.—Paus. 2 & 3.—Homer. 11, 21. Hym. in Ap. & Dian.—Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 & 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 160.—Hygin. Fab. 140.

Latopólis. a city of Egypt. Strab.

Latous, a name given to Apollo, as son of Latona. Ovid. Met. 6, Fab. 9.

Latreus, one of the Centaurs, who, after killing Halesus, was himself slain by Cæneus. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 463.

Laudamia, a daughter of Alexander king of Epirus, and Olympias daughter of Pyrrhus, killed in a temple of Diana, by the enraged populace. Justin. 28, c. 3.—The wife of Proteus. Vid. Laodamia.

Laudice. Vid. Laodice.

Laverna, the goddess of thieves and dishonest persons at Rome. She did not only preside over robbers, called from her Laverniones, but she protected such as deceived others, or performed their secret machinations in obscurity and silence. Her worship was very popular, and the Romans raised her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which from that circumstance was called the gate of Laverna. She was generally represented by a head without a body. Horat. 11, ep. 16, v. 60.—Varro de L. L. 4.—A place mentioned by Plut., &c.

Lavernium, a temple of Laverna, near Formæ. Cic. 7, Att. 8.

Laufolla, a wanton woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 319.

Laviana, a province of Armenia Minor.

Lavinia, a daughter of king Latinus and Amata. She was betrothed to her relation king Turnus, but because the oracle ordered her father to marry her to a foreign prince, she was given to Æneas after the death of Turnus. Vid. Latinus. At her husband's death she was left pregnant, and being fearful of the tyranny of Æneas her son-in-law, she fled into the woods, where she brought forth a son called Æneas Sylvius. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6 & 7.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 507.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

Lavinium, or Lavinum, a town of Italy, built by Æneas, and called by that name in honour of Lavinia, the founder's wife. It was the capital of Latium during the reign of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 262.—Strab. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Justin. 43, c. 2.

Laura, a place near Alexandria in Egypt.

Laureacum, a town at the confluence of the Enns and the Danube, now Lorch.

Laurentalia, certain festivals celebrated at Rome in honour of Laurentia, on the last day of April and the 23rd of December. They were, in process of time, part of the Saturnalia. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 57.

Laurentis agri, the country in the neighbourhood of Laurentum. Tibul. 2, el. 5, v. 41.

Laurentia. Vid. Acca.

Laurentini, the inhabitants of Latium. They received this name from the great number of laurels which grew in the country. King Latinus found one of uncommon largeness and beauty, when he was going to build a temple to Apollo, and the tree was consecrated to the god, and preserved with the most religious ceremonies. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 59.

Laurentium, belonging to Laurentum or Latium. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 709.

Laurentum, now Paterno, the capital of the kingdom of Latium in the reign of Latinus. It is on the sea coast, east of the Tiber. Vid. Laurentini. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 171.

Laurion, a place of Attica, where were gold mines, from which the Athenians drew considerable revenues, and with which they built their fleets by the advice of Themistocles. These mines failed before the age of Strabo. Thucyd. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9.

Lauron, a town of Spain, where Pompey's son was conquered by Caesar's army.

Latus, now Laino, a town on the river of the same name, which forms the southern boundary of Lucania. Strab. 6.

Laus Pompeia, a town of Italy, founded by a colony sent thither by Pompey.

Lautus, a son of Numitor and brother of Ilia. He was put to death by his uncle Amulius, who usurped his father's throne. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 54.—A son of Mezentius king of the Tyrrhenians, killed by Æneas in the war which his father and Turnus made against the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 649. l. 10, v. 426, &c.

Lautium, a city of Latium.

Lautumio, or Latomio, a prison at Syracuse, cut out of the solid rock by Dionysius, and now converted into a subterraneous garden filled with numerous shrubs, flourishing in luxuriant variety. Cic. Ver. 5, c. 27.—Liv. 26, v. 27. l. 32, c. 26.

Laodes, a son of Astacus, who killed Eteocles. Apollod.

Lœolæ, a nation of Pæonia, near Macedonia.

Leœna, an Athenian harlot. Vid. Leœna.

Leander, a youth of Abydos, famous for his amours with Hero. Vid. Hero.—A Milesian who wrote an historical commentary upon his country.

Léandre, a daughter of Anycias, who married Arcas. Apollod.

Léandrias, a Lacedæmonian refugee of Thebes, who declared, according to an ancient oracle, that Sparta would lose the superiority over Greece when conquered by the Thebans at Leuctra. Diad. 15.

Léanira, a daughter of Amycias. Vid. Léandre.

Léarotus, a son of Athamas and Ino, crushed to death against a wall by his father, in a fit of madness. Vid. Athamas. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 490.

Lébadæa, now Lioudias, a town of Bœotia, near mount Helicon. It received this name from the mother of Aspledon, and became famous for the oracle and cave of Trophonius. No moles could live there, according to Pliny. Strab. 9.—Plin. 16, c. 36.—Paus. 9, c. 59.

Lébedus, or Lébedos, a town of Ionia, at the north of Colophon, where festivals were yearly observed in honour of Bacchus, and where Trophonius had a cave and a temple. Lysimachus destroyed it, and carried part of the inhabitants to Ephesus. It had been founded by an Athenian colony, under one of the sons of Codrus. Strab. 14.—Horat. 1, ep. 11, v. 7.—Herodot. 1, c. 142.—Cic. 1, Div. 33.

Lébéna, a commercial town of Crete, with a temple sacred to Æsculapius. Paus. 2, c. 26.

Lébinthos and Lébynthos, an island in the Ægean sea, near Patmos. Strab. 10.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 222.

Léchosum, now Palaga, a port of Corinth in the bay of Corinth. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 381.—Liv. 31, c. 23.

Léotum, a promontory, now cape Baba, separating Troas from Æolia. Liv. 37, c. 37.

Lécythus, a town of Eubœa.

Léda, a daughter of king Thespius and Eurythemis, who married Tyndarus king of Sparta. She was seen bathing in the river Eurotas by Jupiter, when she was some few days advanced in her pregnancy, and the god, struck with her beauty, resolved to deceive her. He persuaded Venus to change herself into an eagle, while he assumed the bird of prey, fled through the air into the arms of Léda, who willingly sheltered the trembling swan from the assaults of his superior enemy. The caresses with which the naked Léda received the swan, enabled Jupiter to avail himself of his situation, and nine months after this adventure, the wife of Tyndarus brought forth two eggs, of one of which sprang Pollux and Helena, and of the other Castor and Clytemnestra. The two former were deemed the offspring of Jupiter, and the others claimed Tyndarus for their father. Some mythologists attributed this amour to Nemesis, and not to Léda; and they further mention, that Léda was entrusted with the education of the children which sprang from the eggs brought forth by Nemesis. Vid. Helena. To reconcile this diversity of opinions, others maintain that Léda received the name of Nemesis after death. Homer and Hesiod make no mention of the metamorphosis of Jupiter into a swan, whence some have imagined that the fable was unknown to these two ancient poets, and probably invented since their age. Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 109.—Hesiod. 17, v. 55.

—Hygin. Fab. 77.—Isocr. in Hel.—Homer. Od. 11.—Eurip. in Hel.—A famous dancer in the age of Jusened, 6, v. 69.

Lédæa, an epithet given to Hermione, &c., as related to Léda. Verg. Æn. 3, v. 328.

Lédus, now Les, a river of Gaul, near the modern Montpelier. Mela, 2, c. 5.

Légio, a corps of soldiers in the Roman armies, whose numbers have been different at different times. The legiun under Romulus consisted of 3000 foot and 300 horse, and was soon after augmented to 4000, after the admission of the Sabines into the city. When Annibal was in Italy it consisted of 5000 soldiers, and afterwards it decreased to 4000, or 4500. Marius made it consist of 6200, besides 700 horse. This was the period of its greatness in numbers. Livy speaks of 10, and even 18, legions kept at Rome. During the consular government it was usual to levy and fit up four legions, which were divided between the two consuls. This number was, however, often increased, as time and occasion required. Augustus maintained a standing army of 23 or 25 legions, and this number was seldom diminished. In the reign of Tiberius there were 27 legions, and the peace establishment of Adrian maintained no less than 30 of these formidable brigades. They were distributed over the Roman empire, and their stations were settled and permanent. The peace of Britain was protected by three legions; 16 were stationed on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, six in Lower, and three in Upper Germany; one in Noricum, one in Rhetia, three in Mœsia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia. Eight were stationed on the Euphrates, six of which remained in Syria, and two in Cappadocia; while the remote provinces of Egypt, Africa, and Spain were guarded each by a single legion. Besides these the tranquillity of Rome was preserved by 20,000 soldiers, who, under the titles of city cohorts and of pretorian guards, watched over the safety of the monarch and of the capital. The legions were distinguished by different appellations, and generally borrowed their name from the order in which they were first raised, as prima, secunda, tertia, quarta, &c. Besides this distinction, another more expressive was generally added, as from the name of the emperor who embodied them, as Augusta, Claudiana, Galbiana, Flavia, Ulpia, Trajana, Antoniana, &c.; from the provinces or quarters where they were stationed, as Britannica, Cyreniaca, Gallica, &c.; from the provinces which had been subdued by their valour, as Parthica, Scythica, Arabica, Africana, &c.; from the names of the deities whom their generals particularly worshipped, as Minervia, Apollinaria, &c.; or from some trifling accidents, as Martia, Fulminatrix, Rapax, Adjutrix, &c. Each legion was divided into 10 cohorts, each cohort into three manipuli, and every manipulus into two centuries, or ordines. The chief commander of the legion was called legatus, lieutenant. The standards borne by the legions were various. In the first ages of Rome a wolf was the standard, in honour of Romulus; after that a hog, because that animal was generally sacrificed at the conclusion of a treaty, and therefore it indicated that war is undertaken for the obtaining of peace. A minotaur was sometimes the standard, to intimate the secrecy with which the general was to act, in commemoration of the labyrinth. Sometimes a horse or boar was used, till the age of Marius, who changed all these for the eagle, being a representation of that bird in silver, holding sometimes a thunderbolt in its claws. The Roman eagle ever after remained in use, though Trajan made use of the dragon.

Letus, or Letus, a commander of the Boeotians at the siege of Troy. He was saved from the victorious hand of Hector and from death by Idomeneus. Hom. Il. 2, 6 & 17.—One of the Argonauts, son of Alector. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

Lelaps, a dog that never failed to seize and conquer whatever animal he was ordered to pursue. It was given to Procris by Diana, and Procris reconciled herself to her husband by presenting him with that valuable present. According to some, Procris had received it from Minos, as a reward for the dangerous wounds of which she had cured him. Hygin. Fab. 128.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 771.—Paus. 9, c. 19.—One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 211.

Leleges (a λεγω, to gather), a wandering people, composed of different unconnected nations. They were originally inhabitants of Caria, and went to the Trojan war with Altes their king. Achilles plundered their country, and obliged them to retire to the neighbourhood of Halicarnassus, where they fixed their habitation. The inhabitants of Laconia and Megara bore this name for some time, from Lelex, one of their kings. Strab. 7 & 8.—Hom. Il. 21, v. 85.—Plin. 4, c. 7, l. 5, c. 30.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 725.—Paus. 3, c. 1.

Lelegis, a name applied to Miletus, because once possessed by the Leleges. Plin. 5, c. 29.

Lelex, an Egyptian, who came with a colony to Megara, where he reigned about 200 years before the Trojan war. His subjects were called from him Leleges, and the place Lelegia mania. Paus. 3, c. 1.—A Greek, who was the first king of Laconia in Peloponnesus. His subjects were also called Leleges, and the country where he reigned Lelegia. Id.

Lemanis, a place in Britain, where Caesar is supposed to have first landed, and therefore placed by some at Lime in Kent.

Lemannus, a lake in the country of the Allobroges, through which the Rhone flows by Geneva. It is now called the lake of Geneva or Lausanne. Lucan. 1, v. 306.—Mela, 2, c. 5.

Lemnos, an island in the Ægean sea between Tenedos, Imbros, and Samothrace. It was sacred to Vulcan, called Lemnius pater, who fell there when kicked down from heaven by Jupiter. Vid. Vulcanus. It was celebrated for two horrible massacres; that of the Lemnian women murdering their husbands (Vid. Hipsipyle), and that of the Lemnians, or Pelasgi, in killing all the children they had had by some Athenian women, whom they had carried away to become their wives. These two acts of cruelty have given rise to the proverb of Lemnian actions, which is applied to all barbarous and inhuman deeds. The first inhabitants of Lemnos were the Pelasgi, or rather the Thracians, who were murdered by their wives. After them came the children of the Lemnian widows by the Argonauts, whose descendants were at last expelled by the Pelasgi, about 1200 years before the Christian era. Lemnos is about 122 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, who says that it is often shadowed by mount Athos, though at the distance of 87 miles. It has been called Hipsipyle, from queen Hipsipyle. It is famous for a certain kind of earth or chalk, called terra Lemnia or terra sigillata, from the seal or impression which it can bear. As the inhabitants were blacksmiths, the poets have taken occasion to fix the forges of Vulcan in that island, and to consecrate the whole country to his divinity. Lemnos is also celebrated for a labyrinth, which, according to some traditions, surpassed those of Crete and Egypt. Some remains of it were still visible in the age of Pliny. The island of Lemnos, now called Skadimene, was reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades, and the Carians, who then inhabited it, were obliged to emigrate. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 454.—Hom. Il. 2, v. 593.—C. Nep. in Mill.—Strab. 1, 2, & 7.—Herodot. 6, c. 140.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Apollon. 1, Arg.—Flacc. 2, v. 78.—Ovid. Art. Am. 3, v. 679.—Stat. 3, Theb. 274.

Lemovices, a people of Gaul, now Limousin and Limoges. Cæs. G. 7, G. 4.

Lemovii, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ.

Lēmūros, the manes of the dead. The ancients supposed that the souls after death wandered all over the world, and disturbed the peace of its inhabitants. The good spirits were called Lares familiares, and the evil ones were known by the name of Larvæ, or Lemurs. They terrified the good, and continually haunted the wicked and impious; and the Romans had the superstition to celebrate festivals in their honour, called Lemuria, or Lemuralia, in the month of May. They were first instituted by Romulus to appease the manes of his brother Remus, from whom they were called Remuria, and, by corruption, Lemuria. These solemnities continued three nights, during which the temples of the gods were shut and marriages prohibited. It was usual for the people to throw black beans on the graves of the deceased, or to burn them, as the smell was supposed to be insupportable to them. They also muttered magical words, and, by beating kettles and drums, they believed that the ghosts would depart and no longer come to terrify their relations upon earth. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 421, &c.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 209.—Persius, 5, v. 185.

Lēmūria and Lēmūrālia. Vid. Lemures.
Lemæus, a surname of Bacchus, from Anvois, a wine-press. There was a festival called Lemæa, celebrated in his honour, in which the ceremonies observed at the other festivals of the god chiefly prevailed. There were, besides, poetical contentions, &c. Paus.—Virg. G. 2, v. 4.—Æn. 4, v. 207.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 14.—A learned grammarian, ordered by Pompey to translate into Latin some of the physical manuscripts of Mithridates king of Pontus.

Lentulus, a celebrated family at Rome, which produced many great men in the commonwealth. The most illustrious were L. Corn. Lentulus, a consul, A.U.C. 427, who dispersed some robbers who infested Umbria.—Batiatus Lentulus, a man who trained up some gladiators at Capua, which escaped from his school.—Corn. Lentulus, surnamed Sura. He joined in Catiline's conspiracy, and assisted in corrupting the Allobroges. He was convicted in full senate by Cicero, and put in prison and afterwards executed.—A consul who triumphed over the Samnites.—Cn. Lentulus, surnamed Gelulicus, was made consul A.D. 26, and was some time after put to death by Tiberius, who was jealous of his great popularity. He wrote a history mentioned by Suetonius, and attempted also poetry.—L. Lentulus, a friend of Pompey, put to death in Africa.—P. Corn. Lentulus, a pretor, defeated by the rebellious slaves in Sicily.—Lentulus Spinther, a senator, kindly used by J. Caesar, &c.—A tribune at the battle of Cannæ.—P. Lentulus, a friend of Brutus, mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. 1, c. 48) as a great and consummate statesman.—Besides these, there are a few others, whose name is only mentioned in history, and whose life was not marked by any uncommon event. The consulship was in the family of the Lentuli in the years of Rome 427, 479, 517, 518, 553, 555, 598, &c. Tacit. Ann.—Liv.—Flor.—Plin.—Plut.—Eutrop.

Leo, a native of Byzantium, who flourished 350 years before the Christian era. His philosophical and political talents endeared him to his countrymen, and he was always sent upon every important occasion as ambassador to Athens, or to the court of Philip king of Macedonia. This monarch, well acquainted with the abilities of Leo, was sensible that his views and claims to Byzantium would never succeed while it was protected by the vigilance of such a patriotic citizen. To remove him he had recourse to artifice and perfidy. A letter was forged, in which Leo made solemn promises of betraying his country to the king of Macedonia for money. This was no sooner known than the people ran enraged to the house of Leo, and the philosopher, to avoid their fury, and without attempting his justification, strangled himself. He had written some treatises upon physic, and also the history of his country, and the wars of Philip in seven books, which have been lost. Plut.—A Corinthian at Syracuse, &c.—A king of Sparta.—A son of Eurycrates. Athen. 12.—Philost.—An emperor of the east, surnamed the Thracian. He reigned 17 years, and died A.D. 474, being succeeded by Leo II. for 10 months, and afterwards by Zeno.

Leocorion, a monument and temple erected by the Athenians to Pasithea, Theope, and Eubele, daughters of Leos, who immolated themselves when an oracle had ordered that, to stop the raging pestilence, some of the blood of the citizens must be shed. Ælian. 12, c. 28.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 10.

Leocrates, an Athenian general, who flourished B.C. 460, &c. Diod. 11.

Leodamas, a son of Eteocles, one of the seven Theban chiefs who defended the city against the Argives. He killed Ægialeus, and was himself killed by Alcmaeon.—A son of Hector and Andromache. Dicys Crest.

Leogoras, an Athenian debauchee, who maintained the courtesan Myrnhina.

Leon, a king of Sparta. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—A town of Sicily, near Syracuse. Liv. 24, l. 25.

Leona, a courtesan, called also Læna. Vid. Læna.

Leonatus, one of Alexander's generals. His father's name was Eumenes. He distinguished himself in Alexander's conquest of Asia, and once saved the king's life in a dangerous battle. After the death of Alexander, at the general division of the provinces, he received for his portion that part of Phrygia which borders on the Hellespont. He was empowered by Perdiccas to assist Eumenes in making himself master of the province of Cappadocia, which had been allotted to him. Like the rest of the generals of Alexander, he was ambitious of power and dominion. He aspired to the sovereignty of Macedonia, and secretly communicated to Eumenes the different plans he meant to pursue to execute his designs. He passed from Asia into Europe to assist Antipater against the Athenians, and was killed in a battle which was fought soon after his arrival. Historians have mentioned, as an instance of the luxury of Leonatus, that he employed a number of camels to procure some earth from Egypt to wrestle upon, as, in his opinion, it seemed better calculated for that purpose. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3, c. 12. l. 6, c. 8.—Justin. 13, c. 2.—Diod. 18.—C. Nep. in Eum.—A Macedonian with Pyrrhus in Italy against the Romans.

Leonidas, a celebrated king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, sent by his countrymen to oppose Xerxes king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with about five millions of souls. He was offered the kingdom of Greece by the enemy, if he would not oppose his views; but Leonidas heard the proposal with indignation, and observed, that he preferred death for his country, to an unjust though extensive dominion over it. Before the engagement Leonidas exhorted his soldiers, and told them all to die heartily, as they were to sup in the realms of Pluto. The battle was fought at Thermopylæ, and the 300 Spartans who alone had refused to abandon the scene of action, withstood the enemy with such vigour, that they were obliged to retire wearied and conquered during three successive days, till Ephialtes, a Trachinian, had the perfidy to conduct a detachment of Persians by a secret path up the mountains, whence they suddenly fell upon the rear of the Spartans, and crushed them to pieces. Only one escaped of the 300; he returned home, where he was treated with insult and reproaches, for flying ignominiously from a battle in which his brave companions, with their royal leader, had perished. This celebrated battle, which happened 480 years before the Christian era, taught the Greeks to despise the number of the Persians, and to rely upon their own strength, and intrepidity. Temples were raised to the fallen hero, and festivals, called Læidea, yearly celebrated at Sparta, in which free-born youths contended. Leonidas, as he departed for the battle from Lacedæmon, gave no other injunction to his wife but, after his death, to marry a man of virtue and honour, to raise from her children deserving of the name and greatness of her first husband. Herodot. 7, c. 120, &c.—C. Nep. in Them.—Justin. 2.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Paus. 3, c. 4.—Plut. in Lyc. & Cleom.—A king of Sparta after Areus II., 257 before Christ. He was driven from his kingdom by Cleombrotus his son-in-law, and afterwards re-established.—A preceptor to Alexander the Great.—A friend of Parmenio, appointed commander, by Alexander, of the soldiers who lamented the death of Parmenio, and who formed a separate cohort. Curt. 7, c. 2.—A learned man of Rhodes, greatly commended by Strabo, &c.

Leontium and Leontini, a town of Sicily, about five miles distant from the sea-shore. It was built by a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa, and was, according to some accounts, once the habitation of the Læstrygonæ, for which reason the neighbouring fields are often called Læstrygonii campi. The country was extremely fruitful, whence Cicero calls it the grand magazine of Sicily. The wine which it produced was the best of the island. The people of Leontium implored the assistance of the Athenians against the Syracusans, B.C. 427. Thucyd. 6.—Polyb. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 467.—Ital. 14, v. 126.—Cic. in Verr. 5.

Leontium, a celebrated courtesan of Athens, who studied philosophy under Epicurus, and became one of his most renowned pupils. She prostituted herself to the philosopher's scholars, and even to Epicurus himself, if we believe the reports which were raised by some of his enemies. Vid. Epicurus. Metrodorus shared her favours in the most unbounded manner, and by him she had a son, to whom Epicurus was so partial, that he recommended him to his executors on his dying bed. Leontium not only professed herself a warm admirer and follower of the doctrines of Epicurus, but she even wrote a book in support of them against Theophrastus. This book was valuable, if we believe the testimony and criticism of Cicero, who praised the purity and elegance of its style, and the truly Attic turn of the expressions. Leontium had also a daughter called Danae, who married Sophron. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 33.

Leonton, or Leontopolis, a town of Egypt where lions were worshipped. Elian. H. An. 13, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 10.

Leontyohides. Vid. Leotyehides.

Leos, a son of Orpheus, who immolated his three daughters for the good of Athens. Vid. Leocoon.

Leosthenes, an Athenian general, who, after Alexander's death, drove Antipater to Thessaly, where he besieged him in the town of Lamia. The success which for a while attended his arms was soon changed by a fatal blow, which he received from a stone thrown by the besieged, B.C. 323. The death of Leosthenes was followed by the total defeat of the Athenian forces. The funeral oration over his body was pronounced at Athens by Hyperides, in the absence of Demosthenes, who had been lately banished for taking a bribe from Harpalus. Vid. Lamiacum. Diod. 17 & 18.—Strab. 9.—Another general of Athens, condemned on account of the bad success which attended his arms against Pezaretos.

Leotyehides, a king of Sparta, son of Menares, of the family of the Proclides. He was set over the Grecian fleet, and, by his courage and valour, he put an end to the Persian war at the famous battle of Mycale. It is said that he cheered the spirits of his fellow-soldiers at Mycale, who were anxious for their countrymen in Greece, by raising a report that a battle had been fought at Platæa, in which the barbarians had been defeated. This succeeded, and though the information was premature, yet a battle was fought at Platæa, in which the Greeks obtained the victory the same day that the Persian fleet was destroyed at Mycale. Leotyehides was accused of a capital crime by the Ephori, and, to avoid the punishment which his guilt seemed to deserve, he fled to the temple of Minerva at Tegea, where he perished, B.C. 469, after a reign of 25 years. He was succeeded by his grandson Archidamus. Paus. 3, c. 7 & 8.—Diod. 11.—A son of Agis king of Sparta by Timæa. The legitimacy of his birth was disputed by some, and it was generally believed that he was the son of Alcibiades. He was prevented from ascending the throne of Sparta by Lysander, though Agis had declared him upon his death-bed his lawful son and heir, and Agesilaus was appointed in his place. C. Nep. in Ages.—Plut.—Paus. 3, c. 8.

Lephyrium, a city of Cilicia.

Lepida, a noble woman, accused of attempts to poison her husband, from whom she had been separated for 20 years. She was condemned under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 25.—A woman who married Scipio.—Domitia, a daughter of Drusus and Antonia, great niece to Augustus, and aunt to the emperor Nero. She is described by Tacitus as a common prostitute, infamous in her manners, violent in her temper, and yet celebrated for her beauty. She was put to death by means of her rival Agrippina, Nero's mother. Tacit.—A wife of Galba the emperor.—A wife of Cassius, &c.

Lepidus M. Junilius, a Roman, celebrated as being one of the triumvirs with Augustus and Antony. He was of an illustrious family, and, like the rest of his contemporaries, he was remarkable for his ambition, to which were added a narrowness of mind, and a great deficiency of military abilities. He was sent against Caesar's murderers, and some time after, he leagued with M. Antony, who had gained the heart of his soldiers by artifice, and that of their commander by his address. When his influence and power among the soldiers had made him one of the triumvirs, he showed his cruelty, like his colleagues, by his proscriptions, and even suffered his own brother to be sacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirate. He received Africa as his portion in the division of the empire; but his indolence soon rendered him despicable in the eyes of his soldiers and of his colleagues; and Augustus, who was well acquainted with the unpopularity of Lepidus, went to his camp and obliged him to resign the power to which he was entitled as being a triumvir. After this degrading event, he sunk into obscurity, and retired, by order of Augustus, to Cercæ, a small town on the coast of Latium, where he ended his days in peace, B.C. 13, and where he was forgotten as soon as out of power. Appian.—Plut. in Aug.—Flor. 4, c. 5 & 7.—A Roman consul, sent to be the guardian of young Ptolemy Epiphanes, whom his father had left to the care of the Roman people. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 67.—Juvén. 30, c. 3.—A son of Julia the granddaughter of Augustus. He was intended by Augustus as his successor in the Roman empire. He committed adultery with Agrippina when young. Dion. 59.—An orator mentioned by Cicero in Bru.—A censor, A.U.C. 734.

Lepinus, a mountain of Italy. Coloss. 10.

Lepontii, a people at the source of the Rhine. Plin. 3, c. 20.

Lepreos, a son of Pyrgus, who built a town in Elis, which he called after his own name. He laid a wager that he would eat as much as Hercules; upon which he killed an ox and ate it up. He afterwards challenged Hercules to a trial of strength, and was killed. Paus. 5, c. 5.

Leprium, or Lepreos, a town of Elis. Cic. 6, Att. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 5.

Leptines, a general of Demetrius, who ordered Cn. Octavius, one of the Roman ambassadors, to be put to death.—A son of Hermocrates of Syracuse, brother to Dionysius. He was sent by his brother against the Carthaginians, and experienced so much success, that he sunk 50 of their ships. He was afterwards defeated by Mago, and banished by Dionysius. He always continued a faithful friend to the interests of his brother, though naturally an avowed enemy to tyranny and oppression. He was killed in a battle with the Carthaginians. Diod. 15.—A famous orator at Athens, who endeavoured to set the people free from oppressive taxes. He was opposed by Demosthenes.—A tyrant of Apollonia in Sicily, who surrendered to Timoleon. Diod. 16.

Leptis, the name of two cities of Africa, one of which, called Major, now Lebida, was near the Syrtis, and had been built by a Tyrian or Sidonian colony. The other, called Minor, now Lemta, was about 18 Roman miles from Adrumetum. It paid every day a talent to the republic of Carthage, by way of tribute. Lucan. 2, v. 251.—Plin. 5, c. 19.—Sallust. in Jug. 77.—Strab. 1, c. 8.—Strab. 3, v. 256.—Cass. C. 2, c. 38.—Cic. 5, Verr. 59.

Leria, an island in the Ægean sea, on the coast of Caria, about 18 miles in circumference, peopled by a Milesian colony. Its inhabitants were very dishonest. Strab. 10.—Herodot. 5, c. 195.

Lerina, or Pianasia, a small island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Gaul, at the east of the Rhone. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.

Lerna, a country of Argolis, celebrated for a grove and a lake, where, according to the poets, the Danaides threw the heads of their murdered husbands. It was there also that Hercules killed the famous hydra. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 803. l. 12, v. 517.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 597.—Lucret. 5.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 638.—Apollod. 2, c. 15.—There was a festival, called Lernæa, celebrated there in honour of Bacchus, Proserpine, and Ceres. The Argives used to carry fire to this solemnity from a temple upon mount Crathis, dedicated to Diana. Paus.

Lero, a small island on the coast of Gaul, called also Lerina.

Leros. Vid. Leria.

Lesbos, a large island in the Ægean sea, now known by the name of Methim, 168 miles in circumference. It has been severally called Egira, Lasia, Æthiops, and Pelagias, from the Pelagias, by whom it was first peopled, Macaria, from Macareus who settled in it, and Lesbos, from the son-in-law and successor of Macareus, who bore the same name. The chief towns of Lesbos were Methymna and Mitylene. Lesbos was originally governed by kings, but they were afterwards subjected to the neighbouring powers. The wine which it produced was greatly esteemed by the ancients, and still is in the same repute among the moderns. The Lesbians were celebrated among the ancients for their skill in music, and their women for their beauty; but the general character of the people was so debauched and dissipated, that the epithet of Lesbian was often used to signify debauchery and extravagance. Lesbos has given birth to many illustrious persons, such as Arion, Terpander, &c. The best verses were by way of eminence often called Lesbomæ carmen, from Alcaeus and Sappho, who distinguished themselves for their poetical compositions, and were also natives of the place. Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. G. 2, v. 90.—Horat. 1, ep. 11.—Herodot. 1, c. 100.

Lesbus, or Lesbos, a son of Lapithas, grandson of Æolus, who married Methymna daughter of Macareus. He succeeded his father-in-law, and gave his name to the island over which he reigned.

Lesches, a Greek poet of Lesbos, who flourished B.C. 600. Some suppose him to be the author of the little Iliad, of which only few verses remain, quoted by Paus. 10, c. 25.

Lestrygones. Vid. Lestrygonæ.

Lethæum, a town of Propontis, built by the Athenians.

Lethæus, a river of Lydia, flowing by Magnesia into the Mæander. Strab. 10, &c.—Another of Macedonia,—of Crete.

Lêthè, one of the rivers of hell, whose waters the souls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain space of time in Tartarus. It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, seen, or heard before, as the name implies, Λεθηον, oblivion.—Lêthè is a river of Africa, near the Syrtis, which runs under the ground, and some time after rises again, whence the origin of the fable of the Lethæan streams of oblivion.—There is also a river of that name in Spain.—Another in Bœotia, whose waters were drunk by those who consulted the oracle of Trophonius. Lucan. 9, v. 355.—Ovid.

Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 47.—Virg. G. 4, v. 545. Æn. 6, v. 714.—Ital. 1, v. 235. l. 10, v. 555.—Paus. 9, c. 39.—Horat. 4, od. 7, v. 27.

Létus, a mountain of Liguria. Liv. 41, c. 18.

Léuana, a goddess of Rome, who presided over the action of the person who took up from the ground a newly born child, after it had been placed there by the midwife. This was generally done by the father, and so religiously observed was this ceremony, that the legitimacy of a child could be disputed without it.

Leucas, a town of the Salentines, near a cape of the same name in Italy. Lucan. 5, v. 376.—A town of Ionia,—of Crete,—of Argolis. Strab. 6, &c.

Leucas, or Leucadia, an island of the Ionian sea, now called St. Maura, near the coast of Epirus, famous for a promontory called Leucate, Leucas, or Leucates, where desponding lovers threw themselves into the sea. Sappho had recourse to this leap to free herself from the violent passion which she entertained for Phaon. The word is derived from λευκω, white, on account of the whiteness of its rocks. Apollo had a temple on the promontory, whence he is often called Leucadius. The island was formerly joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus, which the inhabitants dug through after the Peloponnesian war. Ovid. Heroid. 15, v. 171.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ital. 15, v. 302. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 274. l. 8, v. 677.—A town of Phœnicia.

Leucæstion, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 25.

Leucospis, a Lycian, one of the companions of Æneas, drowned in the Tyrrhene sea. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 334.

Leucate. Vid. Leucas.

Leucæ, a small island in the Euxine sea, of a triangular form, between the mouths of the Danube and the Borysthenes. According to the poets, the souls of the ancient heroes were placed there as in the Elysian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repose to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, seemed to entitle them. From that circumstance it has often been called the island of the blessed, &c. According to some accounts Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and shared the pleasures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ammian. 22.—Q. Calab. 2, v. 773.—One of the Oceanides whom Pluto carried into his kingdom.

Leucæ, a people of Gaul, between the Moselle and the Maese. Their capital is now called Toul. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 40.—Mountains on the west of Crete, appearing at a distance like white clouds, whence the name.

Leucippe, one of the Oceanides.

Leucippides, the daughters of Leucippus. Vid. Leucippus.

Leucippus, a celebrated philosopher of Abdera, about 488 years before Christ, disciple to Zeno. He was the first who invented the famous system of atoms and of a vacuum, which was afterwards more fully explained by Democritus and Epicurus. Many of his hypotheses have been adopted by the moderns, with advantage. Diogenes has written his life.—A brother of Tyndarus king of Sparta, who married Philodice daughter of Inachus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilaira and Phœbe, known by the patronymic of Leucippides. They were carried away by their cousins Castor and Pollux, as they were going to celebrate their nuptials with Lynceus and Idas. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 701.—Apollod. 3, c. 10, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 17 & 26.—A son of Xanthus, descended from Heliophon. He became deeply enamoured of one of his sisters, and when he was unable to restrain his unnatural passion, he resolved to gratify it. He acquainted his mother with it, and threatened to murder himself if she attempted to oppose his views or remove the object of his affection. The mother, rather than lose a son whom she tenderly loved, cherished his passion, and by her consent her daughter yielded herself to the arms of her brother. Some time after the father resolved to give his daughter in marriage to a Lycian prince. The future husband was informed that the daughter of Xanthus secretly entertained a lover, and he communicated the intelligence to the father. Xanthus upon this secretly watched his daughter, and when Leucippus had introduced himself to her bed, the father, in his eagerness to discover the seducer, occasioned a little noise in the room. The daughter was alarmed, and as she attempted to escape she received a mortal wound from her father, who took her to be the lover. Leucippus came to her assistance, and stabbed his father in the dark, without knowing who he was. This accidental parricide obliged Leucippus to fly from his country. He came to Crete, where the inhabitants refused to give him an asylum, when acquainted with the atrociousness of his crime, and he at last came to Ephesus, where he died in the greatest misery and remorse. Hermetianus apud Parthen. c. 5.—A son of Epomauus, who became enamoured of Daphne, and to obtain her confidence disguised himself in a female dress, and attended his mistress as a companion. He gained the affections of Daphne by his obsequiousness and attention, but his artifice at last proved fatal through the influence and jealousy of his rival Apollo; for when Daphne and her attendants were bathing in the Ladon, the sex of Leucippus was discovered, and he perished by the darts of the females. Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.—Paus. 8, c. 20.—A son of Hercules by Marse, one of the daughters of Thespius. Apollod. 3, c. 7.

Leucolia, a part of Cyprus.

Leoon, a tyrant of Bosphorus, who lived in great intimacy with the Athenians. He was a firm patron of the useful arts, and greatly encouraged commerce. Strab.—Dion. 14.—A son of Athamas and Themisto. Paus. 6, c. 22.—A king of Pontus killed by his brother, whose bed he had defiled. Ovid. in Ib. 3.—A town of Africa near Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 160.

Leucône, a daughter of Aphidas, who gave her name to a fountain of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 44.

Leucónes, a son of Hercules. Apollod.

Leucónes, a daughter of Lycambes. The Leucónes to whom Horace addressed his 1st Od. 11, seems to be a fictitious name.

Leucopetra, a place on the isthmus of Corinth, where the Achæans were defeated by the consul Mummius.—A promontory six miles east from Rhegium in Italy, where the Apennines terminate and sink into the sea.

Leucophrys, a temple of Diana, with a city of the same name, near the Mæander. The goddess was represented under the figure of a woman with many breasts, and crowned with victory.—An ancient name of Tenedos. Paus. 10, c. 14.—Strab. 13 & 14.

Leucopólis, a town of Caria.

Leucos, a river of Macedonia near Pydna.—A man, &c. Vid. Idomeneus.

Leucosia, a small island in the Tyrrhene sea. It received its name from one of the companions of Æneas, who was drowned there, or from one of the Sirens, who was thrown there by the sea. Strab. 5.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708.

Leucosylli, a people of Asia Minor, called afterwards Cappadocians. Strab. 12.—The same name is given to the inhabitants of Cilicia, where it borders on Cappadocia. C. Nep. 14, c. 1.

Leucothoe, or Leucothoa, the wife of Athamas, changed into a sea deity. Vid. Ino. She was called Matuta by the Romans, who raised her a temple, where all the people, particularly women, offered vows to their brother's children. They did not entreat the deity to protect their own children, because Ino had been unfortunate in hers. No female slaves were permitted to enter the temple; or if their curiosity tempted them to transgress this rule, they were beaten away with the greatest severity. To this supplicating for other people's children, Ovid alludes in these lines, Fast. 6:

Non tamen hanc pro stirpe sub pia mater adorat, Ipsa parvum felix visa fuisse parvum.

—A daughter of king Orchamus by Eurynome. Apollo became enamoured of her, and to introduce himself to her with greater facility, he assumed the shape and features of her mother. Their happiness was complete, when Clytia, who tenderly loved Apollo, and was jealous of his amours with Leucothoe, discovered the whole intrigue to her father, who ordered his daughter to be buried alive. The lover, unable to save her from death, sprinkled nectar and ambrosia on her tomb, which, penetrating as far as the body, changed it into a beautiful tree, which bears frankincense. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 196.—An island in the Tyrrhene sea, near Caprea.—A fountain of Samos.—A town of Egypt, of Arabia. Mela. 2, c. 7.—A part of Asia which produces frankincense.

Leuctra, a village of Boeotia, between Plataea and Thespia, famous for the victory which Epaminondas the Theban general obtained over the superior force of Cleombrotus king of Sparta, on the 8th of July, B.C. 371. In this famous battle 4000 Spartans were killed with their king Cleombrotus, and no more than 300 Thebans. From that time the Spartans lost the empire of Greece, which they had obtained for nearly 500 years.—Plut. in Pelop. & Ages.—C. Nep. in Epam.—Justin. 6, c. 6.—Xenophon. Hist. Græc.—Diod. 15.—Paus. Lacon.—Cic. de Offic. 1, c. 18. Tusc. 1, c. 46. Att. 6, ep. 1.—Strab. 9.

Leuctrum, a town of Laconia. Strab. 8.

Leuons, one of the companions of Ulysses, killed before Troy by Antiphon son of Priam. Homer. Il. 4, v. 497.

Leucyanias, a river of Peloponnesus, flowing into the Alpheus. Paus. 6, c. 21.

Levinus. Vid. Levinus.

Leutyichides, a Lacedæmonian, made king of Sparta on the expulsion of Demaratus. Herodot. 6, c. 65, &c. Vid. Leutyichides.

Lexovii, a people of Gaul, at the mouth of the Seine, conquered with great slaughter by a lieutenant of J. Cesar. Cæs. Bell. G.

Libanius, a celebrated sophist of Antioch in the age of the emperor Julian. He was educated at Athens, and opened a school at Antioch, which produced some of the best and most learned of the literary characters of the æge. Libanius was naturally vain and arrogant, and he contemptuously refused the offers of the emperor Julian, who wished to purchase his friendship and intimacy by raising him to offices of the highest splendour and affluence in the empire. When Julian had imprisoned the senators of Antioch for their impertinence, Libanius undertook the defence of his fellow-citizens, and paid a visit to the emperor, in which he astonished him by the boldness and independence of his expressions, and the firmness and resolution of his mind. Some of his orations, and above 1600 of his letters, are extant; they discover much affectation and obscurity of style, and we cannot perhaps much regret the loss of writings which afforded nothing but a display of pedantry, and quotations from Homer. Julian submitted his writings to the judgment of Libanius with the greatest confidence, and the sophist freely rejected or approved, and showed that he was more attached to the person than the fortune and greatness of his prince. The time of his death is unknown. The best edition of Libanius seems to be that of Paris, fol. 1606, with a second volume published by Morell, 1627. His epistles have been edited by Wolf, fol. 1773.

Libanus, a high mountain of Syria, famous for its cedars. Strab. 6.

Libentina, a surname of Venus, who had a temple at Rome, where the young women used to dedicate the toys and childish amusements of their youth, when arrived at nubile years. Varro. de L. l. 5, c. 6.

Liber, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies free. He received this name from his delivering some cities of Bœotia from slavery, or, according to others, because wine, of which he was the patron, delivered mankind from their cares, and made them speak with freedom and unconcern. The word is often used for wine itself. Senec. de Trag. Anim.

Libera, a goddess, the same as Proserpine. Cic. in Ver. 4, c. 48.—A name given to Ariadne by Bacchus, or Liber, when he had married her. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 513.

Liberalia, festivals yearly celebrated in honour of Bacchus, the 17th of March. Slaves were then permitted to speak with freedom, and everything bore the appearance of independence. They were much the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks. Varro.

Libertas, a goddess of Rome who had a temple on mount Aventine, raised by T. Gracchus, and improved and adorned by Pollio with many elegant statues and brazen columns, and a gallery in which were deposited the public acts of the state. She was represented as a woman in a light dress, holding a rod in one hand and a cap in the other, both signs of independence, as the former was used by the magistrates in the manumission of slaves, and the latter was worn by slaves, who were soon to be set at liberty. Sometimes a cat was placed at her feet, as this animal is very fond of liberty, and impatient when confined. Liv. 24, c. 16. l. 25, c. 7.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 1, v. 72.—Plat. in Grac. —Dio. Cas. 44.

Libethra, a fountain of Magnesia in Thessaly, or of Bœotia, according to some, sacred to the muses, who from thence are called Libethrides. Virg. Ecl. 7, v. 21.—Plin. 4, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9 & 10.

Libethrides, a name given to the Muses from the fountain Libethra, or from mount Libethrus in Thrace.

Libiod. Libentii, or Libri, a people of Gaul who passed into Italy, A.U.C. 364.—Liv. 5, c. 35. l. 21, c. 38.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Polyb. 2.

Libitina, a goddess at Rome, who presided over funerals. According to some, she is the same as Venus, or rather Proserpine. Servius Tullius first raised her a temple at Rome, where everything necessary for funerals was exposed to sale, and where the registers of the dead were usually kept. Dionys. Hal. 4.—Liv. 40, c. 19.—Val. Max. 5, c. 2.—Plut. Quasi. Rom.

Libo, a friend of Pompey, who watched over the fleet, &c. Plut.—A Roman citizen, &c. Horat. 1, ep. 19.—A friend of the first triumvirate, who killed himself and was condemned after death.

Libon, a Greek architect who built the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius. He flourished about 450 years before the christian era.

Libophonœes, the inhabitants of the country near Carthage.

Liburna, a town of Dalmatia. Liburnia, now Croatia, a country of Illyricum, between Istria and Dalmatia, whence a colony came to settle in Apulia, in Italy. There were at Rome a number of men whom the magistrates employed as public heralds, who were called Liburni, probably from being originally of Liburnian extraction. Some ships of a light construction but with strong beaks were also called Liburnian. Propert. 2, el. 21, v. 44.—Juv. 4, v. 75.—Martial. 1, ep. 50, v. 33.—Horat. 1, od. 37, v. 30.—Epod. 1, v. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 534.—Plin. 6, ep. 16.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 7.—Plut. 2, c. 17.

Liburnides, an island on the coast of Liburnia, in the Adriatic. Strab. 5.

Liburnum mare, the sea which borders on the coasts of Liburnia.

Liburnus, a mountain of Campania. Libya, a daughter of Epaphus and Cassiopea, who became mother of Agenor and Belus by Neptune. Apollod. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 2, 44.—A name given to Africa, one of the three grand divisions of the ancient globe. Libya, properly speaking, is only a part of Africa, bounded on the east by Egypt, and on the west by that part called by the moderns the kingdom of Tripoli. The ancients, according to some traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others, sailed round Africa, by steering westward from the Red sea, and entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, after a perilous navigation of three years. From the word Libya, are derived the epithets of Libys, Libyssa, Libyis, Libystis, Libycus, Libysticus, Libystinus, Libystenus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 706. l. 5, v. 37.—Lucan. 4.—Sallust. &c.

Libyous and Libystis. Vid. Libya.

Libys, a sailor, &c. Ovid. Met. 3.

Libyssa, a river of Nithynia, with a town of the same name, where was the tomb of Annibal, still extant in the age of Pliny.

Licoates, a people of Vindelicia.

Licha, a city near Lycia.

Lichades, small islands near Cæneum, a promontory of Eubœa, or less called Lichas. Vid. Lichas. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 155. 218.—Strab. 9.

Lichas, a servant of Hercules who brought him the poisoned tunic from Dejanira. He was thrown by his master into the sea with great violence, and changed into a rock in the Eubœan sea, by the compassion of the gods. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 211.

Lichos, an Arcadian who found the bones of Orestes buried at Tegea, &c. Herodot.

Licinia lex, was enacted by L. Licinius Crassus and Q. Mutius, consuls, A.U.C. 659. It ordered all the inhabitants of Italy to be enrolled on the list of citizens in their respective cities.—Another, by C. Licinius Crassus the tribune, A.U.C. 668. It transferred the right of choosing priests from the college to the people. It was proposed, but did not pass.—Another, by C. Licinius Stolo the tribune. It forbade any person to possess 500 acres of land, or keep more than 100 head of large cattle, or 500 of small.—Another, by P. Licinius Varus, A.U.C. 545, to settle the day for the celebration of the Ludi Apollinares, which was before uncertain.—Another, by P. Licinius Crassus Dives, B.C. 110. It was the same as the Fannian law, and further required that no more than 30 asses should be spent at any table on the Calends, Nones, or Nundinae, and only three pounds of fresh and one of salt meat, on ordinary days. None of the fruits of the earth were forbidden.—Another, de sodalitiis, by M. Licinius the consul, 692. It imposed a severe penalty on party clubs, or societies assembled or frequented for election purposes, as coming under the definition of ambitus, and of offering violence in some degree to the freedom and independence of the people.—Another, called also Abulia, by Licinius and Æbutius the tribunes. It enacted, that when any law was proffered with respect to any office or power, the person who proposed the bill, as well as his colleagues in office, his friends and relations, should be declared incapable of being invested with the said office or power.

Licinia, the wife of C. Gracchus, who attempted to dissuade her husband from his seditious measures by a pathetic speech. She was deprived of her dowry after the death of Caius.—A vestal virgin accused of incontinence, but acquitted, A.U.C. 536.—Another vestal, put to death for her lasciviousness under Trajan.—The wife of Mæcenas, distinguished for conjugal tenderness. She was sister to Procleius, and bore also the name of Terentia. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 13.

O. Licinius, a tribune of the people, celebrated for the consequence of his family, for his intrigues and abilities. He was a plebeian, and was the first of that body who was raised to the office of a master of horse to the dictator. He was surnamed Stolo, or useless sprout, on account of the law which he had enacted during his tribuneship. Vid. Licinia lex, by Stolo. He afterwards made a law which permitted the plebeians to share the consular dignity with the patricians, A.U.C. 388. He reaped the benefit of this law, and was one of the first plebeian consuls. This law was proposed and passed by Licinius, as it is reported, at the instigation of his ambitious wife, who was jealous of her sister, who had married a patrician, and who seemed to be of a higher dignity in being the wife of a consul. Liv. 6, c. 34.—Plut.—C. Calvus, a celebrated orator and poet in the age of Cicero. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the forum, and his poetry, which some of the ancients have compared to Catullus. His orations are greatly commended by Quintilian. Some believe that he wrote annals quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. He died in the 30th year of his age. Quintil.—Cic. in Brut. 81.—Macer, a Roman accused by Cicero when pretor. He denied the power of his accuser, but when he saw himself condemned he grew so desperate that he killed himself. Plut.—P. Crassus, a Roman sent against Perseus king of Macedonia. He was at first defeated, but afterwards repaired his losses and obtained a complete victory, &c.—A consul sent against Annibal.—Another, who defeated the robbers that infested the Alps.—A high priest.—Caius Iremex, a comic poet in the age of Africanus, preferred by some in merit to Ennius and Terence. His Nævina and Nexera are quoted by ancient authors, but of all his poetry only two verses are preserved. Ant. Græ.—A consul, &c.—Lucullus. Vid. Lucullus.

—Crassus. Vid. Crassus.—Mucianus, a Roman who wrote about the history and geography of the eastern countries, often quoted by Pliny. He lived in the reign of Vespasian.—P. Tegula, a comic poet of Rome about 200 years before Christ. He is ranked as the fourth of the best comic poets which Rome produced. Few lines of his compositions are extant. He wrote an ode, which was sung all over the city of Rome by nine virgins during the Macedonian war. Liv. 31, c. 12.—Varro Muræna, a brother of Proculus, who conspired against Augustus with Fannius Cæpio, and suffered for his crime. Horace addressed his 2 od. 10 to him, and recommended equanimity in every situation. Dio. 54.—C. Flavius Valerianus, a celebrated Roman emperor. His father was a poor peasant of Dalmatia, and himself a common soldier in the Roman armies. His valour recommended him to the notice of Galerius Maximianus, who had once shared with him the inferior and subordinate offices of the army, and had lately been invested with the imperial purple by Diocletian. Galerius loved him for his friendly services, particularly during the Persian war, and he showed his regard for his merit by taking him as a colleague in the empire, and appointing him over the province of Pannonia and Rhætia. Constantine, who was also one of the emperors, courted the favour of Licinius, and made his intimacy more durable by giving him his sister Constantia in marriage, A.D. 313. The continual successes of Licinius, particularly against Maximinus, increased his pride, and rendered him jealous of the greatness of his brother-in-law. The persecutions of the christians, whose doctrines Constantine followed, soon caused a rupture, and Licinius had the mortification to lose two battles, one in Pannonia, and the other near Adrianopolis. Treaties of peace were made between the contending powers, but the restless ambition of Licinius soon broke them; and after many engagements a decisive battle was fought near Chalcedonia. Ill fortune again attended Licinius, who was conquered, and fled to Nicomedia, where soon the conqueror obliged him to surrender, and to resign the imperial purple. The tears of Constantia obtained forgiveness for her husband, yet Constantine knew what a turbulent and active enemy had fallen into his hands, therefore he ordered him to be strangled at Thessalonica, A.D. 324. His family was involved in his ruin. The avarice, licentiousness, and cruelty of Licinius are as conspicuous as his misfortunes. He was an enemy to learning, and this aversion totally proceeded from his ignorance of letters, and the rusticity of his education. His son by Constantia bore also the same name. He was honoured with the title of Cæsar when scarce 30 months old. He was involved in his father's ruin, and put to death by order of Constantine.

Licinius, a barber and freedman of Augustus, raised by his master to the rank and dignity of a senator, merely because he hated Pompey's family. Horat. Art. P. 301.

Licymnus, a son of Electryon and brother of Alcmena. He was so infirm in his old age, that when he walked, he was always supported by a slave Triptolemus son of Hercules, seeing the slave inattentive to his duty, threw a stick at him, which unfortunately killed Licymnius. The murderer fled to Rhodes. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Homer. Il. 2.—Pind. Olymp. 7.

Lido, a mountain of Caria. Herodot. 1, c. 105.
Q. Ligarius, a Roman proconsul of Africa, after Confidius. In the civil war he followed the interest of Pompey, and was pardoned when Caesar had conquered his enemies. Caesar, however, and his adherents were determined upon the ruin of Ligarius; but Cicero, by an eloquent oration, still extant, defeated his accusers, and he was pardoned. He became afterwards one of Caesar's murderers. Cic. pro Lig.—Plut. in Caesar.

Ligea, one of the Nereides. Virg. G. 4.
Liger, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 576.

Liger, or Ligoris, now La Loire, a large river of Gaul, falling into the Atlantic ocean near Nantes. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Cas. G. 7, c. 55 & 75.

Ligoras, an officer of Antiochus king of Syria, who took the town of Sardis by stratagem, &c.

Ligures, the inhabitants of Liguria. Vid. Liguria.

Liguria, a country on the west of Italy, bounded on the east by the river Macra, on the south by part of the Mediterranean called the Ligustic sea, on the west by the Varus, and on the north by the Po. The commercial town of Genoa was anciently and is now the capital of the country. The origin of the inhabitants is not known, though in their character they are represented as vain, unpolished, and addicted to falsehood. According to some they were descended from the ancient Gauls and Germans, or, as others support, they were of Greek origin, perhaps the posterity of the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus. Liguria was subdued by the Romans, and its chief harbour now bears the name of Leghorn. Lucan. 1, v. 442.—Mela, 2, c. 1.—Strab. 4, &c.—Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 15.—Plin. 2, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 5, c. 35. l. 22, c. 33. l. 39, c. 6, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann.—Flor. 2, c. 8.

Ligurinus, a poet. Martial. 3, ep. 50.—A beautiful youth in the age of Horace, 4, od. 1, v. 33.

Ligur, a woman who inhabited the Alps. She concealed her son from the pursuit of Otho's soldiers, &c. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 13.

Ligusticæ Alpes, a part of the Alps which borders on Liguria, sometimes called Maritimi.

Ligusticum mare, the north part of the Tyrrhene sea, now the gulf of Genoa. Plin. 2, c. 47.

Ligyæ, a people of Asia who inhabited the country between Caucasus and the river Phasis. Some suppose them to be a colony of the Ligyes of Europe, more commonly called Ligures. Herodot. 7, c. 72.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 10.—Strab. 4.—Diod. 4.

Ligyrgum, a mountain of Arcadia.

Lilæa, a town of Achaia near the Cephissus. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 348.

Lilybæum, now Boco, a promontory of Sicily, with a town of the same name near the Ægates, now Marsala. The town was strong and very considerable, and it maintained long sieges against the Carthaginians, Romans, &c., particularly one of 10 years against Rome in the first Punic war. It had a port large and capacious, which the Romans, in the wars with Carthage, endeavoured in vain to stop and fill up with stones, on account of its convenience and vicinity to the coast of Africa. Nothing now remains of this once powerful city but the ruins of temples and aqueducts. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 706.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Cic. in Verr. 3.—Cas. de Bell. Afric.—Diod. 22.

Limæa, a river of Lusitania. Strab. 3.

Limonia, a town of Cyprus. Id. 14.

Limnæ, a fortified place on the borders of Laconia and Messenia. Paus. 3, c. 14.—A town of the Thracian Chersonesus.

Limnæum, a temple of Diana at Limnæ, from which the goddess was called Limnæa, and worshipped under that appellation at Sparta and in Achaia. The Spartans wished to seize the temple in the age of Tiberius, but the emperor interfered, and gave it to its lawful possessors the Messenians. Paus. 3, c. 14. l. 7, c. 20.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 43.

Limnætidia, a festival in honour of Diana, surnamed Limnæia, from Limnæ, a school of exercise at Træzene, where she was worshipped, or from Limnæ ponds, because she presided over fishermen.

Limniæce, the daughter of the Ganges, mother of Arys. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 48.

Limnonia, one of the Nereides. Homer. Il. 18.

Limonum, a town of Gaul, afterwards Pictavi, Pictavis. Cas. G. 8, c. 26.

Limyra, a town of Lycia at the mouth of the Limyrus. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 645.—Vell. 2, c. 102.

Lincæii, a people of Gaul Narbonensis.

Lindum, a colony of Britain, now Lincoln.

Lindus, a city on the south-east part of Rhodes, built by Ceraphus son of Sol and Cydippe. The Danaides built there a temple to Minerva, and one of its colonies founded Gela in Sicily. It gave birth to Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men, and to Chares and Laches, who were employed in making and finishing the famous Colossus of Rhodes. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 34.—Herodot. 7, c. 153.—A grandson of Apollo. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

Lingones, now Langres, a people of Gallia Belgica, made tributary to Rome by J. Caesar. They passed into Italy, where they made some settlements near the Alps at the head of the Adriatic. Tacit. H. 4, c. 55.—Martial. 11, ep. 57, v. 9. l. 14, ep. 159.—Lucan. 1, v. 398.—Cas. Bell. G. 1, c. 26.

Lintera palus, a lake of Campania. Ital. 7, v. 278.

Linternum, a town of Campania at the mouth of the river Clanis, where Scipio Africanus died and was buried. Liv. 34, c. 45.—Sil. 6, v. 654. l. 7, v. 278.—Cic. 10, Att. 13.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 713.

Linxus. This name is common to different persons whose history is confused, and who are often taken one for the other. One was son of Urania and Amphimarus the son of Neptune. Another was son of Apollo by Psamathe, daughter of Crotopus king of Argos. Martial mentions him in his 78 ep. l. 2. The third, son of Æsneus, and born at Thebes in Bœotia, taught music to Hercules, who in a fit of anger struck him on the head with his tyre and killed him. He was son of Mercury and Urania, according to Diogenes, who mentions some of his philosophical compositions, in which he asserted that the world had been created in an instant. He was killed by Apollo for presuming to compare himself to him. Apollodorus, however, and Pausanias mention that his ridicule of Hercules on his awkwardness in holding the lyre was fatal to him. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diog. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 4.—Paus. 2, c. 15, l. 9, c. 20.—A fountain in Arcadia, whose waters were said to prevent abortion. Plin. 31, c. 2.

Lodes, one of Penelope's suitors, killed by Ulysses. Homer. Od. 22, 8c.

Lipara, the largest of the Æolian islands, on the coast of Sicily, now called the Lipari. It had a city of the same name, which, according to Diodorus, it received from Liparus the son of Auson, king of these islands, whose daughter Cyane was married by his successor Æolus, according to Pliny. The inhabitants of this island were powerful by sea, and from the great tributes which they paid to Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse, they may be called very opulent. The island was celebrated for the variety of its fruits, and its raisins are still in general repute. It had some convenient harbours, and a fountain whose waters were much frequented on account of their medicinal powers. According to Diodorus, Æolus reigned at Lipara before Liparus. Liv. 5, c. 28.—Plin. 3, c. 9.—Ital. 14, v. 57.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, l. 8, v. 477.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—A town of Etruria.

Liparis, a river of Cilicia, whose waters were like oil. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Vitrav. 8, c. 3.

Liplum, a town of the Æqui, taken by the Romans.

Lipodorus, one of the Greeks settled in Asia by Alexander, &c.

Liquentia, now Livenna, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Adriatic sea. Plin. 3, c. 18.

Livonus, a fountain near Nemea. Stat. Théb. 4, v. 711.

Liriope, one of the Oceanides, mother of Narcissus by the Cepheus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 311.—A fountain of Bœotia on the borders of Thespiis, where Narcissus was drowned, according to some accounts.

Liris, now Gariigliano, a river of Campania, which it separates from Latium. It falls into the Mediterranean sea. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Horat. 3, od. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 424.—A warrior killed by Camilla, &c. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 670.

Lisinnas, a town of Thessaly. Liv. 32, c. 14.

Lissa, the name of a fury which Euripides introduces on the stage, as conducted by Iris at the command of Juno, to inspire Hercules with that fatal rage which ended in his death.

Lisson, a river of Sicily.

Lissus, now Akro, a town of Macedonia, on the confines of Illyricum. Plin. 5, c. 2.—Liv. 44, c. 10.—Lucan. 5, v. 719.—A river of Thrace, falling into the Ægean sea, between Thasos and Samothracia. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes, when he invaded Greece. Strab. 7.—Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Liste, a town of the Sabines, whose inhabitants are called Listini.

Litabrum, now Buitrago, a town of Spain Tarraconensis. Liv. 39, c. 14, l. 35, c. 22.

Litana, a wood in Gallia Togata. Liv. 43, c. 24.

Litavious, one of the Ædui, who assisted Cæsar with 10,000 men. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 37.

Liternum, a town of Campania.

Lithobolia, a festival celebrated at Troezen in honour of Lania and Auxesia, who came from Crete, and were sacrificed by the fury of the seditious populace, and stoned to death. Hence the name of the solemnity, λιθοβολια, lapidation.

Lithrus, a town of Armenia Minor. Strab.

Lithubium, a town of Liguria. Liv. 32, c. 29.

Lityerxes, an illegitimate son of Midas king of Phrygia. He made strangers prepare his harvest, and afterwards put them to death. He was at last killed by Hercules. Thaëcrit. Id. 10.

Livia Drusilla, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of L. Drusus Calpurnianus. She married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom she had the emperor Tiberius and Drusus Germanicus. The attachment of her husband to the cause of Antony was the beginning of her greatness. Augustus saw her as she fled from the danger which threatened her husband, and he resolved to marry her, though she was then pregnant. He divorced his wife Scribonia, and with the approbation of the augurs, he celebrated his nuptials with Livia. She now took advantage of the passion of Augustus, in the share that she enjoyed of his power and imperial dignity. Her children by Drusus were adopted by the complying emperor; and, that she might make the succession of her son Tiberius more easy and undisputed, Livia is accused of secretly involving in one common ruin the heirs and nearest relations of Augustus. Her cruelty and ingratitude are still more strongly marked, when she is charged with having murdered her own husband to hasten the elevation of Tiberius. If she was anxious for the aggrandizement of her son, Tiberius proved ungrateful, and hated a woman to whom he owed his life, his elevation, and his greatness. Livia died in the 86th year of her age, A.D. 29. Tiberius showed himself as undutiful after her death as before, for he neglected her funeral, and expressly commanded that no honours, either private or public, should be paid to her memory. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.—Suet. in Aug. et Tib.—Dion. Cass.—Another, Vid. Drusilla.—Another, called Horestilla, &c. She was debauched by Galba, as she was going to marry Piso. Suet. in Gal. 25.—Another, called also Ocellina. She was Galba's stepmother, and committed adultery with him. Id. ib. 3.

Livia lex, de sociis, proposed to make all the inhabitants of Italy free citizens of Rome. M. Livius Drusus, who framed it, was found murdered in his house before it passed.—Another by M. Livius Drusus the tribune, A.U.C. 662, which required that the judicial power should be lodged in the hands of an equal number of knights and senators.

Livineius, a friend of Pompey, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 11, &c.

Livilla, a daughter of Drusus.—A sister of Caligula, &c. Vid. Julia.

Livius Andronicus, a dramatic poet, who flourished at Rome about 240 years before the christian era. He was the first who turned the personal satires and fescennine verses, so long the admiration of the Romans, into the form of a proper dialogue and regular play. Though the character of a player, so valued and applauded in Greece, was reckoned vile and despicable among the Romans, Andronicus acted a part in his dramatic compositions and engaged the attention of his audience, by repeating what he had laboriously formed after the manner of the Greeks. Andronicus was the freedman of M. Livius Salinator, whose children he educated. His poetry was grown obsolete in the age of Cicero, whose nicety and judgment would not even recommend the reading of it. Some few of his verses are preserved in the Corpus Poetarum.—M. Salinator, a Roman consul, sent against the Illyrians. The success with which he finished the campaign, and the victory which some years after he obtained over Asdrubal, who was passing into Italy with a reinforcement for his brother Annibal, show how deserving he was to be at the head of the Roman armies. Liv.—Drusus, a tribune who joined the patricians in opposing the ambitious views of C. Gracchus. Plut. in Gracc.—An uncle of Cato of Utica. Plut.—Titus, a native of Padua, celebrated for his writings. He passed the greatest part of his life at Naples and Rome, but more particularly at the court of Augustus, who liberally patronized the learned, and encouraged the progress of literature. Few particulars of his life are known, yet his fame was so universally spread even in his lifetime, that an inhabitant of Gades traversed Spain, Gaul, and Italy, merely to see the man whose writings had given him such pleasure and satisfaction in the perusal. Livy died at Padua, in his 67th year, and according to some, on that same day Rome was also deprived of another of its brightest ornaments, by the death of the poet Ovid, A.D. 17. It is said that Livia had appointed Livy to be the preceptor to young Claudius the brother of Germanicus, but death prevented the historian from enjoying an honour to which he was particularly entitled by his learning and his universal knowledge. The name of Livy is rendered immortal by his history of the Roman empire. Besides this, he wrote some philosophical treatises and dialogues, with a letter addressed to his son, on the merit of authors, which ought to be read by young men. This letter is greatly commended by Quintilian, who expatiates with great warmth on the judgment and candour of the author. His Roman history was comprehended in 140 books, of which only 35 are extant. It began with the foundation of Rome, and was continued till the death of Drusus in Germany. The merit of this history is well known, and the high rank which Livy holds among historians will never be disputed. He is always great; his style is clear and intelligible, laboured without affectation, diffusive without tediousness, and argumentative without pedantry. In his harangues he is bold and animated, and in his narrations and descriptions he claims a decided superiority. He is always elegant, and though many have branded his provincial words with the name of Patawinity, yet the expressions, or rather the orthography of words, which in Livy are supposed to distinguish a native of a province of Italy from a native of Rome, are not loaded with obscurity, and the perfect classic is as familiarly acquainted with the one as with the other. Livy has been censured, and perhaps with justice, for being too credulous, and burdening his history with vulgar notions and superstitious tales. He may disgust when he mentions that milk and blood were rained from heaven, or that an ox spoke, or a woman changed her sex, yet he candidly confesses that he recorded only what made an indelible impression upon the minds of a credulous age. His candour has also been called in question, and he has sometimes shown himself too partial to his countrymen, but everywhere he is an indefatigable supporter of the cause of justice and virtue. The works of Livy have been divided by some of the moderns into 14 decades, each consisting of 10 books. The first decade comprehends the history of 460 years. The second decade is lost, and the third comprehends the history of the second Punic war, which includes about 48 years. In the fourth decade, Livy treats of the wars with Macedonia and Antiochus, which contain about 23 years. For the first five books of the fifth decade, we are indebted to the researches of the moderns. They were found at Worms, A.D. 1431. These are the books that remain of Livy's history, and the loss which the celebrated work has sustained by the ravages of time, has in some measure been compensated by the labours of J. Freinshemius, who with great attention and industry has made an epitome of the Roman history, which is now incorporated with the remaining books of Livy. The third decade seems to be superior to the others, yet the author has not scrupled to copy from his contemporaries and predecessors, and we find many passages taken word for word from Polybius, in which the latter has shown himself more informed in military affairs, and superior to his imitator. The best editions of Livy will be found to be those of Maittaire, 6 vols. 12mo, London, 1722; of Drakenborch, 7 vols. 4to, Amst. 1731; and of Kuddiman, 4 vols. 12mo, Edin. 1751.—A governor of Tarcentum, who delivered his trust to Annibal, &c.—A high priest who devoted Decius to the Dii Mares.—A commander of a Roman fleet sent against Antiochus in the Hellespont.

Lixus, a river of Mauritania, with a city of the same name. Antaeus had a palace there, and according to some accounts it was in the neighbourhood that Hercules conquered him. Ital. 3, v. 258. —Mela, 3, c. 10.—Strab. 2.—A son of Ægyptus. Apollod.

Lobon, a native of Argos, who wrote a book concerning poets. Diog.

Löceus, a man who conspired against Alexander with Dymnus, &c. Curt. 5, c. 7.

Locha, a large city of Africa, taken and plundered by Scipio's soldiers.

Lochias, a promontory and citadel of Egypt near Alexandria.

Locri, a town of Magna Græcia in Italy on the Adriatic, not far from Rhegium. It was founded by a Grecian colony about 757 years before the christian era, as some suppose. The inhabitants were called Locri or Locressæ. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 399.—Strab.—Plin.—Liv. 22, c. 6. l. 23, c. 30.—A town of Locris in Greece.

Locris, a country of Greece, whose inhabitants are known by the name of Ozole, Epicnemidii, and Opuntii. The country of the Ozole, called also Epiaphyrrii from their westerly situation, was at the north of the bay of Corinth, and extended above 12 miles northward. On the west it was separated from Ætolia by the Evenus, and it had Phocis at the east. The chief city was called Naupactus. The Epicnemidii were at the north of the Ozole, and had the bay of Malia at the east, and Æta on the north. They received their name from the situation of their residence, near a mountain called Cnemis. They alone, of all the Locrians, had the privilege of sending members to the council of the Amphictyons. The Opuntii, who received their name from their chief city called Opus, were situated on the borders of the Eurippus, and near Phocis and Eubœa. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ptol.—Mela—Liv. 26, c. 25. l. 28, c. 6.—Paus. Æch. & Phoc.

Locusta, a celebrated woman at Rome in the favour of Nero. She poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and at last attempted to destroy Nero himself, for which she was executed. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 66, &c.—Suet. in Ner. 33.

Locutius. Virg. Æn.

Lollia Paulina, a beautiful woman, daughter of M. Lollius, who married C. Mennius Regulus, and afterwards Calpurnia. She was divorced and put to death by means of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 1, &c.

Lollianus Spurius, a general proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in Gaul, and soon after murdered, &c.—A consul, &c.

M. Lollius, a companion and tutor of C. Caesar the son-in-law of Tiberius. He was consul, and offended Augustus by his rapacity in the provinces. Horace has addressed two of his epistles to him, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3.

Londinum, the capital of Britain, founded, as some suppose, between the age of Julius Caesar and Nero. It has been severally called Londinium, Lundinum, &c. Ammianus calls it vetustum oppidum. It is represented as a considerable, opulent, and commercial town, in the age of Nero. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 33.—Ammian.

Longarënus, a man guilty of adultery with Fausta, Sylla's daughter. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 67.

Longimãnus, a surname of Artaxerxes, from his having one hand longer than the other. The Greeks called him Macrochir. C. Nep. in Reg.

Longinus Dionysius Cassius, a celebrated Greek philosopher and critic of Athens. He was preceptor of the Greek language, and afterwards minister, to Zenobia the famous queen of Palmyra, and his ardent zeal and spirited activity in her cause proved at last fatal to him. When the emperor Aurelian entered victorious the gates of Palmyra, Longinus was sacrificed to the fury of the Roman soldiers, A.D. 273. At the moment of death he showed himself great and resolute, and with a philosophical and unparalleled firmness of mind, he even repressed the tears and sighs of the spectators who pitied his miserable end. Longinus has rendered his name immortal by his critical remarks on ancient authors. His treatise on the sublime gives the world reason to lament the loss of his other valuable compositions. The best editions of this author are that of Tollius, 4to, Traja. ad Rhem. 1694, and that of Toup, 8vo, Oxon. 1778.—

Cassius, a tribune driven out of the senate for favouring the interest of J. Caesar. He was made governor of Spain by Caesar, &c.—A governor of Judæa.—A proconsul.—A lawyer whom, though blind and respected, Nero ordered to be put to death, because he had in his possession a picture of Cassius, one of Caesar's murderers. Juv. 10, v. 6.

Longobardi, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ.

Longula, a town of Latium on the borders of the Volsci. Liv. 2, c. 33 & 39. l. 9, c. 39.

Longuntice, a maritime city of Spain Tarraconensis. Liv. 22, c. 20.

Longus, a Roman consul, &c.—A Greek author who wrote a novel called the amours of Daphnis and Chloe. The age in which he lived is not precisely known. The best editions of this pleasing writer are that of Paris, 4to, 1754, and that of Villotson, 8vo, Paris, 1778.

Lordi, a people of Illyricum.

Loryna, a town of Doris. Liv. 37, c. 17.

Lotis, or Lotos, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Neptune. Priapus offered her violence, and to save herself from his importunities she implored the gods, who changed her into a tree called Lotus, consecrated to Venus and Apollo. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 348.

Lotôphâgi, a people on the coast of Africa near the Syrtis. They received this name from their living upon the lotus. Ulysses visited their country, at his return from the Trojan war. Hero- dot. 4, c. 177.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 7, l. 13, c. 17.

Lôus, or Aous, a river of Macedonia near Apollonia.

Lua, a goddess at Rome, who presided over things which were purified by lustrations, whence the name (â luendo). She is supposed to be the same as Ops or Rhea.

Lucca, now Lucca, a city of Etruria on the river Arno. Liv. 21, c. 5. l. 41, c. 13.—Cic. 13, Jam. 13.

Lucagus, one of the friends of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 575.

Lucani, a people of Italy, descended from the Samnites, or from the Brutii.

Lucania, a country of Italy between the Tyrrhene and Sicilian seas, and bounded by Pucetia, the Picentini, and the country of the Brutii. The country was famous for its grapes. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 8, c. 17. l. 9, c. 2. l. 10, c. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 178.

Q. Lucretius, a centurion in Caesar's army, &c. Cæs. Bell. G. 5.

Lucianus M. Annæus, a native of Corduba in Spain. He was early removed to Rome, where his rising talents, and more particularly his lavish praises and panegyrics, recommended him to the emperor Nero. This intimacy was soon productive of honour, and Lucian was raised to the dignity of an augur and questor before he had attained the proper age. The poet had the imprudence to enter the lists against his imperial patron; he chose for his subject Orpheus, and Nero took the tragical story of Niobe. Lucian obtained an easy victory, but Nero became jealous of his poetical reputation, and resolved upon revenge. The insults to which Lucian was daily exposed, provoked at last his resentment, and he joined Piso in a conspiracy against the emperor. The whole was discovered, and the poet had nothing left but to choose the manner of his execution. He had his veins opened in a warm bath, and as he expired he pronounced with great energy the lines which, in his Pharsalia, l. 3, v. 639—642, he had put into the mouth of a soldier, who died in the same manner as himself. Some have accused him of pusillanimity at the moment of his death, and say that, to free himself from the punishment which threatened him, he accused his own mother, and involved her in the crime of which he was guilty. This circumstance, which throws an indelible blot upon the character of Lucian, is not mentioned by some writers, who observe that he expired with all the firmness of a philosopher. He died in his 26th year, A.D. 65. Of all his compositions none but his Pharsalia remains. This poem, which is an account of the civil wars of Caesar and Pompey, is unfinished. Opinions are various as to the merit of the poetry. It possesses neither the fire of Homer, nor the melodious numbers of Virgil. If Lucian had lived to a greater age, his judgment and genius would have matured, and he might have claimed a more exalted rank among the poets of the Augustan age. His expressions, however, are bold and animated, his poetry entertaining, though his irregularities are numerous, and, to use the words of Quintilian, he is more an orator than a poet. He wrote a poem upon the burning of Rome, now lost. It is said that his wife Polla Argentaria not only assisted him in the composition of his poem, but even corrected it after his death. Scaliger says that Lucian rather barks than sings. The best editions of Lucian are those of Oudendorp, 4to, L. Bat. 1728; of Bentley, 4to, printed at Strawberry-hill, 1760; and of Barbou, 1260, Paris, 1767. Quintil. 10.—Suet.—Tacit. Ann. 15, &c.—Marzial. 7, ep. 20.—Ocellus, or Ucellus, an ancient Pythagorean philosopher, whose age is unknown. He wrote, in the Attic dialect, a book on the nature of the universe, which he deemed eternal, and from it were drawn the systems adopted by Aristotle, Plato, and Philo Judæus. This work was first translated into Latin by Nogarola. Another book of Ocellus on laws, written in the Doric dialect, was greatly esteemed by Archytas and Plato, a fragment of which has been preserved by Stobæus, of which, however, Ocellus is disputed to be the author. There is an edition of Ocellus, with a learned commentary, by C. Emman. Vizzanius, Bononia, 1646, in 4to.

LUCĒRIA, or LUCĒRIA, festivals at Rome, celebrated in a large grove between the Via Salaria and the Tiber, where the Romans hid themselves when besieged by the Gauls. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 77.

L. LUCOELIUS, a celebrated historian, asked by Cicero to write a history of his consulship. He favoured the cause of Pompey, but was afterwards pardoned by J. Cæsar. Cic. ad. Fam. 5, ep. 12, &c.

LUCCEIUS ALBINUS, a governor of Mauritania after Galba's death, &c. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 58.

LUCENTUM (or IA), a town of Spain, now Alicant.

LUCĒRES, a body of horse, composed of Roman knights, first established by Romulus and Tatius. It received its name either from Lucumo, an Etrurian who assisted the Romans against the Sabines, or from Lucas, a grove where Romulus had erected an asylum, or a place of refuge for all fugitives, slaves, homicides, &c., that he might people his city. The Luceres were some of these men, and they were incorporated with the legions. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 31.

LUCĒRIA, a town of Apulia, famous for wool. Liv. 9, c. 2 & 12. l. 10, c. 35.—Horat. 3, od. 15, v. 14.—Lucan. 2, v. 473.

LUCERTIUS, a surname of Jupiter, as the father of light.

LUCETIUS, a Rutulian killed by Ilieneus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 570.

LUCIĀNUS, a celebrated writer of Samosata. His father was poor in his circumstances, and Lucian was early bound to one of his uncles, who was a sculptor. This employment highly displeased him; he made no proficiency in the art, and resolved to seek his livelihood by better means. A dream in which Learning seemed to draw him to her, and to promise fame and immortality, confirmed his resolutions, and he began to write. The artifices and unfair dealings of a lawyer, a life which he had embraced, disgusted him, and he began to study philosophy and eloquence. He visited different places, and Antioch, Ionia, Greece, Italy, Gaul, and more particularly Athens, became successively acquainted with the depth of his learning and the power of his eloquence. The emperor M. Aurelius was sensible of his merit, and appointed him registrar to the Roman governor of Egypt. He died A.D. 180, in his 90th year, and some of the moderns have asserted that he was torn to pieces by dogs for his impiety, particularly for ridiculing the religion of Christ. The works of Lucian, which are numerous, and written in the Attic dialect, consist partly of dialogues, in which he introduces different characters with much dramatic propriety. His style is easy, simple, elegant, and animated, and he has stored his compositions with many lively sentiments, and much of the true Attic wit. His frequent obscenities, and his manner of exposing to ridicule, not only the religion of his country, but also that of every nation, have deservedly drawn upon him the censure of every age, and branded him with the appellation of atheist and blasphemer. He also wrote the life of Socrates, a philosopher of Bœotia, as also that of the philosopher Democritus. Some have also attributed to him, with great impropriety, the life of Apollonius Thyanæus. The best editions of Lucian are that of Crævius, 2 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1687; and that of Reitzius, 4 vols. 4to, Amst. 1743.

LUCIFER, the name of the planet Venus, or morning star. It is called Lucifer, when appearing in the morning before the sun; but when it follows it, and appears some time after its setting, it is called Hesperus. According to some mythologists, Lucifer was son of Jupiter and Aurora.—A Christian writer, whose work was edited by the Coletii, fol. Venet. 1778.

LUCIFERI FANUM, a town of Spain.

C. LUCILIUS, a Roman knight born at Aurunca, illustrious not only for the respectability of his ancestors, but more deservedly for the uprightness and the innocence of his own immaculate character. He lived in the greatest intimacy with Scipio the first Africanus, and even attended him in his war against Numantia. He is looked upon as the founder of satire, and as the first great satirical writer among the Romans. He was superior to his poetical predecessors at Rome; and though he wrote with great roughness and inelegance, but with much facility, he gained many admirers, whose praises have been often lavished with too liberal a hand. Horace compares him to a river which rolls upon its waters precious sand, accompanied with mire and dirt. Of the 30 satires which he wrote, nothing but a few verses remain. He died at Naples, in the 46th year of his age, B.C. 103. His fragments have been collected and published with notes by Fr. Douza, 4to, L. Bat. 1597, and lastly by the Vulpil, 8vo, Patav. 1735. Quintil. 10, 1.—Cic. de Orat. 2.—Horat.—Lucilius, a famous Roman, who fled with Brutus after the battle of Philippi. They were soon after overtaken by a party of horse, and Lucilius suffered himself to be severely wounded by the dart of the enemy, exclaiming that he was Brutus. He was taken and carried to the conquerors, whose clemency spared his life. Plut.—A tribune who attempted in vain to elect Pompey to the dictatorship.—A centurion, &c.—A governor of Asia under Tiberius.—A friend of Tiberius.

LUCILLA, a daughter of M. Aurelius, celebrated for the virtues of her youth, her beauty, debaucheries, and misfortunes. At the age of 16 her father sent her to Syria to marry the emperor Verus, who was then employed in a war with the Parthians and Arminians. The conjugal virtues of Lucilla were great at first, but when she saw Verus plunge himself into debauchery and dissipation, she followed his example and prostituted herself. At her return to Rome she saw the incestuous commerce of her husband with her mother, &c., and at last poisoned him. She afterwards married an old but virtuous senator, by order of her father, and was not ashamed soon to gratify the criminal sensualities of her brother Commodus. The coldness and indifference with which Commodus treated her afterwards determined her on revenge, and she with many illustrious senators conspired against his life A.D. 185. The plot was discovered, Lucilla was banished, and soon after put to death by her brother, in the 38th year of her age.

LUCINA, a goddess, daughter of Jupiter and Juno, or, according to others, of Latona. As her mother brought her into the world without pain, she became the goddess whom women in labour invoked, and she presided over the birth of children. She receives this name either from lucus, or from lux, as Ovid explains it:

*Gratia Lucina, dedit hæc tibi nomina lucus;
Aut quia principium tu, Dea, lucis habes.*

Some suppose her to be the same as Diana and Juno, because these two goddesses were also sometimes called Lucina, and presided over the labours of women. She is called Ilythia by the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Rome, raised A.U.C. 396. Var. de L. L. 4. — Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27. — Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 449. — Horat. Carm. Sec.

LUCIUS, a Roman soldier killed at the siege of Jerusalem, by saving in his arms a man who jumped down from one of the walls. Joseph. — A brother of M. Antony. — Vid. L. Antonius. — A Roman general, who defeated the Etrurians, &c. — A relation of J. Cæsar. — A Roman ambassador, murdered by the Illyrians. — A consul, &c. — A writer, called by some Saturantius Apuleius. He was born in Africa, on the borders of Numidia. He studied poetry, music, geometry, &c., at Athens, and warmly embraced the tenets of the Platonists. He cultivated magic, and some miracles are attributed to his knowledge of enchantments. He wrote in Greek and Latin with great ease and simplicity; his style, however, is sometimes affected, though his eloquence was greatly celebrated in his age. Some fragments of his compositions are still extant. He flourished in the reign of M. Aurelius. — A brother of Vitellius, &c. — A son of Agrippa, adopted by Augustus. — A man put to death for his incontinence, &c. — The word Lucius is a patronym common to many Romans, of whom an account is given under their family names.

LUCRĒTIA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. Her accomplishments proved fatal to her, and the prizes which a number of young nobles at Ardea, among whom were Collatinus and the sons of Tarquin, bestowed upon the domestic virtues of their wives at home, were productive of a revolution in the state. While every one was warm with the idea, it was universally agreed to leave the camp and to go to Rome, to ascertain the veracity of their respective assertions. Collatinus had the pleasure to see his expectations fulfilled in the highest degree, and while the wives of the other Romans were involved in the riot and dissipation of a feast, Lucretia was found at home, employed in the midst of her female servants, and easing their labour by sharing it herself. The beauty and innocence of Lucretia inflamed the passion of Sextus the son of Tarquin, who was a witness of her virtues and industry. He cherished his flame, and he secretly retired from the camp, and came to the house of Lucretia, where he met with a kind reception. He showed himself unworthy of such a treatment, and in the dead of night he introduced himself to Lucretia, who refused to his intreaties what her fear of shame granted to his threats. She yielded to her ravisher when he threatened to murder her, and to slay on her slaves, and put him in her bed, that this apparent adultery might seem to have met with the punishment it deserved. Lucretia, in the morning, sent for her husband and her father, and, after she had revealed to them the indignities she had suffered from the son of Tarquin, and entreated them to avenge her wrongs, she stabbed herself with a dagger which she had previously concealed under her clothes. This fatal blow was the signal of rebellion. The body of the virtuous Lucretia was exposed to the eyes of the senate, and the violence and barbarity of Sextus, joined with the unpopularity and oppression of his father, so irritated the Roman populace, that that moment they expelled the Tarquins for ever from Rome. Brutus, who was present at the tragical death of Lucretia, kindled the flames of rebellion, and the republican or consular government was established at Rome A.U.C. 244. Liv. 2, c. 57, &c. — Dionys. Hal. 4, c. 15. — Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 741. — Val. Max. 6, c. 1. — Plut. — August. de Civ. D. 2, c. 19. — The wife of Numa. — Plut.

LUCRĒTĪLLIA, now Libretti, a mountain in the country of the Sabines, hanging over a pleasant valley, near which the house and farm of Horace were situated. Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 1. — Cic. 7, Att. 21.

T. LUCRĒTIUS CARUS, a celebrated Roman poet and philosopher, who was early sent to Athens, where he studied under Zeno and Phædrus. The tenets of Epicurus and Empedocles, which then prevailed at Athens, were warmly embraced by Lucretius, and when united with the infinite of Anaximander and the atoms of Democritus, they were explained and elucidated in a poem, in six books, which is called De rerum natura. In this poem the masterly genius and unaffected elegance of the poet are everywhere conspicuous; but the opinions of the philosopher are justly censured, who gives no existence of power to a supreme Being, but is the devoted advocate of atheism and impiety, and earnestly endeavours to establish the mortality of the soul. This composition, which has little claim to be called an heroic poem, was written and finished while the poet laboured under a violent delirium, occasioned by a phlizer, which the jealousy of his mistress or his wife Lucia had administered. It is said that he destroyed himself in the 44th year of his age, about 54 years before Christ. Cicero, after his death, revised and corrected his poems, which had been partly written in the lucid intervals of reason and of sense. Lucretius, whose poems show that he wrote Latin better than any other man ever did, would have proved no mean rival to Virgil, had he lived in the polished age of Augustus. The best editions of his works are that of Creech, 8vo. Oxon. 1695; that of Havercamp, 2 vols. 4to. Lug. Bat. 1725; and that of Glasgow, 2mo. 1759. Pater. 2, c. 36. — Quintil. 3, c. 1. l. 10, c. 1. — Quintus, a Roman who killed himself because the inhabitants of Sulmo, over which he was appointed with a garrison, seemed to favour the cause of J. Cæsar. — Cat. Bell. Civ. 1, c. 18. He is also called Vesipillo. — Sp. Tricipitinus, father of Lucretia wife of Collatinus, was made consul after the death of Brutus, and soon after died himself. — Horatius Pulvillus succeeded him. — Liv. 1, c. 58. — Plut. in Pub. — An interrex at Rome. — A consul. — Ocella, a Roman, put to death by Sylla because he had applied for the consulship without his permission. — Plut.

LUCRĒTIUM, a town of Apulia.

LUCRĒTIUS, a small lake of Campania, opposite Puteoli. Some believe that it was made by Hercules when he passed through Italy with the bulls of Geryon. It abounded with excellent oysters, and was united by Augustus to the Avernus, and a communication formed with the sea, near a harbour called Judius Portus. The Lucrine lake disappeared on the 30th of September, 1538, in a violent earthquake, which raised on the spot a mountain four miles in circumference, and about 1000 feet high, with a crater in the middle. Cic. 4. Att. 20. Strab. 5. & 6.—Melas, 2, c. 4.—Propert. 1, el. 17, v. 10.—Virg. G. 2, v. 161.—Horat. 2, od. 15.

C. Lucullus Catulus, a Roman consul with Marius. He assisted his colleague in conquering the Cimbrians. Virg. Cimbricum bellum. He was eloquent as well as valiant, and his history of his consulship, which he wrote with great veracity, convinces us of his literary talents. That history is lost. Cic. de Orat.—Varro de L. L.—Flor. 2, c. 2.—C. Catulus, a Roman consul, who destroyed the Carthaginian fleet. Vid. Catulus.

Lucullea, a festival established by the Greeks in honour of Lucullus, who had behaved with great prudence and propriety in his province. Plut. in Luc.

Luculli horti, gardens of Lucullus, situate near Neapolis, &c. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 1.—Villa, a country seat near mount Misenum, where Tiberius died. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 50.

Lucullus Lucius Licinius, a Roman celebrated for his fondness of luxury and for his military talents. He was born about 115 years before the Christian era, and soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in the liberal arts, particularly eloquence and philosophy. His first military campaign was in the Marston war, where his valour and cool intrepidity recommended him to public notice. His mildness and constancy gained him the admiration and confidence of Sylla, and from this connection he derived honour, and during his questorship in Asia and pretorship in Africa, he rendered himself more conspicuous by his justice, moderation, and humanity. He was raised to the consulship A.U.C. 680, and entrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war, and first displayed his military talents in rescuing his colleague Cotta, whom the enemy had besieged in Chalcedonia. This was soon followed by a celebrated victory over the forces of Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, and by the conquest of the Bithynia. His victories by sea were as great as those by land, and Mithridates lost a powerful fleet near Lemnos. Such considerable losses weakened the enemy, and Mithridates retired with precipitation towards Armenia to the court of King Tigranes his father-in-law. His flight was perceived, and Lucullus crossed the Euphrates with great expedition, and gave battle to the numerous forces which Tigranes had already assembled to support the cause of his son-in-law. According to the exaggerated account of Plutarch, no less than 300,000 foot and near 55,000 horse of the Armenians lost their lives in that celebrated battle. All this carnage was made by a Roman army amounting to no more than 18,000 men, of whom only five were killed and 100 wounded during the combat. The taking of Tigranocerta the capital of Armenia was the consequence of this immortal victory, and Lucullus there obtained the greatest part of the royal treasures. This continual success, however, was attended with serious consequences. The severity of Lucullus, and the haughtiness of his commands, offended his soldiers, and displeased his adherents at Rome. Pompey was soon after sent to succeed him, and to continue the Mithridatic war, and the interview which he had with Lucullus began with acts of mutual kindness, and ended in the most inveterate reproaches and open enmity. Lucullus was permitted to retire to Rome, and only 1600 of the soldiers who had shared his fortune and his glories were suffered to accompany him. He was received with coldness at Rome, and was obtained with difficulty a triumph which was deservedly claimed by his fame, his successes, and his victories. In this ended the days of his glory; he retired to the enjoyment of ease and peaceful society, and no longer interested himself in the commotions which disturbed the tranquillity of Rome. He dedicated his time to studious pursuits, and to literary conversation. His house was enriched with a valuable library, which was opened for the service of the curious, and of the learned. Lucullus fell into a delirium in the last part of his life, and died in the 67th or 68th year of his age. The people showed their respect for his merit by their wish to give him an honourable burial in the Campus Martius; but their offers were rejected, and he was privately buried, by his brother, on his estate at Tusculum. Lucullus has been admired for his many accomplishments, but he has been censured for his severity and extravagance. The expenses of his meals were immoderate; his halls were distinguished by the different names of the gods; and, when Cicero and Pompey attempted to surprise him, they were astonished at the costliness of a supper which had been prepared upon the word of Lucullus, who had merely said to his servant that he would sup in the hall of Apollo. In his retirement Lucullus was fond of artificial variety; subterraneous caves and passages were dug under the hills on the coast of Campania, and the sea water was conveyed round the house and pleasure grounds, where the fishes flocked in such abundance, that not less than 25,000 pounds worth were sold at his death. In his public character Lucullus was humane and compassionate, and he showed his sense of the vicissitudes of human affairs by shedding tears at the sight of one of the cities of Armenia, which his soldiers reduced to ashes. He was a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages, and he employed himself for some time to write a concise history of the Marston war in Greek hexameters. Such are the striking characteristics of a man who mediated the conquest of Parthia, and for a while gained the admiration of all the inhabitants of the east by his justice and moderation, and who might have disputed the empire of the world with a Cæsar or Pompey, had not, at last, his fondness for retirement withdrawn him from the reach of ambition. *Cic. pro Arch. 4.—Quint. Lugduno, the first name of Terquinius Priscus, afterwards changed into Lucius. The word is Etrurian, and signifies prince or chief. Plut. in Rom.

Lugdunum, a king of ancient Gaul.—A town of Gaul at the foot of the Alps.

Lugdunensis Gallia, a part of Gaul, which received its name from Lugdunum, the capital city of the province. It was anciently called Celtica. Vid. Gallia.

Lugdunum, a town of Gallia Celtica, built at the confluence of the Rhone and the Arar, or Saone, by Manlius Plancus, when he was governor of the province. This town, now called Lyons, is the second city of France in point of population. Juv.

LUNA (the moon), was the daughter of Hyperion and Terra, and was the same, according to some mythologists, as Diana. She was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of the earth with many superstitious forms and ceremonies. It was supposed that magicians and encharmers, particularly those of Thessaly, had an uncontrollable power over the moon, and that they could draw her down from heaven at pleasure by the mere force of their incantations. Her eclipses, according to their opinion, proceeded from thence; and on that account it was usual to beat drums and cymbals to ease her labours, and to render the power of magic less effectual. The Arcadians believed that they were older than the moon. Ovid. Met. 13 v. 263, &c.—Tibull. 1, el. 8, v. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 69.—A maritime town of Etruria, famous for the white marble which it produced, and called also Lumenis portus. It contained a fine, capacious harbour, and abounded in wine, cheese, &c. The inhabitants were naturally given to augury, and the observation of uncommon phenomena. Meta. 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 586.—Plin. 14, c. 6.—Liv. 34, c. 8.—Sil. 8, v. 481.

LUPA (a she-wolf), was held in great veneration at Rome, because Romulus and Remus, according to an ancient tradition, were suckled and preserved by one of these animals. This fabulous story arises from the surname of Lupa, præstitula, which was given to the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, to whose care and humanity these children owed their preservation. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 415.—Plut. in Romul.

LUPERCAL, a place at the foot of mount Aventine sacred to Pan, where festivals called Lupercalia were yearly celebrated, and where the she-wolf was said to have brought up Romulus and Remus. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 343.

LUPERCALIA, a yearly festival observed at Rome the 15th of February, in honour of the god Pan. It was usual first to sacrifice two goats and a dog, and to touch with a bloody knife the foreheads of two illustrious youths, who always were obliged to smile while they were touched. The blood was wiped away with soft wool dipped in milk. After this the skins of the victims were cut into thongs, with which whips were made for the youths. With these whips the youths ran about the streets all naked except the middle, and whipped freely all those whom they met. Women in particular were fond of receiving the lashes, as they superstitiously believed that they removed barrenness, and eased the pains of child-birth. This excursion in the streets of Rome was performed by naked youths, because Pan is always represented naked, and a goat was sacrificed because that deity was supposed to have the feet of a goat. A dog was added, as a necessary and useful guardian of the sheepfold. This festival, as Plutarch mentions, was first instituted by the Romans in honour of the she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. This opinion is controverted by others, and Livy, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, observes that they were introduced into Italy by Evander. The name seems to be borrowed from the Greek name of Pan, Lycaeus, from Lycaos, a wolf; not only because these ceremonies were like the Lycæan festivals observed in Arcadia, but because Pan, as god of shepherds, protected the sheep from the rapacity of the wolves. The priests who officiated at the Lupercalia were called Luperci. Augustus forbade any person above the age of 14 to appear naked or to run about the streets during the Lupercalia. Cicero, in his Philippics, reproaches Antony for having disgraced the dignity of the consulship by running naked, and armed with a whip, about the streets. It was during the celebration of these festivals that Antony offered a crown to J. Caesar, which the indignation of the populace obliged him to refuse. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 427.—Varro. L. L. 5, c. 3.

LUPERICI, a number of priests at Rome, who assisted at the celebration of the Lupercalia, in honour of the god Pan, to whose service they were dedicated. This order of priests was the most ancient and respectable of all the sacerdotal offices. It was divided into two separate colleges, called Fabiani and Quintilianii, from Fabius and Quintilius, two of their high priests. The former was instituted in honour of Romulus, and the latter of Remus. To these two sacerdotal bodies J. Caesar added a third, called from himself the Julii, and this action contributed not a little to render his cause unpopular, and to betray his ambitious and aspiring views. Vid. Lupercalia. Plut. in Rom.—Dio. Cas. 45.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 663.

LUPERUS, a grammarian in the reign of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote some grammatical pieces, which some have preferred to Herodian's compositions.

LUPIAS, or LUPIA, now Lippe, a town of Germany, with a small river of the same name falling into the Rhine. Tacit. Ann. 1, &c.

LUPUS, a general of the emperor Severus.—A governor of Britain.—A quæstor in the reign of Tiberius, &c.—A comic writer of Sicily, who wrote a poem on the return of Menelaus and Helen to Sparta, after the destruction of Troy. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 16, v. 26.—P. Rut., a Roman, who, contrary to the omens, marched against the Marsi, and was killed with his army. He has been taxed with impiety, and was severely censured in the Augustan age. Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 68.

LUSITANIA, a part of ancient Spain, whose extent and situation have not been accurately defined by the ancients. According to the more correct descriptions it extended from the Tagus to the sea of Cantabria, and comprehended the modern kingdom of Portugal. The inhabitants were warlike, and were conquered by the Roman army under Dolabella, B.C. 99, with great difficulty. They generally lived upon plunder, and were rude and unpolished in their manners. It was usual among them to expose their sick in the high-roads, that their diseases might be cured by the directions and advice of travellers. They were very moderate in their meals, and never ate but of one dish. Their clothes were commonly black, and they generally warmed themselves by means of stones heated in the fire. Strab. 3.—Meta. 2, c. 6. l. 3, c. 1.—Liv. 21, c. 43. l. 27, c. 20.

LUSIUS, a river of Arcadia. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Pans. Arc. 28.

LUSONES, a people of Spain, near the Iberus.

LUSTRIUS BRUTIANUS, a Roman poet. Martial. 4, ep. 43.

LUTATIUS CATILLUS, a Roman who shut the temple of Janus after peace had been made with Carthage. Vid. Lucatius.

LUTERIUS, a general of the Gauls, defeated by Cæsar, &c.

LUTETIA, a town of Belgic Gaul, on the confluence of the rivers Sequana and Matrona, which received its name, as some suppose, from the quantity of clay, lutum, which is in its neighbourhood. J. Cæsar fortified and embellished it, from which circumstance some authors call it Julii Civitas. Julian the apostate resided there some time. It is now called Paris, the capital of France. Cæsar. de Bell. G. 6 & 7. Strab. 4.—Ammian. 20.

C. Lutorius Frisus, a Roman knight, put to death by order of Tiberius, because he had written a poem in which he had bewailed the death of Germanicus, who then laboured under a severe illness. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 49, &c.

Lyseus, a surname of Bacchus. It is derived from lyseis, solvers, because wine, over which Bacchus presides, gives freedom to the mind, and delivers it from all cares and melancholy. Horat. ep. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 675.

Lybas, one of the companions of Ulysses, &c.

Lybys, or Lybissa, a small village of Bithynia, where Annibal was buried.

Lyckbas, an Etrurian who had been banished from his country for murder. He was one of those who offered violence to Bacchus, and who were changed into dolphins. *Ovid. Met. 4, v. 604.—*One of the Lapitæ who ran away from the battle which was fought at the nuptials of Pirithous. Id. Met. 12, v. 302.

Lycaëtes, a mountain of Attica, near Athens. Strab.

Lycaëtes, festivals in Arcadia, in honour of Pan the god of shepherds. They are the same as the Lupercalia of the Romans.—A festival at Argos in honour of Apollo Lycaëus, who delivered the Argives from wolves, &c.

Lycaëum, a celebrated place near the banks of the Ilissus in Attica. It was in this pleasant and salubrious spot that Aristotle taught philosophy, and as he generally instructed his pupils in walking, they were called Peripatetics, a περιπατῶν ἀμβούλο. The philosopher continued his instructions for 12 years, till, terrified by the false accusations of Eurymedon, he was obliged to fly to Chalcis.

Lycaeus, a mountain of Arcadia, sacred to Jupiter, where a temple was built in honour of the god by Lycaon the son of Pelagus. It was also sacred to Pan, whose festivals, called Lycaea, were celebrated there. Virg. G. 3, v. 16. Æn. 8, v. 243.—Strab. 8.—Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 2.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 698.

Lycaëtes, the father of Neobule. He promised his daughter in marriage to the poet Archilochus, and afterwards refused to fulfil his engagement when she had been courted by a man whose opulence had more influence than the fortune of the poet. This irritated Archilochus; he wrote a bitter invective against Lycaëtes and his daughter, and rendered them both so desperate by the satire of his composition, that they hanged themselves. Horat. ep. 6, v. 13.—Ovid. in Ib. 52.—Aristot. Rhet. 3.

Lycaon, the first king of Arcadia, son of Pelagus and Melibœa. He built a town called Lycaura on the top of mount Lycaëus, in honour of Jupiter. He had many wives, by whom he had a daughter called Callisto, and 50 sons. He was succeeded on the throne by Nyctimus, the eldest of his sons. He lived about 1800 years before the christian era. *Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 176.—Catal. ep. 76.—Paus. 8, c. 2, &c.—*Another king of Arcadia, celebrated for his cruelties. He was changed into a wolf by Jupiter, because he offered human victims on the altars of the god Pan. Some attribute this metamorphosis to another cause. The sins of mankind, as they relate, were become so enormous, that Jupiter visited the earth to punish their wickedness and impiety. He came to Arcadia, where he was announced as a god, and the people began to pay proper adoration to his divinity. Lycaon, however, who used to sacrifice all strangers to his wanton cruelty, laughed at the pious prayers of his subjects, and to try the divinity of the god, he served up human flesh on his table. This impiety so irritated Jupiter, that he immediately destroyed the house of Lycaon, and changed him into a wolf. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 198, &c. These two monarchs are often confounded together, though it appears that they were two different characters, and that not less than an age elapsed between their reigns.—A son of Priam and Laotloe. He was taken by Achilles and carried to Lemnos, whence he escaped. He was afterwards killed by Achilles in the Trojan war. *Homer. Il. 21, &c.—*The father of Pandarus, killed by Diomedes before Troy.—A Gnosian artist, who made the sword which Ascanius gave to Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 304.

Lycaonia, a country of Asia, between Cappadocia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Phrygia, made a Roman province under Augustus. Iconium was the capital. *Strab. 10.—Mela, 1, c. 2.—Liv. 27, c. 54. l. 38, c. 39.—*Arcadia bore also that name, from Lycaon, one of its kings. *Dionys. Hal.—*An island in the Tiber.

Lycaon, a priest of Apollo in the interest of Turnus. He was killed by Æneas. *Virg. Æn. 10, v. 315.—*Another officer of Turnus. Id. 10, c. 561.

Lycaon, an ancient town of Crete, whose inhabitants accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war. *Homer. Il. 2.—*A daughter of Priam by a concubine. She married Polydamas the son of Antenor.—A famous courtesan of Drepanum, called Venus on account of her great beauty. She had a son called Eryx, by Butes son of Amycus.

Lycaon, a town of Cappadocia.

Lycaon, a son of Minos I. He was father of Minos II, by Ida the daughter of Corybas. *Diad. 4.—*A son of Minos and Philonome daughter of Nyctimus. He succeeded his father on the throne of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 3 & 4.

Lyce, one of the Amazons, &c. Flacc. 6, v. 374.

Lyces, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 33.

Lycaon. Vid. Lycaon.

Lyca, a country of Asia Minor, bounded by the Mediterranean on the south, Caria on the west, Pamphylia on the east, and Phrygia on the north. It was anciently called Milyas and Tremile, from the Milyæ or Solyim, a people of Crete, who came to settle there. The country received the name of Lyca, from Lycus the son of Pandion, who established himself there. The inhabitants have been greatly commended by all the ancients, not only for their sobriety and justice, but their great dexterity in the management of the bow. They were conquered by Cræsus king of Lydia, and afterwards by Cyrus. Though they were subject to the power of Persia, yet they were governed by their own kings, and only paid a yearly tribute to the Persian monarch. They became part of the Macedonian empire when Alexander came into the east, and afterwards were ceded to the house of the Seleucidæ. The country was reduced into a Roman province by the emperor Claudius. Apollo had there his celebrated oracle at Patara, and the epithet Athenia is applied to the country, because the god was said to pass the winter in his temple. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 143 & 446. l. 7, v. 816.—Stat. Theb. 6, v. 686.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 37, c. 16. l. 38, c. 39.

Lycidas, a centaur, killed by the Lapithæ at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 310.—A shepherd's name. Virg. Ecl.—A beautiful youth, the admiration of Rome in the age of Horace. Horat. l. od. 4, v. 19.

Lycimna, a town of Peloponnesus.

Lycimnia, a slave, mother of Helenor by a Lydian prince. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 446.

Lyciscus, an Athenian archon.—A Messenian of the family of the Æpyidae. When his daughters were doomed by lot to be sacrificed for the good of their country, he fled with them to Sparta, and Aristodemus upon this cheerfully gave his own children and soon after succeeded to the throne. Paus. 4, c. 9.—A youth of whom Horace was enamoured.

Lycius, a son of Hercules and Toxicaria.—A son of Lycaon.—An epithet given to Apollo from his temple in Lycia, where he gave oracles, particularly at Patara, where the appellation of Lycia sorites was given to his answers, and even to the will of the fates. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 346.—A surname of Danaus.

Lycobates, a king of Scyros, an island in the Ægean sea, son of Apollo and Parthenope. He was secretly entrusted with the care of young Achilles, whom his mother Thetis had disguised in woman's clothes, to remove him from the Trojan war, where she knew he must unavoidably perish. Lycomedes has rendered himself infamous for his treachery to Theseus, who had implored his protection when driven from the throne of Athens by the usurper Menestheus. Lycomedes, as it is reported, either envious of the fame of his illustrious guest, or bribed by the emissaries of Menestheus, led Theseus to an elevated place, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and perfidiously threw him down a precipice, where he was killed. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 17. l. 7. c. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—An Arcadian, who, with 500 chosen men, put to flight 1000 Spartans and 500 Argives, &c. Diod. 15.—A seditious person at Tegea.—A Mantinea general, &c.—An Athenian, the first who took one of the enemy's ships at the battle of Salamis. Plut.

Lycón, a philosopher of Troas, son of Astynox, in the age of Aristotle. He was greatly esteemed by Eumenes, Antiochus, &c. He died in the 74th year of his age. Diog. in Vit.—A man who wrote the life of Pythagoras.—A poet.—A writer of epigrams.—A player, greatly esteemed by Alexander.—A Syracusan who assisted in murdering Dion.—A peripatetic philosopher.

Lycóns, a city of Thrace.—A mountain of Argolis. Paus. 2, c. 24.

Lycophron, a son of Periander king of Corinth. The murder of his mother Melissa by his father had such an effect upon him, that he resolved never to speak to a man who had been so wantonly cruel against his relations. This resolution was strengthened by the advice of Procles his maternal uncle, and Periander at last banished to Corycra a son whose disobedience and obstinacy had rendered him odious. Cypselus, the eldest son of Periander, being incapable of reigning, Lycophron was the only surviving child who had any claim to the crown of Corinth. But when the infirmities of Periander obliged him to look for a successor, Lycophron refused to come to Corinth while his father was there, and he was induced to leave Corycra, only on promise that Periander would come and dwell there while he remained master of Corinth. This exchange, however, was prevented.

The Corycraeans, who were apprehensive of the tyranny of Periander, murdered Lycophron before he left that island. Herodot. 3.—Aristot.—A brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander tyrant of Phæra. He assisted his sister in murdering her husband, and he afterwards seized the sovereignty. He was dispossessed by Philip of Macedonia.

Plat.—Diad. 16.—A general of Corinth, killed by Nicias. Plat. in Nic.—A native of Cythera, son of Mastor. He went to the Trojan war with Ajax the son of Telamon, after the accidental murder of one of his citizens. He was killed, &c.

Homér. Il. 15, v. 450.—A famous Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He was one of the poets who flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and who, from their number, obtained the name of Pleiades. Lycophron died by the wound of an arrow. He wrote tragedies, the titles of 20 of which have been preserved. The only remaining composition of this poet is called Cassandra or Alexandra. It contains 1474 verses, whose obscurity has procured the epithet of Tenebrosus to its author. It is a mixture of prophetic effusions, which, as he supposes, were given by Cassandra during the Trojan war. The best editions of Lycophron are that of Bassi, 1546, fol., enriched with the Greek commentary of Tzetzes; that of Canter, 8vo, apud Commelin. 1598; and that of Porter, fol. Oxon. 1702. Ovid. in Ib. 533.—Stat. 5, Sylv. 3.

Lycopolis, now Sinet, a town of Egypt. It received this name on account of the immense number of wolves, Λύκοι, which repelled an army of Æthiopiens, who had invaded Egypt. Diod. 1.—Strab. 17.

Lycopus, an Ætolian who assisted the Cyrenians against Ptolemy Polyarch. 8.

Lycorea, a town of Phocia at the top of Parnassus, where the people of Delphi took refuge during Deucalion's deluge, directed by the howlings of wolves. Paus. Phoc. 6.

Lycoreus, the supposed founder of Lycorea, on mount Parnassus, was son of Apollo and Corycia. Hygin. fab. 161.

Lycorias, one of the attendant nymphs of Cyrene. Virg. G. 4, v. 339.

Lycoris, a freedwoman of the senator Voluminus, also called Cytheris, and Volumina, from her master. She is celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. The poet Gallus was greatly enamoured of her, and his friend Virgil, in his 10th eclogue, comforts him for the loss of the favours of Cytheris, who followed M. Antony's camp, and was become the Aspasia of Rome. The charms of Cleopatra, however, prevailed over those of Cytheris, and the unfortunate courtesan lost the favours of Antony and of all the world at the same time. Lycoris was originally a comedian. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. A. A. 3, v. 537.

Lycornæus, a river of Ætolia, whose sands were of a golden colour. It was afterwards called Ereusus, from king Ereusus, who threw himself into it. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 245.

Lycortides, the father of Polybius, who flourished B.C. 184. He was chosen general of the Achæan league, and he revenged the death of Philopomen, &c. Plut.

Lycostroa, a city built by Lycaon on mount Lycaeus in Arcadia.

Lycetus, a town of Crete, the country of Idomenus, whence he is often called Lycettus. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 401.

Lycurgides, annual days of solemnity, appointed in honour of the lawgiver of Sparta.—A patronymic of a son of Lycurgus. Ovid. in Ib. 503.

Lycurgus, a king of Nemæa, in Peloponnesus. He was raised from the dead by Asclepius. Stat. Theb. 5, v. 638.—A giant killed by Osiris in Thrace. Diod. 1.—A king of Thrace, son of Dryas. He has been represented as cruel and impious, on account of the violence which he offered to Bacchus. He, according to the opinion of the mythologists, drove Bacchus out of his kingdom, and abolished his worship, for which impiety he was severely punished by the gods. He put his own son Dryas to death in a fury, and he cut off his own legs, mistaking them for vine boughs. He was put to death in the greatest torments by his subjects, who had been informed by the oracle that they should not taste wine till Lycurgus was no more. This fable is explained by observing that the aversion of Lycurgus for wine, over which Bacchus presided, arose from the filthiness and disgrace of intoxication, and therefore the monarch wisely ordered all the vines of his dominions to be cut down, that himself and his subjects might be preserved from the extravagance and debauchery which are produced by too free a use of wine. Hygin. fab. 122.—Homer. Il. 6, v. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 22.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 14.—Horat. 2, od. 19.—A son of Hercules and Praxithea daughter of Thestius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A son of Phereas the son of Creteus. Id. 2, c. 9.—An orator of Athens, surnamed Ibis, in the age of Demosthenes, famous for his justice and impartiality when at the head of the government. He was one of the 30 orators whom the Athenians refused to deliver up to Alexander. Some of his orations are extant. He died about 350 years before Christ. Diod. 16.—A king of Tegea, son of Aleus, by Neaira the daughter of Peres. He married Cleophila, called also Eurynome, by whom he had Amphidamas, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Homer. Il. 7.—A celebrated lawgiver of Sparta, son of king Eunomus and brother to Polydeces. He succeeded his brother on the Spartan throne; but when he saw that the widow of Polydeces was pregnant, he kept the kingdom not for himself, but till Charilaus his nephew was arrived to years of maturity. He had previously refused to marry his brother's widow, who wished to strengthen him on his throne by destroying her own son Charilaus, and leaving him in the peaceful possession of the crown. The integrity with which he acted, when guardian of his nephew Charilaus, united with the disappointment and the resentment of the queen, raised him many enemies, and he at last yielded to their satire and malevolence, and retired to Crete. He travelled like a philosopher, and visited Asia and Egypt without suffering himself to be corrupted by the licentiousness and luxury which prevailed there. The confusion which followed his departure from Sparta now had made his presence totally necessary, and he returned home at the earnest solicitations of his countrymen. The disorders which reigned at Sparta induced him to reform the government; and the more effectually to execute his undertaking, he had recourse to the oracle of Delphi. He was received by the priestess of the god with every mark of honour, his intentions were warmly approved by the divinity, and he was called the friend of gods, and himself rather god than man. After such a reception from the most celebrated oracle of Greece, Lycurgus found no difficulty in reforming the abuses of the state, and all were equally anxious in promoting a revolution which had received the sanction of heaven. This happened 884 years before the christian era. Lycurgus first established a senate, which was composed of 28 senators, whose authority preserved the tranquillity of the state, and maintained a due and just equilibrium between the kings and the people, by watching over the intrusions of the former, and checking the seditious convulsions of the latter. All distinctions were destroyed, and by making an equal and impartial division of the land among the members of the commonwealth, Lycurgus banished luxury, and encouraged the useful arts. The use of money, either of gold or silver, was totally forbidden, and the introduction of heavy brass and iron coin brought no temptations to the dishonest, and left every individual in the possession of his effects without any fears of robbery or violence. All the citizens dined in common, and no one had greater claims to indulgence or luxury than another. The intercourse of Sparta with other nations was forbidden, and few were permitted to travel. The youths were entrusted to the public master as soon as they had attained their seventh year, and their education was left to the wisdom of the laws. They were taught early to think, to answer in a short and laconic manner, and to excel in sharp repartee. They were instructed and encouraged to carry things by surprise, but if ever the theft was discovered they were subjected to a severe punishment. Lycurgus was happy and successful in establishing and enforcing these laws, and by his prudence and administration the face of affairs in Lacedæmon was totally changed, and it gave rise to a set of men distinguished for their integrity, their fortune, and their magnanimity. After this, Lycurgus retired from Sparta to Delphi, or, according to others, to Crete, and before his departure he bound all the citizens of Lacedæmon by a solemn oath, that neither they nor their posterity would alter, violate, or abolish the laws which he had established before his return. He soon after put himself to death, and he ordered his ashes to be thrown into the sea, fearful lest, if they were carried to Sparta, the citizens would call themselves freed from the oath which they had taken, and empowered to make a revolution. The wisdom and the good effect of the laws of Lycurgus have been firmly demonstrated at Sparta, where for 700 years they remained in full force, but the legislator has been censured as cruel and impolitic. He has shown himself inhumane in ordering mothers to destroy such of their children whose feebleness or deformity in their youth seemed to promise incapability of action in maturer years, and to become a burden to the state. His regulations about marriage must necessarily be censured, and no true conjugal felicity can be expected from the union of a man with a person whom he perhaps never knew before, and whom he was compelled to choose in a dark room, where all the marriageable women in the state assembled on stated occasions. The peculiar dress which was appointed for the females might be termed improper; and the law must for ever be called injudicious, which ordered them to appear naked on certain days of festivity, and wrestle in a public assembly promiscuously, with boys of equal age with themselves. These things indeed contributed as much to corrupt the morals of the Lacedæmonians, as the other regulations seemed to be calculated to banish dissipation, riot, and debauchery. Lycurgus has been compared to Solon, the celebrated legislator of Athens, and it has been judiciously observed, that the former gave his citizens morals conformable to the laws which he had established, and that the latter had given the Athenians laws which coincided with their customs and manners. The office of Lycurgus demanded resolution, and he showed himself inexorable and severe. In Solon artifice was requisite, and he showed himself mild and even voluptuous. The moderation of Lycurgus is greatly commended, particularly when we recollect that he treated with the greatest humanity and confidence Alcander, a youth who had put out one of his eyes in a seditious tumult. Lycurgus had a son called Antiorus, who left no issue. The Lacedæmonians showed their respect for their great legislator, by yearly celebrating a festival in his honour, called Lycurgide or Lycurgides. The introduction of money into Sparta in the reign of Agis the son of Archidamus was one of the principal causes which corrupted the innocence of the Lacedæmonians, and rendered them the prey of intrigue and faction. The laws of Lycurgus were abrogated by Philopromenes, B.C. 188, but only for a little time, as they were soon after re-established by the Romans. Plut. in Vitâ.—Justin. 3, c. 2, &c.—Strab. 8, 10, 15, &c.—Diomy. Hal. 2.—Paus. 3, c. 2.

LYCUS, a king of Bœotia, successor to his brother Nycteus, who left no male issue. He was entrusted with the government only during the minority of Labdacus, the son of the daughter of Nycteus. He was further enjoined to make war against Epopeus, who had carried away by force Antiope the daughter of Nycteus. He was successful in this expedition. Epopeus was killed, and Lycus recovered Antiope and married her, though she was his niece. This new connection highly displeased his first wife Dirce, and Antiope was delivered to the unfeeling queen and tortured in the most cruel manner. Antiope at last escaped, and entreated her sons Zethus and Amphion to avenge her wrongs. The children, incensed on account of the cruelties which their mother had suffered, besieged Thebes, killed Lycus, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, which dragged her till she died. Paus. 9, c. 3.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—A king of Libya, who sacrificed whatever strangers came upon his coast. When Diomedes, at his return from the Trojan war, had been shipwrecked there, the tyrant seized him and confined him. He, however, escaped by means of Callirhoë, the tyrant's daughter, who was enamoured of him, and who hung herself when she saw herself deserted.—A son of Neptune by Celæno, made king of a part of Mysia by Hercules. He offered violence to Megara the wife of Hercules, for which he was killed by the incensed hero. Lycus gave a kind reception to the Argonauts. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. Fab. 18, 31, 33, 137.—A son of Ægyptus,—of Mars,—of Lycæon king of Arcadia,—of Pandion king of Athens.—The father of Arcesilaus.—One of the companions of Æneas. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Paus. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Hygin. Fab. 97 & 159.—An officer of Alexander in the interest of Lysimachus. He made himself master of Ephesus by the treachery of Androm. Æn. Polyan. 5.—One of the Centaurs.—A son of Phœon.—A river of Phrygia, which disappears near Colosse, and rises again at the distance of about four stadia, and at last falls into the Mæander. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 273.—A river of Sarmatia, falling into the Palus Mæotic.—Another in Paphlagonia, near Heraclea. Ovid. 4, ex Pont. 2, v. 47.—Another in Assyria.—A river in Armenia, falling into the Euxine near the Phasis. Virg. G. 4, v. 307.—One of the friends of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 545.—A youth beloved by Alcæus. Horat. 6, ad. 31.—A town of Crete.

LYDIE, the wife of the poet Antimachus, &c. Ovid. Trist. 1, ad. 5.—A woman in Domitian's reign, who pretended that she could remove harrenness by medicines. Juv. 2, v. 141.

LYDIA, a celebrated kingdom of Asia Minor, whose boundaries were different at different times. It was first bounded by Mysia Major, Caria, Phrygia Major, and Ionia, but in its more flourishing times it contained the whole country which lies between the Helys and the Ægean sea. It was anciently called Mæonia, and received the name of Lydia from Lydus, one of its kings. It was governed by monarchs who, after the fabulous ages, reigned for 200 years in the following order: Ardyus began to reign 777 B.C.; Alyattes, 761; Meles, 747; Candaules, 631; Gyges, 518; Ardyus II., 680; Sadyattes, 631; Alyattes II., 619; and Croesus, 560, who was conquered by Cyrus, B.C. 548, when the kingdom became a province of the Persian empire. There were three different races that reigned in Lydia, the Atyadæ, Heracleidæ, and Mermnadæ. The history of the first is obscure and fabulous; the Heracleidæ began to reign about the Trojan war, and the crown remained in their family for about 500 years, and was always transmitted from father to son. Candaules was the last of the Heracleidæ; and Gyges the first, and Croesus the last, of the Mermnadæ. The Lydians were great warriors in the reign of the Mermnadæ. They invented the art of coining gold and silver, and were the first who established public sports, &c. Herodot. 1, c. 6, l. 2, c. 90, l. 9, c. 74.—Strab. 2, 5, & 13.—Mela, 1, c. 2.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Diomy. Hal. 1.—Justin. 13, c. 4.—A mistress of Horace, &c., 1, od. 6.

LYDIAS, a river of Mædonia. LYDIUS, an epithet applied to the Tiber, because it passed over Etruria, whose inhabitants were originally a Lydian colony. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 281, l. 8, v. 479.

LYDUS, a son of Atyx and Callithea, king of Mæonia, which from him received the name of Lydia. His brother Tyrhenus led a colony to Italy, and gave the name of Tyrhenia to the settlement which he made on the coast of the Mediterranean. Herodot. 2, c. 74.—A eunuch, &c.

LYDAMNIS, or LYDDAMNIS, a man who made himself absolute at Naxos. Polyan.—A general of the Cimmerians who passed into Asia Minor, and took Sardis in the reign of Ardyus king of Lydia. Callian.—An athlete of Syracuse, the father of Artemisia the celebrated queen of Miletus. Herodot. 7, c. 99.—A servant of the poet Propertius, or of his mistress Cynthia.

LYGILL, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

LYGODESSA, a surname of Diana at Sparta, because her statue was brought by Orestes from Taurus, shielded round with oxen. Paus. 3, c. 16.

LYGUS, Vid. LIGA.
LYMIRE, a town of Lycia. Ovid. Met. Fab. 12.
LYMÆUS, a river of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 41.

Lynceides, a man at the court of Cepheus. Ovid. Met. 4, Feb. 12.

Lynceus, a noble family of Macedonia, connected with the royal family. Justin. 11, c. 2, &c.

Lynceus, a son of Amyntas, in the army of Alexander, &c. Curt. 7, &c.—Alexander, a son-in-law of Antipater, who conspired against Alexander and was put to death. Ibid.

Lynoestius, a river of Macedonia, whose waters were of an intoxicating quality. Ovid. Met. 17, v. 379.

Lyncæus, son of Aphareus, was among the hunters of the Calydonian boar, and one of the Argonauts. He was so sharp-sighted that, as it is reported, he could see through the earth, and distinguish objects at the distance of above nine miles. He stole some oxen with his brother Idas, and they were both killed by Castor and Pollux, when they were going to celebrate their nuptials with the daughters of Leucippus. Apollod. 1 & 3.—Hygin. fab.—Paus. 4, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 303.—Apollod. Arg. 1.—A son of Egyptus, who married Hypernestra the daughter of Danaus. His life was spared by the love and humanity of his wife. Vid. Danaides. He made war against his father-in-law, dethroned him, and seized his crown. Some say that Lyncæus was reconciled to Danaus, and that he succeeded him after his death, and reigned 42 years. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Paus. 2, c. 16, 19, 25.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.—One of the companions of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 768.

Lyncus, Lyncæus, or Lynx, a cruel king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Scythia. He received, with feigned hospitality, Triptolemus, whom Ceres had sent all over the world to teach mankind agriculture; and as he was jealous of his commission, he resolved to murder this favourite of the gods in his sleep. As he was going to give the deadly blow to Triptolemus, he was suddenly changed into a lynx, an animal which is the emblem of perfidy and ingratitude. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 657.

Lyncus, a town of Macedonia, of which the inhabitants were called Lyncestæ. Plin. 2, c. 103. l. 4, c. 10.

Lyndus, a town of Sicily.

Lyncæ, a people of Scythia, who live upon hunting.

Lyncæus, a mountain of Arcadia. Vid. Lycæus.—A fountain. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 711.

Lynceæ, a town of Peloponnesus, formerly called Lynceæ. Paus. 2, c. 35.

Lynceus, a king of Caunus in Caria, &c. Parthen.

Lynessus, a city of Cilicia, the native country of Briseis, called from thence Lynessæ. It was taken and plundered by Achilles and the Greeks at the time of the Trojan war, and the booty divided among the conquerors. Homer. Il. 2, v. 197.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 108; Heroid. 3, v. 5. Triit. 4, cl. 1, v. 15.

Lysander, a celebrated general of Sparta, in the last years of the Peloponnesian war. He drew Ephesus from the interest of Athens, and gained the friendship of Cyrus the younger. He gave battle to the Athenian fleet, consisting of 120 ships, at Ægospotamos, and destroyed it all, except three ships, with which the enemy's general fled to Evagoras king of Cyprus. In this celebrated battle, which happened 405 years before the Christian era, the Athenians lost 3000 men, and with them their empire and influence among the neighbouring states. Lysander well knew how to take advantage of his victory, and the following year Athens, worn out by a long war of 27 years, and discouraged by its misfortunes, gave itself up to the power of the enemy, and consented to destroy the Piræus, to deliver up all its ships, except 12, to recall all those who had been banished, and, in short, to be submissive in every degree to the power of Lacedæmon. Besides these humiliating conditions, the government of Athens was totally changed, and 30 tyrants were set over it by Lysander. This glorious success, and the honour of having put an end to the Peloponnesian war, increased the pride of Lysander. He had already begun to pave his way to universal power by establishing aristocracy in the Grecian cities of Asia, and now he attempted to make the crown of Sparta elective. In the pursuit of his ambition he used prudence and artifice; and as he could not easily abolish a form of government which ages and popularity had confirmed, he had recourse to the assistance of the gods. His attempts, however, to corrupt the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter Ammon, proved ineffectual, and he was even accused of using bribes by the priests of the Libyan temple. The sudden declaration of war against the Thebans saved him from the accusations of his adversaries, and he was sent, together with Pausanias, against the enemy. The plans of his military operations were discovered, and the Halians, whose ruin he secretly meditated, attacked him unexpectedly, and he was killed in a bloody battle, which ended in the defeat of his troops, 394 years before Christ. His body was recovered by his colleague Pausanias, and honoured with a magnificent funeral. Lysander has been commended for his bravery, but his ambition deserves the severest censure, and his cruelty and his duplicity have greatly stained his character. He was arrogant and vain in his public as well as private conduct, and he received and heard with the greatest avidity the flattery which his courtiers and flatterers sung to his honour. Yet in the midst of all his pomp, his ambition, and intrigues, he died extremely poor, and his daughters were rejected by two opulent citizens of Sparta, to whom they had been betrothed during the life of their father. This behaviour of the lovers was severely punished by the Lacedæmonians, who protected from injury the children of a man whom they hated for his sacrilege, his contempt of religion, and his perfidy. The father of Lysander, whose name was Aristodites or Aristocrates, was descended from Hercules, though not reckoned of the race of the Heraclidæ. *Plut. & C. Lysias, a celebrated orator, son of Cephalus, a native of Syracuse. His father left Sicily and went to Athens, where Lysias was born and carefully educated. In his 15th year he accompanied the colony which the Athenians sent to Thurium, and after a long residence there he returned home in his 47th year. He distinguished himself by his eloquence, and by the simplicity, correctness, and purity of his orations, of which he wrote no less than 425 according to Plutarch, though the number may with more probability be reduced to 250. Of these 34 are extant, the best editions of which are that of Taylor, 8vo, Cantab. 1740, and that of Auger, a vols. 8vo, Paris, 1783. He died in the first year of his age, 378 years before the christian era. *Plut. de Orat.—Cic. de Brut. de Orat.—Quintil. 3, &c.—Diog. 2.—An Athenian general, &c.—A town of Phrygia. Lysimachus, a son of Agathocles, who was among the generals of Alexander. After the death of that monarch, he made himself master of part of Thrace, where he built a town which he called Lysimachia. He sided with Cassander and Seleucus against Antigonus and Demetrius, and fought with them at the celebrated battle of Ipsus. He afterwards seized Macedonia, after expelling Pyrrhus from the throne, B.C. 286; but his cruelty rendered him odious, and the murder of his son Agathocles so offended his subjects, that the most opulent and powerful revolted from him and abandoned the kingdom. He pursued them to Asia, and declared war against Seleucus, who had given them a kind reception. He was killed in a bloody battle, 281 years before Christ, in the 86th year of his age, and his body was found in the heaps of slain only by the fidelity of a little dog, which had carefully watched near it. It is said that the love and respect of Lysimachus for his learned master Callisthenes proved nearly fatal to him. He, as Justin mentions, was thrown into the den of a hungry lion, by order of Alexander, for having given Callisthenes poison, to save his life from ignominy and insult; and when the furious animal darted upon him, he wrapped his hand in his mantle, and boldly thrust it into the lion's mouth, and by twisting his tongue killed an adversary ready to devour him. This act of courage in his self-defence recommended him to Alexander. He was pardoned, and ever after esteemed by the monarch. *Justin. 15, c. 3, &c.—Diod. 19, &c. Lysippe, a daughter of Proetus. Vid. Prætidæ.—A daughter of Theseus.

Lysippus, a famous statuary of Sicyon. He was originally a whitesmith, and afterwards applied himself to painting, till his talents and inclination taught him that he was born to excel in sculpture. He flourished about 325 years before the christian era, in the age of Alexander the Great. The monarch was so partial to the artist, that he forbade any sculptor but Lysippus to make his statue. Lysippus excelled in expressing the hair, and he was the first who made the head of his statues less large, and the body smaller than usual, that they might appear taller. This was observed by one of his friends, and the artist gave for answer, that his predecessors had represented men in their natural form, but that he represented them such as they appeared. Lysippus made no less than 600 statues, the most admired of which were those of Alexander: one of Apollo of Tarentum 40 cubits high; one of a man coming out of a bath, with which Agrippa adorned his baths; one of Socrates; and those of the 25 horsemen who were drowned in the Granicus. These were so valued, that in the age of Augustus, they were bought for their weight in gold. *Plut. in Alex.—Cic. in Brut. c. 154. MACÆREUS, an ancient historian.—A son of Æolus, who debauched his sister Canace, and had a son by her. The father being informed of the incest, ordered the child to be exposed, and sent a sword to his daughter, and commanded her to destroy herself. Macæreus fled to Delphi, where he became priest of Apollo. Ovid. Met. Heroid. 11, in lb. 562.—One of the companions of Ulysses, Mæcæria, a daughter of Hercules and Dejanira. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus made war against the Heracidae, whom the Athenians supported, and the oracle declared, that the descendants of Hercules should obtain the victory if any one of them devoted himself to death. This was cheerfully accepted by Mæcæria, who refused to endanger the life of the children of Hercules by suffering the victim to be drawn by lot, and the Athenians obtained a victory. Great honours were paid to the patriotic Mæcæria, and a fountain of Marathon was called by her name. Paus. 1, c. 32.—An ancient name of Cyprus.

Mæcæria, an ancient name of Creta.

Mæcedrus, a son of Lycæon. Apollod.

Mæcædo, a son of Osiris, who had a share in the divine honours which were paid to his father. He was represented clothed in a wolf's skin, for which reason the Egyptians held that animal in great veneration. Diod. 1.—Plut. in Isid. et Os.—A man who gave his name to Macedonia. Mæcædônia, a celebrated country, situated between Thrace, Epirus, and Greece. Its boundaries have been different at different periods. Philip increased it by the conquest of Thessaly and of part of Thrace, and according to Pliny it contained no less than 150 different nations. The kingdom of Macedonia, first founded B. C. 814, by Caranus, a descendant of Hercules, and a native of Argos, continued in existence 646 years, till the battle of Pydna. The family of Caranus remained in possession of the crown until the death of Alexander the Great, and began to reign in the following order: Caranus, after a reign of 28 years, was succeeded by Cœnus, who ascended the throne 786 B. C.; Thurimus, 774; Perdiccas, 759; Argæus, 678; Philip, 640; Æropas, 604; Alcetas or Alectas, 576; Amyntas, 547; Alexander, 497; Perdiccas, 454; Archelaus, 423; Amyntas, 399; Pausanias, 358; Amyntas II., 327; Argæus the tyrant, 300; Amyntas restored, 300; Alexander II., 371; Ptolemy Alorites, 370; Perdiccas III., 366; Philip son of Amyntas, 360; Alexander the Great, 336; Philip Arridæus, 323; Cassander, 316; Antipater and Alexander, 282; Demetrius king of Asia, 294; Pyrrhus, 287; Lysimachus, 285; Ptolemy Ceraunus, 280; Meleager, two months; Antipater the Etesian, 45 days; Antigonus Gonatas, 277; Demetrius, 243; Antigonus Dosis, 232; Philip, 221; Perseus, 179; conquered by the Romans 168 B. C. at Pydna. Macedonia has been severally called Æmonia, Mygdonia, Pœonia, Edonia, Æmathia, &c. The inhabitants of Macedonia were naturally warlike, and though in the infancy of their empire they were little known beyond the borders of their country, yet they signalized themselves greatly in the reign of Philip, and added the kingdom of Asia to their European dominions by the valour of Alexander. The Macedonian phalanx, or body of soldiers, was always held in the highest repute, and it resisted and subdued the repeated attacks of the bravest and most courageous enemies. Liv. 44.—Just. 6, c. 9. l. 7, c. 1, &c.—Strab. 7.—Meib. 1, c. 3, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10, &c.—Curr. 3 & 4.—Paus. 8, c. 2.

Macedoniæ bellum, was undertaken by the Romans against Philip king of Macedonia, some few months after the second Punic war, B. C. 200. The cause of this war originated in the hostilities which Philip had exercised against the Achæans, the friends and allies of Rome. The consul Flaminius had the care of the war, and he conquered Philip on the confines of Epirus, and afterwards in Thessaly. The Macedonian fleets were also defeated; Kubona was taken; and Philip, after continual losses, sued for peace, which was granted him in the fourth year of the war. The ambition and cruelty of Perseus, the son and successor of Philip, soon irritated the Romans. Another war was undertaken, in which the Romans suffered two defeats. This, however, did not discourage them; Paulus Æmilius was chosen consul in the 60th year of his age, and entrusted with the care of the war. He came to a general engagement near the city of Pydna. The victory sided with the Romans, and 20,000 of the Macedonian soldiers were left on the field of battle. This decisive blow put an end to the war, which had already continued for three years, 168 years before the christian era. Perseus and his sons Philip and Alexander were taken prisoners, and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. About 15 years after, new seditions were raised in Macedonia, and the false pretensions of Andriscus, who called himself the son of Perseus, obliged the Romans to send an army to quell the commotions. Andriscus at first obtained many considerable advantages over the Roman forces, till at last he was conquered and delivered to the consul Metellus, who carried him to Rome. After these commotions, which are sometimes called the third Macedonian war, Macedonia was finally reduced into a Roman province, and governed by a regular proconsul, about 148 years before the christian era.

Mæcedonicus, a surname given to Metellus, from his conquests in Macedonia. It was also given to such as had obtained any victory in that province.

Mæcella, a town of Sicily, taken by the consul Duilius. Liv. 26, c. 22.

Mæcer Æmilius, a Latin poet of Verona, intimate with Tibullus and Ovid, and commended for his genius, his learning, and the elegance of his poetry. He wrote some poems upon serpents, plants, and birds, mentioned by Ovid. He also composed a poem upon the ruins of Troy, to serve as a supplement to Homer's Iliad. His compositions are now lost. He died B. C. 16. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 44, et Pont. 2, ep. 10.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—L. Claudius, a proprietor of Africa in the reign of Nero. He assumed the title of emperor, and was put to death by order of Galba.

Mæchæra, a river of Africa.—A common river at Rome. Juv. 7, v. 9.

Mæchaniidas, a man who made himself absolute at Sparta. He was killed by Philopomen, after being defeated at Mantineæ, B. C. 208. Nabis succeeded him. Plut.—Liv. 27, c. 30. l. 28, c. 5 & 7.

Mæchæon, a celebrated physician, son of Esculapius and brother to Podalirius. He went to the Trojan war with the inhabitants of Trica, Thome, and Cebalæ. According to some he was king of Messenia. As physician to the Greeks, he healed the wounds which they received during the Trojan war, and was one of those concealed in the wooden horse. Some suppose that he was killed before Troy by Euryppus the son of Telemus. He received divine honours after death, and had a temple in Messenia. Homer. Il. 2, &c.—Ovid. ex

Macra, a river flowing from the Apennines, and dividing Liguria from Etruria. Lucan. 2, v. 426.—Liv. 39, c. 32.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Macri campi, a plain in Cisalpine Gaul, near the river Gabellus. Liv. 47, c. 18. l. 45, c. 12.—A plain near Mutina bears the same name. Col. 7, c. 2.

Macrius Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian of obscure birth, who, from a private soldier, rose to the highest command in the army, and proclaimed himself emperor when Valerian had been made prisoner by the Persians, A.D. 260. His liberality supported his usurpation; his two sons Macrianus and Quietus were invested with the imperial purple, and the enemies of Rome were severely defeated, either by the emperors or their generals. When he had supported his dignity for a year in the eastern parts of the world, Macrianus marched towards Rome, to crush Gallienus, who had been proclaimed emperor. He was defeated in Illyricum by the lieutenant of Gallienus, and put to death with his son, at his own expressive request, A.D. 262.

Macrinus M. Opilius Severus, a native of Africa, who rose from the most ignominious condition to the rank of prefect of the pretorian guards, and at last of emperor, after the death of Caracalla, whom he inhumanly sacrificed to his ambition, A.D. 217. The beginning of his reign was popular; the abolition of the taxes, and an affable and compliant behaviour, endeared him to his subjects. These promising appearances did not long continue, and the timidity which Macrinus betrayed in buying the peace of the Persians by a large sum of money, soon rendered him odious; and while he affected to imitate the virtuous Aurelius without possessing the good qualities of his heart, he became contemptible and insignificant. This affectation irritated the minds of the populace, and when severe punishments had been inflicted on some of the disorderly soldiers, the whole army mutinied; and their tumult was increased by their consciousness of their power and numbers, which Macrinus had the imprudence to betray, by keeping almost all the military force of Rome encamped together in the plains of Syria. Heliogabalus was proclaimed emperor, and Macrinus attempted to save his life by flight. He was, however, seized in Cappadocia, and his head was cut off and sent to his successor, June 7th, A.D. 218. Macrinus reigned about two months and three days. His son, called Diadumenianus, shared his father's fate.—A friend of the poet Persius, to whom his second satire is inscribed.

Macro, a favourite of the emperor Tiberius, celebrated for his intrigues, perfidy, and cruelty. He destroyed Sejanus, and raised himself upon the ruins of that unfortunate favourite. He was accessory to the murder of Tiberius, and conciliated the good opinion of Caligula, by prostituting to him his own wife called Ennia. He soon after became unpopular, and was obliged by Caligula to kill himself together with his wife, A.D. 38.

Macrobii, a people of Æthiopia, celebrated for their justice and the innocence of their manners. They generally lived to their 120th year, some say 1000 years; and indeed from that longevity they have obtained their name (μακροβιοι, long life), to distinguish them more particularly from the other inhabitants of Æthiopia. After so long a period spent in virtuous actions, and freed from the indulgencies of vice, and from maladies, they dropped into the grave as to sleep, without pain and without terror. Orph. Argon. 1105.—Herodot. 3, c. 17.—Mela, 3, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 48.—Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

Macrobius, a Latin writer, who died A.D. 415. Some suppose that he was chamberlain to the emperor Theodosius II.; but this appears groundless, when we observe that Macrobius was a follower of paganism, and that none were admitted to the confidence of the emperor, or to the enjoyment of high stations, except such as were of the christian religion. Macrobius has rendered himself famous for a composition called Saturnalia, a miscellaneous collection of antiquities and criticism, supposed to have been the result of a conversation of some of the learned Romans during the celebration of the Saturnalia. This was written for the use of his son, and the bad latinity which the author has often introduced, proves that he was not born in a part of the Roman empire where the Latin tongue was spoken, as he himself candidly confesses. The Saturnalia are useful for the learned reflections which they contain, and particularly for some curious observations on the two greatest epic poets of antiquity. Besides this, Macrobius wrote a commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, which was likewise composed for the improvement of the author's son, and dedicated to him. The best editions are that of Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1670, and that of Lips. 8vo, 1777.

Macrochir, a Greek name of Artaxerxes, the same as Longimanus. This surname arises from his having one hand longer than the other. C. Nep. in Reg.

Macrones, a nation of Pontus, on the confines of Colchis and Armenia. Flacc. 5, v. 153.—Herodot.

Maetorium, a town of Sicily, at the south, near Gela.

Macellonus, a rich and penurious Roman, &c. Juv. 7, v. 40.

Madaura, a town on the borders of Numidia and Gætaulia, of which the inhabitants were called Madawrenses. It was the native place of Apuleius. Apul. Met. 21.

Madetes, a town of Thrace.

Madetes, a general of Darius, who bravely defended a place against Alexander. The conqueror resolved to put him to death, though 30 orators pleaded for his life. Sisymbrius prevailed over the almost inexorable Alexander, and Madetes was pardoned. Curt. 5, c. 3.

Maduatani, a people of Thrace. Liv. 38, c. 40.

Madyes, a Scythian prince who pursued the Cimmerians in Asia, and conquered Cyaxares, B.C. 623. He held for some time the supreme power of Asia Minor. Herodot. 8, c. 103.

Mæander, a son of Oceanus and Tethys.—A celebrated river of Asia Minor, rising near Coluana, and flowing through Caria and Ionia into the Ægean sea between Miletus and Priene, after it has been increased by the waters of the Marsyas, Lycus, Eudon, Lethæus, &c. It is celebrated among the poets for its windings, which amount to no less than 600, and from which all obliquities have received the name of Mæanders. It forms in its course, according to the observations of some travellers, the Greek letters ε, Γ, Ϛ, and ω, and from its windings Dædalus had the first idea of his famous labyrinth. *Ovid. Maandria, a city of Epirus.

Mantua, a people at the south of Scotland. Dis. 75, c. 12.

Macedonia. Vid. Macedonia.

Mædi, a people of Mædia, a district of Thrace, near Rhodope. Liv. 26, c. 25. l. 40, c. 21.

Mælius, a Roman, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, for aspiring to tyranny at Rome in the early ages of the republic.

Mæmactaria, sacrifices offered to Jupiter at Athens in the winter month Mæmacteron. The god surnamed Mæmactes was intreated to send mild and temperate weather, as he presided over the seasons, and was the god of the air.

Mænades, a name of the Bacchantes, or priestesses of Bacchus. The word is derived from μαῖναίαι, to be furious, because in the celebration of their festivals, their gestures and actions were those of mad women. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 458.

Mænalia, a town of Spain.

Mænalius (plur. Mænalia), a mountain of Arcadia sacred to the god Pan, and greatly frequented by shepherds. It received its name from Mænalius, a son of Lycaon. It was covered with pine trees, whose echo and shade had been greatly celebrated by all the ancient poets. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 216.—Virg. G. 1, v. 17. Ecl. 8, v. 24.—Paus. 8, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—A town of Arcadia.—A son of Lycaon.—The father of Atalanta.

Mæonius, a Roman consul.—A dictator accused and honourably acquitted, &c.—A spendthrift at Rome. Herod. 1, c. 15, v. 26.

Mænon, a tyrant of Sicily, B.C. 285.

Mænona, a river of Germany, now called the Mayne, falling into the Rhine at Mayence.

Mæonia, a country of Asia Minor, the same as Lydia. It is to be observed, that only part of Lydia was known by the name of Mæonia, that is, the neighbourhood of mount Tmolus, and the country watered by the Pactolus. The rest on the sea coast was called Lydia. Strab. 12.—Ovid. Met.—The Etruriana, as being descended from a Lydian colony, are often called Mæonia (Virg. Æn. 11, v. 759), and even the lake Thrasymenus in their country is called Mæonius lacus. Sil. Ital. 15, v. 25.

Mæonides, a name given to the Muses, because Homer, their greatest and worthiest favourite, was supposed to be a native of Mæonia.

Mæonides, a surname of Homer, because, according to the opinion of some writers, he was born in Mæon. Ovid.—The surname is also applied to Bacchus, as he was worshipped in Mæonia.

Mæonia, an epithet applied to Omphale, as queen of Lydia or Mæonia. Ovid.—The epithet is also applied to Arachne, as a native of Lydia. Id. Met. 6.

Mæotæ, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia.

Mæotis Palus, a large lake, or part of the sea between Europe and Asia, at the north of the Euxine, to which it communicates by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, now called the sea of Azof or Zaback. It was worshipped as a deity by the Massagætæ. It extends about 390 miles from southwest to north-east, and is about 600 miles in circumference. The Amazons are called Mæotides, as living in the neighbourhood. Strab.—Mela, 1, c. 1, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 1.—Curt. 5, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 3, l. 12, ep. Sab. 2, v. 9.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 739.

Mæsia sylvia, a wood in Etruria, near the mouth of the Tiber. Liv. 1, c. 33.

Mævia, an immodest woman. Juv. 1, v. 22.

Mævius, a poet of inferior note in the Augustan age, who made himself known by his illiberal attacks on the character of the first writers of his time, as well as by his affected compositions. His name would have sunk in oblivion if Virgil had not ridiculed him in his third eclogue, and Horace in his 10th epode.

Mægas, a king of Cyrene, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He reigned 50 years, and died B.C. 257. Polyen. 2.

Magella, a town of Sicily about the middle of the island.

Magetæ, a people of Africa.

Magi, a religious sect among the eastern nations of the world, and particularly in Persia. They had great influence in the political as well as religious affairs of the state, and a monarch seldom ascended the throne without their previous approbation. Zoroaster was founder of their sect. They paid particular homage to fire, which they deemed a deity, as pure in itself, and the purifier of all things. In their religious tenets they had two principles, one good, the source of everything good; and the other evil, from whence sprang all manner of ills. Their professional skill in the mathematics and philosophy rendered everything familiar to them, and from their knowledge of the phenomena of the heavens, the word Magi was applied to all learned men; and in process of time, the Magi, from their experience and profession, were confounded with the magicians who impose upon the superstitious and credulous. Hence the word Magi and Magicians became synonymous among the vulgar. Smerdis, one of the Magi, usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses, and the fraud was not discovered till the seven noble Persians conspired against the usurper, and elected Darius king. From this circumstance there was a certain day on which none of the Magi were permitted to appear in public, as the populace had the privilege of murdering whomsoever of them they met. Strab.—Cic. de Divom. 1.—Herodot. 3, c. 62, &c.

Magius, a lieutenant of Piso, &c.—A man in the interest of Pompey, grandfather to the historian Velleius Paterculus, &c. Paterc. 2, c. 115.

Magna Græcia, a part of Italy. Vid. Græcia Magna.

Magna Mater, a name given to Cybele.

Magnentius, an ambitious Roman, who distinguished himself by his cruelty and perfidy. He conspired against the life of Constantine, and murdered him in his bed. This cruelty was highly resented by Constantine; and the assassin, unable to escape from the fury of his antagonist, murdered his own mother and the rest of his relations, and afterwards killed himself by falling upon a sword, which he had thrust against a wall. He was the first of the followers of christianity who ever murdered his lawful sovereign, A.D. 353.

Magnes, a young man who found himself detained by the iron nails which were under his shoes as he walked over a stone mine. This was no other than the magnet, which received its name from the person who had been first sensible of its powers. Some say that Magnes was a slave of Medea, whom that enchantress changed into a magnet. Orph. de Lapid. 10, v. 7.—A son of Æolus and Anareta, who married Nais, by whom he had Pierus, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—A poet and musician of Smyrna, in the age of Gyges king of Lydia.

Magnælia, a town of Asia Minor on the Mæander, about 15 miles from Ephesus, now called Gualthar. It is celebrated for the death of Themistocles, and for a battle which was fought there 187 years before the christian era, between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. The forces of Antiochus amounted to 70,000 men, according to Appian, or 70,000 foot and 12,000 horse, according to Livy, which have been exaggerated by Florus to 300,000 men; the Roman army consisted of about 28,000 or 30,000 men, 2000 of which were employed in guarding the camp. The Syrians lost 50,000 foot and 4000 horse, and the Romans only 300 killed, with 25 horse. It was founded by a colony from Magnesia in Thessaly, and was commonly called Magnesia ad Mæandrum, to distinguish it from another called Magnesia ad Sipylum in Lydia, at the foot of mount Sipylus. This last was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius.—A country on the eastern parts of Thessaly, at the south of Ossa. It was sometimes called Amonia and Magnes Campus. The capital was also called Magnesia.—A promontory of Magnesia in Thessaly. Liv. 37.—Flor. 2.—Appian.

Mago, a Carthaginian general sent against Dionysius tyrant of Sicily. He obtained a victory, and granted peace to the conquered. In a battle which soon after followed this treaty of peace, Mago was killed. His son, of the same name, succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian army, but he disgraced himself by flying at the approach of Timoleon, who had come to assist the Syracusans. He was accused in the Carthaginian senate, and he prevented by suicide the execution of the sentence justly pronounced against him. His body was hung on a gibbet, and exposed to public ignominy.—A brother of Annibal the Great. He was present at the battle of Cannæ, and was deputed by his brother to carry to Carthage the news of the celebrated victory which had been obtained over the Roman armies. His arrival at Carthage was unexpected, and more powerfully to astonish his countrymen on account of the victory of Cannæ, he emptied in the senate-house the three bushels of golden rings which had been taken from the Roman knights slain in battle. He was afterwards sent to Spain, where he defeated the two Scipios, and was himself, in another engagement, totally ruined. He retired to the Balears, which he conquered; and one of the cities there still bears his name, and is called Portus Magonis, Port Mahon. After this he landed in Italy with an army, and took possession of part of Insubria. He was defeated in a battle by Quintilius Varus, and died of a mortal wound 203 years before the christian era. Liv. 30, &c. C. Nep. in Ann. 8, gives a very different account of his death, and says he either perished in a shipwreck, or was murdered by his servants. Perhaps Annibal had two brothers of that name.—A Carthaginian, more known by the excellence of his writings than by his military exploits. He wrote 28 volumes upon husbandry; these were preserved by Scipio, at the taking of Carthage, and presented to the Roman senate. They were translated into Greek by Cassius Dionysius of Utica, and into Latin by order of the Roman senate, though Cato had already written so copiously upon the subject; and the Romans, as it has been observed, consulted the writings of Mago with greater eagerness than the books of the Sybilline verses. Columella.—A Carthaginian sent by his countrymen to assist the Romans against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, with a fleet of 120 sail. This offer was politely refused by the Roman senate. This Mago was father of Asdrubal and Hamilcar. Val. Max.

Magon, a river of India falling into the Ganges. Arrian.

Magontiacum, or Magontea, a large city of Germany, now called Mentz. Tacit. 4, Hist. 15 & 23.

Magnus, an officer of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 522.

Maherbal, a Carthaginian who was at the siege of Saguntum, and who commanded the cavalry of Annibal at the battle of Cannæ. He advised the conqueror immediately to march to Rome, but Annibal required time to consider on so bold a measure; upon which Maherbal observed, that Annibal knew how to conquer, but not how to make a proper use of victory.

Maia, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, mother of Mercury by Jupiter. She was one of the Pleiades, the most luminous of the seven sisters. Virg. Æn. 3, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 305.—A surname of Cybele.

Majestas, a goddess among the Romans, daughter of Honour and Reverence. Ovid. 5, Fast. 5, v. 25.

Majorianus Jul. Valerius, an emperor of the western Roman empire, raised to the imperial throne A.D. 457. He signalized himself by his private as well as public virtues. He was massacred, after a reign of 37 years, by one of his generals, who envied in his master the character of an active, virtuous, and humane emperor.

Majorca, the greatest of the islands called Balears, on the coast of Spain, in the Mediæterranean. Strab.

Malæ Fortuna, the goddess of evil fortune, was worshipped among the Romans. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

Malæa, a promontory of Lesbos.—Another in Peloponnesus, at the south of Laconia. The sea is so rough and boisterous there, that the dangers which attended a voyage round it gave rise to the proverb of Cum ad Malæam deflexeris, oblitiscere quæ sumi domi. Strab. 8 & 9.—Lucan. 6, v. 58.—Plut. in Arat.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 193.—Mele. 2, c. 3.—Liv. 21, c. 44.—Ovid. Am. 2, el. 16, v. 24, el. 11, v. 20.—Paus. 3, c. 23.

Maleventum, the ancient name of Beneventum. Liv. 9, c. 27.

Malho, or Matho, a general of an army of Carthaginian mercenaries, 258 B.C.

Malis, a city of Phthiotis, near mount Ceta and Thermopylæ. There were in its neighbourhood some hot mineral waters which the poet Castilius has mentioned. From Malis a gulf or small bay in the neighbourhood, at the western extremities of the island of Eubœa, has received the name of the gulf of Malis, Maliacum Fretum, or Maliacus Sinus. Some call it the gulf of Lamia, from its vicinity to Lamia. It is often taken for the Sinus Pelægius of the ancients. Paus. 1, c. 4.—Herodot.

Malli, a people of Mesopotamia.

Mallie, a servant-maid of Omphale, beloved by Hercules.

Mallia, or Mallia aqua. Virg. Malis.

Mallioſius, a man who murdered his mother, &c. Cic. ad Heren. 1, c. 13.

Mallius, a Roman consul defeated by the Gauls, &c.

Malliphœra (lanam ferrus), a surname under which Ceres had a temple at Megara, because she had taught the inhabitants the utility of wool, and the means of tending sheep to advantage. This temple is represented as so old in the age of Pausanias, that it was falling to decay. Paus. 1, c. 44.

Mallos, a town of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

Malthinus, a name under which Horace has lashed some of his friends or enemies. 1, sat. 2, v. 27.

Mamæus, a river of Peloponnesus.

Mamercus, a tyrant of Catania, who surrendered to Timoleon. His attempts to speak in a public assembly at Syracuse were received with groans and hisses, upon which he dashed his head against a wall, and endeavoured to destroy himself. The blows were not fatal, and Mamercus was soon after put to death as a robber, B.C. 340. Polyæn. 3.—C. Nep. in Tim.—A dictator at Rome, B.C. 437.—A consul with D. Brutus.

Mamerthes, a Corinthian who killed his brother's son in hopes of reigning, upon which he was torn to pieces by his brother. Ovid. in Ib.

Mamertina, a town of Campania, famous for its wines.—A name of Messana in Sicily. Martial. 13, ep. 117.—Strab. 7.

Mamertini, a mercenary band of soldiers which passed from Campania into Sicily, at the request of Agathocles. When they were in the service of Agathocles, they claimed the privilege of voting at the election of magistrates at Syracuse, and had recourse to arms to support their unlawful demands. The sedition was appeased by the authority of some leading men, and the Campanians were ordered to leave Sicily. In their way to the coast they were received with great kindness by the people of Messana, and soon returned perfidy for hospitality. They conspired against the inhabitants, murdered all the males in the city, and married their wives and daughters, and rendered themselves masters of the place. After this violence they assumed the name of Mamertini, and called their city Mamertina, from a provincial word, which in their language signified martial or warlike. The Mamertines were afterwards defeated by Hiero, and totally disabled from repairing their ruined affairs. Plut. in Pyrrh., &c.

Mamilia lex, de limitibus, by the tribune Mamilius. It ordained that in the boundaries of the lands five or six feet of land should be left uncultivated, which no person could convert into private property. It also appointed commissioners to see it carried into execution.

Mamilii, a plebeian family at Rome, descended from the Aborigines. They first lived at Tusculum, from whence they came to Rome. Liv. 3, c. 20.

Mamilius Octavius, a son-in-law of Tarkin, who behaved with uncommon bravery at the battle of Regillæ. He is also called Mamilius. Vid. Mamilius.

Mamæes, the mother of the emperor Severus, who died A.D. 235.

Mamurius Veturius, a worker in brass in Numa's reign. He was ordered by the monarch to make a number of ancyliæ or shields, like that one which had fallen from heaven, that it might be difficult to distinguish the true one from the others. He was very successful in his undertaking, and he asked for no other reward, but that his name might be frequently mentioned in the hymns which were sung by the Salii in the feast of the Ancyliæ. This request was granted. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 397.—Varro L. L. 5, c. 6.

Mamurra, a Roman knight born at Formiæ. He followed the fortune of J. Cæsar in Gaul, where he greatly enriched himself. He built a magnificent palace on mount Coelius, and was the first who increased his walls with marble. Catullus has attacked him in his epigrams. Formiæ is sometimes called Masurrisarum urbs. Plin. 36, c. 6.

Manastâhal, son of Manisima, who was father to the celebrated Jugurtha. Sallust. Jug. Bell.

C. Manucius, a Roman general, who, though at the head of an army of 30,000 men, was defeated by 4000 Numantians, B.C. 138. He was dragged from the senate, &c. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 40.

Mandâne, a daughter of king Astyages, married by her father to Cambyses, an ignoble person of Persia. The monarch had dreamed that his daughter's urine had drowned all his city, which had been interpreted in an unfavourable manner by the soothsayers, who assured him that his daughter's son would dethrone him. The marriage of Mandane with Cambyses would, in the monarch's opinion, prevent the effects of the dream, and the children of this connection would, like their father, be poor and unnoticed. The expectations of Astyages were frustrated. He was dethroned by his grandson. Vid. Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 107.

Mandânes, an Indian prince and philosopher, whom Alexander invited by his ambassador, on pain of death, to come to his banquet, as being the son of Jupiter. The philosopher ridiculed the threats and promises of Alexander, &c. Strab. 15.

Mandela, a village in the country of the Sabines, near Horace's country seat. Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 105.

Mandonius, a prince of Spain, who for some time favoured the cause of the Romans. When he heard that Scipio the Roman commander was ill, he raised commotions in the provinces, for which he was severely reprimanded and punished. Liv. 20.

Mandrocles, a general of Artaxerxes, &c. C. Nep. in Dat.

Mandron, a king of the Bebryces, &c. Polyæn. 8.

Mandubii, a people of Gaul (now Burgundy), in Cæsar's army, &c. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 78.

Mandubratus, a young Briton who came over to Cæsar in Gaul. His father Immauentius was king in Britain, and had been put to death by order of Cassivelaunus. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 20.

Manduria, a city of Calabria, near Tarentum, whose inhabitants were famous for eating dog's flesh. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Liv. 27, c. 15.

Manes, a son of Jupiter and Tellus, who reigned in Mæonia. He was father of Cotys, by Callirhoë the daughter of Oceanus.

Manes, a name generally applied by the ancients to the souls when separated from the body. They were reckoned among the infernal deities, and generally supposed to preside over the burying places and the monuments of the dead. They were worshipped with great solemnity, particularly by the Romans. The augurs always invoked them when they proceeded to exercise their sacerdotal offices. Virgil introduces his hero as sacrificing to the infernal deities, and to the Manes, a victim whose blood was received in a ditch. The word manes is supposed to be derived from Manis, who was by some reckoned the mother of those tremendous deities. Others derive it from manare, quod per omnia æthera larrenaque manant, because they filled the air, particularly in the night, and were intent to molest and disturb the peace of mankind. Some say that manes comes from manis, an old Latin word which signified good or propitious. The word manes is differently used by ancient authors; sometimes it is taken for the in-feral regions, and sometimes it is applied to the deities of Pluto's kingdom, whence the epitaphs of the Romans were always superscribed with D. M., Dis Manibus, to remind the sacrilegious and profane not to molest the monuments of the dead, which were guarded with such sanctity. Propert. 1, el. 19.—Virg. 4, G. v. 469. En. 3, &c.—Horat. 1, sat. 8, v. 28.—A river of Locris.

Manetho, a celebrated priest of Heliopolis in Egypt, surnamed the Mendesian, B.C. 261. He wrote in Greek a history of Egypt, which has been often quoted and commended by the ancients, particularly by Josephus. It was chiefly collected from the writings of Mercury, and from the journals and annals which are preserved in the Egyptian temples. This history has been greatly corrupted by the Greeks. The author supposed that all the gods of the Egyptians had been mere mortals, and had all lived upon earth. This history, which is now lost, had been epitomized, and some fragments of it are still extant. There is extant a Greek poem ascribed to Manetho, in which the power of the stars, which preside over the birth and fate of mankind, is explained. The Apotelesmata of this author were edited in 410, by Grosvenor, L. Bat. 1668.

Mania, a goddess, supposed to be the mother of the Lares and Manes.—A female servant of queen Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy.—A mistress of Demetrius Poliorcetes, called also Demo, and Mania, from her folly. Plut. in Dem.

Manlius lex, by Manlius the tribune, A.U.C. 678. It required that all the forces of Lucullus and his province, together with Bithynia, which was then under the command of Glabrio, should be delivered to Pompey, and that this general should, without any delay, declare war against Mithridates, and still retain the command of the Roman fleet, and the empire of the Mediterranean, as before.—Another, which permitted all those whose fathers had not been invested with public offices, to be employed in the management of affairs.—A woman famous for her debaucheries. Juv. 6, v. 242.

Manlius, a Roman who married the daughter of Tarquin. He lived at Tusculum, and received his father-in-law in his house, when banished from Rome, &c. Liv. 2, c. 15.—Caius, a celebrated mathematician and poet of Antioch, who wrote a poetical treatise on astronomy, of which five books are extant, treating of the fixed stars. The style is not elegant. The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose that he flourished in the Augustan age. No author, however, in the age of Augustus has made mention of Manlius. The best editions of Manlius are those of Bentley, 4to, London, 1739, and Stoberus, 8vo, Argentor. 1767.—Titus, a learned historian in the age of Sylla and Marius. He is greatly commended by Cicero, pro Roscio.—Marcus, a senator mentioned by Cicero de Orat. 1, c. 48, as supporting the character of a great lawyer, and of an eloquent and powerful orator.

Manlius, a people in Germany. Tacit. G. 43.

Manlius lex, by the tribune P. Manlius, A.U.C. 557. It revived the office of triviri epulonum, first instituted by Numa. The epulones were priests, who prepared banquets for Jupiter and the gods at public festivals, &c.

Manlius Torquatus, a celebrated Roman, whose youth was distinguished by a lively and cheerful disposition. These promising talents were, however, impeded by a difficulty of speaking; and the father, unwilling to expose his son's rusticity at Rome, detained him in the country. The behaviour of the father was publicly censured, and Marius Pomponius the tribune cited him to answer for his unfatherly behaviour to his son. Young Manlius was informed of this, and with a dagger in his hand he entered the house of the tribune, and made him solemnly promise that he would drop the accusation. This action of Manlius endeared him to the people, and soon after he was chosen military tribune. In a war against the Gauls, he accepted the challenge of one of the enemy, whose gigantic stature and ponderous arms had rendered him terrible and almost invincible in the eyes of the Romans. The Gaul was conquered, and Manlius stripped him of his arms, and from the collar (torquis) which he took from the enemy's neck, he was ever after surnamed Torquatus. Manlius was the first Roman who was raised to the dictatorship without having been previously consul. The severity of Torquatus to his son has been deservedly censured. This father had the courage and heart to put to death his son, because he had engaged one of the enemy, and obtained an honourable victory, without his previous permission. This uncommon rigour displeased many of the Romans; and though Torquatus was honoured with a triumph, and commended by the senate for his services, yet the Roman youth showed their disapprobation of the consul's severity, by refusing him at his return the homage which every other conqueror received. Some time after the censorship was offered to him, but he refused it, observing that the people could not bear his severity, nor he the vices of the people. From the rigour of Torquatus, all edicts and actions of severity and justice have been called Manliana aetia. Liv. 7, c. 10.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.—Marcus, a celebrated Roman, whose valour was displayed in the field of battle, even at the early age of 16. When Rome was taken by the Gauls, Manlius with a body of his countrymen fled into the Capitol, which he defended when it was suddenly surprised in the night by the enemy. This action gained him the surname of Capitolinus, and the geese, which by their clamour had awakened him to arm himself in his own defence, were ever after held sacred among the Romans. A law which Manlius proposed to abolish the taxes on the common people, raised the senators against him. The dictator Corn. Cossus seized him as a rebel, but the people put on mourning, and delivered from prison their common father. This did not in the least check his ambition; he continued to raise factions, and even secretly to attempt to make himself absolute, till at last the tribunes of the people themselves became his accusers. He was tried in the Campius Martius; but when the distant view of the Capitol which Manlius had saved seemed to influence the people in his favour, the court of justice was removed, and Manlius was condemned. He was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, A.U.C. 371, and to render his ignominy still greater, none of his family were afterwards permitted to bear the surname of Marcus, and the place where his house had stood was deemed unworthy to be inhabited. Liv. 5, c. 31. L. 6, c. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 13 & 26.—Val. Max. 6, c. 2.—Virg. En. 6, v. 825.—Imperious, father of Manlius Torquatus. He was made dictator. He was accused of detaining his son at home. Vid. Manlius Torquatus. Volscus, a Roman consul who received an ally of Scipio in Asia, and made war against the Gallo-grecians, whom he conquered. He was honoured with a triumph at his return, though it was at first strongly opposed. Fior. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 38, c. 12, &c.—Caus, or Aulus, a senator sent to Athens to collect the best and wisest laws of Solon, A.U.C. 300. Liv. 2, c. 54, l. 3, c. 37.—Another, called also Cincinnatus. He made war against the Etrurians and Veientes with great success, and he died of a wound which he had received in a battle.—Another, who in his pretorship reduced Sardinia. He was afterwards made dictator.—Another, who was defeated by a rebel army of slaves in Sicily.—A pretor in Gaul, who fought against the Boii, with very little success.—Another, called Attilius, who defeated a Carthaginian fleet, &c.—Another, who conspired with Catiline against the Roman republic.—Another, in whose consulship the temple of Janus was shut.—Another, who was banished under Tiberius for his adultery.—A Roman appointed judge between his son Silanus and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father said, "It is evident that my son has suffered himself to be bribed, therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my house, and I order him to depart from my presence." Silanus was so struck at the rigour of his father, that he hanged himself. Val. Max. 5, c. 5.—A learned man in the age of Cicero.

Mannus, the son of Thiaso, both famous divinities among the Germans. Tacit. de Germ. c. 2.

J. Mansuetus, a friend of Vitellius, who entered the Roman armies, and left his son, then very young, at home. The son was promoted by Galba, and soon after met a detachment of the partisans of Vitellius in which his father was. A battle was fought, and Mansuetus was wounded by the hand of his son, &c. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 25.

Mantineæ, a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus. It was taken by Aratus and Antigonus, and, on account of the latter, it was afterwards called Antigonia. The emperor Adrian built there a temple in honour of his favourite Alcinoüs. It is famous for the battle which was fought there between Epaminondas at the head of the Thebans, and the combined forces of Lacedæmon, Achæia, Elis, Athens, and Arcadia, about 363 years before Christ. The Theban general was killed in the engagement, and from that time Thebes lost its power and consequence among the Grecian states. Strab. 8.—Nep. in Epam.—Diod. 15.—Plut. 3, c. 16.

Mantineus, the father of Ocalea, who married Abas the son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

Mantindrum oppidum, a town of Corsica, now supposed to be Bastia.

Mantius, a son of Melampus.

Manto, a daughter of the prophet Tiresias, endowed with the gift of prophecy. She was made prisoner by the Argives when the city of Thebes fell into their hands, and as she was the worthiest part of the booty, the conquerors sent her to Apollo the god of Delphi, as the most valuable present they could make. Manto, often called Daphne, remained for some time at Delphi, where she officiated as priestess, and where she gave oracles. From Delphi she came to Claros in Ionia, where she established an oracle of Apollo. Here she married Rhadus the sovereign of the country, by whom she had a son called Mopsus. Manto afterwards visited Italy, where she married Tiberius the king of Alba, or, as the poets mention, the god of the river Tiber. From this marriage sprang Ocnus, who built a town in the neighbourhood, which, in honour of his mother, he called Mantua. Manto, according to a certain tradition, was so struck at the misfortunes which afflicted Thebes, her native country, that she gave way to her sorrow, and was turned into a fountain. Some suppose her to be the same who conducted Æneas into hell, and who sold the Sibylline books to Tarquin the Proud. She received divine honours after death. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 199, l. 10, v. 199. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 157.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—Strab. 14 & 15.—Paus. 9, c. 20 & 33, l. 7, c. 3.

Mantua, a town of Italy beyond the Po, founded about 300 years before Rome, by Bianor or Ocnus the son of Manto. It was the ancient capital of Etruria. When Cremona, which had followed the interest of Brutus, was given to the soldiers of Octavius, Mantua also, which was in the neighbourhood, shared the common calamity, though it had favoured the party of Augustus, and many of the inhabitants were tyrannically deprived of their possessions. Virgil, who was among them, and a native of the town, and from thence often called Mantuanus, applied for redress to Augustus, and obtained it by means of his poetical talents. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æl. 1, &c. G. 3, v. 12. Æn. 10, v. 180.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 15.

Maraconda, a town of Sogdiana.

Marætha, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Maræthon, a village of Attica, 10 miles from Athens, celebrated for the victory which the 10,000 Athenians and 2000 Platæans, under the command of Miltiades, gained over the Persian army, consisting of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, or, according to Val. Maximus, of 300,000, or, as Justin says, of 600,000, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, on the 28th of Sept. 490, B.C. In this battle, according to Herodotus, the Athenians lost only 192 men, and the Persians 6500. Justin has raised the loss of the Persians in this expedition and in the battle to 200,000 men. To commemorate this immortal victory of their countrymen, the Greeks raised small columns, with the names inscribed on the tombs of the fallen heroes. It was also in the plains of Marathon that Theseus overcame a celebrated bull, which ravaged the neighbouring country. Erigone is called Marathonia virgo, as being born at Marathon. Stat. 5, Sylv. 3, v. 74.—C. Nep. in Milt.—Herodot. 6, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 9.—Val. Max. 5, c. 3.—Plut. in Paræd.—A king of Attica, son of Epopeus, who gave his name to a small village there. Paus. 2, c. 1.—A king of Sicily.

Maræthos, a town of Phœnicia. Mela. 1, c. 12.

Marcella, a daughter of Octavia the sister of Augustus by Marcellus. She married Agrippa.

Marcellinus Ammianus, a celebrated historian who carried arms under Constantius, Julian, and Valens, and wrote a history of Rome from the reign of Domitian, where Suetonius stops, to the emperor Valens. His style is neither elegant nor laboured, but it is greatly valuable for its veracity, and in many of the actions he mentions, the author was nearly concerned. This history was composed at Rome, where Ammianus retired from the noise and troubles of the camp, and does not betray that severity against the christians which other writers have manifested, though the author was warm in favour of paganism, the religion which for a while was seated on the throne. It was divided into 31 books, of which only the 18 last remain, beginning at the death of Magnentius. Ammianus has been liberal in his encomiums upon Julian, whose favours he enjoyed and who so eminently patronised his religion. The negligence with which some facts are sometimes mentioned, has induced many to believe that the history of Ammianus has suffered much from the ravages of time, and that it has descended to us mutilated and imperfect. The best editions of Ammianus are those of Gronovius, fol. and 4to, L. Bat. 1693, and of Ernesti, 8vo, Lips. 1773.—An officer under Julian.

Marcellus Marcus Claudius, a famous Roman general, who, after the first Punic war, had the management of an expedition against the Gauls, where he obtained the Spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Viridomarus the king of the Cenomani. Such success rendered him popular, and soon after he was entrusted to oppose Annibal in Italy. He was the first Roman who obtained some advantage over this celebrated Carthaginian, and showed his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible. The troubles which were raised in Sicily by the Carthaginians at the death of Hieronymus, alarmed the Romans, and Marcellus, in his third consulship, was sent with a powerful force against Syracuse. He attacked it by sea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, and the invention and industry of a philosopher [Vid. Archimedes] were able to baffle all the efforts, and to destroy all the great and stupendous machines and military engines of the Romans during three successive years. The perseverance of Marcellus at last obtained the victory. The inattention of the inhabitants during their nocturnal celebration of the festivals of Diana, favoured his operations; he forcibly entered the town, and made himself master of it. The conqueror enriched the capital of Italy with all its paintings and ornaments, he confessed that he had done it to adorn the public buildings of Rome, and to introduce a taste for the fine arts and elegance of the Greeks among his countrymen. After the conquest of Syracuse, Marcellus was called upon by his country to oppose a second time Annibal. In this campaign he behaved with greater vigour than before; the greatest part of the towns of the Samnites, which had revolted, were recovered by force of arms, and 3000 of the soldiers of Annibal made prisoners. Some time after an engagement with the Carthaginian general proved unfavourable; Marcellus had the disadvantage; but on the morrow a more successful skirmish vindicated his military character, and the honour of the Roman soldiers. Marcellus, however, was not sufficiently vigilant against the snares of his adversary. He imprudently separated himself from his camp, and was killed in an ambuscade in the 60th year of his age, in his fifth consulship, A. U. C. 546. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by the conqueror, and his ashes were conveyed in a silver urn to his son. Marcellus claims our commendation for his private as well as public virtues; and the humanity of the general will ever be remembered who, at the surrender of Syracuse, wept at the thought that many were going to be exposed to the avarice and rapaciousness of an incensed soldiery, which the policy of Rome and the laws of war rendered inevitable. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 855.—Patere. 2, c. 38.—Plut. in Vit., &c.—One of his descendants, who bore the same name, signalized himself in the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by his firm attachment to the latter. He was banished by Cæsar, but afterwards recalled at the request of the senate. Cicero undertook his defence in an oration which is still extant.—The grandson of Pompey's friend rendered himself popular by his universal benevolence and affability. He was son of Marcellus, by Octavia the sister of Augustus. He married Julia, that emperor's daughter, and was publicly intended as his successor. The suddenness of his death, at the early age of 18, was the cause of much lamentation at Rome, particularly in the family of Augustus, and Virgil procured himself great favours by celebrating the virtues of this amiable prince. Vid. Octavia. Marcellus was buried at the public expense. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 883.—Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Marcell.—*Senec. He received the ashes of his father from the conqueror. Plut. in Marcell.—A man who conspired against Vespasian.—The husband of Octavia the sister of Augustus.—A conqueror of Britain.—An officer under the emperor Julian.—A man put to death by Galba.—A man who gave Cicero information of Catiline's conspiracy.—A colleague of Cato in the questorship.—A native of Pamphylia, who wrote an heroic poem on physic, divided into 43 books. He lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.—A Roman drowned in a storm, &c.

Maroia lex, by Marcus Censorius. It forbade any man to be invested with the office of censor more than once.

Maroia, the wife of Regulus. When she heard that her husband had been put to death at Carthage in the most excruciating manner, she retorted the punishment, and shut up some Carthaginian prisoners in a barrel, which she had previously filled with sharp nails. The senate was obliged to stop the wantonness of her cruelty. Diod. 24.—A favourite of the emperor Commodus, whom he poisoned.—A vestal virgin, punished for her incontinence.—A daughter of Philip, who married Cato the censor. Maroiana, a sister of the emperor Trajan, who, on account of her public and private virtues and her amiable disposition, was declared Augusta and empress by her brother. She died A. D. 113.

Maronianopolis, the capital of Lower Mœsia in Greece. It receives its name in honour of the empress Marciana.

Marcianus, a native of Thrace, born of an obscure family. After he had for some time served in the army as a common soldier, he was made private secretary to one of the officers of Theodosius. His winning address and uncommon talents raised him to higher stations; and on the death of Theodosius II., A. D. 450, he was invested with the imperial purple in the east. The subjects of the Roman empire had reason to be satisfied with their choice. Marcianus showed himself active and resolute, and when Attila, the barbarous king of the Huns, asked of the emperor the annual tribute, which the indulgence and cowardice of his predecessors had regularly paid, the successor of Theodosius firmly said that he kept his gold for his friends, but that iron was the metal which he had prepared for his enemies. In the midst of universal popularity Marcianus died, after a reign of six years, in the 60th year of his age, as he was making warlike preparations against the barbarians that had invaded Africa. His death was lamented, and indeed his merit was great, since his reign has been distinguished by the appellation of the golden age. Marcianus married Pulcheria, the sister of his predecessor. It is said, that in the years of his obscurity he found a man who had been murdered, and that he had the humanity to give him a private burial, for which circumstance he was accused of the homicide and imprisoned. He was condemned to lose his life, and the sentence would have been executed, had not the real murderer been discovered, and convinced the world of the innocence of Marcianus.—Capella, a writer. Vid. Capella.

M. Marcus Sabinus, was the progenitor of the Marcian family at Rome. He came to Rome with Numa, and it was he who advised Numa to accept of the crown which the Romans offered to him. He attempted to make himself king of Rome, in opposition to Tullus Hostilius, and when his efforts proved unsuccessful he killed himself. His son, who married a daughter of Numa, was made high priest by his father-in-law. He was father of Ancus Marcius. Plut. in Numa.—A Roman who accused Ptolemy Auletes king of Egypt of misdemeanour in the Roman senate.—A Roman consul, defeated by the Samnites. He was more successful against the Carthaginians, and obtained a victory, &c.—Another consul, who obtained a victory over the Etrurians.—Another, who defeated the Hernici.—A Roman who fought against Asdrubal.—A man whom Catiline hired to assassinate Cicero.

Marcius Sallus, a place in Liguria, &c.

Marcomanni, a people of Germany, who originally dwelt on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. They proved powerful enemies to the Roman emperors. Augustus granted them peace, but they were afterwards subdued by Antoninus and Trajan, &c. Patric. 2, c. 109.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 46 & 62. G. 42.

Marcius, a prænomen common to many of the Romans. Vid. Amilius, Lepidus, &c.—A son of Cato, killed at Philippi, &c.—Caryensis, a general of the Achaean league, 255 B.C.

Mardi, a people of Persia, on the confines of Media. They were very poor, and generally lived upon the flesh of wild beasts. Their country, in later times, became the residence of the famous assassins destroyed by Hulakou the grandson of Zingis Khan. Herodot. 1 & 3.—Plin. 6, c. 16.

Mardia, a place of Thrace, famous for a battle between Constantine and Licinius, A.D. 315.

Mardonius, a general of Xerxes, who, after the defeat of his master at Thermopylae and Salamis, was left in Greece with an army of 300,000 chosen men, to subdue the country, and reduce it under the power of Persia. His operations were rendered useless by the courage and vigilance of the Greeks; and in a battle at Platæa, Mardonius was defeated and left among the slain, B.C. 479. He had been commander of the armies of Darius in Europe, and it was chiefly by his advice that Xerxes invaded Greece. He was son-in-law of Darius. Plut. in Arist.—Herodot. 6, 7, & 8.—Diod. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 13, &c.

Mardus, a river of Media, falling into the Caspian sea.

Mare Mortuum, called also, from the bitterness which it throws up, the lake Asphaltites, is situate in Judæa, and is near 100 miles long and 25 broad. Its waters are salter than those of the sea, but the vapours exhaled from them are not so pestilential as have been generally represented. It is supposed that the 13 cities, of which Sodom and Gomorrah, as mentioned in the Scriptures, were the capital, were destroyed by a volcano, and on the site a lake formed. Volcanic appearances now mark the face of the country, and earthquakes are frequent. Plin. 5, c. 6.—Joseph. Y. Bell. 4, c. 27.—Strab. 16, p. 764.—Justin. 36, c. 3.

Mærotis, now Sitach, a lake in Egypt near Alexandria. Its neighbourhood is famous for wine, though some make the Mæroticum vinum grow in Epirus, or in a certain part of Libya, called also Mærotis, near Egypt. Virg. G. 9, v. 97.—Horat. 1, od. 38, v. 14.—Lucan. 9 & 10.—Strab. 17.

Margina and Margania, a town and country near the river Oxus, at the east of Hyrcania, celebrated for its wines. The vines are so uncommonly large that two men can scarcely grasp the trunk of one of them. Cwrk. 7, c. 10.—Ptol. 5.

Margites, a man against whom, as some suppose, Homer wrote a poem, to ridicule his superficial knowledge, and to expose his affectation. When Demosthenes wished to prove Alexander an inveterate enemy to Athens, he called him another Margites.

Margus, a river of Mœsia falling into the Danube, with a town of the same name, now Kastolat.

Mariaba, a city in Arabia, near the Red sea.

Maria lex, by C. Marius the tribune, A.U.C. 634. It ordered the planks called comite, on which the people stood up to give their votes in the comitia, to be narrower, that no other might stand there to hinder the proceedings of the assembly by appeal, or other disturbances.—Another, called also Pornia, by L. Marius and Porcius, tribunes, A.U.C. 691. It fined a certain sum of money such commanders as gave a false account to the Roman senate of the number of the slain in a battle. It obliged them to swear to the truth of their return when they entered the city, according to the best computation.

Mariamna, a Jewish woman, who married Herodes, &c.

Mariæna fossa, a town of Gaul Narbonensis, which received its name from the dyke (fossa) which Marius opened from thence to the sea. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 4.

Mariandynum, a place near Bithynia, where the poets feign that Hercules dragged Cerberus out of hell. Dionys.—Ptol. 5, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 2 & 19, l. 2, c. 7.

Marius, a surname given to Jupiter from a temple built to his honour by Marius. It was in this temple that the Roman senate assembled to recall Cicero, a circumstance commemorated to him in a dream. Vid. Mæc. 1, c. 7.

Mariæa, a nymph of the river Liris, near Minturnæ. She married king Fœtus, by whom she had king Latinus, and she was afterwards called Fœna and Fatus, and honoured as a goddess. A city of Campania bore her name. Some suppose her to be the same as Circe. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47.—Liv. 27, c. 37.—A wood on the borders of Campania bore also the name of Mariæa, as being sacred to the nymph. Liv. 27, c. 37.—Horat. 3, od. 17, v. 7.

Marius, a Gaul thrown to lions, in the reign of Vitellius, who refused to devour him, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 61.

Maria, a daughter of Arcadius, &c.

Marius, a friend of Tiberius, put to death, &c.

Marion, a king of Tyre in the age of Alexander the Great.

Marissa, an opulent town of Judæa.

Marita lex. Vid. Julia de Maritandis.

Maris, a river of Scythia.—A son of Arminodares, who assisted Priam against the Greeks, and was killed by Antilochus. Homer. Il. 6, v. 317.

Marians, a river of Dacia.

C. Marius, a celebrated Roman, who, from a peasant, became one of the most powerful and cruel tyrants that Rome ever beheld during her consular government. He was born at Arpinum, of obscure and illiterate parents. His father bore the same name as himself, and his mother was called Fulcinia. He forsook the meaner occupations of the country for the camp, and signalized himself under Scipio at the siege of Numantia. The Roman general saw the courage and intrepidity of young Marius, and foretold the era of his future greatness. By his seditions and intrigues at Rome, while he exercised the inferior offices of the state, he rendered himself known; and his marriage with Julia, who was of the family of the Cæsars, contributed in some measure to raise him to consequence. He passed into Africa as lieutenant to the consul Metellus against Jugurtha, and after he had there ingratiated himself with the soldiers, and raised enemies to his friend and benefactor, he returned to Rome, and canvassed for the consulship. The extravagant promises he made to the people, and his malevolent insinuations about the conduct of Metellus, proved successful. He was elected, and appointed to finish the war against Jugurtha. He showed himself capable in every degree to succeed Metellus. Jugurtha was defeated and afterwards betrayed into the hands of the Romans by the perfidy of Bocchus. No sooner was Jugurtha conquered, than new honours and fresh trophies awaited Marius. The provinces at Rome were suddenly invaded by an army of 300,000 barbarians, and Marius was the only man whose activity and boldness could resist so powerful an enemy. He was elected consul, and sent against the Teutones. The war was prolonged, and Marius was a third and fourth time invested with the consulship. At last two engagements were fought, and not less than 200,000 of the barbarian forces of the Ambrones and Teutones were slain in the field of battle, and 90,000 made prisoners. The following year was also marked by a total overthrow of the Cimbræ, another horde of barbarians, in which 140,000 were slaughtered by the Romans, and 60,000 taken prisoners. After such honourable victories, Marius, with his colleague Catulus, entered Rome in triumph, and for his eminent services, he deserved the appellation of the third founder of Rome. He was elected consul a sixth time; and, as his intrepidity had delivered his country from its foreign enemies, he sought employment at home, and his restless ambition began to raise seditions and to oppose the power of Sylla. This was the cause and the foundation of a civil war. Sylla refused to deliver up the command of the forces with which he was empowered to prosecute the Mithridatic war, and he resolved to oppose the authors of a demand which he considered as arbitrary and improper. He advanced to Rome, and Marius was obliged to save his life by flight. The unfavourable winds prevented him from seeking a safer retreat in Africa, and he was left on the coasts of Campania, where the emissaries of his enemy soon discovered him in a marsh, where he had plunged himself in the mud, and left only his mouth above the surface for respiration. He was violently dragged to the neighbouring town of Minturnæ, and the magistrates, all devoted to the interest of Sylla, passed sentence of immediate death on their magnanimous prisoner. A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the stern countenance of Marius disarmed the courage of the executioner, and, when he heard the exclamation of Tunc, homo, aude occidere Caisum Marium, the dagger dropped from his hand. Such an uncommon adventure awakened the compassion of the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They released Marius from prison, and favoured his escape to Africa, where he joined his son Marius, who had been arming the princes of the country in his cause. Marius landed near the walls of Carthage, and he received no small consolation at the sight of the venerable ruins of a once powerful city, which, like himself, had been exposed to calamity, and felt the cruel vicissitude of fortune. This place of his retreat was soon known, and the governor of Africa, to conciliate the favours of Sylla, compelled Marius to fly to a neighbouring island. He soon after learned that Cinna had embraced his cause at Rome, when the Roman senate had stripped him of his consular dignity and bestowed it upon one of his enemies. This intelligence animated Marius; he set sail to assist his friend, only at the head of 1000 men. His army, however, gradually increased, and he entered Rome like a conqueror. His enemies were inhumanly sacrificed to his fury. Rome was filled with blood, and he who had once been called the father of his country, marched through the streets of the city, attended by a number of assassins, who immediately slaughtered all those whose salutations were not answered by their leader. Such were the signals for bloodshed. When Marius and Cinna had sufficiently gratified their resentment, they made themselves consuls, but Marius, already worn out with old age and infirmity, died 16 days after he had been honoured with the consular dignity for the seventh time, B.C. 86. His end was probably hastened by the uncommon quantities of wine which he drank when labouring under a dangerous disease, to remove, by intoxication, the stings of a guilty conscience. Such was the end of Marius, who rendered himself conspicuous by his victories, and by his cruelty. As he was brought up in the midst of poverty and among peasants, it will not appear wonderful that he always betrayed rusticity in his behaviour, and despised in others those polished manners and that studied address which education had denied him. He hated the conversation of the learned only because he was illiterate, and if he appeared an example of sobriety and temperance, he owed these advantages to the years of obscurity which he had passed at Arpinum. His countenance was stern, his voice firm and imperious, and his disposition untractable. He always betrayed the greatest timidity in the public assemblies, as he had not been early taught to make eloquence and oratory his pursuit. He was in the 70th year of his age when he died, and Rome seemed to rejoice at the fall of a man whose ambition had proved fatal to so many of her citizens. His only qualifications were those of a great general, and with these he rendered himself the most illustrious and powerful of the Romans, because he was the only one whose ferocity seemed capable to oppose the barbarians of the north. The manner of his death, according to some opinions, remains doubtful, though some have charged him with the crime of suicide. Among the instances which are mentioned of his firmness this may be recorded: A swelling in the leg obliged him to apply to a physician, who urged the necessity of cutting it off. Marius gave it, and saw the operation performed without a distortion of the face, and without a groan. The physician asked the other, and Marius gave it with equal composure. *Plut. in Vita. Marius has been often celebrated for his great strength, and it is confidently reported that he could stop, with one of his fingers only, the wheel of a chariot in its most rapid course.—Maximus, a Latin writer, who published an account of the Roman emperors from Trajan to Alexander, now lost. Mars, the god of war among the ancients, was the son of Jupiter and Juno, according to Hesiod, Homer, and all the Greek poets, or of Juno alone, according to Ovid. This goddess, as the poet mentions, wished to become a mother without the assistance of the other sex, like Jupiter, who had produced Minerva all armed from his head, and she was shown a flower by Flora in the plains near Olenus, whose very touch made women pregnant. Vid. Juno. The education of Mars was entrusted by Juno to the god Priapus, who instructed him in dancing and in every manly exercise. His trial before the celebrated court of the Areopagus, according to the authority of some authors, for the murder of Hallirhotius, forms an interesting epoch in history. Vid. Areopagite. The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. The god of war gained the affection of Venus, and obtained the gratification of his desires; but Apollo, who was conscious of their familiarities, informed Vulcan of his wife's debaucheries, and awakened his suspicions. Vulcan secretly laid a net around the bed, and the two lovers were exposed in each other's arms, to the ridicule and satire of all the gods, till Neptune prevailed upon the husband to set them at liberty. This unfortunate discovery so provoked Mars, that he changed into a cock his favourite Alectryon, whom he had stationed at the door to watch against the approach of the sun [Vid. Alectryon], and Venus also showed her resentment by persecuting with the most inveterate fury the children of Apollo. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was seized by Otus and Ephialtes, and confined for 15 months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. During the Trojan war Mars interested himself on the side of the Trojans, but whilst he defended these favourites of Venus with uncommon activity, he was wounded by Diomedes, and hastily retreated to heaven to conceal his confusion and his resentment, and to complain to Jupiter that Minerva had directed the unerring weapon of his antagonist. The worship of Mars was not very universal among the ancients; his temples were not numerous in Greece, but in Rome he received the most unbounded honours, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they esteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the first of their monarchs. His most celebrated temple at Rome was built by Augustus after the battle of Philippi. It was dedicated to Mars Ultor, or the avenger. His priests among the Romans were called Salii; they were first instituted by Numa, and their chief office was to guard the sacred Ancylia, one of which, as was supposed, had fallen down from heaven. Mars was generally represented in the naked figure of an old man, armed with a helmet, a pike, and a shield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dress, and with a long flowing beard, and sometimes without. He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horses, which the poets called Flight and Terror. His altars were stained with the blood of the horse, on account of his warlike spirit, and of the wolf, on account of his ferocity. Magpies and vultures were also offered up to him, on account of their greediness and voracity. The Scythians generally offered him asses, and the people of Caria dogs. The weed called dog-grass was sacred to him, because it grows, as it is commonly reported, in places which are fit for fields of battle, or where the ground has been stained with the effusion of human blood. The surnames of Mars are not numerous. He was called Gradivus, Mavors, Quirinus, Salusbauius, among the Romans. The Greeks called him Ares, and he was the Enyalus of the Sabines, the Camulus of the Gauls, and the Mavors of Carthage. Mars was father of Cupid, Anteros, and Harmonia, by the goddess Venus. He had Ascalaphus and Ialmenus by Astyoche; Alcippe by Agraulos; Moius, Pylus, Euenus, and Thestrus, by Demoniche the daughter of Aegaeon. Besides these, he was the reputed father of Romulus, Cenoemus, Bythis, Thrax, Diomedes of Thrace, &c. He presided over gladiators, and was the god of hunting, and of whatever exercises or amusements have something manly and warlike. Among the Romans it was usual for the consul, before he went on an expedition, to visit the temple of Mars, where he offered his prayers, and in a solemn manner shook the spear which was in the hand of the statue of the god, at the same time exclaiming, "Mars vigila! god of war, watch over the safety of this city." *Ovid. Marsi, a nation of Germany, who afterwards came to settle near the lake Fucinus in Italy, in a country chequered with forests, abounding with wild boars and other ferocious animals. They at first proved very inimical to the Romans, but in process of time they became their firmest supporters. They are particularly celebrated for the civil war in which they were engaged, and which from them has received the name of the Marsian war. The large contributions which they made to support the interest of Rome, and the number of men which they continually supplied to the republic, rendered them bold and aspiring, and they claimed, with the rest of the Italian states, a share of the honours and privileges which were enjoyed by the citizens of Rome, B. C. 91. This petition, though supported by the interest, the eloquence, and the integrity of the tribune Drusus, was received with contempt by the Roman senate; and the Marsi, with their allies, showed their dissatisfaction by taking up arms. Their resentment was increased when Drusus, their friend at Rome, had been basely murdered by the means of the nobles; and they erected themselves into a republic, and Corfinium was made the capital of their new empire. A regular war was now begun, and the Romans led into the field an army of 100,000 men, and were opposed by a superior force. Some battles were fought in which the Roman generals were defeated, and the allies reaped no inconsiderable advantages from their victories. A battle, however, near Asculum, proved fatal to their cause: 4000 of them were left dead on the spot; their general, Francus, a man of uncommon experience and abilities, was slain, and such as escaped from the field perished by hunger in the Apennines, where they had sought a shelter. After many defeats, and the loss of Asculum, one of their principal cities, the allies, grown dejected and tired of hostilities which had already continued for three years, sued for peace one by one, and tranquillity was at last re-established in the republic, and all the states of Italy were made citizens of Rome. The armies of the allies consisted of the Marsi, the Peligni, the Vestini, the Hirpini, Pompeiani, Marconi, Picentes, Venusini, Ferentani, Apuli, Lucani, and Samnites. The Marsi were greatly addicted to magic. Horat. ep. 5, v. 76, ep. 27, v. 20.—Appian.—Val. Max. 8.—Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Ser. Mario, &c.—Cic. pro Balb.—Strab.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 50. & 56. G. 2.

Marsus Domitius, a Latin poet.

Marsyaba, a town of Arabia.

Marsyas, a celebrated piper of Celenæ, in Phrygia, son of Olympus, or of Hyagnis, or Cægrus. He was so skillful in playing on the flute, that he is generally deemed the inventor of it. According to the opinion of some, he found it when Minerva had thrown it aside on account of the distortion of her face when she played upon it. Marsyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nysa, where he had the impudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his skill as a musician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated should be flayed alive by the conqueror. The Muses, or according to Diodorus, the inhabitants of Nysa, were appointed umpires. Each exerted his utmost skill, and the victory, with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo. The god, upon this, tied his antagonist to a tree, and flayed him alive. The death of Marsyas was universally lamented; the Fauns, Satyrs, and Dryads wept at his fate, and from their abundant tears, arose a river of Phrygia, well known by the name of Marsyas. The unfortunate Marsyas is often represented on monuments as tied, his hands behind his back, to a tree, while Apollo stands before him with his lyre in his hand. In independent cities among the ancients the statue of Marsyas was generally erected in the forum, to represent the intimacy which subsisted between Bacchus and Marsyas, as the emblems of liberty. It was also erected at the entrance of the Roman forum, as a spot where usurers and merchants resorted to transact business, being principally intended in terrorem litigatorum: a circumstance to which Horace seems to allude, 1. sat. 6, v. 120. At Celanum, the skin of Marsyas was shown to travellers for some time; it was suspended in the public place in the form of a bladder, or a foot-ball. *Hygin. fab. 105.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 707. Martiales ludii, games celebrated at Rome in honour of Mars.

Martialis Marcus Valerius, a native of Billbilis, in Spain, who came to Rome about the 20th year of his age, where he recommended himself to notice by his poetical genius. As he was the panegyrist of the emperors, he gained the greatest honours, and was rewarded in the most liberal manner. Domitian gave him the tribuneship; but the poet, unmindful of the favours he received, after the death of his benefactor, exposed to ridicule the vices and cruelties of a monster, whom in his lifetime he had extolled as the pattern of virtue, goodness, and excellence. Trajan treated the poet with coldness, and Martial, after he had passed 35 years in the capital of the world, in the greatest splendour and affluence, retired to his native country, where he had the mortification to be the object of malevolence, satire, and ridicule. He received some favours from his friends, and his poverty was alleviated by the liberality of Pliny the younger, whom he had panegyricized in his poems. Martial died about the 10th year of the christian era, in the 75th year of his age. He is now well known by the 14 books of epigrams which he wrote, and whose merit is now best described by the candid confession of the author in this line,

But the genius which he displays in some of his epigrams deserves commendation, though many critics are liberal in their censure upon his style, his thoughts, and particularly upon his puns, which are often low and despicable. In many of his epigrams the poet has shown himself a declared enemy to decency, and the book is to be read with caution which can corrupt the purity of morals, and initiate the votaries of virtue in the mysteries of vice. It has been observed of Martial, that his talent was epigrams. Everything which he did was the subject of an epigram. He wrote inscriptions upon monuments in the epigrammatical style, and even a new year's gift was accompanied with a distich, and his poetical pen was employed in begging a favour as well as in satirizing a fault. The best editions of Martial are those of Rader, fol. Mogunt. 1627; of Schriverius, 12mo, L. Bat. 1619; and of Smids, 8vo, Amst. 1701.—A friend of Otho.—A man who conspired against Caracalla.

Massoyii, a people of Libya, where Syphax reigned. Vid. Massyla.

Masinissa, son of Gala, was king of a small part of Africa, and assisted the Carthaginians in their wars against Rome. He proved a most indefatigable and courageous ally, but an act of generosity rendered him amicable to the interests of Rome. After the defeat of Asdrubal, Scipio, the first African who had obtained the victory, found, among the prisoners of war, one of the nephews of Masinissa. He sent him back to his uncle loaded with presents, and conducted him with a detachment for the safety and protection of his person. Masinissa was struck with the generous action of the Roman general; he forgot all former hostilities, and joined his troops to those of Scipio. This change of sentiments was not the effect of a wavering or unsettled mind, but Masinissa showed himself the most attached and the firmest ally the Romans ever had. It was to his exertions they owed many of their victories in Africa, and particularly in that battle which proved fatal to Asdrubal and Syphax. The Numidian conqueror, charmed with the beauty of Sophonisba, the captive wife of Syphax, carried her to his camp and married her; but when he perceived that this new connection displeased Scipio, he sent poison to his wife, and recommended her to destroy herself, since he could not preserve her life in a manner which became her rank, her dignity, and fortune, without offending his Roman allies. In the battle of Zama, Masinissa greatly contributed to the defeat of the great Annibal, and the Romans, who had been so often spectators of his courage and valour, rewarded his fidelity with the kingdom of Syphax, and some of the Carthaginian territories. At his death Masinissa showed the confidence which he had in the Romans, and the esteem he entertained for the rising talents of Scipio Æmilianus, by entrusting him with the care of his kingdom, and empowering him to divide it among his sons. Massinissa died in the 97th year of his age, after a reign of above 60 years, 149 years before the christian era. He experienced adversity as well as prosperity, and in the first years of his reign he was exposed to the greatest danger, and obliged often to save his life by seeking a retreat among his savage neighbours. But his alliance with the Romans was the beginning of his greatness, and he ever after lived in the greatest affluence. He is remarkable for the health which he long enjoyed. In the last years of his life he was seen at the head of his armies behaving with the most indefatigable activity, and he often remained for many successive days on horseback without a saddle under him, or a covering upon his head, and without showing the least mark of fatigue. This strength of mind and body he chiefly owed to the temperance which he observed. He was seen eating brown bread at the door of his tent like a private soldier the day after he had obtained an immortal victory over the armies of Carthage. He left 54 sons, three of whom were legitimate, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Manastabal. The kingdom was fairly divided among them by Scipio, and the illegitimate children received, as their portion, very valuable presents. The death of Gulussa and Manastabal soon after left Micipsa sole master of the large possessions of Massinissa. Strab. 17.—Polyb.—African. Lybic.—Cic. de Senect.—*Val. Maso, a name common to several persons mentioned by Cicero.

Messaga, a town of India, taken by Alexander the Great.

Messagete, a people of Scythia, who had their wives in common, and dwelt in tents. They had no temples, but worshipped the sun, to whom they offered horses, on account of their swiftness. When their parents had come to a certain age, they generally put them to death, and ate their flesh mixed with that of cattle. Authors are divided with respect to the place of their residence. Messilla, a maritime town of Gaul Narbonensis, now called Marseilles, founded B.C. 539, by the people of Phocæa, in Asia, who quitted their country to avoid the tyranny of the Persians. It is celebrated for its laws, its fidelity to the Romans, and for its being long the seat of literature. It acquired great consequence by its commercial pursuits during its infancy, and even waged war against Carthage. By becoming the ally of Rome, its power was established; but in warmly espousing the cause of Pompey against Cæsar, its views were frustrated, and it was so much reduced by the insolence and resentment of the conqueror, that it never after recovered its independence and warlike spirit. Herodot. 1, c. 164.—Plin. 3, c. 4.—Justin. 37, &c.—

Mætuta, a deity among the Romans, the same as the Leucothoe of the Greeks. She was originally Ino, who was changed into a sea deity [Vid. Ino and Leucothoe], and she was worshipped by sailors as such, at Corinth, in a temple sacred to Neptune. Only married women and freeborn matrons were permitted to enter her temples at Rome, where they generally brought the children of their relations in their arms. Liv. 5, &c.—*Cic. de Nat. Mauritania, a country on the western part of Africa, which forms the modern kingdom of Fœz and Morocco. It was bounded on the west by the Atlantic, south by Gætulia, and north by the Mediterranean, and is sometimes called Maurusia. It became a Roman province in the reign of the emperor Claudius. Vid. Mauri.

Maurus, a man who flourished in the reign of Trajan, or, according to others, of the Antonini. He was governor of Syene, in Upper Egypt. He wrote a Latin poem upon the rules of poetry and versification.

Mauræi, the people of Maurusia, a country near the columns of Hercules. It is also called Mauritania. Vid. Mauritania. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 206.

Mausôlus, a king of Caria. His wife Artemisia was so disconsolate at his death, which happened B.C. 353, that she drank up his ashes, and resolved to erect one of the grandest and noblest monuments of antiquity, to celebrate the memory of a husband whom she tenderly loved. This famous monument, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was called Mausoleum, and from it all other magnificent sepulchres and tombs have received the same name. It was built by four different architects. Sopas erected the side which faced the east, Timotheus had the south, Leochares had the west, and Bruxis the north. Pithis was also employed in raising a pyramid over this stately monument, and the top was adorned by a chariot drawn by four horses. The expenses of this edifice were immense, and this gave an occasion to the philosopher Anaxagoras to exclaim, when he saw it, "How much money changed into stones!" *Vid. Maxentius Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a son of the emperor Maximianus Hercules. Some suppose him to have been a supposititious child. The voluntary abdication of Diocletian, and of his father, raised him in the state, and he declared himself independent emperor, or Augustus, A.D. 306. He afterwards incited his father to re-assume his imperial authority, and in a perfidious manner destroyed Severus, who had delivered himself into his hands and relied upon his honour for the safety of his life. His victories and successes were impeded by Galerius Maximianus, who opposed him with a powerful force. The defeat and voluntary death of Galerius soon restored peace to Italy, and Maxentius passed into Africa, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He soon after returned to Rome, and was informed that Constantine was come to dethrone him. He gave his adversary battle near Rome, and, after he had lost the victory, he fled back to the city. The bridge over which he crossed the Tiber was in a decayed state, and he fell into the river and was drowned, on the 24th of September, A.D. 317. The cowardice and luxuries of Maxentius are as conspicuous as his cruelties. He oppressed his subjects with heavy taxes to gratify the cravings of his pleasures, or the avarice of his favourites. He was debauched in his manners, and neither virtue nor innocence were safe whenever he was inclined to voluptuous pursuits. He was naturally deformed, and of an unwieldy body. To visit a pleasure ground, or to exercise himself under a marble portico, or to walk on a shady terrace, was to him a Herculean labour, which required the greatest exertions of strength and resolution.

Corn. Maximiliãna, a vestal virgin, buried alive for incontinency, A.D. 92.

Maximianus Hercules Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a native of Sirmium, in Pannonia, who served as a common soldier in the Roman armies. When Diocletian had been raised to the imperial throne, he remembered the valour and courage of his fellow-soldier Maximianus, and rewarded his fidelity by making him his colleague in the empire, and by ceding to him the command of the provinces of Italy, Africa, and Spain, and the rest of the western territories of Rome. Maximianus showed the justness of the choice of Diocletian by his victories over the barbarians. In Britain success did not attend his arms; but in Africa he defeated and put to death Aurelius Julianus, who had proclaimed himself emperor. Soon after Diocletian abdicated the imperial purple, and obliged Maximianus to follow his example on the 1st of April, A.D. 304. Maximianus reluctantly complied with the command of a man to whom he owed his greatness, but before the first year of his reign had elapsed, he was roused from his indolence and retreat by the ambition of his son Maxentius. He reassumed the imperial dignity, and showed his ingratitude to his son by wishing him to resign the sovereignty, and to sink into a private person. This proposal was not only rejected with the contempt which it deserved, but the troops mutinied against Maximianus, and he fled for safety to Gaul, to the court of Constantine, to whom he gave his daughter Faustina in marriage. Here he again acted a conspicuous character, and reassumed the imperial power, which his misfortunes had obliged him to relinquish. This offended Constantine. But, when open violence seemed to frustrate the ambitious views of Maximianus, he had recourse to artifice. He prevailed upon his daughter Faustina to leave the doors of her chamber open in the dead of night; and when she promised faithfully to execute his commands, he secretly introduced himself to her bed, where he stabbed to the heart the man who slept by the side of his daughter. This was not Constantine; Faustina, faithful to her husband, had apprised him of her father's machinations, and a eunuch had been placed in his bed. Constantine watched the motions of his father-in-law, and when he heard the fatal blow given to the eunuch, he rushed in with a band of soldiers, and secured the assassin. Constantine resolved to destroy a man who was so inimical to his nearest relations, and nothing was left to Maximianus but to choose his own death. He strangled himself at Marseilles, A.D. 310, in the 60th year of his age. His body was found fresh and entire in a leaden coffin about the middle of the 11th century.—Galerius Valerius, a native of Dacia, who, in the first years of his life, was employed in keeping his father's flocks. He entered the army, where his valour and bodily strength recommended him to the notice of his superiors, and particularly to Diocletian, who invested him with the imperial purple in the east, and gave him his daughter Valeria in marriage. Galerius deserved the confidence of his benefactor. He conquered the Goths and Dalmatians, and checked the insolence of the Persians. In a battle, however, with the king of Persia, Galerius was defeated; and, to complete his ignominy, and render him more sensible of his disgrace, Diocletian obliged him to walk behind his chariot arrayed in his imperial robes. This humiliation stung Galerius to the quick; he assembled another army, and gave battle to the Persians. He gained a complete victory, and took the wives and children of his enemy. This success elated Galerius to such a degree, that he claimed the most dignified appellations, and ordered himself to be called the son of Mars. Diocletian himself dreaded his power, and even, it is said, abdicated the imperial dignity by means of his threats. This resignation, however, is attributed by some to a voluntary act of the mind, and to a desire of enjoying solitude and retirement. As soon as Diocletian had abdicated, Galerius was proclaimed Augustus, A.D. 304, but his cruelty soon rendered him odious, and the Roman people, offended at his oppression, raised Maxentius to the imperial dignity the following year, and Galerius was obliged to yield to the torrent of his unpopularity, and to fly before his more fortunate adversary. He died in the greatest agonies, A.D. 311. The bodily pains and sufferings which preceded his death were, according to the christian writers, the effects of the vengeance of an offended providence for the cruelty which he had exercised against the followers of Christ. In his character Galerius was wanton and tyrannical, and he often teased his eyes with the sight of dying wretches, whom his barbarity had delivered to bears and other wild beasts. His aversion to learned men arose from his ignorance of letters; and, if he was deprived of the benefits of education, he proved the more cruel and the more inexorable. Lactant. de M. P. 33.—Eusebius, 6, c. 16.

Maximianus Cæsar Julius Verus, the son of a peasant in Thrace. He was originally a shepherd, and, by heading his countrymen against the frequent attacks of the neighbouring barbarians and robbers, he incurred himself to the labours and to the fatigues of a camp. He entered the Roman armies, where he gradually rose to the first offices; and on the death of Alexander Severus he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, A.D. 235. The popularity which he had gained when general of the armies, was at an end when he ascended the throne. He was delighted with acts of the greatest barbarity, and no less than 400 persons lost their lives on the false suspicion of having conspired against the emperor's life. They died in the greatest torments, and, that the tyrant might the better entertain himself with their sufferings, some were exposed to wild beasts, others expired by blows, some were nailed on crosses, while others were shut up in the bellies of animals just killed. The nobles of the Roman citizens were the objects of his cruelty; and, as if they were more conscious than others of his mean origin, he resolved to spare no means to remove from his presence a number of men whom he looked upon with an eye of envy, and who, as he imagined, hated him for his oppression, and despised him for the poverty and obscurity of his early years. Such is the character of the suspicious and tyrannical Maximianus. In his military capacity he acted with the same ferocity; and, in an expedition in Germany, he not only cut down the corn, but he totally ruined and set fire to the whole country, to the extent of 450 miles. Such a monster of tyranny at last provoked the people of Rome. The Gordians were proclaimed emperors, but their innocence and pacific virtues were unable to resist the fury of Maximianus. After their fall, the Roman senate invested 30 men of their number with the imperial dignity and entrusted into their hands the care of the republic. These measures so highly irritated Maximianus, that at the first intelligence, he howled like a wild beast, and almost destroyed himself by knocking his head against the walls of his palace. When his fury was abated he marched to Rome, resolved on slaughter. His bloody machinations were stopped, and his soldiers, ashamed of accompanying a tyrant whose cruelties had procured him the name of Bursus, Cyclops, and Phalaris, assassinated him in his tent before the walls of Aquileia, A.D. 236, in the 65th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest rejoicings at Rome; public thanksgivings were offered, and whole hecatombs flamed on the altars. Maximianus has been represented by historians as of a gigantic stature; he was eight feet high, and the bracelets of his wife served as rings to adorn the fingers of his hand. His voracity was as remarkable as his corpulence; he generally ate 40 pounds of flesh every day, and drank 18 bottles of wine. His strength was proportionable to his gigantic shape; he could alone draw a loaded waggon, and, with a blow of his fist, he often broke the teeth in a horse's mouth; he also broke the hardest stones between his fingers, and cleft trees with his hand. Herodianus.—Jordan. de Reb. Get.—Capitol. Maximianus made his son, of the same name, emperor, as soon as he was invested with the purple, and his choice was unanimously approved by the senate, by the people, and by the army.—Galerius Valerius, a shepherd of Thrace, who was raised to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, A.D. 305. He was nephew to Galerius Maximianus, by his mother's side, and to him he was indebted for his rise and consequence in the Roman armies. As Maximianus was ambitious and fond of power, he looked with an eye of jealousy upon those who shared the dignity of emperor with himself. He declared war against Licinius, his colleague on the throne, but a defeat, which soon after followed, on the 30th of April, A.D. 313, between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, left him without resources and without friends. His victorious enemy pursued him, and he fled beyond mount Taurus, forsaken and almost unknown. He attempted to put an end to his miserable existence, but his efforts were ineffectual, and though his death is attributed by some to despair, it is more universally believed that he expired in the greatest agonies of a dreadful distemper, which consumed him, day and night, with inexpressible pains, and reduced him to a mere skeleton. This miserable end, according to the ecclesiastical writers, was the visible punishment of heaven, for the barbarities which Maximianus had exercised against the followers of christianity, and for the many blasphemies which he had uttered. Lactant.—Euseb.—A minister of the emperor Valerian.—One of the ambassadors of young Theodosius to Attila king of the Huns.

Maximus Magnus, a native of Spain, who proclaimed himself emperor, A.D. 383. The unpopularity of Gratian favoured his usurpation, and he was acknowledged by his troops. Gratian marched against him, but he was defeated, and soon after assassinated. Maximus refused the honours of a burial to the remains of Gratian; and, when he had made himself master of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, he sent ambassadors into the east, and demanded of the emperor Theodosius to acknowledge him as his associate on the throne. Theodosius endeavoured to amuse and delay him, but Maximus resolved to support his claim by arms, and crossed the Alps. Italy was laid desolate, and Rome opened her gates to the conqueror. Theodosius now determined to revenge the audaciousness of Maximus, and had recourse to artifice. He began to make a naval armament, and Maximus, not to appear inferior to his adversary, had already embarked his troops, when Theodosius, by secret and hastened marches, fell upon him, and besieged him at Aquilina. Maximus was betrayed by his soldiers, and the conqueror, moved with compassion at the sight of his fallen and dejected enemy, granted him life, but the multitude refused him mercy, and instantly struck off his head, A.D. 388. His son Victor, who shared the imperial dignity with him, was soon after sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers.—Petronius, a Roman, descended of an illustrious family. He caused Valentinian III. to be assassinated, and ascended the throne; and, to strengthen his usurpation, he married the empress, to whom he had the weakness and imprudence to betray that he had sacrificed her husband to his love for her person. This declaration irritated the empress; she had recourse to the barbarians to avenge the death of Valentinian, and Maximus was stoned to death by his soldiers, and his body thrown into the Tiber, A.D. 455. He reigned only 77 days.—Pupianus. Vid. Pupianus.—A celebrated cynic philosopher and magician of Ephesus. He instructed the emperor Julian in magic; and according to the opinion of some historians, it was in the conversation and company of Maximus that the apostasy of Julian originated. The emperor not only visited the philosopher, but he even submitted his writings to his inspection and censure. Maximus refused to live in the court of Julian, and the emperor, not dissatisfied with the refusal, appointed him high pontiff in the province of Lydia, an office which he discharged with the greatest moderation and justice. When Julian went into the east, the philosopher promised him success, and even said that his conquests would be more numerous and extensive than those of the son of Philip. He persuaded his imperial pupil that, according to the doctrine of metempsychosis, his body was animated by the soul which once animated the hero whose greatness and victories he was going to eclipse. After the death of Julian, Maximus was almost sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers, but the interposition of his friends saved his life, and he retired to Constantinople. He was soon after accused of magical practices before the emperor Valens, and beheaded at Ephesus, A.D. 366. He wrote some philosophical and rhetorical treatises, some of which were dedicated to Julian. They are all now lost. Ammianus.—Tyrnus, a Platonic philosopher in the reign of M. Aurelius. This emperor, who was naturally fond of study, became one of the pupils of Maximus, and paid great deference to his instructions. There are extant of Maximus 47 dissertations on moral and philosophical subjects, written in Greek, the best editions of which are that of Davis, 8vo, Cantab. 1703; and that of Reiske, a vols. 8vo, Lips. 1774.—One of the Greek fathers of the seventh century, whose works were edited by Combais, a vols. fol. Paris, 1675.—Paulus Fabius, a consul with M. Antony's son. Horace speaks of him, 4, od. 1, v. 10, as of a gay, handsome youth, fond of pleasure, yet industrious and indefatigable.—An epithet applied to Jupiter, as being the greatest and most powerful of all the gods.—A native of Sirmium, in Pannonia. He was originally a gardener, but, by enlisting in the Roman army, he became one of the military tribunes, and his marriage with a woman of rank and opulence soon rendered him independent. He was father to the emperor Probus.—A general of Trajan, killed in the eastern provinces.—One of the murderers of Domitian, &c.—A philosopher, native of Byzantium, in the age of Julian the emperor.

Masæos, a large city of Cappadocia, the capital of the province. It was called Casarea by Theodosius, in honour of Augustus.

Masætes, a Persian governor of Memphis. He made a sally against the Grecian soldiers of Alexander, and killed great numbers of them. Curt. 4, c. 1.

Masæus, a satrap of Cilicia, under Artaxerxes Ochus.—A governor of Babylon, son-in-law to Darius. He surrendered to Alexander, &c. Curt. 5, c. 1.

Masætes, a satrap of Media, who reduced Priene under the power of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 161.

Masætes (sing. Masax), a people of Africa, famous for shooting arrows. Lucan. 4, v. 681.

Masætes, a river of Hyrcania, falling into the Caspian sea. Plut.

Masætes and Masyætes, a people of Libya, very expert in the use of missile weapons. The Romans made use of them as couriers, on account of their great swiftness. Suet. in Ner. 30.—Lucan. 4, v. 684.

Meconas, or Meconas C. Cilnius, a celebrated Roman knight, descended from the kings of Etruria. He has rendered himself immortal by his liberal patronage of learned men and of letters; and to his prudence and advice Augustus acknowledged himself indebted for the security which he enjoyed. His fondness for pleasure removed him from the reach of ambition, and he preferred to die, as he was born, a Roman knight, to all the honours and dignities which either the friendship of Augustus or his own popularity could heap upon him. It was from the result of his advice, against the opinion of Agrippa, that Augustus resolved to keep the supreme power in his hands, and not by a voluntary resignation to plunge Rome into civil commotions. The emperor received the private admonitions of Meconas in the same friendly manner as they were given, and he was not displeased with the liberty of his friend, who threw a paper to him with these words, "Descend from the tribunal, thou butcher!" while he sat in the judgment-seat, and betrayed revenge and impatience in his countenance. He was struck with the admonition, and left the tribunal without passing sentence of death on the criminals. To the interference of Meconas, Virgil owed the restitution of his lands, and Horace was proud to boast that his learned friend had obtained his forgiveness from the emperor, for joining the cause of Brutus at the battle of Philippi. Meconas was himself fond of literature, and, according to the most received opinion, he wrote a history of animals, a journal of the life of Augustus, a treatise on the different natures and kinds of precious stones, besides the two tragedies of Octavia and Prometheus, and other things, all now lost. He died eight years before Christ; and, on his death-bed, he particularly recommended his poetical friend Horace to the care and confidence of Augustus. Seneca, who has liberally commended the genius and abilities of Meconas, has not withheld his censure from his dissipation, indolence, and effeminate luxury. From the patronage and encouragement which the princes of heroic and lyric poetry among the Latins received from the favourite of Augustus, all patrons of literature have ever since been called Meconates. Virgil dedicated to him his Georgics, and Horace his odes. Suet. in Aug. 66, &c.—Plut. in Aug.—Herodian. 7.—Senec. ep. 19 & 92.

Mechaneus, a surname of Jupiter, from his patronizing undertakings. He had a statue near the temple of Ceres at Argos, and there the people swore, before they went to the Trojan war, either to conquer or to perish. Paus. 2, c. 22.

Meclisteus, son of Echius, or Talaua, was one of the companions of Ajax. He was killed by Polydamus. Homer. Il. 6, v. 28, &c.—A son of Lycan. Apollod.

Meorida, the wife of Lysimachus. Polyan. 6.

Medea, a celebrated magician, daughter of Æetes king of Colchis. Her mother's name, according to the more received opinion of Hesiod and Hyginus, was Idyia, or, according to others, Ephyre, Hecate, Asterodia, Antiope, or Neræa. She was the niece of Circe. When Jason came to Colchis in quest of the golden fleece, Medea became enamoured of him, and it was to her well-directed labours that the Argonauts owed their preservation. Vid. Jason and Argonautæ. Medea had an interview with her lover in the temple of Hecate, where they bound themselves by the most solemn oaths, and mutually promised eternal fidelity. No sooner had Jason overcome all the difficulties which Æetes had placed in his way, than Medea embarked with the conquerors for Greece. To stop the pursuit of her father, she tore to pieces her brother Absyrtus, and left his mangled limbs in the way through which Æetes was to pass. This act of barbarity some have attributed to Jason, and not to her. When Jason reached Iolchos, his native country, the return and victories of the Argonauts were celebrated with universal rejoicings; but Æson the father of Jason was unable to assist at the solemnity, on account of the infirmities of his age. Medea, at her husband's request, removed the weakness of Æson, and by drawing away the blood from his veins, and filling them again with the juice of certain herbs, she restored to him the vigour and sprightliness of youth. This sudden change in Æson astonished the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias were also desirous to see their father restored, by the same power, to the vigour of youth. Medea, willing to revenge the injuries which her husband's family had suffered from Pelias, increased their curiosity, and by cutting to pieces an old ram and making it again, in their presence, a young lamb, she totally determined them to try the same experiment upon their father's body. They accordingly killed him of their own accord, and boiled his flesh in a cauldron; but Medea refused to perform the same friendly offices to Pelias which she had done to Æson, and he was consumed by the heat of the fire, and even deprived of a burial. This action greatly irritated the people of Iolchos, and Medea, with her husband, fled to Corinth to avoid the resentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for 10 years with much conjugal tenderness; but the love of Jason for Glauce, the king's daughter, soon interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jason by causing the death of Glauce, and the destruction of her family. Vid. Glauce. This action was followed by another still more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's presence, and when Jason attempted to punish the barbarity of the mother, she fled through the air upon a chariot drawn by winged dragons. From Corinth Medea came to Athens, where, after she had undergone the necessary purification of her murder, she married king Ægeus, or, according to others, lived in an adulterous manner with him. From her connection with Ægeus, Medea had a son, who was called Medus. Soon after, when Theseus wished to make himself known to his father (Vid. Ægeus), Medea, jealous of his fame, and fearful of his power, attempted to poison him at a feast which had been prepared for his entertainment. Her attempts, however, failed of success, and the sight of the sword which Theseus wore by his side, convinced Ægeus that the stranger against whose life he had so basely conspired was no less than his own son. The father and the son were reconciled, and Medea, to avoid the punishment which her wickedness deserved, mounted her fiery chariot, and disappeared through the air. She came to Colchis, where, according to some, she was reconciled to Jason, who had sought her in her native country after her sudden departure from Corinth. She died at Colchis, as Justin mentions, when she had been restored to the confidence of her family. After death she married Achilles in the Elysian fields, according to the traditions mentioned by Simonides. The murder of Mermerus and Pheres, the youngest of Jason's children by Medea, is not attributed to their mother according to Ælian, but the Corinthians themselves assassinated them in the temple of Juno Acræa. To avoid the resentment of the gods, and deliver themselves from the pestilence which visited their country after so horrid a massacre, they engaged the poet Euripides, for five talents, to write a tragedy, which cleared them of the murder, and represented Medea as the cruel assassin of her own children. And besides, that this opinion might be the better credited, festivals were appointed, in which the mother was represented with all the barbarity of a fury murdering her own sons. Vid. Heræa. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—*Hygin. Medesicaste, a daughter of Priam, who married Imbrus son of Mentor, who was killed by Teucer during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 13, v. 372.—Apollod. 3.

Media, a celebrated country of Asia, bounded on the north by the Caspian sea, west by Armenia, south by Persia, and east by Parthia and Hyrcania. It was originally called Aria, till the age of Medus the son of Medea, who gave it the name of Media. The province of Media was first raised into a kingdom by its revolt from the Assyrian monarchy, B.C. 820; and after it had for some time enjoyed a kind of republican government, Deiocees, by his artifice, procured himself to be called king, 700 B.C. After a reign of 53 years he was succeeded by Phraortes, B.C. 647; who was succeeded by Cyaxares, B.C. 625. His successor was Astyages, B.C. 585, in whose reign Cyrus became master of Media, B.C. 551; and ever after the empire was transferred to the Persians. The Medes were warlike in the primitive ages of their power; they encouraged polygamy, and were remarkable for the homage which they paid to their sovereigns, who were styled kings of kings. This title was afterwards adopted by their conquerors the Persians, and it was still in use in the age of the Roman emperors. Justin. 1, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Polyb. 5 & 10.—Curt. 5, &c.—*Diod. Medias, a tyrant of Mysia, &c.

Medious, a prince of Larissa, in Thessaly, who made war against Lycophron tyrant of Phœræ. Diod. 14.

Mediolanum, now Milan, the capital of Insubria at the mouth of the Po. Liv. 5, c. 24. l. 34. c. 46.—Aulercorum, a town of Gaul, now Evreux, in Normandy.—Santonum, another, now Saintes, in Guienne.

Mediomatrica, a nation that lived on the borders of the Rhine, now Mets. Strab. 4.—Cæs. Bell. G. 4, c. 10.

Mediterraneum mare, a sea which divides Europe and Asia Minor from Africa. It receives its name from its situation, medio terra, situate in the middle of the land. It has a communication with the Atlantic by the columns of Hercules, and with the Euxine through the Ægean. The word Mediterraneum does not occur in the classics; but it is sometimes called internum, nostrum, or medius liquor, and is frequently denominated in Scripture the Great sea. The first naval power that ever obtained the command of it, as recorded in the fabulous epochs of the writer Cæsar, was Crete, under Minos. Afterwards it passed into the hands of the Lydians, B.C. 1179; of the Pelasgi, 1058; of the Thracians, 1000; of the Rhodians, 976; of the Phrygians, 893; of the Cyprians, 868; of the Phœnicians, 826; of the Egyptians, 787; of the Milesians, 753; of the Carians, 734; and of the Lesbians, 676, which they retained for 69 years. Horat. 3, od. 3, v. 46.—Plin. 2, c. 68.—Sallust. Jug. 17.—Cæs. B. G. 5, c. 1.—Liv. 26, c. 42.

Medicina, the goddess of medicines, whose festivals, called Medicinalia, were celebrated at Rome the last day of September, when they made offerings of fruits. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

Medocus, or Medusius, a river in the country of the Veneti, falling into the Adriatic sea. Liv. 10, c. 2.

Medobithyni, a people of Thrace.

Medobriga, a town of Lusitania, now destroyed. Hirtius, 48.

Medon, son of Codrus, the seventeenth and last king of Athens, was the first Archon that was appointed with regal authority, B.C. 1070. In the election Medon was preferred to his brother Neleus, by the oracle of Delphi, and he rendered himself popular by the justice and moderation of his administration. His successors were called from him Medontidae, and the office of archon remained for above 200 years in the family of Codrus under 13 perpetual archons. Paus. 7, c. 2.—Paterc. 2, c. 2.

—A man killed in the Trojan war. Æneas saw him in the infernal regions. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.

—A statuery of Laomedon, who made a famous statue of Minerva, seen in the temple of Juno at Olympia. Paus. 7, c. 17.—One of the Centaurs, &c. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 303.—One of the Tyrrhene sailors changed into dolphins by Bacchus. Id. Met. 3, v. 671.—A river of Peloponnesus.—An illegitimate son of Ajax Oilæus. Homer.—One of Penelope's suitors. Ovid. Heroid. 1.—A man of Cyzicus, killed by the Argonauts.—A king of Argos, who died about 990 years B.C.—A son of Pylades by Electra. Paus. 2, c. 16.

Medontias, a woman of Abydos, with whom Alcibiades cohabited as with a wife. She had a daughter, &c. Lyrius.

Meduacis, two rivers (Major, now Brenta, and Minor, now Bachilonia), falling, near Venice, into the Adriatic sea. Plin. 3, c. 16.—Liv. 10, c. 2.

Meduana, a river of Gaul, flowing into the Ligeris, now the Mayne. Lucan. 1, v. 438.

Medulina, a Roman virgin ravished by her father, &c. Plut. in Paral.—An infamous courtesan in Juvenal's age, 6, v. 321.

Medus, now Kur, a river of Media, falling into the Araxes. Some take Medus adjectively, as applying to any of the great rivers of Media. Strab. 15.—Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 21.—A son of Ægeus and Medea, who gave his name to a country of Asia. Medus, when arrived to years of maturity, went to seek his mother, whom the arrival of Theseus in Athens had driven away. Vid. Medea. He came to Colchis, where he was seized by his uncle Perses, who usurped the throne of Æetes, his mother's father, because the oracle had declared that Perses should be murdered by one of the grandsons of Æetes. Medus assumed another name, and called himself Hippotes son of Creon. Meanwhile Medea arrived in Colchis, disguised in the habit of a priestess of Diana, and when she heard that one of Creon's children was imprisoned, she resolved to hasten the destruction of a person whose family she detested. To effect this with more certainty, she told the usurper that Hippotes was really a son of Medea, sent by his mother to murder him. She begged Perses to give her Hippotes, that she might sacrifice him to her resentment. Perses consented. Medea discovered that it was her own son, and she instantly armed him with the dagger which she had prepared against his life, and ordered him to stab the usurper. He obeyed, and Medea discovered who he was, and made her son Medus sit on his grandfather's throne. Herod. Theog.—Pans. 2.—Apollod. 1.—Justin. 42.—Sæc. in Med.—Diod.

Medusa, one of the three Gorgons, daughter of Phorcys and Ceto. She was the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. She is celebrated for her personal charms and the beauty of her locks. Neptune became enamoured of her, and obtained her favours in the temple of Minerva. This violation of the sanctity of the temple provoked Minerva, and she changed the beautiful locks of Medusa, which had inspired Neptune's love, into serpents. According to Apollodorus and others, Medusa and her sisters came into the world with snakes on their heads, instead of hair, with yellow wings and brazen hands. Their bodies were also covered with impenetrable scales, and their very looks had the power of killing or turning to stones. Perseus rendered his name immortal by his conquest of Medusa. He cut off her head, and the blood that dropped from the wound produced the innumerable serpents that infest Africa. The conqueror placed Medusa's head on the ægis of Minerva, which he had used in his expedition. The head still retained the same petrifying power as before, as it was fatally known in the court of Cepheus. Vid. Andromeda. Some suppose that the Gorgons were a nation of women, whom Perseus conquered. Vid. Gorgones. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Herod. Theog.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 618.—Lucan. 9, v. 624.—Apollod. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 151.—A daughter of Priam.—A daughter of Sthenelus. Apollod.

Megabizi, certain priests in Diana's temple at Ephesus. They were all eunuchs. Quintil. 5, c. 12.

Megabyzus, one of the noble Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. He was set over an army in Europe by king Darius, where he took Perinthus and conquered all Thrace. He was greatly esteemed by his sovereign. Herodot. 3, &c.—A son of Zopyrus, satrap to Darius. He conquered Egypt, &c. Herodot. 3, c. 160.—A satrap of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his king, and defeated two large armies that had been sent against him. The interference of his friends restored him to the king's favour, and he showed his attachment to Artaxerxes by killing a lion which threatened his life in hunting. This act of affection in Megabryus was looked upon with envy by the king. He was discarded and afterwards reconciled to the monarch by means of his mother. He died in the 76th year of his age, B.C. 447, greatly regretted. Ctesias.

Megacles, an Athenian archon, who involved the greatest part of the Athenians in the sacrilege which was committed in the conspiracy of Cylon. Plat. in Sol.—A brother of Dion, who assisted his brother against Dionysius, &c.—A son of Alcmaeon, who revolted with some Athenians after the departure of Solon from Athens. He was ejected by Pisistratus.—A man who exchanged dress with Pyrrhus, when assisting the Tarentines in Italy. He was killed in that disguise.—A native of Messana in Sicily, famous for his inveterate enmity to Agathocles tyrant of Syracuse.—A man who destroyed the leading men of Mitylene, because he had been punished.—A man who wrote an account of the lives of illustrious persons.—The maternal grandfather of Alcibiades.

Megaclides, a peripatetic philosopher in the age of Protagoras.

Megara, one of the furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron. The word is derived from μεγαπειρ, invicta, odisse, and she is represented as employed by the gods, like her sisters, to punish the crimes of mankind, by visiting them with diseases, with inward torments, and with death. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 846. Vid. Eumenides.

Megale, the Greek name of Cybele the mother of the gods, whose festivals were called Megalesia.

Megaleus, a seditious person of Corinth. He was seized for his treachery to king Philip of Macedonia, upon which he destroyed himself to avoid punishment.

Megalesia, games in honour of Cybele, instituted by the Phrygians, and introduced at Rome in the second Punic war, when the statue of the goddess was brought from Pesinnum. Liv. 29, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 337.

Megalia, a small island of Campania, near Neapolis. Stat. 2, Sylv. v. 80.

Megalopolis, a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus, built by Epaminondas. It joined the Achaean league, B.C. 232, and was taken and ruined by Cleomenes king of Sparta. The inhabitants were called Megalopolitai, or Megalopolitani. Strab. 8.—Paus. 9, c. 14.—Liv. 28, c. 8.

Megaméde, the wife of Thestius, mother by him of 50 daughters. Apollod. 2.

Meganira, the wife of Celeus king of Eleusis in Attica. She was mother of Triptolemus, to whom Ceres, as she travelled over Attica, taught agriculture. She received divine honours after death, and she had an altar raised to her, near the fountain where Ceres had first been seen when she arrived in Attica. Paus. 1, c. 39.—The wife of Arcas. Apollod.

Megapenthes, an illegitimate son of Menelaus, who, after his father's return from the Trojan war, was married to a daughter of Alector, a native of Sparta. His mother's name was Teridæa, a slave of Menelaus. Homer. Od. 4.—Apollod. 3.

Megara, a daughter of Creon king of Thebes, given in marriage to Hercules, because he had delivered the Thebans from the tyranny of the Orchomenians. Vid. Erginus. When Hercules went to hell by order of Eurystheus, violence was offered to Megara by Lycus, a Theban exile, and she would have yielded to her ravisher had not Hercules returned that moment and punished him with death. This murder displeased Juno, and she rendered Hercules so delirious, that he killed Megara and the three children he had by her, in a fit of madness, thinking them to be wild beasts. Some say that Megara did not perish by the hand of her husband, but that he afterwards married her to his friend Iolas. The names of Megara's children by Hercules were Creontades, Therimachus, and Deicoon. Hygin. fab. 82.—Senec. in Her.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

Megara (m. and pl. orum), a city of Achaia, the capital of a country called Megaris, founded about 1337 B.C. It is situate nearly at an equal distance from Corinth and Athens, on the Sinus Saronicus. It was built upon two rocks, and is still in being, and preserves its ancient name. It was called after Megareus the son of Neptune, who was buried there, or from Megareus, a son of Apollo. It was originally governed by 12 kings, but became afterwards a republic, and fell into the hands of the Athenians, from whom it was rescued by the Heraclidae. At the battle of Salamis the people of Megara furnished 20 ships for the defence of Greece, and at Platæa they had 300 men in the army of Pausanias. There was here a sect of philosophers called the Megaric, who held the world to be eternal. Cic. Acad. 4, c. 42. Orat. 3, c. 17. Att. 1, ep. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 39.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—A town of Sicily, founded by a colony from Megara in Attica, about 728 years before the christian era. It was destroyed by Gelon king of Syracuse; and before the arrival of the Megarean colony it was called Hybla. Strab. 26, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.

Megarous, the father of Hippomenes, was son of Onchestus. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 605.—A son of Apollo.

Megaris, a small country of Achaia, between Phocis on the west and Attica on the east. Its capital city was called Megara. Vid. Megara. Strab. 8.—Plin. 3, c. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3 & 7.

Megarous, a town of Sicily,—of Cilicia.—A river of India.

Megasthenes, a Greek historian in the age of Seleucus Nicanor, about 300 years before Christ. He wrote about the oriental nations, and particularly the Indians. His history is often quoted by the ancients. What now passes as his composition is spurious.

Meges, one of Helen's suitors, governor of Dulichium and of the Echinades. He went with 40 ships to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.

Megilla, a native of Locris, remarkable for beauty, and mentioned by Horat. 1, od. 27, v. 11.

Megista, an island of Lycia, with a harbour of the same name. Liv. 37, c. 29.

Megistias, a soothsayer, who told the Spartans that defended Thermopylae, that they all should perish, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 219, &c.—A river. Vid. Mella.

Mela Pomponius, a Spaniard, who flourished about the 45th year of the christian era, and distinguished himself by his geography divided into three books, and written with elegance, with great perspicuity and brevity. The best editions of this book, called De Situ Orbis, are those of Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1727, and of Reinhold, 4to, Eton, 1761.

Melenus, a village of Attica. Stat. Theb. 12, v. 610.

Melampus, a celebrated soothsayer and physician of Argos, son of Amythaon and Idomena, or Dorippe. He lived at Pylos in Peloponnesus. His servants once killed two large serpents, which had made their nests at the bottom of a large oak, and Melampus paid so much regard to these two reptiles, that he raised a burning pile and burned them upon it. He also took particular care of their young ones, and fed them with milk. Some time after this the young serpents crept to Melampus as he slept on the grass near the oak, and, as if sensible of the favours of their benefactor, they wantonly played around him, and softly licked his ears. This awoke Melampus, who was astonished at the sudden change which his senses had undergone. He found himself acquainted with the chirping of the birds, and with all their rude notes, as they flew around him. He took advantage of this supernatural gift, and soon made himself perfect in the knowledge of futurity, and Apollo also instructed him in the art of medicine. He had soon after the happiness of curing the daughters of Proteus, by giving them hellebore, which from this circumstance has been called melampodium, and as a reward for his trouble he married the eldest of these princesses. Vid. Proteides. The tyranny of his uncle Neleus king of Pylos obliged him to leave his native country, and Proteus, to show himself more sensible of his services, gave him part of his kingdom, over which he established himself. About this time the personal charms of Pero the daughter of Neleus had gained many admirers, but the father promised his daughter only to him who brought into his hands the oxen of Iphiclus. This condition displeased many; but Bias, who was also one of her admirers, engaged his brother Melampus to steal the oxen, and deliver them to him. Melampus was caught in the attempt and imprisoned, and nothing but his services as a soothsayer and physician to Iphiclus would have saved him from death. All this pleaded in favour of Melampus, but when he had taught the childless Iphiclus how to become a father, he not only obtained his liberty, but also the oxen, and with them he compelled Neleus to give Pero in marriage to Bias. A severe distemper, which had rendered the women of Argos insane, was totally removed by Melampus, and Anaxagoras, who then sat on the throne, rewarded his merit by giving him part of his kingdom, where he established himself, and where his posterity reigned during six successive generations. He received divine honours after death, and temples were raised to his memory. Homer. Od. 11, v. 287, l. 15, v. 225—Herodot. 2 & 9—Apollod. 2, c. 2—Paus. 7, c. 18, l. 4, c. 3—*Virg. Melampygos, a surname of Hercules, from the black and hairy appearance of his back, &c.

Melanchotes, one of Actæon's dogs, so called from his black hair. Ovid. Met. 3.

Melanchleoni, a people near the Cimmerian Bosphorus.

Melanchrus, a tyrant of Lesbos, who died about 612 B.C.

Melane, the same as Samothrace.

Melaneus, a son of Eurypus, from whom Eretria has been called Melaneis.—A centaur. Ovid. Met. 12.—One of Actæon's dogs. Id. 3.

—An Ethiopian, killed at the nuptials of Perseus. Id. 5.

Melanida, a surname of Venus.

Melanion, the same as Hippomenes, who married Alalanta, according to some mythologists. Apollod. 3.

Melanippe, a daughter of Æolus, who had two children by Neptune, for which her father put out both her eyes, and confined her in a prison. Her children, who had been exposed and preserved, delivered her from confinement, and Neptune restored to her her eye-sight. She afterwards married Metapontus. Hygin. fab. 186.—A nymph who married Itonus son of Amphitryon, by whom she had Borotus, who gave his name to Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 1.

Melanippides, a Greek poet about 520 years before Christ. His grandson, of the same name, flourished about 60 years after at the court of Perdiccas II. of Macedonia. Some fragments of their poetry are extant.

Melanippus, a priest of Apollo at Cyrene, killed by the tyrant Nicocrates. Polyam. 8.—A son of Astacus, one of the Theban chiefs who defended the gates of Thebes against the army of Adrastus king of Argos. He was opposed by Tydeus, whom he slightly wounded, and at last was killed by Amphiaraus, who carried his head to Tydeus. Tydeus, to take revenge of the wound he had received, bit the head with such barbarity, that he swallowed the brains, and Minerva, offended with his conduct, took away the herb which she had given him to cure his wound, and he died. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Æschyl. ante Theb.—Paus. 9, c. 18.—A son of Mars, who became enamoured of Cometho, a priestess of Diana Triclaria. He concealed himself in the temple, and ravished his mistress, for which violation of the sanctity of the place the two lovers soon after perished by a sudden death, and the country was visited by a pestilence, which was stopped only after the offering of a human sacrifice by the direction of the oracle. Paus. 7, c. 19.—A Trojan, killed by Antiochus in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 15.—Another, killed by Patroclus.—Another, killed by Teucer.—A son of Agrius.—Another, son of Priam.—A son of Theseus.

Melanopyri, a people of Syria.

Melanthii, rocks near the island of Samos.

Melanthis, a man who wrote a history of Attica.—A famous painter of Sicily. Plin. 35.

—A tragic poet of a very malevolent disposition in the age of Phocion. Plut.—A Trojan, killed by Eurypius in the Trojan war. Homer. Od.—A shepherd in Theocrit. Idyll.—A goat-herd, killed by Telemachus after the return of Ulysses. Ovid. 1, Heroid.—An elegiac poet.

Melanthis, a daughter of Proteus, ravished by Neptune under the form of a dolphin. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 12.—One of Penelope's women, sister to Melanthis. Homer. Il. 18, &c. Od. 18.

Melanthis, Melanthis, or Melanthis, a son of Andropompus, whose ancestors were kings of Pylos. He was driven from his paternal kingdom by the Heraclids, and came to Athens, where king Thymoetes resigned the crown to him, provided he fought a battle against Xanthus, a general of the Boeotians, who made war against him. He fought and conquered (Vid. Aparuria), and his family, surnamed the Nelidae, sat on the throne of Athens, till the age of Codrus. He succeeded to the crown 1128 years B.C., and reigned 37 years. Paus. 2, c. 18.—A man of Cyzicus. Placc.—A river of European Sarmatia, falling into the Borysthenes. Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 10, v. 55.

Melas (e), a river of Peloponnesus.—Of Thrace, at the west of the Thracian Chersonesus.—Another in Thessaly,—in Achaia,—in Bœotia,—in Sicily,—in Iopia,—in Cappadocia.—A son of Neptune.—Another, son of Proteus.—A son of Phryxus, who was among the Argonauts, and was drowned in that part of the sea which bore his name. Apollod. 1.

Meldœ, or Meldorum urbs, a city of Gaul, now Meaux, in Champagne.

Meleager, a celebrated hero of antiquity, son of Ceneus king of Etolia, by Althæa daughter of Thestius. The Parcs were present at the moment of his birth, and predicted his future greatness. Clotho said that he would be brave and courageous, Lachesis foretold his uncommon strength, and Atropos declared that he should live as long as that fire-brand, which was on the fire, remained entire and unconsumed. Althæa no sooner heard this, than she snatched the stick from the fire, and kept it with the most jealous care, as the life of her son was destined to depend upon its preservation. The fame of Meleager increased with his years; he signalized himself in the Argonautic expedition, and afterwards delivered his country from the neighbouring inhabitants, who made war against his father, at the instigation of Diana, whose altars Ceneus had neglected. Vid. Ceneus. No sooner were they destroyed than Diana punished the negligence of Ceneus by a greater calamity. She sent a huge wild boar, which laid waste all the country, and seemed invincible on account of its immense size. It became soon a public concern; all the neighbouring princes assembled to destroy this terrible animal, and nothing became more famous in mythological history than the hunting of the Calydonian boar. The princes and chiefs who assembled, and who are mentioned by mythologists, are Meleager son of Ceneus, Idas and Lynceus sons of Aphareus, Dryas son of Mars, Castor and Pollux sons of Jupiter and Leda, Pirithous son of Ixion, Theseus son of Ægeus, Anceus and Cepheus sons of Lycurgus, Admetes son of Phœbus, Jason son of Æson, Peleus and Telamon sons of Æacus, Iphicles son of Amphitryon, Eurytrion son of Actor, Atalanta daughter of Schoeneus, Iolas the friend of Hercules, the sons of Thestius, Amphiaræus son of Oileus, Proteus, Cometes, the brothers of Althæa, Hippothous son of Cercyon, Leucippus, Adrastus, Ceneus, Phileus, Echeon, Lelex, Phœnix son of Amyntor, Panopeus, Hyleus, Hippasus, Nestor, Menœtes the father of Patroclus, Amphicides, Laertes the father of Ulysses, and the four sons of Hippocoon. This troop of armed men attacked the boar with unusual fury, and it was at last killed by Meleager. The conqueror gave the skin and the head to Atalanta, who had first wounded the animal. This partiality to a woman irritated the others, and particularly Toxeus and Plexippus the brothers of Althæa, and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the honourable present. Meleager defended a woman, of whom he was enamoured, and killed his uncles in the attempt. Meantime the news of this celebrated conquest had already reached Calydon, and Althæa went to the temple of the gods to return thanks for the victory which her son had gained. As she went she met the corpses of her brothers that were brought from the chase, and at this mournful spectacle she filled the whole city with her lamentations. She was upon this informed that they had been killed by Meleager, and in the moment of resentment, to revenge the death of her brothers, she threw into the fire the fatal stick on which her son's life depended, and Meleager died as soon as it was consumed. Homer does not mention the fire-brand, whence some have imagined that this fable is posterior to that poet's age. But he says that the death of Toxeus and Plexippus so irritated Althæa, that she uttered the most horrible curses and imprecations upon the head of her son. Meleager married Cleopatra the daughter of Idas and Marpessa, as also Atalanta, according to some accounts. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Apollon. 1, Arg. 1, v. 997. l. 3, v. 518.—Flacc. 1 & 6.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—Hygin. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8.—Homer. Il. 9.—A general who supported Aridæus when he had been made king, after the death of his brother Alexander the Great.—A brother of Ptolemy, made king of Macedonia B.C. 280 years. He was but two months invested with the regal authority.—A Greek poet in the reign of Seleucus, the last of the Seleucidae. He was born at Tyre, and died at Cos. It is to his well-directed labours that we are indebted for the Anthologia, or collection of Greek epigrams, which he selected from 46 of the best and most esteemed poets. The original collection of Meleager has been greatly altered by succeeding editors. The best edition of the Anthologia is that of Brunck, in three vols. 4to and 8vo, Argentor. 1772.

Meleagrides, the sisters of Meleager, daughters of Ceneus and Althæa. They were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Meleager, that they refused all aliments, and were, at the point of death, changed into birds called Meleagrides, whose feathers and eggs, as it is supposed, are of a different colour. The youngest of the sisters, Gorge and Dejanira, who had been married, escaped this metamorphosis. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 540.—Plin. 10, c. 26.

Melœsander, an Athenian general, who died B.C. 414.

Meles (ētis), a river of Asia Minor, in Ionia, near Smyrna. Some of the ancients supposed that Homer was born on the banks of that river, from which circumstance they call him Melisigenes, and his compositions Melesian charts. It is even supposed that he composed his poems in a cave near the source of that river. Strab. 12.—Stat. 2, Sylv. 7, v. 34.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 201.—Paus. 7, c. 5.—A beautiful Athenian youth, greatly beloved by Timagoras, whose affections he repaid with the greatest coldness and indifference. He even ordered Timagoras to leap down a precipice, from the top of the citadel of Athens, and Timagoras, not to disoblige him, obeyed, and was killed in the fall. This token of true friendship and affection had such an effect upon Meles, that he threw himself down from the place, to atone by his death for the ingratitude which he had shown to Timagoras. Paus. 1, c. 30.—A king of Lydia, who succeeded his father Alyattes, about 747 years before Christ. He was father to Candaules.

Melesigenes, or Melesigēna, a name given to Homer. Vid. Meles.

Melia, a daughter of Oceanus, who married Inachus.—A nymph, &c. Apollod.—A daughter of Oceanus, sister to Caastus. She became mother of Ismarus and Tenerus by Apollo. Tenerus was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and the river Ladon in Bœotia assumed the name of Ismarus. Paus. 9, c. 10.—One of the Nereides.—A daughter of Agenor.

Meliboœa, a daughter of Oceanus, who married Pelægus.—A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Apollod.—A maritime town of Magnesia in Thessaly, at the foot of mount Ossa, famous for dyeing wool. The epithet of Melibœus is applied to Philoctetes, because he reigned there. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 401. l. 5, v. 251.—Hærodot. 7, c. 188.—Also an island at the mouth of the Orontes in Syria, whence Melibœa purpura. Mel. 2, c. 3.

Meliboœus, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues.

Melicoerta, Melicertes, or Melicertus, a son of Athamas and Ino. He was saved by his mother from the fury of his father, who prepared to dash him against the wall as he had done his brother Learchus. The mother was so terrified that she threw herself into the sea, with Melicerta in her arms. Neptune had compassion on the misfortunes of Ino and her son, and changed them both into sea deities. Ino was called Leucothoe or Matuta, and Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palemon, and among the Latins by that of Portunus. Some suppose that the Isthmian games were in honour of Melicerta. Vid. Isthmia. Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 4.—Paus. 1, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 1 & 2.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 529, &c.—Plut. de Symp.

Melignis, one of the Æolian islands near Sicily.

Melina, a daughter of Thespius, mother of Laomedon by Hercules.

Melias, a town of Magna Græcia.

Melissa, a daughter of Melisus king of Crete, who, with her sister Amalthea, fed Jupiter with the milk of goats. She first found out the means of collecting honey; whence some have imagined that she was changed into a bee, as her name is the Greek word for that insect. Colusmell.—One of the Oceanides, who married Inachus, by whom she had Phoroneus and Ægialus.—A daughter of Procles, who married Perander the son of Cypselus, by whom, in her pregnancy, she was killed with a blow of his foot, by the false accusation of his concubines. Diog. Laert.—Paus. 1, c. 28.—A woman of Corinth, who refused to initiate others in the festivals of Ceres, after she had received admission. She was torn to pieces upon this disobedience, and the goddess made a swarm of bees rise from her body.

Melissus, a king of Crete, father to Melissa and Amalthea. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 13.—Lactant. 1, c. 22.—An admiral of the Samian fleet, B.C. 441. He was defeated by Pericles, &c. Plut. in Per.—A philosopher of Samos, who maintained that the world was infinite, immovable, and without a vacuum. According to his doctrines, no one could advance any argument upon the power or attributes of Providence, as all human knowledge was weak and imperfect. Themistocles was among his pupils. He flourished about 440 years before the christian era. Diog. A freedman of Mæcenæus, appointed librarian to Augustus. He wrote some comedies. Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 16, v. 30.—Sueton. de Gram.

Melita, an island in the Libyan sea, between Sicily and Africa, now called Malta. The soil was fertile, and the country famous for its wool. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians. St. Paul was shipwrecked there, and cursed all venomous creatures, which now are not to be found in the whole island. Some, however, suppose that the island on which the Apostle was shipwrecked, was another island of the same name in the Adriatic on the coast of Illyricum, now called Melade. Malta is now remarkable as being the residence of the knights of Malta, formerly of St. John of Jerusalem, settled there A.D. 1530, by the concession of Charles V., after their expulsion from Rhodes by the Turks. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cic. in Ver. 4, c. 46.—Another on the coast of Illyricum, in the Adriatic, now Melade. Plin. 3, c. 26.—An ancient name of Samothrace. Strab. 10.—One of the Nereides. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825.

Melitene, a province of Armenia.

Melitus, a poet and orator of Athens, who became one of the principal accusers of Socrates. After his eloquence had prevailed, and Socrates had been put ignominiously to death, the Athenians repented of their severity to the philosopher, and condemned his accusers. Melitus perished among them. His character was mean and insidious, and his poems had nothing great or sublime. Diog.

Sp. Melitus, a Roman knight accused of aspiring to tyranny, on account of his uncommon liberality to the populace. He was summoned to appear by the dictator L. Q. Cincinnatus, and when he refused to obey, he was put to death by Ahala the master of horse, A.U.C. 314.—Varro de L. L. 4.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.

Melivandrus, a Mælian, who wrote an account of the wars of the Lapithæ and Centaurs. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 2.

Melia, or Mela, a small river of Cisalpine Gaul, falling into the Ollius, and with it into the Po. Catull. 68, v. 33.—Virg. G. 4, v. 278.

Mella Anneus, the father of Lucan. He was accused of being privy to Piso's conspiracy against Nero, upon which he opened his veins. Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 17.

Melobolus, one of the Oceanides.

Melon, an astrologer, who feigned madness and burnt his house that he might not go to an expedition, which he knew would be attended with great calamities.—An interpreter of king Darius. Curr. 5, c. 13.

Melos, now Milo, an island between Crete and Peloponnesus, about 24 miles from Scythium, about 60 miles in circumference, and of an oblong figure. It enjoyed its independence for above 700 years before the time of the Peloponnesian war. This island was originally peopled by a Lacedæmonian colony, 1116 years before the christian era. From this reason the inhabitants refused to join the rest of the islands and the Athenians against the Peloponnesians. This refusal was severely punished. The Athenians took Melos, and put to the sword all such as were able to bear arms. The women and children were made slaves, and the island left desolate. An Athenian colony re-peopled it, till Lysander reconquered it and re-established the original inhabitants in their possessions. The island produced a kind of earth successfully employed in painting and medicine. Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12. l. 35, c. 9.—Thucyd. 2, &c.

Melopes, now Melipa, a river of Lucania, falling into the Tyrrhene sea. Plin. 3, c. 5.

Melpia, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Melpomene, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over tragedy. Horace has addressed the finest of his odes to her, as to the patroness of lyric poetry. She was generally represented as a young woman with a serious countenance. Her garments were splendid; she wore a buskin, and held a dagger in one hand, and in the other a sceptre and crowns. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Hesiod. Theog.

Memaœni, a powerful nation of Asia, &c. Curr.

Memmia Sulpitia, a woman who married the emperor Alexander Severus. She died when young.

Memmia lex, ordained that no one should be entered on the calendar of criminals who was absent on the public account.

Mammius, a Roman citizen, accused of ambitus. Cic. ad Fratrem, 3.—A Roman knight, who rendered himself illustrious for his eloquence and poetical talents. He was made tribune, pretor, and afterwards governor of Bithynia. He was accused of extortion in his province, and banished by J. Caesar, though Cicero undertook his defence. Lucretius dedicated his poem to him. Cic. in Brut.—Regulus, a Roman of whom Nero observed, that he deserved to be invested with the imperial purple. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 47.—A Roman who accused Jugurtha before the Roman people.—A lieutenant of Pompey, &c.—The family of the Memmii were plebeians. They were descended, according to some accounts, from Minesthus the friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 117.

Memnon, a king of Æthiopia, son of Tithonus and Aurora. He came with a body of 10,000 men to assist his uncle Priam, during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Nestor's son. The aged father challenged the Æthiopian monarch, but Memnon refused it on account of the venerable age of Nestor, and accepted that of Achilles. He was killed in the combat, in the sight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. Aurora was so disconsolate at the death of her son, that she flew to Jupiter all bathed in tears, and begged the god to grant her son such honours as might distinguish him from other mortals. Jupiter consented, and immediately a numerous flight of birds issued from the burning pile on which the body was laid, and after they had flown three times round the flames, they divided themselves into two separate bodies, and fought with such acrimony, that above half of them fell down into the fire, as victims to appease the manes of Memnon. These birds were called Memnonides; and it has been observed by some of the ancients, that they never failed to return yearly to the tomb of Memnon in Troas, and repeat the same bloody engagement, in honour of the hero, from whom they received their name. The Æthiopians or Egyptians, over whom Memnon reigned, erected a celebrated statue to the honour of their monarch. This statue had the wonderful property of uttering a melodious sound every day, at sun-rising, like that which is heard at the breaking of the string of a harp when it is wound up. This was effected by the rays of the sun when they fell upon it. At the setting of the sun, and in the night the sound was lugubrious. This is supported by the testimony of the geographer Strabo, who confesses himself ignorant whether it proceeded from the basis of the statue, or the people that were then round it. This celebrated statue was dismantled by order of Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, and its ruins still astonish modern travellers by their grandeur and beauty. Memnon was the inventor of the alphabet, according to Anticledes, a writer mentioned by Pliny, 7, c. 56. Met. in Dion.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 578, &c.—Ælian. 5, c. 1.—Paus. 1, c. 42, l. 10, c. 31.—Strab. 13 & 17.—Juv. 15, v. 1.—Philostrophus, in Apollod.—Plin. 36, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 9.—Quint. Calab.—A general of the Persian forces, when Alexander invaded Asia. He distinguished himself for his attachment to the interest of Darius, his valour in the field, the soundness of his counsels, and his great sagacity. He defended Miletus against Alexander, and died in the midst of his successful enterprises, B.C. 333. His wife Barsine was taken prisoner with the wife of Darius. Diod. 16.—A governor of Cælosyria.—A man appointed governor of Thrace by Alexander.—A man who wrote a history of Heraclea in Pontus, in the age of Augustus.

Memphis, a celebrated town of Egypt, on the western banks of the Nile, above the Delta. It once contained many beautiful temples, particularly those of the god Apis (bos Memphites), whose worship was observed with the greatest ceremonies. Vid. Apis. It was in the neighbourhood of Memphis that those famous pyramids were built, whose grandeur and beauty still astonish the modern traveller. These noble monuments of Egyptian vanity, which pass for one of the wonders of the world, are about 20 in number, three of which, by their superior size, particularly claim attention. The largest of these is 481 feet in height measured perpendicularly, and the area of its basis is on 480,240 square feet, or something more than 11 English acres of ground. It has steps all round with massy and polished stones, so large that the breadth and depth of every step is one single stone. The smallest stone, according to an ancient historian, is not less than 30 feet. The number of steps, according to modern observation, amounts to 208, a number which is not always adhered to by travellers. The place where Memphis formerly stood is not now known; the ruins of its fallen grandeur were conveyed to Alexandria to beautify its palaces, or to adorn the neighbouring cities. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 28.—Sil. 11, l. 14, v. 660.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 2, c. 9.—Diod. 1.—Plut. in Isid.—Herodot. 2, c. 10, &c.—Joseph. Ant. Jud. 8.—A nymph, daughter of the Nile, who married Ephesus, by whom she had Libya. She gave her name to the celebrated city of Memphis. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—The wife of Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Memphitis, a son of Ptolemy Physcon king of Egypt. He was put to death by his father.

Mena, a goddess worshipped at Rome, and supposed to preside over the monthly infirmities of women. She was the same as Juno. According to some, the sacrifices offered to her were young puppies that still sucked their mother. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 2.—Plin. 29, c. 4.

Mena, or Menes, the first king of Egypt, according to some accounts.

Menalcas, a shepherd in Virgil's eclogues. Menaloides, an intriguing Lacedæmonian in the time of the famous Achæan league. He was accused before the Romans, and he killed himself.

Menalippe, a sister of Antiope queen of the Amazons, taken by Hercules when that hero made war against this celebrated nation. She was ransom'd, and Hercules received in exchange the arms and belt of the queen. Juv. 8, v. 229.—A daughter of the centaur Chiron, beloved and ravished by Æolus son of Hellen. She retired into the woods to hide her disgrace from the eyes of her father, and when she had brought forth she entreated the gods to remove her totally from the pursuits of Chiron. She was changed into a mare, and called Ocyroe. Some suppose that she assumed the name of Menalippe, and lost that of Ocyroe. She became a constellation after death, called the horse. Some authors call her Hippe, or Evippe. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 18.—Pollux. 4.—Menalippe is a name common to other persons, but it is generally spelt Melanippe by the best authors. Vid. Melanippe.

Melanippus. Vid. Melanippus.

Menander, a celebrated comic poet of Athens, educated under Theophrastus. He was universally esteemed by the Greeks, and received the appellation of Prince of the New Comedy. He did not disgrace his compositions, like Aristophanes, by mean and indecent reflections and libellous satire, but his writings were replete with elegance, refined wit, and judicious observations. Of 108 comedies which he wrote, nothing remains but a few fragments. It is said that Terence translated all these, and indeed we may have cause to lament the loss of such valuable writings, when we are told by the ancients that the elegant Terence, so much admired, was in the opinion of his countrymen reckoned inferior to Menander. It is said that Menander drowned himself in the 52d year of his age, B.C. 293, because the compositions of his rival Philemon obtained more applause than his own. Only eight of his numerous comedies were rewarded with a poetical prize. The name of his father was Dioplytus, and that of his mother Hegistrata. His fragments, with those of Philemon, were published by Clericus, 8vo, 1709. Quintil. 10, c. 2.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.—A man who wrote an account of embassies, &c.—A king of Bactria, whose ashes were divided among his subjects, &c.—An historian of Ephesus.—Another of Pergarus.—An Athenian general defeated at Ægospotamos by Lysander.—An Athenian sent to Sicily with Nicias.—A man put to death by Alexander for deserting a fortress of which he had the command.—An officer under Mithridates, sent against Lucullus.

Menapii, a people of Belgic Gaul, near the Mosæ. Cæs. B. Gall.

Menapiæ, a Persian exile, made satrap of Hyrcania by Alexander. Curt. 6, c. 4.

Menas, a freedman of Pompey the Great, who distinguished himself by the active and perfidious part which he took in the civil wars which were kindled between the younger Pompey and Augustus. When Pompey invited Augustus to his galley, Menas advised his master to seize the person of his enemy, and at the same time the Roman empire, by cutting the cables of his ship. "No," replied Pompey, "I would have approved of the measure if you had done it without consulting me; but I scorn to break my word." Suet. in Oct. Horace, ep. epod. 4, has ridiculed the pride of Menas, and recalled to his mind his former meanness and obscurity.

Menchères, the twelfth king of Memphis.

Mendes, a city of Egypt, near Lycopolis, on one of the mouths of the Nile, called the Mendesian mouth. Pan, under the form of a goat, was worshipped there with the greatest solemnity. It was unlawful to kill one of these animals, with which the Egyptians were not ashamed to have public commerce, to the disgrace of human nature, from the superstitious notion that such embraces had given birth to the greatest heroes of antiquity, as Alexander, Scipio, &c. Herodot. 2, c. 42 & 46.—Strab. 17.—Diad. 1.

Mencles, an orator of Alabanda in Caria, who settled at Rhodes. Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 53.—Strab. 14.

Mensolides, a detractor of the character of Epaminondas. C. Nep. in Epam.

Meneerates, a physician of Syracuse, famous for his vanity and arrogance. He was generally accompanied by some of his patients, whose disorders he had cured. He disguised one in the habit of Apollo, and the other in that of Esculapius, while he reserved for himself the title and name of Jupiter, whose power was extended over those inferior deities. He crowned himself like the master of the gods; and in a letter which he wrote to Philip king of Macedonia, he styled himself in these words, Meneerates Jupiter to king Philip, greeting. The Macedonian monarch answered, Philip to Meneerates, greeting, and better sense. Philip also invited him to one of his feasts, but when the meats were served up, a table was put separate for the physician, on which he was served only with perfumes and frankincense, like the father of the gods. This entertainment displeased Meneerates; he remembered that he was a mortal, and hurried away from the company. He lived about 360 years before the christian era. The book which he wrote on cures is lost. Allian. V, H, 10, c. 51.—Athen. 7, c. 13.—One of the generals of Seleucus.—A physician under Tiberius.—A Greek historian of Nysa, disciple to Aristarchus, B.C. 119. Strab. 16.—An Ephesian architect who wrote on agriculture. Varro de R. R.—An historian.—A man appointed to settle the disputes of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians in the eighth year of the Peloponnesian war. His father's name was Amphidorus.—An officer in the fleet of Pompey the son of Pompey the Great.

Menedotus, an officer of Alexander, killed by the Danaæ. Curt. 7, c. 6.—A Socratic philosopher of Eretria, who was originally a tent-maker, an employment which he left for the profession of arms. The persuasive eloquence and philosophical lectures of Plato had such an influence over him, that he gave up his offices in the state to cultivate literature. It is said that he died through melancholy when Antigonus, one of Alexander's generals, had made himself master of his country, B.C. 301, in the 74th year of his age. Some attribute his death to a different cause, and say that he was falsely accused of treason, for which he became so desperate that he died, after he had passed seven days without taking any aliments. He was called the Eretrian Bull, on account of his gravity. Strab. 9.—Diog.—A cynic philosopher of Lampascus, who said that he was come from hell to observe the sins and wickedness of mankind. His habit was that of the furies, and his behaviour was a proof of his insanity. He was the disciple of Colotes of Lampascus. Diog.—An officer of Lucullus.—A philosopher of Athens. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 29.

Menegotas, a boxer or wrestler in Philip of Macedonia's army, &c. Polæm.

Mensâi portus, a harbour on the coast of Africa, between Cyrene and Egypt. C. Nep. in Agg. 8.—Strab. 1.—Mons, a hill near Sparta, with a fortification, called Menelæum. Liv. 34, c. 28.

Mensâlisia, a festival celebrated at Therapsis in Læconia, in honour of Menelaus. He had there a temple, where he was worshipped with his wife Helen, as one of the supreme gods.

Mensâliæus, a king of Sparta, brother to Agamemnon. His father's name was Atreus, according to Homer, or, according to the more probable opinion of Hesiod, Apollodorus, &c., he was the son of Plisthenes and Ærope. Vid. Plisthenes. He was educated with his brother Agamemnon in the house of Atreus, but soon after the death of this monarch, Thyestes his brother usurped the kingdom, and banished the two children of Plis-thenes. Menelaus and Agamemnon came to the court of Cœneus king of Calydonia, who treated them with tenderness and paternal care. From Calydonia they went to Sparta, where, like the rest of the Grecian princes, they solicited the marriage of Helen the daughter of king Tyndarus. By the artifice and advice of Ulysses, Helen was permitted to choose a husband, and she fixed her eyes upon Menelaus, and married him, after her numerous suitors had solemnly bound themselves by an oath to defend her, and protect her person against the violence or assault of every intruder. Vid. Helena. As soon as the nuptials were celebrated, Tyndarus resigned the crown to his son-in-law, and their happiness was complete. This was, however, of short duration; Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised Paris the son of Priam to reward him with such a beauty. Vid. Paris. The arrival of Paris in Sparta was the cause of great revolutions. The absence of Menelaus in Crete gave opportunities to the Trojan prince to corrupt the fidelity of Helen, and to carry away home what the goddess of beauty had promised to him as his due. This action was highly resented by Menelaus; he reminded the Greek princes of their oath and solemn engagements when they courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and immediately all Greece took up arms to defend his cause. The combined forces assembled at Aulis in Bœotia, where they chose Agamemnon for their general, and Calchas for their high priest; and after their applications to the court of Priam for the recovery of Helen had proved fruitless, they marched to meet their enemies in the field. During the Trojan war Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage, and Paris must have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interposed and redeemed him from certain death. He also expressed his wish to engage Hector, but Agamemnon hindered him from fighting so powerful an adversary. In the tenth year of the Trojan war, Helen, as it is reported, obtained the forgiveness and the good graces of Menelaus by introducing him with Ulysses, the night that Troy was reduced to ashes, into the chamber of Deiphobus, whom she had married after the death of Paris. This perfidious conduct totally reconciled her to her first husband; and she returned with him to Sparta, during a voyage of eight years. He died some time after his return. He had a daughter called Hermione, and Nicomachus, according to some, by Helen, and a son called Megapenthes by a concubine. Some say that Menelaus went to Egypt on his return from the Trojan war to obtain Helen, who had been detained there by the king of the country. Vid. Helena. The palace which Menelaus once inhabited was still entire in the days of Pausanias, as well as the temple which had been raised to his memory by the people of Sparta. *Homer. Od. 4. &c. Il. 3. &c.—Apollod. 3. c. 10.—Paus. 3. c. 14 & 19.—Dionys. Cris. 2. &c.—Virg. Æn. 2. &c.—Quintil. Smyrn. 14.—Ovid. Heroid. 5 & 13.—Hygin. Fab. 79.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Propert. 2.—Sophocles.—A lieutenant of Ptolemy, set over Salamis. Polyan.—Paus.—A city of Egypt. Strab. 14.—A mathematician in the age of the emperor Trajan.*

MENANIUS AGRIPPA, a celebrated Roman who appeased the Roman populace in the infancy of the consular government by repeating the well-known fable of the belly and limbs. He flourished 495 B.C. Liv. 2. c. 16, 32, 33.—A Roman consul.—An insane person in the age of Horace.

MENOPHRON, a man who attempted to offer violence to his own mother. He was changed into a wild beast. Ovid. Met. 7. v. 387.

MENES, the first king of Egypt. He built the town of Memphis, as is generally supposed, and deserved, by his abilities and popularity, to be called a god after death. Herodot. 2. c. 1 & 90.—Diod. 1.

MENESTHŒI PORTUS, a town of Hispania Bœtica.

Menestheus, Menestheus, or Mnestheus, a son of Peres, who so insinuated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, that, during the long absence of Theseus, he was elected king. The lawful monarch at his return home was expelled, and Mnestheus established his usurpation by his popularity and great moderation. As he had been one of Helen's suitors, he went to the Trojan war at the head of the people of Athens, and died in his return in the island of Melos. He reigned 23 years B.C. 1205, and was succeeded by Demophoon the son of Theseus. Plut. in These.—A son of Iphicrates, who distinguished himself in the Athenian armies. C. Nep. in Tim.

MENESTHIUS, a Greek killed by Paris in the Trojan war.

Menetas, a man set governor over Babylon by Alexander. Curt. 5. c. 2.

MENINX, or Lotophagitis insula, now Zerbi, an island on the coast of Africa, near the Syrtis Minor. It was peopled by the people of Neritos, and thence called Neritia. Plin. 5. c. 7.—Strab. 17.—Sil. It. 3. v. 318.

Menippe, one of the Amazons who assisted Ætes, &c.

Menippides, a son of Hercules. Apollod.
Menippus, a cynic philosopher of Phœnicia. He was originally a slave, and obtained his liberty with a sum of money, and became one of the greatest usurers at Thebes. He grew so desperate from the continual reproaches and insults to which he was daily exposed on account of his meanness, that he destroyed himself. He wrote 13 books of satires, which have been lost. M. Varro composed satires in imitation of his style, and called them Menippean.—A native of Stratonicæ, who was preceptor to Cicero for some time. Cic. Br. 91.

Menius, a plebeian consul at Rome. He was the first who made the rostrum at Rome with the beaks (rostra) of the enemy's ships.—A son of Lycaon, killed by the same thunderbolt which destroyed his father. Ovid. Ib. 472.

Mennis, a town of Assyria abounding in bitumen. Curt. 5. c. 2.

Menodotus, a physician.—A Samian historian.

MENOCÆUS, a Theban, father of Hipponome, Jocasta, and Creon.—A young Theban, son of Creon. He offered himself to death when Tiresias, to ensure victory on the side of Thebes against the Argive forces, ordered the Thebans to sacrifice one of the descendants of those who sprang from the dragon's teeth, and he killed himself near the cave where the dragon of Mars had formerly resided. The gods required this sacrifice because the dragon had been killed by Cadmus, and no sooner was Creon dead than his countrymen obtained the victory. Stat. Theb. 10. v. 614.—Eurip. Phœn.—Apollod. 3. c. 6.—Cic. Tusc. 1. c. 98.—Sophocles in Antig.

Mencetes, the pilot of the ship Gyas, at the naval games exhibited by Æneas at the anniversary of his father's death. He was thrown into the sea by Gyas for his inattention, and saved himself by swimming to a rock. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 161, &c.—An Arcadian, killed by Turnus in the wars of Æneas. Ibid. 12, v. 517.

Menestides. Vid. Menestius.
Menestius, a son of Actor and Ægina after her amour with Jupiter. He left his mother and went to Opus, where he had, by Stenclæ, or, according to others, by Philomela or Polyæmela, Patroclus, often called from him Menestides. Menestius was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 4, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 307.—Hygin. fab. 97.

Menon, a Thessalian commander in the expedition of Cyrus the younger against his brother Artaxerxes. He was dismissed on the suspicion that he had betrayed his fellow-soldiers. Diod. 14.—A Thessalian refused the freedom of Athens, though he furnished a number of auxiliaries to the people.—The husband of Semiramis.—A sophist in the age of Socrates.—One of the first kings of Phrygia. Dionys. Hal.—A scholar of Phidias, &c.

Menophilus, a eunuch to whom Mithridates, when conquered by Pompey, entrusted the care of his daughter. Menophilus murdered the princess for fear of her falling into the enemy's hands. Amian. 16.

Mente, or Minthe. Vid. Minthe.
Mentes, a king of the Taphians in Ætolia, son of Anchialus, in the time of the Trojan war.

Mentisara, a town of Spain. Liv. 26, c. 17.

Mento, a Roman consul, &c.

Mentor, a faithful friend of Ulysses.—A son of Hercules.—A king of Sidonia, who revolted against Artaxerxes Ochus, and afterwards was restored to favour by his treachery to his allies, &c. Diod. 16.—An excellent artist in polishing cups and engraving flowers on them. Plin. 33, c. 11.—Mart. 9, ep. 63, v. 16.

Meryllus, a Macedonian set over the garrison which Antipater had stationed at Athens. He attempted in vain to corrupt the innocence of Phocion. Plut.

Mera, a priest of Venus. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 478.—A dog of Icarus, which by his cries showed Erigone where her murdered father had been thrown. Immediately after this discovery the daughter bung herself in despair, and the dog pined away, and was made a constellation in the heavens known by the name of Canis. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 363.—Hygin. fab. 130.—Ælian. Hist. 7, c. 28.

Mera, or Miora, one of the Atlantides, who married Tegeates son of Lycan. Paus. 8, c. 48.

Mercurii promontorium, a cape of Africa near Cipeæ. Liv. 26, c. 44. l. 29, c. 27.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

Mercurius, a celebrated god of antiquity, called Hermes by the Greeks. There were no less than five of this name according to Cicero; a son of Cœlus and Lux; a son of Valens and Coronus; a son of the Nile; a son of Jupiter and Maia; and another called by the Egyptians Thaut. Some add a sixth, a son of Bacchus and Proserpine. To the son of Jupiter and Maia, the actions of all the others have been probably attributed, as he is the most famous and the best known. Mercury was the messenger of the gods, and of Jupiter in particular; he was the patron of travellers and of shepherds; he conducted the souls of the dead into the infernal regions, and not only presided over tortors, merchants, declaimers, but he was also the god of thieves, pickpockets, and all dishonest persons. His name is derived a mercurus, because he was the god of merchandise among the Latins. He was born, according to the more received opinion, in Arcadia, on mount Cyllene, and in his infancy he was entrusted to the care of the Seasons. The day that he was born, or more probably the following day, he gave an early proof of his craftiness and dishonesty, in stealing away the oxen of Admetus which Apollo tended. He gave another proof of his thievish propensity, by taking also the quiver and arrows of the divine shepherd, and he increased his fame by robbing Neptune of his trident, Venus of her girdle, Mars of his sword, Jupiter of his sceptre, and Vulcan of many of his mechanical instruments. These specimens of his art recommended him to the notice of the gods, and Jupiter took him as his messenger, interpreter, and cup-bearer in the assembly of the gods. This last office he discharged till the promotion of Ganymede. He was presented by the king of heaven with a winged cap called petasus, and with wings for his feet called talaria. He had also a short sword called harpæ, which he lent to Perseus. With these he was enabled to go into whatever part of the universe he pleased with the greatest celerity; and besides, he was permitted to make himself invisible, and to assume whatever shape he pleased. As messenger of Jupiter he was entrusted with all his secrets. He was the ambassador and plenipotentiary of the gods, and he was concerned in all alliances and treaties. He was the confidant of Jupiter's amours, and he often was set to watch over the jealousy and intrigues of Juno. The invention of the lyre and its seven strings is ascribed to him. This he gave to Apollo, and received in exchange the celebrated caduceus with which the god of poetry used to drive the flocks of king Admetus. Vid. Caduceus. In the wars of the giants against the gods, Mercury showed himself brave, spirited, and active. He delivered Mars from the long confinement which he suffered from the superior power of the Aloides. He purified the Danaides of the murder of their husbands, he tied Ixion to his wheel in the infernal regions, he destroyed the hundred-eyed Argus, he sold Hercules to Omphale the queen of Lydia, he conducted Priam to the tent of Achilles, to redeem the body of his son Hector, and he carried the infant Bacchus to the nymphs of Nysa. Mercury had many surnames and epithets. He was called Cyllenius, Caduceator, Acaetos, from Acaeos, an Arcadian; Acaesius, Tricephalos, Triplex, Chthoosius, Camillus, Agoneus, Dellius, Arcas, &c. His children are also numerous as well as his amours. He was father of Autolyclus by Chione; of Myrtilus by Cleobula; of Libys by Libya; of Echion and Eurystus by Antianira; of Cephalus by Creusa; of Pnylis by Issa; and of Priapus, according to some. He was also father of Hermaphroditus by Venus; of Eudorus by Polimela; of Pan by Dryope, or Penelope. His worship was well established, particularly in Greece, Egypt, and Italy. He was worshipped at Tanagra in Boeotia, under the name of Criophorus, and represented as carrying a ram on his shoulders, because he delivered the inhabitants from a pestilence by telling them to carry a ram in that manner round the walls of their city. The Roman merchants yearly celebrated a festival on the 15th of May, in honour of Mercury, in a temple near the Circus Maximus. A pregnant sow was then sacrificed, and sometimes a calf, and particularly the tongues of animals were offered. After the votaries had sprinkled themselves with water with laurel leaves, they offered prayers to the divinity, and entreated him to be favourable to them, and to forgive whatever artful measures, false oaths, or falsehoods they had used or uttered in the pursuit of gain. Sometimes Mercury appears on monuments with a large cloak round his arm, or tied under his chin. The chief ensigns of his power and offices are his caduceus, his petasus, and his talapia. Sometimes he is represented sitting upon a crayfish, holding in one hand his caduceus, and in the other the claws of the fish. At other times he is like a young man without a beard, holding in one hand a purse, as being the tutelary god of merchants, with a cock on his wrists as an emblem of vigilance, and at his feet a goat, a scorpion, and a fly. Some of his statues represented him as a youth fascino erecto. Sometimes he rests his foot upon a tortoise. In Egypt his statues represented him with the head of a dog, whence he was often confounded with Anubis, and received the sacrifice of a stork. Offerings of milk and honey were made because he was the god of eloquence, whose powers were sweet and persuasive. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of speaking of which the tongue is the organ. Sometimes his statues represent him as without arms, because, according to some, the power of speech can prevail over everything, even without the assistance of arms. *Homer. Od. 1, &c. 11, 1, &c. He lived in the age of Osiris, and wrote 40 books on theology, medicine, and geography, from which Sanchoniathon the Phœnician historian has taken his theogonia. *Diod. 1, & 5.—Plut. de Isid. & Os.—Cic. 3, de Nat. D.

MERETRIX, a name under which Venus was worshipped at Abydos and at Samos, because both those places had been benefited by the intrigues or the influence of courtesans. Athen. 13.

MERIONES, a charioteer of Idomeneus king of Crete during the Trojan war, son of Molus, a Cretan prince, and Melphidia. He signalized himself before Troy, and fought with Deiphobus the son of Priam, whom he wounded. He was greatly admired by the Cretans, who even paid him divine honours after death. *Horat. 1, od. 6, v. 15.—Homer. Il. 2, &c.—Dictys Crest. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 1.—*A brother of Jason son of Æson, famous for his great opulence and for his avarice. Polyen. 6, c. 1.

MERMEROS, a centaur. *Ovid. Met. 12, v. 305.—*A Trojan, killed by Antilochus.—A son of Jason and Medea, who was fasher to Ithac of Corinth. Paus. 2, c. 3.

MERMNADÆ, a race of kings in Lydia, of which Gyges was the first. They sat on the Lydian throne till the reign of Cræsus, who was conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. They were descendants of the Heracleidæ, and probably received the name of Mermnades from Mermnas, one of their own family. They were descended from Lemnos, or, according to others, from Agelaus, the son of Omphale by Hercules. Herodot. 1, c. 7 & 14.

MEROE, now Nuabia, an island of Æthiopia, with a town of the same name, celebrated for its wines. Its original name was Saba, and Cambyses gave it that of Meroe from his sister. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 31.—Plin. 2, c. 173.—Mela. 1.—Lucan. 4, v. 3, 33. l. 20, v. 163 & 303.

MEROPE, one of the Atlantides. She married Sisyphus son of Æolus, and, like her sisters, was changed into a constellation after death. Vid. Pleiades. It is said, that in the constellation of the Pleiades the star of Merope appears more dim and obscure than the rest, because she, as the poets observe, married a mortal, while her sisters married some of the gods or their descendants. *Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 275.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 199.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—*A daughter of Cypselus, who married Cresphontes king of Messenia, by whom she had three children. Her husband and two of her children were murdered by Polyphontes. The murderer obliged her to marry him, and she would have been forced to comply had not Epytus or Telephontes, her third son, revenged his father's death by assassinating Polyphontes. *Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 4, c. 3.—*A daughter of Genopion, beloved by Orion. *Apollod. 1, c. 4.—*A daughter of the Cebrenus, who married Æscasus the son of Priam.—A daughter of Erechtheus, mother of Dandalus. *Plut. in Thea.—*A daughter of Pandarus.—A daughter of the river Sangarius, who married king Priam.

MEROPE, a king of the island of Cos, who married Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was changed into an eagle and placed among the constellations. *Ovid. Met. 1, v. 763.—Apollod. 3.—Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 16.—*A celebrated soothsayer of Perseus in Troas, who foretold the death of his sons Adrastus and Amphius, who were engaged in the Trojan war. They slighted their father's advice, and were killed by Diomedes. *Homer. Il. 2.—*One of the companions of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 702.

MEROS, a mountain of India sacred to Jupiter. It is called by Pliny, 6, c. 22, Nysa. Bacchus was educated upon it, whence arose the fable that Bacchus was confined in the thigh (μηροῦ) of his father. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 13.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Diod. 1.

MERTIA CORN, a Roman who fought against the Gauls, and who was made consul by Octavius in the place of Cinna. He some time after killed himself in despair, &c. Plut.

MESABATES, a eunuch in Persia, flayed alive by order of Parysatis, because he had cut off the head and right hand of Cyrus. Plut. in Artax.

MESABIUS, a mountain of Bœotia, hanging over the Euripus. Paus. 9, c. 22.

MESAPIA, an ancient name of Bœotia.

MESAUBIUS, a servant of Eumæus the steward of Ulysses. Homer. Od. 14, v. 449.

MESEMBRIA, now Miseneia, a maritime city of Thrace. Hence Mesembriacus. *Ovid. 1, Trist. 6, v. 37.—*Another at the mouth of the Lissus.

MESENE, an island in the Tigris where Apamea was built, now Diabl. Plin. 6, c. 37.

MESOMEDIES, a lyric poet in the age of the emperor Antoninus.

MESOPOTAMIA, a country of Asia, which receives its name from its situation (μεῖνον ὠροῶν) between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. It is yearly inundated by the Euphrates, and the water properly conveyed over the country by canals. It is now called Diarbec. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 11.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 53.

Messala, a name of Valerius Corvinus, from his having conquered Messana in Sicily. This family was very ancient; the most celebrated was a friend of Brutus, who seized the camp of Augustus at Philippi. He was afterwards reconciled to Augustus, and died A.D. 9, in his 77th year. Plut.—Another consul, &c.—The father of Valeria, who married the dictator Sylla. Id.—A great flatterer at the court of Tiberius.—A governor of Syria.—A tribune in one of the Roman legions during the civil war between Vespasian and Vitellius, of which he wrote an historical account mentioned by Tacitus, Orat. 14.—A consul with Domitianus, &c.—A painter at Rome, who flourished B.C. 235.—A writer, whose book of Augusti progenie was edited 1210, L. Bat. 1648.

Messalina Valeria, a daughter of Messala Harbatus. She married the emperor Claudius, and disgraced herself by her cruelties and incontinence. Her husband's palace was not the only seat of her lasciviousness, but she prostituted herself in the public streets, and few men there were at Rome who could not boast of having enjoyed the favours of the impure Messalina. Her extravagancies at last irritated her husband; he commanded her to appear before him to answer all the accusations which were brought against her, upon which she attempted to destroy herself, and when her courage failed, one of the tribunes, who had been sent to her, despatched her with his sword, A.D. 48. It is in speaking of her debaucheries and lewdness that a celebrated satirist says,

Et lassata viris, necdum satiata, recessit.

Juv.—Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 37.—Suet. in Claud.—Dio.—Another, called also Statilia. She was descended from a consular family, and married the consul Atticus Vistinius, whom Nero murdered. She received with great marks of tenderness her husband's murderer and married him. She had married four husbands before she came to the imperial throne; and after the death of Nero she retired to literary pursuits and peaceful occupations. Otho courted her, and would have married her had he not destroyed himself. In his last moments he wrote her a very pathetic and consolatory letter, &c. Tacit. Ann.

Messallinus M. Valer., a Roman officer in the reign of Tiberius. He was appointed governor of Dalmatia, and rendered himself known by his opposition to Piso, and by his attempts to persuade the Romans of the necessity of suffering women to accompany the camps on their different expeditions. Tacit. Ann. 3.—One of Domitian's informers.—A flatterer of the emperor Tiberius.

Messana, an ancient and celebrated town of Sicily, on the straits which separate Italy from Sicily. It was anciently called Zancle, and was founded 1600 years before the christian era. The inhabitants, being continually exposed to the depredation of the people of Cuma, implored the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and with them repelled the enemy. After this victorious campaign, the Messenians entered Zancle, and lived in such intimacy with the inhabitants that they changed their name, and assumed that of the Messenians, and called their city Messana. Another account say that Anaxilaus tyrant of Rhegium made war against the Zancleans, with the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and that after he had obtained a decisive victory, he called the conquered city Messana in compliment to his allies, about 494 years before the christian era. After this revolution at Zancle, the Mamertini took possession of it, and made it the capital of the neighbouring country. Vid. Mamertini. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Romans, and was for some time the chief of their possessions in Sicily. The inhabitants were called Messanii, Messanienses, and Mamertini. The straits of Messana have always been looked upon as very dangerous, especially by the ancients, on account of the rapidity of the currents, and the irregular and violent flowing and ebbing of the sea. Strab. 6.—Mela, c. 7.—Paus. 4, c. 23.—Diod. 4.—Thucyd. 1, &c. Herodot. 6, c. 23. l. 7, c. 28.

Messapia, a country of Italy, between Tarentum and Brundisium. It is the same as Calabria. It received its name from Messapus the son of Neptune, who left a part of Bœotia called Messapia, and came to Italy, where he assisted the Rutulians against Æneas. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 513.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 691. l. 8, v. 6. l. 9, v. 27.

Messatia, a town of Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 18.

Messe, a town in the island of Cythera. Stat. 1, Theb. 4, v. 226.

Messia, a fountain of Thessaly. Strab. 9.

Messone, a daughter of Triopas king of Argos, who married Polycæon, son of Lelex king of Laconia. She encouraged her husband to levy troops, and to seize a part of Peloponnesus, which, after it had been conquered, received her name. She received divine honours after her death, and had a magnificent temple at Ithome, where her statue was made half of gold and half of Parian marble. Paus. 4, c. 1 & 13.

Messone, or Messenia, now Maura-Matru, a city in the Peloponnesus, the capital of the country called Messenia. The inhabitants have rendered themselves famous for the war which they carried on against the Spartans, and which received the appellation of the Messenian war. The first Messenian war arose from the following circumstances. The Messenians offered violence to some Spartan women, who had assembled to offer sacrifices in a temple which was common to both nations, and which stood on the borders of their respective territories; and, besides, they killed Teleclus the Spartan king, who attempted to defend the innocence of the females. This account, according to the Spartan tradition, is contradicted by the Messenians, who observe that Teleclus, with a chosen body of Spartans, assembled at the temple before mentioned, disguised in women's clothes, and all secretly armed with daggers. This hostile preparation was to surprise some of the neighbouring inhabitants; and in a quarrel which soon after arose, Teleclus and his associates were all killed. These quarrels were the cause of the first Messenian war, which began B.C. 743. It was carried on with vigour and spirit on both sides, and after many obstinate and bloody battles had been fought and continued for 19 years, it was at last finished by the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, a place which had stood a siege of 10 years, and been defended with all the power of the Messenians. The insults to which the conquered Messenians were continually exposed at last excited their resentment, and they resolved to shake off the yoke. They suddenly revolted, and the second Messenian war was begun 685 B.C., and continued 14 years. The Messenians at first gained some advantage, but a fatal battle in the third year of the war so totally disheartened them, that they fled to Ira, where they resolved to maintain an obstinate siege against their victorious pursuers. The Spartans were assisted by the Samians in besieging Ira, and the Messenians were at last obliged to submit to the superior power of their adversaries. The taking of Ira by the Lacedæmonians, after a siege of 11 years, put an end to the second Messenian war. Peace was re-established for some time in Peloponnesus, but after the expiration of 200 years, the Messenians attempted a third time to free themselves from the power of Lacedæmon, B.C. 465. At that time the Helots had revolted from the Spartans, and the Messenians, by joining their forces to these wretched slaves, looked upon their respective calamities as common, and thought themselves closely interested in each other's welfare. The Lacedæmonians were assisted by the Athenians, but they soon grew jealous of one another's power, and their political connection ended in the most inveterate enmity, and at last in open war. Ithome was the place in which the Messenians had a second time gathered all their forces, and though 30 years had already elapsed, both parties seemed equally confident of victory. The Spartans were afraid of storming Ithome, as the oracle of Delphi had threatened them with the greatest calamities if they offered any violence to a place which was dedicated to the service of Apollo. The Messenians, however, were soon obliged to submit to their victorious adversaries, B.C. 453, and they consented to leave their native country, and totally to depart from the Peloponnesus, solemnly promising that if they ever returned into Messenia, they would suffer themselves to be sold as slaves. The Messenians upon this, miserably exiled, applied to the Athenians for protection, and were permitted to inhabit Naupactus, whence some of them were afterwards removed to take possession of their ancient territories in Messenia, during the Peloponnesian war. The third Messenian war was productive of great revolutions in Greece, and though almost a private quarrel, it soon engaged the attention of all the neighbouring states, and kindled the flames of disension everywhere. Every state took up arms as if in its own defence, or to prevent additional power and dominion from being lodged in the hands of its rivals. The descendants of the Messenians at last returned to Peloponnesus, B.C. 370, after a long banishment of 300 years. *Paus. Messænia, a province of Peloponnesus, situate between Laconia, Elis, Arcadia, and the sea. Its chief city is Messena. Vid. Messena.

Nestor, a son of Perseus and Andromeda, who married Lysidice daughter of Pelops, by whom he had Hippoboe.—A son of Pericles, —of Priam. Apollod.

Messia, a town of Italy, in the country of the Sabines.

Metabus, a tyrant of the Privernates. He was father of Camilla, whom he consecrated to the service of Diana, when he had been banished from his kingdom by his subjects. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 540.

Metagitnia, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated by the inhabitants of Melite, who migrated to Attica. It receives its name from its being observed in the month called Metagitnion.

Metanira, the wife of Celeus king of Eleusis, who first taught mankind agriculture. She is also called Megaira. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Metapontum, a town of Lucania in Italy, founded about 1260 years B.C. by Metabus the father of Camilla, or Epeus, one of the companions of Nestor. Pythagoras retired there for some time, and perished in a sedition. Annibal made it his head-quarters when in that part of Italy, and its attachment to Carthage was afterwards severely punished by the Roman conquerors, who destroyed its liberties and independence. A few broken pillars of marble are now the only vestiges of Metapontum. Strab. 5.—Meta, 2, c. 4.—Justin. 12, c. 2.—Liv. 1, 8, 25, 27, &c.

Metapontus, a son of Sisyphus, who married Theana. Vid. Theana. Hygin. fab. 166.

Metaurus, now Metro, a town with a small river of the same name, in the country of the Brutii. The river Metaurus falls into the Tyrrhene sea above Sicily.—Another, in Umbria, famous for the defeat of Asdrubal by the consuls Livy and Nero. Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 38.—Meta, 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, v. 498.

Metella, the wife of Sylla.

Metelli, the surname of the family of the Cæcili at Rome, the most known of whom were:—A general who defeated the Achæans, took Thebes, and invaded Macedonia, &c.—Q. Cæcilius, who rendered himself illustrious by his successes against Jugurtha the Numidian king, from which he was surnamed Numidicus. He took, in this expedition, the celebrated Marius as his lieutenant, and he had soon cause to repent of the confidence he had placed in him. Marius raised himself to power by defaming the character of his benefactor, and Metellus was recalled to Rome, and accused of extortion and ill-management. Marius was appointed successor to finish the Numidian war, and Metellus was acquitted of the crimes laid to his charge before the tribunal of the Roman knights, who observed that the probity of his whole life and the greatness of his exploits were greater proofs of his innocence than the most powerful arguments. *Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Sallust. de Bell. Jug.—L. Cæcilius, another, who saved from the flames the palladium, when Vesta's temple was on fire. He was then high priest. He lost his sight and one of his arms in doing it, and the senate, to reward his zeal and piety, permitted him always to be drawn to the senate-house in a chariot, an honour which no one had ever before enjoyed. He also gained a great victory over the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and led in his triumph 13 generals and 120 elephants taken from the enemy. He was honoured with the dictatorship, and the office of master of horse, &c.—Q. Cæcilius Celer, another, who distinguished himself by his spirited exertions against Castiline. He married Clodia the sister of Cæsius, who disgraced him by her incontinence and lasciviousness. He died 57 years B.C. He was greatly lamented by Cicero, who shed tears at the loss of one of his most faithful and valuable friends. Cic. de Cal.—L. Cæcilius, a tribune in the civil wars of J. Cæsar and Pompey. He favoured the cause of Pompey, and opposed Cæsar when he entered Rome with a victorious army. He refused to open the gates of Saturn's temple, in which were deposited great treasures, upon which they were broken open by Cæsar, and Metellus retired, when threatened with death.—Q. Cæcilius, the grandson of the high priest, who saved the palladium from the flames, was a warlike general, who, from his conquest of Crete and Macedonia, was surnamed Macedonicus. He had six sons, of whom four are particularly mentioned by Plutarch.—Q. Cæcilius, surnamed Balcanicus, from his conquest of the Balcanes.—*

L. Cæcilius, surnamed Diadematus, but supposed the same as that called Lucius with the surname of Dalmaticus, from a victory obtained over the Dalmatians during his consulship with Mutius Scaevola.—Caius Cæcilius, surnamed Caprarius, who was consul with Carbo, A.U.C. 64.—The fourth was Marcus, and of these four brothers it is remarkable, that two of them triumphed in one day, but over what nations is not mentioned by Eutrop. 4.—Nepos, a consul, &c.—Another, who accused C. Curio, his father's detractor, and who also vented his resentment against Cicero when going to banishment.—Another, who, as tribune, opposed the ambition of Julius Cæsar.—A general of the Roman armies against the Sicilians and Carthaginians. Before he marched he offered sacrifices to all the gods, except Vesta, for which neglect the goddess was so incensed that she demanded the blood of his daughter Metella. When Metella was going to be immolated, the goddess placed a heifer in her place, and carried her to a temple at Lanuvium, of which she became the priestess.—Lucius Cæcilius, or Quintus, surnamed Creticus, from his conquest in Crete, B.C. 66, is supposed by some to be the son of Metellus Macedonicus.—Cimber, one of the conspirators against J. Cæsar. It was he who gave the signal to attack and murder the dictator in the senate-house.—Pius, a general in Spain, against Sertorius, on whose head he set a price of 100 talents, and 20,000 acres of land. He distinguished himself also in the Marian war, and was high priest. He obtained the name of Pius from the sorrow he showed during the banishment of his father Metellus Numidicus, whom he caused to be recalled. Pater. 2, c. 5.—Sallust. Jug. 44.—A consul who commanded in Africa, &c. *Val. Metarmia, a daughter of Pygmalion king of Cyprus, and mother of Adonis by Cinyras, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Metion, the father of Phorbas, &c. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

Methodius, a bishop of Tyre, who maintained a controversy against Porphyry. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, fol. 1657.

Methone, a town of Peloponnesus, where king Philip gained his first battle over the Athenians, B.C. 336.—A town of Macedonia, south of Pella, in the siege of which, according to Justin. 7, c. 6, Philip lost his right eye.—Another in Magnesia. Hom. Il. 2, v. 71.

Methydrium, a town of Peloponnesus, near Megalopolis. Val. Flacc.

Methymna (now Porto Petero), a town of the island of Lesbos, which received its name from a daughter of Marceareus. It is the second city of the island in greatness, population, and opulence, and its territory is fruitful, and the wines it produces excellent. It was the native place of Anon. When the whole island of Lesbos revolted from the power of the Athenians, Methymna alone remained firm to its ancient allies. Diad. 5.—Thucyd. 3.—Herod. 2, sat. 8, v. 50.—Virg. G. 3, v. 00.

Metiadusa, a daughter of Eupalamus, who married Cæcrops, by whom she had Pandion. Apollod. 3, c. 15.

Metilla lex, was enacted A.U.C. 536, to settle the power of the dictator, and of his master of horse, within certain bounds.

Metilli, a patrician family, brought from Alba to Rome by Tullus Hostilius. Dionys. Hal.

Metilius, a man who accused Fabius Maximus before the senate, &c.

Metiöchus, a son of Miltiades, who was taken by the Phœnicians, and given to Darius king of Persia. He was tenderly treated by the monarch, though his father had conquered the Persian armies in the plains of Marathon. Plut.—Herodot. 6, c. 41.—An Athenian entrusted with the care of the roads, &c. Plut.

Metion, a son of Erechtheus king of Athens and Praxitheia. He married Alcipe daughter of Mars and Agraulös. His sons drove Pandion from the throne of Athens, and were afterwards expelled by Pandion's children. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 2, c. 6.

Metis, one of the Oceanides. She was Jupiter's first wife, celebrated for her great prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods. Jupiter, who was afraid lest she should bring forth into the world a child more cunning and greater than himself, devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Some time after this adventure the god had his head opened, from which issued Minerva, armed from head to foot. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 2, Metis gave a portion to Saturn, and obliged him to throw up the children whom he had devoured. Hesiod. Theog. v. 890.—Apollod. 7, c. 3.—Hygin.

Metisinos, a charioteer to Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 469.

Metius Curtius, one of the Sabines who fought against the Romans, on account of the stolen virgins.—Suffetius, a dictator of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. He fought against the Romans, and at last, finally to settle their disputes, he proposed a single combat between the Horatii and Curiatii. The Albans were conquered, and Metius promised to assist the Romans against their enemies. In a battle against the Veientes and Fidenates, Metius showed his infidelity by forsaking the Romans at the first onset, and retired to a neighbouring eminence, to wait for the event of the battle, and to fall upon whatever side proved victorious. The Romans obtained the victory, and Tullus ordered Metius to be tied between two chariots, which were drawn by four horses two different ways, and his limbs were torn away from his body, about 669 years before the christian era. Liv. 1, c. 23, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 642.—A critic. Vid. Tarpa.—Carus, a celebrated informer under Domitian, who enriched himself with the plunder of those who were sacrificed to the emperor's suspicion.

Metœois, festivals instituted by Theseus in commemoration of the people of Attica having removed to Athens.

Meton, an astrologer and mathematician of Athens. His father's name was Pausanias. He refused to go to Sicily with his countrymen, and pretended to be insane, because he foresaw the calamities that attended that expedition. In a book called Enneadecaterides, or the cycle of 19 years, he endeavoured to adjust the course of the sun and the moon, and supported that the solar and lunar years could regularly begin from the same point in the heavens. This is called by the moderns the golden numbers. He flourished B.C. 432. Vitruv. 1.—Plut. in Nicid.—A native of Tarentum, who pretended to be intoxicated that he might draw the attention of his countrymen, when he wished to dissuade them from making an alliance with king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrr.

Metope, the wife of the river Sangarius. She was mother of Hecuba.—The daughter of Lædon, who married the Asopus.—A river of Arcadia.

Metra, the daughter of Eresichthon, a Thesalian prince, beloved by Neptune. When her father had spent all his fortune to gratify the canine hunger under which he laboured, she prostituted herself to her neighbours, and received for reward oxen, goats, and sheep, which she presented to Eresichthon. Some say that she had received from Neptune the power of changing herself into whatever animal she pleased, and that her father sold her continually to gratify his hunger, and that she instantly assumed a different shape, and became again his property. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 21.

Metragyrte, one of the names of Tellus, or Cybele.

Metrobolus, a player greatly favoured by Sylla. Plut.

Metrocles, a pupil of Theophrastus, who had the care of the education of Cleombrotus and Cleomenes. He suffocated himself when old and infirm. Diog.

Metrodorus, a physician of Chios, B.C. 444. He was the disciple of Democritus, and had Hippocrates among his pupils. His compositions on medicine, &c., are lost. He supported that the world was eternal and infinite, and denied the existence of motion. Diog.—A painter and philosopher of Stratonice, B.C. 172. He was sent to Paulus Æmylius, who, after the conquest of Perseus, demanded of the Athenians a philosopher and a painter; the former to instruct his children, and the latter to make a painting of his triumphs. Metrodorus was sent, as in him alone were united the philosopher and the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.—Cic. 5. De Finib. 1. De Orat. 4. Acad.—Diod. in Epic.—A friend of Mithridates, sent as ambassador to Tigranes king of Armenia. He was remarkable for his learning, moderation, humanity, and justice. He was put to death by his royal master for his infidelity, B.C. 72. Strab.—Plut.—Another, of a very retentive memory.

Metrophanes, an officer of Mithridates, who invaded Euboea, &c.

Metropolis, a town of Phrygia on the Mæander.—Another of Thessaly near Pharsalia.

Mettius, a chief of the Gauls, imprisoned by J. Cæsar. Cæs. Bell. G.

Mettus. Vid. Metius.

Metulum, a town of Liburnia, in besieging of which Augustus was wounded. Div. 49.

Mevania, now Brevagna, a town of Umbria, on the Clitumnus, the birthplace of the poet Propertius. Lucan. 1, v. 473.—Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 124.

Mævius, a wretched poet. Vid. Mævius.

Mevontius, a king of the Tyrrhenians when Æneas came into Italy. He was remarkable for his cruelties, and put his subjects to death by slow tortures, or sometimes tied a man to a dead corpse face to face, and suffered him to die in that condition. He was expelled by his subjects, and fled to Turnus, who employed him in his war against the Trojans. He was killed by Æneas, with his son Lausus. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 15.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 648. l. 8, v. 482.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 881.

Micipsa, a king of Numidia, son of Masinissa, who, at his death, B.C. 119, left his kingdom between his sons Adherbal and Hiempsal, and his nephew Jugurtha. Jugurtha abused his uncle's favours by murdering his two sons. Sallust. de Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 1.—Plut. in Gr.

Mioythus, a youth through whom Diomedon, by order of the Persian king, made an attempt to bribe Epaminondas. C. Nep. in Epam. 4.—A slave of Anaxilus of Rhegium. Herodot. 7, c. 170.

Midas, a king of Phrygia, son of Gordius, or Gorgius. In the early part of his life, according to some traditions, he found a large treasure, to which he owed his greatness and opulence. The hospitality he showed to Silenus the preceptor of Bacchus, who had been brought to him by some peasants, was liberally rewarded; and Midas, when he conducted the old man back to the god, was permitted to choose whatever recompence he pleased. He had the imprudence and the avarice to demand of the god that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted, but he was soon convinced of his injudicious choice; and when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away a present which must prove so fatal to the receiver. He was ordered to wash himself in the river Pactolus, whose sands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Some time after this adventure, Midas had the imprudence to support that Pan was superior to Apollo in singing and playing upon the flute, for which rash opinion the offended god changed his ears into those of an ass, to show his ignorance and stupidity. This Midas attempted to conceal from the knowledge of his subjects, but one of his servants saw the length of his ears, and being unable to keep the secret, and afraid to reveal it, apprehensive of the king's resentment, he opened a hole in the earth, and after he had whispered there that Midas had the ears of an ass, he covered the place as before, as if he had buried his words in the ground. On that place, as the poets mention, grew a number of reeds, which, when agitated by the wind, uttered the same sound that had been buried beneath, and published to the world that Midas had the ears of an ass. Some explain the fable of the ears of Midas by the supposition that he kept a number of informers and spies, who were continually employed in gathering every seditious word that might drop from the mouths of his subjects. Midas, according to Strabo, died of drinking hot bull's blood. This he did, as Plutarch mentions, to free himself from the numerous ill dreams which continually tormented him. Midas, according to some, was son of Cybele. He built a town, which he called Ancyra. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 5.—Plut. de Superst.—Strab. 1.—Hygin. fab. 191, 274.—Max. Tyr. 30.—Paus. 1, c. 4.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Herodot. 1, c. 14.—Elian. V. H. 4 & 12.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 36. l. 2, c. 37.

Midea, a town of Argolis. Paus. 6, c. 20.—Of Lycia. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 45.—Of Bœotia, drowned by the inundations of the lake Copais. Strab. 8.—A nymph, who had Aspleidon by Neptune. Paus. 9, c. 38.—A mistress of Electryon. Apollod.

Milænon, a youth who became enamoured of Atalanta. He is supposed by some to be the same as Meleager or Hippomanes. Ovid. Art. Am. 2, v. 188.—A son of Amphidamas.

Milæsi, the inhabitants of Miletus. Vid. Miletus.

Milestorum murus, a place of Egypt, at the entrance of one of the mouths of the Nile.

Milesius, a surname of Apollo.—A native of Miletus.

Milētium, a town of Calabria, built by the people of Miletus of Asia.—A town of Crete. Homer. Il. 2, v. 154.

Milētus, a son of Apollo, who fled from Crete to avoid the wrath of Minos, whom he meditated to dethrone. He came to Caria, where he built a city which he called by his own name. Some suppose that he only conquered a city there called Anactoria, which assumed his name. They further say, that he put the inhabitants to the sword, and divided the women among his soldiers. Cyanea, a daughter of the Mæander, fell to his share. Strab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 446.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.—A celebrated town of Asia Minor, the capital of all Ionia, situate about 10 stadia south of the mouth of the river Mæander, near the sea coast on the confines of Ionia and Caria. It was founded by a Cretan colony under Miletus, or, according to others, by Neleus the son of Codrus, or by Sarpedon, Jupiter's son. It has successively been called Lelegis, Pithyusa, and Anactoria. The inhabitants, called Milēsi, were very powerful, and long maintained an obstinate war against the kings of Lydia. They early applied themselves to navigation, and planted no less than 80 colonies, or, according to Seneca, 380, in different parts of the world. Miletus gave birth to Thales, Anaximenes, Anaximander, Hecateus, Timotheus the musician, Pittacus, one of the seven wise men, &c. Miletus was also famous for a temple and an oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and for its excellent wool, with which were made stuffs and garments, held in the highest reputation, both for softness, elegance, and beauty. The words Milēsia fabiua, or Milēsiaca, were used to express wanton and ludicrous plays. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 473.—Capitola. in Alb. 11.—Virg. G. 3, v. 306.—Strab. 15.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Mela. 1, c. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Senec. de Consul. ad Alb.

Milichus, a freedman who discovered Piso's conspiracy against Nero. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 54.

Milinus, a Cretan king, &c.

Milionia, a town of the Samnites, taken by the Romans.

Milo, a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy. His father's name was Dioximus. He early accustomed himself to carry the greatest burdens, and by degrees became a monster in strength. It is said that he carried on his shoulders a young bullock four years old, for above 40 yards, and afterwards killed it with one blow of his fist, and ate it up in one day. He was seven times crowned at the Pythian games, and six at Olympia. He presented himself a seventh time, but no one had the courage or boldness to enter the lists against him. He was one of the disciples of Pythagoras, and to his uncommon strength the learned preceptor and his pupils owed their life. The pillar which supported the roof of the school suddenly gave way, but Milo supported the whole weight of the building, and gave the philosopher and his auditors time to escape. In his old age Milo attempted to pull up a tree by the roots and break it. He partly effected it, but his strength being gradually exhausted, the tree, when half cleft, re-united, and his hands remained pinched in the body of the tree. He was then alone, and being unable to disentangle himself, he was eaten up by the wild beasts of the place, about 300 years before the christian era. Ovid. Met. 15.—Cic. de Senect.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Strab. 16.—Paus. 6, c. 11.—T. Annus, a native of Lanuvium, who attempted to obtain the consul- ship at Rome by intrigue and seditious tumults. Clodius the tribune opposed his views, yet Milo would have succeeded had not an unfortunate event totally frustrated his hopes. As he was going into the country, attended by his wife and a numerous retinue of gladiators and servants, he met on the Appian road his enemy Clodius, who was returning to Rome with three of his friends and some domestics completely armed. A quarrel arose between the servants. Milo supported his attendants, and the dispute became general. Clodius received many severe wounds, and was obliged to retire to a neighbouring cottage. Milo pursued his enemy in his retreat, and ordered his servants to despatch him. Eleven of the servants of Clodius shared his fate, as also the owner of the house who had given them a reception. The body of the murdered tribune was carried to Rome, and exposed to public view. The enemies of Milo inveighed bitterly against the violence and barbarity with which the sacred person of a tribune had been treated. Cicero undertook the defence of Milo, but the continual clamours of the friends of Clodius, and the sight of an armed soldiery, which surrounded the seat of judgment, so terrified the orator, that he forgot the greatest part of his arguments, and the defence he made was weak and injudicious. Milo was condemned and banished to Massilia. Cicero soon after sent his exiled friend a copy of the oration which he had delivered in his defence, in the form in which we have it now; and Milo, after he had read it, exclaimed, "O Cicero, hadst thou spoken before my accusers in those terms, Milo would not be now eating figs at Marseilles." The friendship and cordiality of Cicero and Milo were the fruits of long intimacy and familiar intercourse. It was by the successful labours of Milo that the orator was recalled from banishment and restored to his friends. Cic. pro Milon.—Paterc. 2, c. 47 & 68.—Dio. 40.—A general of the forces of Pyrrhus. He was made governor of Tarentum, and that he might be reminded of his duty to his sovereign, Pyrrhus sent him as a present a chain, which was covered with the skin of Nicias the physician, who had perfidiously offered the Romans to poison his royal master for a sum of money. Polyæn. 8, &c.—A tyrant of Pisa in Elis, thrown into the river Alpheus by his subjects for his oppression. Ovid. in Ib. v. 325.

Milōnius, a drunken buffoon at Rome, accustomed to dance when intoxicated. Horat. 2, sat. 1, v. 24.

Miltas, a soothsayer, who assisted Dion in explaining prodigies, &c.

Miltiades, an Athenian, son of Cypselus, who obtained a victory in a chariot race at the Olympic games, and led a colony of his countrymen to the Chersonesus. The causes of this appointment are striking and singular. The Thracian Dolonci, harassed by a long war with the Absynthians, were directed by the oracle of Delphi to take for their king the first man they met in their return home, who invited them to come under his roof and partake of his entertainments. This was Miltiades, whom the appearance of the Dolonci, their strange arms and garments, had struck. He invited them to his house, and was made acquainted with the commands of the oracle. He obeyed, and when the oracle of Delphi had approved a second time the choice of the Dolonci, he departed for the Chersonesus, and was invested by the inhabitants with sovereign power. The first measure he took was to stop the further incursions of the Absynthians, by building a strong wall across the isthmus. When he had established himself at home, and fortified his dominions against foreign invasion, he turned his arms against Lampascus. His expedition was unsuccessful; he was taken in an ambush, and made prisoner. His friend Croesus king of Lydia was informed of his captivity, and he procured his release by threatening the people of Lampascus with his severest displeasure. He lived a few years after he had recovered his liberty. As he had no issue, he left his kingdom and his possessions to Stesagoras the son of Cimon, who was his brother by the same mother. The memory of Miltiades was greatly honoured by the Dolonci, and they regularly celebrated festivals and exhibited shows in commemoration of a man to whom they owed their greatness and preservation. Some time after Stesagoras died without issue, and Miltiades the son of Cimon, and the brother of the deceased, was sent by the Athenians with one ship to take possession of the Chersonesus. At his arrival Miltiades appeared mournful, as if lamenting the recent death of his brother. The principal inhabitants of the country visited the new governor to condole with him; but their confidence in his sincerity proved fatal to them. Miltiades seized their persons, and made himself absolute in Chersonesus; and to strengthen himself he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of Olorus the king of the Thracians. His prosperity, however, was of short duration. In the third year of his government his dominions were threatened by an invasion of the Scythian Nomades, whom Darius had some time before irritated by entering their country. He fled before them, but as their hostilities were but momentary, he was soon restored to his kingdom. Three years after he left Chersonesus and set sail for Athens, where he was received with great applause. He was present at the celebrated battle of Marathon, in which all the chief officers ceded their power to him, and left the event of the battle to depend upon his superior abilities. He obtained an important victory [Vid. Marathon] over the more numerous forces of his adversaries; and when he had demanded of his fellow-citizens an olive crown as the reward of his valour in the field of battle, he was not only refused, but severely reprimanded for presumption. The only reward, therefore, that he received for a victory which proved so beneficial to the interests of universal Greece, was in itself simple and inconsiderable, though truly great in the opinion of that age. He was represented in the front of a picture among the rest of the commanders who fought at the battle of Marathon, and he seemed to exhort and animate his soldiers to fight with courage and intrepidity. Some time after Miltiades was entrusted with a fleet of 70 ships, and ordered to punish those islands which had revolted to the Persians. He was successful at first, but a sudden report that the Persian fleet was coming to attack him, changed his operations as he was besieging Paros. He raised the siege and returned to Athens, where he was accused of treason, and particularly of holding a correspondence with the enemy. The falsity of these accusations might have appeared, if Miltiades had been able to come into the assembly. A wound which he had received before Paros detained him at home, and his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, became more eager in their accusations and louder in their clamours. He was condemned to death, but the rigour of the sentence was retracted on the recollection of his great services to the Athenians, and he was put into prison till he had paid a fine of 50 talents to the state.

His inability to discharge so great a sum detained him in confinement, and soon after his wounds became incurable, and he died about 80 years before the christian era. His body was ransomed by his son Cimon, who was obliged to borrow and pay the 50 talents, to give his father a decent burial. The crimes of Miltiades were probably aggravated in the eyes of his countrymen when they remembered how he made himself absolute in Chersonesus; and in condemning the barbarity of the Athenians towards a general who was the source of their military prosperity, we must remember the jealousy which ever reigns among a free and independent people, and how watchful they are in defence of the natural rights which they see wrested from others by violence and oppression. Cornelius Nepos has written the life of Miltiades the son of Cimon; but his history is incongruous and not authentic; and the author, by confounding the actions of the son of Cimon with those of the son of Cypselus, has made the whole dark and unintelligible. Greater reliance in reading the actions of both the Miltiades is to be placed on the narration of Herodotus, whose veracity is confirmed, and who was indisputably more informed and more capable of giving an account of the life and exploits of men who flourished in his age, and of which he could see the living monuments. Herodotus was born about six years after the famous battle of Marathon, and C. Nepos, as a writer of the Augustan age, flourished about 450 years after the age of the father of history. *C. Milyas, a country of Asia Minor, better known by the name of Lycia. Its inhabitants, called Milyades, and afterwards Solymi, were among the numerous nations which formed the army of Xerxes in his invasion of Greece.—Herodot.—Cic. Verr. 1, c. 38.

Mimallones, the Bacchanals, who, when they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus, put horns on their heads. They are also called Mimallonides, and some derive their name from the mountain Mimas. Pers. 1, v. 99.—Ovid. A. A. v. 542.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 660.

Mimas, a giant whom Jupiter destroyed with thunder. Horat. 2, od. 4.—A high mountain of Asia Minor, near Colophon. Ovid. Æn. 10, v. 702.

Mimnermus, a Greek poet and musician of Colophon in the age of Solon. He chiefly excelled in elegiac poetry, whence some have attributed the invention of it to him; and, indeed, he was the poet who made elegy an amorous poem, instead of a mournful and melancholy tale. In the expression of love, Propertius prefers him to Homer, as this verse shows:

Plus in amore valet Mimnermi versas Homero.

In his old age Mimnermus became enamoured of a young girl called Nanno. Some few fragments of his poetry remain, collected by Stobæus. He is supposed by some to be the inventor of the pentameter verse, which others, however, attribute to Callinus or Archilochus. The surname of Ligustades, Λιγυστῆδης (shrill-voiced), has been applied to him, though some imagine the word to be the name of his father. Strab. 1 & 14.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Diog. l.—Proper. 1, el. 9, v. 11.—Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 65.

Minikrus, a commander of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He was defeated by the Athenians, and died 410 B.C. Plut.

Minides, the daughters of Minyas or Mineus, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia. They were three in number, Leuconoe, Leucippe, and Alcithoe. Ovid calls the two first Clymene and Iris. They deified the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god inspired them with an unconquerable desire of eating human flesh. They drew lots which of them should give up her son as food to the rest. The lot fell upon Leucippe, and she gave up her son Hippasus, who was instantly devoured by the three sisters. They were changed into bats. In commemoration of this bloody crime, it was usual among the Orchomenians for the high priest, as soon as the sacrifice was finished, to pursue, with a drawn sword, all the women who had entered the temple, and even to kill the first he came up to. Ovid, Met. 4, fab. 12.—Plut. Quæst. Gr. 38.

Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, was, and all the liberal arts, was produced from Jupiter's brain without a mother. The god, as it is reported, married Metis, whose superior prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods, made him apprehend that the children of such a union would be of a more exalted nature, and more intelligent than their father. To prevent this, Jupiter devoured Metis in her pregnancy, and some time after, to relieve the pains which he suffered in his head, he ordered Vulcan to cleave it open. Minerva came all armed and grown up from her father's brain, and immediately was admitted into the assembly of the gods, and made one of the most faithful counsellors of her father. The power of Minerva was great in heaven; she could hurl the thunders of Jupiter, prolong the life of men, bestow the gift of prophecy, and, indeed, she was the only one of all the divinities whose authority and consequence were equal to those of Jupiter. The actions of Minerva are numerous, as well as the kindnesses by which she endeared herself to mankind. Her quarrel with Neptune concerning the right of giving a name to the capital of Cæcopia deserves attention. The assembly of the gods settled the dispute by promising the preference to whichever of the two gave the most useful and necessary present to the inhabitants of the earth. Neptune, upon this, struck the ground with his trident, and immediately a horse issued from the earth. Minerva produced the olive, and obtained the victory by the unanimous voice of the gods, who observed that the olive, as the emblem of peace, is far preferable to the horse, the symbol of war and bloodshed. The victorious deity called the capital Athenæ, and became the tutelary goddess of the place. Minerva was always very jealous of her power, and the manner in which she punished the presumption of Arachne is well known. Vid. Arachne. The attempts of Vulcan to offer her violence, are strong marks of her virtue. Jupiter had sworn by the Styx to give to Vulcan, who had made him a complete suit of armour, whatever he desired. Vulcan demanded Minerva, and the father of the gods, who had permitted Minerva to live in perpetual celibacy, consented, but privately advised his daughter to make all the resistance she could to frustrate the attempts of her lover. The prayers and force of Vulcan proved ineffectual, and her chastity was not violated, though the god left on her body the marks of his passion, and, from the impurity which proceeded from this scuffle, and which Minerva threw down upon the earth, wrapped up in wool, was born Erichthon, an uncommon monster. Vid. Erichthonius. Minerva was the first who built a ship, and it was her zeal for navigation, and her care for the Argonauts, which placed the prophetic tree of Dodona behind the ship Argo, when going to Colchis. She was known among the ancients by many names. She was called Athena, Pallas (Vid. Pallas), Parthenos, from her remaining in perpetual celibacy; Tritonia, because worshipped near the lake Tritonis; Glaucois, from the blueness of her eyes; Agorea, from her presiding over markets; Hippiæ, because she first taught mankind how to manage the horse; Strateia and Area, from her martial character; Coryphænea, because born from Jupiter's brain; Sais, because worshipped at Sais, &c. Some attributed to her the invention of the flute, whence she was surnamed Andon, Luscinia, Musica, Salpiga, &c. She, as it is reported, once amused herself in playing upon her favourite flute before Juno and Vepus, but the goddesses ridiculed the distortion of her face in blowing the instrument. Minerva, convinced of the justness of their remarks by looking at herself in a fountain near mount Ida, threw away the musical instrument, and denounced a melancholy death to him who found it. Marsyas was the miserable proof of the veracity of her expressions. The worship of Minerva was universally established; she had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. Sais, Rhodes, and Athens particularly claimed her attention, and it is even said that Jupiter rained a shower of gold upon the island of Rhodes, which had paid so much veneration and such an early reverence to the divinity of his daughter. The festivals celebrated in her honour were solemn and magnificent. Vid. Panathenæa. She was invoked by every artist, and particularly such as worked in wool, embroidery, painting, and sculpture. It was the duty of almost every member of society to implore the assistance and patronage of a deity who presided over sense, taste, and reason. Hence the poets have had occasion to say, and,

Qui bene placuit Pallada, doctus erit.

Minerva was represented in different ways, according to the different characters in which she appeared. She generally appeared with a countenance full more of masculine firmness and composure, than of softness and grace. Most usually she was represented with a helmet on her head, with a large plume nodding in the air. In one hand she held a spear, and in the other a shield, with the dying head of Medusa upon it. Sometimes this Gorgon's head was on her breastplate, with living serpents writhing round it, as well as round her shield and helmet. In most of her statues she is represented as sitting, and sometimes she holds in one hand a distaff, instead of a spear. When she appeared as the goddess of the liberal arts she was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplus. Sometimes Minerva's helmet was covered at the top with the figure of a cock, a bird which, on account of his great courage, is properly sacred to the goddess of war. Some of her statues represented her helmet with a sphinx in the middle, supported on either side by griffins. In some medals, a chariot drawn by four horses, or sometimes a dragon or a serpent, with winding spires, appear at the top of her helmet. She was partial to the olive tree; the owl and the cock were her favourite birds, and the dragon among reptiles was sacred to her. The functions, offices, and actions of Minerva seem so numerous, that they undoubtedly originate in more than one person. Cicero speaks of five persons of this name; a Minerva, mother of Apollo; a daughter of the Nile, who was worshipped at Sais, in Egypt; a third, born from Jupiter's brain; a fourth, daughter of Jupiter and Coryphe; and a fifth, daughter of Pallas, generally represented with winged shoes. This last put her father to death because he attempted her virtue. Paus. 1, 2, 3, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 16. l. 3, od. 4.—Virg. Æn. 2, &c.—Strab. 6, 9, & 13.—Philost. Icon. 2.—*Ovid. Minervælla, festivals at Rome in honour of Minerva, celebrated in the months of March and June. During this solemnity scholars obtained some relaxation from their studious pursuits, and the present, which it was usual for them to offer to their masters, was called Minervæ, in honour of the goddess Minerva, who patronized over literature. *Varro de R. Minnaei, a people of Arabia, on the Red sea. Plin. 12, c. 14.

Minos, a town of Sicily, built by Minos when he was pursuing Dædalus, and called also Heraclæa.—A town of Peloponnesus.—A town of Crete.

Minos, belonging to Minos. Crete is called Minos regna, as being the legislator's kingdom. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 14.—A patronymic of Ariadne. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 157.

Minos, a king of Crete, son of Jupiter and Europa, who gave laws to his subjects, B.C. 1406, which still remained in full force in the age of the philosopher Plato. His justice and moderation procured him the appellation of the favourite of the gods, the confidant of Jupiter, the wise legislator, in every city of Greece; and, according to the poets, he was rewarded for his equity, after death, with the office of supreme and absolute judge in the infernal regions. In this capacity, he is represented sitting in the middle of the shades and holding a sceptre in his hand. The dead plead their different causes before him, and the impartial judge shakes the fatal urn, which is filled with the destinies of mankind. He married Ithona, by whom he had Lycastes, who was the father of Minos II. Homer. Od. 19, v. 178.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 432.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. Fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 28.

Minos II., was a son of Lycastes, the son of Minos I. king of Crete. He married Pasiphae the daughter of Sol and Perseis, and by her he had many children. He increased his paternal dominions by the conquest of the neighbouring islands, but he showed himself cruel in the war which he carried on against the Athenians, who had put to death his son Androgeus. Vid. Androgeus. He took Megara by the treachery of Scylla (Vid. Scylla), and, not satisfied with a victory, he obliged the vanquished to bring him yearly to Crete seven chosen boys, and the same number of virgins, to be devoured by the Minotaur. Vid. Minotaur. This bloody tribute was at last abolished when Theseus had destroyed the monster. Vid. Theseus. When Dædalus, whose industry and invention had fabricated the labyrinth, and whose imprudence, in assisting Pasiphae in the gratification of her unnatural desires, had offended Minos, fled from the place of his confinement with wings (Vid. Dædalus), and arrived safe in Sicily, the incensed monarch pursued the offender, resolved to punish his infidelity. Cocalus king of Sicily, who had hospitably received Dædalus, entertained his royal guest with dissembled friendship; and that he might not deliver to him a man whose ingenuity and abilities he so well knew, he put Minos to death. Some say that it was the daughters of Cocalus who put the king of Crete to death, by detaining him so long in a bath till he fainted, after which they suffocated him. Minos died about 35 years before the Trojan war. He was father of Androgeus, Glaucus, and Deucalion, and two daughters, Phædra and Ariadne. Many authors have confounded the two monarchs of this name, the grandfather and the grandson, but Homer, Plutarch, and Diodorus prove plainly that they were two different persons. Paus. in Ach. 4.—Plut. in These.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 141.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Plut. in Min.—Athen.—Flacc. 14.

Minotaurus, a celebrated monster, half a man and half a bull, according to this verse of Ovid. A. A. 2, v. 24.

Semibovæque virum, semitaurumque bovem.

It was the fruit of Pasiphae's amour with a bull. Minos refused to sacrifice a white bull to Neptune, an animal which he had received from the god for that purpose. This offended Neptune, and he made Pasiphae the wife of Minos enamoured of this fine bull, which had been refused to his altar. Dædalus prostituted his talents in being subservient to the queen's unnatural desires, and, by his means, Pasiphae's horrible passions were gratified, and the Minotaur came into the world. Minos confined in the labyrinth a monster which convinced the world of his wife's lasciviousness and indecency, and reflected disgrace upon his family. The Minotaur usually devoured the chosen young men and maidens, whom the tyranny of Minos yearly extracted from the Athenians. Theseus delivered his country from this shameful tribute, when it had fallen to his lot to be sacrificed to the voracity of the Minotaur, and, by means of Ariadne, the king's daughter, he destroyed the monster, and made his escape from the windings of the labyrinth. The fabulous traditions of the Minotaur, and of the infamous commerce of Pasiphae with a favourite bull, have been often explained. Some suppose that Pasiphae was enamoured of one of her husband's courtiers, called Taurus, and that Dædalus favoured the passion of the queen by suffering his house to become the retreat of the two lovers. Pasiphae, some time after, brought twins into the world, one of whom greatly resembled Minos, and the other Taurus. In the natural resemblance of their countenance with that of their supposed fathers originated their name, and consequently the fable of the Minotaur. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 2—Hygin. fab. 40—Plut. in Thest.—Palaphat.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 26.

Minthe, a daughter of Cocytus, loved by Pluto. Proserpine discovered her husband's amour, and changed his mistress into an herb, called by the same name, mint. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 729.

Minturne, a town of Campania, between Sinuessa and Formia. It was in the marshes, in its neighbourhood, that Marius concealed himself in the mud, to avoid the partisans of Sylla. The people condemned him to death, but when his voice alone had terrified the executioner, they settled themselves compassionate, and favoured his escape. Marius was worshipped there; hence Mariæ regina applied to the place. Strab. 2—Mela, 2, c. 4—Liv. 8, c. 10. l. 10, c. 21. l. 27, c. 38—Pateri, 2, c. 14—Lucan. 2, v. 474.

Minutia, a vestal virgin, accused of debauchery on account of the beauty and elegance of her dress. She was condemned to be buried alive because a female supported the false accusation, A.U.C. 418. Liv. 8, c. 15.—A public way from Rome to Brundisium. Vid. Via.

Minutius Augurinus, a Roman consul slain in a battle against the Samnites.—A tribune of the people, who put Mænius to death when he aspired to the sovereignty of Rome. He was honoured with a brazen statue for causing the corn to be sold at a reduced price to the people. Liv. 4, c. 16—Plin. 18, c. 3.—Rufus, a master of horse to the dictator Fabius Maximus. His disobedience to the commands of the dictator was productive of an extension of his prerogative, and the master of the horse was declared equal in power to the dictator. Minutius, soon after this, fought with ill success against Annibal, and was saved by the interference of Fabius; which circumstance had such an effect upon him, that he laid down his power at the feet of his deliverer, and swore that he would never act again but by his directions. He was killed at the battle of Cannæ. Liv.—C. Nep. in Ann.—A Roman consul who defended Coriolanus from the insults of the people, &c.—Another, defeated by the Æqui, and disgraced by the dictator Cincinnatus.—An officer under Cæsar, in Gaul, who afterwards became one of the conspirators against his patron. Cæs. B. G. 6, c. 29.—A tribune who warmly opposed the views of C. Gracchus.—A Roman, chosen dictator, and obliged to lay down his office, because, during the time of his election, the sudden cry of a rat was heard.—A Roman, one of the first who were chosen questors.—Felix, an African lawyer, who flourished 207 A.D. He has written an elegant dialogue in defence of the christian religion, called Octavianus, from the principal speaker in it. This book was long attributed to Arnobius, and even printed as an eighth book (Octavus), till Balduinus discovered the imposition in his edition of Felix, 1560. The two last editions are that of Davier, 8vo, Can-tab. 1712; and of Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1709.

Minyas, a name given to the inhabitants of Orchomenos in Beotia, from Minyas king of the country. Orchomenos the son of Minyas gave his name to the capital of the country, and the inhabitants still retained their original appellation, in contradistinction to the Orchomenians of Arcadia. A colony of Orchomenians passed into Thessaly and settled in Iolchos; from which circumstance the people of the place, and particularly the Argonauts, were called Minyas. This name they received, according to the opinion of some, not because a number of Orchomenians had settled among them, but because the chief and noblest of them were descended from the daughters of Minyas. Part of the Orchomenians accompanied the sons of Codrus when they migrated to Ionia. The descendants of the Argonauts, as well as the Argonauts themselves, received the name of Minyas. They first inhabited Lemnos, where they had been born from the Lemnian women who had murdered their husbands. They were driven from Lemnos by the Pelasgi about 1160 years before the christian era, and came to settle in Laconia, from whence they passed into Calliste with a colony of Lacedæmonians. Hygin. fab. 14—Paus. 9, c. 6—Apollon. 1, Arg.—Herodot. 4, c. 145.

Minyas, a king of Beotia, son of Neptune and Tritogenia the daughter of Æolus. Some make him the son of Neptune and Callirhoe, or of Chryses, Neptune's son, and Chrysogetia the daughter of Halimus. He married Clytadora, by whom he had Presbon, Perclymenus, and Eteolymentus. He was father of Orchomenos, Diocithondes, and Athamas, by a second marriage with Phanassa the daughter of Paos. According to Plutarch and Ovid, he had three daughters, called Leucoone, Alcithoe, and Leucippe. They were changed into bats. *Vid. Mineides. Paus. 9, c. 36—Plut. Quæst. Græc. 38—Ovid. Minycus, a river of Thessaly, falling into the sea near Arene, called afterwards Orchomenus. Homer. Il. 11—Strab. 8.

Minyia, a festival observed at Orchomenus, in honour of Minyas the king of the place. The Orchomenians were called Minyæ, and the river upon whose banks their town was built, Mycos.—A small island near Patmos.

Misænum, or Misenus. Vid. Misenus.

Misenus, a son of Æolus, who was piper to Hector. After Hector's death he followed Æneas to Italy, and was drowned on the coast of Campania, because he had challenged one of the Tritons. Æneas afterwards found his body on the sea-shore, and buried it on a promontory which bears his name, now Miseno. There was also a town of the same name on the promontory, at the west of the bay of Naples, and it had also a capacious harbour, where Augustus and some of the Roman emperors generally kept stationed one of their fleets. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 239. l. 6, v. 164 & 234—Strab. 5—Mela, 2, c. 4—Liv. 24, c. 13—Tacit. H. 2, c. 9. An. 15, c. 51.

Misithenus, a Roman celebrated for his virtues and his misfortunes. He was father-in-law to the emperor Gordian, whose counsels and actions he guided by his prudence and moderation. He was sacrificed to the ambition of Philip, a wicked senator who succeeded him as prefect of the pretorian guards. He died A.D. 243, and left all his possessions to be appropriated for the good of the public.

Mithras, a god of Persia, supposed to be the sun, or, according to others, Venus Urania. His worship was introduced at Rome, and the Romans raised him altars, on which was this inscription, Deo Soli Mithræ, or Soli Deo invicto Mithræ. He is generally represented as a young man, whose head is covered with a turban, after the manner of the Persians. He supports his knee upon a bull that lies on the ground, and one of whose horns he holds in one hand, while with the other he plunges a dagger into his neck. *Stat. Mithrènes, a Persian who betrayed Sardes, &c. Curt. 3.

Mithridates I., was the third king of Pontus. He was tributary to the crown of Persia, and his attempts to make himself independent proved fruitless. He was conquered in a battle, and obtained peace with difficulty. Xenophon calls him merely a governor of Cappadocia. He was succeeded by Ariobarzanes, B.C. 363. Diad.—Xenoph.

Mithridates II., king of Pontus, was grandson to Mithridates I. He made himself master of Pontus, which had been conquered by Alexander, and had been ceded to Antigonus at the general division of the Macedonian empire among the conqueror's generals. He reigned about 26 years, and died at the advanced age of 84 years, B.C. 302. He was succeeded by his son Mithridates III. Some say that Antigonus put him to death, because he favoured the cause of Cassander. Appian.

Mithridates III., was son of the preceding monarch. He enlarged his paternal possessions by the conquest of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and died after a reign of 36 years. Flor.

Mithridates IV., succeeded his father Ariobarzanes, who was the son of Mithridates III.

Mithridates V., succeeded his father Mithridates IV., and strengthened himself on his throne by an alliance with Antiochus the Great, whose daughter Laodice he married. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces.

Mithridates VI., succeeded his father Pharnaces. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made alliance with the Romans. He furnished them with a fleet in the third Punic war, and assisted them against Aristonicus, who had laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. This fidelity was rewarded; he was called Euergetes, and received from the Roman people the province of Phrygia Major, and was called the friend and ally of Rome. He was murdered B.C. 123. Appian.

Mithridates VII., surnamed Eupator and The Great, succeeded his father Mithridates VI., though only at the age of 11 years. The beginning of his reign was marked by ambition, cruelty, and artifice. He murdered his own mother, who had been left by his father co-heiress of the kingdom, and he fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes against the poison with which his enemies at court attempted to destroy him. He early inured his body to hardship, and employed himself in many manly exercises, often remaining whole months in the country, and making the frozen snow and the earth the place of his repose. Naturally ambitious and cruel, he spared no pains to acquire himself power and dominion. He murdered the two sons whom his sister Laodice had had by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and placed one of his own children, only eight years old, on the vacant throne. These violent proceedings alarmed Nicomedes king of Bithynia, who married Laodice the widow of Ariarathes. He suborned a youth to be king of Cappadocia, as the third son of Ariarathes, and Laodice was sent to Rome to impose upon the senate, and assure them that her third son was still alive, and that his pretensions to the kingdom of Cappadocia were just and well grounded. Mithridates used the same arms of dissimulation. He also sent to Rome Gordius, the governor of his son, who solemnly declared before the Roman people, that the youth who sat on the throne of Cappadocia was the third son and lawful heir of Ariarathes, and that he was supported as such by Mithridates. This intricate affair displeased the Roman senate, and finally to settle the dispute between the two monarchs, the powerful arbiters took away the kingdom of Cappadocia from Mithridates, and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes. These two kingdoms, being thus separated from their original possessors, were presented with their freedom and independence; but the Cappadocians refused it, and received Ariobarzanes for king. Such were the first seeds of enmity between Rome and the king of Pontus. Vid. Mithridaticum bellum. Mithridates never lost an opportunity by which he might lessen the influence of his adversaries; and the more effectually to destroy their power in Asia, he ordered all the Romans that were in his dominions to be massacred. This was done in one night, and no less than 150,000, according to Plutarch, or 80,000 Romans, as Appian mentions, were made, at one blow, the victims of his cruelty. This universal massacre called aloud for revenge. Aquilius, and soon after Sylla, marched against Mithridates with a large army. The former was made prisoner, but Sylla obtained a victory over the king's generals, and another decisive engagement rendered him master of all Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, and Asia Minor, which had submitted to the victorious arms of the monarch of Pontus. This ill fortune was aggravated by the loss of about 200,000 men, who were killed in the several engagements that had been fought; and Mithridates, weakened by repeated ill success by sea and land, sued for peace from the conqueror, which he obtained on condition of defraying the expenses which the Romans had incurred by the war, and of remaining satisfied with the possessions which he had received from his ancestors. While these negotiations of peace were carried on, Mithridates was not unmindful of his real interests. His poverty, and not his inclinations, obliged him to wish for peace. He immediately took the field, with an army of 140,000 infantry and 16,000 horse, which consisted of his own forces and those of his son-in-law Tigranes king of Armenia. With such a numerous army, he soon made himself master of the Roman provinces in Asia; none dared to oppose his conquests, and the Romans, relying on his fidelity, had withdrawn the greatest part of their armies from the country. The news of his warlike preparations was no sooner heard, than Lucullus the consul marched into Asia, and without delay blocked up the camp of Mithridates, who was then besieging Cysicus. The Asiatic monarch escaped from him, and fled into the heart of his kingdom. Lucullus pursued him with the utmost celerity, and would have taken him prisoner after a battle, had not the avidity of his soldiers preferred the plundering of a mule loaded with gold, to the taking of a monarch who had exercised such cruelties against his countrymen, and shown himself so faithless to the most solemn engagements. After this escape, Mithridates was more careful about the safety of his person, and he even ordered his wives and sisters to destroy themselves, fearful of their falling into the enemy's hands. The appointment of Glabrio to the command of the Roman forces, instead of Lucullus, was favourable to Mithridates, and he recovered the greatest part of his dominions. The sudden arrival of Pompey, however, soon put an end to his victories. A battle, in the night, was fought near the Euphrates, in which the troops of Pontus laboured under every disadvantage. The engagement was by moonlight, and, as the moon then shone in the face of the enemy, the lengthened shadows of the arms of the Romans having induced Mithridates to believe that the two armies were close together, the arrows of his soldiers were darted from a great distance, and their efforts rendered ineffectual. A universal overthrow ensued, and Mithridates, bold in his misfortunes, rushed through the thick ranks of the enemy, at the head of 800 horsemen, 500 of which perished in the attempt to follow him. He fled to Tigranes, but that monarch refused an asylum to his father-in-law, whom he had before supported with all the collected forces of his kingdom. Mithridates found a safe retreat among the Scythians, and, though destitute of power, friends, and resources, yet he meditated the destruction of the Roman empire, by penetrating into the heart of Italy by land. These wild projects were rejected by his followers, and he sued for peace. It was denied to his ambassadors, and the victorious Pompey declared that, to obtain it, Mithridates must ask it in person. He scorned to trust himself into the hands of his enemy, and resolved to conquer or to die. His subjects refused to follow him any longer, and they revolted from him, and made his son Pharnaces king. The son showed himself ungrateful to his father, and even, according to some writers, he ordered him to be put to death. This unnatural treatment broke the heart of Mithridates; he obliged his wife to poison herself, and attempted to do the same himself. It was in vain; the frequent antidotes he had taken in the early part of his life strengthened his constitution against the poison, and, when this was unavailing, he attempted to stab himself. The blow was not mortal; and a Gaul, who was then present, at his own request, gave him the fatal stroke, about 63 years before the christian era, in the 72nd year of his age. Such were the misfortunes, abilities, and miserable end of a man, who supported himself so long against the power of Rome, and who, according to the declaration of the Roman authors, proved a more powerful and indefatigable adversary to the capital of Italy, than the great Annibal, and Pyrrhus, Perseus, or Antiochus. Mithridates has been commended for his eminent virtues, and censured for his vices. As a commander he deserves the most unbounded applause, and it may create admiration to see him waging war with such success during so many years against the most powerful people on earth, led to the field by a Sylla, a Lucullus, and a Pompey. He was the greatest monarch that ever sat on a throne, according to the opinion of Cicero; and, indeed, no better proof of his military character can be brought, than the mention of the great rejoicings which happened in the Roman armies and in the capital at the news of his death. No less than 12 days were appointed for public thanksgivings to the immortal gods, and Pompey, who had sent the first intelligence of his death to Rome, and who had partly hastened his fall, was rewarded with the most uncommon honours. Vid. Ampia lex. It is said that Mithridates conquered 24 nations, whose different languages he knew, and spoke with the same ease and fluency as his own. As a man of letters he also deserves attention. He was acquainted with the Greek language, and even wrote in that dialect a treatise on botany. His skill in physic is well known, and even now there is a celebrated antidote which bears his name, and is called Mithridate. Superstition, as well as nature, had united to render him great; and if we rely upon the authority of Justin, his birth was accompanied by the appearance of two large comets, which were seen for 70 days successively, and whose splendour eclipsed the mid-day sun, and covered the fourth part of the heavens. Justin. 37, c. 1, &c. Strab. Diod. 14. Flor. 3, c. 5, &c. Plut. *in Syll. Mithridaticum bellum, begun 89 years B.C., was one of the longest and most celebrated wars ever carried on by the Romans against a foreign power. The ambition of Mithridates, from whom it receives its name, may be called the cause and origin of it. His views upon the kingdom of Cappadocia, of which he was stripped by the Romans, first engaged him to take up arms against the republic. Three Romans officers, L. Cassius the proconsul, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius, opposed Mithridates with the troops of Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallo-græcia. The army of these provinces, together with the Roman soldiers in Asia, amounted to 70,000 men and 6000 horse. The forces of the king of Pontus were greatly superior to these; he led 250,000 foot, 40,000 horse, and 130 armed chariots into the field of battle, under the command of Neoptolemus and Archelaus. His fleet consisted of 400 ships of war, well manned and provisioned. In an engagement the king of Pontus obtained the victory, and dispersed the Roman forces in Asia. He became master of the greatest part of Asia, and the Hellespont submitted to his power. Two of the Roman generals were taken, and M. Aquilius, who was principally entrusted with the conduct of the war, was carried about in Asia, and exposed to the ridicule and insults of the populace, and at last put to death by Mithridates, who ordered melted gold to be poured down his throat, as a sur upon the avidity of the Romans. The conqueror took every possible advantage; he subdued all the islands of the Ægean sea, and, though Rhodes refused to submit to his power, yet all Greece was soon overrun by his general Archelaus, and made tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. Meanwhile the Romans, incensed against Mithridates on account of his perfidy, and of his cruelty in massacring 80,000 of their countrymen in one day all over Asia, appointed Sylla to march into the east. Sylla landed in Greece, where the inhabitants readily acknowledged his power; but Athens shut her gates against the Roman commander, and Archelaus, who defended it, defeated, with the greatest courage, all the efforts and operations of the enemy. This spirited defence was of short duration. Archelaus retreated into Boeotia, where Sylla soon followed him. The two hostile armies drew up in a line of battle near Chæronea, and the Romans obtained the victory, and of the almost innumerable forces of the Asiatics, no more than 10,000 escaped. Another battle in Thessaly, near Orchomenos, proved equally fatal to the king of Pontus. Dorylaeus, one of his generals, was defeated, and he soon after sued for peace. Sylla listened to the terms of accommodation, as his presence at Rome was now become necessary to quell the commotions and cabals which his enemies had raised against him. He pledged himself to the king of Pontus to confirm him in the possession of his dominions, and to procure him the title of friend and ally of Rome; and Mithridates consented to relinquish Asia and Paphlagonia, to deliver Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and Bithynia to Nicomedes, and to pay to the Romans 2000 talents to defray the expenses of the war, and to deliver into their hands 50 galleys, with all their rigging. Though Mithridates seemed to have re-established peace in his dominions, yet Fimbria, whose sentiments were contrary to those of Sylla, and who made himself master of the army of Asia by intrigue and oppression, kept him under continual alarms, and rendered the existence of his power precarious. Sylla, who had returned from Greece to ratify the treaty which had been made with Mithridates, rid the world of the tyrannical Fimbria; and the king of Pontus, awed by the resolution and determined firmness of his adversary, agreed to the conditions, though with reluctance. The hostile preparations of Mithridates, which continued in the time of peace, became suspected by the Romans, and Murena, who was left as governor of Asia in Sylla's absence, and who wished to make himself known by some conspicuous action, began hostilities by taking Comana and plundering the temple of Bellona. Mithridates did not oppose him, but he complained of this breach of peace before the Roman senate. Murena was publicly reprimanded; but, as he did not cease from hostilities, it was easily understood that he acted by the private directions of the Roman people. The king upon this marched against him, and a battle was fought, in which both the adversaries claimed the victory. This was the last blow which the king of Pontus received in this war, which is called the second Mithridatic war, and which continued for about three years. Sylla at that time was made perpetual dictator at Rome, and he commanded Murena to retire from the kingdom of Mithridates. The death of Sylla changed the face of affairs; the treaty of peace between the king of Pontus and the Romans, which had never been committed to writing, demanded frequent explanations, and Mithridates at last threw off the mask of friendship, and declared war. Nicomedes, at his death, left his kingdom to the Romans, but Mithridates disputed their right to the possessions of the deceased monarch, and entered the field with 200,000 men, besides a fleet of 400 ships in his ports, 16,000 horsemen to follow him, and 100 chariots armed with scythes. Lucullus was appointed over Asia, and entrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war. His valour and prudence showed his merit; and Mithridates, in his vain attempts to take Cyzicum, lost no less than 300,000 men. Success continually attended the Roman arms. The king of Pontus was defeated in several bloody engagements, and with difficulty saved his life, and retired to his son-in-law Tigranes king of Armenia. Lucullus pursued him; and, when his applications for the person of the fugitive monarch had been despised by Tigranes, he marched to the capital of Armenia, and terrified, by his sudden approach, the numerous forces of the enemy. A battle ensued. The Romans obtained an easy victory, and no less than 100,000 foot of the Armenians perished, and only five men of the Romans were killed. Tigranocerta, the rich capital of the country, fell into the conqueror's hands. After such signal victories, Lucullus had the mortification to see his own troops mutiny, and to be dispossessed of the command by the arrival of Pompey. The new general showed himself worthy to succeed Lucullus. He defeated Mithridates, and rendered his affairs so desperate, that the monarch fled for safety into the country of the Scythians; where, for a while, he meditated the ruin of the Roman empire, and, with more wildness than prudence, secretly resolved to invade Italy by land, and march an army across the northern wilds of Asia and Europe to the Apennines. Not only the kingdom of Mithridates had fallen into the enemy's hands, but also all the neighbouring kings and princes were subdued, and Pompey saw prostrate at his feet Tigranes himself, that king of kings, who had lately treated the Romans with such contempt. Meantime, the wild projects of Mithridates terrified his subjects; and they, fearful to accompany him in a march of above 3000 miles across a barren and uncultivated country, revolted, and made his son king. The monarch, forsaken in his old age, even by his own children, put an end to his life [Vid. Mithridates VII.], and gave the Romans cause to rejoice, as the third Mithridatic war was ended in his fall, B.C. 63. Such were the unsuccessful struggles of Mithridates against the power of Rome. He was always full of resources, and the Romans had never a greater or more dangerous war to sustain. The duration of the Mithridatic war is not precisely known. According to Justin, Orosius, Florus, and Eutropius, it lasted 40 years; but the opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapsed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates first entered the field against the Romans, till the time of his death. Appian. in Mithrid.—Justin. 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Orosius.—Paterc.—Dion.

Mitylēne and Hitylēne, the capital city of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from Mitylene the daughter of Macareus, a king of the country. It was greatly commended by the ancients for the stateliness of its buildings and the fruitfulness of its soil, but more particularly for the great men whom it produced. Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophrastus, Hellenicus, &c., were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a seat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honour of having educated many of the great men of Rome and Greece. In the Peloponnesian war the Mityleneans suffered greatly for their revolt from the power of Athens; and, in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldness to resist the Romans, and disdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. *Cic. de Leg. Momus, the god of pleasantry among the ancients, was son of Nox, according to Hesiod. He was continually employed in satirizing the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He blamed Vulcan, because in the human form which he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in his breast, by which whatever was done or thought there might be easily brought to light. He censured the house which Minerva had made, because the goddess had not made it movable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. In the bull which Neptune had produced, he observed that his blows might have been surer if his eyes had been placed near his horns. Venus herself was exposed to his satire; and when the sneering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddess, he observed, as she retired, that the noise of her feet was too loud, and greatly improper in the goddess of beauty. These illiberal reflections upon the gods were the cause that Momus was driven from heaven. He is generally represented raising a mask from his face, and holding a small figure in his hand. Hesiod. in Theog.—Lucian. in Herm.

Mona, an island between Britain and Hibernia, anciently inhabited by a number of Druids. It is supposed by some to be the modern island of Anglesey, and by others, the island of Man. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 18 & 29.

Moneses, a king of Parthia, who favoured the cause of M. Antony against Augustus. Horat. 3, od. 6, c. 9.—A Parthian in the age of Mithridates, &c.

Monda, a river between the Durus, and Tagus, in Portugal. Plin. 4, c. 22.

Monæus, a general killed by Jason at Colchis, &c.

Monæta, a surname of Juno among the Romans. She received it because she advised them to sacrifice a pregnant sow to Cybele, to avert an earthquake. *Cic. de Div. 1, c. 15. Livy says (7, c. 28) that a temple was vowed to Juno under this name, by the dictator Furus, when the Romans waged war against the Aurunci, and that the temple was raised to the goddess by the senate, on the spot where the house of Manlius Capitolinus had formerly stood. Suidas, however, says, that Juno was surnamed Monæta, from assuring the Romans, when in the war against Pyrrhus they complained of want of pecuniary resources, that money could never fail to those who cultivated justice.*

Monima, a beautiful woman of Miletus, whom Mithridates the Great married. When his affairs grew desperate, Mithridates ordered his wives to destroy themselves; Monima attempted to strangle herself, but when her efforts were unavailing, she ordered one of her attendants to stab her. Plut. in Luc.

Monimus, a philosopher of Syracuse.

Monodus, a son of Prusias. He had one continued bone instead of a row of teeth, whence his name (monor odour). Plin. 7, c. 16.

Monocæus, now Monaco, a town and port of Liguria, where Hercules had a temple; whence he is called Monacius, and the harbour Herculis Portus. Strab. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 870.

Monoleus, a lake of Æthiopia.

Monophæge, sacrifices in Ægina.

Monophilus, a eunuch of Mithridates. The king entrusted him with the care of one of his daughters; and the eunuch, when he saw the affairs of his master in a desperate situation, stabbed her, lest she should fall into the enemy's hands, &c.

Mons Sacæ, a mountain near Rome, where the Roman populace retired in a tumult, which was the cause of the election of the tribunes.

Mons Sævæ, a mountain near Rome, &c.

Montanus, a poet who wrote in hexameter and elegiac verses. Ovid. ex Pont.—An orator under Vespasian.—A favourite of Messalina.—One of the senators whom Domitian consulted about boiling a turbot. Juv. 4.

Monychus, a powerful giant, who could root opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapsed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates first entered the field against the Romans, till the time of his death. Appian. in Mithrid.—Justin. 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Crosus.—Patere.—Dion.

Mithridātis, a daughter of Mithridates the Great. She was poisoned by her father.

Mithrobarzanes, a king of Armenia, &c.—An officer sent by Tigranes against Lucullus, &c. Plut.—The father-in-law of Datames.

Mitylēne and Hitylēne, the capital city of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from Mitylene the daughter of Macareus, a king of the country. It was greatly commended by the ancients for the stateliness of its buildings and the fruitfulness of its soil, but more particularly for the great men whom it produced. Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophrastus, Hellenicus, &c., were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a seat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honour of having educated many of the great men of Rome and Greece. In the Peloponnesian war the Mityleneans suffered greatly for their revolt from the power of Athens; and, in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldness to resist the Romans, and disdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. Cic. de Leg. Ag.—Strab. 13.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Diod. 3 & 12.—Patere, 1, c. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 7, &c.—Tasey, 3, &c.—Plut. in Pomp., &c.

Mitys, a man whose statue fell upon his murderer, and crushed him to death, &c. Aristot. 10, de Poet.—A river of Macedonia.

Mizæi, a people of Elymais.

Mnasalces, a Greek poet, who wrote epigrams. Athen.—Strab.

Mnasias, an historian of Phœnicia.—Another of Colophon.—A third of Patre, in Achaia, who flourished 141 B.C.

Mnasioles, a general of Thymbro, &c. Diod. 58.

Mnasilus, a youth who assisted Chronis to tie the old Siletus, whom they found asleep in a cave. Some imagine that Virgil spoke of Varus under the name of Mnasilus. Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 13.

Mnasippidas, a Laœdamonian, who imposed upon the credulity of the people, &c. Polyæn.

Mnasippus, a Laœdamonian, sent with a fleet of 65 ships and 1500 men to Corcyra, where he was killed, &c. Diod. 15.

Mnasitheus, a friend of Aratus.

Mnasion, a tyrant of Elatia, who gave 1200 pieces of gold for 12 pictures of 12 gods to Asclepiodorus. Plin. 35, c. 16.

Mnasyrion, a place in Rhodes. Strab. 14.

Mnemon, a surname given to Artaxerxes on account of his retentive memory. C. Nep. in Reg.—A Rhodian.

Mnēmōsyne, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, mother of the nine Muses by Jupiter, who assumed the form of a shepherd to enjoy her company. The word Mnemosyne signifies memory, and therefore the poets have rightly called memory the mother of the Muses, because it is to that mental endowment that mankind are indebted for their progress in science. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Pindar. Isth. 6.—Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.—A fountain of Boœtia, whose waters were generally drunk by those who consulted the oracle of Trophonius. Paus. 9, c. 39.

Mnesarchus, a celebrated philosopher of Greece, pupil to Panætius, &c. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 11.

Mnesidæmus, an officer who conspired against the lieutenant of Demetrius. Polyæn. 5.

Mnesilans, a son of Pollux and Phœbe. Apollod.

Mnesimache, a daughter of Dexamenus king of Olenus, courted by Eurytion, whom Hercules killed. Apollod. 2.

Mnesimachus, a comic poet.

Mnester, a freedman of Agrippina, who murdered himself at the death of his mistress. Tacit. An. 14, c. 9.

Mnestheus, a Trojan, descended from Assaracus. He was a competitor for the prize given to the best sailing vessel by Æneas, at the funeral games of Anchises in Sicily, and became the progenitor of the family of the Memmii at Rome. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 116, &c.—A son of Peteus. Vid. Menestheus.—A freedman of Aurelian, &c. Eutrop. 9.—Aur. Vict.

Mnestia, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.

Mnestra, a mistress of Cimon.

Mnēvia, a celebrated bull, sacred to the sun in the town of Heliopolis. He was worshipped with the same superstitious ceremonies as Apis, and at his death, he received the most magnificent funeral. He was the emblem of Osiris. Diod. 1.—Plut. de Isid.

Mosphernes, the uncle of Strabo's mother, &c. Strab. 12.

Modestus, a Latin writer, whose book De re Militari has been elegantly edited in 2 vols. 8vo, Vesalix, 1670.

Modia, a rich widow at Rome. Juv. 3, v. 130.

Mœcia, one of the tribes at Rome. Liv. 8, c. 17.

Mœnus, now Majna, a river of Germany, which falls into the Rhine near Mentz. Tacit. de Germ. 48.

Moragētos, satorum ductor, a surname of Jupiter. Paus. 5, c. 15.

Moris, a king of India, who fled at the approach of Alexander. Cæsar. 9, c. 8.—A steward of the shepherd Menæcas in Virgil's Ecl. 9.—A king of Egypt. He was the last of the 300 kings from Menes to Sesostrius, and reigned 68 years. Herodot. 2, c. 13.—A celebrated lake in Egypt, supposed to have been dug by the king of the same name. It is about 220 miles in circumference, and intended as a reservoir for the superfluous waters during the inundation of the Nile. There were two pyramids in it, 600 feet high, half of which lay under the water, and the other appeared above the surface. Herodot. 2, c. 4, &c.—Mela, 1, c. 6.—Plin. 36, c. 12.

Mœdi, a people of Thrace, conquered by Philip of Macedonia.

Mœon, a Sicilian, who poisoned Agathocles, &c.

Mœra, a dog. Vid. Mera.

Mœsia, a country of Europe, bounded on the south by the mountains of Dalmatia, north by mount Hæmus, extending from the confluence of the Sava and the Danube to the shores of the Euxine. It was divided into Upper and Lower Mœsia. Lower Mœsia was on the borders of the Euxine, and contained that tract of country which received the name of Pontus from its vicinity to the sea, and which is now part of Bulgaria. Upper Mœsia lies beyond the other, in the inland country, now called Servia. Plin. 3, c. 26.—Virg. G. 1, v. 102.

Moleis, a festival in Arcadia, in commemoration of a battle in which Lycurgus obtained the victory.

Molon, a Trojan prince, who distinguished himself in the defence of his country against the Greeks as the friend and companion of Thymbræus. They were slain by Ulysses and Diomedes. Homer. Il. 11, v. 320.

Molone, the wife of Actor son of Phorbias. She became mother of Cteatus and Eurtytus, who, from her, are called Molionides. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Molo, a philosopher of Rhodes, called also Apollonius. Some are of opinion that Apollonius and Molo are two different persons, who were both natives of Alabanda, and disciples of Meneceles, of the same place. They both visited Rhodes, and there opened a school, but Molo flourished some time after Apollonius. Molo had Cicero and J. Caesar among his pupils. Vid. Apollonius. Cic. de Orat.—A prince of Syria, who revolted against Antiochus, and killed himself when his rebellion was attended with ill success.

Molossia, a river of Bœotia, near Platæa.

Molochus, an old shepherd near Cleonæ, who received Hercules with great hospitality. The hero, to repay the kindness he received, destroyed the Nemean lion, which laid waste the neighbouring country and, therefore, the Nemean games, instituted on this occasion, are to be understood by the words Lucus Molochi. There were two festivals instituted in his honour, called Molochæa. Martial. 9, ep. 44. 1. 14, ep. 44.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 3, v. 19.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 160.

Molossi, a people of Epirus, who inhabited that part of the country which was called Molossia, or Molossis from king Molossus. This country had the bay of Ambracia on the south, and the country of the Perrhæbeans on the east. The dogs of the place were famous, and received the name of Molossi among the Romans. Dodona was the capital of the country according to some writers. Others, however, reckon it as the chief city of Thesprotia. Lucr. 5, v. 19, 62.—Lucan. 4, v. 440.—Strab. 7.—Liv.—Justin. 7, c. 6.—C. Nep. 2, c. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 495.—Horat. 2, sat. 6, v. 114.

Molossia, or Molossia. Vid. Molossi.

Molossus, a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache. He reigned in Epirus, after the death of Helenus, and part of his dominions received the name of Molossia from him. Paus. 1, c. 11.—A surname of Jupiter in Epirus.—An Athenian general, &c. Id. in Theop.—The father of Menon of Crete. Vid. Molus. Homer. Od. 6.

Molpadia, one of the Amazons, &c. Plut.

Molpus, an author who wrote a history of Lacedæmon.

Molus, a Cretan, father of Meriones. Homer. Od. 6.—A son of Deucalion.—Another, son of Mars and Demonicæ.

Molyriorion, a town of Ætolia, between the Evenus and Naupactum. Paus. 5, c. 3.

Momemphis, a town of Egypt. Strab. 17.

Momus, the god of pleasantry among the ancients, was son of Nox, according to Hesiod. He was continually employed in satirizing the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He blamed Vulcan, because in the human form which he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in his breast, by which whatever was done or thought there might be easily brought to light. He censured the house which Minerva had made, because the goddess had not made it movable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. In the bull which Neptune had produced, he observed that his blows might have been surer if his eyes had been placed near his horns. Venus herself was exposed to his satire; and when the steering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddess, he observed, as she retired, that the noise of her feet was too loud, and greatly improper in the goddess of beauty. These illiberal reflections upon the gods were the cause that Momus was driven from heaven. He is generally represented raising a mask from his face, and holding a small figure in his hand. Hesiod. in Theog.—Lucian. in Herm.

Mons, an island between Britain and Hibernia, anciently inhabited by a number of Druids. It is supposed by some to be the modern island of Anglesey, and by others, the island of Man. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 18 & 29.

Monses, a king of Parthis, who favoured the cause of M. Antony against Augustus. Horat. 3, od. 6, c. 9.—A Parthian in the age of Mithridates, &c.

Monda, a river between the Durius, and Tagus, in Portugal. Plin. 4, c. 22.

Monesus, a general killed by Jason at Colchis, &c.

Monsta, a surname of Juno among the Romans. She received it because she advised them to sacrifice a pregnant sow to Cybele, to avert an earthquake. *Cic. de Div. 1, c. 15. Livy says (7, c. 28) that a temple was vowed to Juno under this name, by the dictator Furius, when the Romans waged war against the Aurunci, and that the temple was raised to the goddess by the senate, on the spot where the house of Manlius Capitolinus had formerly stood. Suidas, however, says, that Juno was surnamed Moneta, from assuring the Romans, when in the war against Pyrrhus they complained of want of pecuniary resources, that money could never fail to those who cultivated justice.*

Monima, a beautiful woman of Miletus, whom Mithridates the Great married. When his affairs grew desperate, Mithridates ordered his wives to destroy themselves; Monima attempted to strangle herself, but when her efforts were unavailing, she ordered one of her attendants to stab her. Plut. in Luc.

Monimus, a philosopher of Syracuse.

Monodus, a son of Prusias. He had one continued bone instead of a row of teeth, whence his name (μονοὸς ὀδόν). Plin. 7, c. 16.

Monocus, now Monaco, a town and port of Liguria, where Hercules had a temple; whence he is called Monacius, and the harbour Herculis Portus. Strab. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 830.

Monoleus, a lake of Ethiopia.

Monophæge, sacrifices in Ægina.

Monophilus, a eunuch of Mithridates. The king entrusted him with the care of one of his daughters; and the eunuch, when he saw the affairs of his master in a desperate situation, stabbed her, lest she should fall into the enemy's hands, &c.

Mons Sacer, a mountain near Rome, where the Roman populace retired in a tumult, which was the cause of the election of the tribunes.

Mons Sæverus, a mountain near Rome, &c.

Montanus, a poet who wrote in hexameter and elegiac verses. Ovid. ex Pont.—An orator under Vespasian.—A favourite of Messalina.—One of the senators whom Domitian consulted about boiling a turbot. Juv. 4.

Montolus, a powerful giant, who could root up trees and hurt them like a javelin. He receives his name from his having the feet of a horse, as the word implies. Juv. 1, v. 12.

Monyma. Vid. Moenia.

Monymus, a servant of Corinth, who, not being permitted by his master to follow Diogenes the cynic, pretended madness, and obtained his liberty. He became a great admirer of the philosopher, and also of Crates, and even wrote something in the form of facetious stories. Diog. Laert.

Mophs, an Indian prince conquered by Alexander.

Mopsium, a hill and town of Thessaly, between Tempe and Larissa. Liv. 49.

Mopsopia, an ancient name of Athens, from Mopsus, one of its kings, and from thence the epithet of Mopsopus is often applied to an Athenian.

Mopsuhestia, or Mopsos, a town of Cilicia near the sea. Cic. Fam. 3, c. 8.

Mopsus, a celebrated prophet, son of Manto and Apollo, during the Trojan war. He was consulted by Amphimachus king of Colophon, who wished to know what success would attend his arms in a war which he was going to undertake. He predicted the greatest calamities; but Calchas, who had been a soothsayer of the Greeks during the Trojan war, promised the greatest success. Amphimachus followed the opinion of Calchas, but the opinion of Mopsus was fully verified. This had such an effect upon Calchas that he died soon after. His death is attributed by some to another mortification of the same nature. The two soothsayers, jealous of each other's fame, came to a trial of their skill in divination. Calchas first asked his antagonist how many figs a neighbouring tree bore. "Ten thousand except one," replied Mopsus; "and one single vessel can contain them all." The figs were gathered, and his conjectures were true. Mopsus, now to try his adversary, asked him how many young ones a certain pregnant sow would bring forth. Calchas confessed his ignorance, and Mopsus immediately said that the sow would bring forth on the morrow 10 young ones, of which only one should be a male, all black, and that the females should all be known by their white streaks. The morrow proved the veracity of his prediction, and Calchas died by excess of the grief which this defeat produced. Mopsus after death was ranked among the gods; and had an oracle at Malia, celebrated for the true and decisive answers which it gave. Strab. 9.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Amian. 14, c. 8.—Plut. de Orac. Defect.

—A son of Amphyx and Chloris, born at Titaressa in Thessaly. He was the prophet and soothsayer of the Argonauts, and died at his return from Colchis by the bite of a serpent in Libya. Jason erected to him a monument on the sea-shore, where afterwards the Africans built him a temple where he gave oracles. He has often been confounded with the son of Manto, as their professions and their names were alike. Hygin. fab. 14, 128, 173.—Strab. 9.—A shepherd of that name in Virg. Ecl.

Morgantium (or ia), a town of Sicily, near the mouth of the Simethus. Cic. in Ver. 3, c. 18.

Morini, a people of Belgic Gaul, on the shores of the British ocean. The shortest passage to Britain was from their territories. They were called extremi hominum by the Romans, because situate on the extremities of Gaul. Their city, called Morinorum castellum, is now Mount Cassel, in Artois; and Morinorum civitas, is Terouenne, on the Lis. Virg. En. 8, v. 720.—Caes. 4, Bel. G. 21.

Mortagus, a king of the Senones at the arrival of Cæsar in Gaul. Cæsar. B. G.

Morius, a river of Bœotia. Plut.

Morpheus, the son and minister of the god Somnus, who naturally imitated the grimaces, gestures, words, and manners of mankind. He is sometimes called the god of sleep. He is generally represented as a sleeping child of great corpulence, and with wings. He holds a vase in one hand, and in the other are some poppies. He is represented by Ovid as sent to inform by a dream and a vision the unhappy Alcyone of the fate of her husband Ceyx. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 10.

Mors, one of the infernal deities born of Night, without a father. She was worshipped by the ancients, particularly by the Lacedæmonians, with great solemnity, and represented not as an actually existing power, but as an imaginary being. Euripides introduces her in one of his tragedies on the stage. The moderns represent her as a skeleton armed with a scythe and a scymetar.

Mortuum mare. Vid. Mare Mortuum.

Morys, a Trojan killed by Mariones during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 13, 80.

Mosa, a river of Belgic Gaul falling into the German ocean, and now called the Meuse or Mense. The bridge over it, Mosopons, is now supposed to be Maestricht. Tacit. H. 4, c. 66.

Moscha, now Mascat, a port of Arabia on the Red sea.

Moschi, a people of Asia, at the west of the Caspian sea. Mela, 1, c. 2. 1, 3, c. 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 270.

Moschion, a name common to four different writers, whose compositions, character, and native place are unknown. Some fragments of their writings remain, some few verses and a treatise de morbis mulierum, edited by Gesner, 4to, Basil. 1756.

Moschus, a Phœnician who wrote the history of his country in his own mother tongue.—A philosopher of Sidon. He is supposed to be the founder of anatomical philosophy. Strab.—A Greek Bucolic poet in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The sweetness and elegance of his eclogues, which are still extant, make the world regret the loss of poetical pieces no ways inferior to the productions of Theocritus. The best editions of Moschus with Bion is that of Heskin, 8vo, Oxon. 1748.—A Greek rhetorician of Pergamus in the age of Horace, defended by Torquatus in an accusation of having poisoned some of his friends. Herat. 1, ep. 5, v. 9.

Mosella, a river of Belgic Gaul falling into the Rhine at Coblenz, and now called the Moselle. Flor. 3, c. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 53.

Moses, a celebrated legislator and general among the Jews, well known in sacred history. He was born in Egypt 1571 B.C., and after he had performed his miracles before Pharaoh, conducted the Israelites through the Red sea, and given them laws and ordinances, during their peregrination of 40 years in the wilderness of Arabia, he died at the age of 120. His writings have been quoted and commended by several of the heathen authors, who have divested themselves of their prejudices against a Hebrew, and extolled his learning and the effects of his wisdom. Longinus.—Diog. 1.

Mosychius, a mountain of Lemnos. Nican.

Mosynæol, a nation on the Euxine sea, in whose territories the 10,000 Greeks stayed on their return from Cunaxa. Æmop.

Mothone, a town of Magnesia, where Philip lost one of his eyes. Justin. 7, c. 6. The word is oftener spelt Methone.

MOTYA, a town of Sicily, besieged and taken by Dionysius tyrant of Syracuse.

MUCIĀNUS, a facious and intriguing general under Otho and Vitellius, &c.

MUCIUS. Vid. Mutius.

MUCRĀS, a village of Samnium. Ital. 8, v. 565.

MULCĪBER, a surname of Vulcan (a mulcendo ferrum), from his occupation. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 5. Vid. Vulcanus.

MULĪCHA, a river of Africa, dividing Numidia from Mauritania. Plin. 5, c. 2.

MULVIUS PONS, a bridge on the Flaminian way, about one mile distant from Rome. Mart. 3, ep. 14.

M. MUMMIUS, a Roman consul sent against the Achæans, whom he conquered, B.C. 147. He destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, by order of the senate, and obtained the surname of Achaicus from his victories. He did not enrich himself with the spoils of the enemy, but returned home without any increase of fortune. He was so unacquainted with the value of the paintings and works of the most celebrated artists of Greece, which were found in the plunder of Corinth, that he said to those who conveyed them to Rome, that if they lost them or injured them, they should make others in their stead. Paterc. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 8.—Plin. 34, c. 7. l. 37, c. 1.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 24.

M. PUBLIUS, a man commended by C. Publicius for the versatility of his mind, and the propriety of his manners. Cic. de Orat. 2.—A Latin poet. Macrobius, 1, Satur. 20.—M. a poet. Cic. in Ver.—Spurius, a brother of Achaicus before mentioned, distinguished as an orator, and for his fondness for the stoic philosophy. Cic. ad Brut. 25. Ad Att. 13, ep. 6.—A lieutenant of Crassus defeated, &c. Plin. in Crass.

MUNATIUS PLANCIUS, a consul sent to the rebellious army of Germanicus. He was almost killed by the incensed soldiery, who suspected that it was through him that they had not all been pardoned and indemnified by a decree of the senate. Calpurnius rescued him from their fury.—An orator and disciple of Cicero. His father, grandfather, and great grandfather bore the same name. He was with Cæsar in Gaul, and was made consul with Brutus. He promised to favour the republican cause for some time, but he deserted again to Cæsar. He was long Antony's favourite, but he left him at the battle of Actium to conciliate the favours of Octavianus. His services were great in the senate; for through his influence and persuasion, that venerable body flattered the conqueror of Antony with the appellation of Augustus. He was rewarded with the office of censor. Plin. in Ant.—Gratus, a Roman knight who conspired with Piso against Nero. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 30.—Suet. in Aug. 23.—A friend of Horace, ep. 3, v. 31.

MUNDA, a small town of Hispania Bætica, celebrated for a battle which was fought there on the 17th of March, B.C. 45, between Cæsar and the republican forces of Rome, under Labienus and the sons of Pompey. Cæsar obtained the victory after an obstinate and bloody battle, and by this blow put an end to the Roman republic. Pompey lost 30,000 men, and Cæsar only 1000, and 500 wounded. Sil. Ital. 3, v. 400.—Hirt. Bell. Hisp. 27.—Lucan. 1.

MUNTIUS, a son of Laodice, the daughter of Priam by Acamas. He was entrusted to the care of Æthra as soon as born, and at the taking of Troy he was made known to his father, who saved his life, and carried him to Thrace, where he was killed by the bite of a serpent. Parthen. 10.

MUNYCHIA (and æ), a port of Attica, between the Piræus and the promontory of Sunium, called after king Munychus, who built there a temple to Diana, and in whose honour he instituted festivals called Munychia. The temple was held so sacred that whatever criminals fled there for refuge were pardoned. During the festivals they offered small cakes which they called amphiphontes, ὄμοι τῶν ἀμφιφώνων, from shining all round, because there were lighted torches hung round when they were carried to the temple, or because they were offered at the full moon, at which time the solemnity was observed. It was particularly in honour of Diana, who is the same as the moon, because it was full moon when Themistocles conquered the Persian fleet at Salamis. The port of Munychia was well fortified and of great consequence; therefore the Lacedæmonians, when sovereigns of Greece, always kept a regular garrison there. Plin.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 709.—Strab. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 1.

MURÆNA, a celebrated Roman, left at the head of the armies of the republic in Asia by Sylla. He invaded the dominions of Mithridates with success, but soon after met with a defeat. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. He commanded one of the wings of Sylla's army at the battle against Archelaus near Chæronea. He was ably defended in an oration by Cicero, when his character was attacked and censured. Cic. pro Mur.—Appian. de Mithrid.—A man put to death for conspiring against Augustus, B.C. 22.

MURCIA. Vid. Murta.

MURCUS, an enemy of the triumvirate of J. Cæsar.—Statius, a man who murdered Piso in Vesta's temple in Nero's reign. Tacit. H. 1, c. 43.

MURGANĪA, a town of Samnium. Liv. 25, c. 27.

MURRHŌNUS, a friend of Turnus, killed by Æneas, &c. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 520.

MURSA, now Essek, a town of Hungary, where the Drave falls into the Danube.

MURTIĀ, or Myrtia (a myrtoe), a supposed surname of Venus, because she presided over the myrtle. This goddess was the patroness of idleness and cowardice. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 32.

MUS, a Roman consul. Vid. Decius.

MUSA ANTONIUS, a freedman and physician of Augustus. He cured his imperial master of a dangerous disease under which he laboured, by recommending to him the use of the cold bath. He was greatly rewarded for this celebrated cure. He was honoured with a brazen statue by the Roman senate, which was placed near that of Esculapius, and Augustus permitted him to wear a golden ring, and to be exempted from all taxes. He was not so successful in recommending the use of the cold bath to Marcellus, as he had been to Augustus, and his illustrious patient died under his care. The cold bath was for a long time discontinued, till Charms of Marselles introduced it again, and convinced the world of its great benefits. Musa was brother to Euphorbus the physician of king Juba. Two small treatises, de herbâ Botanica, and de tuedâ Valeriane, are supposed to be the productions of his pen.—A daughter of Nicomeries king of Bithynia. She attempted to recover her father's kingdom from the Romans, but to no purpose, though Cæsar espoused her cause. Paterc. 2.—Suet. in Cæs.

MUSEŌ, certain goddesses who presided over poetry, music, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and were nine in number: Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Some suppose that there were in ancient times only three Muses, Melete, Mueme, and Aoidé; others four, Telixiope, Arde, Arche, Melete. They were, according to others, daughters of Pierus and Antiope, from which circumstance they are called Pierides. The name of Pierides might probably be derived from mount Pierus, where they were born. They have been severally called Castalides, Aganippides, Lebethrides, Aonides, Heliconiades, &c., from the places where they were worshipped, or over which they presided. Apollo, who was the patron and the conductor of the Muses, has received the name of Musagetes, or leader of the Muses. The same surname was also given to Hercules. The palm tree, the laurel, and all the fountains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus, &c., were sacred to the Muses. They were generally represented as young, beautiful, and modest virgins. They were fond of solitude, and commonly appeared in different attire, according to the arts and sciences over which they presided. Vid. Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, &c. Sometimes they were represented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indissoluble connection which exists between the liberal arts and sciences. The Muses sometimes appear with wings, because by the assistance of wings they freed themselves from the violence of Pyreæus. Their contest with the daughters of Pierus is well known. Vid. Pierides. The worship of the Muses was universally established, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Thessaly, and Italy. No sacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poet ever began a poem without a solemn invocation to the goddesses who presided over verse. There were festivals instituted in their honour in several parts of Greece, especially among the Thespians, every fifth year. The Macedonians observed also a festival in honour of Jupiter and the Muses. It had been instituted by king Archelaus, and it was celebrated with stage plays, games, and different exhibitions, which continued nine days, according to the number of the Muses. Plut. Erot.—Follux.—Eschin. in Tim.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 310.—Hom. Hymn. Mus.—Juv. 7.—Diod. 1.—Martial. 4, ep. 14.

Museus, an ancient Greek poet, supposed to have been son or disciple of Linus or Orpheus, and to have lived about 1450 years before the Christian era. Virgil has paid great honour to his memory by placing him in the Elysian fields attended by a great multitude, and taller by the head than his followers. None of the poet's compositions are extant. The elegant poem of the loves of Leander and Hero was written by a Museus, who flourished in the fourth century, according to the more received opinions. Among the good editions of Museus two may be selected as the best; that of Rover, 8vo, L. Bat. 1727, and that of Schroder, 8vo, Leovard, 1743. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 677.—Diog.—A Latin poet, whose compositions were very obscene. Martial. 19, ep. 96.—A poet of Thebes who lived during the Trojan war.

Musonius Rufus, a stoic philosopher of Etruria in the reign of Vespasian. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 87.

Muta, a goddess who presided over silence, among the Romans. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 580.

Mustela, a man greatly esteemed by Cicero. Ad. Attic. 12.—A gladiator. Cic.

Muthullus, a river of Numidia. Sallust. Jug. 48.

Mutia, a daughter of Q. Mutius Scaevola, and sister of Metellus Celer. She was Pompey's third wife. Her incontinent behaviour so disgusted her husband, that at his return from the Mithridatic war, he divorced her, though she had borne him three children. She afterwards married M. Scaurus. Augustus greatly esteemed her. Plut. in Pomp.—A wife of Julius Cæsar, beloved by Clodius the tribune. Suet. in Cæs. 50.—The mother of Augustus.

Mutia lex, the same as that which was enacted by Licinius Crassus, and Q. Mutius A.U.C. 657. Vid. Licinia lex.

Mutica, or Mutyce, a town of Sicily west of the cape Pachynus. Cic. in Ver. 3, c. 43.

Mutilia, a woman intimate with Livia Augusta. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 12.

Mutina, a Roman colony of Cisalpine Gaul, where M. Antony besieged D. Brutus, whom the consuls Pansa and Hirtius delivered. Two battles on the 15th of April, B.C. 43, were fought there, in which Antony was defeated, and at last obliged to retire. Mutina is now called Modena. Lucan. 1, v. 41. l. 7, v. 872.—Sil. 8, v. 592.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 822.—Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 14. Brut. ep. 5.

Mutinus, one of Annibal's generals, who was honoured with the freedom of Rome on delivering up Agrigentum. Liv. 25, c. 41. l. 27, c. 5.

Mutinus. Vid. Mutunus.

Mutius, the father-in-law of C. Marius.—A Roman who saved the life of young Marius by conveying him away from the pursuit of his enemies in a load of straw.—A friend of Tiberius Gracchus, by whose means he was raised to the office of a tribune.—C. Scaevola, surnamed Cordus, became famous for his courage and intrepidity. When Porsenna king of Etruria had besieged Rome to reinstate Tarquin in all his rights and privileges, Mutius determined to deliver his country from so dangerous an enemy. He disguised himself in the habit of a Tuscan, and as he could fluently speak the language, he gained an easy introduction into the camp, and soon into the royal tent. Porsenna sat alone with his secretary when Mutius entered. The Roman rushed upon the secretary and stabbed him to the heart, mistaking him for his royal master. This occasioned a noise, and Mutius, unable to escape, was seized and brought before the king. He gave no answer to the inquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman; and to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals, and sternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him that 300 young Romans like himself had conspired against his life, and entered the camp in disguise, determined either to destroy him or perish in the attempt. This extraordinary confession astonished Porsenna; he made peace with the Romans, and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the surname of Scaevola, because he had lost the use of his right hand by burning it in the presence of the Etrurian king. Plut. in Par.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Liv. 2, c. 12.—Q. Scaevola, a Roman consul. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and signalized himself greatly in the Marsian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he instructed in the study of civil law. Cic.—Plut.—Another, appointed proconsul of Asia, which he governed with so much popularity, that he was generally proposed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero speaks of him as eloquent, learned, and ingenious, equally eminent as an orator and as a lawyer. He was murdered in the temple of Vesta, during the civil war of Marius and Sulla, 82 years before Christ. Plut.—Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 48.—Paterc. 2, c. 22.

Mutinus, or Mutinus, a deity among the Romans, much the same as the Priapus of the Greeks. The Roman matrons, and particularly new married women, disgraced themselves by the obscene ceremonies which custom obliged them to observe before the statue of this impure deity. August. de Civ. D. 4, c. 9. l. 6, c. 9.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.

Mutusose, a town of Umbria. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 711.

Museris, a town of India, now Vizindrah. Plin. 6, c. 23.

Myagrus, or Myodes, a divinity among the Egyptians, called also Achor. He was entreated by the inhabitants to protect them from flies and serpents. His worship passed into Greece and Italy. Plin. 10, c. 28.—Paus. 8, c. 26.

Mycale, a celebrated magician, who boasted that she could draw down the moon from her orb. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263.—A city and promontory of Asia Minor opposite Samos, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the Greeks and Persians on the 22nd of September, 479 B.C., the same day that Mardonius was defeated at Plataea. The Persians were about 100,000 men, that had just returned from the unsuccessful expedition of Xerxes in Greece. They had drawn their ships to the shore and fortified themselves, as if determined to support a siege. They suffered the Greeks to disembark from their fleet without the least molestation, and were soon obliged to give way before the cool and resolute intrepidity of an inferior number of men. The Greeks obtained a complete victory, slaughtered some thousands of the enemy, burned their camp, and sailed back to Samos with an immense booty, in which were seventy chests of money among other very valuable things. Herodot.—Justin. 2, c. 14.—Diod.—A woman's name. Juv. 4, v. 141.

Mycalessus, an inland town of Bœotia, where Ceres had a temple. Paus. 9, c. 19.

Mycenee, a town of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, built by Perseus son of Danae. It was situated on a small river at the east of the Inachus, about 50 stadia from Argos, and received its name from Mycene, a nymph of Laconia. It was once the capital of a kingdom, whose monarchs reigned in the following order: Acrisius, 1344 B.C.; Perseus, Electryon, Mastor, and Sthenelus, and Sthenelus alone for eight years; Atreus and Thyestes, Agamemnon, Ægisthus, Orestes, Ægyptus, who was dispossessed 1104 B.C., on the return of the Heracleidae. The town of Mycenee was taken and laid in ruins by the Argives, B.C. 568; and it was almost unknown where it stood in the age of the geographer Strabo. Paus. 2, c. 16.—Strab. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 839.—Mela, 2, c. 3. The word Myceus is used for Agamemnon, as he was one of the kings of Mycenee.

Myconis (idis), a name applied to Iphigenia, as residing at Mycene. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 34.

Mycerinus, a son of Cheops king of Egypt. After the death of his father he reigned with great justice and moderation. Herodot. 2, c. 129.

Mycolberna, a town of the Hellespont. Diod. 12.

Mycolthus, a servant of Anaxilaus tyrant of Rhegium. He was entrusted with the care of the kingdom, and of the children of the deceased prince, and he exercised his power with such fidelity and moderation, that he acquired the esteem of all the citizens, and at last restored the kingdom to his master's children when come to years of maturity, and retired to peace and solitude with a small portion. He is called by some Micalus. Justin. 4, c. 2.

Mycon, a celebrated painter, who with others assisted in making and perfecting the Pædic of Athens. He was the rival of Polygnotus. Plin. 33 & 35.—A youth of Athens changed into a poppy by Ceres.

Myconos (or e), one of the Cyclades between Delos and Icaria, which received its name from Myconus, an unknown person. It is about three miles at the east of Delos, and is 36 miles in circumference. It remained long uninhabited on account of the frequent earthquakes to which it was subject. Some suppose that the giants whom Hercules killed were buried under that island, whence arose the proverb of everything is under Mycone, applied to those who treat of different subjects under one and the same title, as if none of the defeated giants had been buried under no other island or mountain about Mycone. Strabo observes, and his testimony is supported by that of modern travellers, that the inhabitants of Mycone became bald very early, even at the age of 20 or 25, from which circumstance they were called, by way of contempt, the bald heads of Mycone. Pliny says that the children of the place were always born without hair. The island was poor, and the inhabitants very avaricious; whence Archilochus reproached a certain Pericles, that he came to a feast like a Myconian, that is, without previous invitation. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 76.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 21, c. 37. l. 12, c. 7. l. 14, c. 1.—Athen. 1.—Thucyd. 3, c. 20.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.

Mydon, one of the Trojan chiefs who defended Troy against the Greeks. He was killed by Antilochus. Homer. Il. 5, v. 580.

Mycephoris, a town in Egypt, in a small island near Bubastis.

Myneus, a mountain of Ætolia. Plut. de Flum.

Myrdon, a brother of Amycus, killed in a war against Hercules.—A brother of Hecuba. Vid. Myrdonus.

Myrdonia, a small province of Macedonia, near Thrace, between the rivers Axius and Strymon. The inhabitants, called Myrdones, migrated into Asia, and settled near Troas, where the country received the name of their ancient habitation. Cybele was called Myrdonia, from the worship she received in Myrdonia in Phrygia. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 22. l. 3, od. 16, v. 41.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 45.—A small province of Mesopotamia bears also the name of Myrdonia, and was probably peopled by a Macedonian colony. Flacc. 3, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10.—Ovid. Heroid. 20.—Horat. 2, od. 12.

Myrdonus, or Myrdon, a brother of Hecuba, Priam's wife, who reigned in part of Thrace. His son Corœbus was called Myrdonides, from him. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 341.—Homer. Il. 3.—A small river running through Mesopotamia.

Mylassa (orum), a town of Caria. Liv. 38, c. 35.

Mylo, or Mylassa, a small river on the east of Sicily, with a town of the same name. Liv. 24, c. 30 & 31.—Suet. Aug. 16.—Also a town of Thesaly, now Mylasao. Liv. 42, c. 54.

Myles, a son of Lelex.

Myllita, a surname of Venus among the Assyrians, in whose temples all the women were obliged to prostitute themselves to strangers. Herodot. 1, c. 131 & 199.—Strab. 16.

Myndus, a maritime town of Caria near Halicarnassus. Cic. Fam. 3, ep. 8.—Mele. 1, c. 16.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

Myneus, a prince of Lymnessus, who married Briseis. He was killed by Achilles, and his wife became the property of the conqueror. Homer. 11, 3.

Myneus. Vid. Myneus.

Myonia, a town of Phocis. Paus.

Myonessus, a town and promontory of Ionia, now Jalangi-Liman. Liv. 37, c. 13 & 27.

Myra (or um, or æ), a town of Lycia, on a high hill, two miles from the sea. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Strab. 14.

Myriandros, a town of Seleucia in Syria, on the bay of Issus, which is sometimes called Sinus Myriandricus. Liv. 2, c. 108.

Myrina, a maritime town of Æolia, called also Sebastopolis, and now Sanderlic. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.—Liv. 33, c. 30.—Strab. 13.—A queen of the Amazons, &c. Dion. 4.—A town of Lemnos, now Palaio Castro. Plin. 4, c. 12.—A town of Asia, destroyed by an earthquake in Trajan's reign.—The wife of Thoas king of Lemnos, by whom she had Hippisyle.

Myrinus, a surname of Apollo, from Myrina in Æolia, where he was worshipped.—A gladiator. Mart. 12, c. 29.

Myriscus, a town of Arcadia, called also Megalopolis.

Myrleus, or Apamea, a town of Bithynia. Plin. 5, c. 32.

Myrmecides, an artist of Miletus, mentioned as making chariots so small that they could be covered by the wing of a fly. He also inscribed an elegiac distich on a grain of Indian sesamum. Cic. 4, Acad.—Ælian. 7, h. 1.

Myrmidones, a people on the southern borders of Thessaly, who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan war. They received their name from Myrmidon, a son of Jupiter and Eurymedusa, who married one of the daughters of Æolus son of Hellen. His son Actor married Ægina the daughter of the Asopus. He gave his name to his subjects, who dwell near the river Peneus in Thessaly. According to some, the Myrmidons received their name from their having been originally ants, μυρμηκων. Vid. Æacus. According to Strabo, they received it from their industry, because they imitated the diligence of the ants, and like them were indefatigable, and were continually employed in cultivating the earth. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 654.—Strab.—Hygin. fab. 52.

Myron, a tyrant of Sicyon.—A man of Priene, who wrote a history of Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 6.—A celebrated statue of Greece, peculiarly happy in imitating nature. He made a cow so much resembling life, that even bulls were deceived and approached her as if alive, as is frequently mentioned by many epigrams in the Anthologia. He flourished about 442 years before Christ. Ovid. Art. Am. 3, v. 319.—Paus.—Juv. 8.—Propert. 2, st. 43.

Myronianus, an historian. Diog.

Myronides, an Athenian general who conquered the Thebans. Polyæn.

Myrrha, a daughter of Cinyras king of Cyprus. She became enamoured of her father, and introduced herself into his bed unknown. She had a son by him, called Adonis. When Cinyras was apprised of the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, and Myrrha fled into Arabia, where she was changed into a tree called myrrh. Hygin. fab. 58 & 275.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 298.—Plut. in Par.—Apollod. 3.

Myrsilus, a son of Myrsus, the last of the Heraclidae who reigned in Lydia. He is also called Candaules. Vid. Candaules.

Myrsus, the father of Candaules. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—A Greek historian in the age of Solon.

Myrtale, a courtesan of Rome, mistress to the poet Horace, 1, od. 33.

Myrtea, a surname of Venus. Vid. Myrtea.

Myrtillus, son of Mercury and Phaetusa, or Cleobule, or Clymene, was arm-bearer to (Enomaus king of Pisa. He was so experienced in riding and in the management of horses, that he rendered those of (Enomaus the swiftest in all Greece. His infidelity proved at last fatal to him. (Enomaus had been informed by an oracle that his daughter Hippodamia's husband would cause his death, and on that account he resolved to marry her only to him who should overcome him in a chariot race. This seemed totally impossible, and to render it more terrible, (Enomaus declared that death would be the consequence of a defeat in the suitors. The charms of Hippodamia were so great, that many sacrificed their life in the fruitless endeavour to obtain her hand. Pelops at last presented himself, undaunted at the fate of those who had gone before him, but before he entered the course he bribed Myrtillus, and assured him that he should share Hippodamia's favours if he returned victorious from the race. Myrtillus, who was enamoured of Hippodamia, gave an old chariot to (Enomaus, which broke in the course and caused his death. Pelops gained the victory, and married Hippodamia; and when Myrtillus had the audacity to claim the reward promised to his perfidy, Pelops threw him headlong into the sea, where he perished. The body of Myrtillus, according to some, was carried by the waves to the sea-shore, where he received an honourable burial, and as he was the son of Mercury, he was made a constellation. Diog. 4.—Hygin. fab. 84 & 274.—Paus. 8, c. 14.—Apollod. 1.

Myrtle, a Greek woman who distinguished herself by her poetical talents. She flourished about 500 years B.C., and instructed the celebrated Corinna in the several rules of versification. Pindar himself, as some report, was also one of her pupils.

Myrtium mare, a part of the Ægean sea which lies between Eubœa, Attica, and Peloponnesus, as far as cape Melea. It receives this name from Myrto, a woman; or from Myrtois, a small island opposite to Carystos in Eubœa; or from Myrtillus the son of Mercury, who was drowned there, &c. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Hygin. fab. 84.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

Myrtuntium, a name given to that part of the sea which lies on the coast of Epirus, between the bay of Ambracia and Leucas.

Myrtusa, a mountain of Libya. Callim. in Apollo.

Mys (Myos), an artist famous in working and polishing silver. He beautifully represented the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, on a shield in the hand of Minerva's statue made by Phidias. Paus. 1, c. 28.—Marzial. 8, ep. 34 & 51. l. 14, ep. 93.—Propert. 3, el. 9, v. 14.

Mysacellus, or Miscellus, a native of Rhype in Achaia, who founded Crotona in Italy according to an oracle, which told him to build a city where he found rain with fine weather. The meaning of the oracle long perplexed him, till he found a beautiful woman all in tears in Italy, which circumstance he interpreted in his favour. According to some, Myscellus, who was the son of Hercules, went out of Argos without the permission of the magistrates, for which he was condemned to death. The judges had put each a black ball as a sign of condemnation, but Hercules changed them all and made them white, and had his son acquitted, upon which Myscellus left Greece and came to Italy, where he built Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 19.—Strab. 6 & 8.—Suidas.

Mysia, a country of Asia Minor, generally divided into major and minor. Mysia minor was bounded on the north and west by the Propontis and Bithynia, and Phrygia on the southern and eastern borders. Mysia major had Æolia on the south, the Ægean on the west, and Phrygia on the north and east. Its chief cities were Cynicum, Lampsacus, &c. The inhabitants were once very warlike, but they greatly degenerated; and the words Mysorum ultimus were emphatically used to signify a person of no merit. The ancients generally hired them to attend their funerals as mourners, because they were naturally melancholy and inclined to shed tears. They were once governed by monarchs. They are supposed to be descended from the Mysians of Europe, a nation which inhabited that part of Thrace which was situate between mount Hæmus and the Danube. Strab.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Cic. in Verr.—Flac. 27.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Apian. in Mithrid.—A festival in honour of Ceres, surnamed Mysia from Mysias, an Argive, who raised her a temple near Pallene in Achaia. Some derive the words aro tau muoiar, to cloy, or satisfy, because Ceres was the first who satisfied the wants of men by giving them corn. The festival continued during seven days, &c.

Myson, a native of Sparta, one of the seven wise men of Greece. When Anacharsis consulted the oracle of Apollo, to know which was the wisest man in Greece, he received for answer, he who was now ploughing his fields. This was Myson. Diog. in Vit.

Mystes, a son of the poet Valgius, whose early death was so lamented by the father, that Horace wrote an ode to allay the grief of his friend. Horat. 2, od. 9.

Mythecus, a sophist of Syracuse. He studied cookery, and when he thought himself sufficiently skilled in dressing meat, he went to Sparta, where he gained much practice, especially among the younger citizens. He was soon after expelled the city by the magistrates, who observed that the aid of Mythecus was unnecessary, as hunger was the best seasoning.

Mylène. Vid. Mitylene.

Myus (Myuntis), a town of Ionia on the confines of Caria, founded by a Grecian colony. It is one of the 12 capital cities of Ionia, situate at the distance of about 30 stadia from the mouth of the Mæander. Artaxerxes king of Persia gave it to Themistocles to maintain him in meat. Magnesia was to support him in bread, and Lampsacus in wine. C. Nep. in Themist.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 4, c. 142.—Diod. 11.

NABAZANES, an officer of Darius III., at the battle of Issus. He conspired with Bessus to murder his royal master, either to obtain the favour of Alexander or to seize the kingdom. He was pardoned by Alexander. Curt. 3, &c. Diod. 17.

Nabathæna, a country of Arabia, of which the capital was called Petra. The word is often applied to any of the eastern countries of the world by the poets, and seems to be derived from Nabath the son of Ishmael. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 61. l. 5, v. 163.—Strab. 16.—Lucan. 4, v. 63.—Juv. 11, v. 126.—Seneca. in Her. Cel. 160, &c.

Nabis, a celebrated tyrant of Lacedæmon, who in all acts of cruelty and oppression surpassed a Phalaris or a Dionysius. His house was filled with flatterers and with spies, who were continually employed in watching the words and the actions of his subjects. When he had exercised every art in plundering the citizens of Sparta, he made a statue, which in resemblance was like his wife, and was clothed in the most magnificent apparel, and whenever any one refused to deliver up his riches, the tyrant led him to the statue, which immediately, by means of secret springs, seized him in its arms, and tormented him in the most excruciating manner with bearded points and prickles, hid under the clothes. To render his tyranny more popular, Nabis made an alliance with Flaminius the Roman general, and pursued with the most inveterate enmity the war which he had undertaken against the Achæans. He besieged Gythium and defeated Philopœmen in a naval battle. His triumph was short; the general of the Achæans soon repaired his losses, and Nabis was defeated in an engagement, and treacherously murdered, as he attempted to save his life by flight, B.C. 197, after a usurpation of 14 years. Polyb. 13.—Justin. 30 & 31.—Plut. in Phil.—Paus. 7, c. 8.—Flor. 2, c. 7.—A priest of Jupiter Ammon, killed in the second Punic war, as he fought against the Romans. Sil. 15, v. 672.

Nabonassar, a king of Babylon, after the division of the Assyrian monarchy. From him the Nabonassaræan epoch received its name, agreeing with the year of the world 3237, or 746 B.C.

Nacri camp, a place of Gallia Togata near Mutina. Liv. 41, c. 18.

Nadagara. Vid. Nagara.

Nænia, the goddess of funerals at Rome, whose temple was without the gates of the city. The songs which were sung at funerals were also called nænia. They were generally filled with the praises of the deceased, but sometimes they were so unmeaning and improper, that the word became proverbial to signify nonsense. Varro de Vitâ P. R.—Plaut. Asin. 42, c. 1, v. 63.

On. Nævius, a Latin poet in the first Punic war. He was originally in the Roman armies, but afterwards he applied himself to study and wrote comedies, besides a poetical account of the first Punic war, in which he had served. His satirical disposition displeased the consul Metellus, who drove him from Rome. He passed the rest of his life in Utica, where he died, about 203 years before the christian era. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. Cic. Tus. 1, c. 1, de Senect.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, c. 53.—A tribune of the people at Rome, who accused Scipio Africanus of extortion.—An augur in the reign of Tarquin. To convince the king and the Romans of his power as an augur, he cut a flint with a razor, and turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. Tarquin rewarded his merit by erecting to him a statue in the comitium, which was still in being in the age of Augustus. The razor and flint were buried near it under an altar, and it was usual among the Romans to make witnesses in civil causes swear near it. This miraculous event of cutting a flint with a razor, though believed by some writers, is treated as fabulous and improbable by Cicero, who himself had been an augur. Dionys. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 36.—Cic. de Divin. 1, c. 17. De N. D. 2, c. 3. l. 2, c. 6.

Naharvalli, a people of Germany. Tacit. Germ. 43.

Naiades, or Naiades, certain inferior deities who presided over rivers, springs, wells, and fountains. The Naiades generally inhabited the country, and resorted to the woods or meadows near the stream over which they presided, whence the name (naeo, to flow). They are represented as young and beautiful virgins, often leaning upon an urn, from which flows a stream of water. Egle was the fairest of the Naiades, according to Virgil. They were held in great veneration among the ancients, and often sacrifices of goats and lambs were offered to them, with libations of wine, honey, and oil. Sometimes they received only offerings of milk, fruit, and flowers. Vid. Nymphæ. Virg. Ecl.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 328.—Homer. Od. 13.

Nais, one of the Oceanides, mother of Chiron or Glauco by Magnes. Apollo. 1, c. 9.—A nymph, mother by Eucoion of Egeus and Pedasus. Homer. Il. 6.—A nymph in an island of the Red sea, who by her incantations turned to fishes all those who approached her residence, after she had admitted them to her embraces. She was herself changed into a fish by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 49, &c.—The word is used for water by Tibull. 3, 7.

Naisus, or Nessus, now Nissa, a town of Moesia, the birthplace of Constantine, ascribed by some to Illyricum or Thrace.

Nantuates, a people of Gaul near the Alps. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 1.

Napus, certain divinities among the ancients, who presided over the hills and woods of the country. Some suppose that they were tutelary deities of the fountains, and the Naiades of the sea. Their name is derived from naen, a grove. Virg. G. 4, v. 535.

Napata, a town of Æthiopia.

Naphlus, a river of Peloponnesus, falling into the Alpheus. Paus. 1.

Nar, now Nera, a river of Umbria, whose waters, famous for their sulphureous properties, pass through the lake Velinus, and issuing from thence with great rapidity, fall into the Tiber. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 330.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 517.—Cic. ad Attic. 4, ep. 15.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 79. l. 3, c. 9.

Narbo Martius, now Narbonne, a town of Gaul, founded by the consul Marcus, A.U.C. 636. It became the capital of a large province of Gaul, which obtained the name of Gallia Narbonensis. Pater. 1, c. 15. l. 2, c. 8.—Plin. 3.

Narbonensis Gallia, one of the four great divisions of ancient Gaul, was bounded by the Alps, the Pyrenean mountains, Aquitania, Belgicum, and the Mediterranean, and contained the modern provinces of Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, and Savoie.

Narcæus, a son of Bacchus and Phiscon. Paus. 5, c. 15.

Narcæa, a surname of Minerva in Elis, from her temple there, erected by Narcæus.

Narcissus, a beautiful youth, son of Cephus and the nymph Liriope, born at Thespis in Boeotia. He saw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitless attempts to approach this beautiful object so provoked him, that he grew desperate and killed himself. His blood was changed into a flower, which still bears his name. The nymphs raised a funeral pile to burn his body, according to Ovid, but they found nothing but a beautiful flower. Pausanias says that Narcissus had a sister as beautiful as himself, of whom he became deeply enamoured. He often hunted in the woods in her company, but his pleasure was soon interrupted by her death; and still to keep afresh her memory, he frequented the groves, where he had often attended her, or reposed himself on the brim of a fountain, where the sight of his own reflected image still awakened tender sentiments. Paus. 9, c. 21.—Hygin. fab. 291.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 346, &c.—Philostrat. 1.—A freedman and secretary of Claudius, who abused his trust and the infirmities of his imperial master, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himself. Messalina, the emperor's wife, endeavoured to remove him, but Narcissus sacrificed her to his avarice and resentment. Agrippina, who succeeded in the place of Messalina, was more successful. Narcissus was banished by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himself, A.D. 54. The emperor greatly regretted his loss, as he had found him subservient to his most criminal and extravagant pleasures. Tacit.—Sueton.—A favourite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.—A wretch who strangled the emperor Commodus.

Nargara, a town of Africa, where Hannibal and Scipio came to a parley. Liv. 30, c. 29.

Narisci, a nation of Germany, in the Upper Palatinæ. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

Narnia, or Narna, anciently Nequinum, now Narni, a town of Umbria, washed by the river Nar, from which it received its name. In its neighbourhood are still visible the remains of an aqueduct and of a bridge, erected by Augustus. Liv. 10, c. 9.

Naro, now Narenta, a river of Dalmatia, falling into the Adriatic, and having the town of Narona, now called Narenza, on its banks, a little above the mouth.

Narses, a king of Persia, A.D. 594, defeated by Maximianus Galerius, after a reign of seven years.—A eunuch in the court of Justinian, who was deemed worthy to succeed Belisarius, &c.—A Persian general, &c.

Narthécia, a small island near Samos.

Narycia, Narycium, or Naryx, a town of Magna Græcia, built by a colony of Locrians after the fall of Troy. The place in Greece from which they came bore the same name, and was the country of Ajax Oileus. The word Narycian is more universally understood as applying to the Italian colony, near which pines and other trees grew in abundance. Virg. G. 2, v. 438. Æn. 3, v. 390.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 705.

Nasamones, a savage people of Libya near the Syrtes, who generally lived upon plunder. Curt. 4, c. 7.—Lucan. 9, v. 439.—Herodot. 2, c. 165.—Syl. It. 2, v. 116. l. 11, v. 180.

Nasatio, or Natio, a goddess at Rome who presided over the birth of children. She had a temple at Ardea. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 18.

Nasica, the surname of one of the Scipios. Nasica was the first who invented the measuring of time by water, B.C. 159, about 134 years after the introduction of sun-dials at Rome. Vid. Scipio.—An avaricious fellow who married his daughter to Coranus, a man as mean as himself, that he might not only not repay the money he had borrowed, but moreover become his creditor's heir. Coranus, understanding his meaning, purposely alienated his property from him and his daughter, and exposed him to ridicule. Horat. 2, sat. 5, v. 64, &c.

Nasidionus, a Roman knight, whose luxury, arrogance, and ostentation, exhibited at an entertainment which he gave to Mecenas, were ridiculed by Horace, 2, sat. 8.

L. Nasidius, a man sent by Pompey to assist the people of Massilia. After the battle of Pharsalia, he followed the interests of Pompey's children, and afterwards revolted to Antony. Appian.

Nassus, or Nanus, a town of Acarnania, near the mouth of the Achelous. Liv. 26, c. 24.—Also a part of the town of Syracuse.

Nasua, a general of the Suevi, when Cæsar was in Gaul.

Natilis Antonius, a Roman knight who conspired against Nero with Piso. He was pardoned for discovering the conspiracy, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 50.

Natiso, now Natisone, a river rising in the Alps, and falling into the Adriatic east of Aquileia. Plin. 3, c. 18.

Natta, a man whose manner of living was so mean, that his name became almost proverbial at Rome. Horat. 1, sat. 6, v. 224.

Nava, now Nape, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine at Bingen, below Mentz. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 70.

Naubolus, a charioteer of Laius king of Thebes.—A Phœcean, father of Iphitus. The sons of Iphitus were called Naubolides, from their grandfather.—A son of Lernus, one of the Argonauts.

Nauces, a general of the mercenary troops of Lacedæmon against Thebes, &c.

Naucrætes, a Greek poet, who was employed by Artemisia to write a panegyric upon Mausolus.—Another poet. Athen. 9.—An orator who endeavoured to alienate the cities of Lycia from the interest of Brutus.

Naucrætis, a city of Egypt on the left side of the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It was celebrated for its commerce, and no ship was permitted to land at any other place, but was obliged to sail directly to the city, there to deposit its cargo. It gave birth to Athenæus. The inhabitants were called Naucratite, or Naucratiota. Herodot. 2, c. 97 & 179.—Plin. 5, c. 9.

Navius Actius, a famous augur. Vid. Nevius.

Naulöchus, a maritime town of Sicily near Pelorum.—A town of Thrace on the Euxine sea. Plin. 4, c. 11.—A promontory of the island of Imbros.—A town of the Locri. Plin. 4, c. 3.

Naupactus, or Naupactum, a city of Ætolia, at the mouth of the Evenus, now called Epanto. The word is derived from nave and πηγαίον, because it was there that the Heracleidae built the first ship, which carried them to Peloponnesus. It first belonged to the Locri Ozolæ, and afterwards fell into the hands of the Athenians, who gave it to the Messenians, who had been driven from Peloponnesus by the Lacedæmonians. It became the property of the Lacedæmonians, after the battle of Ægospotamos, and it was restored to the Locri. Philip of Macedonia afterwards took it, and gave it to the Ætolians, from which circumstance it has generally been called one of the chief cities of their country. Strab. 4.—Paus. 4, c. 25.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 43.

Nauplia, a maritime city of Peloponnesus, the naval station of the Argives. The famous fountain Canathos was in its neighbourhood. Paus. 2, c. 38.—Strab. 8.

Naupliades, a patronymic of Palamedes son of Nauplius. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 39.

Nauplius, a son of Neptune and Amynone, king of Eubœa. He was father to the celebrated Palamedes, who was so unjustly sacrificed to the artifice and resentment of Ulysses by the Greeks during the Trojan war. The death of Palamedes highly irritated Nauplius, and to avenge the injustice of the Grecian princes, he attempted to debauch their wives and ruin their character. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius saw them with pleasure distressed in a storm on the coasts of Eubœa, and to make their disaster still more universal, he lighted fires on such places as were surrounded with the most dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be shipwrecked upon the coast. This succeeded, but Nauplius was so disappointed when he saw Ulysses and Diomedes escape from the general calamity, that he threw himself into the sea. According to some mythologists, there were two persons of this name.—A native of Argos, who went to Colchis with Jason. He was son of Neptune and Amynone. The other was king of Eubœa, and lived during the Trojan war. He was, according to some, son of Clytonas, one of the descendants of Nauplius the Argonaut. The Argonaut was remarkable for his knowledge of sea affairs, and of astronomy. He built the town of Nauplia, and sold Auge daughter of Aëtes to king Teuthras, to withdraw her from her father's resentment. Orph. Argon.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Apollon. 1, &c.—Flacc. 1 & 5.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 4, c. 35.—Hygin. fab. 116.

Nauportus, a town of Pannonia on a river of the same name, now called Ober, or Upper Laybach. Veil. Pat. 2, c. 110.—Plin. 3, c. 18.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 20.

Naura, a country of Scythia in Asia. Curt. 8.—Of India within the Ganges. Arrian.

Nausioxa, a daughter of Alcinoüs king of the Phœacians. She met Ulysses shipwrecked on her father's coasts, and it was to her humanity that he owed the kind reception which he experienced from the king. She married, according to Aristotle and Dictys, Telemachus the son of Ulysses, by whom she had a son called Persepolis or Ptoliporthus. Homer. Od. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 126.

Nausicles, an Athenian, sent to assist the Phœcians with 5000 foot, &c.

Nausimenes, an Athenian, whose wife lost her voice from the alarm she received in seeing her son guilty of incest.

Nausithoo, one of the Nereides.

Nausithous, a king of the Phœacians, father to Alcinoüs. He was son of Neptune and Peribœa. Hesiod makes him son of Ulysses and Calypso. Hesiod. Th. 1, v. 16.—The pilot of the vessel which carried Theseus into Crete.

Naustathmus, a port of Phœcia in Ionia. Liv. 37, c. 31.—Also a part of Cyrenaica, now Bendaria. Strab. 17.

Nautæ, a Trojan soothsayer, who comforted Æneas when his fleet had been burnt in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 704. He was the progenitor of the Nautæi at Rome, a family to whom the Palladium of Troy was, in consequence of the service of their ancestors, entrusted. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 794.

Naxos, now Naxia, a celebrated island in the Ægean sea, the largest and most fertile of all the Cyclades, about 105 miles in circumference, and 30 broad. It was formerly called Strongyle, Dis, Diomyssias, and Callipolis, and received the name of Naxos from Naxus, who was at the head of a Carian colony, which settled in the island. Naxos abounds with all sorts of fruits, and its wines are still in the same repute as formerly. The Naxians were anciently governed by kings, but they afterwards exchanged this form of government for a republic, and enjoyed their liberty till the age of Pisistratus, who appointed a tyrant over them. They were reduced by the Persians; but in the expedition of Darius and Xerxes against Greece, they revolted and fought on the side of the Greeks. During the Peloponnesian war, they supported the interest of Athens. Bacchus was the chief deity of the island. The capital was also called Naxos; and near it, on the 20th Sept., B.C. 377, the Lacedæmonians were defeated by Chabrias. Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot.—Diod. 5, &c.—*Ovid. There was also another town at the distance of five miles from Naxos, which bore the same name, and was often called, by contradistinction, Taurominium. Plin. 3.—Diod. 13.—A town of Crete, noted for hones. Plin. 36, c. 7.—A Carian who gave his name to the greatest of the Cyclades.

Nazianzus, a town of Cappadocia where St. Gregory was born, and hence he is called Nazianzenus.

Nea, or Nova insula, a small island between Lemnos and the Hellespont, which rose out of the sea during an earthquake. Plin. 2, c. 87.

Neera, a nymph, mother of Phaëtusa and Lampetia by the Sun. Homer. Od. 12.—A woman mentioned by Virgil's Ecl. 3.—A mistress of the poet Tibullus.—A favourite of Horace.—A daughter of Pereus, who married Aleus, by whom she had Cepheus, Lycurgus, and Auge, who was ravished by Hercules. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 4.—The wife of Autolycus. Paus.—A daughter of Niobe and Amphion.—The wife of Strymon. Apollod.

Neesthus, now Nete, a river of Magna Græcia near Crotone. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 51.

Nealces, a friend of Turmus in his war against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 753.

Nealices, a painter, amongst whose capital pieces are mentioned a painting of Venus, a sea-fight between the Persians and Egyptians, and an ass drinking on the shore, with a crocodile preparing to attack it.

Neandros (or ia), a town of Troas. Plin. 5, c. 30.

Neanthes, an orator and historian of Cyricum, who flourished 257 years B.C.

Neapolis, a city of Campania, anciently called Parthenope, and now known by the name of Naples, rising like an amphitheatre at the back of a beautiful bay 30 miles in circumference. As the capital of that part of Italy, it is now inhabited by upwards of 350,000 souls, who exhibit the opposite marks of extravagant magnificence, and extreme poverty. Augustus called it Neapolis. Suet. in Aug. 98.

—A town in Africa.—A city of Thrace.—A town of Egypt.—of Palestine.—of Ionia.—Also a part of Syracuse. Liv. 25, c. 24.—Cic. in Ver. 5.

Nearchus, an officer of Alexander in his Indian expedition. He was ordered to sail upon the Indian ocean with Onesicritus, and to examine it. He wrote an account of this voyage and of the king's life; but his veracity has been called in question by Arrian. After the king's death he was appointed over Lycia and Pamphylia. Curt. 9, c. 10.—Polyan. 9.—Justin. 12, c. 4.—Strab. 2, &c.—A beautiful youth. &c. Horat. 3, od. 20.—An old man mentioned by Cicero, de Senect.

Nebo, a high mountain near Palestine, beyond Jordan, from the top of which Moses was permitted to view the promised land.

Nebriæsa, a town of Spain, now Lebriza.

Nebrodes, a mountain of Sicily, where the Himera rises. Sil. 14, v. 237.

Nebrophônus, a son of Jason and Hypsipyle. Apollod.—One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3.

Nebulis, a name given to Nephele the wife of Athamas. Lactant. ad Arch. Stat. 1, c. 65.

Necessitas, a divinity who presided over the destinies of mankind, and who was regarded as the mother of the Parca. Paus. 2, c. 4.

Nechos, a king of Egypt, who attempted to make a communication between the Mediterranean and Red seas, B.C. 610. No less than 12,000 men perished in the attempt. It was discovered in his reign that Africa was circumnavigable. Herodot. 2, c. 158. l. 4, c. 42.

Neoropolis, one of the suburbs of Alexandria.

Neotanebus and Nectanæbis, a king of Egypt, who defended his country against the Persians, and was succeeded by Tachos, B.C. 363. His grandson, of the same name, made an alliance with Agésilæus king of Sparta, and with his assistance he quelled a rebellion of his subjects. Some time after he was joined by the Sidonians, Phœnicians, and inhabitants of Cyprus, who had revolted from the king of Persia. This powerful confederacy was soon attacked by Darius the king of Persia, who marched at the head of his troops. Nectanebus, to defend his frontiers against so dangerous an enemy, levied 20,000 mercenary soldiers in Greece, the same number in Libya, and 60,000 were furnished in Egypt. This numerous body was not equal to the Persian forces; and Nectanebus, defeated in a battle, gave up all hopes of resistance, and fled into Æthiopia, B.C. 350, where he found a safe asylum. His kingdom of Egypt became from that time tributary to the king of Persia. Plut. Ages.—Diod. 16, &c.—Polyan.—C. Nep. in Ages.

Necyria, a solemnity observed by the Greeks in memory of the dead.

Nels, the wife of Eudymion. Apollod.

Neleus, a son of Neptune and Tyro. He was brother to Pelias, with whom he was exposed by his mother, who wished to conceal her infirmities from her father. They were preserved and brought to Tyro, who had then married Cretheus king of Iolchos. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus seized the kingdom of Iolchos, which belonged to Æson, the lawful son of Tyro by the deceased monarch. After they had reigned for some time conjointly, Pelias expelled Neleus from Iolchos. Neleus came to Aphareus king of Messenia, who treated him with kindness, and permitted him to build a city, which he called Pylus. Neleus married Chloris the daughter of Amphion, by whom he had a daughter and 12 sons, who were all, except Nestor, killed by Hercules, together with their father. Neleus promised his daughter in marriage only to him who brought him the bulls of Iphiclus. Bias was the successful lover. Vid. Melampus. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 418.—Paus. 4, c. 36.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 6.—A river of Eubœa.

Nemœa, a town of Argolis between Cleonæ and Phlius, with a wood, where Hercules, in the 16th year of his age, killed the celebrated Nemæan lion. This animal, born of the hundred-headed Typhon, infested the neighbourhood of Nemœa, and kept the inhabitants under continual alarms. It was the first labour of Hercules to destroy it; and the hero, when he found that his arrows and his club were useless against an animal whose skin was hard and impenetrable, seized him in his arms and squeezed him to death. The conqueror clothed himself in the skin, and games were instituted to commemorate so great an event. The Nemæan games were originally instituted by the Argives in honour of Archemorus, who died by the bite of a serpent [Vid. Archemorus], and Hercules some time after renewed them. They were one of the four great and solemn games which were observed in Greece. The Argives, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonæ generally presided by turns at the celebration, in which were exhibited foot and horse races, chariot races, boxing, wrestling, and contests of every kind, both gymnical and equestrian. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of olives, afterwards of green parsley, in memory of the adventure of Archemorus, whom his nurse laid down on a sprig of that plant. They were celebrated every third, or, according to others, every fifth year, or more properly on the first and third year of every Olympiad, on the 15th day of the Corinthian month Panemos, which corresponds to our August. They served as an era to the Argives, and to the inhabitants of the neighbouring country. It was always usual for an orator to pronounce a funeral oration in memory of the death of Archemorus, and those who distributed the prizes were always dressed in mourning. *Liv. 27, c. 30 & 31, l. 34, c. 41.—Ovid. Nemausus, a town of Gaul, in Linguædoc, near the mouth of the Rhone, now Nismes.

Nemesis, festivals in honour of Nemesis. Vid. Nemesis.

M. Aurel. Olymp. Nemesianus, a Latin poet, born at Carthage, of no very brilliant talents, in the third century, whose poems on hunting and bird-catching were published by Burman, interscriptores rei venaticæ, 4to, L. Bat. 1728.

Nēmēsis, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddess of vengeance, always prepared to punish impiety, and at the same time liberally to reward the good and virtuous. She is made one of the Fœcæ by some mythologists, and is represented with a helm and a wheel. The people of Smyrna were the first who made her statues with wings, to show with what celerity she is prepared to punish the crimes of the wicked, both by sea and land, as the helm and the wheel in her hands intimate. Her power did not only exist in this life, but she was also employed after death to find out the most effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemesis was particularly worshipped at Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated statue to cubits long, made of Parian marble by Phidias, or, according to others, by one of his pupils. The Romans were also particularly attentive to the adoration of a deity whom they solemnly invoked, and to whom they offered sacrifices before they declared war against their enemies, to show the world that their wars were undertaken upon the most just grounds. Her statue at Rome was in the Capitol. Some suppose that Nemesis was the person whom Jupiter deceived in the form of a swan, and that Leda was entrusted with the care of the children which sprang from the two eggs. Others observe that Leda obtained the name of Nemesis after death. According to Pausanias, there were more than one Nemesis. The goddess Nemesis was surnamed Rhamnusia because worshipped at Rhamnus, and Adrastia from the temple which Adrastus king of Argos erected to her, when he went against Thebes, to revenge the indignities which his son-in-law Polyneices had suffered in being unjustly driven from his kingdom by Eteocles. The Greeks celebrated a festival called Nemesisia, in memory of deceased persons, as the goddess Nemesis was supposed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all insult. *Hygin. P. Nemestius, a Greek writer, whose elegant and useful treatise, de Natura Hominis, was edited in 1660, Ant. apud Plant. 1565, and in 8vo, Oxon. 1671.

Nemetacum, a town of Gaul, now Arras.

Nemetes, a nation of Germany, now forming the inhabitants of Spire, which was afterwards called Noviomagus. Facti. de Germ. 28.

Nemorialis, festivals observed in the woods of Aricia, in honour of Diana, who presided over the country and the forests, on which account that part of Italy was sometimes denominated Nemorensis ager. Ovid. de A. 1, v. 259.

Nemossus (or um), the capital of the Arverni in Gaul, now Clermont. Lucan. 1, v. 429.—Strab. 4.

Neobûle, a daughter of Lycambes, betrothed to the poet Archilochus. Vid. Lycambes. Horat. ep. 6, v. 13, l. 1, ep. 3, v. 79.—Ovid. in lb. 54.—A beautiful woman, to whom Horace addressed 3 od. 12.

Neocæsaria, a town of Pontus.

Neochabis, a king of Egypt.

Neocles, an Athenian philosopher, father, or according to Cicero, brother to the philosopher Epicurus. Cic. 1, de Nat. D. c. 21.—Diog.—The father of Themistocles. Ælian. V. H. 2, &c.—C. Nep. in Them.

Neogones, a man who made himself absolute, &c. Diod. 15.

Neon, a town of Phocis.—There was also another of the same name in the same country, on the top of Parassus. It was afterwards called Tithorea. Plut. in Syll.—Paus. Phoc.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.—One of the commanders of the 10,000 Greeks who assisted Cyrus against Artaxerxes.

Neontichos, a town of Æolia near the Hermus. Herodot.—Plin.

Neoptôlemus, a king of Epirus, son of Achilles and Deïdamia, called Pyrrhus from the yellow colour of his hair. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother, and gave early proofs of his valour. After the death of Achilles, Calchas declared, in the assembly of the Greeks, that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of the son of the deceased hero. Immediately upon this, Ulysses and Phoenix were commissioned to bring Pyrrhus to the war. He returned with them with pleasure, and received the name of Neoptolemus (new soldier), because he had come late to the field. On his arrival before Troy, he paid a visit to the tomb of his father, and wept over his ashes. He afterwards, according to some authors, accompanied Ulysses to Lemnos, to engage Philoctetes to come to the Trojan war. He greatly signalized himself during the remaining time of the siege, and he was the first who entered the wooden horse. He was inferior to none of the Grecian warriors in valour, and Ulysses and Nestor alone could claim a superiority over him in eloquence, wisdom, and address. His cruelty, however, was as great as that of his father. Not satisfied with breaking down the gates of Priam's palace, he exercised the greatest barbarities upon the remains of his family, and without any regard to the sanctity of the place where Priam had taken refuge, he slaughtered him without mercy; or, according to others, dragged him by the hair to the tomb of his father, where he sacrificed him, and where he cut off his head, and carried it in exultation through the streets of Troy, fixed on the point of a spear. He also sacrificed Astyanax to his fury, and immolated Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles, according to those who deny that that sacrifice was voluntary. When Troy was taken, the captives were divided among the conquerors, and Pyrrhus had for his share Andromache the widow of Hector, and Helenus the son of Priam. With these he departed for Greece, and he probably escaped from destruction by giving credit to the words of Helenus, who foretold him that, if he sailed with the rest of the Greeks, his voyage would be attended with fatal consequences, and perhaps with death. This obliged him to take a different course from the rest of the Greeks, and he travelled over the greatest part of Thrace, where he had a severe encounter with queen Harpalycæ. Vid. Harpalycæ. The place of his retirement after the Trojan war is not known. Some maintain that he went to Thessaly, where his grandfather still reigned; but this is confuted by others, who observe, perhaps with more reason, that he went to Epirus, where he laid the foundation of a new kingdom, because his grandfather Peleus had been deprived of his sceptre by Acastus the son of Pelias. Neoptolemus lived with Andromache after his arrival in Greece, but it is unknown whether he treated her as a lawful wife or a concubine. He had a son by this unfortunate princess, called Molossus, and two others, if we rely on the authority of Pausanias. Besides Andromache, he married Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, as also Lanassa the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the descendants of Hercules. The cause of his death is variously related. Menelaus, before the Trojan war, had promised his daughter Hermione to Orstes, but the services he experienced from the valour and the courage of Neoptolemus during the siege of Troy, induced him to reward his merit by making him his son-in-law. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but Hermione became jealous of Andromache, and because she had no children, she resolved to destroy her Trojan rival, who seemed to steal away the affections of their common husband. In the absence of Neoptolemus at Delphi, Hermione attempted to murder Andromache, but she was prevented by the interference of Peleus, or, according to others, of the populace. When she saw her schemes defeated, she determined to lay violent hands upon herself, to avoid the resentment of Neoptolemus. The sudden arrival of Orstes changed her resolution, and she consented to elope with her lover to Sparta. Orstes at the same time, to revenge and to punish his rival, caused him to be assassinated in the temple of Delphi, and he was murdered at the foot of the altar by Machareus the priest, or by the hand of Orstes himself, according to Virgil, Paternulus, and Hyginus. Some say that he was murdered by the Delphians, who had been bribed by the presents of Orstes. It is unknown why Neoptolemus went to Delphi. Some suppose that he wished to consult the oracle to know how he might have children by the barren Hermione; others say that he went thither to offer the spoils which he had obtained during the Trojan war, to appease the resentment of Apollo, whom he had provoked by calling him the cause of the death of Achilles. The plunder of the rich temple of Delphi, if we believe others, was the object of the journey of Neoptolemus, and it cannot but be observed that he suffered the same death and the same barbarities which he had inflicted in the temple of Minerva upon the aged Priam and his wretched family. From this circumstance, the ancients have made use of the proverb Neoptolemus revenge, when a person had suffered the same savage treatment which others had received from his hand. The Delphians celebrated a festival with great pomp and solemnity in memory of Neoptolemus, who had been slain in his attempt to plunder their temple, because, as they said, Apollo, the patron of the place, had been in some manner accessory to the death of Achilles. Paterc. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. Nephele, the first wife of Athamas king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle. She was repudiated on pretence of being subject to fits of insanity, and Athamas married Ino the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had several children. Ino became jealous of Nephele, because her children would succeed to their father's throne before hers, by right of seniority, and she resolved to destroy them. Nephele was apprised of her wicked intentions, and she removed her children from the reach of Ino, by giving them a celebrated ram, sprung from the union of Neptune and Theophrane, on whose back they escaped to Colchis. Vid. Phryxus. Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud, whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds. Some call her Nebula, which word is the Latin translation of Nephele. The fleece of the ram, which saved the life of Nephele's children, is often called the Nephelean fleece. Apollod. 2, c. 9.—Hygin. 2, &c.—*Ovid. Nepherites, a king of Egypt, who assisted the Spartans against Persia, when Agesilaus was in Asia. He sent them a fleet of 100 ships, which were intercepted by Conon, as they were sailing towards Rhodes, &c. Diod. 14.

Nephus, a son of Hercules.

Nepia, a daughter of Jasus, who married Olympus king of Mysia, whence the plains of Mysia are sometimes called Nepia campi.

Nepos, Corn., a celebrated historian in the reign of Augustus. He was born at Hostilia, and, like the rest of his learned contemporaries, he shared the favours and enjoyed the patronage of the emperor. He was the intimate friend of Cicero and of Atticus, and recommended himself to the notice of the great and opulent by delicacy of sentiment and a lively disposition. According to some writers, he composed three books of chronicles, as also a biographical account of all the most celebrated kings, generals, and authors of antiquity. Of all his valuable compositions, nothing remains but his lives of the illustrious Greek and Roman generals, which have often been attributed to Æmilius Probus, who published them in his own name in the age of Theodosius, to conciliate the favour and the friendship of that emperor. The language of Cornelius has always been admired, and as a writer of the Augustan age, he is entitled to many commendations for the delicacy of his expressions, the elegance of his style, and the clearness and precision of his narrations. Some support that he translated Dares Phrygius from the Greek original; but the inelegance of the diction, and its many incorrect expressions, plainly prove that it is the production, not of a writer of the Augustan age, but the spurious composition of a more modern pen. Cornelius speaks of his account of the Greek historians in Dion. c. 3. Among the many good editions of Cornelius Nepos, two may be selected as the best, that of Verheyk, 8vo, L. Bat. 1773, and that of Glasgow, 12mo, 1761.—Julius, an emperor of the west, &c.

Nepotianus Flavius Popilius, a son of Eutropia the sister of the emperor Constantine. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of his cousin Constans, and rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He was murdered by Anicetus, after one month's reign, and his family were involved in his ruin.

Nephtys, wife of Typhon, became enamoured of Osiris her brother-in-law, and introduced herself to his bed. She had a son called Anubis by him. Plut. in Isis.

Neptuni fanum, a place near Cenchræ. Mela, 1, c. 19.—Another in the island of Calauria.—Another near Mantinea.

Neptunia, a town and colony of Magna Græcia.

Neptunium, a promontory of Arabia at the entrance of the gulf.

Neptunius, an epithet applied to Sext. Pompey, because he believed himself to be god of the sea, or descended from him, on account of his superiority in ships, &c. Horat. Epod. 9.—Dion. 48.

Neptunus, a god, son of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto, and Juno. He was devoured by his father the day of his birth, and again restored to life by means of Metis, who gave Saturn a certain potion. Pausanias says that his mother concealed him in a sheepfold in Arcadia, and that she imposed upon her husband, telling him that she had brought a colt into the world, which was instantly devoured by Saturn. Neptune shared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the sea. This, however, did not seem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed, therefore he conspired to dethrone him, with the rest of the gods. The conspiracy was discovered, and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. Vid. Laomedon. A reconciliation was soon after made, and Neptune was reinstated to all his rights and privileges. Neptune disputed with Minerva the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, but he was defeated, and the olive which the goddess suddenly raised from the earth was deemed more serviceable for the good of mankind than the horse which Neptune had produced by striking the ground with his trident, as that animal is the emblem of war and slaughter. This decision did not please Neptune; he renewed the combat by disputing for Troæze, but Jupiter settled their disputes by permitting them to be conjointly worshipped there, and by giving the name of Polias, or the protectress of the city, to Minerva, and that of king of Troæze to the god of the sea. He also disputed his right for the isthmus of Corinth with Apollo; and Briareus the Cyclops, who was mutually chosen umpire, gave the isthmus to Neptune, and the promontory to Apollo. Neptune, as being god of the sea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only the ocean, rivers, and fountains were subjected to him, but he also could cause earthquakes at his pleasure, and raise islands from the bottom of the sea with a blow of his trident. The worship of Neptune was established in almost every part of the earth, and the Libyans in particular venerated him above all other nations, and looked upon him as the first and greatest of the gods. The Greeks and the Romans were also attached to his worship, and they celebrated their isthmian games and Consualia with the greatest solemnity. He was generally represented sitting in a chariot made of a shell, and drawn by sea-horses or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horses, and holds his trident in his hand, and stands up as his chariot flies over the surface of the sea. Homer represents him as issuing from the sea, and in three steps crossing the whole horizon. The mountains and the forests, says the poet, trembled as he walked; the whales, and all the fishes of the sea, appear round him, and even the sea herself seems to feel the presence of her god. The ancients generally sacrificed a bull and a horse on his altars, and the Roman soothsayers always offered to him the gall of the victims, which in taste resembles the bitterness of the sea water. The amours of Neptune are numerous. He obtained, by means of a dolphin, the favours of Amphitrite, who had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, and he placed among the constellations the fish which had persuaded the goddess to become his wife. He also married Venilia and Salacia, which are only the names of Amphitrite according to some authors, who observed that the former word is derived from venire, alluding to the continual motion of the sea. Salacia is derived from Salum, which signifies the sea, and is applicable to Amphitrite. Neptune became a horse to enjoy the company of Ceres. Vid. Arion. To deceive Theophane, he changed himself into a ram. Vid. Theophane. He assumed the form of the river Enipeus, to gain the confidence of Tyro the daughter of Salmones, by whom he had Pelias and Neleus. He was also father of Phorcus and Polyphemus by Thoosa; of Lycus, Nycteus, and Euphemus by Celeno; of Chryses by Chrysogetia; of Aeneas by Astypalea; of Boeotus and Helen by Antiope; of Leucocoe by Themisto; of Agenor and Bellerophon by Eurynome the daughter of Nysus; of Antas by Alcycne the daughter of Atlas; of Abas by Arethusa; of Actor and Dictys by Agemede the daughter of Augias; of Megareus by Cenope daughter of Epopeus; of Cycnus by Harpalyc; of Taras, Otus, Ephialtes, Dorus, Alesus, &c. The word Neptunus is often used metaphorically by the poets, to signify sea water. In the Consualia of the Romans, horses were led through the streets finely equipped and crowned with garlands, as the god in whose honour the festivals were instituted had produced the horse, an animal so beneficial for the use of mankind. Paus. 1, 2, &c.—*Homer. Nereïdæ, nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were 50, according to the greater number of the mythologists, whose names are as follows: Sao, Amphitrite, Proto, Galatæa, Thoe, Eucrate, Eudora, Galena, Glaucæ, Thetis, Spio, Cymothoe, Melita, Thalia, Agave, Eulimene, Erato, Pasithea, Doto, Eunice, Nesea, Dynamene, Pherusa, Protomelia, Actæa, Panope, Doris, Cymatolege, Hippothoe, Cymo, Eione, Hippocoe, Cymodoce, Neso, Empoupe, Pronoe, Themisto, Glaucocome, Halimede, Pontoporia, Evagora, Liagora, Polymone, Laomedia, Lysianassa, Autocone, Menippe, Evarne, Pasmathe, Nemertes. In those which Homer mentions, to the number of 30, we find the following names different from those spoken of by Hesiod: Halia, Limmoria, Iera, Amphitroë, Dezanene, Amphimone, Callianira, Apsudea, Callanassa, Clymene, Janira, Nassa, Mera, Orythya, Amatheia. Apollodoros, who mentions 45, mentions the following names different from the others: Glaucothoe, Protomedusa, Pione, Plesaura, Calypso, Cranto, Neomere, Dejanira, Polynoe, Melia, Dione, Isera, Dero, Eumolpe, Ione, Ceto. Hyginus and others differ from the preceding authors in the following names: Drymo, Xantho, Ligea, Phyllodoce, Cydippe, Lycorias, Cleio, Berce, Ephira, Opis, Asia, Deopea, Arethusa, Crenis, Eurydice, and Leucothoe. The Nereides were employed as the rest of the deities; they had altars chiefly on the coast of the sea, where the piety of mankind made offerings of milk, oil, and honey, and often of the flesh of goats. When they were on the sea-shore they generally resided in grottos and caves which were adorned with shells, and shaded by the branches of vines. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the sea, and to be subservient to the will of Neptune. They were particularly fond of alcyons, and as they had the power of ruffling or calming the waters, they were always addressed by sailors, who implored their protection, that they might grant them a favourable voyage and a prosperous return. They are represented as young and handsome virgins, sitting on dolphins and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or sometimes garlands of flowers. Orpheus. Hymn. 23.—*Catul. de Rept. Nereus, a name given to Achilles, as son of Thetis, who was one of the Nereides. Horat. ep. 17, v. 8.

Nereus, a deity of the sea, son of Oceanus and Terra. He married Doris, by whom he had 50 daughters, called the Nereides. Vid. Nereides. Nereus was generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and hair of an azure colour. The chief place of his residence was in the Ægean sea, where he was surrounded by his daughters, who often danced in choruses round him. He had the gift of prophecy, and informed those that consulted him with the different fates that attended them. He acquainted Paris with the consequences of his elopement with Helen; and it was by his directions that Hercules obtained the golden apples of the Hesperides. But the sea-god often evaded the importunities of inquirers by assuming different shapes, and totally escaping from their grasp. The word Nereus is often taken for the sea itself. Nereus is sometimes called the most ancient of all the gods. Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin.—Homer. Il. 18.—Apollod.—Orpheus. Argon.—Horat. 1, od. 13.—Eurip. in Iphig.

Neris, or Nerisæ, the wife of Mars. Gell. B. c. 21.

Neriphus, a desert island near the Thracian Chersonesus.

Neritos, a mountain in the island of Ithaca, as also a small island in the Ionian sea, according to Mela. The word Neritos is often applied to the whole island of Ithaca, and Ulysses the king of it is called Neritus dux, and his ship Neritis navis. The people of Saguntum, as descended from a Neritian colony, are called Neritia proles. Sil. 11, v. 317.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 271.—Plin. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 712. *Rom. Neritum, a town of Calabria, now called Nardo.

Nerius, a silversmith in the age of Horace, 2, sat. 3, v. 69.—A usurer in Nero's age, who was so eager to get money that he married as often as he could, and as soon destroyed his wives by poison, to possess himself of their estates. Terr. 2, v. 14.

Nero Claudius Domitius Cæsar, a celebrated Roman emperor, son of Caius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A.D. 50, and four years after he succeeded to him on the throne. The beginning of his reign was marked by acts of the greatest kindness and condescension, by affability, complaisance, and popularity. The object of his administration seemed to be the good of his people; and when he was desired to sign his name to a list of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, "I wish to heaven I could not write." He was an enemy to flattery, and when the senate had liberally commended the wisdom of his government, Nero desired them to keep their praises till he deserved them. These promising virtues were soon discovered to be artificial, and Nero displayed the propensities of his nature. He delivered himself from the sway of his mother, and at last ordered her to be assassinated. This unnatural act of barbarity might astonish some of the Romans, but Nero had his devoted adherents; and when he declared that he had taken away his mother's life to save himself from ruin, the senate applauded his measures, and the people signified their approbation. Many of his courtiers shared the unhappy fate of Agrippina, and Nero sacrificed to his fury or caprice all such as obstructed his pleasure, or diverted his inclination. In the night he generally sallied out from his palace, to visit the meanest taverns and all the scenes of debauchery which Rome contained. In this nocturnal riot he was fond of insulting the people in the streets, and his attempts to offer violence to the wife of a Roman senator nearly cost him his life. He also turned actor, and publicly appeared on the Roman stage in the meanest characters. In his attempts to excel in music, and to conquer the disadvantages of a hoarse, rough voice, he moderated his meals, and often passed the day without eating. The celebrity of the Olympian games attracted his notice. He passed into Greece, and presented himself as a candidate for the public honours. He was defeated in wrestling, but the flattery of the spectators adjudged him the victory, and Nero returned to Rome with all the pomp and splendour of an eastern conqueror, drawn in the chariot of Augustus, and attended by a band of musicians, actors, and stage dancers, from every part of the empire. These private and public amusements of the emperor were indeed innocent; his character was injured, but not the lives of the people. But his conduct soon became more abominable; he disguised himself in the habit of a woman, and was publicly married to one of his eunuchs. This violence to nature and decency was soon exchanged for another; Nero resumed his sex, and celebrated his nuptials with one of his meanest catamites, and it was on this occasion that one of the Romans observed that the world would have been happy if Nero's father had had such a wife. But now his cruelty was displayed in a more superlative degree, and he sacrificed to his wantonness his wife Octavia Poppea, and the celebrated writers, Seneca, Lucan, Petronius, &c. The Christians also did not escape his barbarity. He had heard of the burning of Troy, and as he wished to renew that dismal scene, he caused Rome to be set on fire in different places. The conflagration became soon universal, and during nine successive days the fire was unextinguished. All was desolation; nothing was heard but the lamentations of mothers whose children had perished in the flames, the groans of the dying, and the continual fall of palaces and buildings. Nero was the only one who enjoyed the general consternation. He placed himself on the top of a high tower, and he sang on his lyre the destruction of Troy, a dreadful scene which his barbarity had realized before his eyes. He attempted to avert the public odium from his head, by a feigned commiseration of the miseries of his subjects. He began to repair the streets and the public buildings at his own expense. He built himself a celebrated palace, which he called his golden house. It was profusely adorned with gold and precious stones, and with whatever was rare and exquisite. It contained spacious fields, artificial lakes, woods, gardens, orchards, and whatever could exhibit beauty and grandeur. The entrance of this edifice could admit a large colossus of the emperor 120 feet high; the galleries were each a mile long, and the whole was covered with gold. The roofs of the dining halls represented the firmament in motion as well as in figure, and continually turned round night and day, showering down all sorts of perfumes and sweet waters. When this grand edifice, which, according to Pliny, extended all round the city, was finished, Nero said, that now he could lodge like a man. His profusion was not less remarkable in all his other actions. When he went a-fishing, his nets were made with gold and silk. He never appeared twice in the same garment, and when he undertook a voyage, there were thousands of servants to take care of his wardrobe. This continuation of debauchery and extravagance at last roused the resentment of the people. Many conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but they were generally discovered, and such as were necessary suffered the greatest punishments. The most dangerous conspiracy against Nero's life was that of Piso, from which he was delivered by the confession of a slave. The conspiracy of Calpa proved more successful; and the conspirator, when he was informed that his plot was known to Nero, declared himself emperor. The unpopularity of Nero favoured his cause; he was acknowledged by all the Roman empire, and the senate condemned the tyrant that sat on the throne to be dragged naked through the streets of Rome, and whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock like the meanest malefactor. This, however, was not done, and Nero, by a voluntary death, prevented the execution of the sentence. He killed himself, A.D. 68, in the 32nd year of his age, after a reign of thirteen years and eight months. Rome was filled with acclamations at the intelligence, and the citizens, more strongly to indicate their joy, wore caps such as were generally used by slaves who had received their freedom. Their vengeance was not only exercised against the statues of the deceased tyrant, but his friends were the objects of the public resentment, and many were crushed to pieces in such a violent manner, that one of the senators, amid the universal joy, said that he was afraid they should soon have cause to wish for Nero. The tyrant, as he expired, begged that his head might not be cut off from his body, and exposed to the insolence of an enraged populace, but that the whole might be burned on the funeral pile. His request was granted by one of Calpa's freedmen, and his obsequies were performed with the usual ceremonies. Though his death seemed to be the source of universal gladness, yet many of his favourites lamented his fall, and were grieved to see that their pleasures and amusements were stopped by the death of the patron of debauchery and extravagance. Even the king of Parthia sent ambassadors to Rome to condole with the Romans, and to beg that they would honour and revere the memory of Nero. His statues were also crowned with garlands of flowers, and many believed that he was not dead, but that he would soon make his appearance, and take a due vengeance upon his enemies. It will be sufficient to observe, in finishing the character of this tyrannical emperor, that the name of Nero is even now used emphatically to express a barbarous and unfeeling oppressor. Pliny calls him the common enemy and the fury of mankind, and in this he has been followed by all writers, who exhibit Nero as the pattern of the most execrable barbarity and unpardonable wantonness. Plut. in Galb.—Suet. in Vita.—Plin. 7, c. 8, Rec.—Dio. 64.—Aurel. Vict.—Tact. Ann.

Ann.—Claudius, a Roman general sent into Spain to succeed the two Scipios. He suffered himself to be imposed upon by Asdrubal, and was soon after succeeded by young Scipio. He was afterwards made consul, and intercepted Asdrubal, who was passing from Spain into Italy with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. An engagement was fought near the river Metaurus, in which 56,000 of the Carthaginians were left on the field of battle, and great numbers taken prisoners, 207 B.C. Asdrubal the Carthaginian general was also killed, and his head cut off and thrown into his brother's camp by the conquerors. Appian. in Hann.—Oros. 4.—Liv. 27, c. 8.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—Another, who opposed Cicero when he wished to punish with death such as were accessory to Catiline's conspiracy.—A son of Germanicus, who was ruined by Sejanus, and banished from Rome by Tiberius. He died in the place of his exile. His death was voluntary, according to some. Sueton. in Tiber.—Domitian was called Nero, because his cruelties surpassed those of his predecessors, and also Calvus, from the baldness of his head. Juv. 4.—The Neros were of the Claudian family, which, during the republican times of Rome, was honoured with 28 consulships, five dictatorships, six triumphs, seven censorships, and two ovations. They assumed the surname of Nero, which, in the language of the Sabines, signifies strong and warlike.

NERONIA, a name given to Artaxata by Tirdates, who had been restored to his kingdom by Nero, whose favours he acknowledged by calling the capital of his dominions after the name of his benefactor.

NERONIÆNE Thermae, baths at Rome, made by the emperor Nero.

Nertobrigia, a town of Spain on the Bilibis.

Nerva Cocceius, a Roman emperor after the death of Domitian, A.D. 96. He rendered himself popular by his mildness, his generosity, and the active part he took in the management of affairs. He suffered no statues to be raised to his honour, and he applied to the use of the government all the gold and silver statues which flattery had erected to his predecessor. In his civil character he was the pattern of good manners, of sobriety, and temperance. He forbade the mutilation of male children, and gave no countenance to the law which permitted the marriage of an uncle with his niece.

He made a solemn declaration that no senator should suffer death during his reign; and thus he observed with such sanctity that, when two members of the senate had conspired against his life, he was satisfied to tell them that he was informed of their wicked machinations. He also conducted them to the public spectacles, and seated himself between them, and when a sword was offered to him, according to the usual custom, he desired the conspirators to try it upon his body. Such goodness of heart, such confidence in the self-conviction of the human mind, and such reliance upon the consequence of his lenity and indulgence, conciliated the affection of all his subjects. Yet, as envy and danger are the constant companions of greatness, the pretorian guards at last mutinied, and Nerva nearly yielded to their fury. He uncovered his aged neck in the presence of the incensed soldiery, and bade them wreak their vengeance upon him, provided they spared the life of those to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom his honour commanded him to defend. His seeming submission was unavailing, and he was at last obliged to surrender to the fury of his soldiers some of his friends and supporters. The infirmities of his age, and his natural timidity, at last obliged him to provide himself against any future rout or tumult, by choosing a worthy successor. He had many friends and relations, but he did not consider the aggrandizement of his family, and he chose for his son and successor Trajan, a man of whose virtues and greatness of mind he was fully convinced. This voluntary choice was approved by the acclamations of the people, and the wisdom and prudence which marked the reign of Trajan showed how discerning was the judgment, and how affectionate were the intentions, of Nerva for the good of Rome. He died on the 27th of July, A.D. 98, in his 72nd year, and his successor showed his respect for his merit and his character by raising him altars and temples in Rome, and in the provinces, and by ranking him in the number of the gods. Nerva was the first Roman emperor who was of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. Plin. Paneg.—Diod. 69.—M. Cocceius, a consul in the reign of Tiberius. He starved himself, because he would not be concerned in the extravagance of the emperor.—A celebrated lawyer, consul with the emperor Vespasian. He was father to the emperor of that name.

Nervii, a warlike people of Belgic Gaul, who continually upbraided the neighbouring nations for submitting to the power of the Romans. They attacked J. Cæsar, and were totally defeated. Their country forms the modern province of Hainault. Lucan. 1, v. 428.—Cæsar. Bell. G. 2, c. 15.

Nerulum, an inland town of Lucania, now Lagonero. Liv. 9, c. 20.

Nerium, or Artabrum, a promontory of Spain, now cape Finis terra. Strab. 3.

Nesactum, a town of Istria at the mouth of the Arsia, now Castel Nuovo.

Nesæa, one of the Nereides. Virg. G. 4, v. 338.

Nesimachus, the father of Hippomedon, a native of Argos, who was one of the seven chiefs who made war against Thebes. Hygin. 70.—Schol. Stat. Th. 2, v. 44.

Nesia (is, or idis), now Nisita, an island on the coast of Campania, famous for asparagus. Lucan and Statius speak of its air as unwholesome and dangerous. Plin. 19, c. 8.—Lucan. 6, v. 90.—Cic. ad Att. 16, ep. 1 & 2.—Stat. 3, Sylv. 1, v. 148.

Nessus, a celebrated centaur, son of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had entrusted to his care, with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. Virg. Dejanira. Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately he let fly one of his poisoned arrows, which struck the centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave the tunic he then wore to Dejanira, assuring her that, from the poisoned blood which had flowed from his wounds, it had received the power of calling a husband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received it with pleasure, and this mournful present caused the death of Hercules. Virg. Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Ep. 9.—Senec. in Herc. Fur.—Paus. 3, c. 28.—Diod. 4.—A river. Virg. Nessus.

Nestōles, a famous statue of Greece, rival to Phidias. Plin. 34, c. 8.

Nestor, a son of Neleus and Chloris, nephew to Pelias and grandson to Neptune. He had 11 brothers, who were all killed, with his father, by Hercules. His tender age detained him at home, and was the cause of his preservation. The conqueror spared his life, and placed him on the throne of Pylos. He married Eurydice the daughter of Clymenes, or, according to others, Anaxibia the daughter of Atreus. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and was present at the nuptials of Pirithous, when a bloody battle was fought between the Lapithæ and Centaurs. As king of Pylos and Messenia he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself among the rest of the Grecian chiefs by eloquence, address, wisdom, justice, and an uncommon prudence of mind. Homer displays his character as the most perfect of all his heroes; and Agamemnon exclaims, that if he had to generals like Nestor, he should soon see the walls of Troy reduced to ashes. After the Trojan war, Nestor retired to Greece, where he enjoyed, in the bosom of his family, the peace and tranquillity which were due to his wisdom and to his old age. The manner and the time of his death are unknown; and the ancients are all agreed that he lived three generations of men, which length of time some suppose to be 300 years, though more probably only 90, allowing 30 years for each generation. From that circumstance, therefore, it was usual among the Greeks and the Latins, when they wished a long and happy life to their friends, to wish them to see the years of Nestor. He had two daughters, Pisidice and Polycaeste; and seven sons, Perseus, Straticus, Aretus, Echeponer, Pistratus, Antilochus, and Trasimedes. Nestor was one of the Argonauts, according to Valerius Flaccus, 1, v. 380, &c.—Dictys Cret. 1, c. 13, &c.—Homer. Il. 1, &c. Od. 3 & 11.—Hygin. Fab. 10 & 273.—Paus. 3, c. 26. l. 4, c. 3 & 31.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 162, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 15.—A poet of Lycamnia in the age of the emperor Severus. He was father to Pisander, who, under the emperor Alexander, wrote some fabulous stories.—One of the body-guards of Alexander. Polyæn.

Nestorius, a bishop of Constantinople, who flourished A.D. 431. He was condemned and degraded from his episcopal dignity for his heretical opinions, &c.

Nessus, or Nessus, now Nesto, a small river of Thrace, rising in mount Rhodope, and falling into the Ægean sea above the island of Thasos. It was for some time the boundary of Macedonia on the east, in the more extensive power of that kingdom.

Netum, a town of Sicily, now called Neto, on the eastern coast. Sil. 14, v. 269.—Cic. in Ver. 4, c. 26. l. 5, c. 51.

Neuri, a people of Sarmatia. Mela, 2, c. 1.

Nicea, a widow of Alexander, who married Demetrius.—A daughter of Antipater, who married Perdiccas.—A city of India, built by Alexander on the very spot where he had obtained a victory over king Porus.—A town of Achaia near Thermopylæ, on the bay of Malia.—A town of Illyricum.—Another in Corsica.—Another in Thrace,—in Bosotia.—A town of Bithynia (now Nice, or Isnik), built by Antigonus, the son of Philip king of Macedonia. It was originally called Antigonia, and afterwards Nicea by Lysimachus, who gave it the name of his wife, who was daughter of Antipater.—A town of Liguria, built by the people of Massilia, in commemoration of a victory.

Nicagōras, a sophist of Athens in the reign of the emperor Philip. He wrote the lives of illustrious men, and was reckoned one of the greatest and most learned men of his age.

Nicander, a king of Sparta, son of Charillus, of the family of the Proclidæ. He reigned 39 years, and died B.C. 770.—A writer of Chalcædon.—A Greek grammarian, poet, and physician, of Colophon, 137 B.C. His writings were held in estimation, but his judgment cannot be highly commended, since, without any knowledge of agriculture, he ventured to compose a book on that intricate subject. Two of his poems, entitled Theriacæ, on hunting, and Alexipharmacæ, on antidotes against poison, are still extant; the best editions of which are those of Gorraeus, with a translation in Latin verse by Grevinus, a physician at Paris, 4to, Paris, 1557, and Salvinus, 8vo, Florent. 1764. Cic. 1, de Orat. c. 16.

Nicānor, a man who conspired against the life of Alexander. Curt. 6.—A son of Parmenio, who died in Hyrcania, &c.—A surname of Demetrius. Virg. Demetrius II.—An unskilful pilot of Antigonus. Polyæn.—A servant of Atticus. Cic. 5, ep. 3.—A Samian, who wrote a treatise on rivers.—A governor of Media, conquered by Seleucus. He had been governor over the Athenians under Cassander, by whose orders he was put to death.—A general of the emperor Titus, wounded at the siege of Jerusalem.—A man of Stagira, by whom Alexander the Great sent a letter to recall the Grecian exiles. Diod. 18.—A governor of Munychia, who seized the Piræus, and was at last put to death by Cassander, because he wished to make himself absolute over Attica. Diod. 18.—A brother of Cassander, destroyed by Olympias. Id. 19.—A general of Antiochus king of Syria. He made war against the Jews, and showed himself uncommonly cruel.

Nicarchus, a Corinthian philosopher in the age of Perander. Plut.—An Arcadian chief, who deserted to the Persians, at the return of the 10,000 Greeks.

Nicarthisdes, a man set over Persepolis by Alexander.

Nicātor, a surname of Seleucus king of Syria, from his having been unconquered.

Nicoe, a daughter of Thestius. Apollod.

Nicephorium, a town of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, where Venus had a temple. Liv. 31, c. 33.—Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 41.

Nicēphōrius, now Khabour, a river which flowed by the walls of Tigranocerta. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.

Nicephorus Cæsar, a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1661. — Gregoras, another, edited fol. Paris, 1702. — A Greek ecclesiastical historian, whose works were edited by Ducaeus, 2 vols. Paris, 1630.

Nicer, now the Necker, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine at the modern town of Mannheim. Auson. Mos. 423.

Niceratus, a poet who wrote a poem in praise of Lysander. — The father of Nicias.

Nicetas, one of the Byzantine historians, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.

Nicetoria, a festival at Athens, in memory of the victory which Minerva obtained over Neptune, in their dispute about giving a name to the capital of the country.

Nicia, a city. Vid. Nizza. — A river falling into the Po at Brixellum. It is now called Lenza, and separates the duchy of Modena from Parma.

Nicias, an Athenian general, celebrated for his valour and for his misfortunes. He early conciliated the good will of the people by his liberality, and he established his military character by taking the island of Cythera from the power of Lacedæmon. When Athens determined to make war against Sicily, Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reproached as impolitic, and as the future cause of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmness, but he often blamed the quick and inconsiderate measures of his colleagues. The success of the Athenians remained long doubtful. Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuse was surrounded by a wall, and though the operations were carried on slowly, yet the city would have surrendered, had not the sudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the besieged at the most critical moment. Gylippus proposed terms of accommodation to the Athenians, which were refused; some battles were fought, in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage, and Nicias at last, tired of his ill success, and grown desponding, demanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a successor. Demosthenes, upon this, was sent with a powerful fleet, but the advice of Nicias was despised, and the admiral, by his eagerness to come to a decisive engagement, ruined his fleet and the interest of Athens. The fear of his enemies at home prevented Nicias from leaving Sicily; and when, at last, a continued series of ill success obliged him to comply, he found himself surrounded on every side by the enemy, without hope of escaping. He gave himself up to the conquerors with all his army, but the assurances of safety which he had received soon proved vain and false, and he was no sooner in the hands of the enemy than he was shamefully put to death with Demosthenes. His troops were sent to quarries, where the plague and hard labour diminished their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some suppose that the death of Nicias was not violent. He perished about 413 years before Christ, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant but unfortunate general. Plut. in Vita Cic. — Nep. in Alcib. — Thucyd. 4, &c. — Diod. 15. — A grammarian of Rome, intimate with Cicero. Cic. in Epist. — A man of Nicaea, who wrote a history of philosophers. — A physician of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who made an offer to the Romans of poisoning his master for a sum of money. The Roman general disdain'd his offers, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. He is oftener called Cineas. — A painter of Athens in the age of Alexander. He was chiefly happy in his pictures of women. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 31.

Nioclippe, a daughter of Pelops, who married Stenelus. — A daughter of Theopius. Apollod.

Nioppus, a tyrant of Cos, one of whose sheep brought forth a lion, which was considered as pre-empting his future greatness, and his elevation to the sovereignty. Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 39.

Nico, one of the Tarentine chiefs who conspired against the life of Annibal. Liv. 30. — A celebrated architect and geometrician. He was father to the celebrated Galen the prince of physicians. — One of the slaves of Craterus. — The name of an ass which Augustus met before the battle of Actium, a circumstance which he considered as a favourable omen. — The name of an elephant remarkable for his fidelity to king Pyrrhus.

Nicochares, a Greek comic poet in the age of Aristophanes.

Nicolesus, a familiar friend of Phocion, condemned to death. Plut. — A king of Salamis, celebrated for his contest with a king of Phœnicia, to prove which of the two was most effeminate. — A king of Paphos, who reigned under the protection of Ptolemy king of Egypt. He revolted from his friend to the king of Persia, upon which Ptolemy ordered one of his servants to put him to death, to strike terror into the other dependent princes. The servant, unwilling to murder the monarch, advised him to kill himself. Nicoles obeyed, and all his family followed his example, 310 years before the christian era. — An ancient Greek poet, who called physicians a happy race of men, because light published their good deeds to the world, and the earth hid all their faults and imperfections. — A king of Cyprus, who succeeded his father Evagoras on the throne, 374 years before Christ. It was with him that the philosopher Isocrates corresponded. — A tyrant of Sicily, deposed by means of Aratus the Achæan. Plut. in Arat.

Nicoorates, a tyrant of Cyrene. — An author at Athens. — A king of Salamis in Cyprus, who made himself known by the valuable collection of books which he had. Athen. 1.

Nicooreon, a tyrant of Salamis in the age of Alexander the Great. He ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to pieces in a mortar.

Nicoosmus, an Athenian appointed by Conon over the fleet which was going to the assistance of Artaxerxes. Diod. 14. — A tyrant of Italy, &c. — An ambassador sent to Pompey by Aristobolus.

Nicodorus, a wrestler of Mantinea, who studied philosophy in his old age. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 22. — Swidas. — An Athenian archon.

Nicodromus, a son of Hercules and Nice. Apollod. — An Athenian who invaded Ægina, &c.

Nicolæus, a philosopher. — A celebrated Syracusan, who endeavoured, in a pathetic speech, to dissuade his countrymen from offering violence to the Athenian prisoners who had been taken with Nicias their general. His eloquence was unavailing. — An officer of Ptolemy against Antigonus. — A peripatetic philosopher and historian in the Augustan age.

Nicomæcha, a daughter of Themistocles.

Nicomachus, the father of Aristotle, whose son also bore the same name. The philosopher composed his 10 books of morals for the use and improvement of his son, and thence they are called Nicomachea. Swidas. — One of Alexander's friends, who discovered the conspiracy of Dymus.

Curt. 6.—An excellent painter.—A Pythagorean philosopher.—A Lacedaemonian general, conquered by Timotheus.—A writer in the fifth century, &c.

Nicomedes I., a king of Bithynia, about 278 years before the christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia. Justin.—Paus. &c.

Nicomedes II. was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B.C. 149. He reigned 59 years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.

Nicomedes III., son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans re-established him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was, at last, expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia, who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab.—Appian.

Nicomedes IV. was son and successor of Nicomedes III. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B.C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions, to the Roman people. Strab. 12.—Appian. Mithrid.—Justin. 38, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 5.

Nicomedes, a celebrated geometer in the age of the philosopher Eratosthenes. He made himself known by his useful machines, &c.—An engineer in the army of Mithridates.—One of the preceptors of the emperor M. Antoninus.

Nicomedia (now Isnik), a town of Bithynia, founded by Nicomedes I. It was the capital of the country, and it has been compared, for its beauty and greatness, to Rome, Antioch, or Alexandria. It became celebrated for being, for some time, the residence of the emperor Constantine and most of his imperial successors. Some suppose that it was originally called Asacus, and Olbia, though it is generally believed that they were all different cities. Ammian. 17.—Paus. 5, c. 12.—Plin. 5, &c.—Strab. 12, &c.

Nico, a pirate of Phære in Peloponnesus, &c. Polyam.—An athlete of Thasos, 14 times victorious at the Olympic games.—A native of Tarentum. Vid. Nico.

Nicoia, a town of Pontus.

Niophanes, a famous painter of Greece, whose pieces are mentioned with commendation. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Niöphron, a comic poet of Athens some time after the age of Aristophanes.

Nicöpolis, a city of Lower Egypt.—A town of Armenia, built by Pompey the Great in memory of a victory which he had there obtained over the forces of Mithridates. Strab. 12.—Another, in Thrace, built on the banks of the Nestus by Trajan, in memory of a victory which he obtained there over the barbarians.—A town of Epirus, built by Augustus after the battle of Actium.—Another, near Jerusalem, founded by the emperor Vespasian.—Another, in Moesia.—Another, in Dacia, built by Trajan to perpetuate the memory of a celebrated battle.—Another, near the bay of Issus, built by Alexander.

Nicostrata, a courtesan who left all her possessions to Sylla.—The same as Carmentis mother of Evander.

Nicostratus, a man of Argos of great strength. He was fond of imitating Hercules by clothing himself in a lion's skin. Diad. 16.—One of Alexander's soldiers. He conspired against the king's life, with Hermolus. Curt. 8.—A painter who expressed great admiration at the sight of Helen's picture by Zeuxis. Ælian. 14, c. 47.—A dramatic actor of Ionia.—A comic poet of Argos.—An orator of Macedonia, in the reign of the emperor M. Antoninus.—A son of Menelaus and Helen. Paus. 2, c. 18.—A general of the Achæans, who defeated the Macedonians.

Nicothea, a celebrated woman of Messenia, who said that she became pregnant of Aristomenes by a serpent. Paus. 4, c. 14.

Nicothöles, a Corinthian drunkard, &c. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 14.

Niger, a friend of M. Antony, sent to him by Octavia.—A surname of Clitus, whom Alexander killed in a fit of drunkenness.—C. Pescennius Justus, a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valour in the Roman armies, while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated situation were supported by a sound understanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue. He proposed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M. Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondness for ancient discipline, and never suffered his soldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirst with water and vinegar. He forbade the use of silver and gold utensils in his camp, all the bakers and cooks were driven away, and the soldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biscuits. In his punishments Niger was inexorable; he condemned to of his soldiers to be beheaded in the presence of the army, because they had stolen and eaten a fowl. The sentence was heard with groans; the army interferred; and when Niger consented to diminish the punishment for fear of kindling a rebellion, he yet ordered the criminals to make each a restoration of 10 fowls to the person whose property they had stolen. They were, besides, ordered not to light a fire the rest of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments, and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general seemed to promise the restoration of ancient discipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger frustrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had also been invested with the imperial purple, marched against him; some battles were fought, and Niger was at last defeated, A.D. 194. His head was cut off and fixed to a long spear, and carried in triumph through the streets of Rome. He reigned about one year. Herodian. 3.—Eutrop.

Niger, or Nigris (itis), a river of Africa, which rises in Ethiopia, and falls by three mouths into the Atlantic, little known to the ancients, and not yet satisfactorily explored by the moderns. Plin. 5, c. 1 & 8.—Mela, 1, c. 4. l. 3, c. 10.—Ptol. 4, c. 6.

P. Nigidius Figulus, a celebrated philosopher and astrologer at Rome, one of the most learned men of his age. He was intimate with Cicero, and gave his most unbiased opinions concerning the conspirators who had leagued to destroy Rome with Catiline. He was made pretor, and honoured with a seat in the senate. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, for which he was banished by the conqueror. He died in the place of his banishment, 47 years before Christ. Cic. ad Fam. 4. ep. 13.—Lucan. 1. v. 639.

Nigrīta, a people of Africa, who dwell on the banks of the Niger. Mela, 1. c. 4.—Plin. 5. c. 1.

Nileus, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenae, &c. Paus. 7. c. 2, &c.—A philosopher who had in his possession all the writings of Aristotle. Athen. 1.

Nilus, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river which flows through the middle of Egypt, and falls into the Mediterranean sea. The Nile, anciently called Ægyptus, is one of the most celebrated rivers in the world. Its sources were unknown to the ancients, and the moderns were till lately ignorant of their situation, whence an impossibility is generally meant by the proverb of Nili caput querere. It flows through the middle of Egypt in a northern direction, and when it comes to the town of Cercasorum, it then divides itself into several streams, and falls into the Mediterranean by seven mouths. The most eastern canal is called the Pelusian, and the most western is called the Canopic mouth. The other canals are the Sebennytican, that of Sais, the Mendesian, Bolbitic, and Bucolic. They have all been formed by nature, except the two last, which have been dug by the labours of men. The island which the Nile forms by its division into several streams is called Delta, from its resemblance to the fourth letter in the Greek alphabet. The Nile yearly overflows the country, and it is to those regular inundations that the Egyptians are indebted for the fertile produce of their lands. It begins to rise in the month of May for 100 successive days, and then decreases gradually the same number of days. If it does not rise as high as 16 cubits, a famine is generally expected, but if it exceeds this by many cubits, it is of the most dangerous consequences; houses are overturned, the cattle are drowned, and a great number of insects are produced from the mud, which destroy the fruits of the earth. The river, therefore, proves a blessing or a calamity to Egypt, and the prosperity of the nation depends so much upon it, that the tributaries of the inhabitants were in ancient times, and are still under the present government, proportioned to the rise of the waters. The causes of the overflowings of the Nile, which remained unknown to the ancients, though searched with the greatest application, are owing to the heavy rains which regularly fall in Ethiopia, in the months of April and May, and which rush down like torrents upon the country, and lay it all under water. These causes, as some people suppose, were well known to Homer, as he seems to show it, by saying that the Nile flowed down from heaven. The inhabitants of Egypt, near the banks of the river, were called Niliaci, Nilitigema, &c., and large canals were also from this river denominated Nili or Euripi. *Cic. Leg. 2. c. 1. Ad. Q. flourished A.D. 440. His works were edited at Rome, fol. 2 vols. 1668 & 1678.

Ninnius, a tribune who opposed Clodius the enemy of Cicero.

Ninias. Vid. Ninyas.

Ninus, a son of Belus, who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Assyrian monarchy, of which he was the first sovereign, B.C. 2099. He was very warlike, and extended his conquests from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her husband had destroyed himself through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned 52 years, and at his death he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a son. The history of Ninus is very obscure, and even fabulous according to the opinion of some. Ctesias is the principal historian from whom it is derived, but little reliance is to be placed upon him, when Aristotle deems him unworthy to be believed. Ninus after death received divine honours, and became the Jupiter of the Assyrians and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Ctesias.—Diod. 2.—Justin. 1. c. 1.—Herodot. 1.—A celebrated city, now Nino, the capital of Assyria, built on the banks of the Tigris by Ninus, and called Ninewa in Scripture. It was, according to the relation of Diodorus Siculus, 15 miles long, nine broad, and 48 in circumference. It was surrounded by large walls 100 feet high, on the top of which three chariots could pass together abreast, and was defended by 1500 towers, each 200 feet high. Ninus was taken by the united armies of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar king of Babylon, B.C. 606. Strab. 1.—Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1. c. 185, &c.—Paus. 8. c. 33.—Lucian.

Ninyas, a son of Ninus and Semiramis, king of Assyria, who succeeded his mother, who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. Some suppose that Semiramis was put to death by her own son, because she had encouraged him to commit incest. The reign of Ninyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. The prince left the care of the government to his favourites and ministers, and gave himself up to pleasure, riot, and debauchery, and never appeared in public. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness, and therefore their names or history are little known till the age of Sardanapalus. Justin. 1. c. 2.—Diod. 1, &c.

Niobe, a daughter of Tantalus king of Lydia by Euryanassa or Dione. She married Amphion the son of Jasion, by whom she had 10 sons and 10 daughters according to Hesiod, or two sons and three daughters according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius say that she had six daughters and as many sons, and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c., according to the more received opinion, support that she had seven sons and seven daughters. The names of the sons were Sippylus, Myrtus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damascithon, and Ismenus; and those of the daughters, Cleodora, Ethodora, or Thera, Astyoche, Phthia, Pelopia or Chloris, Asticratea, and Ogygia. The number of her children increased the pride of Niobe, and she not only had the imprudence to prefer herself to Latona, who had only two children, but she even insulted her, and ridiculed the worship which was paid to her, observing that she had a better claim to altars and sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This insolence provoked Latona, who entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters except Chloris, who had married Neleus king of Pelos, were equally destroyed by Diana; and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The carcasses of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied in the plains for nine successive days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honoured with a funeral by the gods. *Homer. Il. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. Fab. 5.—Hygin. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom she had a son called Argus, who gave his name to Argia or Argolis, a country of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 22.—Apollod. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 8.

Niphates, a mountain of Asia, which divides Armenia from Assyria, and from which the Tigris takes its rise. Virg. G. 3, v. 30.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 15.—A river of Armenia, falling into the Tigris. Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 20.—Lucan. 3, v. 245.

Niphe, one of Diana's companions. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 245.

Nireus, a king of Naxos, son of Charops and Aglaia, celebrated for his beauty. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—Horat. 2, od. 20.

Nisa, a town of Greece. Homer. Il. 2.—A country-woman. Virg. Ecl. 8.—A place. Vid. Nysa.—A celebrated plain of Media near the Caspian sea, famous for its horses. Herodot. 3, c. 106.

Nisus, a naval station on the coasts of Megaris. Strab. 8.—A town of Parthia, called also Nisa.

Nisus, a sea-nymph. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 826.

Nisus. Vid. Nisus.

Nisibis, a town of Mesopotamia, built by a colony of Macedonians on the Tigris, and celebrated as being a barrier between the provinces of Rome and the Persian empire during the reign of the Roman emperors. It was sometimes called Antiochia Mygdonica. Joseph. 20, c. 2.—Strab. 11.—Ammian. 25, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 13.

Nisus, a son of Hyrtacus, born on mount Ida near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and signalized himself by his valour against the Rutulians. He was united in the closest friendship with Euryalus, a young Trojan, and with him he entered, in the dead of night, the enemy's camp. As they were returning victorious, after much bloodshed, they were perceived by the Rutulians, who attacked Euryalus. Nisus, in endeavouring to rescue his friend from the enemy's darts, perished himself with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a spear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans, and their great friendship, like that of a Pylades and an Orestes, or of a Theseus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 176, &c.—A king of Dulichium, remarkable for his probity and virtue. Homer. Od. 18.—A king of Megara, son of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hostilities of Minos, who wished to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was besieged, and Attica laid waste. The fate of Nisus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued upon his head, according to the words of an oracle, promised him life, and success in his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Niseta Virgo) saw from the walls of Megara the royal besieger, and she became desperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her passion, she stole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was asleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos disregarded the services of Scylla, and she threw herself into the sea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Nisus assumed the nature of the hawk at the very moment that he gave himself death, not to fall into the enemy's hands. These two birds have continually been at variance with each other, and Scylla, by her apprehensions at the sight of her father, seems to suffer the punishment which her perfidy deserved. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 6, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 404, &c.

Nisyros, an island in the Ægean sea, at the west of Rhodes, with a town of the same name. It was originally joined to the island of Cos, according to Pliny, and it bore the name of Porphyrus. Neptune, who was supposed to have separated them with a blow of his trident, and to have there overwhelmed the giant Polybotes, was worshipped there, and called Nisyros. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

Nitôsis, a daughter of Apries king of Egypt, married by his successor Amasis to Cyrus. Polyan. 8.

Nitobriges, a people of Gaul, supposed to be Agenois, in Guienne. Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 7.

Nitôcris, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge across the Euphrates, in the middle of that city, and dug a number of reservoirs for the superfluous waters of that river. She ordered herself to be buried over one of the gates of the city, and placed an inscription on her tomb, which signified that her successors would find great treasures within if ever they were in need of money, but that their labours would be but ill repaid if ever they ventured to open it without necessity. Cyrus opened it through curiosity, and was struck to find within these words: If thy avarice had not been insatiable, thou never wouldst have violated the monuments of the dead. Herodot. 1, c. 185.—A queen of Egypt, who built a third pyramid.

Nitria, a country of Egypt with two towns of the same name, above Memphis.

Nivaria, an island at the west of Africa, supposed to be Teneriff, one of the Canaries. Plin. 6, c. 32.

Noas, a river of Thrace falling into the Ister. Herodot. 4, c. 45.

Noomom, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 167.

Noctiluca, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome on mount Palatine, where torches were generally lighted in the night. Varr. de L. L. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 6, v. 38.

Nola, an ancient town of Campania, which became a Roman colony before the first Punic war. It was founded by a Tuscan, or, according to others, by an Euboean colony. It is said that Virgil had introduced the name of Nola in his Georgics, but that, when he was refused a glass of water by the inhabitants as he passed through the city, he totally blotted it out of his poem, and substituted the word ora, in the 25th line of the second book of his Georgics. Nola was besieged by Annibal, and bravely defended by Marcellus. Augustus died there on his return from Neapolis to Rome. Bells were first invented there in the beginning of the fifth century, from which reason they have been called Nolæ, or Campane, in Latin. The inventor was St. Paulinus, the bishop of the place, who died A.D. 431, though many imagine that bells were known long before, and only introduced into churches by that prelate. Before his time, congregations were called to the church by the noise of wooden rattles (sacra ligna). Paterc. 1, c. 7.—Suet. in Aug.—Sil. 8, v. 517. l. 12, v. 161.—A. Gellius. 7, c. 20.—Liv. 23, c. 14 & 39. l. 24, c. 37.

Nomades, a name given to all those uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their residence, to go in quest of fresh pasture for the numerous cattle which they tended. There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. Those of Africa were afterwards called Numidians, by a small change of the letters which composed their name. Ital. 1, v. 215.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, c. 15. l. 4, c. 187.—Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 2. l. 3, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 343.—Faus. 8, c. 43.

Nomæ, a town of Sicily. Diod. 11.—Sil. 14, v. 266.

Nomentanus, an epithet applied to L. Cassius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as a mixture of luxury and dissipation. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 102 & alibi.

Nomentum, a town of the Sabines in Italy, famous for wine, and now called Lamentana. The dictator Q. Servilius Priscus gave the Veientes and Fidenates battle there A.U.C. 312, and totally defeated them. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 905.—Liv. 1, c. 38. l. 4, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.

Nomli, mountains of Arcadia. Faus.

Nomius, a surname given to Apollo, because he fed (pecus, pasco), the flocks of king Admetus in Thessaly. Cic. in Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

Nomioris, a town of Arcadia, which received its name from a wife of Lycaon. There was a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood. Evander is sometimes called Nomacrius heros, as being an Arcadian by birth, and Atalanta Nomacria, as being a native of the place. Curt. 10, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 97. Met. 8, fab. 10.—Faus. 8, c. 17, &c.

Nomius, a Roman soldier, imprisoned for paying respect to Galba's statues, &c. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 56.—A Roman who exhorted his countrymen after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, and the flight of Pompey, by observing that eight standards (aquilæ) still remained in the camp, to which Cicero answered, Recte, si nobis cum graculis bellum esset.

Nomius Marcellus, a grammarian, whose treatise de uariis significationibus uerborum was edited by Mercier, 8vo, Paris, 1614.

Nonnus, a Greek writer of the fifth century, who wrote an account of the embassy he had undertaken to Ethiopia, among the Saracens and other eastern nations. He is also known by his Dionysiaca, a wonderful collection of heathen mythology and erudition, edited 4to, Antwerp, 1569. His paraphrase on John was edited by Heinsius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1627.

Nonus, a Greek physician, whose book de omnium morborum curatione was edited in 12mo, Argent. 1568.

Nopia, or Cinopia, a town of Bœotia, where Amphiarus had a temple.

Nora, now Nour, a place of Phrygia, where Eumenes retired for some time, &c. C. Nepos.—A town. Vid. Nora.

Norax, a son of Mercury and Eurythra, who led a colony of Iberians into Sardinia, where he founded a town, to which he gave the name of Nora. Paus. 10, c. 17.

Norba, a town of the Volsci. Liv. 2, c. 34.—Cæsarea, a town of Spain on the Tagus.

C. Norbanus, a young and ambitious Roman who opposed Sylla, and joined his interest to that of young Marius. In his consulship he marched against Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.—A friend and general of Augustus, employed in Macedonia against the republicans. He was defeated by Brutus, &c.

Noricum, a country of ancient Illyricum, which now forms a part of modern Bavaria and Austria. It extended between the Danube, and part of the Alps and Vindelicia. Its savage inhabitants, who were once governed by kings, made many incursions upon the Romans, and were at last conquered under Tiberius, and the country became a dependent province. In the reign of Diocletian, Noricum was divided into two parts, Ripense and Mediterranean. The iron that was drawn from Noricum was esteemed excellent, and thence Noricus ensis was used to express the goodness of a sword. Dionys. Perieg.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 34, c. 14.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 16, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 712.

Northippus, a Greek tragic poet.

Nortia, a name given to the goddess of Fortune among the Etrurians. Liv. 7, c. 3.

Nothus, a son of Deucalion.—A surname of Darius king of Persia, from his illegitimacy.

Notium, a town of Æolia near the Cayster. It was peopled by the inhabitants of Colophon, who left their ancient habitations because Notium was more conveniently situated in being on the seashore. Liv. 37, c. 26, 38, 39.

Notus, the south wind, called also Auster.

Novæ (tabernæ), the new shops built in the forum at Rome, and adorned with the shields of the Cimbræ. Cic. Orat. 2, c. 66.—The Veteres tabernæ were adorned with those of the Samnites. Liv. 9, c. 40.

Novaria, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, now Novara, in Milan. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 70.

Novatus, a man who severely attacked the character of Augustus, under a fictitious name. The emperor discovered him, and only fined him a small sum of money.

Novesium, a town of the Ubii, on the west of the Rhine, now called Neys, near Cologne. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 26, &c.

Noviodunum, a town of the Ædui in Gaul, taken by J. Cæsar. It is pleasantly situated on the Ligeris, and now called Noyon, or, as others suppose, Nevers. Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 12.

Noviomagus, or Neomagus, a town of Gaul, now Nîmes, in Normandy.—Another, called also Nemetes, now Spire.—Another, in Batavia, now Nimwegen, on the south side of the Waal.

Novium, a town of Spain, now Noya.

Novius Priscus, a man banished from Rome by Nero, on suspicion that he was accessory to Piso's conspiracy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 71.—A man who attempted to assassinate the emperor Claudius.—Two brothers obscurely born, distinguished in the age of Horace for their officiousness. Horat. 1, sat. 6.

Novum Comum, a town of Insubria on the lake Larinus, of which the inhabitants were called Noxcomenses. Cic. ad Div. 13, c. 55.

NOX, one of the most ancient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus she gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was also the mother of the Furies, Hesperides, Dreams, of Discord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by some of the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore she was worshipped with great solemnity by the ancients. She had a famous statue in Diana's temple at Ephesus. It was usual to offer her a black sheep, as she was the mother of the furies. The cock was also offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day, during the darkness of the night. She is represented as mounted on a chariot, and covered with a veil bespangled with stars. The constellations generally went before her as her constant messengers. Sometimes she is seen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, representing death, or rather night, and the other white, representing sleep or day. Some of the moderns have described her as a woman veiled in mourning, and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 950.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 455.—Paus. 10, c. 38.—Hesiod. Theog. 125 & 212.

Nuceria, a town of Campania taken by Anibal. It became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was called Nuceria Constantia, or Alfaterna. It now bears the name of Nocera, and contains about 30,000 inhabitants. Lucan. 2, v. 472.—Liv. 9, c. 41. l. 27, c. 3.—Ital. 8, v. 531.—Tacit. Ann. 13 & 14.—A town of Umbria at the foot of the Apennines. Strab.—Plin.

Naithones, a people of Germany, possessing the country now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. Tacit. G. 40.

Numa Martius, a man made governor of Rome by Tullius Hostilius. He was son-in-law of Numa Pompilius, and father to Ancus Martius. Tacit. A. 6, c. 11.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

Numa Pompilius, a celebrated philosopher, born at Cures, a village of the Sabines, on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome. He married Tatia, the daughter of Tattius the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country to devote himself more freely to literary pursuits. At the death of Romulus, the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two senators were sent to acquaint him with the decisions of the senate and of the people. Numa refused their offers, and it was not but at the repeated solicitations and prayers of his friends that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he dismissed the 300 body-guards which his predecessor had kept around his person, observing that he did not distrust a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He was not, like Romulus, fond of war and military expeditions, but he applied himself to tame the ferocity of his subjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the Deity, and to quell their dissensions by dividing all the citizens into different classes. He established different orders of priests, and taught the Romans not to worship the Deity by images; and from his example no graven or painted statues appeared in the temples or sanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 120 years. He encouraged the report which was spread of his paying regular visits to the nymph Egeria, and made use of her name to give sanction to the laws and institutions which he had introduced. He established the college of the vestals, and told the Romans that the safety of the empire depended upon the preservation of the sacred ancile or shield which, as was generally believed, had dropped down from heaven. He dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign, remained shut, as a mark of peace and tranquillity at Rome. Numa died after a reign of 43 years, in which he had given every possible encouragement to the useful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B.C. 672. Not only the Romans, but also the neighbouring nations, were eager to pay their last offices to a monarch whom they revered for his abilities, moderation, and humanity. He forbade his body to be burnt according to the custom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written. These books were accidentally found by one of the Romans, about 400 years after his death, and as they contained nothing new or interesting, but merely the reasons why he had made innovations in the form of worship and in the religion of the Romans, they were burnt by order of the senate. He left behind one daughter called Pompilia, who married Numa Martius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome. Some say that he had also four sons, but this opinion is ill-founded. Plut. in Vit.—Varr.—Liv. 1, c. 18.—Plin. 13 & 14, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 809, l. 9, v. 552.—*Cic. de Nat. Numana, a town of Picenum in Italy, of which the people were called Numanates. Mela, 2, c. 4.

Numantia, a town of Spain near the sources of the river Durus, celebrated for the war of 14 years which, though unprotected by walls and towers, it bravely maintained against the Romans. The inhabitants obtained some advantages over the Roman forces till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finish the war, and to see the destruction of Numantia. He began the siege with an army of 60,000 men, and was bravely opposed by the besieged, who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms. Both armies behaved with uncommon valour, and the courage of the Numantines was soon changed into despair and fury. Their provisions began to fail, and they fed upon the flesh of their horses, and afterwards on that of their dead companions, and at last were necessitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy situation of their affairs obliged some to surrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themselves up on the morrow; they refused, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and set fire to their houses, and all destroyed themselves, B.C. 133, so that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some historians, however, deny that, and support that a number of Numantines delivered themselves into Scipio's hands, and that 50 of them were drawn in triumph at Rome, and the rest sold as slaves. The fall of Numantia was more glorious than that of Carthage or Corinth, though inferior to them. The conqueror obtained the surname of Numantinus. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Appian, Iber.—Paterr. 2, c. 3.—Cic. 1, Off.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plut.—Horat. 1, od. 12, v. 1.

Numantius, a woman accused under Tiberius of making her husband insane by enchantments, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 22.

Numānus Bembūlus, a Rutulian who accused the Trojans of effeminacy. He had married the younger sister of Turnus, and was killed by Ascanius during the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 592, &c.

Numōnes, a follower of the doctrines of Plato and Pythagoras, born at Apamea in Syria. He flourished in the reign of M. Antoninus.

Numenia, or Neomenia, a festival observed by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honour of all the gods, but especially of Apollo or the Sun, who is justly deemed the author of light, and of whatever distinction is made in the months, seasons, days, and nights. It was observed with games and public entertainments which were provided at the expense of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor. Solemn prayers were offered at Athens during the solemnity, for the prosperity of the republic. The demigods as well as the heroes of the ancients were honoured and invoked in the festival.

Numenius, a philosopher, who supposed that Chaos, from which the world was created, was animated by an evil and maleficent soul. He lived in the second century.

Numētāna via, a road at Rome, which led to mount Sacer through the gate Viminalis. Liv. 3, c. 52.

Numeria, a goddess at Rome who presided over numbers. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11.

Numerianus M. Aurelius, a son of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father into the east with the title of Cæsar, and at his death he succeeded him with his brother Carinus, A.D. 282. His reign was short. Eight months after his father's death, he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law, Arrius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. The murderer, who hoped to ascend the vacant throne, continued to follow the litter as if the emperor was alive, till he found a proper opportunity to declare his sentiments. The stench of the body, however, soon discovered his perfidy, and he was sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers. Numerianus had been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally an eloquent speaker, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.—A friend of the emperor Severus.

Numerius, a man who favoured the escape of Marius to Africa, &c.—A friend of Pompey taken by J. Cæsar's adherents, &c. Plin.

Numicia via, one of the great Roman roads, which led from the capital to the town of Brundisium.

Numicus, a small river of Latium, near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found, and where Anna, Dido's sister, drowned herself. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 150, &c.—Sil. 1, v. 359.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 358. &c. Fast. 3, v. 643.—A friend of Horace, to whom he addressed 1, ep. 6.

Numida, a surname given by Horace, l. ad. 36, to one of the generals of Augustus, from his conquests in Numidia. Some suppose that it is Pomponius; others, Plotius.

Numidia, an inland country of Africa, which now forms the kingdom of Algiers and Bildulgerid. It was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean sea, south by Gætulia, west by Mauritania, and east by a part of Libya, which was called Africa Propria. The inhabitants were called Nomades, and afterwards Numidæ. It was the kingdom of Masinissa, which was the occasion of the third Punic war, on account of the offence which he had received from the Carthaginians. Jugurtha reigned there, as also Juba the father and son. It was conquered, and became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. The Numidians were excellent warriors, and in their expeditions they always endeavoured to engage with the enemy in the night-time. They rode without saddles or bridles, whence they have been called inservi. They had their wives in common, as the rest of the barbarian nations of antiquity. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Strab. 2 & 17.—Mela, 1, c. 4, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 754.

Numidius Quadratus, a governor of Syria under Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 12.

Numistro, a town of the Bruttii in Italy. Liv. 45, c. 37.

Numitor, a son of Procas king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, and began to reign conjointly with him. Amulius was too avaricious to bear a colleague on the throne; he expelled his brother, and that he might more safely secure himself, he put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Ilia to the service of the goddess Vesta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. These great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant, and though the two children whom she brought forth were exposed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preserved, and Numitor was restored to his throne by his grandsons, and the tyrannical usurper was put to death. Dionys. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 3.—Plut. in Romul.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 55, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.—A son of Phorcus, who fought with Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 342.—A rich and dissolute Roman in the age of Juvenal, 7, v. 74.

Numitorius, a Roman who defended Virginia, to whom Appius wished to offer violence. He was made military tribune.—Q. Pullus, a general of Fregellæ, &c. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 34.

Numonius. Vid. Vala.

Nunocoreus, a son of Sesostris king of Egypt, who made an obelisk, some ages after brought to Rome, and placed in the Vatican. Plin. 26, c. 11.—He is called Pheron by Herodotus.

Nundina, a goddess whom the Romans invoked when they named their children. This happened the ninth day after their birth, whence the name of the goddess, Nona dies. Macroh. Sat. 1, c. 16.

Nundinæ. Vid. Ferix.

Nurses, a town of Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 744.

Nursia, a goddess who patronized the Etrurians. Juv. 10, v. 74.

Nursia, now Norcia, a town of Picenum, whose inhabitants are called Nursini. Its situation was exposed, and the air considered as unwholesome. Sil. It. 8, v. 416.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.—Martial. 13, ep. 20.—Liv. 28, c. 45.

Nutria, a town of Illyricum. Polyb. 2.

Nyctelia, a daughter of Nycteus, who was mother of Labdacus.—A patronymic of Antiope the daughter of Nycteus, mother of Amphion and Zethus by Jupiter, who had assumed the shape of a satyr to enjoy her company. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 110.

Nyctelia, festivals in honour of Bacchus [Vid. Nyctelius], observed on mount Cithæron. Plut. in Symp.

Nyctelius, a surname of Bacchus, because his orgies were celebrated in the night (νύκτ. παρ. ἑλέως περφόει). The words lætes Nyctelius thence signify wine. Seneca in Edip.—Paus. 1, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

Nycteus, a son of Hyrieus and Clonia.—A son of Chthonius.—A son of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas king of Lesbos, or of Thebes, according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete, called Polyxo or Amalthæa, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope. The first of these disgraced herself by her criminal amours with her father, into whose bed she introduced herself by means of her nurse. When the father knew the incest which he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, who was immediately changed by Minerva into an owl. Nycteus made war against Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he entreated to continue the war, and punish Antiope for her immodest conduct. Vid. Antiope. Paus. 2, c. 6.—Hygin. Fab. 157 et 204.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 590, &c. l. 6, v. 120, &c.

Nyctimene, a daughter of Nycteus. Vid. Nycteus.

Nyctimus, a son of Lycaon king of Arcadia. He died without issue, and left his kingdom to his nephew Arcas the son of Callisto. Paus. 8, c. 4.

Nymbeum, a lake of Peloponnesus in Laconia. Id. 3, v. 23.

Nymphæ, certain female deities among the ancients. They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades and Hamadryades; others presided over mountains, and were called Orades; some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napeæ, &c. Of the sea nymphs, some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, Limnades, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also over rivers, fountains, streams, and lakes. The nymphs fixed their residence not only in the sea, but also on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns, and their grottos were beautified by evergreens and delightful and romantic scenes. The nymphs were immortal, according to the opinion of some mythologists; others supposed that, like men, they were subject to mortality, though their life was of long duration. They lived for several thousand years, according to Hesiod, or, as Plutarch seems obscurely to intimate, they lived above 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known. They were, according to Hesiod, above 3000, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were worshipped by the ancients, though not with so much solemnity as the superior deities. They had no temples raised to their honour, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and sometimes the sacrifice of a goat. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle, and sometimes they held a vase, from which they seemed to pour water. Sometimes they had grass, leaves, and shells, instead of vases. It was deemed unfortunate to see them naked, and such sight was generally attended by a delirium, to which Propertius seems to allude in this verse, wherein he speaks of the innocence and simplicity of the primitive ages of the world,

Nec fuerat nudas pœna videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally distinguished by an epithet which denoted the place of their residence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides;

those of Corycus, Corycides, &c. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320. l. 5, v. 412. l. 9, 657, &c. Fast. 3, v. 159.—Paus. 10, c. 4.—Plut. de Orac. Def.—Orpheus, Arg.—Hesiod. Theog.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—Homer. Od. 14.

Nymphæum, a port of Macedonia. Cic. Bell. Civ.—A promontory of Epirus on the Ionian sea.—A place near the walls of Apollonia, sacred to the nymphs, where Apollo had also an oracle. The place was also celebrated for the continual flames of fire which seemed to rise at a distance from the plains. It was there that a sleeping satyr was once caught and brought to Sylla as he returned from the Mithridatic war. This monster had the same features as the poets ascribed to the satyr. He was interrogated by Sylla and by his interpreters, but his articulations were unintelligible, and the Roman spurned from him a creature which seemed to partake of the nature of a beast more than that of a man. Plut. in Sylla.—Dio. 41.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 36 & 40.—A city of Taurica Chersonesus.—The building at Rome where the nymphs were worshipped bore also this name, being adorned with their statues and with fountains and waterfalls, which afforded an agreeable and refreshing coolness.

Nymphæus, a man who went into Caria at the head of a colony of Melians, &c. Polyæn. 8.

Nymphidius, a favourite of Nero, who said that he was descended from Caligula. He was raised to the consular dignity, and soon after disputed the empire with Galba. He was slain by the soldiers, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15.

Nymphis, a native of Heraclea, who wrote a history of Alexander's life and actions, divided into 24 books. Helian. 7, de Anim.

Nymphodôrus, a writer of Amphipolis.—A Syracusan who wrote a history of Sicily.

Nympholætes, or Nymphomænes, possessed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inspired by the nymphs. Plut. in Arist.

Nymphon, a native of Colophon, &c. Cic. ad Fra. 1.

Nysæus, a general of Dionysius the tyrant, who took Syracuse, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Diod. 16.

Nysa, or Nyssa, a town of Æthiopia, at the south of Egypt, or, according to others, of Arabia. This city, with another of the same name in India, was sacred to the god Bacchus, who was educated there by the nymphs of the place, and who received the name of Dionysius, which seems to be compounded of Διός and Νύσα, the name of his father, and that of the place of his education. The god made this place the seat of his empire, and the capital of the conquered nations of the east. Diodorus, in his third and fourth books, has given a prolix account of the birth of the god at Nysa, and of his education and heroic actions. Mela, 3, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 12, &c.—Ital. 7, v. 198.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 805.—According to some geographers there were no less than 10 places of the name of Nysa. One of these was on the coast of Eubœa, famous for its vines, which grew in such an uncommon manner, that if a twig was planted in the ground in the morning, it was said immediately to produce grapes, which were full ripe in the evening.—A city of Thrace.—Another seated on the top of mount Parnassus, and sacred to Bacchus. Juv. 7, v. 63.

Nyssaus, a surname of Bacchus, because he was worshipped at Nysa. Propert. 3, el. 17, v. 22.—A son of Dionysius of Syracuse. Cor. Nep. in Dion.

Nyssa, a river of Africa, rising in Æthiopia.

Nyssa portus, a small island in Africa.

Nysaides, a name given to the nymphs of Nysa, to whose care Jupiter entrusted the education of his son Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 374, &c.

Nystrus, an island. Virg. Nisyrus.

Nystrus, a surname of Bacchus as the protecting god of Nysa. Cic. Flac. 25.

Nyssa, a sister of Mithridates the Great. Plut.

OARSES, the original name of Artaxerxes Memnon.

Oarus, a river of Sarmatia, falling into the Palus Mæotis. Herodot. 4.

Oasis, a town about the middle of Libya, at the distance of seven days' journey from Thebes in Egypt, where the Persian army, sent by Cambyses to plunder Jupiter Ammon's temple, was lost in the sands. There were two other cities of that name very little known. Oasis became a place of banishment under the lower empire. Strab. 17.—Zosim. 5, c. 97.—Herodot. 3, c. 26.

Oaxes, a river of Crete, which received its name from Oaxus the son of Apollo. Virg. Ecl. 1, v. 66.

Oaxus, a town of Crete where Etearchus reigned, who founded Cyrene.—A son of Apollo and the nymph Anchiale.

Obringa, now Abr, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine above Rimmagen.

Obultronius, a questor put to death by Galba's orders, &c. Tacit.

Ocalia, or Ooalia, a town of Bœotia. Homer. Il. 2.—A daughter of Mantineus, who married Abas son of Lynceus and Hypermetra, by whom she had Acrisius and Præstus. Apollod. 2, c. 2.

Ocella, a woman who presided over the sacred rites of Vesta for 57 years with the greatest sanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius, and the daughter of Domitius succeeded her. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 86.

Oecæides and Oecæitides, sea nymphs, daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddess Tethys. They were 3000 according to Apollodorus, who mentions the names of seven of them: Asia, Styx, Electra, Doris, Erynnæ, Amphitrite, and Metis. Hesiod speaks of the eldest of them, and reckons 41: Pitho, Admete, Prynno, Ianthe, Rhodia, Hippo, Callirhoë, Urania, Clymene, Idyia, Pasithoe, Clythia, Zeuxo, Galaxaure, Plezaura, Petreis, Pluto, Thoe, Polydora, Melobosis, Dione, Cercæis, Xantha, Acata, Ianira, Telestho, Europa, Menestho, Petrea, Eudora, Calypso, Tyche, Ceyroe, Crisia, Amphiro, with those mentioned by Apollodorus, except Amphitrite. Hymnus mentions 16, whose names are almost all different from those of Apollodorus and Hesiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oecæides, like the rest of the inferior deities, were honoured with libations and sacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were entreated to protect sailors from storms and dangerous tempests. The Argonauts, before they proceeded on their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the sea-shore, to all the deities of the sea, and sacrificed bulls to them, and entreated their protection. When the sacrifice was made on the sea-shore the blood of the victim was received in a vessel, but when it was in the open sea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the sea was calm, the sailors generally offered a lamb or a young pig, but if it was agitated by the winds, and rough, a black bull was deemed the most acceptable victim. Homer. Od. 3.—Horat.—Apollon. Arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 347.—Hesiod. Theog. 349.—Apollod. 1.

Océanus, a powerful deity of the sea, son of Coelus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the most principal rivers, such as the Alps, Peneus, Strymon, &c., with a number of daughters who are called from him Oceanides. Virg. Oceanides. According to Homer, Océanus was the fathers of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent visits from the rest of the deities. He is generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea. He often holds a pike in his hand, whilst ships under sail appear at a distance, or a sea monster stands near him. Océanus presided over every part of the sea, and even the rivers were subjected to his power. The ancients were superstitious in their worship to Océanus, and revered with great solemnity a deity to whose care they entrusted themselves when going on any voyage. Hesiod. Theog.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 81, &c.—Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.—Homer. Il.

Ocellus, an ancient philosopher of Lucania. Virg. Lucanus.

Ocellum, a town of Gaul. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 10.

Ocha, a mountain of Eubœa, and the name of Eubœa itself.—A sister of Ochus, buried alive by his orders.

Ochealus, a general of Ætolia in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.

Ochus, a surname given to Artaxerxes III. king of Persia. Virg. Artaxerxes.—A man of Cyzicus, who was killed by the Argonauts. Flacc. 3.—A prince of Persia, who refused to visit his native country for fear of giving all the women each a piece of gold. Plut.—A river of India, or of Bactriana. Plin. 6, c. 16. l. 31, c. 7.—A king of Persia. He exchanged his name for that of Darius. Virg. Darius Nothus.

Ocnus, a son of the Tiber and of Manto, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. He built a town, which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some suppose that he is the same as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 9. Æn. 10, v. 198.—A man remarkable for his industry. He had a wife as remarkable for her profusion; she always consumed and lavished away whatever the labours of her husband had earned. He is represented as twisting a cord, which an ass standing by eats up as soon as he makes it; whence the proverb of the cord of Ocnus often applied to labour which meets no return, and which is totally lost. Propert. 4, el. 3, v. 21.—Plin. 35, c. 11.—Paus. 10, c. 29.

Ocriculum, now Otricoli, a town of Umbria near Rome. Cic. pro Mil.—Liv. 19, c. 41.

Ooridion, a king of Rhodes, who was reckoned in the number of the gods after death. Plut. in Græc. Quæst. 27.

Ooriana, a woman of Corniculum, who was one of the attendants of Tanquil the wife of Tarquinus Priscus. As she was throwing into the flames, as offerings, some of the meats that were served on the table of Tarquin, she suddenly saw in the fire what Ovid calls obscanti forma virilis. She informed the queen of it, and when by her orders she had approached near it, she conceived a son who was called Servius Tullus, and who, being educated in the king's family, afterwards succeeded to the vacant throne. Some suppose that Vulcan had assumed that form which was presented to the eyes of Ocresia, and that the god was the father of the sixth king of Rome. Plut. de Fort. Rom.—Plin. 36, c. 27.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 627.

Ocellillus, a slave who was manumitted, and who afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome. He had Pompey the Great in the number of his pupils. Sueton. in Rhet.—Martial. 10, ep. 79.

Octavia, a Roman lady, sister to the emperor Augustus, and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death, M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political step to reconcile her brother and her husband. Antony proved for some time attentive to her, but he soon after despised her for Cleopatra, and when she attempted to withdraw him from this unlawful amour by going to meet him at Athens, she was secretly rebuked, and totally banished from his presence. This affront was highly resented by Augustus, and though Octavia endeavoured to pacify him by palliating her husband's behaviour, he resolved to revenge her cause by arms. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries she had received, took into her house all the children of her husband and treated them with maternal tenderness. Marcellus her son by her first husband was married to a niece of Augustus, and publicly intended as a successor to his uncle. His sudden death plunged all his family into the greatest grief. Virgil, whom Augustus patronized, undertook upon himself to pay a melancholy tribute to the memory of a young man whom Rome regarded as her future father and patron. He was desired to repeat his composition in the presence of Augustus and of his sister. Octavia burst into tears as soon as the poet began; but when he mentioned, Tu Marcellus eris, she swooned away. This tender and pathetic encomium upon the merit and the virtues of young Marcellus was liberally rewarded by Octavia, and Virgil received 20,000 sesterces for every one of the verses. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The elder married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had Cn. Domitius the father of the emperor Nero, by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. Antonia Minor, who was as virtuous and as beautiful as her mother, married Drusus the son of Tiberius, by whom she had Germanicus and Claudius, who reigned before Nero. The death of Marcellus continually preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy about 20 years before the christian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory, by pronouncing himself her funeral oration. The Roman people also showed their respect for her virtues by their wish to pay her divine honours. Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Anton., &c.—A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Messalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, she was married to the emperor Nero in the 16th year of her age. She was soon after divorced on pretence of barrenness, and the emperor married Poppæa, who exercised her enmity upon Octavia by causing her to be banished into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the instance of the people, and Poppæa, who was resolved on her ruin, caused her again to be banished to an island, where she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa.

Suet. in Claud. 27. In Ner. 7 & 35.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

Octavianus, or Octavius Cæsar, the nephew of Cæsar the dictator. After the battle of Actium and the final destruction of the Roman republic, the servile senate bestowed upon him the title and surname of Augustus, as more expressive of his greatness and dignity. Vid. Augustus.

Octavius, a Roman officer who brought Perseus king of Macedonia a prisoner to the consul. He was sent by his countrymen to be guardian to Ptolemy Eupator the young king of Egypt, where he behaved with the greatest arrogance. He was assassinated by Lysias, who was before regent of Egypt. The murderer was sent to Rome.—A man who opposed Metellus in the reduction of Crete by means of Pompey. He was obliged to retire from the island.—A man who banished Cinna from Rome, and became remarkable for his probity and fondness of discipline. He was seized and put to death by order of his successful rivals Marius and Cinna.—A Roman who boasted of being in the number of Cæsar's murderers. His assertions were false, yet he was punished as if he had been accessory to the conspiracy.—A lieutenant of Crassus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Crassus.—A governor of Cilicia. He died in his province, and Lucullus made applications to succeed him, &c.—A tribune of the people at Rome, whom Tib. Gracchus his colleague deposed.—A commander of the forces of Antony against Augustus.—An officer who killed himself, &c.—A tribune of the people, who debauched a woman of Pontus from her husband. She proved unfaithful to him, upon which he murdered her. He was condemned under Nero. Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Plut. in Vitius.—Flor.—Liv., &c.—A poet in the Augustan age, intimate with Horace. He also distinguished himself as an historian. Horat. l. sat. 10, v. 82.

Octodurus, a village in the modern country of Switzerland, now called Martigny. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 1.

Otogressa, a town of Spain, a little above the mouth of the Iberus, now called Mequinensa. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 61.

Otolophum, a place of Greece. Liv. 31.

Oxyptis, one of the Harpies, who infected whatever she touched. The name signifies swift flying. Hærod. Theog. 265.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.
A daughter of Thæumas.—A daughter of Danaus.

Ocyros, a daughter of Chiron by Chariclo, who had the gift of prophecy. She was changed into a mare. Vid. Melanippe. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 638, &c.
—A woman, daughter of Chesias, carried away by Apollo, as she was going to a festival at Miletus.

Odenatus, a celebrated prince of Palmyra. He early inured himself to bear fatigues, and by hunting leopards and wild beasts, he accustomed himself to the labours of a military life. He was faithful to the Romans; and when Aurelian had been taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia, Odenatus warmly interested himself in his cause, and solicited his release by writing a letter to the conqueror and sending him presents. The king of Persia was offended at the liberty of Odenatus; he tore the letter, and ordered the presents which were offered to be thrown into a river. To punish Odenatus, who had the impudence, as he observed, to pay homage to so great a monarch as himself, he ordered him to appear before him, on pain of being devoted to instant destruction, with all his family, if he dared to refuse. Odenatus disdained the summons of Sapor, and opposed force to force. He obtained some advantages over the troops of the Persian monarch, and took his wife prisoner with a great and rich booty. These services were seen with gratitude by the Romans; and Gallienus, the then reigning emperor, named Odenatus as his colleague on the throne, and gave the title of Augustus to his children and to his wife, the celebrated Zenobia. Odenatus, invested with new power, resolved to signalize himself more conspicuously by conquering the northern barbarians, but his exaltation was short, and he perished by the dagger of one of his relations, whom he had slightly offended in a domestic entertainment. He died at Emessa, about the 26th year of the christian era. Zenobia succeeded to all his titles and honours.

Odinus, a celebrated hero of antiquity, who flourished about 70 years before the christian era, in the northern parts of ancient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a priest, a soldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He imposed upon the credulity of his superstitious countrymen, and made them believe that he could raise the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and increased his fame by conquest and by persuasion, he resolved to die in a different manner from other men. He assembled his friends, and with a sharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he should become one of the immortal gods. He further added that he would prepare bliss and felicity for such of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. These injunctions had the desired effect; his countrymen superstitiously believed him, and always recommended themselves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the souls of such as had fallen in war.

Oditus, a son of Ixion, killed by Mopsus at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12. v. 457.—A prince killed at the nuptials of Andromeda. Id. ib. 5. v. 97.

Odoacer, a king of the Heruli, who destroyed the western empire of Rome, and called himself king of Italy, A.D. 476.

Odomanti, a people of Thrace on the eastern banks of the Strymon. Liv. 45. c. 4.

Odonos, a people of Thrace.

Odryæ, an ancient people of Thrace, between Abdera and the river Ister. The epithet of Odryæ is often applied to a Thracian. Ovid. Met. 6. v. 490. l. 23. v. 554. Stat. Ach. 1. v. 124.—Liv. 39. c. 53.

Odyssæa, one of Homer's epic poems, in which he describes in 24 books the adventures of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than 55 days. It is not so esteemed as the Iliad of that poet. Vid. Homerus.

Odyssæum, a promontory of Sicily, at the west of Pachynus.

Oea, a city of Africa, now Tripoli. Plin. 5. c. 4.—Sil. Ital. 3. v. 257.—Also a place in Ægina. Herodot. 5. c. 83.

Oeagrus, or Oeager, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him mount Hamus, and also the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, have received the appellation of Oeagrius, though Servius, in his commentaries, disputes the explanation of Diodorus, by asserting that the Oeagrus is a river of Thrace, whose waters supply the streams of the Hebrus. Ovid. in Ib. 414.—Apollon. 1. Arg.—Virg. G. 4. v. 524.—Ital. 5. v. 463.—Diod.—Apollod. 1. c. 3.

Oeanthe and Oeanthia, a town of Phocis, where Venus had a temple. Paus. 10. c. 38.

Oeax, a son of Nauplius and Clymene. He was brother to Palamedes, whom he accompanied to the Trojan war, and whose death he highly resented on his return to Greece, by raising disturbances in the family of some of the Grecian princes. Dictys Cret.—Apollod. 2.—Hygin. fab. 117.

Oebalia, the ancient name of Laconia, which it received from king Oebalus, and thence Oebalides was applied to Hyacinthus as a native of the country, and Oebalides sanguis is used to denominate his blood. Paus. 3. c. 1.—Apollod. 3. c. 10.—The same name is given to Tarentum because built by a Lacedæmonian colony, whose ancestors were governed by Oebalus. Virg. G. 4. v. 125.—Sil. 12. v. 451.

Oebalus, a son of Argalus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone the daughter of Perseus, by whom he had Hippocoon, Tyndarus, &c. Paus. 3. c. 1.—Apollod. 3. c. 10.—A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis, who reigned in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7. v. 734.

Oebares, a satrap of Cyrus, against the Medes. Polyæn. 7.—A groom of Darius son of Hystaspes. He was the cause that his master obtained the kingdom of Persia, by his artifice in making his horse neigh first. Vid. Darius I. Herodot. 3. c. 85.—Justin. 1. c. 10.

Ochalia, a country of Peloponnesus in Laconia, with a small town of the same name. This town was destroyed by Hercules, while Eurystus was king over it, when this circumstance it was often called Eurytropolis.—A small town of Eubœa, where, according to some, Eurystus reigned, and not in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8. 9. & 10.—Virg. Æn. 8. v. 291.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 9. v. 126.—Sophoc. in Trach. 74 & Schol.

Oclides, a patronymic of Amphiaraus son of Ocleus. Ovid. Met. 8. fab. 7.

Ocleus. Vid. Oicleus.

Oeumenius, wrote in the middle of the 10th century a paraphrase of some of the books of the New Testament in Greek, edited in two vols. fol. Paris, 1637.

Oedipodia, a fountain of Thebes in Bœotia.

Oedipus, a son of Laius king of Thebes and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, Oedipus was born to be exposed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius the father of Oedipus was informed by the oracle, as soon as he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, he resolved never to approach Jocasta; but his solemn resolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication. The queen became pregnant, and Laius, still intent to stop this evil, ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as it came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet she gave the child as soon as born to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him on the mountains. The servant was moved with pity, but to obey the commands of Jocasta, she bored the feet of the child, and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home; and Peribœa the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the swelling of his feet (oidew tumeo, wober pedes), soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address; and one of them, to mortify his rising ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts; he asked Peribœa, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill-founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth, where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey, met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality and of the rank of the men whom he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphinx. This terrible monster, which Juno had sent to lay waste the country [Vid. Sphinx], resorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain, without success, the enigmas which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the Sphinx, Creon, who at the death of Laius had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed his head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismene and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease only when the murderer of king Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact inquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming when Œdipus considered, that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonus, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this he walked, himself, without the assistance of a guide, to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had not children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus, in the age of Pausanias. Some of the ancient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to them, the four children which he had were by Euriganea the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. Apollod. 3. c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniss. &c.—*Sophocl. ŒNEA, a daughter of Danaus by Crino. Apol. lod.

ŒNANTHES, a favourite of young Ptolemy king of Egypt.

ŒNEA, a small town of Argolis. The people were called Œneade.

ŒNEUS, a river of Assyria. Ammian.

ŒNEUS, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthæon, or Portneus, and Euryle. He married Althæa the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althæa's death, he married Peribœa the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general sacrifice, which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddess, to revenge this unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and, besides, she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydonia. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chase, known by the name of the chase of the Calydonian boar. Some time after, Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius. Dionædes, however, his grandson, soon restored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed rendered him melancholy. He excised himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the cave of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Œneæ. It is reported that Œneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that he suffered the god to enjoy the favours of Althæa, and to become the father of Dejanira, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron should be called among the Greeks by the name of Ceneus (ovvov). Ilygin. Jab. 199.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 559.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 2, c. 25.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 519.

Cenides, a patronymic of Meleager son of Ceneus. Ovid. Met. 8, Jab. 10.

Cenoe, a nymph who married Sicinus, the son of Thias king of Lemnos. From her the island of Sicinus had been called Cnoe.—Two villages of Attica were also called Cnoe. Herodot. 5, c. 74.—Plin. 4, c. 7.—A city of Argolis, where Ceneus fled when driven from Calydon. Paus. 2, c. 25.—A town of Elis in the Peloponnesus. Strab.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 1, 8c.

Cenomaus, a son of Mars, by Sterope the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia, by Evarate daughter of Acrisius, or Eurysthea the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law, therefore as he could skillfully drive a chariot he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could outrun him, on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their life, if conquered. Many had already perished, when Pelops son of Tantalus proposed himself. He previously bribed Myrtilus the charioteer of Cenomaus, by promising him the enjoyment of the favours of Hippodamia, if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian isthmus, and Cenomaus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, Cenomaus entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Those that had been defeated when Pelops entered the lists, were Marmax, Alcaethous, Euryalus, Eurymachus, Capetus, Lasius, Acrisius, Chalcedon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Aristomachus, Eolius, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 5, c. 17. l. 6, c. 11, 8c.—*Apollon. Cenora, a part of Locris on the bay of Corinth.

Cenona, an ancient name of the island Egina. It is also called Cenofoia. Herodot. 8, c. 46.—Two villages of Attica are also called Cenona, or rather Cnoe.—A town of Troas, the birthplace of the nymph Cenoë. Strab. 13.

Cenone, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Coleranus in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priam, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled; and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Cenone, in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as he came into her presence; and Cenone was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that she bathed it with her tears, and stabbed herself to the heart. She was mother of Corymbus by Paris, and his son perished by the hand of his father when he attempted, at the instigation of Cenoë, to persuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. Dictys. Cret.—Ovid. de Rem. Amor. v. 457. Heroid. 5.—Lucan. 9.

Cenopion, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some suppose that this violence was offered to Orion after he had dishonoured Merope. Cenopion received the island of Chios from Rhadamantus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Aegean sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias. Some suppose, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Egina, which from him was called Cenopia. Plut. in These.—Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Diod.—Paus. 7, c. 4.—Apollon. Rhod. 3.

Cenotri, the inhabitants of Cenotria.

Cenotria, a part of Italy, which was afterwards called Lucania. It received this name from Cenotrus the son of Lycaon, who settled there with a colony of Arcadians. The Cenotrians afterwards spread themselves into Umbria and as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabines, according to some writers. The name of Cenotria is sometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where Cenotrus settled, was before inhabited by the Ausones. Dionys. Hal. 8, c. 11.—Paus. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 536. l. 7, v. 85.—Ital. 8, v. 220.

Cenotrides, two small islands on the coast of Lucania, where some of the Romans were banished by the emperors. They were called Ischia and Pontia.

Cenotrus, a son of Lycaon of Arcadia. He passed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of Cenotria to that part of the country where he settled. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Paus. 1, c. 3.

Cenusa, small islands near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.—Thucyd. 8.—Others on the coast of the Peloponnesus, near Messenia. Mela, 2, c. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Cenusa, a son of Licymnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules; and as the hero had promised Licymnius to bring back his son, he burnt his body and presented the ashes to the afflicted father. From this circumstance arose a custom of burning the dead among the Greeks. Schol. Homer. Il.—A small river of Laconia. Liv. 34, c. 28.

Cenoe, an island of Beotia formed by the Asopus. Herodot. 9, c. 50.

Ceta, now Bassina, a celebrated mountain between Thessaly and Macedonia, upon which Hercules burnt himself. Its height has given occasion to the poets to feign that the sun, moon, and stars arose behind it. Mount Ceta, properly speaking, is a long chain of mountains which runs from the straits of Thermopylæ and the gulf of Malia, in a western direction, to mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. The straits or passes of mount Ceta are called the straits of Thermopylæ, from the hot baths and mineral waters which are in the neighbourhood. These passes are not more than 25 feet in breadth. Mela, 2, c. 3.—Catull. 66, v. 54.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 10, c. 20, 8c.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 2, v. 216. l. 9, v. 204, 8c.—Virg. Ecl. 8.—Plin. 25, c. 5.—Seneca in Med.—Lucan. 3, 8c.—A small town at the foot of mount Ceta near Thermopylæ.

Cetylus, or Cetylum, a town of Laconia, which received its name from Cetylus, one of the heroes of Argos. Serapis had a temple there. Paus. 3, c. 25.

Coffinus, a man whom, though unpolished, Horace represents as a character exemplary for wisdom, economy, and moderation. Horat. 2, sat. 2, v. 2.

Oh, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 28.

Ogdolapis, a navigable river flowing from the Alps. Strab. 6.

Ogdorus, a king of Egypt.

Oglossa, an island in the Tyrrhene sea, east of Corsica, famous for wine, and now called Monte Christo. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Ogmilus, a name of Hercules among the Gauls. Lucian. in Herc.

Ogoa, a deity of Mylassa in Caria, under whose temple, as was supposed, the sea passed. Paus. 8, c. 10.

Ogulnia lex, by Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 453. It increased the number of pontifices and augurs from four to nine. The addition was made to both orders from plebeian families.—A Roman lady as poor as she was lascivious. Juv. 6, v. 351.

Ogyges, a celebrated monarch, the most ancient of those that reigned in Greece. He was son of Terra, or, as some suppose, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Boeotia, which from him is sometimes called Ogygia, and his power was also extended over Attica. It is supposed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are so obscure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygius is often applied to everything of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which so inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waste for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is supposed to have happened about 1764 years before the christian era, and previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to some writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was also marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and, as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her colour, diameter, figure, and her course. Varro. de R. R. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 9, c. 5.—Aug. de Civ. D. 18, &c.

Ogygia, a name of one of the gates of Thebes in Boeotia. Lucian. 1, v. 675.—One of the daughters of Niobe and Amphion, changed into stones. Apollod.—Paus. 9, c. 8.—An ancient name of Boeotia, from Ogyges, who reigned there.

—The island of Calypso, opposite the promontory of Lacinium in Magna Græcia, where Ulysses was shipwrecked. The situation, and even the existence of Calypso's island, is disputed by some writers. Plin. 3, c. 10.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 52 & 85. l. 5, v. 254.

Ogyris, an island in the Indian ocean.

Oicleus, a son of Antiphates and Zeuxippe, who married Hypermetra daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Iphianira, Polybea, and Amphiarzus. He was killed by Laomedon when defending the ships which Hercules had brought to Asia, when he made war against Troy. Homer. Od. 15.—Dioid. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 17.

Oileus, a king of the Locrians. His father's name was Odoedocus, and his mother's Agrionome. He married Eriopo, by whom he had Ajax, called

Oileus from his father, to discriminate him from Ajax the son of Telamon. He had also another son called Medon, by a courtesan called Rhene. Oileus was one of the Argonauts. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 45.—Apollod. 1.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.—Homer. Il. 13 & 15.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Olanus, a town of Lesbos.

Olastres, a people of India. Lucan. 3, v. 249.—Plin. 6, c. 20.

Olba, or Olbus, a town of Cilicia.

Olbia, a town of Sarmatia at the confluence of the Hypanis and the Borysthenes, about 15 miles from the sea, according to Pliny. It was afterwards called Borysthenes and Miletopolis, because peopled by a Milesian colony, and is now supposed to be Ocakow. Strab. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—A town of Bithynia. Mela, 1, c. 19.—A town of Gallia Narbonensis. Mela, 2, c. 5.—The capital of Sardinia. Claudian.

Olchintum, or Olcintum, now Dulcigno, a town of Dalmatia, on the Adriatic. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Olbades, a people of Spain. Liv. 21, c. 5.

Oleæros, or Oliaros, one of the Cyclades, about 16 miles in circumference, separated from Paros by a strait of seven miles. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 126.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Oleastrum, a town of Spain near Saguntum. Strab.

Olan, a Greek poet of Lycia, who flourished some time before the age of Orpheus, and composed many hymns, some of which were regularly sung at Delphi, on solemn occasions. Some suppose that he was he first who established the oracle of Apollo at Delphi where he first delivered oracles. Herodot. 4, c. 35.

Olenius, a Lemnian killed by his wife. Val. Fl. 2, v. 164.

Olenus, a son of Vulcan, who married Lethæa, a beautiful woman, who preferred herself to the goddesses. She and her husband were changed into stones by the deities. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 68.

—A famous soothsayer of Etruria. Plin. 28, c. 2.

Olenus, or Olenum, a town of Peloponnesus between Patræ and Cylene. The goat Amalthæa, which was made a constellation by Jupiter, is called Olenia, from its residence there. Paus. 7, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 3.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 2, c. 28.—Another in Ætolia.

Oleorus, one of the Cyclades, now Antiparo.

Olgassy, a mountain of Galatia.

Oligyrtia, a town of Peloponnesus.

Olinthus, a town of Macedonia. Vid. Olynthus.

Ollisipo, now Lisbon, a town of ancient Spain on the Tagus, surnamed Felicitas Julia (Plin. 4, c. 22), and called by some Ulyssippo, and said to be founded by Ulysses. Mela, 3, c. 1.—Solinus 23.

Ollingi, a town of Lusitania. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Ollison, a town of Magnesia in Thessaly. Homer.

T. Ollius, the father of Poppea, destroyed on account of his intimacy with Sejanus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 45.—A river rising in the Alps, and falling into the Po, now called the Oglio. Plin. 2, c. 103.

Ollovioo, a prince of Gaul, called the friend of the republic by the Roman senate. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 31.

Olimée, a promontory near Megara.

Olimus, a river of Bœotia, near Helicon, sacred to the Muses. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 284.

Olooson, now Alestone, a town of Magnesia. Hom.

Olophyxus, a town of Macedonia on mount Athos. Herodot. 7, c. 21.

Olpe, a fortified place of Epirus, now Forte Castri.

Olus (untis), a town at the west of Crete.

Olympœum, a place of Delos.—Another in Syracuse.

Olympia (orum), celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia, where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated. They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B.C. 1457. Some attribute the institution to Pelops after he had obtained a victory over Cœnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the more received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honour of Jupiter (Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augias, B.C. 1222. Strabo objects to this opinion, by observing that if they had been established in the age of Homer, the poet would have undoubtedly spoken of them, as he is in every particular careful to mention the amusements and diversions of the ancient Greeks. But they were neglected after their first institution by Hercules, and no notice was taken of them, according to many writers, till Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity. This reinstitution, which happened B.C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiad. Vid. Olympias. They, however, were neglected for some time after the age of Iphitus, till Corœbus, who obtained a victory, B.C. 776, reinstalled them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendence of the games were entrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans, B.C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment; they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th Olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103rd Olympiad, the number was increased to 12, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following Olympiad, they were reduced to eight, and afterwards increased to 20, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. The presidents were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked, and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity, called ἀστυνοί, much the same as the Roman factors, of whom the chief was called ἀστυνόμος. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to trespass this law was immediately thrown down from a rock. This, however, was sometimes neglected, for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were great.

No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself 10 months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. No unfair dealings were allowed, and whoever attempted to bribe his adversary was subjected to a severe fine. No criminals, nor such as were connected with impious and guilty persons, were suffered to present themselves as combatants; and even the father and relations were obliged to swear that they would have recourse to no artifice which might decide the victory in favour of their friends. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. Some little balls, superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver urn, and such as drew the same letter were obliged to contend one with the other. He who had an odd letter remained the last, and he often had the advantage, as he was to encounter the last who had obtained the superiority over his adversary. He was called ἐπὶ δέρος. In these games were exhibited running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, which was called altogether πενταθλον, or quinquetrium. Besides these, there were horse and chariot races, and also contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained, was a crown of olive; which, as some suppose, was in memory of the labours of Hercules, which was accomplished for the universal good of mankind, and for which the hero claimed no other reward than the consciousness of having been the friend of humanity. So small and trifling a reward stimulated courage and virtue, and was more the source of great honours than the most unbounded treasures. The statues of the conquerors, called Olympionicæ, were erected at Olympia, in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; they were drawn in a chariot by four horses, and everywhere received with the greatest acclamations. Their entrance into their native city was not through the gates, but, to make it more grand and more solemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names; and indeed the victories severally obtained at Olympia are the subjects of the most beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a scarf was originally tied round the waist, but when it had entangled one of the adversaries, and been the cause that he lost the victory, it was laid aside, and no regard was paid to decency. The Olympic games were observed every fifth year, or, to speak with greater exactness, after a revolution of four years, and in the first month of the fifth year, and they continued for five successive days. As they were the most ancient and the most solemn of all the festivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew so many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries. *Pind. Olympias, a certain space of time which elapsed between the celebration of the Olympic games. The Olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence some have said that they were observed every fifth year.

This period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The custom of reckoning time by the celebration of the Olympic games was not introduced at the first institution of these festivals, but, to speak accurately, only the year in which Coroebus obtained the prize. This Olympiad, which has always been reckoned the first, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of some of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the christian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon, next after the summer solstice; therefore the Olympiads were of unequal length, because the time of the full moon differs 21 days every year, and for that reason they sometimes began the next day after the solstice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by Olympiads ceased, as some suppose, after the 364th, in the year 440 of the christian era. It was universally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though still the Pythian games served as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Boeotians, the Nemeian games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Isthmian to the Corinthians and the inhabitants of the Peloponnesian isthmus. To the Olympiads history is much indebted. They have served to fix the time of many momentous events, and indeed before this method of computing time was observed, every page of history is mostly fabulous, and filled with obscurity and contradiction, and no true chronological account can be properly established and maintained with certainty. The mode of computation, which was used after the suppression of the Olympiads and of the consular fasti of Rome, was more useful as it was more universal; but while the era of the creation of the world prevailed in the east, the western nations in the sixth century began to adopt with more propriety the christian epoch, which was propagated in the eighth century, and at last, in the tenth, became legal and popular.—A celebrated woman, who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness, and more probably her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was sensible of this injury, and Alexander showed his disapprobation of his father's measures by retiring from the court to his mother. The murder of Philip, which soon followed this disgrace, and which some have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greatest extravagancies. The queen paid the highest honour to her husband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his ashes near those of Philip. The administration of Alexander, who had succeeded his father, was, in some instances, offensive to Olympias; but when the ambition of her son was concerned, she did not scruple to declare publicly that Alexander was not the son of Philip, but that he was the offspring of an enormous serpent which had supernaturally introduced itself into her bed. When Alexander was dead, Olympias seized the government of Macedonia, and to establish her usurpation, she cruelly put to death Arideus, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicanor the brother of Cassander, with 100 leading men of Macedonia, who were inimical to her interest. Such barbarities did not long remain unpunished; Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired with the remains of her family, and she was obliged to surrender after an obstinate siege. The conqueror ordered her to be accused, and to be put to death. A body of 200 soldiers were directed to put the bloody commands into execution, but the splendour and majesty of the queen disarmed their courage, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the christian era. Justin. 7, c. 6. l. 9, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Paus.—A fountain of Arcadia which flowed for one year and the next was dry. Paus. 8, c. 29.

Olympiodorus, a musician who taught Epaminondas music. C. Nep.—A native of Thebes in Egypt, who flourished under Theodosius II., and wrote 22 books of history, in Greek, beginning with the seventh consulship of Honorius, and the second of Theodosius, to the period when Valentinian was made emperor. He wrote also an account of an embassy to some of the barbarian nations of the north, &c. His style is censured by some as low, and unworthy of an historian. The commentaries of Olympiodorus on the Meteora of Aristotle, were edited apud Aid. 1550, in fol.—An Athenian officer, present at the battle of Plataea, where he behaved with great valour. Plut.

Olympius, a surname of Jupiter at Olympia, where the god had a celebrated temple and statue, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the work of Phidias. Paus. 7, c. 2.—A native of Carthage, called also Nemesianus. Vid. Nemesianus.—A favourite at the court of Honorius, who was the cause of Stilicho's death.

Olympus, a physician of Cleopatra queen of Egypt, who wrote some historical treatises. Plut. in Anton.—A poet and musician of Mysia, son of Mazon and disciple to Marsyas. He lived before the Trojan war, and distinguished himself by his amatory elegies, his hymns, and particularly the beautiful airs which he composed, and which were still preserved in the age of Aristophanes. *Plato in Min.—Aristot. The ancients supposed that it touched the heavens with its top; and, from that circumstance, they have placed the residence of the gods there, and have made it the court of Jupiter. It is about one mile and a half in perpendicular height, and is covered with pleasant woods, caves, and grottoes. On the top of the mountain, according to the notions of the poets, there was neither wind nor rain, nor clouds, but an eternal spring. Homer. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, 6, &c.—*Ovid. Olyzon, a town of Thessaly.

Omarus, a Lacedæmonian sent to Darius, &c.

Curt. 3, c. 13.

Ombi and Tentyra, two neighbouring cities of Egypt, whose inhabitants were always in discord one with another. Juv. 15, v. 35.

Ombri. Vid. Umbri.

Omolé, or Homôlé, a mountain of Thessaly. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.—There were some festivals called Homoleia, which were celebrated in Bœotia in honour of Jupiter, surnamed Homoleius.

Omophaagia, a festival in honour of Bacchus. The word signifies the eating of raw flesh. Vid. Dionysia.

Omphale, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jar-danus. She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wished to see so illustrious a hero. Her wish was soon gratified. After the murder of Eurytus, Hercules fell sick, and was ordered to be sold as a slave, that he might recover his health, and the right use of his senses. Mercury was commissioned to sell him, and Omphale bought him, and restored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and the queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him, whom some call Ageiaus, and others Lamon. From this son were descended Gyges and Croesus; but this opinion is different from the account which makes these Lydian monarchs spring from Alcæus, a son of Hercules by Malis, one of the female servants of Omphale. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen that, to conciliate her esteem, he spins by her side among her women, while she covers herself with the lion's skin, and arms herself with the club of the hero, and often strikes him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the distaff, &c. Their fondness was mutual. As they once travelled together, they came to a grotto on mount Tmolus, where the queen dressed herself in the habit of her lover, and obliged him to appear in a female garment. After they had supped, they both retired to rest in different rooms, as a sacrifice on the morrow to Bacchus required. In the night, Faunus, or rather Pan, who was enamoured of Omphale, introduced himself into the cave. He went to the bed of the queen, but the lion's skin persuaded him that it was the dress of Hercules, and therefore he repaired to the bed of Hercules, in hopes to find there the object of his affection. The female dress of Hercules deceived him, and he laid himself down by his side. The hero was awakened, and kicked the intruder into the middle of the cave. The noise awoke Omphale, and Faunus was discovered lying on the ground, greatly disappointed and ashamed. *Ovid. Omphalos, a place of Crete, sacred to Jupiter, on the borders of the river Triton. It received its name from the umbilical cord (ομφαλος) of Jupiter, which fell there soon after his birth. Diod.

Omphis, a king of India, who delivered himself up to Alexander the Great. Curt. 8, c. 12.

Onœum, or Onœnum, a promontory and town of Dalmatia. Liv. 43, c. 19.

Onarus, a priest of Bacchus, who is supposed to have married Ariadne after she had been abandoned by Theseus. Plut. in Theseus.

Onasimus, a sophist of Athens, who flourished in the reign of Constantine.

Onâtas, a famous statuary of Egina son of Micon. Paus. 8, c. 42.

Onchemites, a wind which blows from Onchesmus, a harbour of Epirus, towards Italy. The word is sometimes spelt Ancherites and Anchemites. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 2.—Ptolemaus.

Onchestus, a town of Bœotia, founded by Onchestus, a son of Neptune. Paus. 9, c. 26.

Onesion, a place of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 25.

Onesicritus, a cynic philosopher of Egina, who went with Alexander into Asia, and was sent to the Indian Gymnosophsists. He wrote a history of the king's life, which has been censured for the romantic, exaggerated, and improbable narrative it gives. It is asserted that Alexander, upon reading it, said that he should be glad to come to life again for some time, to see what reception the historian's work met with. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 9, c. 10.

Onesimus, a Macedonian nobleman, treated with great kindness by the Roman emperors. He wrote an account of the life of the emperor Probus, and of Carus, with great precision and elegance.

Onesippus, a son of Hercules. Apollod.

Onoba, a king of Salamis, who revolted from the Persians.

Onetorides, an Athenian officer, who attempted to murder the garrison which Demetrius had stationed at Athens, &c. Polyam. 5.

Onium, a place of Peloponnesus, near Corinth.

Onoba, a town near the columns of Hercules. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Onobala, a river of Sicily.

Onochônus, a river of Thessaly, falling into the Peneus. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes. Herodot. 7, c. 106.

Onomacritus, a soothsayer of Athens. It is generally believed that the Greek poem on the Argonautic expedition, attributed to Orpheus, was written by Onomacritus. The elegant poems of Musæus are also, by some, supposed to be the production of his pen. He flourished about 510 years before the christian era, and was expelled from Athens by Hipparchus, one of the sons of Pisis-tratus. Herodot. 7, c. 6.—A. Locrian, who wrote concerning laws, &c. Aristot. 2, Polit.

Onomarchus, a Phocian, son of Euthyocrates and brother of Philomelus, whom he succeeded, as general of his countrymen, in the sacred war. After exploits of valour and perseverance, he was defeated and slain in Thessaly by Philip of Macedonia, who ordered his body to be ignominiously hung up, for the sacrifice offered to the temple of Delphi. He died 353 B.C. Arist. Pol. 5, c. 4.—Diod. 16.—A man to whose care Antigonus entrusted the keeping of Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum.

Onomastorides, a Lacedæmonian ambassador sent to Darius, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Onomastus, a freedman of the emperor Otho. Tacit.

Onophas, one of the seven Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. Ctesias.—An officer in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece.

Onosander, a Greek writer, whose book De Imperatoris Institutione has been edited by Schwabel, with a French translation, fol. Norimb. 1757.

Onythes, a friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 514.

Opalia, festivals celebrated by the Romans, in honour of Ops, on the 14th of the calends of January.

Opheles, a general of Cyrene, defeated by Agathocles.

Opheleus, a son of Lycurgus king of Thrace. He is the same as Archemorus. Vid. Archemorus.

—The father of Euryalus, whose friendship with Nisus is proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 201. — One of the companions of Acastus, changed into a dolphin by Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 8.

Opheusia, a town of Africa. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 50.

Opheides, an island on the coast of Arabia, so called from the great number of serpents found there. It belonged to the Egyptian kings, and was considered valuable for the topaz it produced. Diod. 3.

Opheias, a patronymic given to Combe, as daughter of Opheius, an unknown person. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 382.

Opheionus, was an ancient soothsayer in the age of Aristodemus. He was born blind.

Opheis, a small river of Arcadia, which falls into the Alpheus.

Opheusa, the ancient name of Rhodes. — A small island near Crete. — A town of Sarmatia.

—An island near the Balears, so called from the number of serpents which it produced (opis, serpens). It is now called Formentera.

Opheynum, a town of Troas on the Hellespont. Hector had a grove there. Strab. 13.

Opici, the ancient inhabitants of Campania, from whose mean occupations the word Opicus has been used to express disgrace. Juv. 3, v. 207.

Opilius, a grammarian who flourished about 94 years before Christ. He wrote a book called Libri Musarum.

L. Optimus, a Roman who made himself consul in opposition to the interests and efforts of the Gracchi. He showed himself a most inveterate enemy to C. Gracchus and his adherents, and behaved, during his consulship, like a dictator. He was accused of bribery, and banished. He died of want at Dyrrachium. Cic. pro Sext. Planc. & in Pis. Plut.

—A Roman, who killed one of the Cimbrs in single combat. — A rich usurer at Rome in the age of Horace, 2, sat. 3, v. 142.

Opis, a town on the Tigris, afterwards called Antiochia. Xenoph. Anab. 2. — A nymph who was among Diana's attendants. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 532 & 867. — A town near the mouth of the Tigris. — One of Cyrene's attendants. Virg. G. 4, v. 343.

Opiter, a Roman consul, &c.

Opitergini, a people near Aquileia, on the Adriatic. Their chief city was called Opitergum, now Odero. Luca. 4, v. 416.

Opites, a native of Argos, killed by Hector in the Trojan war. Homer. Il.

Oppia, a vestal virgin, buried alive for her incontinence.

Oppia lex, by C. Oppius the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman should wear above half an ounce of gold, have party-coloured garments, or be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's distance, unless it was to celebrate some sacred festivals or solemnities. This famous law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in distressed circumstances, created discontent, and, 18 years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the assembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato opposed it strongly, and made many satirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to solicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had presented their petition to the assembly, answered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had such an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was instantly abrogated with the unanimous consent of all the comitia. Cato alone excepted. Lib. 33 & 34. — Cic. de Orat. 3.

Oppianus, a Greek poet of Cilicia in the second century. His father's name was Agesianus, and his mother's Zenodora. He wrote some poems, celebrated for their elegance and sublimity.

Two of his poems are now extant, five books on fishing called aleuticon, and four on hunting called cynegeticon. The emperor Caracalla was so pleased with his poetry, that he gave him a piece of gold for every verse of his cynegeticon; from which circumstance the poem received the name of the golden verses of Oppian. The poet died of the plague in the 30th year of his age. His countrymen raised statues to his honour, and engraved on his tomb that the gods had hastened to call back Oppian in the flower of youth, only because he had already excelled all mankind. The best edition of his works is that of Schneider, 8vo, Argent. 1776.

Oppidius, a rich old man introduced by Horace, 2, sat. 3, v. 168, as wisely dividing his possessions among his two sons, and warning them against those follies and that extravagance which he believed he saw rising in them.

O. Oppius, a friend of Julius Cæsar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus, and of Pompey the Great. In the latter he paid not much regard to historical facts, and took every opportunity to defame Pompey, to extol the character of his pat on Cæsar. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars, which some attribute to Cæsar, and others to A. Hirtius. Tacit. Ann. 12. — Suet. in Cæs. 53. — An officer sent by the Romans against Mithridates. He met with ill success, and was sent in chains to the king, &c. — A Roman who saved his aged father from the dagger of the triumvirate.

Ops (opis), a daughter of Cælus and Terra, the same as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Phya, Tellus, Proserpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worship which was paid to these apparently several deities was offered merely to one and the same person, mother of the gods. The word Ops seems to be derived from Opus; because the goddess, who is the same as the earth, gives nothing without labour. Tullus built her temple at Rome. She was generally represented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering assistance to the helpless, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her festivals were called Opalia, &c. Varr. de L. L. 4. — Dionys. Hal. 2, &c. — Tibull. el. 4, v. 68. — Plin. 10, c. 6.

Optatus, one of the fathers, whose works were edited by Du Pin, fol. Paris, 1700.

Optimus Maximus, epithets given to Jupiter to denote his greatness, omnipotence, and supreme goodness. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 25.

Opus (opuntis), a city of Locris, on the Asopus, destroyed by an earthquake. Strab. 9. — Mela, 2, c. 7. — Liv. 28, c. 7.

Ors, a town in India, taken by Alexander. — One of Jupiter's mistresses.

Oraculum, an answer of the gods to the questions of men, or the place where those answers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were supposed to be the will of the gods themselves, and they were consulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. To make peace or war, to introduce a change of government, to plant a colony, to enact laws, to raise an edifice, to marry, were sufficient reasons to consult the will of the gods. Mankind, in consulting them, showed that they wished to pay implicit obedience to the command of the divinity, and, when they had been favoured with an answer, they acted with more spirit and with more vigour, conscious that the undertaking had met with the sanction and approbation of heaven. In this, therefore, it will not appear wonderful that so many places were sacred to oracular purposes. The small province of Boeotia could once boast of her 25 oracles, and Peloponnesus of the same number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in process of time, heroes were admitted to give the same privileges; and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antonius were soon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The most celebrated oracles of antiquity were those of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon, &c. Vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon. The temple of Delphi seemed to claim a superiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were so great, that not only private persons, but even kings and numerous armies, made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. A priestess at Delphi [Vid. Pythia] was permitted to pronounce the oracles of the god, and her delivery of the answers was always attended with acts of apparent madness and desperate fury. Not only women, but even doves, were the ministers of the temple of Dodona; and the suppliant votary was often started to hear his questions readily answered by the decayed trunk or the spreading branches of a neighbouring oak. Ammon conveyed his answers in a plain and open manner; but Amphiarus required many ablutions and preparatory ceremonies, and he generally communicated his oracles to his suppliants in dreams and visions. Sometimes the first words that were heard, after issuing from the temple, were deemed the answers of the oracles, and sometimes the nodding or shaking of the head of the statue, the motions of fishes in a neighbouring lake, or their reluctance in accepting the food which was offered to them, were as strong and valid as the most express and the minutest explanations. The answers were also sometimes given in verse, or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obscure, and often the cause of disaster to such as consulted them. Cræsus, when he consulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that, if he crossed the Halys, he should destroy a great empire; he supposed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Credo te, Asiada, Romanos vincere posse, which Pyrrhus received when he wished to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, by a favourable interpretation for himself, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered by the oracle of Delphi to beware of 73 years; but the pleasing idea that he should live to that age, rendered him careless, and he was soon convinced of his mistake, when Galba, in his 73rd year, had the presumption to dethrone him. It is a question among the learned whether the oracles were given by the inspiration of evil spirits, or whether they proceeded from the imposture of the priests. Imposture, however, and forgery cannot long flourish, and falsehood becomes its own destroyer; and, on the contrary, it is well known how much confidence an enlightened age, therefore, much more the credulous and the superstitious, place upon dreams and romantic stories. Some have strongly believed that all the oracles of the earth ceased at the birth of Christ, but the supposition is false. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline; but they remained in repute, and were consulted, though perhaps not so frequently, till the fourth century, when christianity began to triumph over paganism. The oracles often suffered themselves to be bribed. Alexander did it, but it is well known that Lysander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who first mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt, has been severely treated for his remarks by the historian Plutarch. Demosthenes is also a witness of the corruption, and he observed that the oracles of Greece were servilely subservient to the will and pleasure of Philip king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expresses it by the word φιλαργίειν. If some of the Greeks, and other European and Asiatic countries, paid so much attention to oracles, and were so fully persuaded of their veracity, and even divinity, many of their leading men and of their philosophers were apprised of their deceit, and paid no regard to the command of priests, whom money could corrupt, and interposition silence. The Egyptians showed themselves the most superstitious of mankind, by their blind acquiescence to the imposition of the priests, who persuaded them that the safety and happiness of their life depended upon the mere motions of an ox, or the tameness of a crocodile. *Homer. ORBELUS, a mountain of Thrace or Macedonia. ORBILLIUS PUPILLUS, a grammarian of Beneventum, who was the first instructor of the poet Horace. He came to Rome in the consulship of Cicero, and there, as a public teacher, acquired more fame than money. He was naturally of a severe disposition, of which his pupils often felt the effects. He lived almost to his 100th year, and lost his memory some time before his death. Suet. de Illust. Gr. 9.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 71.

ORBONA, a mischievous goddess at Rome, who, as it was supposed, made children die. Her temple at Rome was near that of the gods Lares. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 25.—Plin. 2, c. 7.

ORODES, islands on the northern coasts of Britain, now called the Orkneys. They were unknown till Britain was discovered to be an island by Agricola, who presided there as governor. Tacit. in Agric.—Jub. 2, v. 161.

Orchālis, an eminence of Bœotia, near Haliartus, called also Alopecos. Plin. in Lys.

Orchāmus, a king of Assyria, father of Leucothoe by Eurynome. He buried his daughter alive for her amours with Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 212.

Orchia lex, by Orchius the tribune, A.U.C. 566. It was enacted to limit the number of guests that were to be admitted at an entertainment; and it also enforced that, during supper, which was the chief meal among the Romans, the doors of every house should be left open.

Orchomēnus, or Orchomēnum, a town of Bœotia, at the west of the lake Copais. It was anciently called Minytia, and from that circumstance the inhabitants were often called Minyans of Orchomenos. There was at Orchomenos a celebrated temple, built by Etæocles son of Cephisus, sacred to the Graces, who were from thence called the Orchomenian goddesses. The inhabitants founded Teos in conjunction with the Ionians, under the sons of Codrus. Plin. 4, c. 8.—Herodot. 2, c. 146.—Paus. 9, c. 37.—Strab. 9.—A town of Arcadia, at the north of Mantinea. Homer. Il. 2.—A town of Thessaly, with a river of the same name. Strab.—A son of Lycaon king of Arcadia, who gave his name to a city of Arcadia, &c. Paus. 8.—A son of Minyas king of Bœotia, who gave the name of Orchomenians to his subjects. He died without issue, and the crown devolved to Clymenus the son of Preshon, &c. Paus. 9, c. 36.

Orcus, one of the names of the god of hell, the same as Pluto, though confounded by some with Charon. He had a temple at Rome. The word Orcus is generally used to signify the infernal regions. Horat. 1, ad. 29, &c.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 503, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 116.

Oreynia, a place of Cappadocia, where Eumenes was defeated by Antigonus.

Ordessus, a river of Scythia, which falls into the Ister. Herodot.

Ordovices, the people of North Wales in Britain, mentioned by Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 53.

Orēades, nymphs of the mountains (opos, mons), daughters of Phoroneus and Hecate. Some call them Orestiades, and give them Jupiter for father. They generally attended upon Diana, and accompanied her in hunting. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 504.—Homer. Il. 6.—Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 787.

Oreas, a son of Hercules and Chryseis.

Orestes, a people of Epirus. They received their name from Orestes, who fled to Epirus when cured of his insanity. Lucan. 3, v. 249.—Of Macedonia. Liv. 33, c. 34.

Orestes, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, young Orestes was saved from his mother's dagger by means of his sister Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, who was king of Phocis, and who had married a sister of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who educated him with his son Pylades. The two young princes soon became acquainted, and, from their familiarity, arose the most inviolable attachment and friendship. When Orestes was arrived to the years of manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra, and her adulterer

Ægisthus. The manner in which he committed this murder is variously reported. According to Æschylus he was commissioned by Apollo to avenge his father, and, therefore, he introduced himself, with his friend Pylades, at the court of Mycenæ, pretending to bring the oews of the death of Orestes from king Strophius. He was at first received with coldness, and when he came into the presence of Ægisthus, who wished to inform himself of the particulars, he murdered him, and soon after Clytemnestra shared the adulterer's fate. Euripides and Sophocles mention the same circumstance. Ægisthus was assassinated after Clytemnestra, according to Sophocles; and, in Euripides, Orestes is represented as murdering the adulterer, while he offers a sacrifice to the nymphs. This murder, as the poet mentions, irritates the guards, who were present, but Orestes appeases their fury by telling them who he is, and immediately he is acknowledged king of the country. Afterwards he stabs his mother, at the instigation of his sister Electra, after he has upbraided her for her infidelity and cruelty to her husband. Such medicated murders receive the punishment which, among the ancients, was always supposed to attend parricide. Orestes is tormented by the Furies, and exiles himself to Argos, where he is still pursued by the avengeful goddesses. Apollo himself purifies him, and he is acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites, whom Minerva herself instituted on this occasion, according to the narration of the poet Æschylus, who flatters the Athenians in his tragical story, by representing them as passing judgment even upon the gods themselves. According to Pausanias, Orestes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Trozène, where still was seen a large stone at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was also, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Orestes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of insanity. These different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who says that Orestes, after the murder of his mother, consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the persecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece Diana's statue, which was in the Taurica Chersonesus, and which, as it is reported by some, had fallen down from heaven. This was an arduous enterprise. The king of the Chersonesus always sacrificed on the altars of the goddess all such as entered the borders of his country. Orestes and his friend were both carried before Thoas the king of the place, and they were doomed to be sacrificed. Iphigenia was then priestess of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate these strangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn something about a country which had given her birth. Vid. Iphigenia. She even interested herself in their misfortunes, and offered to spare the life of one of them provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendship more truly displayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex Pont. 3, el. 2:

Ite jubet Pylades carum moriturus Orestem, Illic negat; inque vicem pignat uterque mori.

At last Pylades gave way to the pressing entreaties of his friend, and consented to carry the letters of Niophorus Cæsar, a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1661. — Gregoras, another, edited fol. Paris, 1702. — A Greek ecclesiastical historian, whose works were edited by Ducæus, 3 vols. Paris, 1730.

Niöer, now the Necker, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine at the modern town of Mannheim. Auson. Mos. 423.

Niöarktus, a poet who wrote a poem in praise of Lysander. — The father of Nicias.

Niöotas, one of the Byzantine historians, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.

Niösteria, a festival at Athens, in memory of the victory which Minerva obtained over Neptune, in their dispute about giving a name to the capital of the country.

Niöia, a city. Vid. Nicaea. — A river falling into the Po at Brizzellum. It is now called Lenza, and separates the duchy of Modena from Parma.

Niöias, an Athenian general, celebrated for his valour and for his misfortunes. He early conciliated the good will of the people by his liberality, and he established his military character by taking the island of Cythera from the power of Lacedæmon. When Athens determined to make war against Sicily, Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reprobated as impolitic, and as the future cause of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmness, but he often blamed the quick and inconsiderate measures of his colleagues. The success of the Athenians remained long doubtful. Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuse was surrounded by a wall, and though the operations were carried on slowly, yet the city would have surrendered, had not the sudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the besieged at the most critical moment. Gylippus proposed terms of accommodation to the Athenians, which were refused; some battles were fought, in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage, and Nicias at last, tired of his ill success, and grown desponding, demanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a successor. Demosthenes, upon this, was sent with a powerful fleet, but the advice of Nicias was despised, and the admiral, by his eagerness to come to a decisive engagement, ruined his fleet and the interest of Athens. The fear of his enemies at home prevented Nicias from leaving Sicily; and when, at last, a continued series of ill success obliged him to comply, he found himself surrounded on every side by the enemy, without hope of escaping. He gave himself up to the conquerors with all his army, but the assurances of safety which he had received soon proved vain and false, and he was no sooner in the hands of the enemy than he was shamefully put to death with Demosthenes. His troops were sent to quarries, where the plague and hard labour diminished their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some suppose that the death of Nicias was not violent. He perished about 413 years before Christ, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant but unfortunate general. Plut. in Vita. Cic. — Nep. in Alcib. — Thucyd. 4, &c. — Diad. 15. — A grammarian of Rome, intimate with Cicero. Cic. in Epist. — A man of Nicaea, who wrote a history of philosophers. — A physician of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who made an offer to the Romans of poisoning his master for a sum of money. The Roman general disdaind his offers, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. He is oftener called Cineas. — A painter of Athens in the age of Alexander. He was chiefly happy in his pictures of women. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 31.

Niöippe, a daughter of Pelops, who married Schenelus. — A daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

Niöippus, a tyrant of Cos, one of whose sheep brought forth a lion, which was considered as pre-tending his future greatness, and his elevation to the sovereignty. Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 29.

Niöo, one of the Tarentine chiefs who conspired against the life of Annibal. Liv. 30. — A celebrated architect and geometrician. He was father to the celebrated Galen the prince of physicians. — One of the slaves of Cræterus. — The name of an ass which Augustus met before the battle of Actium, a circumstance which he considered as a favourable omen. — The name of an elephant remarkable for his fidelity to king Pyrrhus.

Niöochæres, a Greek comic poet in the age of Aristophanes.

Niöocoles, a familiar friend of Phocion, condemned to death. Plut. — A king of Salamis, celebrated for his contest with a king of Phœnicia, to prove which of the two was most effeminate. — A king of Paphos, who reigned under the protection of Ptolemy king of Egypt. He revolted from his friend to the king of Persia, upon which Ptolemy ordered one of his servants to put him to death, to strike terror into the other dependent princes. The servant, unwilling to murder the monarch, advised him to kill himself. Nicocoles obeyed, and all his family followed his example, 310 years before the christian era. — An ancient Greek poet, who called physicians a happy race of men, because light published their good deeds to the world, and the earth hid all their faults and imperfections. — A king of Cyprus, who succeeded his father Evagoras on the throne, 374 years before Christ. It was with him that the philosopher Isocrates corresponded. — A tyrant of Sicyon, deposed by means of Aratus the Ælian. Plut. in Arat.

Niöoorates, a tyrant of Cyrene. — An author at Athens. — A king of Salamis in Cyprus, who made himself known by the valuable collection of books which he had. Athen. 1.

Niöooreon, a tyrant of Salamis in the age of Alexander the Great. He ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to pieces in a mortar.

Niöodæmus, an Athenian appointed by Conon over the fleet which was going to the assistance of Artaxerxes. Diad. 14. — A tyrant of Italy, &c. — An ambassador sent to Pompey by Aristobolus.

Niöodorus, a wrestler of Mantinea, who studied philosophy in his old age. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 25. — Suidas. — An Athenian archon.

Niöodromus, a son of Hercules and Nice. Apollod. — An Athenian who invaded Ægina, &c.

Niöolæus, a philosopher. — A celebrated Syracusan, who endeavoured, in a pathetic speech, to dissuade his countrymen from offering violence to the Athenian prisoners who had been taken with Nicias their general. His eloquence was unavailing. — An officer of Ptolemy against Antigonus. — A peripatetic philosopher and historian in the Augustan age.

Niöomæche, a daughter of Themistocles. Niöomæchus, the father of Aristotle, whose son also bore the same name. The philosopher composed his books of morals for the use and improvement of his son, and thence they are called Nicomachea. Suidas. — One of Alexander's friends, who discovered the conspiracy of Dymus,

Curt. 6.—An excellent painter.—A Pythagorean philosopher.—A Lacedæmonian general, conquered by Timotheus.—A writer in the fifth century, &c.

Nicomædes I., a king of Bithynia, about 278 years before the christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia. Justin.—Paus., &c.

Nicomædes II. was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B.C. 149. He reigned 59 years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.

Nicomædes III., son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans re-established him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was, at last, expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia, who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab.—Appian.

Nicomædes IV. was son and successor of Nicomedes III. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B.C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions, to the Roman people. Strab. 12.—Appian. Mithrid.—Justin. 38, c. 2, &c.—Floz. 3, c. 5.

Nicomædes, a celebrated geometrician in the age of the philosopher Eratosthenes. He made himself known by his useful machines, &c.—An engineer in the army of Mithridates.—One of the preceptors of the emperor M. Antoninus.

Nicomædia (now Isnik), a town of Bithynia, founded by Nicomedes I. It was the capital of the country, and it has been compared, for its beauty and greatness, to Rome, Antioch, or Alexandria. It became celebrated for being, for some time, the residence of the emperor Constantine and most of his imperial successors. Some suppose that it was originally called Astacus, and Olbia, though it is generally believed that they were all different cities. Ammian. 17.—Paus. 5, c. 12.—Plin. 5, &c.—Strab. 12, &c.

Nicoon, a pirate of Phære in Peloponnesus, &c. Polyan.—An athlete of Thasos, 14 times victorious at the Olympic games.—A native of Tarentum. Vid. Nico.

Nicoonia, a town of Pontus.

Niophanes, a famous painter of Greece, whose pieces are mentioned with commendation. Plin. 35, c. 20.

Nicophon, a comic poet of Athens some time after the age of Aristophanes.

Nicopolis, a city of Lower Egypt.—A town of Armenia, built by Pompey the Great in memory of a victory which he had there obtained over the forces of Mithridates. Strab. 12.—Another, in Thrace, built on the banks of the Nestus by Trajan, in memory of a victory which he obtained there over the barbarians.—A town of Epirus, built by Augustus after the battle of Actium.—Another, near Jerusalem, founded by the emperor Vespasian.—Another, in Mæsia.—Another, in Dacia, built by Trajan to perpetuate the memory of a celebrated battle.—Another, near the bay of Issus, built by Alexander.

Nicostrata, a courtesan who left all her possessions to Sylla.—The same as Carmente mother of Evander.

Nicostratus, a man of Argos of great strength. He was fond of imitating Hercules by clothing himself in a lion's skin. Diad. 16.—One of Alexander's soldiers. He conspired against the king's life, with Hermolus. Curt. 8.—A painter who expressed great admiration at the sight of Helen's picture by Zeuxis. Ælian. 14, c. 47.—A dramatic actor of Ionia.—A comic poet of Argos.

—An orator of Macedonia, in the reign of the emperor M. Antoninus.—A son of Menelaus and Helen. Paus. 2, c. 18.—A general of the Achæans, who defeated the Macedonians.

Nicothea, a celebrated woman of Messenia, who said that she became pregnant of Aristomenes by a serpent. Paus. 4, c. 14.

Niothetes, a Corinthian drunkard, &c. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 14.

Niger, a friend of M. Antony, sent to him by Octavia.—A surname of Clitus, whom Alexander killed in a fit of drunkenness.—C. Pescennius Justus, a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valour in the Roman armies, while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated situation were supported by a sound understanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue. He proposed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M. Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondness for ancient discipline, and never suffered his soldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirst with water and vinegar. He forbade the use of silver and gold utensils in his camp, all the bakers and cooks were driven away, and the soldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biscuits. In his punishments Niger was inexorable; he condemned 10 of his soldiers to be beheaded in the presence of the army, because they had stolen and eaten a fowl. The sentence was heard with groans; the army interferred; and when Niger consented to diminish the punishment for fear of kindling a rebellion, he yet ordered the criminals to make each a restoration of 10 fowls to the person whose property they had stolen. They were, besides, ordered not to light a fire the rest of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments, and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general seemed to promise the restoration of ancient discipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger frustrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had also been invested with the imperial purple, marched against him; some battles were fought, and Niger was at last defeated, A.D. 194. His head was cut off and fixed to a long spear, and carried in triumph through the streets of Rome. He reigned about one year. Herodian. 3.—Eutrop.

Niger, or Nigris (itis), a river of Africa, which rises in Æthiopia, and falls by three mouths into the Atlantic, little known to the ancients, and not yet satisfactorily explored by the moderns. Plin. 5, c. 1 & 8.—Mela, 1, c. 4. l. 3, c. 10.—Ptol. 4, c. 6.

P. Nigidius Figulus, a celebrated philosopher and astrologer at Rome, one of the most learned men of his age. He was intimate with Cicero, and gave his most unbiassed opinions concerning the conspirators who had leagued to destroy Rome with Catiline. He was made pretor, and honoured with a seat in the senate. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, for which he was banished by the conqueror. He died in the place of his banishment, 47 years before Christ. Cic. ad Fam. 4, ep. 13.—Lucan. 1, v. 639.

Nigrifera, a people of Africa, who dwell on the banks of the Niger. Meia, 1, c. 4.—Plin. 5, c. 1.

Nileus, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenae, &c. Paus. 7, c. 2, &c.—A philosopher who had in his possession all the writings of Aristotle. Athen. 1.

Nilus, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river which flows through the middle of Egypt, and falls into the Mediterranean sea. The Nile, anciently called Aegyptus, is one of the most celebrated rivers in the world. Its sources were unknown to the ancients, and the moderns were till lately ignorant of their situation, whence an impossibility is generally meant by the proverb of Nili caput querere. It flows through the middle of Egypt in a northern direction, and when it comes to the town of Cercasorum, it then divides itself into several streams, and falls into the Mediterranean by seven mouths. The most eastern canal is called the Pelusian, and the most western is called the Canopic mouth. The other canals are the Sebennytican, that of Sais, the Mendesian, Bolbitinic, and Bucolic. They have all been formed by nature, except the two last, which have been dug by the labours of men. The island which the Nile forms by its division into several streams is called Delta, from its resemblance to the fourth letter in the Greek alphabet. The Nile yearly overflows the country, and it is to those regular inundations that the Egyptians are indebted for the fertile produce of their lands. It begins to rise in the month of May for 100 successive days, and then decreases gradually the same number of days. If it does not rise as high as 16 cubits, a famine is generally expected, but if it exceeds this by many cubits, it is of the most dangerous consequences; houses are overturned, the cattle are drowned, and a great number of insects are produced from the mud, which destroy the fruits of the earth. The river, therefore, proves a blessing or a calamity to Egypt, and the prosperity of the nation depends so much upon it, that the tributes of the inhabitants were in ancient times, and are still under the present government, proportioned to the rise of the waters. The causes of the overflowings of the Nile, which remained unknown to the ancients, though searched with the greatest application, are owing to the heavy rains which regularly fall in Æthiopia, in the months of April and May, and which rush down like torrents upon the country, and lay it all under water. These causes, as some people suppose, were well known to Homer, as he seems to show it, by saying that the Nile flowed down from heaven. The inhabitants of Egypt, near the banks of the river, were called Niliaci, Niligenae, &c., and large canals were also from this river denominated Nili or Eurili. *Cic. Leg. 2, c. 1. Ad. flourished A.D. 440. His works were edited at Rome, fol. 2 vols. 1668 & 1678.

Ninnius, a tribune who opposed Clodius the enemy of Cicero.

Ninias. Vid. Ninyas.

Ninus, a son of Belus, who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Assyrian monarchy, of which he was the first sovereign, B.C. 2059. He was very warlike, and extended his conquests from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her husband had destroyed himself through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned 53 years, and at his death he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a son. The history of Ninus is very obscure, and even fabulous according to the opinion of some. Ctesias is the principal historian from whom it is derived, but little reliance is to be placed upon him, when Aristotle deems him unworthy to be believed. Ninus after death received divine honours, and became the Jupiter of the Assyrians and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Ctesias.—Diod. 2.—Justin. 1, c. 1.—Herodot. 2.—A celebrated city, now Nino, the capital of Assyria, built on the banks of the Tigris by Ninus, and called Ninurveh in Scripture. It was, according to the relation of Diodorus Siculus, 15 miles long, nine broad, and 48 in circumference. It was surrounded by large walls 100 feet high, on the top of which three chariots could pass together abreast, and was defended by 1500 towers, each 200 feet high. Ninus was taken by the united armies of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar king of Babylon, B.C. 606. Strab. 1.—Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 185, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 33.—Lucian.

Ninyas, a son of Ninus and Semiramis, king of Assyria, who succeeded his mother, who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. Some suppose that Semiramis was put to death by her own son, because she had encouraged him to commit incest. The reign of Ninyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. The prince left the care of the government to his favourites and ministers, and gave himself up to pleasure, riot, and debauchery, and never appeared in public. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness, and therefore their names or history are little known till the age of Sardanapalus. Justin. 1, c. 2.—Diod. 1, &c.

Niobe, a daughter of Tantalus king of Lydia by Eurynassa or Dione. She married Amphion the son of Jasus, by whom she had 10 sons and 10 daughters according to Hesiod, or two sons and three daughters according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius say that she had six daughters and as many sons, and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c., according to the more received opinion, support that she had seven sons and seven daughters. The names of the sons were Sipylus, Mætytus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damascichon, and Imenius; and those of the daughters, Cleodora, Ethodæa or Thera, Astyoche, Phibia, Peleopa or Chloris, Asticratea, and Ogygia. The number of her children increased the pride of Niobe, and she not only had the imprudence to prefer herself to Latona, who had only two children, but she even insulted her, and ridiculed the worship which was paid to her, observing that she had a better claim to altars and sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This insolence provoked Latona, who entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters except Chloris, who had married Neleus king of Polos, were equally destroyed by Diana; and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The carcases of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied in the plains for nine successive days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honoured with a funeral by the gods. *Homer. Il. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. Fab. 5.—Hygin. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom she had a son called Argus, who gave his name to Argia or Argolis, a country of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 22.—Apollod. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 8.

Niphates, a mountain of Asia, which divides Armenia from Assyria, and from which the Tigris takes its rise. Virg. G. 3, v. 30.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 15.—A river of Armenia, falling into the Tigris. Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 20.—Lucan. 3, v. 245.

Niphe, one of Diana's companions. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 245.

Nireus, a king of Naxos, son of Charops and Aglaia, celebrated for his beauty. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—Horat. 2, od. 20.

Nisa, a town of Greece. Homer. Il. 2.—A country-woman. Virg. Æt. 8.—A place. Vid. Nysa.—A celebrated plain of Media near the Caspian sea, famous for its horses. Herodot. 3, c. 106.

Nisæa, a naval station on the coasts of Megaris. Strab. 8.—A town of Parthia, called also Nisa.

Nisæus, a sea-nymph. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 826.

Nisena. Vid. Nisus.

Nisibis, a town of Mesopotamia, built by a colony of Macedonians on the Tigris, and celebrated as being a barrier between the provinces of Rome and the Persian empire during the reign of the Roman emperors. It was sometimes called Antiochia Mygdonica. Joseph. 20, c. 2.—Strab. 11.—Ammian. 25, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 13.

Nisus, a son of Hyrtacus, born on mount Ida near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and signalized himself by his valour against the Rutulians. He was united in the closest friendship with Euryalus, a young Trojan, and with him he entered, in the dead of night, the enemy's camp. As they were returning victorious, after much bloodshed, they were perceived by the Rutulians, who attacked Euryalus. Nisus, in endeavouring to rescue his friend from the enemy's darts, perished himself with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a spear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans, and their great friendship, like that of a Pylades and an Orestes, or of a Theseus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 176, &c.—A king of Dulichium, remarkable for his probity and virtue. Homer. Od. 18.—A king of Megara, son of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hostilities of Minos, who wished to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was besieged, and Æticia laid waste. The fate of Nisus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued upon his head, according to the words of an oracle, promised him life, and success to his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Nisica Virgo) saw from the walls of Megara the royal besieger, and she became desperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her passion, she stole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was asleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos disregarded the services of Scylla, and she threw herself into the sea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Nisus assumed the nature of the hawk at the very moment that he gave himself death, not to fall into the enemy's hands. These two birds have continually been at variance with each other, and Scylla, by her apprehensions at the sight of her father, seems to suffer the punishment which her perfidy deserved. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 6, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 404, &c.

Nisyros, an island in the Ægean sea, at the west of Rhodes, with a town of the same name. It was originally joined to the island of Cos, according to Pliny, and it bore the name of Porphyris. Neptune, who was supposed to have separated them with a blow of his trident, and to have there overwhelmed the giant Polybotes, was worshipped there, and called Nisyrewi. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

Nitêtis, a daughter of Apries king of Egypt, married by his successor Amasis to Cyrus. Polygam. 8.

Nitobriges, a people of Gaul, supposed to be Agrenois, in Guenne. Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 7.

Nitocris, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge across the Euphrates, in the middle of that city, and dug a number of reservoirs for the superfluous waters of that river. She ordered herself to be buried over one of the gates of the city, and placed an inscription on her tomb, which signified that her successors would find great treasures within if ever they were in need of money, but that their labours would be but ill repaid if ever they ventured to open it without necessity. Cyrus opened it through curiosity, and was struck to find within these words: If thy avarice had not been insatiable, thou never wouldst have violated the monuments of the dead. Herodot. 1, c. 185.—A queen of Egypt, who built a third pyramid.

Nitria, a country of Egypt with two towns of the same name, above Memphis.

Nivaria, an island at the west of Africa, supposed to be Teneriff, one of the Canaries. Plin. 6, c. 32.

Noas, a river of Thrace falling into the Ister. Herodot. 4, c. 46.

Noomom, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

Noctiluca, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome on mount Palatine, where torches were generally lighted in the night. Varro. de L. L. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 6, v. 38.

Nola, an ancient town of Campania, which became a Roman colony before the first Punic war. It was founded by a Tuscan, or, according to others, by an Eubœan colony. It is said that Virgil had introduced the name of Nola in his Georgics, but that, when he was refused a glass of water by the inhabitants as he passed through the city, he totally blotted it out of his poem, and substituted the word ora, in the 25th line of the second book of his Georgics. Nola was besieged by Annibal, and bravely defended by Marcellus. Augustus died there on his return from Neapolis to Rome. Bells were first invented there in the beginning of the fifth century, from which reason they have been called Nola, or Campane, in Latin. The inventor was St. Paulinus, the bishop of the place, who died A.D. 431, though many imagine that bells were known long before, and only introduced into churches by that prelate. Before his time, congregations were called to the church by the noise of wooden rattles (sacra ligna). Pat. l. 1, c. 7.—Suet. in Aug.—Sil. 8, v. 517. l. 12, v. 161.—A. Gallius, 7, c. 20.—Liv. 23, c. 14 & 39. l. 24, c. 12.

Nomades, a name given to all those uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their residence, to go in quest of fresh pasture for the numerous cattle which they tended. There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. Those of Africa were afterwards called Nomidians, by a small change of the letters which composed their name. Ital. 1, v. 275.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, c. 15. l. 4, c. 187.—Strab. 7.—Mela, c. 1, l. 3, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 343.—Paus. 8, c. 43.

Nomæ, a town of Sicily. Diod. 11.—Sil. 14, v. 266.

Nomentanus, an epithet applied to L. Cassius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as a mixture of luxury and dissipation. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 102 & alibi.

Nomentum, a town of the Sabines in Italy, famous for wine, and now called Lamentana. The dictator Q. Servilius Priscus gave the Veientes and Fidenates battle there A.U.C. 312, and totally defeated them. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 905.—Liv. 1, c. 38. l. 4, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.

Nomii, mountains of Arcadia. Paus.

Nomius, a surname given to Apollo, because he fed (vesco, pasco), the flocks of King Admetus in Thessaly. Cic. in Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

Nōnācris, a town of Arcadia, which received its name from a wife of Lycaon. There was a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood. Evander is sometimes called Nonacrius heros, as being an Arcadian by birth, and Atalanta Nonacria, as being a native of the place. Curt. 10, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 97. Met. 8, fab. 10.—Paus. 8, c. 17, &c.

Nonius, a Roman soldier, imprisoned for paying respect to Galba's statues, &c. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 56.—A Roman who exhorted his countrymen after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, and the flight of Pompey, by observing that eight standards (aquila) still remained in the camp, to which Cicero answered, Recte, si nobis cum gravatibus bellum esset.

Nonnius Marcellus, a grammarian, whose treatise de variis significationibus verborum was edited by Mercet. 8vo, Paris, 1614.

Nonnus, a Greek writer of the fifth century, who wrote an account of the embassy he had undertaken to Ethiopia, among the Saracens and other eastern nations. He is also known by his Dionysiaca, a wonderful collection of heathen mythology and erudition, edited 4to, Antwerp, 1569. His paraphrase on John was edited by Heinsius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1627.

Nonus, a Greek physician, whose book de omnium morborum curatione was edited in 12mo, Argent. 1568.

Nopla, or Oinopia, a town of Boeotia, where Amphiarus had a temple.

Nōra, now Nour, a place of Phrygia, where Eumenes retired for some time, &c. C. Nepos.—A town. Vid. Norax.

Norax, a son of Mercury and Eurythra, who led a colony of Iberians into Sardinia, where he founded a town, to which he gave the name of Nora. Paus. 10, c. 17.

Norba, a town of the Volsci. Liv. 2, c. 34.

Norba, a town of Spain on the Tagus.

C. Norbanus, a young and ambitious Roman who opposed Sylla, and joined his interest to that of young Marius. In his consulship he marched against Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.—A friend and general of Augustus, employed in Macedonia against the republicans. He was defeated by Brutus, &c.

Noricum, a country of ancient Illyricum, which now forms a part of modern Bavaria and Austria. It extended between the Danube, and part of the Alps and Vindelicia. Its savage inhabitants, who were once governed by kings, made many incursions upon the Romans, and were at last conquered under Tiberius, and the country became a dependent province. In the reign of Diocletian, Noricum was divided into two parts, Ripense and Mediterranean. The iron that was drawn from Noricum was esteemed excellent, and thence Noricus ensis was used to express the goodness of a sword. Dionys. Perieg.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 34, c. 14.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 5.—Horat. 1, ad. 16, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 712.

Northippus, a Greek tragic poet.

Nortia, a name given to the goddess of Fortune among the Etrurians. Liv. 7, c. 3.

Nothus, a son of Deucalion.—A surname of Darius king of Persia, from his illegitimacy.

Notium, a town of Æolia near the Cayster. It was peopled by the inhabitants of Colophon, who left their ancient habitations because Notium was more conveniently situated in being on the seashore. Liv. 37, c. 26, 38, 39.

Notus, the south wind, called also Auster.

Novæ (tabernæ), the new shops built in the forum at Rome, and adorned with the shields of the Cimbri. Cic. Orat. 2, c. 66.—The Vesteres tabernæ were adorned with those of the Samnites. Liv. 9, c. 40.

Novaria, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, now Novara, in Milan. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 70.

Novætus, a man who severely attacked the character of Augustus, under a fictitious name. The emperor discovered him, and only fined him a small sum of money.

Novesium, a town of the Ubii, on the west of the Rhine, now called Nuys, near Cologne. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 26, &c.

Noviodunum, a town of the Ædii in Gaul, taken by J. Cesar. It is pleasantly situated on the Ligeris, and now called Noyon, or, as others suppose, Nevers. Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 12.

Noviomagus, or Neomagus, a town of Gaul, now Nîmes, in Normandy.—Another, called also Nemetes, now Spire.—Another, in Batavia, now Nimeguen, on the south side of the Waal.

Novium, a town of Spain, now Noya.

Novius Priscus, a man banished from Rome by Nero, on suspicion that he was accessory to Piso's conspiracy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 71.—A man who attempted to assassinate the emperor Claudius.—Two brothers obscurely born, distinguished in the age of Horace for their officiousness. Horat. 1, sat. 6.

Novum Comum, a town of Insurbia on the lake Larinus, of which the inhabitants were called Nomocomenes. Cic. ad Dio. 13, c. 55.

NOX, one of the most ancient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus she gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was also the mother of the Parcae, Hesperides, Dreams, of Discord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by some of the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore she was worshipped with great solemnity by the ancients. She had a famous statue in Diana's temple at Ephesus. It was usual to offer her a black sheep, as she was the mother of the furies. The cock was also offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day, during the darkness of the night. She is represented as mounted on a chariot, and covered with a veil bespangled with stars. The constellations generally went before her as her constant messengers. Sometimes she is seen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, representing death, or rather night, and the other white, representing sleep or day. Some of the moderns have described her as a woman veiled in mourning, and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 950.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 455.—Paus. 10, c. 38.—Hesiod. Theog. 125 & 212.

Nuceria, a town of Campania taken by Annibal. It became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was called Nuceria Constantia, or Alfaterna. It now bears the name of Nocera, and contains about 30,000 inhabitants. Lucan. 2, v. 472.—Liv. 9, c. 41. l. 27, c. 3.—Ital. 8, v. 531.—Tacit. Ann. 13 & 14.—A town of Umbria at the foot of the Apennines. Strab.—Plin.

Nuthouzen, a people of Germany, possessing the country now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. Tacit. G. 40.

Numa Martius, a man made governor of Rome by Tullus Hostilius. He was son-in-law of Numa Pompilius, and father to Ancus Martius. Tacit. A. 6, c. 11.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

Numa Pompilius, a celebrated philosopher, born at Cures, a village of the Sabines, on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome. He married Tatia, the daughter of Tattius the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country to devote himself more freely to literary pursuits. At the death of Romulus, the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two senators were sent to acquaint him with the decisions of the senate and of the people. Numa refused their offers, and it was not but at the repeated solicitations and prayers of his friends that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he dismissed the 300 body-guards which his predecessor had kept around his person, observing that he did not distrust a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He was not, like Romulus, fond of war and military expeditions, but he applied himself to tame the ferocity of his subjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the Deity, and to quell their dissensions by dividing all the citizens into different classes. He established different orders of priests, and taught the Romans not to worship the Deity by images; and from his example no graven or painted statues appeared in the temples or sanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 100 years. He encouraged the report which was spread of his paying regular visits to the nymph Egeria, and made use of her name to give sanction to the laws and institutions which he had introduced. He established the college of the vestals, and told the Romans that the safety of the empire depended upon the preservation of the sacred ancile or shield which, as was generally believed, had dropped down from heaven. He dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign, remained shut, as a mark of peace and tranquillity at Rome. Numa died after a reign of 43 years, in which he had given every possible encouragement to the useful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B.C. 672. Not only the Romans, but also the neighbouring nations, were eager to pay their last offices to a monarch whom they revered for his abilities, moderation, and humanity. He forbade his body to be burnt according to the custom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written. These books were accidentally found by one of the Romans, about 400 years after his death, and as they contained nothing new or interesting, but merely the reasons why he had made innovations in the form of worship and in the religion of the Romans, they were burnt by order of the senate. He left behind one daughter called Pomilia, who married Numa Martius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome. Some say that he had also four sons, but this opinion is ill-founded. Hist. in Vitt.—Varro.—Liv. 1, c. 18.—Plin. 13 & 14, &c.—Plor. 2, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 809. l. 9, v. 562.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 2 & 17.—Val. Max. 1, c. 2.—Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 59.—Ovid. Fast. 3, &c.—One of the Rutulian chiefs killed in the night by Nisus and Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 454.

Numana, a town of Picenum in Italy, of which the people were called Numanates. Ital. 2, c. 4.

Numantia, a town of Spain near the sources of the river Durius, celebrated for the war of 14 years which, though unprotected by walls and towers, it bravely maintained against the Romans. The inhabitants obtained some advantages over the Roman forces till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finish the war, and to see the destruction of Numantia. He began the siege with an army of 60,000 men, and was bravely opposed by the besieged, who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms. Both armies behaved with uncommon valour, and the courage of the Numantines was soon changed into despair and fury. Their provisions began to fail, and they fed upon the flesh of their horses, and afterwards on that of their dead companions, and at last were necessitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy situation of their affairs obliged some to surrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themselves up on the morrow; they refused, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and set fire to their houses, and all destroyed themselves, B.C. 133, so that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some historians, however, deny that, and support that a number of Numantines delivered themselves into Scipio's hands, and that 50 of them were drawn in triumph at Rome, and the rest sold as slaves. The fall of Numantia was more glorious than that of Carthage or Corinth, though inferior to them. The conqueror obtained the surname of Numantinus. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Appian, Iber.—Paterc. 2, c. 3.—Cic. 1. Off.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Plut.—Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 1.

Numantius, a woman accused under Tiberius of making her husband insane by enchantments, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 22.

Numantius Bembinus, a Rutulian who accused the Trojans of effeminacy. He had married the younger sister of Turnus, and was killed by Ascanius during the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 592, &c.

Numones, a follower of the doctrines of Plato and Pythagoras, born at Apamea in Syria. He flourished in the reign of M. Antoninus.

Numonia, or Neomenia, a festival observed by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honour of all the gods, but especially of Apollo or the Sun, who is justly deemed the author of light, and of whatever distinction is made in the months, seasons, days, and nights. It was observed with games and public entertainments which were provided at the expense of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor. Solemn prayers were offered at Athens during the solemnity, for the prosperity of the republic. The demigods as well as the heroes of the ancients were honoured and invoked in the festival.

Numenius, a philosopher, who supposed that Chaos, from which the world was created, was animated by an evil and maleficent soul. He lived in the second century.

Numentana via, a road at Rome, which led to mount Sacer through the gate Viminalis. Liv. 3, c. 52.

Numeria, a goddess at Rome who presided over numbers. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11.

Numerianus M. Aurelius, a son of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father into the east with the title of Cæsar, and at his death he succeeded him with his brother Carinus, A.D. 282. His reign was short. Eight months after his father's death, he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law, Arrius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. The murderer, who hoped to ascend the vacant throne, continued to follow the litter as if the emperor was alive, till he found a proper opportunity to declare his sentiments. The stench of the body, however, soon discovered his perfidy, and he was sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers. Numerianus had been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally an eloquent speaker, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.—A friend of the emperor Severus.

Numerius, a man who favoured the escape of Marius to Africa, &c.—A friend of Pompey taken by J. Cæsar's adherents, &c. Plin.

Numicia via, one of the great Roman roads, which led from the capital to the town of Brundisium.

Nunions, a small river of Latium, near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found, and where Anna, Dido's sister, drowned herself. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 150, &c.—Sil. 1, v. 350.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 358, &c. Fast. 3, v. 643.—A friend of Horace, to whom he addressed 1, ep. 6.

Numida, a surname given by Horace, 1, od. 36, to one of the generals of Augustus, from his conquests in Numidia. Some suppose that it is Pomponius; others, Plotius.

Numidia, an inland country of Africa, which now forms the kingdom of Algiers and Bildulgerid. It was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean sea, south by Gætulia, west by Mauritania, and east by a part of Libya, which was called Africa Propria. The inhabitants were called Nomades, and afterwards Numidæ. It was the kingdom of Masinissa, which was the occasion of the third Punic war, on account of the offence which he had received from the Carthaginians. Jugurtha reigned there, as also Juba the father and son. It was conquered, and became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. The Numidians were excellent warriors, and in their expeditions they always endeavoured to engage with the enemy in the night-time. They rode without saddles or bridles, whence they have been called infranti. They had their wives in common, as the rest of the barbarian nations of antiquity. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Strab. 2 & 17.—Mela, 1, c. 4, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 754.

Numidius Quadratus, a governor of Syria under Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 12.

Numistro, a town of the Bruti in Italy. Liv. 45, c. 17.

Numitor, a son of Procas king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, and began to reign conjointly with him. Amulius was too avaricious to bear a colleague on the throne; he expelled his brother, and that he might more safely secure himself, he put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Ilia to the service of the goddess Vesta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. These great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant, and though the two children whom she brought forth were exposed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preserved, and Numitor was restored to his throne by his grandsons, and the tyrannical usurper was put to death. Dionys. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Plut. in Romul.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 55, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.—A son of Phorcus, who fought with Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 342.—A rich and dissolute Roman in the age of Juvenal, 7, v. 74.

Numitorius, a Roman who defended Virginia, to whom Appius wished to offer violence. He was made military tribune.—Q. Pullus, a general of Fregellæ, &c. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 34.

Numonius. Vid. Vala.

Nunocoreus, a son of Sesostris king of Egypt, who made an obelisk, some ages after brought to Rome, and placed in the Vatican. Plin. 26, c. 11.—He is called Pheron by Herodotus.

Nundina, a goddess whom the Romans invoked when they named their children. This happened the ninth day after their birth, whence the name of the goddess, Nona dies. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 16.

Nundinae. Vid. Feriæ.

Nurses, a town of Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 744.

Nursia, a goddess who patronized the Etrurians. Juv. 10, v. 74.

Nursia, now Norza, a town of Picenum, whose inhabitants are called Nursini. Its situation was exposed, and the air considered as unwholesome. Sil. 11, v. 416.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.—Martial. 13, ep. 20.—Liv. 28, c. 45.

Nutrila, a town of Illyricum. Polyb. 2.

Nyctelia, a daughter of Nycteus, who was mother of Labdacus.—A patronymic of Antiope the daughter of Nycteus, mother of Amphion and Zethus by Jupiter, who had assumed the shape of a sarr to enjoy her company. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 110.

Nyctelia, festivals in honour of Bacchus [Vid. Nyctelius], observed on mount Cithæron. Plut. in Symph.

Nyctelius, a surname of Bacchus, because his orgies were celebrated in the night (out nox, velox perficio). The words lætes Nyctelius thence signify wine. Seneca in Œdip.—Paus. 1, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

Nycteus, a son of Hyrieus and Clonia.—A son of Chthonius.—A son of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas king of Lesbos, or of Thebes, according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete, called Polyxo or Amalthæa, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope. The first of these disgraced herself by her criminal amours with her father, into whose bed she introduced herself by means of her nurse. When the father knew the incest which he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, who was immediately changed by Minerva into an owl. Nycteus made war against Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he entreated to continue the war, and punish Antiope for her immodest conduct. Vid. Antiope. Paus. 2, c. 6.—Hymn. Jab. 157 & 204.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 590, &c. l. 6, v. 110, &c.

Nyctimène, a daughter of Nycteus. Vid. Nycteus.

Nyctimus, a son of Lycaon king of Arcadia. He died without issue, and left his kingdom to his nephew Arcas the son of Callisto. Paus. 8, c. 4.

Nymphæum, a lake of Peloponnesus in Laconia. Id. 3, v. 23.

Nymphæ, certain female deities among the ancients. They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades and Hamadryades; others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades; some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napeæ, &c. Of the sea nymphs, some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, Limnades, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also over rivers, fountains, streams, and lakes. The nymphs fixed their residence not only in the sea, but also on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns, and their grottoes were beautified by evergreens and delightful and romantic scenes. The nymphs were immortal, according to the opinion of some mythologists; others supposed that, like men, they were subject to mortality, though their life was of long duration. They lived for several thousand years, according to Hesiod, or, as Plutarch seems obscurely to intimate, they lived above 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known. They were, according to Hesiod, above 3000, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were worshipped by the ancients, though not with so much solemnity as the superior deities. They had no temples raised to their honour, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and sometimes the sacrifice of a goat. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle, and sometimes they held a vase, from which they seemed to pour water. Sometimes they had grass, leaves, and shells, instead of vases. It was deemed unfortunate to see them naked, and such sight was generally attended by a delirium, to which Propertius seems to allude in this verse, wherein he speaks of the innocence and simplicity of the primitive ages of the world,

Nec fuerat nudas pœna videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally distinguished by an epithet which denoted the place of their residence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides;

those of Corycus, Corycides, &c. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320. l. 5, v. 412. l. 9, 651, &c. Fast. 3, v. 766.—Paus. 10, c. 4.—Plut. de Orac. Def.—Orpheus, Arg.—Hesiod. Theog.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—Homer. Od. 14.

Nymphæum, a port of Macedonia. Cæs. Bell. Civ.—A promontory of Epirus on the Ionian sea.—A place near the walls of Apollonia, sacred to the nymphs, where Apollo had also an oracle. The place was also celebrated for the continual flames of fire which seemed to rise at a distance from the plains. It was there that a sleeping satyr was once caught and brought to Sylla as he returned from the Mithridatic war. This monster had the same features as the poets ascribed to the satyr. He was interrogated by Sylla and by his interpreters, but his articulations were unintelligible, and the Roman spurned from him a creature which seemed to partake of the nature of a beast more than that of a man. Plut. in Sylla.—Dio. 41.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 36 & 49.—A city of Taurica Chersonesus.—The building at Rome where the nymphs were worshipped bore also this name, being adorned with their statues and with fountains and waterfalls, which afforded an agreeable and refreshing coolness.

Nymphæus, a man who went into Caria at the head of a colony of Melians, &c. Polyam. 8.

Nymphidius, a favourite of Nero, who said that he was descended from Caligula. He was raised to the consular dignity, and soon after disputed the empire with Galba. He was slain by the soldiers, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15.

Nymphis, a native of Heracleia, who wrote a history of Alexander's life and actions, divided into 24 books. Eliau. 7, de Avim.

Nymphodorus, a writer of Amphipolis.—A Syracusan who wrote a history of Sicily.

Nympholætes, or Nymphomænes, possessed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inspired by the nymphs. Plut. in Aris.

Nymphon, a native of Colophon, &c. Cir. ad Fra. 1.

Nypsius, a general of Dionysius the tyrant, who took Syracuse, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Diod. 16.

Nysa, or Nysæa, a town of Æthiopia, at the south of Egypt, or, according to others, of Arabia. This city, with another of the same name in India, was sacred to the god Bacchus, who was educated there by the nymphs of the place, and who received the name of Dionysius, which seems to be compounded of Διὸς and Νύκτος, the name of his father, and that of the place of his education. The god made this place the seat of his empire, and the capital of the conquered nations of the east. Diodorus, in his third and fourth books, has given a prolix account of the birth of the god at Nysa, and of his education and heroic actions. Mela, 3, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 13, &c.—Ital. 7, v. 198.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 805.—According to some geographers there were no less than 10 places of the name of Nysa. One of these was on the coast of Eubœa, famous for its vines, which grew in such an uncommon manner, that if a twig was planted in the ground in the morning, it was said immediately to produce grapes, which were full ripe in the evening.—A city of Thrace.—Another seated on the top of mount Parnassus, and sacred to Bacchus. Juv. 7, v. 63.

Nysæus, a surname of Bacchus, because he was worshipped at Nysa. Propert. 3, el. 17, v. 22.

—A son of Dionysius of Syracuse. Cor. Nep. in Dion.

Nyssa, a river of Africa, rising in Æthiopia.

Nyssiæ portus, a small island in Africa.

Nysiades, a name given to the nymphs of Nysa, to whose care Jupiter entrusted the education of his son Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 314, &c.

Nysiros, an island. Vid. Nisyros.

Nyctus, a surname of Bacchus as the protecting god of Nysa. Cic. Flac. 25.

Nyssa, a sister of Mithridates the Great. Plut.

OARSES, the original name of Artaxerxes Memnon.

Oarus, a river of Sarmatia, falling into the Palus Moeris. Herodot. 4.

Oasis, a town about the middle of Libya, at the distance of seven days' journey from Thebes in Egypt, where the Persian army, sent by Cambyses to plunder Jupiter Ammon's temple, was lost in the sands. There were two other cities of that name very little known. Oasis became a place of banishment under the lower empire. Strab. 17.—Zosim. 5, c. 97.—Herodot. 3, c. 26.

Oaxes, a river of Crete, which received its name from Oaxus the son of Apollo. Virg. Ecl. 1, v. 66.

Oaxus, a town of Crete where Etearchus reigned, who founded Cyrene.—A son of Apollo and the nymph Anchiale.

Obringa, now Ahr, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine above Rimmagen.

Obultronius, a questor put to death by Galba's orders, &c. Tacit.

Ocalia, or Ocalia, a town of Bœotia. Homer. Il. 2.—A daughter of Mantineus, who married Abas son of Lynceus and Hypermenestra, by whom she had Acrisius and Proetus. Apollod. 2, c. 2.

Ocella, a woman who presided over the sacred rites of Vesta for 57 years with the greatest sanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius, and the daughter of Domitius succeeded her. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 86.

Oceanides and Oceanitides, sea nymphs, daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddess Tethys. They were 3000 according to Apollodorus, who mentions the names of seven of them: Asia, Styx, Electra, Doris, Euryome, Amphitrite, and Metis. Hesiod speaks of the eldest of them, and reckons 41: Pitho, Admete, Prynno, Ianthe, Rhodia, Hippo, Callirhoe, Urania, Clymene, Idyia, Pasikhoe, Cythia, Zeuxo, Galaxaura, Plexaura, Perseis, Pluto, Thoe, Polydora, Melobosis, Dione, Carceis, Xantha, Atacta, Ianira, Telestho, Europa, Menestho, Petrea, Eudora, Calypso, Tyche, Ocyroe, Crisia, Amphiro, with those mentioned by Apollodorus, except Amphitrite. Hyginus mentions 16, whose names are almost all different from those of Apollodorus and Hesiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oceanides, like the rest of the inferior deities, were honoured with libations and sacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were entreated to protect sailors from storms and dangerous tempests. The Argonauts, before they proceeded on their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the sea-shore, to all the deities of the sea, and sacrificed bulls to them, and entreated their protection. When the sacrifice was made on the sea-shore the blood of the victim was received in a vessel, but when it was in the open sea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the sea was calm, the sailors generally offered a lamb or a young pig, but if it was agitated by the winds, and rough, a black bull was deemed the most acceptable victim. Homer. Od. 3.—Horat. Apollon. Arg. Virg. G. 4, v. 347.—Hesiod. Theog. 349.—Apollod. 1.

Oceanus, a powerful deity of the sea, son of Coelus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the most principal rivers, such as the Alps, Peneus, Strymon, &c., with a number of daughters who are called from him Oceanides. Vid. Oceanides. According to Homer, Oceanus was the fathers of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent visits from the rest of the deities. He is generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea. He often holds a pike in his hand, whilst ships under sail appear at a distance, or a sea monster stands near him. Oceanus presided over every part of the sea, and even the rivers were subjected to his power. The ancients were superstitious in their worship to Oceanus, and revered with great solemnity a deity to whose care they entrusted themselves when going on any voyage. Hesiod. Theog. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 81, &c.—Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.—Homer. Il.

Ocellus, an ancient philosopher of Lucania. Vid. Lucanus.

Ocellum, a town of Gaul. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 10.

Ocha, a mountain of Eubœa, and the name of Eubœa itself.—A sister of Ochus, buried alive by his orders.

Ochesius, a general of Ætolia in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.

Ochus, a surname given to Artaxerxes III. king of Persia. Vid. Artaxerxes.—A man of Cyzicus, who was killed by the Argonauts. Flacc. 3.—A prince of Persia, who refused to visit his native country for fear of giving all the women each a piece of gold. Plut.—A river of India, or of Bactriana. Plin. 6, c. 16. l. 31, c. 7.—A king of Persia. He exchanged his name for that of Darius. Vid. Darius Nothus.

Ocnus, a son of the Tiber and of Manto, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. He built a town, which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some suppose that he is the same as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 9. Æn. 10, v. 198.—A man remarkable for his industry. He had a wife as remarkable for her profusion; she always consumed and lavished away whatever the labours of her husband had earned. He is represented as twisting a cord, which an ass standing by eats up as soon as he makes it; whence the proverb of the cord of Ocnus often applied to labour which meets no return, and which is totally lost. Propert. 4, el. 3, v. 21.—Plin. 35, c. 11.—Paus. 10, c. 29.

Ocoritulum, now Otricoli, a town of Umbria near Rome. Cic. pro Mil.—Liv. 19, c. 41.

Ocridon, a king of Rhodes, who was reckoned in the number of the gods after death. Plin. in Græc. Quæst. 27.

Ocrisia, a woman of Corniculum, who was one of the attendants of Tanauquil the wife of Tarquinus Priscus. As she was throwing into the flames, as offerings, some of the meats that were served on the table of Tarquinus, she suddenly saw in the fire what Ovid calls obscuri formæ viridis. She informed the queen of it, and when by her orders she had approached near it, she conceived a son who was called Servius Tullius, and who, being educated in the king's family, afterwards succeeded to the vacant throne. Some suppose that Vulcan had assumed that form which was presented to the eyes of Ocresia, and that the god was the father of the sixth king of Rome. Plut. de Fort. Rom.—Plin. 36, c. 27.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 627.

Octacilius, a slave who was manumitted, and who afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome. He had Pompey the Great in the number of his pupils. Sueton. in Rhet.—Martial. 10, ep. 79.

Octavia, a Roman lady, sister to the emperor Augustus, and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death, M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political step to reconcile her brother and her husband. Antony proved for some time attentive to her, but he soon after despised her for Cleopatra, and when she attempted to withdraw him from this unlawful amour by going to meet him at Athens, she was secretly rebuked, and totally banished from his presence. This affront was highly resented by Augustus, and though Octavia endeavoured to pacify him by palliating her husband's behaviour, he resolved to revenge her cause by arms. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries she had received, took into her house all the children of her husband and treated them with maternal tenderness. Marcellus her son by her first husband was married to a niece of Augustus, and publicly intended as a successor to his uncle. His sudden death plunged all his family into the greatest grief. Virgil, whom Augustus patronized, undertook upon himself to pay a melancholy tribute to the memory of a young man whom Rome regarded as her future father and patron. He was desired to repeat his composition in the presence of Augustus and of his sister. Octavia burst into tears as soon as the poet began; but when he mentioned, Tu Marcellus eris, she swooned away. This tender and pathetic encomium upon the merit and the virtues of young Marcellus was liberally rewarded by Octavia, and Virgil received 10,000 sesterces for every one of the verses. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The elder married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had C. Donitius the father of the emperor Nero, by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. Antonia Minor, who was as virtuous and as beautiful as her mother, married Drusus the son of Tiberius, by whom she had Germanicus and Claudius, who reigned before Nero. The death of Marcellus continually preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy about 10 years before the christian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory, by pronouncing himself her funeral oration. The Roman people also showed their respect for her virtues by their wish to pay her divine honours. Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Anton., &c.—A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Messalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, she was married to the emperor Nero in the 16th year of her age. She was soon after divorced on pretence of barrenness, and the emperor married Poppæa, who exercised her enmity upon Octavia by causing her to be banished into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the instance of the people, and Poppæa, who was resolved on her ruin, caused her again to be banished to an island, where she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa.

Suet. in Claud. 27. In Ner. 7 & 35.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

Octavianus, or Octavius Cæsar, the nephew of Cæsar the dictator. After the battle of Actium and the final destruction of the Roman republic, the servile senate bestowed upon him the title and surname of Augustus, as more expressive of his greatness and dignity. Vid. Augustus.

Octavius, a Roman officer who brought Perseus king of Macedonia a prisoner to the consul. He was sent by his countrymen to be guardian to Ptolemy Eupator the young king of Egypt, where he behaved with the greatest arrogance. He was assassinated by Lysias, who was before regent of Egypt. The murderer was sent to Rome.—A man who opposed Metellus in the reduction of Crete by means of Pompey. He was obliged to retire from the island.—A man who banished Cinna from Rome, and became remarkable for his probity and fondness of discipline. He was seized and put to death by order of his successful rivals Marius and Cinna.—A Roman who boasted of being in the number of Cæsar's murderers. His assertions were false, yet he was punished as if he had been accessory to the conspiracy.—A lieutenant of Crassus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Crassus.—A governor of Cilicia. He died in his province, and Lucullus made applications to succeed him, &c.—A tribune of the people at Rome, whom Tib. Gracchus his colleague deposed.—A commander of the forces of Antony against Augustus.—An officer who killed himself, &c.—A tribune of the people, who debauched a woman of Pontus from her husband. She proved unfaithful to him, upon which he murdered her. He was condemned under Nero. Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Plut. in Vitius.—Flores. Liv., &c.—A poet in the Augustan age, intimate with Horace. He also distinguished himself as an historian. Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 8a.

Octodurus, a village in the modern country of Switzerland, now called Martigny. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 1.

Octogesa, a town of Spain, a little above the mouth of the Iberus, now called Mequinensa. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 61.

Octolophum, a place of Greece. Liv. 31.

Ocyalus, one of the Phæaciens with Alcinous. Homer. Od.

Ocypts, one of the Harpies, who infected whatever she touched. The name signifies swift flying. Hesiod. Theog. 265.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—A daughter of Thaumias.—A daughter of Palmyra.

Ocyroë, a daughter of Chiron by Chariclo, who had the gift of prophecy. She was changed into a mare. Vid. Melanippe. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 638, &c.—A woman, daughter of Chesias, carried away by Apollo, as she was going to a festival at Miletus.

Odenatus, a celebrated prince of Palmyra. He early inured himself to bear fatigues, and by hunting leopards and wild beasts, he accustomed himself to the labours of a military life. He was faithful to the Romans; and when Aurelian had been taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia, Odenatus warmly interested himself in his cause, and solicited his release by writing a letter to the conqueror and sending him presents. The king of Persia was offended at the liberty of Odenatus; he tore the letter, and ordered the presents which were offered to be thrown into a river. To punish Odenatus, who had the impudence, as he observed, to pay homage to so great a monarch as himself, he ordered him to appear before him, on pain of being devoted to instant destruction, with all his family, if he dared to refuse. Odenatus disdained the summons of Sapor, and opposed force to force. He obtained some advantages over the troops of the Persian monarch, and took his wife prisoner with a great and rich booty. These services were seen with gratitude by the Romans; and Callienus, the then reigning emperor, named Odenatus as his colleague on the throne, and gave the title of Augustus to his children and to his wife, the celebrated Zenobia. Odenatus, invested with new power, resolved to signalize himself more conspicuously by conquering the northern barbarians, but his exaltation was short, and he perished by the dagger of one of his relations, whom he had slightly offended in a domestic entertainment. He died at Emessa, about the 26th year of the christian era. Zenobia succeeded to all his titles and honours.

Odinus, a celebrated hero of antiquity, who flourished about 70 years before the christian era, in the northern parts of ancient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a priest, a soldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He imposed upon the credulity of his superstitious countrymen, and made them believe that he could raise the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and increased his fame by conquest and by persuasion, he resolved to die in a different manner from other men. He assembled his friends, and with a sharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he should become one of the immortal gods. He further added that he would prepare bliss and felicity for such of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. These injunctions had the desired effect; his countrymen superstitiously believed him, and always recommended themselves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the souls of such as had fallen in war.

Odites, a son of Ixion, killed by Mopsus at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12. v. 457.—A prince killed at the nuptials of Andromeda. Id. ib. 5. v. 97.

Odoacer, a king of the Heruli, who destroyed the western empire of Rome, and called himself king of Italy, A. D. 476.

Odontanti, a people of Thrace on the eastern banks of the Strymon. Liv. 45. c. 4.

Odones, a people of Thrace.

Odryssæ, an ancient people of Thrace, between Abdera and the river Ister. The epithet of Odryssæ is often applied to a Thracian. Ovid. Met. 6. v. 490. l. 13. v. 554. Stat. Ach. 1. v. 124.—Liv. 39. c. 53.

Odyssæa, one of Homer's epic poems, in which he describes in 24 books the adventures of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than 55 days. It is not so esteemed as the Iliad of that poet. Vid. Homerus.

Odyssæum, a promontory of Sicily, at the west of Pachynus.

Oea, a city of Africa, now Tripoli. Plin. 5. c. 4.—Sil. Ital. 3. v. 257.—Also a place in Ægina. Herodot. 5. c. 83.

Æægrus, or Ææger, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him mount Hæmus, and also the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, have received the appellation of Æægrus, though Servius, in his commentaries, disputes the explanation of Diodorus, by asserting that the Æægrus is a river of Thrace, whose waters supply the streams of the Hebrus. Ovid. in Ib. 474.—Apollon. 1. Arg.—Virg. G. 4. v. 524.—Ital. 5. v. 463.—Diod.—Apollod. 1. c. 3.

Æænthæ and Æænthia, a town of Phocis, where Venus had a temple. Paus. 10. c. 38.

Ææx, a son of Nauplius and Clymene. He was brother to Palamedes, whom he accompanied to the Trojan war, and whose death he highly resented on his return to Greece, by raising disturbances in the family of some of the Grecian princes. Dictys Cret.—Apollod. 2.—Hygin. fab. 117.

Ææbala, the ancient name of Laconia, which it received from king Ææbalus, and thence Ææbalides pæur is applied to Hyacinthus as a native of the country, and Ææbalus sanguis is used to denominate his blood. Paus. 3. c. 1.—Apollod. 3. c. 10.—The same name is given to Tarentum because built by a Lacedæmonian colony, whose ancestors were governed by Ææbalus. Virg. G. 4. v. 125.—Sil. 12. v. 451.

Ææbalus, a son of Argæus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone the daughter of Persens, by whom he had Hippocoön, Tyndarus, &c. Paus. 3. c. 7.—Apollod. 3. c. 10.

—A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis, who reigned in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7. v. 734.

Ææbares, a satrap of Cyrus, against the Medes. Polyæn. 7.—A groom of Darius son of Hystaspes. He was the cause that his master obtained the kingdom of Persia, by his artifice in making his horse neigh first. Vid. Darius I. Herodot. 3. c. 85.—Justin. 1. c. 10.

Ææchalia, a country of Peloponnesus in Laconia, with a small town of the same name. This town was destroyed by Hercules, while Eurystus was king over it, from which circumstance it was often called Eurytopolis.—A small town of Eubœa, where, according to some, Eurystus reigned, and not in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8. 9. & 10.—Virg. Æn. 8. v. 291.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 9. v. 126.—Sophoc. in Trach. 74 & Schol.

Ææclides, a patronymic of Amphiaræus son of Ææcleus. Ovid. Met. 8. fab. 7.

Ææcleus. Vid. Oicteus.

Ææoumenius, wrote in the middle of the 10th century a paraphrase of some of the books of the New Testament in Greek, edited in two vols. fol. Paris, 1631.

Æædipodia, a fountain of Thebes in Bœotia.

Æædipus, a son of Laius king of Thebes and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, Æædipus was born to be exposed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius the father of Æædipus was informed by the oracle, as soon as he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, he resolved never to approach Jocasta; but his solemn resolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication. The queen became pregnant, and Laius, still intent to stop this evil, ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as it came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet she gave the child as soon as born to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him on the mountains. The servant was moved with pity, but to obey the commands of Jocasta, he bored the feet of the child, and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home; and Peribœa the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the swelling of his feet (oidem tumeo, vobis pedes), soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address; and one of them, to mortify his rising ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts; he asked Peribœa, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill-founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth, where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey, met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality and of the rank of the men whom he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphinx. This terrible monster, which Juno had sent to lay waste the country [Vid. Sphinx], resorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain, without success, the enigmas which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the Sphinx, Creon, who at the death of Laius had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed his head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismene and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease only when the murderer of king Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact inquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming when Œdipus considered, that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonus, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this he walked, himself, without the assistance of a guide, to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had not children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus, in the age of Pausanias. Some of the ancient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to some, the four children which he had were by Euriganea the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. Apolod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniss. &c.—*Sophocl. CENO, a daughter of Danaus by Crino. Apolod.

CENANTHOS, a favourite of young Ptolemy king of Egypt.

CENO, a small town of Argolis. The people were called Ceneada.

CENEA, a river of Assyria. Ammian.

CENEUS, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthæon, or Portheus, and Euryte. He married Althea the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althea's death, he married Peribœa the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general sacrifice, which Ceneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddess, to revenge this unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and, besides, she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydonia. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chase, known by the name of the chase of the Calydonian boar. Some time after, Meleager died, and Ceneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius. Diomedes, however, his grandson, soon restored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed rendered him melancholy. He excised himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of CENO. It is reported that Ceneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that he suffered the god to enjoy the favours of Althea, and to become the father of Dejanira, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron should be called among the Greeks by the name of CENEUS (νεως). Hygin. Fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 557.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 2, c. 25.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 516.

CENADE, a town of Acarnania. Liv. 26, c. 24, l. 38, c. 11.

CENIDES, a patronymic of Meleager son of CENEUS. Ovid. Met. 8, Fab. 10.

CENOE, a nymph who married Sicinus, the son of Thoon king of Lemnos. From her the island of Sicinus had been called CENOE.—Two villages of Attica were also called CENOE. Herodot. 5, c. 74.—Strab. 4, c. 7.—A city of Argolis, where CENEUS fled when driven from Calydon. Paus. 2, c. 25.—A town of Elis in the Peloponnesus. *Strab. CENOMANUS, a son of Mars, by Sterope the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia, by Evarete daughter of Acrisius, or Eurythoa the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law, therefore as he could skillfully drive a chariot he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could outrun him, on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their life, if conquered. Many had already perished, when Pelops son of Tantalus proposed himself. He previously bribed Myrtilus the charioteer of CENOMANUS, by promising him the enjoyment of the favours of Hippodamia, if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian Isthmus, and CENOMANUS was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, CENOMANUS entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Those that had been defeated when Pelops entered the lists, were Mæmax, Alenathos, Euryalus, Eurymachus, Capetus, Laxius, Acris, Chalcoon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Aristomachus, Æolius, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 11, &c.—*Apollon. CENON, a part of Locris on the bay of Corinth.

CENOEA, an ancient name of the island Ægina. It is also called Enopia. Herodot. 8, c. 46.—Two villages of Attica are also called CENOEA, or rather CENOE.—A town of Troas, the birthplace of the nymph CENOEA. Strab. 13.

CENOEA, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenus in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priamus, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled; and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to CENOEA, in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as he came into her presence; and CENOEA was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that she bathed it with her tears, and stabbed herself to the heart. She was mother of Corythus by Paris, and this son perished by the hand of his father when he attempted, at the instigation of CENOEA, to persuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. Diclys. Curt. Ovid. de Rem. Amor. v. 457. Heroid. 5. Lucan. 4.

CENOPIA, one of the ancient names of the island Ægina. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 473.

CENOPIIDES, a mathematician of Chios. Diod. 1. CENOPIION, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some suppose that this violence was offered to Orion after he had dishonoured Merope. CENOPIION received the island of Chios from Rhadamanthus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Ægean sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias. Some suppose, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Ægina, which from him was called CENOPIA. Plut. in These. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Diod. Paus. 7, c. 4.—Apollon. Rhod. 3.

CENOTRI, the inhabitants of CENOTRIA.

CENOTRIA, a part of Italy, which was afterwards called Lucania. It received this name from CENOTRUS the son of Lycaon, who settled there with a colony of Arcadians. The CENOTRIANS afterwards spread themselves into Umbria and as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabines, according to some writers. The name of CENOTRIA is sometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where CENOTRUS settled, was before inhabited by the Ausones. Dionys. Hal. 8, c. 21.—Paus. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 536, l. 7, v. 85.—Ital. 8, v. 220.

CENOTRIDES, two small islands on the coast of Lucania, where some of the Romans were banished by the emperors. They were called Ischia and Pontia.

CENOTRUS, a son of Lycaon of Arcadia. He passed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of CENOTRIA to that part of the country where he settled. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Paus. 1, c. 3.

CENUSAE, small islands near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.—Thucyd. 8.—Others on the coast of the Peloponnesus, near Messenia. Mela, 2, c. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

CENUSIA, a son of Licymnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules; and as the hero had promised Licymnius to bring back his son, he burnt his body and presented the ashes to the afflicted father. From this circumstance arose a custom of burning the dead among the Greeks. Schol. Homer. Il.—A small river of Laconia. Liv. 34, c. 28.

CENUS, an island of Bœotia formed by the Asopus. Herodot. 9, c. 50.

ËTA, now Bania, a celebrated mountain between Thessaly and Macedonia, upon which Hercules burnt himself. Its height has given occasion to the poets to feign that the sun, moon, and stars arose behind it. Mount ËTA, properly speaking, is a long chain of mountains which runs from the straits of Thermopylæ and the gulf of Malia, in a western direction, to mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. The straits or passes of mount ËTA are called the straits of Thermopylæ, from the hot baths and mineral waters which are in the neighbourhood. These passes are not more than 25 feet in breadth. Mela, 2, c. 3.—Catull. 66, v. 54.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 10, c. 20, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 2, v. 216, l. 9, v. 204, &c.—*Virg. Ceylus, or Cetylum, a town of Laconia, which received its name from Ceylus, one of the heroes of Argos. Serapis had a temple there. Paus. 3, c. 25.

Ocellus, a man whom, though unpolished, Horace represents as a character exemplary for wisdom, economy, and moderation. Horat. 2, sat. 2, v. 2.

Oci, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 28.

Ogdôphis, a navigable river flowing from the Alps. Strab. 6.

Ogdôrus, a king of Egypt.

Ogiossa, an island in the Tyrrhene sea, east of Corsica, famous for wine, and now called Monte Christo. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Ogmilus, a name of Hercules among the Gauls. Lucian. in Herc.

Ogon, a deity of Mylassa in Caria, under whose temple, as was supposed, the sea passed. Paus. 8, c. 10.

Ogulinia lex, by Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 453. It increased the number of pontifices and augurs from four to nine. The addition was made to both orders from plebeian families.—A Roman lady as poor as she was lascivious. Juv. 6, v. 351.

Ogyges, a celebrated monarch, the most ancient of those that reigned in Greece. He was son of Terra, or, as some suppose, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Boeotia, which from him is sometimes called Oegyta, and his power was also extended over Attica. It is supposed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are so obscure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygius is often applied to everything of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which so inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waste for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is supposed to have happened about 1764 years before the christian era, and previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to some writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was also marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and, as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her colour, diameter, figure, and her course. Varro. de R. R. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 9, c. 5.—Aug. de Civ. D. 18, &c.

—The island of Calypso, opposite the promontory of Lacinium in Magna Græcia, where Ulysses was shipwrecked. The situation, and even the existence of Calypso's island, is disputed by some writers. Plin. 3, c. 10.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 52 & 85. l. 5, v. 254.

Ogyris, an island in the Indian ocean.

Oicleus, a son of Antiphates and Zeuxippe, who married Hypermnestra daughter of Theseus, by whom he had Iphianira, Polybœra, and Amphiarus. He was killed by Laomedon when defending the ships which Hercules had brought to Asia, when he made war against Troy. Homer. Od. 15.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 17.

Oileus, a king of the Locrians. His father's name was Odoedocus, and his mother's Argianome. He married Eriope, by whom he had Ajax, called

Oileus from his father, to discriminate him from Ajax the son of Telamon. He had also another son called Medon, by a courtesan called Rhene. Oileus was one of the Argonauts. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 45.—Apollon. 1.—Hygin. Fab. 74 & 18.—Homer. 11, 15 & 15.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Oianus, a town of Lesbos.

Oiantræ, a people of India. Lucan. 3, v. 249.—Plin. 6, c. 20.

Olba, or Olbus, a town of Cilicia.

Olbia, a town of Sarmatia at the confluence of the Hypanis and the Borysthènes, about 15 miles from the sea, according to Pliny. It was afterwards called Borysthènes and Miletopolis, because peopled by a Milesian colony, and is now supposed to be Oczakow. Strab. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—A town of Bithynia. Mela, 1, c. 19.—A town of Gallia Narbonensis. Mela, 2, c. 5.—The capital of Sardinia. Claudian.

Olichintum, or Oleintum, now Dulcigno, a town of Dalmatia, on the Adriatic. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Olbadæ, a people of Spain. Liv. 27, c. 5.

Oleæros, or Oliaros, one of the Cyclades, about 16 miles in circumference, separated from Paros by a strait of seven miles. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 126.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Olestrum, a town of Spain near Saguntum. Strab.

Olen, a Greek poet of Lycia, who flourished some time before the age of Orpheus, and composed many hymns, some of which were regularly sung at Delphi, on solemn occasions. Some suppose that he was the first who established the oracle of Apollo at Delphi where he first delivered oracles. Herodot. 4, c. 35.

Olenius, a Lemnian killed by his wife. Val. Fl. 2, v. 164.

Olenus, a son of Vulcan, who married Lethæa, a beautiful woman, who preferred herself to the goddesses. She and her husband were changed into stones by the deities. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 68.—A famous soothsayer of Etruria. Plin. 28, c. 2.

Olenus, or Olenum, a town of Peloponnesus between Patræ and Cyllene. The goat Amalthæa, which was made a constellation by Jupiter, is called Olenia, from its residence there. Paus. 7, c. 22.—Ovid. Met. 3.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Another in Ætolia.

Olorus, one of the Cyclades, now Antiparo.

Olgassy, a mountain of Galatia.

Oligyrtia, a town of Peloponnesus.

Olinthus, a town of Macedonia. Vid.

Olynthus.

Olistro, now Lisbon, a town of ancient Spain on the Tagus, surnamed Felicitas Julia (Plin. 4, c. 22), and called by some Ulyssippo, and said to be founded by Ulysses. Mela, 3, c. 1.—Solinus 23.

Oltinzi, a town of Lusitania. Mela, 3, c. 1.

Olixon, a town of Magnesia in Thessaly. Homer.

T. Ollius, the father of Poppæa, destroyed on account of his intimacy with Sejanus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 45.—A river rising in the Alps, and falling into the Po, now called the Oglia. Plin. 2, c. 103.

Ollovico, a prince of Gaul, called the friend of pay homage to so great a monarch as himself, he ordered him to appear before him, on pain of being devoted to instant destruction, with all his family, if he dared to refuse. Odenatus disdained the summons of Sapor, and opposed force to force. He obtained some advantages over the troops of the Persian monarch, and took his wife prisoner with a great and rich booty. These services were seen with gratitude by the Romans; and Gallienus, the then reigning emperor, named Odenatus as his colleague on the throne, and gave the title of Augustus to his children and to his wife, the celebrated Zenobia. Odenatus, invested with new power, resolved to signalize himself more conspicuously by conquering the northern barbarians, but his exaltation was short, and he perished by the dagger of one of his relations, whom he had slightly offended in a domestic entertainment. He died at Emessa, about the 267th year of the christian era. Zenobia succeeded to all his titles and honours.

Odinus, a celebrated hero of antiquity, who flourished about 70 years before the christian era, in the northern parts of ancient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a priest, a soldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He imposed upon the credulity of his superstitious countrymen, and made them believe that he could raise the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and increased his fame by conquest and by persuasion, he resolved to die in a different manner from other men. He assembled his friends, and with a sharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he should become one of the immortal gods. He further added that he would prepare bliss and felicity for such of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. These injunctions had the desired effect; his countrymen superstitiously believed him, and always recommended themselves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the souls of such as had fallen in war.

Odites, a son of Ixion, killed by Mopsus at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 457.—A prince killed at the nuptials of Andromeda. Id. ib. 5, v. 97.

Odoacer, a king of the Heruli, who destroyed the western empire of Rome, and called himself king of Italy, A. D. 476.

Odomanti, a people of Thrace on the eastern banks of the Strymon. Liv. 45, c. 4.

Odonos, a people of Thrace.

Odryas, an ancient people of Thrace, between Abdera and the river Ister. The epithet of Odryas is often applied to a Thracian. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 490. L. 13, v. 554. Stat. Ach. 1, v. 184.—Liv. 39, c. 53.

Odyssæa, one of Homer's epic poems, in which he describes in 24 books the adventures of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than 55 days. It is not so esteemed as the Iliad of that poet. Vid. Homerus.

Odyssæum, a promontory of Sicily, at the west of Pachynus.

Oea, a city of Africa, now Tripoli. Plin. 5, c. 4.—Sil. Ital. 3, v. 257.—Also a place in Ægina. Herodot. 5, c. 83.

Oeagrus, or Oeager, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him mount Hæmus, and also the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, have received the appellation of Oeagrus, though Servius, in his commentaries, disputes the explanation of Diodorus, by asserting that the Oeagrus is a river of Thrace, whose waters supply the streams of the Hebrus. *Ovid. in Ib. 414.—Apollon. 1, Arg.—Virg. Oeanthe and Oeanthis, a town of Phocis, where Venus had a temple. Paus. 10, c. 38.

Oeax, a son of Nauplius and Clymene. He was brother to Palamedes, whom he accompanied to the Trojan war, and whose death he highly resented on his return to Greece, by raising disturbances in the family of some of the Grecian princes. Dictys Cret.—Apollod. 2.—Hygin. fab. 117.

Oebalia, the ancient name of Laconia, which it received from king Oebalus, and thence Oebalides puer is applied to Hyacinthus as a native of the country, and Oebalinus sanguis is used to denominate his blood. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—The same name is given to Tarentum because built by a Lacedæmonian colony, whose ancestors were governed by Oebalus. Virg. G. 4, v. 125.—Sil. 12, v. 451.

Oebalus, a son of Argalus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone the daughter of Perseus, by whom he had Hippocoon, Tyndarus, &c. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis, who reigned in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Oebares, a satrap of Cyrus, against the Medes. Polyæn. 7.—A groom of Darius son of Hystaspes. He was the cause that his master obtained the kingdom of Persia, by his artifice in making his horse neigh first. Vid. Darius I. Herodot. 3, c. 85.—Justin. 1, c. 10.

Oebalis, a country of Peloponnesus in Laconia, with a small town of the same name. This town was destroyed by Hercules, while Eurytus was king over it, from which circumstance it was often called Eurytopolis.—A small town of Eubœa, where, according to some, Eurytus reigned, and not in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8, 9, & 10.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 291.—Ovid. Heroid. 9, Met. 9, v. 126.—Sophoc. in Trach. 74 & Schol.

Oelides, a patronymic of Amphiarus son of Ocleus. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 7.

Ocleus. Vid. Oicleus.

Oenonius, wrote in the middle of the 10th century a paraphrase of some of the books of the New Testament in Greek, edited in two vols. fol. Paris, 1632.

Oedipodia, a fountain of Thebes in Boeotia.

Oedipus, a son of Laius king of Thebes and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, Oedipus was born to be exposed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius the father of Oedipus was informed by the oracle, as soon as he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, he resolved never to approach Jocasta; but his solemn resolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication. The queen became pregnant, and Laius, still intent to stop this evil, ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as it came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet she gave the child as soon as born to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him on the mountains. The servant was moved with pity, but to obey the commands of Jocasta, he bored the feet of the child, and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home; and Peribœa the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the swelling of his feet (oïdew tumeo, wober pedes), soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address; and one of them, to mortify his rising ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts; he asked Peribœa, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill-founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth, where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey, met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality and of the rank of the men whom he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphinx. This terrible monster, which Juno had sent to lay waste the country (Vid. Sphinx), resorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain, without success, the enigmas which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the Sphinx, Creon, who at the death of Laius had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed his head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismene and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease only when the murderer of king Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact inquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming when Œdipus considered, that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonus, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this he walked, himself, without the assistance of a guide, to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had not children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus, in the age of Pausanias. Some of the ancient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to some, the four children which he had were by Euriganea the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. Apolod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniss. &c.—*Sophocl. ŒNE, a daughter of Danaus by Crino. Apol. lod.

Œnanthes, a favourite of young Ptolemy king of Egypt.

ŒNE, a small town of Argolis. The people were called Œneade.

ŒNEA, a river of Assyria. Amman.

ŒNEUS, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthæon, or Portheus, and Euryte. He married Althea the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althea's death, he married Peribœa the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general sacrifice, which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddess, to revenge his unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and, besides, she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydonia. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chase, known by the name of the chase of the Calydonian boar. Some time after, Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrus. Diomedes, however, his grandson, soon restored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed rendered him melancholy. He excised himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Œneæ. It is reported that Œneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that he suffered the god to enjoy the favours of Althea, and to become the father of Dejanira, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron should be called among the Greeks by the name of Ceneus (ovios). Hygin. fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 539.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 2, c. 25.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 510.

Cenomaus, a son of Mars, by Sterope the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia, by Evarete daughter of Acrisius, or Eurythoa the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law, therefore as he could skillfully drive a chariot he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could outrun him, on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their life, if conquered. Many had already perished, when Pelops son of Tantalus proposed himself. He previously bribed Myrtilus the charioteer of Cenomaus, by promising him the enjoyment of the favours of Hippodamia, if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian isthmus, and Cenomaus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, Cenomaus entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Those that had been defeated when Pelops entered the lists, were Marmax, Alcaethos, Euryalus, Eurymachus, Capetus, Lasius, Acris, Chalcedon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Aristomachus, Aëolus, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 11, &c.—*Apollon. Cenon, a part of Locris on the bay of Corinth.

Cenona, an ancient name of the island Ægina. It is also called Enopia. Herodot. 8, c. 46.—Two villages of Attica are also called Cenona, or rather Ceneo.—A town of Troas, the birthplace of the nymph Cenone. Strab. 13.

Cenone, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenus in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priam, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled; and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Cenone, in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as she came into her presence; and Cenone was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that she bathed it with her tears, and stabbed herself to the heart. She was mother of Corythus by Paris, and his son perished by the hand of his father when he attempted, at the instigation of Cenone, to persuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. Dictys. Cret. Ovid. de Rem. Amor. v. 457. Heroid. 5. Lucan. 9.

Cenopia, one of the ancient names of the island Ægina. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 473.

Cenopides, a mathematician of Chios. Diod. 1.

Cenopion, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some suppose that this violence was offered to Orion after he had dishonoured Merope. Cenopion received the island of Chios from Rhadamanthus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Ægean sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias. Some suppose, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Ægina, which from him was called Cenopia. Plut. in These. Apollod. 1, c. 4. Diod. Paus. 7, c. 4. Apollon. Rhod. 3.

Cenotri, the inhabitants of Cenotria.

Cenotria, a part of Italy, which was afterwards called Lucania. It received this name from Cenotrus the son of Lycaon, who settled there with a colony of Arcadians. The Cenotrians afterwards spread themselves into Umbria and as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabines, according to some writers. The name of Cenotria is sometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where Cenotrus settled, was before inhabited by the Ausones. Dionys. Hal. 8, c. 11. Paus. 1, c. 3. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 536. l. 7, v. 85. Ital. 8, v. 220.

Cenotrides, two small islands on the coast of Lucania, where some of the Romans were banished by the emperors. They were called Ischia and Pontia.

Cenotrus, a son of Lycaon of Arcadia. He passed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of Cenotria to that part of the country where he settled. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 11. Paus. 1, c. 3.

Cenotus, small islands near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31. Thucyd. 8.—Others on the coast of the Peloponnesus, near Messenia. Mela, 2, c. 17. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Cenotus, a son of Lycimnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules; and as the hero had promised Lycimnius to bring back his son, he burnt his body and presented the ashes to the afflicted father. From this circumstance arose a custom of burning the dead among the Greeks. Schol. Homer. Il.—A small river of Laconia. Liv. 34, c. 28.

Cenotus, an island of Bœotia formed by the Asopus. Herodot. 9, c. 50.

Ceta, now Banina, a celebrated mountain between Thessaly and Macedonia, upon which Hercules burnt himself. Its height has given occasion to the poets to feign that the sun, moon, and stars arose behind it. Mount Ceta, properly speaking, is a long chain of mountains which runs from the straits of Thermopylæ and the gulf of Malia, in a western direction, to mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. The straits or passes of mount Ceta are called the straits of Thermopylæ, from the hot baths and mineral waters which are in the neighbourhood. These passes are not more than 25 feet in breadth. *Mela, 2, c. 3. Catull. 66, v. 54. Apollod. 2, c. 7. Paus. 10, c. 20, &c. Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 2, v. 216. l. 9, v. 204, &c. Virg. Æn. 8. Ogmus, a name of Hercules among the Gauls. Lucian. in Herc.

Ogos, a deity of Mylassa in Caria, under whose temple, as was supposed, the sea passed. Paus. 8, c. 10.

Ogulinus lex, by Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 453. It increased the number of pontifices and augurs from four to nine. The addition was made to both orders from plebeian families.—A Roman lady as poor as she was lascivious. Juv. 6, v. 351.

Ogyges, a celebrated monarch, the most ancient of those that reigned in Greece. He was son of Terra, or, as some suppose, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Boeotia, which from him is sometimes called Ogygia, and his power was also extended over Attica. It is supposed that he was of Egyptian or Phoenician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are so obscure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygian is often applied to everything of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which so inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waste for near 300 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is supposed to have happened about 1764 years before the christian era, and previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to some writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was also marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and, as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her colour, diameter, figure, and her course. *Varr. de R. Ogyris, an island in the Indian ocean.

Oicleus, a son of Antiphatas and Zeuxippe, who married Hypermnestra daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Iphianira, Polyboea, and Amphiarus. He was killed by Laomedon when defending the ships which Hercules had brought to Asia, when he made war against Troy. Homer. Od. 15.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 1, 3, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 17.

Oileus, a king of the Locrians. His father's name was Odoecus, and his mother's Argriome. He married Eriope, by whom he had Ajax, called the republic by the Roman senate. Caes. Bell. G. 7, c. 37.

Oileus from his father, to discriminate him from Ajax the son of Telamon. He had also another son called Medon, by a courtesan called Rhene. Oileus was one of the Argonauts. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 45.—Apollon. 1.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.—Homer. Il. 13 & 15.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.

Olmis, a promontory near Megara.
Olmis, a river of Boeotia, near Helicon, sacred to the Muses. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 284.

Oloosson, now Alessio, a town of Magnesia. Hom.

Olophyxus, a town of Macedonia on mount Athos. Herodot. 7, c. 22.

Olpeæ, a fortified place of Epirus, now Forêt Castri.

Olus (antia), a town at the west of Crete.

Olympæum, a place of Delos.—Another in Syracuse.

Olympia (orum), celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia, where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated. They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dacryli, B.C. 1453. Some attribute the institution to Pelops, after he had obtained a victory over CEnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the more received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honour of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augias, B.C. 1222. Strabo objects to this opinion, by observing that if they had been established in the age of Homer, the poet would have undoubtedly spoken of them, as he is in every particular careful to mention the amusements and diversions of the ancient Greeks. But they were neglected after their first institution by Hercules, and no notice was taken of them, according to many writers, till Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity. This reinstitution, which happened B.C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiad. Vid. Olympias. They, however, were neglected for some time after the age of Iphitus, till Corœbus, who obtained a victory, B.C. 776, reinstated them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendence of the games were entrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans, B.C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment; they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th Olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103rd Olympiad, the number was increased to 12, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following Olympiad, they were reduced to eight, and afterwards increased to 20, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. The presidents were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked, and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity, called ἀγωνα, much the same as the Roman victors, of whom the chief was called ἀγωναρχης. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to trespass this law was immediately thrown down from a rock. This, however, was sometimes neglected, for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were great.

No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself 10 months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. No unfair dealings were allowed, and whoever attempted to bribe his adversary was subjected to a severe fine. No criminals, nor such as were connected with impious and guilty persons, were suffered to present themselves as combatants; and even the father and relations were obliged to swear that they would have recourse to no artifice which might decide the victory in favour of their friends. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. Some little balls, superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver urn, and such as drew the same letter were obliged to contend one with the other. He who had an odd letter remained the last, and he often had the advantage, as he was to encounter the last who had obtained the superiority over his adversary. He was called ἐπέθυρος. In these games were exhibited running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, which was called altogether κρητάρων, or quingertium. Besides these, there were horse and chariot races, and also contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained, was a crown of olive; which, as some suppose, was in memory of the labours of Hercules, which was accomplished for the universal good of mankind, and for which the hero claimed no other reward than the consciousness of having been the friend of humanity. So small and trifling a reward stimulated courage and virtue, and was more the source of great honours than the most unbounded treasures. The statues of the conquerors, called Olympionice, were erected at Olympia, in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; they were drawn in a chariot by four horses, and everywhere received with the greatest acclamations. Their entrance into their native city was not through the gates, but, to make it more grand and more solemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names; and indeed the victories severally obtained at Olympia are the subjects of the most beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a scarf was originally tied round the waist, but when it had entangled one of the adversaries, and been the cause that he lost the victory, it was laid aside, and no regard was paid to decency. The Olympic games were observed every fifth year, or, to speak with greater exactness, after a revolution of four years, and in the first month of the fifth year, and they continued for five successive days. As they were the most ancient and the most solemn of all the festivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew so many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries. *Pind. Olympias, a certain space of time which elapsed between the celebration of the Olympic games. The Olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence some have said that they were observed every fifth year.

This period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The custom of reckoning time by the celebration of the Olympic games was not introduced at the first institution of these festivals, but, to speak accurately, only the year in which Corcebus obtained the prize. This Olympiad, which has always been reckoned the first, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of some of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the christian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon, next after the summer solstice; therefore the Olympiads were of unequal length, because the time of the full moon differs 11 days every year, and for that reason they sometimes began the next day after the solstice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by Olympiads ceased, as some suppose, after the 36th, in the year 440 of the christian era. It was universally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though still the Pythian games served as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Boeotians, the Nemean games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Isthmian to the Corinthians and the inhabitants of the Peloponnesian isthmus. To the Olympiads history is much indebted. They have served to fix the time of many momentous events, and indeed before this method of computing time was observed, every page of history is mostly fabulous, and filled with obscurity and contradiction, and no true chronological account can be properly established and maintained with certainty. The mode of computation, which was used after the suppression of the Olympiads and of the consular fasti of Rome, was more useful as it was more universal; but while the era of the creation of the world prevailed in the east, the western nations in the sixth century began to adopt with more propriety the christian epoch, which was propagated in the eighth century, and at last, in the tenth, became legal and popular.—A celebrated woman, who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness, and more probably her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was sensible of this injury, and Alexander showed his disapprobation of his father's measures by retiring from the court to his mother. The murder of Philip, which soon followed this disgrace, and which some have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greatest extravagancies. The queen paid the highest honour to her husband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his ashes near those of Philip. The administration of Alexander, who had succeeded his father, was, in some instances, offensive to Olympias; but when the ambition of her son was concerned, she did not scruple to declare publicly that Alexander was not the son of Philip, but that he was the offspring of an enormous serpent which had supernaturally introduced itself into her bed. When Alexander was dead, Olympias seized the government of Macedonia, and to establish her usurpation, she cruelly put to death Aridæus, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicanor the brother of Cassander, with 100 leading men of Macedonia, who were inimical to her interest. Such barbarities did not long remain unpunished; Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired with the remains of her family, and she was obliged to surrender after an obstinate siege. The conqueror ordered her to be accused, and to be put to death. A body of 200 soldiers were directed to put the bloody commands into execution, but the splendour and majesty of the queen disarmed their courage, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the christian era. Justin. 7, c. 6, l. 9, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Paus.—A fountain of Arcadia which flowed for one year and the next was dry. Paus. 8, c. 29.

Olympiodorus, a musician who taught Epaminondas music. C. Nep.—A native of Thebes in Egypt, who flourished under Theodosius II., and wrote 22 books of history, in Greek, beginning with the seventh consulship of Honorius, and the second of Theodosius, to the period when Valentinian was made emperor. He wrote also an account of an embassy to some of the barbarian nations of the north, &c. His style is censured by some as low, and unworthy of an historian. The commentaries of Olympiodorus on the Metaphysics of Aristotle, were edited apud Ald. 1550, in fol. —An Athenian officer, present at the battle of Plataea, where he behaved with great valour. Plut.

Olympius, a surname of Jupiter at Olympia, where the god had a celebrated temple and statue, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the work of Phidias. Paus. 7, c. 2.—A native of Carthage, called also Nemesianus. Virg. Nemesianus.—A favourite at the court of Honorius, who was the cause of Stilicho's death.

Olympus, a physician of Cleopatra queen of Egypt, who wrote some historical treatises. Plut. in Anton.—A poet and musician of Mysia, son of Mæon and disciple to Marsyas. He lived before the Trojan war, and distinguished himself by his amatory elegies, his hymns, and particularly the beautiful airs which he composed, and which were still preserved in the age of Aristophanes. Plato in Min.—Aristot. Pol. 8.—Another musician of Phrygia, who lived in the age of Midas. He is frequently confounded with the preceding. Pollux, 4, c. 10.—A son of Hercules and Eubœa. Apollod.—A mountain of Macedonia and Thessaly, now Lacha. The ancients supposed that it touched the heavens with its top; and, from that circumstance, they have placed the residence of the gods there, and have made it the court of Jupiter. It is about one mile and a half in perpendicular height, and is covered with pleasant woods, caves, and grottoes. On the top of the mountain, according to the notions of the poets, there was neither wind nor rain, nor clouds, but an eternal spring. Homer. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, 6, &c.—Ovid. Met.—Lucan. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—A mountain of Mysia, called the Mysian Olympus, a name which it still preserves.—Another in Elis.—Another in Arcadia.—Another in the island of Cyprus, now Santa Croce. Some suppose the Olympus of Mysia and of Cilicia to be the same.—A town on the coast of Lycia.

Olympus, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod. Olynthus, a celebrated town and republic of Macedonia, on the isthmus of the peninsula of Pallene. It became famous for its flourishing situation, and for its frequent disputes with the Athenians and Laocædemonians, and with king Philip, who destroyed it, and sold the inhabitants for slaves. Cic. in Verr.—Plut. de Ir. Coh., &c.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 127.—Curt. 8, c. 9.

Olytas, a river near Thermopylæ, which, as the mythologists report, attempted to extinguish the funeral pile on which Hercules was consumed. Strab. 9.

Olyzon, a town of Thessaly.

Omarus, a Lacedæmonian sent to Darius, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Ombi and Tentyra, two neighbouring cities of Egypt, whose inhabitants were always in discord one with another. Juv. 15, v. 35.

Ombri. Vid. Umbri.

Omolœ, or Homœ, a mountain of Thessaly. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.—There were some festivals called Homœia, which were celebrated in Bœotia in honour of Jupiter, surnamed Homœius.

Omophagia, a festival in honour of Bacchus. The word signifies the eating of raw flesh. Vid. Dionysia.

Omphale, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jar-danus. She married Imolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wished to see so illustrious a hero. Her wish was soon gratified. After the murder of Eurystus, Hercules fell sick, and was ordered to be sold as a slave, that he might recover his health, and the right use of his senses. Mercury was commissioned to sell him, and Omphale bought him, and restored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and the queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him, whom some call Agelaus, and others Lamon. From this son were descended Gyges and Croesus; but this opinion is different from the account which makes these Lydian monarchs spring from Alceus, a son of Hercules by Malis, one of the female servants of Omphale. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen that, to conciliate her esteem, he spins by her side among her women, while she covers herself with the lion's skin, and arms herself with the club of the hero, and often strikes him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the distaff, &c. Their fondness was mutual. As they once travelled together, they came to a grotto on mount Imolus, where the queen dressed herself in the habit of her lover, and obliged him to appear in a female garment. After they had supped, they both retired to rest in different rooms, as a sacrifice on the morrow to Bacchus required. In the night, Faunus, or rather Pan, who was enamoured of Omphale, introduced himself into the cave. He went to the bed of the queen, but the lion's skin persuaded him that it was the dress of Hercules, and therefore he repaired to the bed of Hercules, in hopes to find there the object of his affection. The female dress of Hercules deceived him, and he laid himself down by his side. The hero was awakened, and kicked the intruder into the middle of the cave. The noise awoke Omphale, and Faunus was discovered lying on the ground, greatly disappointed and ashamed. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 305, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 4.—Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 17.

Omphalos, a place of Crete, sacred to Jupiter, on the borders of the river Triton. It received its name from the umbilical cord (ὀμφαλος) of Jupiter, which fell there soon after his birth. Diad.

Omphis, a king of India, who delivered himself up to Alexander the Great. Curt. 8, c. 12.

Onessum, or Oenseum, a promontory and town of Dalmatia. Liv. 43, c. 19.

Onarus, a priest of Bacchus, who is supposed to have married Ariadne after she had been abandoned by Theseus. Plut. in Thest.

Onaselmus, a sophist of Athens, who flourished in the reign of Constantine.

Onatas, a famous statuary of Ægina son of Micon. Paus. 8, c. 42.

Onchemites, a wind which blows from Onchesmus, a harbour of Epirus, towards Italy. The word is sometimes spelt Anchesites and Anchemites. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 2.—Ptolemaus.

Onchestus, a town of Bœotia, founded by Onchestus, a son of Neptune. Paus. 9, c. 26.

Onesion, a place of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 25.

Onesicritus, a cynic philosopher of Ægina, who went with Alexander into Asia, and was sent to the Indian Gymnosophists. He wrote a history of the king's life, which has been censured for the romantic, exaggerated, and improbable narrative it gives. It is asserted that Alexander, upon reading it, said that he should be glad to come to life again for some time, to see what reception the historian's work met with. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 9, c. 10.

Onesimus, a Macedonian nobleman, treated with great kindness by the Roman emperors. He wrote an account of the life of the emperor Probus, and of Carus, with great precision and elegance.

Onesippus, a son of Hercules. Apollod.

Onesius, a king of Salamis, who revolted from the Persians.

Onetorides, an Athenian officer, who attempted to murder the garrison which Demetrius had stationed at Athens, &c. Polyæn. 5.

Onium, a place of Peloponnesus, near Corinth.

Onoba, a town near the columns of Hercules. Mela. 3, c. 7.

Onobala, a river of Sicily.

Onochonus, a river of Thessaly, falling into the Peneus. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes. Herodot. 7, c. 106.

Onomacritus, a soothsayer of Athens. It is generally believed that the Greek poem on the Argonautic expedition, attributed to Orpheus, was written by Onomacritus. The elegant poems of Musæus are also, by some, supposed to be the production of his pen. He flourished about 516 years before the Christian era, and was expelled from Athens by Hipparchus, one of the sons of Pisistratus. Herodot. 7, c. 6.—A. Locran, who wrote concerning laws, &c. Aristot. 2, Polit.

Onomarchus, a Phocian, son of Euthycrates and brother of Philomelus, whom he succeeded, as general of his countrymen, in the sacred war. After exploits of valour and perseverance, he was defeated and slain in Thessaly by Philip of Macedonia, who ordered his body to be ignominiously hung up, for the sacrifice offered to the temple of Delphi. He died 353 B.C. Arist. Pol. 5, c. 4.—Diod. 16.—A man to whose care Antigonus entrusted the keeping of Eumeas. C. Nep. in Eum.

Onomastorides, a Lacedæmonian ambassador sent to Darius, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Onomastus, a freedman of the emperor Otho. Tacit.

Onophas, one of the seven Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. Ctesias.—An officer in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece.

Onosander, a Greek writer, whose book De Imperatoris Institutione has been edited by Schwebel, with a French translation, fol. Norimb. 1752.

Onythes, a friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 514.

Opalia, festivals celebrated by the Romans, in honour of Ops, on the 14th of the calends of January.

Ophélas, a general of Cyrene, defeated by Agathocles.

Opholtes, a son of Lycurgus king of Thrace. He is the same as Archemorus. Vid. Archemorus.

The father of Euryalus, whose friendship with Nisus is proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 203.—One of the companions of Acontes, changed into a dolphin by Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 8.

Ophensis, a town of Africa. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 50.

Ophides, an island on the coast of Arabia, so called from the great number of serpents found there. It belonged to the Egyptian kings, and was considered valuable for the topaz it produced. Diod. 3.

Ophias, a patronymic given to Combe, as daughter of Ophius, an unknown person. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 382.

Ophioneus, was an ancient soothsayer in the age of Aristodemus. He was born blind.

Ophis, a small river of Arcadia, which falls into the Alpheus.

Ophissus, the ancient name of Rhodes.—A small island near Crete.—A town of Sarmatia.

—An island near the Baleares, so called from the number of serpents which it produced (opus, serpens). It is now called Formentera.

Ophrynum, a town of Troas on the Hellespont. Hector had a grove there. Strab. 13.

Opici, the ancient inhabitants of Campania, from whose mean occupations the word Opicus has been used to express disgrace. Juv. 3, v. 207.

Opillus, a grammarian who flourished about 94 years before Christ. He wrote a book called Libri Musarum.

L. Optimus, a Roman who made himself consul in opposition to the interests and efforts of the Gracchi. He showed himself a most inveterate enemy to C. Gracchus and his adherents, and behaved, during his consulship, like a dictator. He was accused of bribery, and banished. He died of want at Dyrrachium. Cic. pro Sext. Planc. & in Pis. Plin.—A Roman, who killed one of the Cimbric in single combat.—A rich usurer at Rome in the age of Horace, 2, sat. 3, v. 142.

Opis, a town on the Tigris, afterwards called Antiochia. Xenoph. Anab. 2.—A nymph who was among Diana's attendants. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 532 & 867.—A town near the mouth of the Tigris.—One of Cyrene's attendants. Virg. G. 4, v. 343.

Opiter, a Roman consul, &c.
Opitergini, a people near Aquileia, on the Adriatic. Their chief city was called Opitergum, now Odessa. Lucan. 4, v. 416.

Opites, a native of Argos, killed by Hector in the Trojan war. Homer. Il.

Oppia, a vestal virgin, buried alive for her incontinence.

Oppia lex, by C. Oppius the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman should wear above half an ounce of gold, have party-coloured garments, or be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's distance, unless it was to celebrate some sacred festivals or solemnities. This famous law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in distressed circumstances, created discontent, and, 18 years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the assembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato opposed it strongly, and made many satirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to solicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had presented their petition to the assembly, answered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had such an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was instantly abrogated with the unanimous consent of all the comitia, Cato alone excepted. Liv. 33 & 34.—Cic. de Orat. 3.

Oppianus, a Greek poet of Cilicia in the second century. His father's name was Agesilius, and his mother's Zenodora. He wrote some poems, celebrated for their elegance and sublimity. Two of his poems are now extant, five books on fishing called aleuticon, and four on hunting called cynageticon. The emperor Caracalla was so pleased with his poetry, that he gave him a piece of gold for every verse of his cynageticon; from which circumstance the poem received the name of the golden verses of Oppian. The poet died of the plague in the 30th year of his age. His countrymen raised statues to his honour, and engraved on his tomb that the gods had hastened to call back Oppian in the flower of youth, only because he had already excelled all mankind. The best edition of his works is that of Schneider, 8vo, Argent. 1776.

Oppidius, a rich old man introduced by Horace, 2, sat. 3, v. 168, as wisely dividing his possessions among his two sons, and warning them against those follies and that extravagance which he believed he saw rising in them.

C. Oppius, a friend of Julius Cæsar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus, and of Pompey the Great. In the latter he paid not much regard to historical facts, and took every opportunity to defame Pompey, to extol the character of his patron Cæsar. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars, which some attribute to Cæsar, and others to A. Hirtius. Tacit. Ann. 12.—Suet. in Cæs. 53.—An officer sent by the Romans against Mithridates. He met with ill success, and was sent in chains to the king, &c.—A Roman who saved his aged father from the dagger of the triumvirate.

Ops (opis), a daughter of Cælus and Terra, the same as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Thya, Tellus, Proserpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worship which was paid to these apparently several deities was offered merely to one and the same person, mother of the gods. The word Ops seems to be derived from Opus; because the goddess, who is the same as the earth, gives nothing without laborem. Tatius built her temple at Rome. She was generally represented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering assistance to the helpless, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her festivals were called Opalia, &c. Varro de L. L. 4.—Dionys. Hal. 2, &c.—Tibull. el. 4, v. 68.—Plin. 19, c. 6.

Optatus, one of the fathers, whose works were edited by Du Pin, fol. Paris, 1700.

Optimus Maximus, epithets given to Jupiter to denote his greatness, omnipotence, and supreme goodness. Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 25.

Opus (opuntis), a city of Locris, on the Asopus, destroyed by an earthquake. Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Liv. 28, c. 7.

Orā, a town in India, taken by Alexander.—One of Jupiter's mistresses.

Oraculum, an answer of the gods to the questions of men, or the place where those answers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were supposed to be the will of the gods themselves, and they were consulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. To make peace or war, to introduce a change of government, to plant a colony, to enact laws, to raise an edifice, to marry, were sufficient reasons to consult the will of the gods. Mankind, in consulting them, showed that they wished to pay implicit obedience to the command of the divinity, and, when they had been favoured with an answer, they acted with more spirit and with more vigour, conscious that the undertaking had met with the sanction and approbation of heaven. In this, therefore, it will not appear wonderful that so many places were sacred to oracular purposes. The small province of Bœotia could once boast of her 25 oracles, and Peloponnesus of the same number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in process of time, heroes were admitted to enjoy the same privileges; and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antinous were soon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The most celebrated oracles of antiquity were those of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon, &c. Vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon. The temple of Delphi seemed to claim a superiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were so great, that not only private persons, but even kings and numerous armies, made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. A priestess at Delphi (Vid. Pythia) was permitted to pronounce the oracles of the god, and her delivery of the answers was always attended with acts of apparent madness and desperate fury. Not only women, but even doves, were the ministers of the temple of Dodona; and the suppliant votary was often startled to hear his questions readily answered by the decayed trunk or the spreading branches of a neighbouring oak. Ammon conveyed his answers in a plain and open manner; but Amphiarus required many ablutions and preparatory ceremonies, and he generally communicated his oracles to his suppliants in dreams and visions. Sometimes the first words that were heard, after issuing from the temple, were deemed the answers of the oracles, and sometimes the nodding or shaking of the head of the statue, the motions of fishes in a neighbouring lake, or their reluctance in accepting the food which was offered to them, were as strong and valid as the most express and the minutest explanations. The answers were also sometimes given in verse, or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obscure, and often the cause of disaster to such as consulted them. Croesus, when he consulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that, if he crossed the Halys, he should destroy a great empire; he supposed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Credo te, Aciada, Romanos vincere posse, which Pyrrhus received when he wished to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, by a favourable interpretation for himself, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered by the oracle of Delphi to beware of 73 years; but the pleasing idea that he should live to that age, rendered him careless, and he was soon convinced of his mistake, when Galba, in his 73rd year, had the presumption to dethrone him. It is a question among the learned whether the oracles were given by the inspiration of evil spirits, or whether they proceeded from the imposture of the priests. Imposture, however, and forgery cannot long flourish, and falsehood becomes its own destroyer; and, on the contrary, it is well known how much confidence an enlightened age, therefore, much more the credulous and the superstitious, place upon dreams and romantic stories. Some have strongly believed that all the oracles of the earth ceased at the birth of Christ, but the supposition is false. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline; but they remained in repute, and were consulted, though perhaps not so frequently, till the fourth century, when christianity began to triumph over paganism. The oracles often suffered themselves to be bribed. Alexander did it, but it is well known that Lysander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who first mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt, has been severely treated for his remarks by the historian Plutarch. Demosthenes is also a witness of the corruption, and he observed that the oracles of Greece were servilely subservient to the will and pleasure of Philip king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expresses it by the word φιλαρκεσειν. If some of the Greeks, and other European and Asiatic countries, paid so much attention to oracles, and were so fully persuaded of their veracity, and even divinity, many of their leading men and of their philosophers were apprised of their deceit, and paid no regard to the command of priests, whom money could corrupt, and interposition silence. The Egyptians showed themselves the most superstitious of mankind, by their blind acquiescence to the imposition of the priests, who persuaded them that the safety and happiness of their life depended upon the mere motions of an ox, or the tameness of a crocodile. Hom. Il. Od. 10.—Herodot. 1 & 2.—Xenoph. Memor.—Strab. 5, 7, &c.—Paus. 1, &c.—Plut. de Defect. Orac. de Ages. De Her. Maligna.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 19.—Justin. 24, c. 6.—Liv. 37.—Elian. V. H. 6.—C. Nep. in Lys.—Aristoph. in Equit. & Plut.—Demost. Phil.—Ovid. Met. 1.

ORÆA, a small country of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 39.—Certain solemn sacrifices of fruits offered in the four seasons of the year, to obtain mild and temperate weather. They were offered to the goddesses who presided over the seasons, who attended upon the sun, and who received divine worship at Athens.

ORASUS, a man who killed Ptolemy the son of Pyrrhus.

ORATES, a river of European Scythia. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 47. As this river is not now known, Vossius reads Cretes, a river which is found in Scythia. Val. Flacc. 4, v. 719.—Thucyd. 4.

ORBELUS, a mountain of Thrace or Macedonia. ORBILIUS PUPILLUS, a grammarian of Beneventum, who was the first instructor of the poet Horace. He came to Rome in the consulship of Cicero, and there, as a public teacher, acquired more fame than money. He was naturally of a severe disposition, of which his pupils often felt the effects. He lived almost to his 100th year, and lost his memory some time before his death. Suet. de Illust. Gr. 9.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 71.

ORBITANUM, a town of the Samnites. Liv. 24, c. 20.

ORBONA, a mischievous goddess at Rome, who, as it was supposed, made children die. Her temple at Rome was near that of the gods Larus. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 25.—Plin. 2, c. 7.

ORODES, islands on the northern coasts of Britain, now called the Orkneys. They were unknown till Britain was discovered to be an island by Agricola, who v. 2, there as governor. Tacit. in Agric.—Juv. 2, v. 161.

Orchalis, an eminence of Bœotia, near Haliartus, called also Alpeocis. Plin. in Lys.

Orchæmus, a king of Assyria, father of Leucothoe by Eurynome. He buried his daughter alive for her amours with Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 212.

Orchis lex, by Orchis the tribune, A.U.C. 566. It was enacted to limit the number of guests that were to be admitted at an entertainment; and it also enforced that, during supper, which was the chief meal among the Romans, the doors of every house should be left open.

Orchoménus, or Orchoménium, a town of Bœotia, at the west of the lake Copais. It was anciently called Minyeia, and from that circumstance the inhabitants were often called Minyæes of Orchomenos. There was at Orchomenos a celebrated temple, built by Etæocles son of Cephus, sacred to the Graces, who were from thence called the Orchomenian goddesses. The inhabitants founded Teos in conjunction with the Ionians, under the sons of Codrus. Plin. 4, c. 8.—Herodot. 1, c. 146.—Paus. 9, c. 37.—Strab. 9.—A town of Arcadia, at the north of Mantinea. Homer. Il. 2.—A town of Thessaly, with a river of the same name. Strab.—A son of Lycaon king of Arcadia, who gave his name to a city of Arcadia, &c. Paus. 8.—A son of Minyas king of Bœotia, who gave the name of Orchomenos to his subjects. He died without issue, and the crown devolved to Clymenus the son of Presbon, &c. Paus. 9, c. 36.

Orcus, one of the names of the god of hell, the same as Pluto, though confounded by some with Charon. He had a temple at Rome. The word Orcus is generally used to signify the infernal regions. Horat. 1, od. 20, &c.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 502, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 116.

Orcynia, a place of Cappadocia, where Eumenides was defeated by Antigonus.

Ordessus, a river of Scythia, which falls into the Ister. Herodot.

Ordovices, the people of North Wales in Britain, mentioned by Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 53.

Oræades, nymphs of the mountains (opos, mont), daughters of Phoroneus and Hecate. Some call them Orestiades, and give them Jupiter for father. They generally attended upon Diana, and accompanied her in hunting. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 504.—Homer. Il. 6.—Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 787.

Oreæ, a son of Hercules and Chryseis.

Orestes, a people of Epirus. They received their name from Orestes, who fled to Epirus when cured of his insanity. Lucan. 3, v. 249.—Of Macedonia. Liv. 33, c. 34.

Orestes, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, young Orestes was saved from his mother's dagger by means of his sister Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, who was king of Phocis, and who had married a sister of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who educated him with his son Pyllades. The two young princes soon became acquainted, and, from their familiarity, arose the most inviolable attachment and friendship. When Orestes was arrived to the years of manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra, and her adulterer

Ægisthus. The manner in which he committed this murder is variously reported. According to Æschylus he was commissioned by Apollo to avenge his father, and, therefore, he introduced himself, with his friend Pyllades, at the court of Mycenæ, pretending to bring the news of the death of Orestes from king Strophius. He was at first received with coldness, and when he came into the presence of Ægisthus, who wished to inform himself of the particulars, he murdered him, and soon after Clytemnestra shared the adulterer's fate. Euripides and Sophocles mention the same circumstance. Ægisthus was assassinated after Clytemnestra, according to Sophocles; and, in Euripides, Orestes is represented as murdering the adulterer, while he offers a sacrifice to the nymphs. This murder, as the poet mentions, irritates the guards, who were present, but Orestes appeases their fury by telling them who he is, and immediately he is acknowledged king of the country. Afterwards he stabs his mother, at the instigation of his sister Electra, after he has upbraided her for her infidelity and cruelty to her husband. Such meditated murders receive the punishment which, among the ancients, was always supposed to attend parricide. Orestes is tormented by the Furies, and exiles himself to Argos, where he is still pursued by the avengeful goddesses. Apollo himself purifies him, and he is acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites, whom Minerva herself instituted on this occasion, according to the narration of the poet Æschylus, who flatters the Athenians in his tragical story, by representing them as passing judgment even upon the gods themselves. According to Pausanias, Orestes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Trozæne, where still was seen a large stone at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was also, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Orestes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of insanity. These different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who says that Orestes, after the murder of his mother, consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the persecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece Diana's statue, which was in the Tauric Chersonesus, and which, as it is reported by some, had fallen down from heaven. This was an arduous enterprise. The king of the Chersonesus always sacrificed on the altars of the goddess all such as entered the borders of his country. Orestes and his friend were both carried before Thoas the king of the place, and they were doomed to be sacrificed. Iphigenia was then priestess of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate these strangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn something about a country which had given her birth. Vid. Iphigenia. She even interested herself in their misfortunes, and offered to spare the life of one of them provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendship more truly displayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex l'ont. 3, el. 2:

Ire jubet Pyllades carum moriturus Orestem, Ilic negat; inque vicem pugnat uterque mori.

At last Pyllades gave way to the pressing entreaties of his friend, and consented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. These were addressed to Orestes himself, and, therefore, these circumstances soon led to a total discovery of the connections of the priestess with the man whom she was going to immolate. Iphigenia was convinced that he was her brother Orestes, and, when the causes of their journey had been explained, she resolved, with the two friends, to fly from Chersonesus, and to carry away the statue of Diana. Their flight was discovered, and Thoas prepared to pursue them; but Minerva interfered, and told him that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. Some suppose that Orestes came to Cappadocia from Chersonesus, and that there he left the statue of Diana at Comana. Others contradict this tradition, and, according to Pausanias, the statue of Diana Orthia was the same as that which had been carried away from the Chersonesus. Some also suppose that Orestes brought it to Aricia, in Italy, where Diana's worship was established. After these celebrated adventures, Orestes ascended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect security, and married Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his sister to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Orestes with Hermione is a matter of dispute among the ancients. All are agreed that she had been promised to the son of Agamemnon, but Menelaus had married her to Neoptolemus the son of Achilles, who had shown himself so truly interested in his cause during the Trojan war. The marriage of Hermione with Neoptolemus displeased Orestes; he remembered that she had been early promised to him, and therefore he resolved to recover her by force or artifice. This he effected by causing Neoptolemus to be assassinated, or assassinating him himself. According to Ovid's epistle of Hermione to Orestes, Hermione had always been faithful to her first lover, and even it was by her persuasion that Orestes removed her from the house of Neoptolemus. Hermione was dissatisfied with the partiality of Neoptolemus for Andromache, and her attachment for Orestes was increased. Euripides, however, and others, speak differently of Hermione's attachment to Neoptolemus: she loved him so tenderly, that she resolved to murder Andromache, who seemed to share, in a small degree, the affection of her husband. She was ready to perpetrate the horrid deed when Orestes came into Epirus, and she was easily persuaded by the foreign prince to withdraw herself, in her husband's absence, from a country which seemed to contribute so much to her sorrows. Orestes, the better to secure the affections of Hermione, assassinated Neoptolemus [Vid. Neoptolemus], and retired to his kingdom of Argos. His old age was crowned with peace and security, and he died in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his son Tisamenus by Hermione. Three years after, the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, and banished the descendants of Menelaus from the throne of Argos. Orestes died in Arcadia, as some suppose, by the bite of a serpent; and the Lacedæmonians, who had become his subjects at the death of Menelaus, were directed by an oracle to bring his bones to Sparta. They were some time after discovered at Tegea, and his stature appeared to be seven cubits, according to the traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others. The friendship of Orestes and of Pylades became proverbial, and the two friends received divine honours among the Scythians, and were worshipped in temples. Paus. 1, 2, 4, &c.—Pater. 1, c. 1 & 3.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Strab. 9 & 13.—*Ovid. ORÆSTEUM, a town of Arcadia, about 18 miles from Sparta. It was founded by Orestheus, a son of Lycaon, and originally called Oresthesium, and afterwards Oræsteum, from Orestes the son of Agamemnon, who resided there for some time after the murder of Clytemnestra. Paus. 8, c. 8.—Euripid.

ORÆTIDÆ, the descendants or subjects of Orestes the son of Agamemnon. They were driven from the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ, and came to settle in a country which, from them, was called Oræstida, at the south-west of Macedonia. Some suppose that that part of Greece originally received its name from Orestes, who fled and built there a city, which gave its founder's name to the whole province. Thucyd. 2.—Liv. 31.

ORGIA, festivals in honour of Bacchus. They are the same as the Bacchanalia, Dionysia, &c., which were celebrated by the ancients to commemorate the triumph of Bacchus in India. Vid. Dionysia.

ORIBASUS, a celebrated physician, greatly esteemed by the emperor Julian, in whose reign he flourished. He abridged the works of Galenus, and of all the most respectable writers on physics, at the request of the emperor. He accompanied Julian into the east, but his skill proved ineffectual in attempting to cure the fatal wound which his benefactor had received. After Julian's death, he fell into the hands of the barbarians. The best edition of his works is that of Dundas, 4to, L. ORICUM, or ORICUS, a town of Epirus, on the Ionian sea, founded by a colony from Colchis, according to Pliny. It was called Dardania, because Helenus and Andromache, natives of Troy or Dardania, reigned over the country after the Trojan war. It had a celebrated harbour, and was greatly esteemed by the Romans on account of its situation, but it was not well defended. The tree which produces the turpentine grew there in abundance. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 136.—Liv. 24, c. 40.—Plin. 2, c. 83.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 1, &c.—Lucean. 3, v. 187.

Orions, in ancient geography, is taken for all the most eastern parts of the world, such as Parthia, India, Assyria, &c.

Origen, a Greek writer, as much celebrated for the easiness of his manners, his humility, and modesty, as for his learning and the sublimity of his genius. He was surnamed Adamantus, from his assiduity; and became so rigid a christian that he made himself a eunuch, by following the literal sense of a passage in the Greek testament, which speaks of the voluntary eunuchs of Christ. He suffered martyrdom in his 69th year, A.C. 254. His works were excellent and numerous, and contained a number of homilies, commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, and different treatises, besides the Hexapla, so called from its being divided into six columns, the first of which contained the Hebrew text, the second the same text in Greek characters, the third the Greek version of the Septuagint, the fourth that of Aquila, the fifth that of Symmachus, and the sixth Theodoion's Greek version. This famous work first gave the hint for the compilation of our Polyglot Bibles. The works of Origen have been learnedly edited by the Benedictine monks, though the whole is not yet completed, in 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1733, 1740, and 1759. The Hexapla was published in 8vo, at Lipsa. 1769, by Cor. Frid. Bahrt.

Origo, a courtesan in the age of Horace. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 55.

Orinus, a river of Sicily.

Oriobates, a general of Darius at the battle of Arbela, &c. Curt. 4.

Orion, a celebrated giant sprung from the nine of Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury. These three gods, as they travelled over Boeotia, met with great hospitality from Hyrieus, a peasant of the country, who was ignorant of their dignity and character. They were entertained with whatever the cottage afforded, and, when Hyrieus had discovered that they were gods, because Neptune told him to fill up Jupiter's cup with wine, after he had served it before the rest, the old man welcomed them by the voluntary sacrifice of an ox. Pleased with his piety, the gods promised to grant him whatever he required, and the old man, who had lately lost his wife, to whom he had promised never to marry again, desired them that, as he was childless, they would give him a son without another marriage. The gods consented, and they ordered him to bury in the ground the skin of the victim, into which they had all three made water. Hyrieus did as they commanded, and when, nine months after, he dug for the skin, he found in it a beautiful child, whom he called Orion, ab urina. The name was changed into Orion, by the corruption of one letter, as Ovid says, Perdidit antiquum littera prima sonum. Orion soon rendered himself celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants, and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic stature, however, displeased CEnopion king of Chios, whose daughter Hero or Merope he demanded in marriage. The king, not to deny him openly, promised to make him his son-in-law as soon as he delivered his island from wild beasts. This task, which CEnopion deemed impracticable, was soon performed by

Orion, who eagerly demanded his reward. CEnopion, on pretence of complying, intoxicated his illustrious guest, and put out his eyes on the seashore, where he had laid himself down to sleep. Orion, finding himself blind when he awoke, was conducted by the sound to a neighbouring forge, where he placed one of the workmen on his back, and by his directions, went to a place where the rising sun was seen with the greatest advantage. Here he turned his face towards the luminary, and, as it is reported, he immediately recovered his eyesight, and hastened to punish the perfidious cruelty of CEnopion. It is said that Orion was an excellent workman in iron, and that he fabricated a subterraneous palace for Vulcan. Aurora, whom Venus had inspired with love, carried him away to the island of Delos, to enjoy his company with the greater security; but Diana, who was jealous of this, destroyed Orion with her arrows. Some say that Orion had provoked Diana's resentment, by offering violence to Opis, one of her female attendants, or, according to others, because he had attempted the virtue of the goddess herself. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a scorpion, which the earth produced, to punish his vanity in boasting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. Some say that Orion was the son of Neptune and Euryale, and that he had received from his father the privilege and power of walking over the sea without wetting his feet. Others made him son of Terra, like the rest of the giants. He had married a nymph called Sida before his connection with the family of CEnopion; but Sida was the cause of her own death, by boasting herself fairer than Juno. According to Diodorus, Orion was a celebrated hunter, superior to the rest of mankind by his strength and uncommon stature. He built the port of Zancle, and fortified the coast of Sicily against the frequent inundations of the sea, by heaping a mound of earth, called Pelorum, on which he built a temple to the gods of the sea. After death, Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the constellations still bears his name. The constellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the bull, is composed of 17 stars, in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion to the poets often to speak of Orion's sword. As the constellation of Orion, which rises about the 9th day of March, and sets about the 21st of June, is generally supposed to be accompanied, at its rising, with great rains and storms, it has acquired the epithet of aquosus, given it by Virgil. Orion was buried in the island of Delos, and the monument which the people of Tanagra in Boeotia showed, as containing the remains of this celebrated hero, was nothing but a cenotaph. The daughters of Orion distinguished themselves as much as their father, and when the oracle had declared that Boeotia should not be delivered from a dreadful pestilence before two of Jupiter's children were immolated on the altars, they joyfully accepted the offer, and voluntarily sacrificed themselves for the good of their country. Their names were Menippe and Metioche. They had been carefully educated by Diana, and Venus and Minerva had made them very rich and valuable presents. The deities of hell were struck at the patriotism of the two females, and immediately two stars were seen to arise from the earth, which still smoked with the blood, and they were placed in the heavens in the form of a crown. According to Ovid, their bodies were burned by the Thebans, and from their ashes arose two persons whom the gods soon after changed into constellations. Diod. 4.—Homer. Od. 5. v. 121. l. 11, v. 309.—Virg. Æn. 3. v. 517.—Apollod. 1. c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 8 & 13. Jast. 5, &c.—Hygin. fab. 125, & *P. Oroanda, a town of Pisidia, now Haviran. Liv. 38, c. 18.

Orobia, a town of Eubœa.

Orobili, a people of Italy, near Milan.

Orodes, a prince of Parthia, who murdered his brother Mithridates, and ascended his throne. He defeated Crassus the Roman triumvir, and poured melted gold down the throat of his fallen enemy, to reproach him for his avarice and ambition. He followed the interest of Cassius and Brutus at Philippi. It is said that, when Orodes became old and infirm, his 30 children applied to him, and disputed in his presence their right to the succession. Phraates, the eldest of them, obtained the crown from his father, and to hasten him out of the world, he attempted to poison him. The poison had no effect; and Phraates, still determined on his father's death, strangled him with his own hands, about 37 years before the christian era. Orodes had then reigned about 50 years. Justin. 42, c. 4.—Patere. 2, c. 30.—Another king of Parthia, murdered for his cruelty. Josephus. 18, Jud.—A son of Artabanus king of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 33.—One of the friends of Æneas in Italy, killed by Mezentius. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 732, &c.

Orotes, a Persian governor of Sardis, famous for his cruel murder of Polycrates. He died B.C. 521. Herodot.

Oromedon, a lofty mountain in the island of Cos. Theocrit. 7.—A giant. Propert. 3, cl. 7, v. 48.

Orontas, a relation of Artaxerxes, sent to Cyprus, where he made peace with Evagoras, &c. Polyan. 7.

Orontes, a satrap of Mysia, B.C. 385, who rebelled from Artaxerxes, &c. Id.—A governor of Armenia. Id.—A king of the Lycians during the Trojan war, who followed Æneas, and perished in a shipwreck. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 217. l. 6, 34.—A river of Syria (now Assi), rising in Carolysyria, and falling after a rapid and troubled course, into the Mediterranean, below Antioch. According to Strabo, who mentions some fabulous accounts concerning it, the Orontes disappeared under ground for the space of five miles. The word Orontes is often used as Syrius. Dionys. Perieg.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 248.—Strab. 16.—Paus. 8, c. 20.

Orophernes, a man who seized the kingdom of Cappadocia. He died B.C. 154.

Oropus, a town of Boœtia, on the borders of Attica, near the Euripus, which received its name from Oropus, a son of Macedon. It was the frequent cause of quarrels between the Boœotians and the Athenians, whence some have called it one of the cities of Attica, and was at last confirmed in the possession of the Athenians by Philip king of Macedon. Amphiaras had a temple there. Paus. 1, c. 34.—Strab. 9.—A small town of Eubœa.—Another in Macedonia.

Orosius, a Spanish writer, A.D. 416, who published a universal history, in seven books, from the creation to his own time, in which, though learned, diligent, and pious, he betrayed a great ignorance of the knowledge of historical facts, and of chronology. The best edition is that of Havercamp, 4to. L. Bat. 1767.

Orospeða, a mountain of Spain. Strab. 3.

Orpheus, a son of Ægeus by the muse Calliope. Some suppose him to be the son of Apollo, to render his birth more illustrious. He received a lyre from Apollo, or, according to some, from Mercury, upon which he played with such a masterly hand, that even the most rapid rivers ceased to flow, the savage beasts of the forest forgot their wildness, and the mountains moved to listen to his song. All nature seemed charmed and animated, and the nymphs were his constant companions. Eurydice was the only one who made a deep impression on the melodious musician, and their nuptials were celebrated. Their happiness, however, was short; Aristæus became enamoured of Eurydice, and, as she fled from her pursuer, a serpent, that was lurking in the grass, bit her foot, and she died of the poisonous wound. Her loss was severely felt by Orpheus, and he resolved to recover her, or perish in the attempt. With his lyre in his hand, he entered the infernal regions, and gained an easy admission to the palace of Pluto. The king of hell was charmed with the melody of his strains; and, according to the beautiful expressions of the poets, the wheel of Ixion stopped, the stone of Sisypus stood still, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirst, and even the Furies relented. Pluto and Proserpine were moved with his sorrow, and consented to restore him Eurydice, provided he forbore looking behind till he had come to the extremest borders of hell. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions of the air, when he forgot his promises, and turned back to look at his long-lost Eurydice. He saw her, but she instantly vanished from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refused admission; and the only comfort he could find, was to soothe his grief at the sound of his musical instrument, in grottos, or on the mountains. He totally separated himself from the society of mankind; and the Thracian women, whom he had offended by his coldness to their amorous passion, or, according to others, by his unnatural gratifications and impure indulgencies, attacked him while they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus, and after they had torn his body to pieces, they threw his head into the Hebrus, which still articulated the words "Eurydice! Eurydice!" as it was carried down the stream into the Aegean sea. Orpheus was one of the Argonauts, of which celebrated expedition he wrote a poetical account, still extant. This is doubted by Aristotle, who says, according to Cicero, that there never existed an Orpheus, but that the poems which pass under his name are the compositions of a Pythagorean philosopher named Cecrops. According to some of the moderns, the Argonautica, and the other poems attributed to Orpheus, are the production of the pen of Onomacritus, a poet who lived in the age of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens. Pausanias, however, and Diodorus Siculus, speak of Orpheus as a great poet and musician, who rendered himself equally celebrated by his knowledge of the art of war, by the extent of his understanding, and by the laws which he enacted. Some maintain that he was killed by a thunderbolt. He was buried at Pieria in Macedonia, according to Apollodorus. The inhabitants of Dion boasted that his tomb was in their city, and the people of mount Libethus, in Thrace, claimed the same honour, and further observed, that the nightingales, which built their nests near his tomb, sang with greater melody than all other birds. Orpheus, as some report, after death received divine honours, the muses gave an honourable burial to his remains, and his lyre became one of the constellations in the heavens. The best edition of Orpheus is that of Gesner, 8vo, Lips. 1764. Diod. 1, &c.—Paus. 1, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, &c.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 38.—Apollon. 1.—*Virg. Ortōna. Vid. Artona.

Ortygia, a grove near Ephesus. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 16.—A small island of Sicily, within the bay of Syracuse, which formed one of the four quarters of that great city. It was in this island that the celebrated fountain Arethusa arose. Ortygia is now the only part remaining of the once famed Syracuse, about two miles in circumference, and inhabited by 18,000 souls. It has suffered, like the towns on the eastern coast, by the eruptions of Ætna. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 604.—Hom. Od. 15, v. 403.—An ancient name of the island of Delos. Some suppose that it received this name from Latona, who fled thither when changed into a quail (ὀρτυξ) by Jupiter, to avoid the pursuit of Juno. Diana was called Ortygia, as being born there; as also Apollo. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 651. Fast. 5, v. 692.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 124.

Ortygius, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 573.

Orus, or Horus, one of the gods of the Egyptians, son of Osiris and Isis. He assisted his mother in avenging his father, who had been murdered by Typhon. Orus was skilled in medicine, he was acquainted with futurity, and he made the good and the happiness of his subjects the sole object of his government. He was the emblem of the sun among the Egyptians, and he was generally represented as an infant, swathed in variegated clothes. In one hand he held a staff, which terminated in the head of a hawk, in the other a whip with three thongs. Herodot. 2.—Plut. de Isid. & Os.—Diod. 1.—The first king of Troezen. Paus. 2, c. 30.

Osca, a town of Spain, now Huesca, in Arragon. Liv. 34, c. 10.

Oschophōria, a festival observed by the Athenians. It receives its name αὐτὸ τοῦ φέρειν τὰς ὄσχα, from carrying boughs hung up with grapes, called ὄσχα. Its original institution is thus mentioned by Plut. in Thes. Theseus, at his return from Crete, forgot to hang out the white sail by which his father was to be apprised of his success. This neglect was fatal to Aegeus, who threw himself into the sea and perished. Theseus no sooner reached the land, than he sent a herald to inform his father of his safe return, and in the mean time he began to make the sacrifices which he vowed when he first set sail from Crete. The herald, on his entrance into the city, found the people in great agitation. Some lamented the king's death, while others, elated at the sudden news of the victory of Theseus, crowned the herald with garlands in demonstration of their joy. The herald carried back the garlands on his staff to the sea-shore, and after he had waited till Theseus had finished his sacrifice, he related the melancholy story of the king's death. Upon this, the people ran in crowds to the city, showing their grief by cries and lamentations. From that circumstance, therefore, at the feast of the Oschophoria, not the herald but his staff is crowned with garlands, and all the people that are present always exclaim ἄελεν, ἴσθ, ἴσθ, the first of which expresses haste, and the other a consternation or depression of spirits. The historian further mentions that Theseus, when he went to Crete, did not take with him the usual number of virgins, but that, instead of two of them, he filled up the number with two youths of his acquaintance, whom he made pass for women, by disguising their dress, and by using them to the ointment and perfumes of women, as well as by a long and successful imitation of their voice. The imposition succeeded; their sex was not discovered in Crete, and when Theseus had triumphed over the Minotaur, he, with these two youths, led a procession with branches in their hands, in the same habit which is still used at the celebration of the Oschophoria. The branches which were carried were in honour of Bacchus or of Ariadne, or because they returned in autumn when the grapes were ripe. Besides this procession, there was also a race exhibited, in which only young men whose parents were both alive were permitted to engage. It was usual for them to run from the temple of Bacchus to that of Minerva, which was on the sea-shore. The place where they stopped was called ὄσχοφορίου, because the boughs which they carried in their hands were deposited there. The reward of the conqueror was a cup called πεντα πλοα, five-fold, because it contained a mixture of five different things—wine, honey, cheese, meal, and oil. Plut. in Thes.

Osci, a people between Campania and the country of the Volsci, who assisted Turnus against Aeneas. Some suppose that they are the same as the Opici, the word Osci being a diminutive or abbreviation of the other. The language, the plays, and ludicrous expressions of this nation, are often mentioned by the ancients, and from their indigent tendency some suppose the word obscenium (quasi oscenium) is derived. *Tacit. Osous, a general of the fleet of the emperor Otho. Tacit. 1, Hist. 17.

Osi, a people of Germany. Tacit. G. 28 & 43.

Osinius, a king of Clusium, who assisted Aeneas against Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 655.

Osiris, a great deity of the Egyptians, son of Jupiter and Niobe. All the ancients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god, but they all agree that, as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilize his subjects, to polish their morals, to give them good and salutary laws, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accomplished a reform at home, Osiris resolved to go and spread cultivation in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Isis, and of her faithful minister Hermes or Mercury. The command of his troops at home was left to the trust of Hercules, a warlike officer. In this expedition Osiris was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis, Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Æthiopia, where his army was increased by the addition of the Satyrs, a hairy race of monsters, who made dancing and playing on musical instruments their chief study. He afterwards passed through Arabia, and visited the greatest part of the kingdoms of Asia and Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worship of the gods, and a reverence for the wisdom of a supreme being. At his return home Osiris found the minds of his subjects roused and agitated. His brother Typhon had raised seditions, and endeavoured to make himself popular. Osiris, whose sentiments were always of the most pacific nature, endeavoured to convince his brother of his ill conduct, but he fell a sacrifice to the attempt. Typhon murdered him in a secret apartment and cut his body to pieces, which were divided among the associates of his guilt. Typhon, according to Plutarch, shut up his brother in a coffer and threw him into the Nile. The inquiries of Isis discovered the body of her husband on the coast of Phœnicia, where it had been conveyed by the waves, but Typhon stole it as it was being carried into Memphis, and he divided it amongst his companions, as was before observed. This cruelty incensed Isis; she revenged her husband's death, and, with her son Orus, she defeated Typhon and the partisans of his conspiracy. She recovered the mangled pieces of her husband's body, the genitals excepted, which the murderer had thrown into the sea; and to render him all the honour which his humanity deserved, she made as many statues of wax as there were mangled pieces of his body. Each statue contained a piece of the flesh of the dead monarch; and Isis, after she had summoned in her presence, one by one, the priests of all the different deities in her dominions, gave them each a statue, intimating that in doing that she had preferred them to all the other communities of Egypt, and she bound them by a solemn oath that they would keep secret that mark of her favour, and endeavour to show their sense of it by establishing a form of worship and paying divine honours to their prince. They were further directed to choose whatever animals they pleased to represent the person and the divinity of Osiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greatest reverence to that representative of divinity, and to bury it when dead with the greatest solemnity. To render their establishment more popular, each sacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to them to maintain them, and to defray the expenses which necessarily attended their sacrifices and ceremonial rites. That part of the body of Osiris which had not been recovered was treated with more particular attention by Isis, and she ordered that it should receive honours more solemn, and at the same time more mysterious, than the other members. Vid. Phallica. As Osiris had particularly instructed his subjects in cultivating the ground, the priests chose the ox to represent him, and paid the most superstitious veneration to that animal. Vid. Apis. Osiris, according to the opinion of some mythologists, is the same as the sun, and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionysius, a Jupiter, a Pan, &c., is the same as that which Osiris received in the Egyptian temples. Isis also after death received divine honours as well as her husband, and as the ox was the symbol of the sun, or Osiris, so the cow was the emblem of the moon, or of Isis. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the power and greatness of Osiris than this inscription, which has been found on some ancient monuments: Saturn, the youngest of all the gods, was my father: I am Osiris, who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deserts of India, and travelled over the greatest part of the world, and visited the streams of the Ister, and the remote shores of the ocean, diffusing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth. Osiris was generally represented with a cap on his head like a mitre, with two horns; he held a stick in his left hand, and in his right a whip with three thongs. Sometimes he appears with the head of a hawk, as that bird, from its quick and piercing eyes, is a proper emblem of the sun. *Plut. in Isis. & Os.—Herodot. 2, c. 144.—Diod. 1.—Homer. Ossa, a lofty mountain of Thessaly, once the residence of the Centaurs. It was formerly joined to mount Olympus, but Hercules, as some report, separated them, and made between them the celebrated valley of Tempe. This separation of the two mountains was more probably effected by an earthquake, which happened, as fabulous accounts represent, about 1885 years before the christian era. Ossa was one of those mountains which the giants, in their wars against the gods, heaped up one on the other to scale the heavens with more facility. *Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Osteodes, an island near the Lipari isles.

Ostia, a town built on the mouth of the river Tiber by Ancus Martius king of Rome, about 10 miles distant from Rome. It had a celebrated harbour, and was so pleasantly situated, that the Romans generally spent a part of the year there as in a country seat. There was a small tower in the port like the Pharos of Alexandria, built upon the wreck of a large ship which had been sunk there, and which contained the obelisks of Egypt, with which the Roman emperors intended to adorn the capital of Italy. In the age of Strabo the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber had choked the harbour, and added much to the sue of the small islands, which sheltered the ships at the entrance of the river. Ostia, and her harbour called Portus, became gradually separated, and are now at a considerable distance from the sea. Nar. 1, c. 4. l. 3. c. 21.—Liv. 1, c. 33.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Sueton.—Plin.

Otho M. Salvius, a Roman emperor descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. He was one of Nero's favourites, and as such he was raised to the highest offices of the state, and made governor of Pannonia by the interest of Seneca, who wished to remove him from Rome, lest Nero's love for Poppæa should prove his ruin. After Nero's death Otho conciliated the favour of Galba the new emperor; but when he did not gain his point, and when Galba had refused to adopt him as his successor, he resolved to make himself absolute, without any regard to the age and dignity of his friend. The great debts which he had contracted encouraged his avarice, and he caused Galba to be assassinated, and he made himself emperor. He was acknowledged by the senate and the Roman people, but the sudden revolt of Vitellius in Germany rendered his situation precarious, and it was mutually resolved that their respective right to the empire should be decided by arms. Otho obtained three victories over his enemies, but in a general engagement near Brixiellum, his forces were defeated, and he stabbed himself when all hopes of success were vanished, after a reign of about three months, on the 20th of April, A.D. 69. It has been justly observed that the last moments of Otho's life were those of a philosopher. He comforted his soldiers who lamented his fortunes, and he expressed his concern for their safety, when they earnestly solicited to pay him the last friendly offices before he stabbed himself, and he observed that it was better that one man should die, than that all should be involved in ruin for his obstinacy. His nephew was pale and distressed, fearing the anger and haughtiness of the conqueror; but Otho comforted him, and observed that Vitellius would be kind and affectionate to the friends and relations of Otho, since Otho was not ashamed to say, that in the time of their greatest enmity the mother of Vitellius had received every friendly treatment from his hand. He also burnt the letters which, by falling into the hands of Vitellius, might provoke his resentment against those who had favoured the cause of an unfortunate general. These noble and humane sentiments of a man who was the associate of Nero's shameful pleasures, and who stained his hand in the blood of his master, have appeared to some wonderful, and passed for the features of policy, and not of a naturally virtuous and benevolent heart. *Plut. in Vita.—Suet.—Tacit. Othryades, one of the 300 Spartans who fought against 300 Argives, when those two nations disputed their respective right to Thyrea. Two Argives, Alcino and Cronius, and Othryades, survived the battle. The Argives went home to carry the news of their victory, but Othryades, who had been reckoned among the number of the slain, on account of his wounds, recovered himself and carried some of the spoils, of which he had stripped the Argives, into the camp of his countrymen; and after he had raised a trophy, and had written with his own blood, the word vici on his shield, he killed himself, unwilling to survive the death of his countrymen. *Val. P. Ovidius Naso, a celebrated Roman poet, born at Sulmo on the 20th of March, about 43 B.C. As he was intended for the bar, his father sent him early to Rome, and removed him to Athens in the 16th year of his age. The progress of Ovid in the study of eloquence was great, but the father's expectations were frustrated; his son was born a poet, and nothing could deter him from pursuing his natural inclination, though he was often reminded that Homer lived and died in the greatest poverty. Everything he wrote was expressed in poetical numbers, as he himself says, et quod tentabam scribere versus erat. A lively genius and a fertile imagination soon gained him admirers; the learned became his friends; Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace, honoured him with their correspondence, and Augustus patronized him with the most unbounded liberality. These favours, however, were but momentary, and the poet was soon after banished to Tomos, on the Euxine sea, by the emperor. The true cause of this sudden exile is unknown. Some attribute it to a shameful amour with Livia the wife of Augustus, while others support that it arose from the knowledge which Ovid had of the unpardonable incest of the emperor with his daughter Julia. These reasons are, indeed, merely conjectural; the cause was of a very private and very secret nature, of which Ovid himself is afraid to speak, as it arose from error and not from criminality. It was, however, something improper in the family and court of Augustus, as these lines seem to indicate.

*Cur aliquid vidi? Cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudens? cognita culpa nihil est?
Inscius Actæon vixit sine veste Dianam?
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille suis.*

Again,

*Inscia quod crimen viderent lumina plector,
Peccatumque oculis est habuisse meum.*

And in another place,

*Perdidit cum me duo crimina, carmen et error,
Alicuius facti culpa silenda mihi est.*

In his banishment, Ovid betrayed his pusillanimity, and however afflicted and distressed his situation was, yet the flattery and impatience which he showed in his writings are a disgrace to his pen, and expose him more to ridicule than pity. Though he prostituted his pen and his time to adulation, yet the emperor proved deaf to all entreaties, and refused to listen to his most ardent friends at Rome who wished for the return of the poet. Ovid, who undoubtedly wished for a Brutus, to deliver Rome of her tyrannical Augustus, continued his flattery even to meanness; and, when the emperor died, he was so mercenary as to consecrate a temple to the departed tyrant on the shores of the Euxine, where he regularly offered frankincense every morning. Tiberius proved as regardless as his predecessor to the entreaties which were made for Ovid, and the poet died in the seventh or eighth year of his banishment, in the 59th year of his age, A.D. 17, and was buried at Tomos. In the year 1708 of the christian era, the following epitaph was found at Stain, in the modern kingdom of Austria:

Hic situs est vates quem Divi Caesaris ira Augusti patriæ cedere jussit humo.

*Sæpe miser voluit patriis occumbere terris,
Sed frustra! Hunc illi fata dederunt locum.*

This, however, is an imposition, to render celebrated an obscure corner of the world, which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greatest part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoses, in 15 books, are extremely curious, on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate, but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In composing this the poet was more indebted to the then existing traditions, and to the theogony of the ancients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Fasts were divided into 12 books, the same number as the constellations in the zodiac; but of these, six have perished, and the learned world have reason to lament the loss of a poem which must have thrown so much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, festivals and sacrifices, of the ancient Romans, as we may judge from the six that have survived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Tristia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and softness of expression, as also his Elegies on different subjects. The Heroides are nervous, spirited, and diffuse, the poetry is excellent, the language varied, but the expressions are often too wanton and indelicate, a fault which is common in his compositions. His three books of Amorum, and the same number of Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris, are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery descriptions; but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and they are to be read with caution, as they seem to be calculated to corrupt the heart, and sap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus, of the same name, is a satirical performance. Besides these, there are extant some fragments of other poems, and among these some of a tragedy called Mela. The talents of Ovid as a dramatic writer have been disputed, and some have observed that he, who is so often void of sentiment, was not born to shine as a tragedian. Ovid has attempted perhaps too many sorts of poetry at once. (On whatever he has written, he has totally exhausted the subject, and left nothing unsaid. He everywhere paints nature with a masterly hand, and gives strength to the most vulgar expressions. It has been judiciously observed, that his poetry, after his banishment from Rome, was destitute of that spirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compositions. His Fasti are perhaps the best written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love verses, his Heroides, and, after all, his Metamorphoses, which were not totally finished when Augustus sent him into banishment. His Epistles from Pontus are the language of an abject and pusillanimous flatterer. However critics may censure the indelicacy and the inaccuracies of Ovid, it is to be acknowledged that his poetry contains great sweetness and elegance, and, like that of Tibullus, charms the ear and captivates the mind. Ovid married three wives, but of the last alone he speaks with fondness and affection. He had only one daughter, but by which of his wives is unknown; and she herself became mother of two children, by two husbands. The best editions of Ovid's works are those of Burman, 4 vols. 4to, Amst. 1727; of L. Bat. 1670, in 8vo, and of Utrecht, in 12mo, 4 vols. 1713. *Ovid. Oxyrynchus, a town of Egypt on the Nile. Strab.

Ozines, a Persian imprisoned by Cisternis, because he attempted to revolt from Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Ozoles, or Ozolis, a people who inhabited the eastern parts of Ætolia, which were called Ozolia. This tract of territory lay at the north of the bay of Corinth, and extended about 12 miles northward. They received their name from the bad stench (ὄζος) of their bodies and of their clothing, which was the raw hides of wild beasts, or from the offensive smell of the body of Nessus the Centaur, which after death was left to putrefy in the country without the honours of a burial. Some derive it with more propriety from the stench of the stagnated waters in the neighbouring lakes and marshes. According to a fabulous tradition, they received their name from a very different circumstance. During the reign of a son of Deucalion, a bitch brought into the world a stick instead of whelps. The stick was planted in the ground by the king, and it grew up to a large vine and produced grapes, from which the inhabitants of the country were called Ozolia, not from ὄζος, to smell bad, but from ὄζος, a branch or sprout. The name of Ozolis, on account of its indelicate signification, highly displeased the inhabitants, and they exchanged it soon for that of Ætolians. Paus. 10, c. 38.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.

PACATIANUS TITUS JULIUS, a general of the Roman armies, who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, about the latter part of Philip's reign. He was soon after defeated, A.D. 249, and put to death, &c.

Paccius, an insignificant poet in the age of Domitian. Juv. 7, v. 12.

Pacorus, the eldest of the 30 sons of Orodus king of Parthia, sent against Crassus, whose army he defeated, and whom he took prisoner. He took Syria from the Romans and supported the republican party of Pompey, and of the murderers of Julius Cæsar. He was killed in a battle by Ventidius Bassus, B.C. 53, on the same day (9th of June) that Crassus had been defeated. Flor. 4, c. 9.—Horat. 3, od. 6, v. 9.—A king of Parthia, who made a treaty of alliance with the Romans, &c.—Another, intimate with king Decebalus.

Pactolus, a celebrated river of Lydia, rising in mount Timolus, and falling into the Hæmus after it has watered the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas washed himself when he turned into gold whatever he touched, and from that circumstance it ever after rolled golden sands, and received the name of Chrysorroas. It is called Tmolus by Pliny. Strabo observes that it had no golden sands in his age. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 142.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 85.—Herodot. 5, c. 110.—Plin. 33, c. 8.

Pactyas, a Lydian entrusted with the care of the treasures of Croesus at Sardes. The immense riches which he could command, corrupted him, and, to make himself independent, he gathered a large army. He laid siege to the citadel of Sardes, but the arrival of one of the Persian generals soon put him to flight. He retired to Cumæ and afterwards to Lesbos, where he was delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 154, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 15.

Pactye, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus.

Pactyes, a mountain of Ionia, near Ephesus. Strab. 14.

Pædrius M., a native of Brundisium, son of the sister of the poet Ennius, who distinguished himself by his skill in painting, and by his poetical talents. He wrote satires and tragedies which were represented at Rome, and of some of which the names are preserved, as Peribœa, Hermione, Atalanta, Ilione, Teucer, Antiope, &c. Orestes was considered as the best finished performance; the style, however, though rough and without either purity or elegance, deserved the commendation of Cicero and Quintilian, who perceived strong rays of genius and perfection frequently beaming through the clouds of the barbarity and ignorance of the times. The poet in his old age retired to Tarentum, where he died in his 90th year, about 132 years before Christ. Of all his compositions about 437 scattered lines are preserved in the collections of Latin poets. Cic. de Orat. 2. Ad. Heren. 2, c. 27.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Quintil. 10, c. 10.

Pædnum, now Bondeno, a town on the Po, where it begins to branch into different channels. Plin. 3, c. 15.

Pædua, a town called also Patavium, in the country of the Venetians, founded by Antenor immediately after the Trojan war. It was the native place of the historian Livy. The inhabitants were once so powerful, that they could levy an army of 20,000 men. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 251.

Padus (now called the Po), a river in Italy, known also by the name of Erivanus, which forms the northern boundary of the territories of Italy. It rises in mount Vesulus, one of the highest mountains of the Alps, and after it has collected in its course the waters of above 30 rivers, discharges itself in an eastern direction into the Adriatic sea by seven mouths, two of which only, the Plana or Volano, and the Padusa, were formed by nature. It was formerly said that it rolled gold dust in its sand, which was carefully searched by the inhabitants. The consuls C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philus were the first Roman generals who crossed it. The Po is famous for the death of Phæton, who, as the poets mention, was thrown down there by the thunderbolts of Jupiter. *Ovid. Pædaretus, a Spartan who, on not being elected in the number of the 300 sent on an expedition, &c., declared that, instead of being mortified, he rejoiced that 300 men better than himself could be found in Sparta. Plut. in Lyc.

Pædrius, a lieutenant of J. Cæsar in Spain, who proposed a law to punish with death all such as were concerned in the murder of his patron, &c.

Pæoniæ, a people of Belgic Gaul, supposed to have dwelt in the country at the west of Luxemburg. Cæs. G. 2, c. 4.

Pæon, a Greek historian. Plut. in Thes.—A celebrated physician who cured the wounds which the gods received during the Trojan war. From him, physicians are sometimes called Pæoni, and herbs serviceable in medicinal processes, Pæonia herba. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 709.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 835.

Pæones, a people of Macedonia, who inhabited a small part of the country called Pæonia. Some believe that they were descended from a Trojan colony. Paus. 5, c. 1.—Herodot. 5, c. 13, &c.

Pæonia, a country of Macedonia at the west of the Strymon. It received its name from Pæon, a son of Endymion, who settled there. Liv. 42, c. 57. l. 45, c. 29.—A small town of Attica.

Pæonides, a name given to the daughters of Pierus, who were defeated by the Muses, because their mother was a native of Pæonia. Ovid. Met. 5, ult. fab.

Pæos, a small town of Arcadia.

Pæsos, a town of the Hellespont, called also Apeos, situated at the north of Lampsacus. When it was destroyed, the inhabitants migrated to Lampsacus, where they settled. They were of Milesian origin. Strab. 13.—Homer. Il. 2.

Pæstum, a town of Lucania, called also Nephtunia and Posidonia by the Greeks, where the soil produced roses which blossomed twice a year. The ancient walls of the town, about three miles in extent, are still standing, and likewise venerable remains of temples and porticoes. The Sinus Pæstannus on which it stood is now called the gulf of Salerno. Virg. G. 4, v. 119.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708. Pont. 2, el. 4, v. 28.

Pæstovium, a town of Pannonia.

Pægo, a town of Megaris, —of Locris. Plin. 4, c. 3.

Pægæso, or Pægæsa, a town of Magnesia, in Macedonia, with a harbour and a promontory of the same name. The ship Argo was built there, as some suppose, and, according to Propertius, the Argonauts set sail from that harbour. From that circumstance not only the ship Argo, but also the Argonauts themselves, were ever after distinguished by the epithet of Pægæans. Pliny confounds

Pagasa with Demetrias, but they are different, and the latter was peopled by the inhabitants of the former, who preferred the situation of Demetrias for its conveniences. Ovid Met. 7, v. 1. 8, v. 349.—Lucan. 2, v. 215. 1. 6. v. 400.—Mela. 2, c. 3 & 7.—Strab. 9.—Propert. 1, el. 20, v. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 8.—*Apollod. Pagrus, a town of Syria, on the borders of Cilicia. Strab. 16.

Pagus, a mountain of Æolia. Paus. 7, c. 5.

Palæcium, or Palâtium, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus.—A small village on the Palatine hill, where Rome was afterwards built.

Palas, a town at the south of Corsica, now St. Bonifacio.

Palmas, a town of Cyprus.—Of Cephalonia.

Palæopölis, a small island on the coast of Spain. Strab.

Palemon, or Palemon, a sea deity, son of Athamas and Ino. His original name was Melicerta, and he assumed that of Palemon, after he had been changed into a sea deity by Neptune. Vid. Melicerta.—A noted grammarian at Rome in the age of Tiberius, who made himself ridiculous by his arrogance and luxury. Juv. 6, v. 451.—Martial. 2, ep. 86.—A son of Neptune, who was amongst the Argonauts. Apollod.

Palæopöphos, the ancient town of Paphos in Cyprus, adjoining to the new. Strab. 14.

Palæopharsäus, the ancient town of Pharsalus in Thessaly. Cæs. B. A. 68.

Palæophätus, an ancient Greek philosopher, whose age is unknown, though it can be ascertained that he flourished between the times of Aristotle and Augustus. He wrote five books de incredibilibus, of which only the first remains, and in it he endeavours to explain fabulous and mythological traditions by historical facts. The best edition of Palæphatus is that of J. Frid. Fischer, in 8vo, Lips. 1773.—An heroic poet of Athens, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world.—A disciple of Aristotle, born at Abydos.—An historian of Egypt.

Palæpölis, a town of Campania, built by a Greek colony, where Naples afterwards was erected. Liv. 8, c. 22.

Palæsto, a village of Epirus near Oricus, where Cæsar first landed with his fleet. Lucan. 5, v. 460.

Palæstina, a province of Syria, &c. Herodot. 1, c. 105.—Sil. It. 3, v. 606.—Strab. 16.

Palæstinus, an ancient name of the river Strymon.

Palætyrus, the ancient town of Tyre on the continent. Strab. 16.

Pälâmêdes, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius king of Eubœa by Clymene. He was sent by the Greek princes, who were going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulysses to the camp, who, to withdraw himself from the expedition, pretended insanity, and the better to impose upon his friends, used to harness different animals to a plough, and to sow salt instead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes; he knew that the regret to part from his wife Penelope, whom he had lately married, was the only reason of the pretended insanity of Ulysses; and to demonstrate this, Palamedes took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulysses showed that he was not insane, by turning the plough a different way not to hurt his child. This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war, but an immortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca resolved to take every opportunity to distress him; and when all his expectations were frustrated, he had the meanness to bribe one of his servants, and to make him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this Ulysses forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes. In the letter the Trojan king seemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previously agreed upon, when he received the money. This forged letter was carried, by means of Ulysses, before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was summoned, and he made the most solemn protestations of innocence. But all was in vain; the money that was discovered in his tent served only to corroborate the accusation, and he was found guilty by all the army, and stoned to death. Homer is silent about the miserable fate of Palamedes, and Pausanias mentions that it had been reported by some, that Ulysses and Diomedes had drowned him in the sea as he was fishing on the coast. Philostratus, who mentions the tragical story above related, adds that Achilles and Ajax buried his body with great pomp on the sea-shore, and that they raised upon it a small chapel, where sacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a soldier, and, according to some, he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters  $\theta$ ,  $\xi$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\phi$ , during the Trojan war. To him, also, is attributed the invention of dice and backgammon; and it is said he was the first who regularly ranged an army in a line of battle, and who placed sentinels round a camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watchword. Hygin. fab. 95, 105, &c.—Apollod. 2, &c.—Diogenes Cræt. 1, c. 15.—*Ovid. Palantia, a town of Spain. Mela. 2, c. 6.

Pälätinus mons, a celebrated hill, the largest of the seven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the first foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there also he kept his court, as well as Tullus Hostilius and Augustus, and all the succeeding emperors, from which circumstance the word Palatinus has ever since been applied to the residence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddess Pales, or from the Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the bleatings of sheep, which were frequent there, or perhaps from the word palantes, wandering, because Evander, when he came to settle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one society. There were some games celebrated in honour of Augustus, and called Palatine, because kept on the hill. Dio. Cass. 53.—Ital. 12, v. 709.—Liv. 1, c. 7 & 33.—*Ovid. His temple there had been built, or rather repaired, by Augustus, who had enriched it with a library, valuable for the various collections of Greek and Latin manuscripts which it contained, as also for the Sibyl's line books deposited there. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 17.

Palantium, a town of Arcadia.

heart. Plut. in Vita.—Suet.—Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 50, &c.—Juv. 2, v. 90.—Roscius, a tribune of the people, who, in Cicero's consulship, made a regulation to permit the Roman knights at public spectacles to have the 14 first rows after the seats of the senators. This was opposed with virulence by some, but Cicero ably defended it, &c. Horat. ep. 4, v. 10.—The father of the Roman emperor Otho was the favourite of Claudius.

Othryades, one of the 300 Spartans who fought against 300 Argives, when those two nations disputed their respective right to Thyrea. Two Argives, Alcino and Cronius, and Othryades, survived the battle. The Argives went home to carry the news of their victory, but Othryades, who had been reckoned among the number of the slain, on account of his wounds, recovered himself and carried some of the spoils, of which he had stripped the Argives, into the camp of his countrymen; and after he had raised a trophy, and had written with his own blood, the word vici on his shield, he killed himself, unwilling to survive the death of his countrymen. *Val. Othryoneus, a Thracian who came to the Trojan war in hopes of marrying Cassandra. He was killed by Idomeneus. Homer. Il. 13.

Othrys, a mountain, or rather a chain of mountains, in Thessaly, the residence of the Centaurs. Strab. 9.—Herodot. 7, c. 129.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.

Otrous, a king of Phrygia, son of Cisseus and brother to Hecuba.

Otröda, a small town on the confines of Bithynia.

Otus and Ephialtes, sons of Neptune. Vid. Aloides.

Otys, a prince of Paphlagonia, who revolted from the Persians to Agesilaus. Xenoph.

Ovia, a Roman lady, wife of C. Lollius. Cic. Att. 21.

P. Ovidius Naso, a celebrated Roman poet, born at Sulmo on the south of March, about 43 B.C. As he was intended for the bar, his father sent him early to Rome, and removed him to Athens in the 16th year of his age. The progress of Ovid in the study of eloquence was great, but the father's expectations were frustrated; his son was born a poet, and nothing could deter him from pursuing his natural inclination, though he was often reminded that Homer lived and died in the greatest poverty. Everything he wrote was expressed in poetical numbers, as he himself says, et quod tentabam scribere versus erat. A lively genius and a fertile imagination soon gained him admirers; the learned became his friends; Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace, honoured him with their correspondence, and Augustus patronized him with the most unbounded liberality. These favours, however, were but momentary, and the poet was soon after banished to Tomos, on the Euxine sea, by the emperor. The true cause of this sudden exile is unknown. Some attribute it to a shameful amour with Livia the wife of Augustus, while others suppose that it arose from the knowledge which Ovid had of the unpardonable incest of the emperor with his daughter Julia. These reasons are, indeed, merely conjectural; the cause was of a very private and very secret nature, of which Ovid himself is afraid to speak, as it arose from error and not from criminality. It was, however, something improper in the family and court of Augustus, as these lines seem to indicate.

*Cur aliquid vidit? Cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi est?
Inscius Actæon vici sine veste Dianam;
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille suis.*

Again,

*Inscia quod crimen viderunt lumina plector,
Peccatumque oculos est habuisse meum.*

And in another place,

*Perdidit cum me duo crimina, carmen et error,
Alterius facti culpa silenda mihi est.*

In his banishment, Ovid betrayed his pusillanimity, and however afflicted and distressed his situation was, yet the flattery and impatience which he showed in his writings are a disgrace to his pen, and expose him more to ridicule than pity. Though he prostituted his pen and his time to adulation, yet the emperor proved deaf to all entreaties, and refused to listen to his most ardent friends at Rome who wished for the return of the poet. Ovid, who undoubtedly wished for a Brutus to deliver Rome of her tyrannical Augustus, continued his flattery even to meanness; and, when the emperor died, he was so mercenary as to consecrate a temple to the departed tyrant on the shores of the Euxine, where he regularly offered frankincense every morning. Tiberius proved as regardless as his predecessor to the entreaties which were made for Ovid, and the poet died in the seventh or eighth year of his banishment, in the 59th year of his age, A.D. 17, and was buried at Tomos. In the year 1508 of the christian era, the following epitaph was found at Stain, in the modern kingdom of Austria:

*Hic situs est vates quem Divi Caesaris ira
Augusti patris cedere jussit humo.
Sæpe miser voluit patriis occumbere terris,
Sed frustra! Hunc illi fata dedere locum.*

This, however, is an imposition, to render celebrated an obscure corner of the world, which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greatest part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoses, in 15 books, are extremely curious, on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate, but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In composing this the poet was more indebted to the then existing traditions, and to the theology of the ancients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Fæsti were divided into 12 books, the same number as the constellations in the zodiac; but of these, six have perished, and the learned world have reason to lament the loss of a poem which must have thrown so much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, festivals and sacrifices, of the ancient Romans, as we may judge from the six that have survived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Tristitia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and softness of expression, as also his Elegies on different subjects. The Heroides are nervous, spirited, and diffuse, the poetry is excellent, the language varied, but the expressions are often too wanton and indelicate, a fault which is common in his compositions. His three books of Amorum, and the same number de Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris, are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery descriptions; but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and they are to be read with caution, as they seem to be calculated to corrupt the heart, and sap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus, of the same name, is a satirical performance. Besides these, there are extant some fragments of other poems, and among these some of a tragedy called Medea. The talents of Ovid as a dramatic writer have been disputed, and some have observed that he, who is so often void of sentiment, was not born to shine as a tragedian. Ovid has attempted perhaps too many sorts of poetry at once. On whatever he has written, he has totally exhausted the subject, and left nothing unsaid. He everywhere paints nature with a masterly hand, and gives strength to the most vulgar expressions. It has been judiciously observed, that his poetry, after his banishment from Rome, was destitute of that spirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compositions. His Fasti are perhaps the best written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love verses, his Heroides, and, after all, his Metamorphoses, which were not totally finished when Augustus sent him into banishment. His Epistles from Pontus are the language of an abject and pusillanimous flatterer. However critics may censure the indelicacy and the inaccuracies of Ovid, it is to be acknowledged that his poetry contains great sweetness and elegance, and, like that of Tibullus, charms the ear and captivates the mind. Ovid married three wives, but of the last alone he speaks with fondness and affection. He had only one daughter, but by which of his wives is unknown; and she herself became mother of two children, by two husbands. The best editions of Ovid's works are those of Burman, 4 vols. 4to, Amst. 1727; of L. Bat. 1670, in 8vo, and of Utrecht, in 12mo, 4 vols. 1713. Ovid. Trist. 3 & 4, &c.—Paterc. 2.—Martial. 3 & 8.—A man who accompanied his friend Cæsonius when banished from Rome by Nero. Martial. 7, ep. 43.

Ovinia lex was enacted to permit the censors to elect and admit among the number of the senators the best and the worthiest of the people.

Ovinus, a freedman of Vatinus, the friend of Cicero, &c. Quintil. 3, c. 4.—Quintus, a Roman senator, punished by Augustus for disgracing his rank in the court of Cleopatra. Entrop. 1.

Oxathres, a brother of Darius, greatly honoured by Alexander, and made one of his generals. Curt. 7, c. 5.—Another Persian, who favoured the cause of Alexander. Curt.

Oxidates, a Persian whom Darius condemned to death. Alexander took him prisoner, and some time after made him governor of Media. He became oppressive, and was removed. Curt. 8, c. 3, l. 9, c. 8.

Oximes, a people of European Sarmatia.
Oxione, a nation of Germans, whom superstitious traditions represented as having the countenance human, and the rest of the body like that of beasts. Tacit. de Germ. 46.

Oxus, a large river of Bactriana, now Gihon, falling into the east of the Caspian sea. Plin. 15, c. 6.—Another in Scythia.

Oxyares, a king of Bactriana, who surrendered to Alexander.

Oxyarcus, an Indian prince in the age of Alexander, &c.

Oxydracæ, a nation of India. Curt. 9, c. 4.

Oxydrus, a leader of the Heraclidæ, when they recovered the Peloponnese. He was rewarded with the kingdom of Elis. Paus. 5, c. 4.—A son of Mars and Protogenia. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Oxyntes, a king of Athens, B.C. 1149. He reigned 12 years.

Oxyrops, a son of Cinyras and Metharme. Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Oxyrynchus, a town of Egypt on the Nile. Strab.

Ozines, a Persian imprisoned by Cræsus, because he attempted to revolt from Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Ozleæ, or Ozëli, a people who inhabited the eastern parts of Ætolia, which were called Ozoleæ. This tract of territory lay at the north of the bay of Corinth, and extended about 12 miles northward. They received their name from the bad stench (ὄζειν) of their bodies and of their clothing, which was the raw hides of wild beasts, or from the offensive smell of the body of Nessus the Centaur, which after death was left to putrefy in the country without the honours of a burial. Some derive it with more propriety from the stench of the stagnated waters in the neighbouring lakes and marshes. According to a fabulous tradition, they received their name from a very different circumstance. During the reign of a son of Deucalion, a bitch brought into the world a stick instead of whelps. The stick was planted in the ground by the king, and it grew up to a large vine and produced grapes, from which the inhabitants of the country were called Ozoleæ, not from ὄζειν, to smell bad, but from ὄζος, a branch or sprout. The name of Ozoleæ, on account of its indelicate signification, highly displeased the inhabitants, and they exchanged it soon for that of Ætolians. Paus. 10, c. 38.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.

PACATIUS TITUS JULIUS, a general of the Roman army, who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, about the latter part of Philip's reign. He was soon after defeated, A.D. 249, and put to death, &c.

Pacellus, an insignificant poet in the age of Domitian. Juv. 7, v. 12.

Paches, an Athenian, who took Mitylene, &c. Arist. Polit. 4.

Pachinus, or Pachynus, now Passara, a promontory of Sicily, projecting about two miles into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, at the south-east corner of the island, with a small harbour of the same name. Strab. 6.—Meta. 2, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 699.—Paus. 5, c. 25.

M. Paconius, a Roman put to death by Tiberius, &c. Suet. in Tib. 61.—A stoic philosopher, son of the preceding. He was banished from Italy by Nero, and he retired from Rome with the greatest composure and indifference. Arrian. 1, c. 1.

Pacorus, the eldest of the 30 sons of Orodes king of Parthia, sent against Crassus, whose army he defeated, and whom he took prisoner. He took Syria from the Romans and supported the republican party of Pompey, and of the murderers of Julius Cæsar. He was killed in a battle by Ventidius Bassus, B.C. 39, on the same day (9th of June) that Crassus had been defeated. Flor. 4, c. 9.—Horat. 3, od. 6, v. 9.—A king of Parthia, who made a treaty of alliance with the Romans, &c.—Another, intimate with king Decebalus.

Pactolus, a celebrated river of Lydia, rising in mount Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus after it has watered the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas washed himself when he turned into gold whatever he touched, and from that circumstance it ever after rolled golden sands, and received the name of Chrysorrhoeus. It is called Tmolus by Pliny. Strabo observes that it had no golden sands in his age. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 142.—Strab. 18.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 85.—Herodot. 5, c. 110.—Plin. 33, c. 8.

Pactyas, a Lydian entrusted with the care of the treasures of Croesus at Sardes. The immense riches which he could command, corrupted him, and to make himself independent, he gathered a large army. He laid siege to the citadel of Sardes, but the arrival of one of the Persian generals soon put him to flight. He retired to Cumæ and afterwards to Lesbos, where he was delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 154, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 35.

Pactye, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus. Strab. 14.

Pæcivius M., a native of Brundisium, son of the sister of the poet Ennius, who distinguished himself by his skill in painting, and by his poetical talents. He wrote satires and tragedies which were represented at Rome, and of some of which the names are preserved, as Periboea, Hermione, Atalanta, Ithone, Teucer, Antiope, &c. Orestes was considered as the best finished performance; the style, however, though rough and without either purity or elegance, deserved the commendation of Cicero and Quintilian, who perceived strong rays of genius and perfection frequently beaming through the clouds of the barbarity and ignorance of the times. The poet in his old age retired to Tarentum, where he died in his 90th year, about 131 years before Christ. Of all his compositions about 437 scattered lines are preserved in the collections of Latin poets. Cic. de Orat. 2. Ad. Herem. 2, c. 27.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Quintil. 10, c. 10.

Pædel, an Indian nation, who devoured their sick before they died. Herodot. 3, c. 99.

Padinum, now Bondeno, a town on the Po, where it begins to branch into different channels. Plin. 3, c. 15.

Pædus, a town called also Patavium, in the country of the Venetians, founded by Antenor immediately after the Trojan war. It was the native place of the historian Livy. The inhabitants were once so powerful, that they could levy an army of 20,000 men. Strab. 5.—Meta. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 251.

Padus (now called the Po), a river in Italy, known also by the name of Erdanuss, which forms the northern boundary of the territories of Italy. It rises in mount Vesulus, one of the highest mountains of the Alps, and after it has collected in its course the waters of above 30 rivers, discharges itself in an eastern direction into the Adriatic sea by seven mouths, two of which only, the Plana or Volano, and the Padusa, were formed by nature. It was formerly said that it rolled gold dust in its sand, which was carefully searched by the inhabitants. The consuls C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philus were the first Roman generals who crossed it. The Po is famous for the death of Phæton, who, as the poets mention, was thrown down by the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 256, &c.—Meta. 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 37, c. 2.

Pædusa, the most southern mouth of the Po, considered by some writers as the Po itself. Vid.

Padus. It was said to abound in swans, and from it there was a cut to the town of Ravenna. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 455.

Pæan, a surname of Apollo, derived from the word pæan, a hymn which was sung in his honour, because he had killed the serpent Python, which had given cause to the people to exclaim Io Pæan! The exclamation of Io Pæan! was made use of in speaking to the other gods, as it often was a demonstration of joy. Juv. 6, v. 171.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 358. l. 14, v. 700.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Strab. 18.

Pædaretus, a Spartan who, on not being elected in the number of the 300 sent on an expedition, &c., declared that, instead of being mortified, he rejoiced that 300 men better than himself could be found in Sparta. Plut. in Lyc.

Pædus, a lieutenant of J. Cæsar in Spain, who proposed a law to punish with death all such as were concerned in the murder of his patron, &c.

Pæmân, a people of Belgic Gaul, supposed to have dwelt in the country at the west of Luxembourg. Cæs. G. 2, c. 4.

Pæon, a Greek historian. Plut. in Thea.—A celebrated physician who cured the wounds which the gods received during the Trojan war. From him, physicians are sometimes called Pæoni, and herbs serviceable in medicinal processes, Pæonia herba. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 769.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 535.

Pæones, a people of Macedonia, who inhabited a small part of the country called Pæonia. Some believe that they were descended from a Trojan colony. Paus. 5, c. 1.—Herodot. 5, c. 13, &c.

Pæonia, a country of Macedonia at the west of the Strymon. It received its name from Pæon, a son of Endymion, who settled there. Liv. 42, c. 51. l. 45, c. 29.—A small town of Attica.

Pæonides, a name given to the daughters of Pierus, who were defeated by the Muses, because their mother was a native of Pæonia. Ovid. Met. 5, ult. fab.

Pæos, a small town of Arcadia.

Pæos, a town of the Helespont, called also Apsos, situated at the north of Lampascus. When it was destroyed, the inhabitants migrated to Lampascus, where they settled. They were of Milesian origin. Strab. 13.—Homer. Il. 2.

Pæstum, a town of Lucania, called also Nephtunia and Posidonia by the Greeks, where the soil produced roses which blossomed twice a year. The ancient walls of the town, about three miles in extent, are still standing, and likewise venerable remains of temples and porticoes. The Sinus Pæstanus on which it stood is now called the gulf of Salerno. Virg. G. 4, v. 119.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708. Pont. 2, el. 4, v. 28.

Pætovium, a town of Pannonia.

Pæstus Osciinna, the husband of Arria. Vid. Arria.—A governor of Armenia, under Nero.—A Roman who conspired with Catiline against his country.—A man drowned as he was going to Egypt to collect money. Propert. 3, el. 7, v. 5.

Pægæ, a town of Megaris, —of Locris. Plin. 4, c. 3.

Pægæa, or Pægæsa, a town of Magnesia, in Macedonia, with a harbour and a promontory of the same name. The ship Argo was built there, as some suppose, and, according to Propertius, the Argonauts set sail from that harbour. From that circumstance not only the ship Argo, but also the Argonauts themselves, were ever after distinguished by the epithet of Pægæura. Pliny confounds Pagææ with Demetrias, but they are different, and the latter was peopled by the inhabitants of the former, who preferred the situation of Demetrias for its conveniences. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 1. 1. 8, v. 349.—Lucan. 2, v. 715. 1. 6. v. 400.—Meta. 2, c. 3 & 7.—Strab. 9.—Propert. 1, el. 20, v. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 8.—Apollod. Rhod. 1, v. 238, &c.

Pagæus, a Trojan killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 690.

Pagææ, a town of Syria, on the borders of Cilicia. Strab. 16.

Pagus, a mountain of Æolia. Paus. 7, c. 5.—Palæotum, or Palæstum, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus.—A small village on the Palatine hill, where Rome was afterwards built.

Palææ, a town at the south of Corsica, now St. Bonifacio.

Palææ, a town of Cyprus.—of Cephalonia.

Palæapollis, a small island on the coast of Spain. Strab.

Palemon, or Palemon, a sea deity, son of Athamas and Ino. His original name was Melicerta, and he assumed that of Palemon, after he had been changed into a sea deity by Neptune. Vid. Melicerta.—A noted grammarian at Rome in the age of Tiberius, who made himself ridiculous by his arrogance and luxury. Juv. 6, v. 451.—Martial. 2, ep. 86.—A son of Neptune, who was amongst the Argonauts. Apollod.

Palæpaphos, the ancient town of Paphos in Cyprus, adjoining to the new. Strab. 14.

Palæpharsalus, the ancient town of Pharsalus in Thessaly. Cæs. B. A. 48.

Palæphætus, an ancient Greek philosopher, whose age is unknown, though it can be ascertained that he flourished between the times of Aristotle and Augustus. He wrote five books of incredibilibus, of which only the first remains, and in it he endeavours to explain fabulous and mythological traditions by historical facts. The best edition of Palæphatus is that of J. Frid. Fischer, in 8vo, Lips. 1773.—An heroic poet of Athens, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world.—A disciple of Aristotle, born at Abydos.—An historian of Egypt.

Palæpōlis, a town of Campania, built by a Greek colony, where Naples afterwards was erected. Liv. 8, c. 22.

Palæstæ, a village of Epirus near Oricus, where Cæsar first landed with his fleet. Lucan. 5, v. 460.

Palæstina, a province of Syria, &c. Herodot. 1, c. 105.—Sil. It. 3, v. 606.—Strab. 16.

Palæstinus, an ancient name of the river Strymon.

Palæstus, the ancient town of Tyre on the continent. Strab. 16.

Palæstodes, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius king of Eubœa by Clymene. He was sent by the Greek princes, who were going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulysses to the camp, who, to withdraw himself from the expedition, pretended insanity, and, the better to impose upon his friends, used to harness different animals to a plough, and to sow salt instead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes; he knew that the regret to part from his wife Penelope, whom he had lately married, was the only reason of the pretended insanity of Ulysses; and to demonstrate this, Palamedes took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulysses showed that he was not insane, by turning the plough a different way not to hurt his child. This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war, but an immortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca resolved to take every opportunity to distress him; and when all his expectations were frustrated, he had the meanness to bribe one of his servants, and to make him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this Ulysses forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes. In the letter the Trojan king seemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previously agreed upon, when he received the money. This forged letter was carried, by means of Ulysses, before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was summoned, and he made the most solemn protestations of innocence. But all was in vain; the money that was discovered in his tent served only to corroborate the accusation, and he was found guilty by all the army, and stoned to death. Homer is silent about the miserable fate of Palamedes, and Pausanias mentions that it had been reported by some, that Ulysses and Diomedes had drowned him in the sea as he was fishing on the coast. Philostratus, who mentions the tragical story above related, adds that Achilles and Ajax buried his body with great pomp on the sea-shore, and that they raised upon it a small chapel, where sacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a soldier, and, according to some, he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters  $\theta$ ,  $\xi$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\phi$ , during the Trojan war. To him, also, is attributed the invention of dice and backgammon; and it is said he was the first who regularly raised an army in a line of battle, and who placed sentinels round a camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watchword. Hygin. fab. 95, 105, &c.—Apollod. 2, &c.—Dictys Cret. 2, c. 15.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 56 & 308.—Paus. 1, c. 31.—Manil. 4, v. 205.—Philos. trat. v. 10, c. 6.—Euripid. in Phœnix.—Martial. 13, ep. 75.—Plin. 7, c. 56.

Palantia, a town of Spain. Meta. 2, c. 6.

Palæstinus mons, a celebrated hill, the largest of the seven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the first foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there also he kept his court, as well as Tullius Hostilius and Augustus, and all the succeeding emperors, from which circumstance the word Palæstinus has ever since been applied to the residence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddess Pales, or from the Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the beatings of sheep, which were frequent there, or perhaps from the word palantes, wandering, because Evander, when he came to settle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one society. There were some games celebrated in honour of Augustus, and called Palatine, because kept on the hill. Div. Cæs. 53.—Ital. 12, v. 709.—Liv. 1, c. 7 & 33.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 822.—Juv. 9, v. 23.—Martial. 1, ep. 71.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 3.—Cic. in Catil. 1.—Apollo, who was worshipped on the Palatine hill, was also called Palæstinus. His temple there had been built, or rather repaired, by Augustus, who had enriched it with a library, valuable for the various collections of Greek and Latin manuscripts which it contained, as also for the Sibyl line books deposited there. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 17.

Palæntium, a town of Arcadia.

Paléis, or Pales, a town in the island of Cephalenia. Paus. 6, c. 15.

Pales, the goddess of sheepfolds and of pastures among the Romans. She was worshipped with great solemnity at Rome, and her festivals, called Palilia, were celebrated the very day that Romulus began to lay the foundation of the city of Rome. Virg. G. 3, v. 1 & 294.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 722, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 8.

Palurius Sura, a writer, removed from the senate by Domitian, who suspected him of attachment to Vitellius, &c. Juv. 4, v. 53.

Palibothra, a city of India, supposed now to be Patna, or, according to others, Allahabad. Strab. 15.

Palici, or Palisci, two deities, sons of Jupiter by Thalia, whom Æschylus calls Ætina, in a tragedy which is now lost, according to the words of Macrobius. The nymph Ætina, when pregnant, entreated her lover to remove her from the pursuit of Juno. The god concealed her in the bowels of the earth, and when the time of her delivery was come, the earth opened, and brought into the world two children, who received the name of Palici, αἰὼ τοῦ καλῆς ἰσθμῶν, because they came again into the world from the bowels of the earth. These deities were worshipped with great ceremonies by the Sicilians, and near their temple were two small lakes of sulphureous water, which were supposed to have sprung out of the earth at the same time that they were born. Near these pools it was usual to take the most solemn oaths, by those who wished to decide controversies and quarrels. If any of the persons who took the oaths perjured themselves, they were immediately punished in a supernatural manner; and those whose oath, by the deities of the place, was sincere, departed unhurt. The Palici had also an oracle, which was consulted upon great emergencies, and which rendered the truest and most unequivocal answers. In a superstitious age, the altars of the Palici were stained with the blood of human sacrifices, but this barbarous custom was soon abolished, and the deities were satisfied with their usual offerings. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 585.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 506.—Diod. 2.—Macrob. Saturn. 5, c. 10.—Ital. 14, v. 219.

Pallia, a festival celebrated by the Romans, in honour of the goddess Pales. The ceremony consisted in burning heaps of straw, and leaping over them. No sacrifices were offered, but the purifications were made with the smoke of horses' blood, and with the ashes of a calf that had been taken from the belly of his mother, after it had been sacrificed, and with the ashes of beans. The purification of the flocks was also made with the smoke of sulphur, of the olive, the pine, the laurel, and the rosemary. Offerings of mild cheese, boiled wine, and cakes of millet, were afterwards made to the goddess. This festival was observed on the 21st of April, and it was during the celebration that Romulus first began to build his city. Some call this festival Parilia quasi a pariendo, because the sacrifices were offered to the divinity for the fecundity of the flocks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 774. Fast. 4, v. 721, &c. l. 6, v. 257.—Proper. 4, el. 1, v. 19.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 87.

Pallinurus, a skillful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and the waves of the sea, and at last came safe to the sea-shore near Velia, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him to obtain his clothes. His body was left unburied on the sea-shore, and as, according to the religion of the ancient Romans, no person was suffered to cross the Stygian lake before 100 years were elapsed, if his remains had not been decently buried, we find Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, speaking to Pallinurus, and assuring him, that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place were his body was exposed should soon be adorned with a monument and bear his name, and accordingly a promontory was called Pallinurus, now Palinuro. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 513. l. 5, v. 840, &c. l. 6, v. 341.—Ovid. de Rom. 577.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 28.

Paliscorum, or Paliscorum stagnum, a sulphureous pool in Sicily. Vid. Palici.

Paliurns, now Nahil, a river of Africa, with a town of the same name at its mouth, at the west of Egypt, on the Mediterranean. Strab. 17.

Pallades, certain virgins of illustrious parents, who were consecrated to Jupiter by the Thebans of Egypt. It was required that they should prostitute themselves, an infamous custom which was considered as a purification, during which they were publicly mourned, and afterwards they were permitted to marry. Strab. 17.

Palladium, a celebrated statue of Pallas. It was about three cubits high, and represented the goddess as sitting and holding a pike in her right hand, and in her left a distaff and a spindle. It fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilius, as that prince was building the citadel of Hium. Some, nevertheless, suppose that it fell at Pessinus in Phrygia, or, according to others, Dardanus received it as a present from his mother Electra. There are some authors who maintain that the Palladium was made with the bones of Pelops by Abaris; but Apollodorus seems to say that it was no more than a piece of clock-work, which moved of itself. However discordant the opinions of ancient authors be about this famous statue, it is universally agreed that on its preservation depended the safety of Troy. This fatality was well known to the Greeks during the Trojan war, and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes were commissioned to steal it away. They effected their purpose; and if we rely upon the authority of some authors, they were directed how to carry it away by Helenus the son of Priam, who proved in this unfaithful to his country, because his brother Deiphobus, at the death of Paris, had married Helen, of whom he was enamoured. Minerva was displeased with the violence which was offered to her statue, and, according to Virgil, the Palladium itself appeared to have received life and motion, and by the flashes which started from its eyes, and its sudden springs from the earth, it seemed to show the resentment of the goddess. The true Palladium, as some authors observe, was not carried away from Troy by the Greeks, but only one of the statues of similar size and shape, which were placed near it, to deceive whatever sacrilegious persons attempted to steal it. The Palladium, therefore, as they say, was conveyed safe from Troy to Italy by Æneas, and it was afterwards preserved by the Romans with the greatest secrecy and veneration, in the temple of Vesta, a circumstance which none but the vestal virgins knew. Herodian. 1, c. 14, &c.—*Ovid. Palladius, a Greek physician, whose treatise on fevers was edited 8vo, L. Bat. 1745.—A learned Roman under Adrian, &c.

Pallantium, a town of Italy, or perhaps more properly a citadel built by Evander, on mount Palatine, from whence its name originates. Virgil says it was called after Pallas the grandfather of Evander; but Dionysius derives its name from Palantium, a town of Arcadia. Dionys. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 54 & 341.

Pallantia, a town of Spain, now Palencia, on the river Cea. Mela, 2, c. 6.

Pallantias, a patronymic of Aurora, as being related to the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 12.

Pallantides, the 50 sons of Pallas (the son of Pandion and the brother of Ægeus). They were all killed by Theseus the son of Ægeus, whom they opposed when he came to take possession of his father's kingdom. This opposition they showed in hopes of succeeding to the throne, as Ægeus left no children except Theseus, whose legitimacy was even disputed, as he was born at Træzene. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 72.

Pallas (Idis), a daughter of Jupiter, the same as Minerva. The goddess received this name either because she killed the giant Pallas, or perhaps from the spear which she seems to brandish in her hands (σπῆλαιε). For the functions, power, and character of the goddess, vid. Minerva.

Pallas (antus), a son of king Evander, sent with some troops to assist Æneas. He was killed by Turnus the king of the Rutuli, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 104, &c.—One of the giants, son of Tartarus and Terra. He was killed by Minerva, who covered herself with his skin, whence, as some suppose, she is called Pallas. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—A son of Crisus and Eurybia, who married the nymph Styx, by whom he had Victory, Valour, &c. Hesiod. Theog.—A son of Lycæon.—A son of Pandion, father of Clytus and Butes. Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 17.—Apollod.—A freedman of Claudius, famous for the power and the riches he obtained. He advised the emperor, his master, to marry Agrippina, and to adopt her son Nero for his successor. It was by his means, and those of Agrippina, that the death of Claudius was hastened, and that Nero was raised to the throne. Nero forgot to whom he was indebted for the crown. He discarded Pallas, and some time after caused him to be put to death, that he might make himself master of his great riches. A. D. 61. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 53.

Pallene, a small peninsula of Macedonia, formerly called Phlegra, situate above the bay of Thermo on the Ægean sea, and containing five cities, the principal of which is called Pallene. It was in this place, according to some of the ancients, that an engagement happened between the gods and the giants. Liv. 31, c. 45. J. 45, c. 30.—Virg. G. 4, v. 391.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 357.

—A village of Attica, where Minerva had a temple, and where the Pallantides chiefly resided. Hesiod. 1, c. 1, 161.—Plut. in Thes.

Pallenses, a people of Cephalonia, whose chief town was called Pala or Palæa. Liv. 38, c. 18.—Polyb. 3, c. 3.

Palma, a governor of Syria.

Palmaria, a small island opposite Tarracina in Latium. Plin. 3, c. 6.

Palmyra, the capital of Palmyrene, a country on the eastern boundaries of Syria, now called Thadmor, or Tadmor. It is famous for being the seat of the celebrated Zenobia and Odenatus, in the reign of the emperor Aurelian. It is now in ruins, and the splendour and magnificence of its porticoes, temples, and palaces, are now frequently examined by the curious and the learned. Plin. 6, c. 26 & 30.

Palphurius, one of the flatterers of Domitian. Juv. 4, v. 53.

Palumbinum, a town of Samnium. Liv. 10, c. 45.

Pamios, a river of Thessaly, falling into the Peneus. Herodot. 7, c. 129.—Plin. 4, c. 8.—Another of Messenia in Peloponnesus.

Pammenes, an Athenian general, sent to assist Megalopolis against the Mantineaes, &c.—An astrologer.—A learned Grecian, who was precursor to Brutus. Cic. Brut. 97, Orat. 9.

Pammon, a son of Priam and Hecuba. Apollod.

Pampa, a village near Tentyra in Thrace. Juv. 15, v. 76.

Pamphilus, a celebrated painter of Macedonia in the age of Philip, distinguished above his rivals by a superior knowledge of literature, and the cultivation of those studies which taught him to infuse more successfully grace and dignity into his pictures. He was founder of the school for painting at Sicyon, and he made a law which was observed not only in Sicyon, but all over Greece, that none but the children of noble and dignified persons should be permitted to learn painting. Apelles was one of his pupils. Diog.—A son of Neoclides, among the pupils of Plato. Diog.

Pamphos, a Greek poet, supposed to have lived before Hesiod's age.

Pamphylia, a Greek woman who wrote a general history in 33 books, in Nero's reign. This history, so much commended by the ancients, is lost.

Pamphylia, a province of Asia Minor, anciently called Mopsopia, and bounded on the south by a part of the Mediterranean, called the Pamphylia sea, west by Lycia, north by Pisidia, and east by Cilicia. It abounded with pastures, vines, and olives, and was peopled by a Grecian colony. Strab. 14.—Mela, 1.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Plin. 5, c. 26.—Liv. 37, c. 23 & 40.

Pan was the god of shepherds, of huntsmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the son of Mercury by Dryope, according to Homer. Some give him Jupiter and Callisto for parents, others Jupiter and Ybis or Oneis. Lucian, Hyginus, &c., support that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope the daughter of Icarus, and that the god gained the affections of the princess under the form of a goat, as she tended her father's flocks on mount Taygetus, before her marriage with the king of Ithaca. Some authors maintain that Penelope became mother of Pan during the absence of Ulysses in the Trojan war, and that he was the offspring of all the suitors that frequented the palace of Penelope, whence he received the name of Pan, which signifies all or everything. Pan was a monster in appearance; he had two small horns on his head, his complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet were those of a goat. The education of Pan was entrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinoe, but the nurse, according to Homer, terrified at the sight of such a monster, fled away and left him. He was wrapped up in the skin of beasts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themselves with the oddity of his appearance. Bacchus was greatly pleased with him, and gave him the name of Pan. The god of shepherds chiefly resided in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with seven reeds, which he called Syrinx, in honour of a beautiful nymph of the same name, to whom he attempted to offer violence, and who was changed into a reed. He was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and often with success. Though deformed in his shape and features, yet he had the good fortune to captivate Diana, and of gaining her favour, by transforming himself into a beautiful white goat. He was also enamoured of a nymph of the mountains called Echo, by whom he had a son called Lynx. He also paid his addresses to Omphale queen of Lydia, and it is well known in what manner he was received. Vid. Omphale. The worship of Pan was well established, particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on mount Lycæus. His festivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. Vid. Lupercalia. The worship, and the different functions of Pan, are derived from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians. This god was one of the eight great gods of the Egyptians, who ranked before the other 12 gods, whom the Romans called Consentes. He was worshipped with the greatest solemnity over all Egypt. His statues represented him as a goat, not because he was really such, but this was done for mysterious reasons. He was the emblem of fecundity, and they looked upon him as the principle of all things. His horns, as some observe, represented the rays of the sun, and the brightness of the heavens was expressed by the vivacity and the ruddiness of his complexion. The star which he wore on his breast was the symbol of the firmament, and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, such as the woods and plants. Some suppose that he appeared as a goat because, when the gods fled into Egypt, in their war against the giants, Pan transformed himself into a goat, an example which was immediately followed by all the deities. Pan, according to some, is the same as Faunus, and he is the chief of all the Satyrs. Plutarch mentions that, in the reign of Tiberius, an extraordinary voice was heard near the Echinades, in the Ionian sea, which exclaimed that the great Pan was dead. This was readily believed by the emperor, and the astrologers were consulted; but they were unable to explain the meaning of so supernatural a voice, which probably proceeded from the imposition of one of the courtiers who attempted to terrify Tiberius. In Egypt, in the town of Mendes, which word also signifies a goat, there was a sacred goat kept with the most ceremonious sanctity. The death of this animal was always attended with the greatest solemnities, and, like that of another Apis, became the cause of a universal mourning. As Pan usually terrified the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, that kind of fear which often seizes men, and which is only ideal and imaginary, has received from him the name of panic fear. This kind of terror has been exemplified not only in individuals, but in numerous armies, such as that of Brennus, which was thrown into the greatest consternation at Rome, without any cause or plausible reason. Vid. Fast. 1, v. 396. l. 2, v. 277. Met. 1, v. 682. Virg. G. 1, v. 27. Æn. 8, v. 343. G. 3, v. 392. Juv. 2, v. 142. Paus. 8, c. 20. Ital. 13, v. 307. Varro. de L. Panætius, a stoic philosopher of Rhodes, 138 B.C. He studied at Athens for some time, of which he refused to become a citizen, observing, that a good and modest man ought to be satisfied with one country. He came to Rome, where he reckoned among his pupils Lælius and Scipio the second Africanus. To the latter he was attached by the closest ties of friendship and partiality; he attended him in his expeditions, and partook of all his pleasures and amusements. To the interest of their countryman at Rome, the Rhodians were greatly indebted for their prosperity and the immunities which they for some time enjoyed. Panætius wrote a treatise on the duties of man, whose merit can be ascertained from the encomiums which Cicero bestows upon it. Cic. in Offic. de Div. 1. In Acad. 2, c. 2. De N. D. 2, c. 46. — A tyrant of Leontini in Sicily, B.C. 613. Polyæn. 5.

Panætolium, a general assembly of the Ætolians. Liv. 31, c. 29. l. 35, c. 32.

Panætes, a general of Crete, defeated by Metellus, &c.

Panariste, one of the waiting-women of Berenice the wife of king Antiochus. Polyæn. 8.

Panathenæa, festivals in honour of Minerva the patroness of Athens. They were first instituted by Erechtheus or Orpheus, and called Atticæa, but Theseus afterwards renewed them, and caused them to be celebrated and observed by all the tribes of Athens, which he had united into one, and from this reason the festivals received their name. Some suppose that they are the same as the Roman Quinquaginta, as they are often called by that name among the Latins. In the first years of the institution, they were observed only during one day, but afterwards the time was prolonged, and the celebration was attended with greater pomp and solemnity. The festivals were two; the great Panathenæa (μεγαλα), which were observed every fifth year, beginning on the 22nd of the month called Hecatombæon, or the 7th of July; and the lesser Panathenæa (μικρα), which were kept every third year, or rather annually, beginning on the 20th or 21st of the month called Thargelion, corresponding to the 5th or 6th day of the month of May. In the lesser festivals there were three games conducted by 30 presidents chosen from the 10 tribes of Athens, who continued four years in office. On the evening of the first day there was a race with torches, in which men on foot, and afterwards on horseback, contended. The same was also exhibited in the greater festivals. The second comb was gymnical, and exhibited a trial of strength and bodily dexterity. The last was a musical contention, first instituted by Pericles. In the songs they celebrated the generous undertaking of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who opposed the Pisistratide, and of Thrasylbus, who delivered Athens from its 30 tyrants. Phrynis of Mitylene was the first who obtained the victory by playing upon the harp. There were, besides, other musical instruments, on which they played in concert, such as flutes, &c. The poets contended in four plays, called from their number τετραλογία. The last of these was a satire. There was also at Sunium an imitation of a naval fight. Whoever obtained the victory in any of these games was rewarded with a vessel of oil, which he was permitted to dispose of in whatever manner he pleased, and it was unlawful for any other person to transport that commodity. The conqueror also received a crown of the olives which grew in the groves of Academus, and were sacred to Minerva, and called μειραιαί, from μειροί, death, in remembrance of the tragical end of Hallithutius the son of Neptune, who cut his own legs when he attempted to cut down the olive which had given the victory to Minerva in preference to his father, when these two deities contended about giving a name to Athens. Some suppose that the word is derived from μειροί, a part, because these olives were given by contribution by all such as attended at the festivals. There was also a dance called Pyrrhichia, performed by young boys in armour, in imitation of Minerva, who thus expressed her triumph over the vanquished Titans. Gladiators were also introduced when Athens became tributary to the Romans. During the celebration no person was permitted to appear in dyed garments, and if any one transgressed he was punished according to the discretion of the president of the games. After these things, a sumptuous sacrifice was offered, in which every one of the Athenian boroughs contributed an ox, and the whole was concluded by an entertainment for all the company with the flesh that remained from the sacrifice. In the greater festivals, the same rites and ceremonies were usually observed, but with more solemnity and magnificence. Others were also added, particularly the procession, in which Minerva's sacred στέφανος, or garment, was carried. This garment was woven by a select number of virgins, called ἰργαστικαί, from ἔργον, work. They were superintended by two of the ἀρχηφόροι, or young virgins, not above 17 years of age nor under 12, whose garments were white and set off with ornaments of gold. Minerva's στέφανος was of a white colour, without sleeves, and embroidered with gold. Upon it were described the achievements of the goddess, particularly her victories over the giants. The exploits of Jupiter and the other gods were also represented there, and from that circumstance men of courage and bravery are said to be ἀφ' οὗ στέφανος, worthy to be portrayed on Minerva's sacred garment. In the procession of the στέφανος, the following ceremonies were observed. In the ceramicus, without the city, there was an engine built in the form of a ship, upon which Minerva's garment was hung as a sail, and the whole was conducted, not by beasts, as some have supposed, but by subterraneous machines, to the temple of Ceres Eleusinia, and from thence to the citadel, where the στέφανος was placed upon Minerva's statue, which was laid upon a bed woven or strewed with flowers, which was called ἄλκιον. Persons of all ages, of every sex and quality, attended the procession, which was led by old men and women carrying olive branches in their hands, from which reason they were called θαλασφοροί, bearers of green boughs. Next followed men of full age with shields and spears. They were attended by the μετοίκιοι, or foreigners, who carried small boats as a token of their foreign origin, and from that account they were called καυκροφόροι, boat-bearers. After them came the women, attended by the wives of the foreigners, called ἰδριαφόροι, because they carried water-pots. Next to these came young men crowned with millet and singing hymns to the goddess, and after them followed select virgins of the noblest families, called καρπφοροί, basket-bearers, because they carried baskets, in which were certain things necessary for the celebration, with whatever utensils were also requisite. These several necessities were generally in the possession of the chief manager of the festival called ἀρχιδεσποτός, who distributed them when occasion offered. The virgins were attended by the daughters of the foreigners, who carried umbrellas and little seats, from which they were named σθροφόροι, seat-carriers. The boys, called καυκροφόροι, as it may be supposed, led the rear, clothed in coats generally worn at processions. The necessities for this and every other festival were prepared in a public hall erected for that purpose, between the Piræan gate and the temple of Ceres. The management and the care of the whole was entrusted to the βομοφύλακται, or people employed in seeing the rites and ceremonies properly observed. It was also usual to set all prisoners at liberty, and to present golden crowns to such as had deserved well of their country. Some persons were also chosen to sing some of Homer's poems, a custom which was first introduced by Hipparchus the son of Pisistratus. It was also customary in this festival, and every other quinquennial festival, to pray for the prosperity of the Plateans, whose services had been so conspicuous at the battle of Marathon. Plut. in Theop.—Paus. Arc. 2.—Ælian. V. 11. 8, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Panchæa, Panchæa, or Panchæia, an island of Arabia Felix, where Jupiter Triphylus had a magnificent temple.—A part of Arabia Felix, celebrated for the myrrh, frankincense, and perfumes which it produced. Virg. G. 2, v. 139. l. 4, v. 379. Culex. 87.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 309, &c.—Diod. 5.—Lucr. 2, v. 417.

Panda, two deities at Rome, who presided, one over the openings of roads, and the other over the openings of towns. Varro de P. R. 1.—A. Gell. 13, c. 22.

Pandama, a girl of India favoured by Hercules, &c. Polyæn. 1.

Pandaria, or Pandataria, a small island of the Tyrrhene sea.

Pandarus, a son of Lycaon, who assisted the Trojans in their war against the Greeks. He went to the war without a chariot, and therefore he generally fought on foot. He broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans, and wounded Menelaus and Diomedes, and showed himself brave and unusually courageous. He was at last killed by Diomedes; and Æneas, who then carried him in his chariot, by attempting to revenge his death, nearly perished by the hands of the furious enemy. Dictys Cret. 2, c. 3.—Homer. Il. 2 & 5.—Hygin. fab. 112.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 495.—Strab. 14.—Serenus in loco.—A son of Alcanor, killed with his brother Bitias by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 735.—A native of Crete, punished with death for being accessory to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, suppose that Tantalus stole the ambrosia and the nectar from the tables of the gods to which he had been admitted, or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crime Pandarus was concerned, and for which he suffered. Pandarus had two daughters, Camiro and Ulytia, who were also deprived of their mother by a sudden death, and left without friends or protectors. Venus had compassion upon them, and she fed them with milk, honey, and wine. The goddesses were all equally interested in their welfare. Juno gave them wisdom and beauty, Diana a handsome figure and regular features, and Minerva instructed them in whatever domestic accomplishment can recommend a wife. Venus wished to make their happiness still more complete; and when they were come to nubile years, the goddess prayed Jupiter to grant them kind and tender husbands. But in her absence th.

Harpies carried away the virgins and delivered them to the Eumenides, to share the punishment which their father suffered. Paus. 10. c. 30.—Plut.

Pandarus, or Pandareus, a man who had a daughter called Philomela. She was changed into a nightingale, after she had killed, by mistake, her son Itylus, whose death she mourned in the greatest melancholy. Some suppose him to be the same as Pandion king of Athens.

Pandataria, an island on the coast of Lucania, now called Santa Maria.

Pandates, a friend of Datames at the court of Artaxerxes. C. Nep. in Dat.

Pandemia, a surname of Venus, expressive of her great power over the affections of mankind.

Pandemus, one of the surnames of the god of love among the Egyptians and the Greeks, who distinguished two Cupids, one of whom was the vulgar, called Pandemus, and another of a purer and more celestial origin. Plut. in Erot.

Pandia, a festival at Athens established by Pandion, from whom it received its name, or because it was observed in honour of Jupiter, who can τα πάντα διγυειν, move and turn all things as he pleases. Some suppose that it concerned the moon, because it does varrote ievai, moves incessantly, by showing itself day and night, rather than the sun, which never appears but in the day-time. It was celebrated after the Dionysia, because Bacchus is sometimes taken for the Sun or Apollo, and therefore the brother, or, as some will have it, the son, of the moon.

Pandion, a king of Athens, son of Erichthon and Pasithea, who succeeded his father, B.C. 1437. He became father of Procne and Philomela, Erechtheus and Butes. During his reign, there was such an abundance of corn, wine, and oil, that it was publicly reported that Bacchus and Minerva had personally visited Attica. He waged a successful war against Labdacus king of Bœotia, and gave his daughter Procne in marriage to Tereus king of Thrace, who had assisted him. The treatment which Philomela received from her brother-in-law Tereus [vid. Philomela] was the source of infinite grief to Pandion, and he died through excess of sorrow, after a reign of 40 years.—There was also another Pandion, son of Cecrops II. by Metiduca, who succeeded to his father, B.C. 1307. He was driven from his paternal dominions, and fled to Pylas king of Megara, who gave him his daughter Peha in marriage, and resigned his crown to him. Pandion became father of four children, called from him Pandionides, Ægeus, Pallas, Nisus, and Lycus. The eldest of these children recovered his father's kingdom. Some authors have confounded the two Pandions together in such an indiscriminate manner, that they seem to have been only one and the same person. Many believe that Philomela and Procne were the daughters, not of Pandion I., but of Pandion II. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 676.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 48.—A son of Phineus and Cleopatra, deprived of his eyesight by his father. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A son of Ægyptus and Hephestina.—A king of the Indies in the age of Augustus.

Pandora, a celebrated woman, the first mortal female that ever lived, according to the opinion of the poet Hesiod. She was made with clay by Vulcan at the request of Jupiter, who wished to punish the impiety and artifice of Prometheus, by giving him a wife. When this woman of clay had been made by the artist, and received life, all the gods vied in making her presents. Venus gave her beauty and the art of pleasing, the Graces gave her the power of captivating, Apollo taught her how to sing, Mercury instructed her in eloquence, and Minerva gave her the most rich and splendid ornaments. From all these valuable presents, which she had received from the gods, the woman was called Pandora, which intimates that she had received every necessary gift, ἡν ὅμοιον. Jupiter after this gave her a beautiful box, which she was ordered to present to the man who married her; and by the commission of the god, Mercury conducted her to Prometheus. The artful mortal was sensible of the deceit, and as he had always distrusted Jupiter, as well as the rest of the gods, since he had stolen fire away from the sun to animate his man of clay, he sent away Pandora without suffering himself to be captivated by her charms. His brother Epimetheus was not possessed of the same prudence and sagacity. He married Pandora, and when he opened the box which she presented to him, there issued from it a multitude of evils and distempers, which dispersed themselves all over the world, and which, from that fatal moment, have never ceased to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one who remained at the bottom of the box, and it is she alone who has the wonderful power of easing the labours of man, and of rendering his troubles and his sorrows less painful in life. Hesiod. Theog. & Dies. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 1, c. 24.—Hygin. 14.—A daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens. She was sister to Protophania, who sacrificed herself for her country at the beginning of the Boeotian war.

Pandorus, a son of Erechtheus king of Athens.

Pandolis, a town in the country of the Brutii, situate on a mountain. Alexander king of the Molossians died there. Strab. 6.—A town of Epirus. Plin. 4, c. 1.

Pandrosos, a daughter of Cecrops king of Athens, sister to Aglauros and Herse. She was the only one of the sisters who had not the fatal curiosity to open a basket which Minerva had entrusted to their care [vid. Erichthonius], for which sincerity a temple was raised to her near that of Minerva, and a festival instituted in her honour, called Pandrosia. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 738.—Apollod. 3.—Paus. 1, &c.

Panonus, or Pansus, a celebrated painter who was for some time engaged in painting the battle of Marathon. Plin. 35.

Pangæus, a mountain of Thrace, anciently called Mons Casaminus, and joined to mount Rhodope near the sources of the river Nestus. It was inhabited by four different nations. It was on this mountain that Lycurgus the Thracian king was torn to pieces, and that Orpheus called the attention of the wild beasts, and of the mountains and woods, to listen to his song. It abounded in gold and silver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 16, &c. 1, 7, c. 113.—Virg. G. 4, v. 460.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 739.—Thucyd. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 679. 1, 7, v. 482.

Paniasis, a man who wrote a poem upon Hercules, &c. vid. Panysias.

Panionium, a place at the foot of mount Mycale, near the town of Ephesus in Asia Minor, sacred to Neptune of Helice. It was in this place that all the states of Ionia assembled, either to consult for their own safety and prosperity, or to celebrate festivals, or to offer a sacrifice for the good of all the nation, whence the name wasayon, all Ionia. The deputies of the 12 Ionian cities which assembled there were those of Miletus, Myus, Priene, Ephesus, Lebedos, Colophon, Clazomenae, Phocaea, Teos, Chios, Samos, and Erythrae. If the bull offered in sacrifice bellowed, it was accounted an omen of the highest favour, as the sound was particularly acceptable to the god of the sea, as in some manner it resembled the roaring of the waves of the ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 148, &c.—Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 17.

Panius, a place at Carbo-Syria, where Antiochus defeated Scopus, B.C. 198.

Pannonia, a large country of Europe, bounded on the east by Upper Moesia, south by Dalmatia, west by Noricum, and north by the Danube. It was divided by the ancients into Lower and Upper Pannonia. The inhabitants were of Celtic origin, and were first invaded by J. Cæsar, and conquered in the reign of Tiberius. Philip and his son Alexander some ages before had successively conquered it. Sirmium was the ancient capital of all Pannonia, which contains the modern provinces of Croatia, Carniola, Sclavonia, Bosnia, Windisch, March, with part of Servia, and of the kingdoms of Hungary and Austria. Lucian, 3, v. 95. l. 6, v. 220.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 109.—Plin. 3.—Dion. Cass. 49.—Strab. 4 & 7.—Jornand.—Palerc. 2, c. 9.—Suet. Aug. 20.

Panobolus, a Greek poet, mentioned by Suidas.

Panophæus, a surname of Jupiter, either because he was worshipped by every nation on earth, or because he heard the prayers and the supplications which were addressed to him, or because the rest of the gods derived from him their knowledge of futurity (scit omnia, ðapn toz). Ovid. Met. 21, v. 198.—Homer. 11, 8.

Panôpe, or Panôpêa, one of the Nereides, whom sailors generally invoked in storms. Her name signifies, giving every assistance, or seeing everything. Hesiod. Theog. 251.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825.—One of the daughters of Thespius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A town of Phocis, called also Panopus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 19.—Liv. 32, c. 18.—Paus. 10, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 344.—Homer. 11, 2, v. 27. Od. 11, v. 580.

Panôpes, a famous huntsman among the attendants of Acestes king of Sicily, who was one of those that engaged in the games exhibited by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 300.

Panôpeus, a son of Phocus and Asterodia, who accompanied Amphitryon when he made war against the Teleboans. He was father to Epeus, who made the celebrated wooden horse at the siege of Troy. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—A town of Phocis, between Orchomenos and the Cephusus. Paus. 10, c. 4.—Strab. 9.

Panopion, a Roman saved from death by the uncommon fidelity of his servant. When the assassins came to murder him as being proscribed, the servant exchanged clothes with his master, and let him escape by a back door. He afterwards went into his master's bed, and suffered himself to be killed, as if Panopion himself. Val. Max.

Panopôlis, the city of Pan, a town of Egypt, called also Cheemis. Pan had there a temple, where he was worshipped with great solemnity, and represented in a statue fascino longissimo et erecto. Diad. 5.—Strab. 17.

Panoptes, a name of Argus, from the power of his eyes. Apollod. 2.

Panormus, now called Palermo, a town of Sicily, built by the Phœnicians, on the north-west part of the island, with a good and capacious harbour. It was the strongest hold of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and it was at last taken with difficulty by the Romans. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Stat. 14,

v. 262.—A town of the Thracian Chersonesus.—A town of Ionia, near Ephesus.—Another in Crete.—in Macedonia.—Achaia.—Samos.—A Messenian who insulted the religion of the Lacedæmonians. Vid. Gonippus.

Panotii, a people of Scythia, said to have very large ears. Plin. 4, c. 13.

Pansa C. Vibius, a Roman consul who, with A. Hirtius, pursued the murderers of J. Cæsar, and was killed in a battle near Mutina. On his death-bed he advised young Octavius to unite his interest with that of Antony, if he wished to revenge the death of Julius Cæsar, and from his friendly advice soon after rose the celebrated second triumvirate. Some suppose that Pansa was put to death by Octavius himself, or, through him, by the physician Glicon, who poured poison into the wounds of his patient. Pansa and Hirtius were the two last consuls who enjoyed the dignity of chief magistrates of Rome with full power. The authority of the consuls afterwards dwindled into a shadow. Palerc. 2, c. 6.—Dio. 46.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 5.—Plut. 5<sup>o</sup> Appian.

Pantagnotus, a brother of Polycrates tyrant of Samos. Polyæn. 1.

Pantagras, a small river on the eastern coast of Sicily, which falls into the sea, after running a short space in rough cascades over rugged stones and precipices. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.—Ital. 14, v. 232.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 471.

Pantaleon, a king of Pisa, who presided at the Olympic games, B.C. 664, after excluding the Eleans, who on that account expunged the Olympiad from the Fasti, and called it the second Olympiad. They had called for the same reason the eighth the first Anolympiad, because the Pisæans presided.—An Ætolian chief. Liv. 42, c. 15.

Pantanus Iacus, the lake of Lessina, is situate in Apulia at the mouth of the Freuto. Plin. 3, c. 12.

Pantauchus, a man appointed over Ætolia by Demetrius, &c. Plut.

Panteus, a friend of Cleomenes king of Sparta, &c. Plut.

Panthides, a man who married Italia the daughter of Themistocles.

Panthea, the wife of Abradates, celebrated for her beauty and conjugal affection. She was taken prisoner by Cyrus, who refused to visit her, not to be ensnared by the power of her personal charms. She killed herself on the body of her husband, who had been slain in a battle, &c. Vid. Abradates. Xenoph. Cyrop.—Suidas.—The mother of Eumæus the faithful servant of Ulysses.

Pantheon, a celebrated temple at Rome, built by Agrippa, in the reign of Augustus, and dedicated to all the gods, whence the name var Æeoz. It was struck with lightning some time after, and partly destroyed. Adarion repaired it, and it still remains at Rome, converted into a christian temple, the admiration of the curious. Plin. 36, c. 15.—Marcell. 16, c. 10.

Pantheus, or Panthus, a Trojan, son of Othryas the priest of Apollo. When his country was burnt by the Greeks, he followed the fortune of Æneas, and was killed. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 429.

Panthoides, a patronymic of Euphorbus the son of Panthous. Pythagoras is sometimes called by that name, as he asserted that he was Euphorbus during the Trojan war. Horat. 1, od. 28, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 161.—A Spartan general killed by Pericles at the battle of Tanagra.

Pantiopeum, now Kereke, a town of Tau-rica Chersonesus, built by the Milesians, and governed some time by its own laws, and afterwards subdued by the kings of Bosphorus. It was, according to Strabo, the capital of the European Bosphorus. Mithridates the Great died there. Plin.—Strab.

Panticæpes, a river of European Scythia, which falls into the Borysthenes, supposed to be the Samara of the moderns. Herodot. 4, c. 54.

Pantilius, a buffoon, ridiculed by Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 78.

Panyæsis, an ancient Greek, uncle to the historian Herodotus. He celebrated Hercules in one of his poems, and the Ionians in another, and was universally esteemed. Athen. 2.

Panyæsus, a river of Illyricum, falling into the Adriatic, near Dyrrhachium. Platom.

Papeus, a name of Jupiter among the Scythians. Herodot. 4.

Paphæges, a king of Ambracia, killed by a lioness deprived of her whelps. Ovid. in 1b. v. 502.

Paphia, a surname of Venus, because the goddess was worshipped at Paphos.—An ancient name of the island of Cyprus.

Paphlagonia, now Penderachia, a country of Asia Minor, situate at the west of the river Halys, by which it was separated from Cappadocia. It was divided on the west from the Bithynians, by the river Parthenus. Herodot. 1, c. 72.—Strab. 4.—Mela.—Plin.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Cic. Rud. 2, c. 2 & 19.

Paphos, now Bafso, a famous city of the island of Cyprus, founded, as some suppose, about 1184 years before Christ, by Agapenor, at the head of a colony from Arcadia. The goddess of beauty was particularly worshipped there, and all male animals were offered on her altars, which, though 100 in number, daily smoked with the profusion of Arabian frankincense. The inhabitants were very effeminate and lascivious, and the young virgins were permitted by the laws of the place to get a dowry by prostitution. Strab. 8, &c.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 8.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 419, &c. 1, v. 51, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 30, v. 1.—Tacit. A. 3, c. 62. H. 2, c. 2.

Paphus, a son of Pygmalion, by a statue which had been changed into a woman by Venus. Vid. Pygmalion. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 297.

Papia lex, de peregrinis, by Papius the tribune, A. U. C. 588, which required that all strangers should be driven away from Rome. It was afterwards confirmed and extended by the Julian law.—Another, called Papia Poppæa, because it was enacted by the tribunes M. Papius Mutilus and Q. Poppæus Secundus, who had received consular power from the consuls for six months. It was called the Julian law, after it had been published by order of Augustus, who himself was of the Julian family. Vid. Julia lex, de Maritandis ordinibus.—Another, to empower the high priest to choose 20 virgins for the service of the goddess Vesta.—Another, in the age of Augustus. It gave the patron a certain right to the property of his client, if he had left a specified sum of money, or if he had not three children.

Papiænanus, a man who proclaimed himself emperor some time after the Gordians. He was put to death.

Papias, an early christian writer, who first propagated the doctrine of the Millennium. There are remaining some historical fragments of his.

Papinianus, a writer, A. D. 212. Vid. Æmylius Papinianus.

Papinius, a tribune who conspired against Caligula.—A man who destroyed himself, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 49.

Päpria, the wife of Paulus Æmylius. She was divorced. Plat.

Papiria lex, by Papirius Carbo, A. U. C. 621. It required that, in passing or rejecting laws in the comitia, the votes should be given on tablets.—Another, by the tribune Papirius, which enacted that no person should consecrate any edifice, place, or thing, without the consent and permission of the people. Cic. pro Domo, 50.—Another, A. U. C. 563, to diminish the weight, and increase the value of the Roman as.—Another, A. U. C. 427, to give the freedom of the city to the citizens of Aceræ.—Another, A. U. C. 623. It was proposed, but not passed. It recommended the right of choosing a man tribune of the people as often as he wished.

Päpirtus, a centurion engaged to murder Piso the proconsul of Africa. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 49.

A patrician, chosen rex sacrorum, after the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome.—A Roman who wished to gratify his unnatural desires upon the body of one of his slaves called Publius. The slave refused, and was inhumanly treated. This called for the interference of justice, and a decree was made which forbade any person to be detained in fetters, but only for a crime that deserved such a treatment, and only till the criminal had suffered the punishment which the laws directed. Creditors also had a right to arrest the goods, and not the person, of their debtors. *Liv. 8, c. 28.—Carbo, a Roman consul who undertook the defence of Opimius, who was accused of condemning and putting to death a number of citizens on mount Aventinus, without the formalities of a trial. His client was acquitted.—Cursor, a man who first erected a sundial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome, B. C. 291; from which time the days began to be divided into hours.—A dictator who ordered his master of horse to be put to death, because he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic without his consent. The people interfered, and the dictator pardoned him. Cursor made war against the Sabines and conquered them, and also triumphed over the Samnites. His great severity displeased the people. He flourished about 320 years before the christian era. Liv. 9, c. 14.—One of his family surnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilst he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father, of the same name, carried him to the senate-house, where affairs of the greatest importance were then in debate before the senators. The mother of young Papirius wished to know what had passed in the senate; but Papirius, unwilling to betray the secrets of that august assembly, amused his mother by telling her that it had been considered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one husband, than two husbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and she communicated the secret to the other Roman matrons, and, on the morrow, they assembled in the senate, petitioning that one woman might have two husbands, rather than one husband two wives. The senators were astonished at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole mystery, and from that time it was made a law among the senators, that no young man should for the future be introduced into the senate-house, except Papirius. This law was carefully observed till the age of Augustus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the senators. *Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 6.—Carbo, a friend of Cinna and Marius. He raised cabals against Sylla and Pompey, and was at last put to death by order of Pompey, after he had rendered himself odious by a tyrannical consularship, and after he had been proscribed by Sylla.—A consul defeated by the armies of the Cimbric.—Crassus, a dictator who triumphed over the Samnites.—A consul murdered by the Gauls, &c.—A son of Papirius Cursor, who defeated the Samnites, and dedicated a temple to Romulus Quirinus.—Maso, a consul who conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and reduced them into the form of a province. At his return to Rome, he was refused a triumph, upon which he introduced a triumphal procession, and walked with his victorious army to the capitol, wearing a crown of myrtle upon his head. His example was afterwards followed by such generals as were refused a triumph by the Roman senate. Val. Max. 3, c. 6.—The family of the Papirii was patrician, and long distinguished for its services to the state. It bore the different surnames of Crassus, Cursor, Mugillanus, Maso, Prætextatus, and Palus, of which the three first branches became the most illustrious.

Pappia lex, was enacted to settle the rights of husbands and wives, if they had no children.—Another, by which a person less than 50 years old could not marry another of 60.

Pappus, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, in the reign of Theodosius the Great.

Papyrius. Vid. Papirius.

Parabyston, a tribunal of Athens, where causes of inferior consequences were tried by 11 judges. Paus. 1, c. 40.

Paradusius, a town of Syria or Phœnicia. Plin. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 16.—In the plains of Jericho there was a large palace, with a garden beautifully planted with trees, and called Balsami Paradusius.

Parætae, or Taceni, a people between Media and Persia, where Antigonus was defeated by Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum. 8.—Strab. 11 & 16.—Plin. 6, c. 46.

Parætonium, a town of Egypt at the west of Alexandria, where Isis was worshipped. The word Parætonium is used to signify Egyptian, and is sometimes applied to Alexandria, which was situate in the neighbourhood. Strab. 17.—Flor. 4, c. 11.—Lucan. 3, v. 295. l. 10, v. 9.—*Ovid. Parali, a division of the inhabitants of Attica. They received this name from their being near the sea coast, παρά και θάλασσαν.

Paralus, a friend of Dion, by whose assistance he expelled Dionysius.—A son of Pericles. His premature death was greatly lamented by his father. Plut.

Parasia, a country at the east of Media.

Parasius, a son of Philonomia by a shepherd. He was exposed on Erymanthus by his mother, with his twin brother Lycastus. Their lives were preserved.

Parce, powerful goddesses, who presided over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Hesiod, or of Jupiter and Themis, according to the same poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the sea. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment in which we are born, and held a distaff in her hand; Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of our life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors. Their different functions are well expressed in this ancient verse:

Clotho colum retinet, Lachesis net, et Atropos accat.

The name of the Parcae, according to Varro, is derived a partu or parturientia, because they presided over the birth of men; and by corruption the word parca is formed from parta or partus: but, according to Servius, they are called so by antiphrasis, quod nemini parcant. The power of the Parcae was great and extensive. Some suppose that they were subjected to none of the gods but Jupiter, while others support that even Jupiter himself was obedient to their commands; and, indeed, we see the father of the gods, in Homer's Iliad, unwilling to see Patroclus perish, yet obliged, by the superior power of the Fates, to abandon him to his destiny. According to the more received opinion, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befalls us in the world, immediately proceeds from the Fates or Parcae. Some make them ministers of the king of hell, and represent them as sitting at the foot of his throne; others represent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidst the celestial spheres, clothed in robes spangled with stars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pausanias, the names of the Parcae were different from those already mentioned. The most ancient of all, as the geographer observes, was Venus Urania, who presided over the birth of men; the second was Fortuna; Hylia was the third. To these some add a fourth, Proserpina, who often disputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worship of the Parcae was well established in some cities of Greece, and though mankind were well convinced that they were inexorable, and that it was impossible to mitigate them, yet they were eager to show a proper respect to their divinity, by raising them temples and statues. They received the same worship as the Furies, and their votaries yearly sacrificed to them black sheep, during which solemnity the priests were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Parcae were generally represented as three old women with chaplets made with wool, and interwoven with the flowers of the narcissus. They were covered with a white robe, and fillet of the same colour, bound with chaplets. One of them held a distaff, another the spindle, and the third was armed with scissors, with which she cut the thread which her sisters had spun. Their dress is differently represented by some authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of seven stars. She holds a distaff in her hand, reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lachesis wore was variegated with a great number of stars, and near her were placed a variety of spindles. Atropos was clothed in black; she held scissors in her hand, with clues of thread of different sizes, according to the length and shortness of the lives, whose destinies they seemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the invention of these Greek letters, α, β, γ, δ, ε, and others call them the secretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Parcae by the different names of μοῖρα, αἴμα, κρο, εἰσαγγεῖν, which are expressive of their power and of their inexorable decrees. *Hesiod. Theog. & Scnt. Parentalia, a festival annually observed at Rome in honour of the dead. The friends and relations of the deceased assembled on the occasion, when sacrifices were offered, and banquets provided. Annals first established it. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 544.

Parentium, a port and town of Iстриa. Plin. 3, c. 19.

Páris, the son of Priam king of Troy by Hecuba, also called Alexander. He was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country; and when his mother, in the first month of her pregnancy, had dreamed that she should bring forth a torch which should set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future son, and which would end in the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great and so alarming an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child as soon as born. The slave, either touched with humanity, or influenced by Hecuba, did not destroy him, but was satisfied to expose him on mount Ida, where the shepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own son. Some attribute the preservation of his life, before he was found by the shepherds, to the motherly tenderness of a she-bear which suckled him. Young Paris, though educated among shepherds and peasants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity, and from his care in protecting the flocks of mount Ida against the rapacity of the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (Helper or Defender). He gained the esteem of all the shepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favour of Chonea, a nymph of Ida, whom he married, and with whom he lived with the most perfect tenderness. Their conjugal peace was soon disturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddess of discord, who had not been invited to partake of the entertainment, showed her displeasure by throwing into the assembly of the gods who were at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple on which were written the words Detur pulchriori. All the goddesses claimed it as their own: the contention at first became general, but at last only three, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, wished to dispute their respective right to beauty. The gods, unwilling to become arbiters in an affair of so tender and so delicate a nature, appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty to the fairest of the goddesses, and indeed the shepherd seemed properly qualified to decide so great a contest, as his wisdom was so well established, and his prudence and sagacity so well known. The goddesses appeared before their judge without any covering or ornament, and each tried by promises and entreaties to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promised him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the fairest woman in the world for his wife, as Ovid expresses it, Heroid. 17, v. 118.

*Utique cum regnum; belli daret altera laudem;
Troas utinam conjux, tertio dixit, eris.*

After he had heard their several claims and promises, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus, and gave her the golden apple, to which, perhaps, she seemed entitled as the goddess of beauty. This decision of Paris in favour of Venus drew upon the judge and his family the resentment of the two other goddesses. Soon after Priam proposed a contest among his sons and other princes, and promised to reward the conqueror with one of the finest bulls of mount Ida. His emissaries were sent to procure the animal, and it was found in the possession of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The shepherd was desirous of obtaining again this favourite animal, and he went to Troy and entered the list of the combatants. He was received with the greatest applause, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Nestor the son of Neleus; Cygnus son of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Driphobus sons of Priam. He also obtained a superiority over Hector himself, and the prince, enraged to see himself conquered by an unknown stranger, pursued him closely, and Paris must have fallen a victim to his brother's resentment, had he not fled to the altar of Jupiter. This sacred retreat preserved his life, and Cassandra the daughter of Priam, struck with the similarity of the features of Paris with those of her brothers, inquired his birth and his age. From these circumstances she soon discovered that he was her brother, and as such she introduced him to her father and to his children. Priam acknowledged Paris as his son, forgetful of the alarming dream which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealousy ceased among the brothers. Paris did not long suffer himself to remain inactive; he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Hestione, his father's sister, whom Hercules had carried away and obliged to marry Telamon the son of Æacus. This was the pretended motive of his voyage, but the causes were far different. Paris recollected that he was to be the husband of the fairest of women; and if he had been led to form those expectations while he was an obscure shepherd of Ida, he had now every plausible reason to see them realized, since he was acknowledged son of the king of Troy. Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised her to him. On these grounds, therefore, he visited Sparta, the residence of Helen, who had married Menelaus. He was received with every mark of respect, but he abused the hospitality of Menelaus, and while the husband was absent in Crete, Paris persuaded Helen to elope with him and fly to Asia. Helen consented, and Priam received her into his palace without difficulty, as his sister was then detained in a foreign country, and as he wished to show himself as hostile as possible to the Greeks. This affair was soon productive of serious consequences. When Menelaus had married Helen, all her suitors had bound themselves by a solemn oath to protect her person, and to defend her from every violence (Vid. Helena), and therefore the injured husband reminded them of their engagements, and called upon them to recover Helen. Upon this all Greece took up arms in the cause of Menelaus; Agamemnon was chosen general of all the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. Vid. Troja. Paris, meanwhile, who had refused Helen to the petitions and embassies of the Greeks, armed himself with his brothers and subjects to oppose the enemy; but the success of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and at the very sight of Menelaus, whom he had so recently injured, all his resolution vanished, and he retired from the front of the army, where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus, which he undertook at the persuasion of his brother Hector, Paris must have perished, had not Venus interfered, and stolen him from the resentment of his adversary. He nevertheless wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Euryphilus, and Diomedes, and, according to some opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. Vid. Achilles. The death of Paris is differently related; some suppose that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the possession of Hercules, and that when he found himself languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himself to be carried to the feet of Enone, whom he had basely abandoned, and who, in the years of his obscurity, had foretold him that he would solicit her assistance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the presence of Enone, and the nymph, still mindful of their former loves, threw herself upon his body, and stabbed herself to the heart, after she had plentifully bathed it with her tears. According to some authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponnesus, but he was driven on the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta, he kept Helen at his court, and permitted Paris to retire. Vid. Helena. Dictys Cret. 1, 3, & 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Homer. II.—*Ovid. Parisii, a people and a city of Celtic Gaul, now called Paris, the capital of the kingdom of France. Cat. Bell. G. 6, c. 3.

Parissus, a river of Pannonia, falling into the Danube. Strab.

Parium, now Camanar, a town of Asia Minor, on the Propontis, where Archilochus was born, as some say. Strab. 10.—Plin. 7, c. 2, l. 36, c. 5.

Parma, a town of Italy, near Cremona, celebrated for its wool, and now for its cheese. The poet Cassius and the critic Macrobius were born there. It was made a Roman colony, A.U.C. 569. The inhabitants are called Parmenses and Parmani. Liv. 39, c. 55.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, v. 3.—Cic. Phil. 14, v. 3.—*Varro, L. Parmenides, a Greek philosopher of Elis, who flourished about 505 years before Christ. He was son of Pyres of Elis, and the pupil of Xenophanes, or of Anaximander, according to some. He maintained that there were only two elements, fire and the earth; and he taught that the first generation of men was produced from the sun. He first discovered that the earth was round, and habitable only in the two temperate zones, and that it was suspended in the centre of the universe, in a fluid lighter than air, so that all bodies left to themselves fell on its surface. There were, as he supposed, only two sorts of philosophy,—one founded on reason, and the other on opinion. He digested this unpopular system in verses, of which a few fragments remain. Diog.

Parmenio, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his person as a man than as a monarch. When Darius king of Persia offered Alexander all the country which lies at the west of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occasion to observe that he would, without hesitation, accept of these conditions, if he were Alexander. "So would I, were I Parmenio," replied the conqueror. This friendship, so true and inviolable, was sacrificed to a moment of resentment and suspicion; and Alexander, who had too eagerly listened to a light and perhaps a false accusation, ordered Parmenio and his son to be put to death, as if guilty of treason against his person. Parmenio was in the 70th year of his age, B.C. 330. He died in the greatest popularity, and it has been judiciously observed, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.

Parnassus, a mountain of Phocis, anciently called Larnassos, from the boat of Deucalion (Αραβάτ), which was carried there in the universal deluge. It received the name of Parnassus from Parnassus the son of Neptune by Cleobula, and was sacred to the Muses, and to Apollo and Bacchus. The soil was barren, but the valleys and the green woods that covered its sides, rendered it agreeable, and fit for solitude and meditation. Parnassus is one of the highest mountains of Europe, and it is easily seen from the citadel of Corinth, though at the distance of about 80 miles. According to the computation of the ancients, it is one day's journey round. At the north of Parnassus, there is a large plain, about eight miles in circumference. The mountain, according to the poets, had only two tops, called Hyampea and Tithorea, on one of which the city of Delphi was situated, and thence it was called Biceps. Strab. 8, 9.—*Ovid. Paron and Heraclides, two youths who killed a man who had insulted their father. Plut. Apophth.

Paropamisus, a ridge of mountains at the north of India, called the Stony Girdle, or Indian Caucasus. Strab. 15.

Paropus, now Colzaana, a town at the north of Sicily, on the shores of the Tyrrhene sea. Polyb. 1, c. 24.

Paroreia, a town of Thrace, near mount Hæmus. Liv. 39, c. 27.—A town of Peloponnesus.—A district of Phrygia Magna. Strab. 12.

Paros, a celebrated island among the Cyclades, about 7½ miles distant from Naxos, and 28 from Delos. According to Pliny, it is half as large as Naxos, that is, about 36 or 37 miles in circumference, a measure which some of the moderns have extended to 50 and even 80 miles. It has borne the different names of Pactia, Minton, Hiria, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Cabirrus, and Hyleassa. It received the name of Paros, which it still bears, from Paros, a son of Jason, or, as some maintain, of Parrhasius. The island of Paros was rich and rica Chersonesus, built by the Milesians, and governed some time by its own laws, and afterwards subdued by the king of Bosphorus. It was, according to Strabo, the capital of the European Bosphorus. Mithridates the Great died there. Plin.—Strab.

Pantiopæa, a river of European Scythia, which falls into the Borysthenes, supposed to be the Samara of the moderns. Herodot. 4, c. 54.

Pantilius, a buffoon, ridiculed by Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 78.

Panyasis, an ancient Greek, uncle to the historian Herodotus. He celebrated Hercules in one of his poems, and the Ionians in another, and was universally esteemed. Athen. 2.

Panyassus, a river of Illyricum, falling into the Adriatic, near Dyrrhachium. Ptolem.

Papæus, a name of Jupiter among the Scythians. Herodot. 4.

Paphæges, a king of Ambracia, killed by a lioness deprived of her whelps. Ovid. in Ib. v. 502.

Paphia, a surname of Venus, because the goddess was worshipped at Paphos.—An ancient name of the island of Cyprus.

Paphlagonia, now Penderachia, a country of Asia Minor, situate at the west of the river Halys, by which it was separated from Cappadocia. It was divided on the west from the Bithynians, by the river Parthenius. Herodot. 1, c. 72.—Strab. 4.—Mela.—Plin.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Cic. Rull. 2, c. 2 & 19.

Paphos, now Bafo, a famous city of the island of Cyprus, founded, as some suppose, about 1184 years before Christ, by Agapenor, at the head of a colony from Arcadia. The goddess of beauty was particularly worshipped there, and all male animals were offered on her altars, which, though 100 in number, daily smoked with the profusion of Arabian frankincense. The inhabitants were very effeminate and lascivious, and the young virgins were permitted by the laws of the place to get a dowry by prostitution. Strab. 8, &c.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—*Homær. Paphus, a son of Pygmalion, by a statue which had been changed into a woman by Venus. Vid. Pygmalion. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 207.

Papia lex, de peregrinis, by Papius the tribune, A.U.C. 688, which required that all strangers should be driven away from Rome. It was afterwards confirmed and extended by the Julian law.—Another, called Papia Poppæa, because it was enacted by the tribunes M. Papius Mutilus and Q. Poppæus Secundus, who had received consular power from the consuls for six months. It was called the Julian law, after it had been published by order of Augustus, who himself was of the Julian family. Vid. Julia lex, de Mariandis ordinibus.—Another, to empower the high priest to choose 20 virgins for the service of the goddess Vesta.—Another, in the age of Augustus. It gave the patron a certain right to the property of his client, if he had left a specified sum of money, or if he had not three children.

Papianus, a man who proclaimed himself emperor some time after the Gordians. He was put to death.

Papias, an early christian writer, who first propagated the doctrine of the Millennium. There are remaining some historical fragments of his.

Papinianus, a writer, A.D. 217. Vid. Æmylius Papinianus.

Papirius, a tribune who conspired against Caligula.—A man who destroyed himself, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 49.

Papiria, the wife of Paulus Æmylius. She was divorced. Plin.

Papiria lex, by Papirius Carbo, A.U.C. 621. It required that, in passing or rejecting laws in the comitia, the votes should be given on tablets.—Another, by the tribune Papirius, which enacted that no person should consecrate any edifice, place, or thing, without the consent and permission of the people. Cic. pro Domo, 50.—Another, A.U.C. 663, to diminish the weight, and increase the value of the Roman as.—Another, A.U.C. 421, to give the freedom of the city to the citizens of Aceræ.—Another, A.U.C. 623. It was proposed, but not passed. It recommended the right of choosing a man tribune of the people as often as he wished.

Papirius, a centurion engaged to murder Piso the proconsul of Africa. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 49.

A patrician, chosen rex sacrorum, after the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome.—A Roman who wished to gratify his unnatural desires upon the body of one of his slaves called Publius. The slave refused, and was inhumanly treated. This called for the interference of justice, and a decree was made which forbade any person to be detained in fetters, but only for a crime that deserved such a treatment, and only till the criminal had suffered the punishment which the laws directed. Creditors also had a right to arrest the goods, and not the person, of their debtors. Liv. 8, c. 28.—Carbo, a Roman consul who undertook the defence of Opimius, who was accused of condemning and putting to death a number of citizens on mount Aventinus, without the formalities of a trial. His client was acquitted.—Cursor, a man who first erected a sun-dial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome, B.C. 293; from which time the days began to be divided into hours.—A dictator who ordered his master of horse to be put to death, because he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic without his consent. The people interfered, and the dictator pardoned him. Cursor made war against the Sabines and conquered them, and also triumphed over the Sammites. His great severity displeased the people. He flourished about 300 years before the christian era. Liv. 9, c. 14.—One of his family surnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilst he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father, of the same name, carried him to the senate-house, where affairs of the greatest importance were then in debate before the senators. The mother of young Papirius wished to know what had passed in the senate; but Papirius, unwilling to betray the secrets of that august assembly, amused his mother by telling her that it had been considered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one husband, than two husbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and she communicated the secret to the other Roman matrons, and, on the morrow, they assembled in the senate, petitioning that one woman might have two husbands, rather than one husband two wives. The senators were astonished at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole mystery, and from that time it was made a law among the senators, that no young man should for the future be introduced into the senate-house, except Papirius. This law was carefully observed till the age of Augustus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the senators. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 6.—Carbo, a friend of Cinna and Marius. He raised cabals against Sylla and Pompey, and was at last put to death by order of Pompey, after he had rendered himself odious by a tyrannical consulship, and after he had been proscribed by Sylla.—A consul defeated by the armies of the Cimbræ.—Crassus, a dictator who triumphed over the Samnites.—A consul murdered by the Gauls, &c.—A son of Papirius Cursor, who defeated the Samnites, and dedicated a temple to Romulus Quirinus.—Maso, a consul who conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and reduced them into the form of a province. At his return to Rome, he was refused a triumph, upon which he introduced a triumphal procession, and walked with his victorious army to the capitol, wearing a crown of myrtle upon his head. His example was afterwards followed by such generals as were refused a triumph by the Roman senate. Val. Max. 3, c. 6.—The family of the Papirii was patrician, and long distinguished for its services to the state. It bore the different surnames of Crassus, Cursor, Mugillanus, Maso, Protestatus, and Papius, of which the three first branches became the most illustrious.

Pappia lex, was enacted to settle the rights of husbands and wives, if they had no children.—Another, by which a person less than 50 years old could not marry another of 60.

Pappus, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, in the reign of Theodosius the Great.

Papyrius. Vid. Papirius.

Parabyston, a tribunal of Athens, where causes of inferior consequence were tried by 12 judges. Paus. 1, c. 40.

Paradisa, a town of Syria or Phœnicia. Plin. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 16.—In the plains of Jericho there was a large palace, with a garden beautifully planted with trees, and called Balsami Paradisa.

Paratacos, or Taceni, a people between Media and Persia, where Antigonus was defeated by Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum. 8.—Strab. 11 & 16.—Plin. 6, c. 26.

Parætonium, a town of Egypt at the west of Alexandria, where Isis was worshipped. The word Parætonius is used to signify Egyptian, and is sometimes applied to Alexandria, which was situate in the neighbourhood. Strab. 17.—Flor. 4, c. 11.—Lycan. 3, v. 295. l. 10, v. 9.—*Ovid. Parali, a division of the inhabitants of Attica. They received this name from their being near the sea coast, vape and dale.

Paralus, a friend of Dion, by whose assistance he expelled Dionysius.—A son of Pericles. His premature death was greatly lamented by his father. Plut.

Parasia, a country at the east of Media.

Parasius, a son of Philonomia by a shepherd. He was exposed on Erymanthus by his mother, with his twin brother Lycastus. Their lives were preserved.

Paros, powerful goddesses, who presided over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Hesiod, or of Jupiter and Themis, according to the same poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the sea. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment in which we are born, and held a distaff in her hand; Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of our life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors. Their different functions are well expressed in this ancient verse:

Clotho colum retinet, Lachesis net, at Atropos occat.

The name of the Paræ, according to Varro, is derived a partu or parturientulo, because they presided over the birth of men; and by corruption the word parca is formed from parta or partus; but, according to Servius, they are called so by antiphrasis, quod nemini parcant. The power of the Paræ was great and extensive. Some suppose that they were subjected to none of the gods but Jupiter, while others support that even Jupiter himself was obedient to their commands; and, indeed, we see the father of the gods, in Homer's Iliad, unwilling to see Patroclus perish, yet obliged, by the superior power of the Fates, to abandon him to his destiny. According to the more received opinion, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befalls us in the world, immediately proceeds from the Fates or Paræ. Some make them ministers of the king of hell, and represent them as sitting at the foot of his throne; others represent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidst the celestial spheres, clothed in robes spangled with stars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pausanias, the names of the Paræ were different from those already mentioned. The most ancient of all, as the geographer observes, was Venus Urania, who presided over the birth of men; the second was Fortune; Ilythia was the third. To these some add a fourth, Proserpina, who often disputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worship of the Paræ was well established in some cities of Greece, and though mankind were well convinced that they were inexorable, and that it was impossible to mitigate them, yet they were eager to show a proper respect to their divinity, by raising them temples and statues. They received the same worship as the Furies, and their votaries yearly sacrificed to them black sheep, during which solemnity the priests were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Paræ were generally represented as three old women with chaplets made with wool, and interwoven with the flowers of the narcissus. They were covered with a white robe, and fillet of the same colour, bound with chaplets. One of them held a distaff, another the spindle, and the third was armed with scissors, with which she cut the thread which her sisters had spun. Their dress is differently represented by some authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of seven stars. She holds a distaff in her hand, reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lachesis wore was variegated with a great number of stars, and near her were placed a variety of spindles. Atropos was clothed in black; she held scissors in her hand, with clues of thread of different sizes, according to the length and shortness of the lives, whose destinies they seemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the invention of these Greek letters,  $\alpha$ ,  $\beta$ ,  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ , and others call them the secretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Paræ by the different names of  $\mu\epsilon\mu\epsilon\alpha$ ,  $\alpha\iota\omega\alpha$ ,  $\kappa\alpha\tau$ ,  $\epsilon\iota\sigma\alpha\gamma\epsilon\mu\epsilon\eta$ , which are expressive of their power, and of their inexorable decrees. *Hesiod. Parentalia. a festival annually observed at Rome in honour of the dead. The friends and relations of the deceased assembled on the occasion, when sacrifices were offered, and banquets provided. Æneas first established it. Ovid. Fast. 2. v. 544.

Parentium, a port and town of Istria. Plin. 3. c. 19.

PÆRIA, the son of Priam king of Troy by Hecuba, also called Alexander. He was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country; and when his mother, in the first month of her pregnancy, had dreamed that she should bring forth a torch which should set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future son, and which would end in the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great and so alarming an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child as soon as born. The slave, either touched with humanity, or influenced by Hecuba, did not destroy him, but was satisfied to expose him on mount Ida, where the shepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own son. Some attribute the preservation of his life, before he was found by the shepherds, to the motherly tenderness of a she-bear which suckled him. Young Paris, though educated among shepherds and peasants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity, and from his care in protecting the flocks of mount Ida against the rapacity of the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). He gained the esteem of all the shepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favour of Cænone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married, and with whom he lived with the most perfect tenderness. Their conjugal peace was soon disturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddess of discord, who had not been invited to partake of the entertainment, showed her displeasure by throwing into the assembly of the gods who were at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple on which were written the words Detur puicriori. All the goddesses claimed it as their own: the contention at first became general, but at last only three, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, wished to dispute their respective right to beauty. The gods, unwilling to become arbiters in an affair of so tender and so delicate a nature, appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty to the fairest of the goddesses, and indeed the shepherd seemed properly qualified to decide so great a contest, as his wisdom was so well established, and his prudence and sagacity so well known. The goddesses appeared before their judge without any covering or ornament, and each tried by promises and entreaties to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promised him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the fairest woman in the world for his wife, as Ovid expresses it, Heroid. 17. v. 118.

*Utique cum regnum; belli daret altera laudem;
Tynndaridis conjux, terttia dixit, eris.*

After he had heard their several claims and promises, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus, and gave her the golden apple, to which, perhaps, she seemed entitled as the goddess of beauty. This decision of Paris in favour of Venus drew upon the judge and his family the resentment of the two other goddesses. Soon after Priam proposed a contest among his sons and other princes, and promised to reward the conqueror with one of the finest bulls of mount Ida. His emissaries were sent to procure the animal, and it was found in the possession of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The shepherd was desirous of obtaining again this favourite animal, and he went to Troy and entered the list of the combatants. He was received with the greatest applause, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Nestor the son of Neleus; Cygnus son of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Deiphobus sons of Priam. He also obtained a superiority over Hector himself, and the prince, enraged to see himself conquered by an unknown stranger, pursued him closely, and Paris must have fallen a victim to his brother's resentment, had he not fled to the altar of Jupiter. This sacred retreat preserved his life, and Cassandra the daughter of Priam, struck with the similarity of the features of Paris with those of her brothers, inquired his birth and his age. From these circumstances she soon discovered that he was her brother, and as such she introduced him to her father and to his children. Priam acknowledged Paris as his son, forgetful of the alarming dream which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealousy ceased among the brothers. Paris did not long suffer himself to remain inactive; he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Hestione, his father's sister, whom Hercules had carried away and obliged to marry Telamon the son of Æacus. This was the pretended motive of his voyage, but the causes were far different. Paris recollected that he was to be the husband of the fairest of women; and if he had been led to form those expectations while he was an obscure shepherd of Ida, he had now every plausible reason to see them realized, since he was acknowledged son of the king of Troy. Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised her to him. On these grounds, therefore, he visited Sparta, the residence of Helen, who had married Menelaus. He was received with every mark of respect, but he abused the hospitality of Menelaus, and while the husband was absent in Crete, Paris persuaded Helen to elope with him and fly to Asia. Helen consented, and Priam received her into his palace without difficulty, as his sister was then detained in a foreign country, and as he wished to show himself as hostile as possible to the Greeks. This affair was soon productive of serious consequences. When Menelaus had married Helen, all her suitors had bound themselves by a solemn oath to protect her person, and to defend her from every violence [vid. Helena], and therefore the injured husband reminded them of their engagements, and called upon them to recover Helen. Upon this all Greece took up arms in the cause of Menelaus; Agamemnon was chosen general of all the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. Vid. Troja. Paris, meanwhile, who had refused Helen to the petitions and embassies of the Greeks, armed himself with his brothers and subjects to oppose the enemy; but the success of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and at the very sight of Menelaus, whom he had so recently injured, all his resolution vanished, and he retired from the front of the army, where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus, which he undertook at the persuasion of his brother Hector, Paris must have perished, had not Venus

interfered, and stolen him from the resentment of his adversary. He nevertheless wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Euryphilus, and Diomedes, and, according to some opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. Vid. Achilles. The death of Paris is differently related; some suppose that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the possession of Hercules, and that when he found himself languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himself to be carried to the feet of Ænone, whom he had basely abandoned, and who, in the years of his obscurity, had foretold him that he would solicit her assistance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the presence of Ænone, and the nymph, still mindful of their former loves, threw herself upon his body, and stabbed herself to the heart, after she had plentifully bathed it with her tears. According to some authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponnesus, but he was driven on the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta, he kept Helen at his court, and permitted Paris to retire. Vid. Helena. Dictys Cret. 1, 3, & 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—*Homer. Parma, a town of Italy, near Cremona, celebrated for its wool, and now for its cheese. The poet Cassius and the critic Macrobius were born there. It was made a Roman colony, A. U. C. 569. The inhabitants are called Parmentenses and Parmani. Liv. 39, c. 55.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, v. 3.—Cic. Phil. 14, v. 3.—*Varron. L. Parmentides, a Greek philosopher of Elis, who flourished about 505 years before Christ. He was son of Pyres of Elis, and the pupil of Xenophanes, or of Anaximander, according to some. He maintained that there were only two elements, fire and the earth; and he taught that the first generation of men was produced from the sun. He first discovered that the earth was round, and habitable only in the two temperate zones, and that it was suspended in the centre of the universe, in a fluid lighter than air, so that all bodies left to themselves fell on its surface. There were, as he supposed, only two sorts of philosophy,—one founded on reason, and the other on opinion. He digested this unpopular system in verses, of which a few fragments remain. Diog.

Parmenio, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his person as a man than as a monarch. When Darius king of Persia offered Alexander all the country which lies at the west of the Euphrates, with his daughter Staïra in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occasion to observe that he would, without hesitation, accept of these conditions, if he were Alexander. "So would I, were I Parmenio," replied the conqueror. This friendship, so true and inviolable, was sacrificed to a moment of resentment and suspicion; and Alexander, who had too eagerly listened to a light and perhaps a false accusation, ordered Parmenio and his son to be put to death, as if guilty of treason against his person. Parmenio was in the 70th year of his age, B. C. 330. He died in the greatest popularity, and it has been judiciously observed, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.

Parnassus, a mountain of Phocis, anciently called Larnassos, from the boat of Deucalion (Ναυοστ), which was carried there in the universal deluge. It received the name of Parnassus from Parnassus the son of Neptune by Cleobula, and was sacred to the Muses, and to Apollo and Bacchus. The soil was barren, but the valleys and the green woods that covered its sides, rendered it agreeable, and fit for solitude and meditation. Parnassus is one of the highest mountains of Europe, and it is easily seen from the citadel of Corinth, though at the distance of about 80 miles. According to the computation of the ancients, it is one day's journey round. At the north of Parnassus, there is a large plain, about eight miles in circumference. The mountain, according to the poets, had only two tops, called Hyampea and Tithorea, on one of which the city of Delphi was situated, and thence it was called Biceps. Strab. 8, 9.—*Ovid. Paropamisus, a ridge of mountains at the north of India, called the Stony Girdle, or Indian Caucasus. Strab. 15.

Paropus, now Colisano, a town at the north of Sicily, on the shores of the Tyrrhene sea. Polyb. 1, c. 24.

Paroreia, a town of Thrace, near mount Hæmus. Liv. 39, c. 27.—A town of Peloponnesus.—A district of Phrygia Magna. Strab. 12.

Paros, a celebrated island among the Cyclades, about 74 miles distant from Naxos, and 28 from Delos. According to Pliny, it is half as large as Naxos, that is, about 36 or 37 miles in circumference, a measure which some of the moderns have extended to 50 and even 80 miles. It has borne the different names of Pactia, Minoa, Hiria, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Cahurnis, and Hyleassa. It received the name of Paros, which it still bears, from Paros, a son of Jason, or, as some maintain, of Parrhasius. The island of Paros was rich and powerful, and well known for its famous marble, which was always used by the best statuaries. The best quarries were those of Marpesus, a mountain where still caverns of the most extraordinary depth are seen by modern travellers, and admired as the sources from whence the labyrinth of Egypt and the porticoes of Greece received their splendour. According to Pliny, the quarries were so uncommonly deep, that, in the clearest weather, the workmen were obliged to use lamps, from which circumstance the Greeks have called the marble Lychnites, worked by the light of lamps. Paros is also famous for the fine cattle which it produces, and for its partridges, and wild pigeons. The capital city was called Paros. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians, and afterwards a colony of Cretans settled in it. The Athenians made war against it, because it had assisted the Persians in the invasion of Greece, and took it, and it became a Roman province in the age of Pompey. Archilochus was born there. The Parian marbles, perhaps better known by the appellation of Arundelian, were engraved in this island in capital letters, B.C. 204, and, as a valuable chronicle, preserved the most celebrated epochs of Greece, from the year 1584 B.C. These valuable pieces of antiquity were procured originally by M. de Peirisc, a Frenchman, and afterwards purchased by the earl of Arundel, by whom they were given to the university of Oxford, where they are still to be seen. Frideaux published an account of all the inscriptions in 1676. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—C. Nep. in Milit. & Alc.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 593. G. 3, v. 34.—*Ovid. Parphōrus, a native of Colophon, who, at the head of a colony, built a town at the foot of Ida, which was abandoned for a situation nearer his native city. Strab. 14.—Paus. 7, c. 3.

Parrhāsia, a town of Arcadia, founded by Parrhasius the son of Jupiter. The Arcadians are sometimes called Parrhasians, and Arcas Parrhasia, and Carmenta, Evander's mother, Parrhasiada. Lucan. 2, v. 237.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 333.—*Ovid. Parrhāsias, a famous painter, son of Evenor of Ephesus, in the age of Zeuxis, about 415 years before Christ. He was a great master of his profession, and particularly excelled in strongly expressing the violent passions. He was blessed with a great genius, and much invention, and he was particularly happy in his designs. He acquired himself great reputation by his pieces, but by none more than that in which he allegorically represented the people of Athens with all the injustice, the clemency, the fickleness, timidity, the arrogance and inconsistency, which so eminently characterized that celebrated nation. He once entered the lists against Zeuxis, and when they had produced their respective pieces, the birds came to pick with the greatest avidity the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Immediately Parrhasius exhibited his piece, and Zeuxis said, "Remove your curtain, that we may see the painting." The curtain was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himself conquered, by exclaiming, "Zeuxis has deceived birds, but Parrhasius has deceived Zeuxis himself. Parrhasius grew so vain of his art, that he clothed himself in purple, and wore a crown of gold, calling himself the king of painters. He was lavish in his own praises, and by his vanity too often exposed himself to the ridicule of his enemies. Plut. in Ther. de Poet. Aud.—Paus. 1, c. 28.—Plin. 35, v. 10.—Horat. 1, ad. 8.—A son of Jupiter, or, according to some, of Mars, by a nymph called Philonoma.

Parthamisiris, a king of Armenia, in the reign of Trajan.

Parthōon, a son of Agenor and Epicaste, who married Eurycle daughter of Hippodamus, by whom he had many children, among whom were Ceneus and Sterope. Parthōon was brother to Demonice, the mother of Evenus by Mars, and also to Molus, Pylus, and Thestius. He is called Parthōon by Homer, Il. 14.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Hygin. fab. 129 & 239.—A son of Peripetus and father of Aristas. Paus. 8.

Parthōnia and Parthōni, a certain number of desperate citizens of Sparta. During the Messenian war, the Spartans were absent from their city for the space of 20 years, and it was unlawful for them to return, as they had bound themselves by a solemn oath not to revisit Sparta before they had totally subdued Messenia. This long absence alarmed the Lacedæmonian women, as well as the magistrates. The Spartans were reminded by their wives, that if they continued in their resolution, the state must at last decay for want of citizens, and when they had duly considered this embassy, they empowered all the young men in the army, who had come to the war while yet under age, and who therefore were not bound by the oath, to return to Sparta, and, by a familiar and promiscuous intercourse with all the unmarried women of the state, to raise a future generation. It was carried into execution, and the children that sprang from this union were called Parthōnia, or sons of virgins (σπαρτορες). The war with Messenia was some time after ended, and the Spartans returned victorious; but the cold indifference with which they looked upon the Parthōnia was attended with serious consequences. The Parthōnia knew they had no legitimate fathers, and no inheritance, and that therefore their life depended upon their own exertions. This drove them almost to despair. They joined with the Helots, whose maintenance was as precarious as their own, and it was mutually agreed to murder all the citizens of Sparta, and to seize their possessions. This massacre was to be done at a general assembly, and the signal was the throwing of a cap in the air. The whole, however, was discovered through the diffidence and apprehensions of the Helots; and when the people had assembled, the Parthōnia discovered that all was known, by the voice of a crier, who proclaimed that no man should throw up his cap. The Parthōnia, though apprehensive of punishment, were not visibly treated with greater severity; their calamitous condition was attentively examined, and the Spartans, afraid of another conspiracy, and awed by their numbers, permitted them to sail for Italy, with Phalantus their ringleader at their head. They settled in Magna Græcia, and built Tarentum, about 709 years before Christ. Justin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6.—Paus. in Lacon. 8c.—Plut. in Apoph.

Parthōnia, a river of Peloponnesus, flowing by Elis. Paus. 6, c. 21.—The ancient name of Samos. Plin. 5, c. 31.

Parthōnia, a mountain of Peloponnesus at the north of Tegea. Paus.

Parthōnius, a river of Paphlagonia, which, after separating Bithynia, falls into the Euxine sea, near Sesamum. It received its name either because the virgin Diana (Ἄρτεμις) bathed herself there, or perhaps it received it from the purity and mildness of its waters. Herodot. 7, c. 104.—Plin. 6, c. 2.—A mountain of Arcadia, which was said to abound in tortoises. Æn.* 10, v. 748.—A Greek writer, whose romance, de Amatoribus Affectionibus has been edited in 12mo, Basil. 1531.

Parthénion, a temple of Athens, sacred to Minerva. It was destroyed by the Persians, and afterwards rebuilt by Pericles in a more magnificent manner, and still exists. All the circumstances which related to the birth of Minerva were beautifully and minutely represented in bas-relief, on the front of the entrance. The statue of the goddess, 26 cubits high, and made of gold and ivory, passed for one of the masterpieces of Phidias. Plin. 34.

Parthénopœna, a son of Meleager and Atalanta, or, according to some, of Milanor and another Atalanta. He was one of the seven chiefs who accompanied Adrastus the king of Argos in his expedition against Thebes. He was killed by Amphidicus. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 3, c. 12. l. 9, c. 19.—A son of Talauus.

Parthénopœ, one of the Sirens.—A daughter of Scythiaulus. Apollod.—A city of Campania, afterwards called Neapolis, or the new city, when it had been beautified and enlarged by a colony from Eubœa. It is now called Naples. It received the name of Parthenopœ from one of the Sirens, whose body was found on the sea-shore there. Virg. G. 4, v. 564.—Strab. 1 & 5.—Paterc. 1, c. 4.—*Homer. Parthia, a celebrated country of Asia, bounded on the west by Media, south by Carmania, north by Hyrcania, and east by Aria, &c., containing, according to Ptolemy, 25 large cities, the most capital of which was called Hecatompylos, from its hundred gates. Some suppose that the present capital of the country is built on the ruins of Hecatompylos. According to some authors, the Parthians were Scythians by origin, who made an invasion on the more southern provinces of Asia, and at last fixed their residence near Hyrcania. They long remained unknown and unnoticed, and became successively tributary to the empire of the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians. When Alexander invaded Asia, the Parthians submitted, like the other dependent provinces of Persia, and they were for some time under the power of Eumenes, Antigonus, Seleucus, Nicanor, and Antiochus, till the rapacity and oppression of Agathocles, a lieutenant of the latter, roused their spirit, and fomented rebellion. Arsaces, a man of obscure origin, but blessed with great military powers, placed himself at the head of his countrymen, and laid the foundation of the Parthian empire, about 250 years before the christian era. The Macedonians attempted in vain to recover it; a race of active and vigilant princes, who assumed the surname of Arsacides, from the founder of their kingdom, increased its power, and rendered it so formidable, that, while it possessed 18 kingdoms between the Caspian and Arabian seas, it even disputed the empire of the world with the Romans, and could never be subdued by that nation, which had seen no people on earth unconquered by their arms. It remained a kingdom till the reign of Artabanus, who was killed about the year 229 of the christian era, and from that time it became a province of the newly re-established kingdom of Persia, under Artaxerxes. The Parthians were naturally strong and warlike, and were esteemed the most expert horsemen and archers in the world. The peculiar custom of discharging their arrows while they were retiring full speed, has been greatly celebrated by the ancients, particularly by the poets, who all observe that their flight was more formidable than their attacks. This manner of fighting, and the wonderful address and dexterity with which it was performed, gained them many victories. They were addicted much to drinking, and to every manner of lewdness, and their laws permitted them to raise children even by their mothers and sisters. Strab. 2, 6, &c.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Pior. 3, c. 5.—*Virg. Parthyènes, a province of Parthia, according to Ptolemy, though some authors support that it is the name of Parthia itself.

Parysades, a king of Pontus, B.C. 310. Diod.—A king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, who flourished 284 B.C.

Parysatis, a Persian princess, wife of Darius Oechus, by whom she had Artaxerxes, Memnon, and Cyrus the younger. She was so extremely partial to her younger son, that she committed the greatest cruelties to encourage his ambition, and she supported him with all her interest in his rebellion against his brother Memnon. The death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa, was revenged with the grossest barbarity, and Parysatis sacrificed to her resentment all such as she found concerned in his fall. She also poisoned Statira the wife of her son Artaxerxes, and ordered one of the eunuchs of the court to be flayed alive, and his skin to be stretched on two poles before her eyes, because he had, by order of the king, cut off the hand and the head of Cyrus. These cruelties offended Artaxerxes, and he ordered his mother to be confined in Babilon; but they were soon after reconciled, and Parysatis regained all her power and influence till the time of her death. Plut. in Art.—Ctes.

Pasargada, a town of Persia, near Carmania, founded by Cyrus on the very spot where he had conquered Astyages. The kings of Persia were always crowned there, and the Pasargadae were the noblest families of Persia, in the number of which were the Achæmenides. Strab. 15.—Plin. 8, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, c. 125.—Mela. 3, c. 8.

Paseas, a tyrant in Sicily in Peloponnesus, father to Abanidas, &c. Plut. in Arot.

Pasicles, a grammarian, &c.

Pasiorâtes, a king of part of the island of Cyprus. Plut.

Pasiphae, a daughter of the Sun and of Perseis, who married Minos king of Crete. She disgraced herself by her unnatural passion for a bull, which, according to some authors, she was enabled to gratify by means of the artist Dædalus. This celebrated bull had been given to Minos by Neptune, to be offered on his altars, but as the monarch refused to sacrifice the animal on account of his beauty, the god revenged his disobedience by inspiring Pasiphæ with an unnatural love for it. This fabulous tradition, which is universally believed by the poets, who observe that the Minotaur was the fruit of this infamous commerce, is refuted by some writers, who suppose that the infidelity of Pasiphæ to her husband was betrayed in her affection for another called Taurus; and that Dædalus, by permitting his house to be the asylum of the two lovers, was looked upon as accessory to the gratification of Pasiphæ's lust. From this amour with Taurus, as it is further remarked, the queen became mother of twins, and the name of Minotaurus arises from the resemblance of the children to the husband and the lover of Pasiphæ. Minos had four sons by Pasiphæ, Casteus, Deucalion, Glaucus, and Androgeus, and three daughters, Hecate, Ariadne, and Phædra. Vid. Minotaurus. Plato de Min.—Plut. in Thez.—Apollon. 2, c. 1.—*Virg. Pasithæa, one of the Graces, also called Aglaia. Paus. 9, c. 35.—One of the Nereides. Hesiod.—A daughter of Atlas.

Pasitigris, a name given to the river Tigris. Strab. 15.—Plin. 6, c. 20.

Passaron, a town of Epirus, where, after sacrificing to Jupiter, the kings swore to govern according to law, and the people to obey and to defend the country. Plut. in Pyrr.—Liv. 45, c. 26 & 33.

Pasissinus, a Roman who reduced Numidia, &c. Tacit. Ann.—Paulus, a Roman knight, nephew to the poet Propertius, whose elegiac compositions he imitated. He likewise attempted lyric poetry, and with success, and chose for his model the writings of Horace. Plin. ep. 6 & 9.—Crispus, a man distinguished as an orator, but more as the husband of Domitia, and afterwards of Agrippina, Nero's mother, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 30.

Passus, a Thessalian in Alexander's army, &c. Plin. 6, c. 20.

Patala, a harbour at the mouth of the Indus, in an island called Fatata. The river here begins to form a Delta like the Nile. Pliny places this island within the torrid zone. Plin. 9, c. 73.—Curt. 9, c. 7.—Strab. 15.—Arrian. 6, c. 17.

Pâtara (orum), now Patera, a town of Lycia, situate on the eastern side of the mouth of the river Xanthus, with a capacious harbour, a temple, and an oracle of Apollo, surnamed Patararus, where was preserved and shown, in the age of Pausanias, a brazen cap, which had been made by the hands of Vulcan, and presented by the god to Telephus. The god was supposed by some to reside for the six winter months at Patara, and the rest of the year at Delphi. The city was greatly embellished by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who attempted in vain to change its original name into that of his wife Arsinoë. Liv. 37, c. 15.—Strab. 14.—Paus. 9, c. 41.—Horat. 3, od. 14, v. 64.—*Ovid. Pâtavium, a city of Italy, at the north of the Po, on the shores of the Adriatic, now called Padua, and once said to be capable of sending 20,000 men into the field. Vid. Padua. It is the birthplace of Livy, from which reason some writers have denominated Pataninitis those peculiar expressions of a provincial dialect, which they seem to discover in the historian's style, not strictly agreeable to the purity and refined language of the Roman authors who flourished in or near the Augustan age. Martial. 11, ep. 17, v. 8.—Quintil. 1, c. 5, 56, l. 8, c. 13.—Liv. 10, c. 2, l. 41, c. 27.—Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

Paterculus, a Roman, whose daughter Sulpicia was pronounced the chastest matron at Rome. Plin. 7, c. 35.—Velleius, an historian. Vid. Velleius.

Patizithes, one of the Persian Magi, who raised his brother to the throne because he resembled Smerdis the brother of Cambyses, &c. Herodot. 3, c. 61.

Patmos, one of the Cyclades, with a small town of the same name, situate at the south of Icaria, and measuring 30 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or only 13, according to modern travellers. It has a large harbour, near which are some broken columns, the Romans generally banished their culprits there. It is now called Palmosa. Strab.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Patras, an ancient town at the north-west of Peloponnesus, anciently called Arar. Diana had there a temple, and a famous statue of gold and ivory. Paus. 7, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 417.—Liv. 27, c. 29.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

Patro, a daughter of Thestius. Apollod.—An epicurean philosopher intimate with Cicero. Cic. ad Div. 13, c. 1.

Pâtrocles, an officer of the fleet of Seleucus and Antiochus. He discovered several countries, and it is said that he wrote a history of the world. Strab.—Plin. 6, c. 17.

Patrocli, a small island on the coast of Attica. Paus. 4, c. 5.

Pâtrocclus, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, son of Menœtius by Sthenela, whom some call Philomela, or Polymela. The accidental murder of Clysonymus the son of Amphidamus, in the time of his youth, obliged him to fly from Opus, where his father reigned. He retired to the court of Peleus king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the most intimate friendship with Achilles the monarch's son. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war, Patrocclus also accompanied them at the express command of his father, who had visited the court of Peleus, and he embarked with 10 ships from Phthia. He was the constant companion of Achilles, and he lodged in the same tent; and when his friend refused to appear in the field of battle, because he had been offended by Agamemnon, Patrocclus imitated his example, and by his absence was the cause of the overthrow of the Greeks. But at last Nestor prevailed upon him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. The valour of Patrocclus, together with the terror which the sight of the arms of Achilles inspired, soon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for safety. He would have broken down the walls of the city; but Apollo, who interested himself for the Trojans, placed himself to oppose him, and Hector, at the instigation of the god, dismounted from his chariot to attack him, as he attempted to strip one of the Trojans whom he had slain. The engagement was obstinate, but at last Patrocclus was overpowered by the valour of Hector, and the interposition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, and Hector would have severed his head from his body had not Ajax and Menelaus intervened. His body was at last recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the bitterest lamentations. His funeral was observed with the greatest solemnity. Achilles sacrificed near the burning pile 17 young Trojans, besides four of his horses, and two of his dogs, and the whole was concluded by the exhibition of funeral games, in which the conquerors were liberally rewarded by Achilles. The death of Patroclus, as it is described by Homer, gave rise to new events; Achilles forgot his resentment against Agamemnon, and entered the field to avenge the fall of his friend, and his anger was gratified only by the slaughter of Hector, who had more powerfully kindled his wrath by appearing at the head of the Trojan armies in the armour which had been taken from the body of Patroclus. The patronymic of Actorides is often applied to Patroclus, because Actor was father to Menœtius. Dictys Cræ. 1, &c.—Homer. 9. li. &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Hygin. fab. 97 & 275.—*Ovid. Patron, an Arcadian at the games exhibited by Æneas in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 298.

Patrous, a surname of Jupiter among the Greeks, represented by his statues as having three eyes, which some suppose to signify that he reigned in three different places, in heaven, on earth, and in hell. Paus. 2.

Patuloius, a surname of Janus, which he received a patulo, because the doors of his temple were always open in the time of war. Some suppose that he received it because he presided over gates, or because the year began by the celebration of his festivals. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 129.

Paventia, a goddess who presided over terror at Rome, and who was invoked to protect her votaries from its effects. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11.

Paula, the first wife of the emperor Helio-gabalus. She was daughter of the prefect of the pretorian guards. The emperor divorced her, and Paula retired to solitude and obscurity with composure.

Paulina, a Roman lady who married Saturninus, a governor of Syria, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. Her conjugal peace was disturbed, and violence was offered to her virtue by a young man called Mundus, who was enamoured of her, and who had caused her to come to the temple of Isis by means of the priests of the goddess, who declared that Anubis wished to communicate to her something of moment. Saturninus complained to the emperor of the violence which had been offered to his wife, and the temple of Isis was overturned and Mundus banished, &c. Joseph. A. 18, c. 4.—The wife of the philosopher Seneca, who attempted to kill herself when Nero had ordered her husband to die. The emperor, however, prevented her, and she lived some few years after in the greatest melancholy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 63, &c.—A sister of the emperor Adrian.—The wife of the emperor Maximinus.

Paulinus Pompeius, an officer in Nero's reign, who had the command of the German armies, and finished the works on the banks of the Rhine, which Drusus had begun 63 years before. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 53.—Suetonius.—A Roman general, the first who crossed mount Atlas with an army. He wrote a history of this expedition in Africa, which is lost. Paulinus also distinguished himself in Britain, &c. He followed the arms of Otho against Vitellius. Plin. 5, c. 1.—Valerius, a friend of Vespasian.—Julius, a Batavian nobleman, put to death by Fonteius Capito, on pretence of rebellion. Tacit. H. 4, c. 13.

Paulus Æmilius, a Roman, son of the Æmilius who fell at Cannæ, was celebrated for his victories, and received the surname of Macedonicus from his conquest of Macedonia. In the early part of life he distinguished himself by his uncommon application, and by his fondness for military discipline. His first appearance in the field was attended with great success, and the barbarians that had revolted in Spain were reduced with the greatest facility under the power of the Romans. In his first consulship his arms were directed against the Ligurians, whom he totally subjected. His applications for a second consulship proved abortive; but when Perseus the king of Macedonia had declared war against Rome, the abilities of Paulus were remembered, and he was honoured with the consulship about the 60th year of his age. After this appointment he behaved with uncommon vigour, and soon a general engagement was fought near Pydna. The Romans obtained the victory, and Perseus saw himself deserted by all his subjects. In two days the conqueror made himself master of all Macedonia, and soon after the fugitive monarch was brought into his presence. Paulus did not exult over his fallen enemy; but when he had gently rebuked him for his temerity in attacking the Romans, he addressed himself in a pathetic speech to the officers of his army who surrounded him, and feelingly enlarged on the instability of fortune, and the vicissitude of all human affairs. When he had finally settled the government of Macedonia with 10 commissioners from Rome, and after he had sacked 70 cities of Epirus, and divided the booty amongst his soldiers, Paulus returned to Italy. He was received with the usual acclamations, and though some of the seditious soldiers attempted to prevent his triumphal entry into the capital, yet three days were appointed to exhibit the fruits of his victories. Perseus, with his wretched family, adorned the triumph of the conqueror, and as they were dragged through the streets before the chariot of Paulus, they drew tears of compassion from the people. The riches which the Romans derived from this conquest were immense, and the people were freed from all taxes till the consulship of Hir-tius and Pansa; but while every one of the citizens received some benefit from the victories of Paulus, the conqueror himself was poor, and appropriated for his own use nothing of the Macedonian treasures except the library of Perseus. In the office of censor, to which he was afterwards elected, Paulus behaved with the greatest moderation, and at his death, which happened about 168 years before the christian era, not only the Romans, but their very enemies, confessed, by their lamentations, the loss which they had sustained. He had married Papiria, by whom he had two sons, one of whom was adopted by the family of Maximus, and the other by that of Scipio Africanus. He had also two daughters, one of whom married a son of Cato, and the other Ælius Tubero. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and when his friends wished to reprobate his conduct in doing so, by observing that she was young and handsome, and that she had made him father of a fine family, Paulus replied, that the shoe which he then wore was new and well made, but that he was obliged to leave it off, though no one but himself, as he said, knew where it pinched him. He married a second wife, by whom he had two sons, whose sudden death exhibited to the Romans, in the most engaging view, their father's philosophy and stoicism. The elder of these sons died five days before Paulus triumphed over Perseus, and the other three days after the public procession. This domestic calamity did not shake the firmness of the conqueror; yet before he retired to a private station, he harangued the people, and in mentioning the severity of fortune upon his family, he expressed his wish that every evil might be averted from the republic by the sacrifice of the domestic prosperity of an individual. Plut. in Vita.—Liv. 43, 44, &c. Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.—Samosatenus, an author in the reign of Gallienus.—Maximus. Vid. Maximus Fabius.—Egineta, a Greek physician whose work was edited apud, Aid. fol. 1758.—L. Æmylius, a consul, who, when opposed to Annibal in Italy, checked the rashness of his colleague Varro, and recommended an imitation of the conduct of the great Fabius, by harassing and not facing the enemy in the field. His advice was rejected, and the battle of Cannæ, so glorious to Annibal, and so fatal to Rome, soon followed. Paulus was wounded, but when he might have escaped from the slaughter, by accepting a horse generously offered by one of his officers, he disdain to fly, and perished by the darts of the enemy. Horat. od. 12, v. 38. Liv. 21, c. 39.—Julius, a Latin poet in the age of Adrian and Antoninus. He wrote some poetical pieces, recommended by A. Gellius.

PAULUS. Vid. Æmylius.

FAVOR, an emotion of the mind which received divine honours among the Romans, and was considered a most tremendous power, as the ancients swore by her name in the most solemn manner. Tullius Hostilius, the third king of Rome, was the first who built her temples, and raised altars to her honour, as also to Pallor the goddess of paleness. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.

PAUSANIAS, a Spartan general, who greatly signalized himself at the battle of Platæa, against the Persians. The Greeks were very sensible of his services, and they rewarded his merit with the tenth of the spoils taken from the Persians. He was afterwards set at the head of the Spartan armies, and extended his conquests in Asia; but the haughtiness of his behaviour created him many enemies, and the Athenians soon obtained a superiority in the affairs of Greece. Pausanias was dissatisfied with his countrymen, and he offered to betray Greece to the Persians, if he received in marriage, as the reward of his perfidy, the daughter of their monarch. His intrigues were discovered by means of a youth, who was entrusted with his letters to Persia, and who refused to go, on the recollection that such as had been employed in that office before had never returned. The letters were given to the Ephori of Sparta, and the perfidy of Pausanias laid open. He fled for safety to a temple of Minerva, and as the sanctity of the place screened him from the violence of his pursuers, the sacred building was surrounded with heaps of stones, the first of which was carried there by the indignant mother of the unhappy man. He was starved to death in the temple, and died about 471 years before the christian era. There was a festival, and solemn games instituted in his honour, in which only free-born Spartans contended. There was also an oration spoken in his praise, in which his actions were celebrated, particularly the battle of Platæa, and the defeat of Mardonius. C. Nep. in Vita.—Plut. in Arist. & Them.—Herodot. 9.—A favourite of Philip king of Macedonia. He accompanied the prince in an expedition against the Illyrians, in which he was killed.—Another, at the court of king Philip, very intimate with the preceding. He was grossly and unaturally abused by Attalus, one of the friends of Philip, and when he complained of the injuries he had received, the king in some measure disregarded his remonstrances, and wished them to be forgotten. This incensed Pausanias; he resolved to revenge himself, and when he had heard from his master Hermocrates the sophist that the most effectual way to render himself illustrious was to murder a person who had signalized himself by uncommon actions, he stabbed Philip as he entered a public theatre. After this bloody action he attempted to make his escape to his chariot, which waited for him at the gate of the city, but he was stopped accidentally by the twig of a vine, and fell down. Attalus, Perdicas, and other friends of Philip, who pursued him, immediately fell upon him and despatched him. Some support that Pausanias committed this murder at the instigation of Olympias the wife of Philip, and of her son Alexander. Diad. 16.—Justin. 9.—Plut. in Apoph.—A king of Macedonia, deposed by Amyntas, after a year's reign. Diad.—Another, who attempted to seize upon the kingdom of Macedonia, from which he was prevented by Iphicrates the Athenian.—A friend of Alexander the Great, made governor of Sardis.—A physician in the age of Alexander. Plut.—A celebrated orator and historian, who settled at Rome, A.D. 170, where he died in a very advanced age. He wrote a history of Greece, in 10 books, in the Ionic dialect, in which he gives, with great precision and geographical knowledge, an account of the situation of its different cities, their antiquities, and the several curiosities which they contained. He has also interwoven mythology in his historical account, and introduced many fabulous traditions and superstitious stories. In each book the author treats of a separate country, such as Attica, Arcadia, Messenia, Elis, &c. Some suppose that he gave a similar description of Phœnicia and Syria. There was another Pausanias, a native of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who wrote some declamations, and who is often confounded with the historian of that name.—The best edition of Pausanias is that of Khunius, fol. Lips. 1096.—A Lacedæmonian, who wrote a partial account of his country.—A statue of Apollonia, whose abilities were displayed in adorning Apollo's temple at Delphi. Paus. 10, c. 9.—A king of Sparta, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, who died 397 B.C., after a reign of 14 years.

PAUSIAS, a painter of Sicily, the first who understood how to apply colours to wood or ivory by means of fire. He made a beautiful painting of his mistress Glycère, whom he represented as sitting on the ground, and making garlands with flowers, and from this circumstance the picture, which was bought afterwards by Lucullus for two talents, received the name of Stephanoglocon. Some time after the death of Pausias, the Sicyonians were obliged to part with the pictures which they possessed to deliver themselves from an enormous debt, and M. Scæurus the Roman bought them all, in which were those of Pausias, to adorn the theatre, which had been built during his edification. Pausias lived about 350 years before Christ. Plin. 35, c. 11.

PAUSILYPPUS, a mountain near Naples, which receives its name from the beauty of its situation, (græco λυπε, cæsare facio dolor). The natives show there the tomb of Virgil, and regard it with the highest veneration. There were near some fishponds belonging to the emperor. The mountain is now famous for a subterraneous passage near half a mile in length, and 22 feet in breadth, which affords a safe and convenient passage to travellers. Stat. 4, Sylv. 4, v. 52.—Plin. 9, c. 53.—Strab. 5.—Sæc. ep. 5 & 57.

PAK, an allegorical divinity among the ancients

The Athenians raised her a statue, which represented her as holding Pluto the god of wealth in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to prosperity and to opulence; and they were the first who erected an altar to her honour after the victories obtained by Timotheus over the Lacedæmonian power, though Plutarch asserts it had been done after the conquests of Cimón over the Persians. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty, and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian built her a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire in the reign of Commodus. It was customary for men of learning to assemble in that temple, and even to deposit their writings there, as in a place of the greatest security. Therefore when it was burnt, not only books, but also many valuable things, jewels, and immense treasures, were lost in the general conflagration. C. Nep. in Timoth. 2.—Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 9, c. 16.

Paxos, a small island between Ithaca and the Echinades in the Ionian sea.

Pæas, a shepherd, who, according to some, set on fire the pile on which Hercules was burnt. The hero gave him his bow and arrows. Apollod. 2.

Pæneus, an illegitimate son of Antenor. Homer. Il. 7.

Pædicia, a woman of whom Horace, l. sat. 3, v. 39, speaks of as a contemptible character.

Pædani. Vid. Pedum.

Pædantius, a prefect of Rome, killed by one of his slaves for having denied him his liberty, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 42.

Pædasa (orum), a town of Caria, near Halicarnassus. Liv. 33, c. 30.

Pædæus, a son of Bucolion the son of Laomedon. His mother was one of the Naiades. He was killed in the Trojan war by Euryalus. Homer. Il. 6, v. 21.—One of the four horses of Achilles. As he was not immortal like the other three, he was killed by Sarpedon. Id. 16.—A town near Pylos in the Peloponnesus.

Pædiadis, a part of Bactriana, through which the Oxus flows. Polyb.

Pædias, the wife of Cranaus.

Pædinus Blossus, a Roman, accused by the people of Cyrene of plundering the temple of Esculapius. He was condemned under Nero, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 18.—A nephew of Julius Cæsar, who commanded one of his legions in Gaul, &c.—Pædicola, a lawyer in the age of Horace. His father was one of J. Cæsar's heirs, and became consul with Augustus after Pansa's death.

Pædo, a lawyer, patronized by Domitian. Juv. 7, v. 120.—Albinovanus. Vid. Albinovanus.

Pædianus Asconius, flourished A.D. 76.

Pædum, a town of Latium, about 10 miles from Rome, conquered by Camillus. The inhabitants were called Pædani. Liv. 3, c. 39. l. 8, c. 13 & 14.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, v. 2.

Pægas, a fountain at the foot of mount Arganthus in Bithynia, into which Hylas fell. Propert. 1, el. 20, v. 33.

Pægasides, a name given to the Muses from the horse Pegasus, or from the fountain which Pegasus had raised from the ground, by striking it with his foot. Ovid. Her. 15, v. 27.

Pægasia, a name given to Cænone by Ovid, Her. 5, because she was daughter of the river (ἑρῆνη) Cæbrinus.

Pægasium stagnum, a lake near Ephesus, which arose from the earth when Pegasus struck it with his foot.

Pægasus, a winged horse sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus had cut off her head. He received his name from his being born, according to Hesiod, near the sources (πηγῆ) of the ocean. As soon as born he left the earth, and flew up into heaven, or rather, according to Ovid, he fixed his residence on mount Helicon, where, by striking the earth with his foot, he instantly raised a fountain, which has been called Hippocrene. He became the favourite of the Muses; and being afterwards tamed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon to conquer the Chimæra. No sooner was this fiery monster destroyed, than Pegasus threw down his rider, because he was a mortal, or rather, according to the more received opinion, because he attempted to fly to heaven. This act of temerity in Bellerophon was punished by Jupiter, who sent an insect to torment Pægasus, which occasioned the melancholy fall of his rider. Pægasus continued his flight up to heaven, and was placed among the constellations by Jupiter. Perseus, according to Ovid, was mounted on the horse Pægasus, when he destroyed the sea monster which was going to devour Andromeda. *Hesiod. Theog. 282.—Horat. 4, od. 11, v. 20.—Homer. Pælago, a eunuch, one of Nero's favourites, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 59.

Pælagon, a man killed by a wild boar. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 360.—A son of Asopus and Metope.—A Phocian, one of whose men conducted Cadmus, and showed him where, according to the oracle, he was to build a city.

Pælarge, a daughter of Potmeus, who re-established the worship of Ceres in Bozotia. She received divine honours after death. Paus. 9, c. 25.

Pælasgi, a people of Greece, supposed to be one of the most ancient in the world. They first inhabited Argolis in Peloponnesus, which from them received the name of Pælasgia, and about 1883 years before the christian era they passed into Æmonia, and were afterwards dispersed in several parts of Greece. Some of them fixed their habitation in Epirus, others in Crete, others in Italy, and others in Lesbos. From these different changes of situation in the Pælasgians, all the Greeks are indiscriminately called Pælasgians, and their country Pælasgia, though, more properly speaking, it should be confined to Thessaly, Epirus, and Peloponnesus in Greece. Some of the Pælasgians, that had been driven from Attica, settled at Lemnos, where some time after they carried some Athenian women, whom they had seized in an expedition on the coast of Attica. They raised some children by these captive females, but they afterwards destroyed them with their mothers, through jealousy, because they differed in manners as well as language from them. This horrid murder was attended by a dreadful pestilence, and they were ordered, to expiate their crime, to do whatever the Athenians commanded them. This was to deliver their possessions into their hands. The Pælasgians seem to have received their name from Pælasgus, the first king and founder of their nation. Paus. 8, c. 1.—Strab. 5.—Herodot. 1.—Plut. in Rom.—Virg. Æn. 1.—Ovid. Met.—Flacc.—Senec. in Med. & Agam.

Pælasgia, or Pælasgiotis, a country of Greece, whose inhabitants are called Pælasgi or Pælasgiote. Every country of Greece, and all Greece in general, is indiscriminately called Pelasgia, though the name should be more particularly confined to a part of Thessaly, situate between the Peneus, the Alacmon, and the Sperchius. The maritime borders of this part of Thessaly were afterwards called Magnesia, though the sea or its shore still retained the name of Pelasgicus Sinus, now the gulf of Volo. Pelasgia is also one of the ancient names of Epirus, as also of Peloponnesus. Vid. Pelasgi.

Pelasgus, a son of Terra, or, according to others, of Jupiter and Niobe, who reigned in Sicily, and gave his name to the ancient inhabitants of Peloponnesus.

Pelēthroniū, an epithet given to the Lapithæ, because they inhabited the town of Pelēthronium, at the foot of mount Pelion in Thessaly; or because one of their number bore the name of Pelēthronius. It is to them that mankind is indebted for the invention of the bit with which they tamed their horses with so much dexterity. Virg. G. 3, v. 115. — Ovid. Met. 12, v. 452. — Lucan. 6, v. 387.

Pelēus, a king of Thessaly, son of Æacus and Endeis the daughter of Chiron. He married Thetis, one of the Nereides, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. He was necessary to the death of his brother Phocus, and on that account he was obliged to leave his father's dominions. He retired to the court of Eurytus the son of Actor, who reigned at Phthia, or according to the less received opinion of Ovid, he fled to Ceyx king of Trachinia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, with the usual ceremonies, and the monarch gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Some time after this Pelēus and Eurytus went to the chase of the Calydonian boar, where the father-in-law was accidentally killed by an arrow which his son-in-law had aimed at the beast. This unfortunate event obliged him to banish himself from the court of Phthia, and he retired to Iolchos, where he was purified of the murder of Eurytus, by Acastus the king of the country. His residence at Iolchos was short; Astydamia the wife of Acastus became enamoured of him, and when she found him insensible to her passionate declaration, she accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The monarch partially believed the accusations of his wife, but not to violate the laws of hospitality, by putting him instantly to death, he ordered his officers to conduct him to mount Pelion, on pretence of hunting, and there to tie him to a tree, that he might become the prey of the wild beasts of the place. The orders of Acastus were faithfully obeyed; but Jupiter, who knew the innocence of his grandson Pelēus, ordered Vulcan to set him at liberty. As soon as he had been delivered from danger, Pelēus assembled his friends to punish the ill-treatment which he had received from Acastus. He forcibly took Iolchos, drove the king from his possessions, and put to death the wicked Astydamia. After the death of Antigone, Pelēus courted Thetis, of whose superior charms Jupiter himself had been enamoured. His pretensions however, were rejected, and, as he was a mortal, the goddess fled from him with the greatest abhorrence; and the more effectually to evade his inquiries, she generally assumed the shape of a bird, or of a tree, or of a tigress. Pelēus became more animated from her refusal; he offered a sacrifice to the gods, and Proteus informed him that to obtain Thetis he must surprise her while she was asleep in her grotto, near the shores of Thessaly. This advice was immediately followed, and Thetis, unable to escape from the grasp of Pelēus, at last consented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greatest solemnity, and all the gods attended, and made them each the most valuable presents. The goddess of discord was the only one of the deities who was not present, and she punished this seeming neglect by throwing an apple into the midst of the assembly of the gods, with the inscription of Detur pulchriori. Vid. Discordia. From the marriage of Pelēus and Thetis was born Achilles, whose education was early entrusted to the Centaur Chiron, and afterwards to Phenix the son of Amyntor. Achilles went to the Trojan war, at the head of his father's troops, and Pelēus gloried in having a son who was superior to all the Greeks in valour and intrepidity. The death of Achilles was the source of grief to Pelēus; and Thetis, to comfort her husband, promised him immortality, and ordered him to retire into the grotto of the island of Leuce, where he would see and converse with the manes of his son. Pelēus had a daughter called Polydora, by Antigone. *Homer. Pelēides, the daughters of Pelias. Vid. Pelias.

Pelias, the twin brother of Neleus, was son of Neptune, by Tyro the daughter of Salmonus. His birth was concealed from the world by his mother, who wished her father to be ignorant of her incontinence. He was exposed in the woods, but his life was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Pelias, from a spot of the colour of lead in his face. Some time after this adventure, Tyro married Cretheus, son of Æolus king of Iolchos, and became mother of three children, of whom Æson was the eldest. Meantime Pelias visited his mother, and was received in her family; and, after the death of Cretheus, he unjustly seized the kingdom, which belonged to the children of Tyro, by the deceased monarch. To strengthen himself in his usurpation, Pelias consulted the oracle, and when he was told to beware of one of the descendants of Æolus, who should come to his court with one foot shod, and the other bare, he privately removed the son of Æson, after he had publicly declared that he was dead. These precautions proved abortive. Jason the son of Æson, who had been educated by Chiron, returned to Iolchos, when arrived to years of maturity; and as he had lost one of his shoes in crossing the river Anaurus, or the Evenus, Pelias immediately perceived that this was the person whom he was advised so much to dread. His unpopularity prevented him from acting with violence against a stranger, whose uncommon dress and commanding aspect had raised admiration in his subjects. But his astonishment was excited when he saw Jason arrive at his palace, with his friends and his relations, and boldly demand the kingdom which he usurped. Pelias was conscious that his complaints were well founded, and therefore, to divert his attention, he told him that he would voluntarily resign the crown to him if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus the son of Athamas, whom Ætes had cruelly murdered. He further observed that the expedition would be attended with the greatest glory, and that nothing but the infirmities of old age had prevented him himself from vindicating the honour of his country, and the injuries of his family by punishing the assassin. This, so warmly recommended, was as warmly accepted by the young hero, and his intended expedition was made known all over Greece. Vid. Jason. During the absence of Jason, in the Argonautic expedition, Pelias murdered Æson and all his family; but, according to the more received opinion of Ovid, Æson was still living when the Argonauts returned, and he was restored to the vigour of youth by the magic of Medea. This sudden change in the vigour and the constitution of Æson astonished all the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias, who had received the patronymic of Peliades, expressed their desire to see their father's infirmities vanish by the same powerful arts. Medea, who wished to avenge the injuries which her husband Jason had received from Pelias, raised the desires of the Peliades, by cutting an old ram to pieces, and boiling the flesh in a cauldron, and afterwards turning it into a fine young lamb. After they had seen this successful experiment, the Peliades cut their father's body to pieces, after they had drawn all the blood from his veins, on the assurance that Medea would replenish them by her incantations. The limbs were immediately put into a cauldron of boiling water, but Medea suffered the flesh to be totally consumed, and refused to give the Peliades the promised assistance, and the bones of Pelias did not even receive a burial. The Peliades were four in number, Alceste, Psisidice, Pelopea, and Hippothoe, to whom Hyginus adds Medusa. Their mother's name was Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias, or Philomache, the daughter of Amphion. After this parricide, the Peliades fled to the court of Admetus, where Acastus the son-in-law of Pelias pursued them, and took their protector prisoner. The Peliades died, and were buried in Arcadia. *Hygin. Fab. 12, 13, & 14.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 3 & 4 Heroid. 12, v. 129.—Paus. 8, c. 11.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Seneca, in Med.—Apollon. Arg. 1.—Pindar. Pelinnæum, or Pellina, a town of Macedonia. Strab. 14.—Liv. 36, c. 10 & 14.

Pelion and Pelios, a celebrated mountain of Thessaly, whose top is covered with pine trees. In their wars against the gods, the giants, as the poets mention, placed mount Ossa upon Pelion, to scale the heavens with more facility. The celebrated spear of Achilles, which none but the hero could wield, had been cut down on this mountain, and was thence called Pelias. It was a present from his preceptor Chiron, who, like the other Centaurs, had fixed his residence here. *Ovid. Met. 1, v. 155. l. 13, v. 199.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9.—Virg. G. 1, v. 281. Pellium, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 40.

Pella, a celebrated town of Macedonia, on the Ludias, not far from the Sinus Thermanicus, which became the capital of the country after the ruin of Edessa. Philip king of Macedonia was educated there, and Alexander the Great was born there, whence he is often called Pellæus juvenis. The tomb of the poet Euripides was in the neighbourhood. The epithet Pellæus is often applied to Egypt or Alexandria, because the Ptolemies, kings of the country, were of Macedonian origin. Martial. 13, ep. 85.—Lucan. 5, v. 60. l. 8, v. 475 & 507. l. 9, v. 1016 & 1073. l. 10, v. 55.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 47.

Pellâne, a town of Laconia, with a fountain whose waters have a subterraneous communication with the waters of another fountain. Paus. 3, c. 21.—Strab. 8.

Pellène, a town of Achaia, in the Peloponnesus, at the west of Sicyon, famous for its wool. It was built by the giant Pallas, or, according to others, by Pelien of Argos, son of Phorbas, and was the country of Proteus the sea-god. Strab. 8.—Paus. 7, c. 26.—Liv. 33, c. 14.

Pelöpsa, or Pelöpsa, a daughter of Thyestes the brother of Atreus. She had a son by her father, who had offered her violence in a wood, without knowing that she was his own daughter. Some suppose that Thyestes purposely committed the incest, as the oracle had informed him that his wrongs should be avenged, and his brother destroyed, by a son who should be born from him and his daughter. This proved too true. Pelopea afterwards married her uncle Atreus, who kindly received in his house his wife's illegitimate child, called Ægysthus, because preserved by goats (agros) when exposed in the mountains. Ægysthus became his uncle's murderer. Vid. Ægysthus. Hygin. Fab. 87, 88.—Ælian. V. H. 12.—Ovid. Met. in 16, v. 359.—Seneca, in Agam.

Pelöpsia, a festival observed by the people of Elis in honour of Pelops. It was kept in imitation of Hercules, who sacrificed to Pelops in a trench, as it was usual, when the manes and the infernal gods were the objects of worship.

Pelöpsia, a daughter of Niobe.—A daughter of Pelias.—The mother of Cycnus.

Pelopidas, a celebrated general of Thebes, son of Hippocleus. He was descended of an illustrious family, and was remarkable for his immense possessions, which he bestowed with great liberality to the poor and necessitous. Many were the objects of his generosity; but when Epaminondas had refused to accept his presents, Pelopidas disregarded all his wealth, and preferred before it the enjoyment of his friend's conversation and of his poverty. From their friendship and intercourse the Thebans derived the most considerable advantages. No sooner had the interest of Sparta prevailed at Thebes, and the friends of liberty and national independence been banished from the city, than Pelopidas, who was in the number of the exiles, resolved to free his country from foreign slavery. His plan was bold and animated, and his deliberations were slow. Meanwhile Epaminondas, who had been left by the tyrants at Thebes, as being in appearance a worthless and insignificant philosopher, animated the youths of the city, and at last Pelopidas, with 11 of his associates, entered Thebes, and easily massacred the friends of the tyranny, and freed the country from foreign masters. After this successful enterprise, Pelopidas was unanimously placed at the head of the government; and so confident were the Thebans of his abilities as a general and a magistrate, that they successively re-elected him 13 times to fill the honourable office of governor of Bœotia. Epaminondas shared with him the sovereign power, and it was to their valour and prudence that the Thebans were indebted for a celebrated victory at the battle of Leuctra. In a war which Thebes carried on against Alexander tyrant of Phœæ, Pelopidas was appointed commander; but his imprudence, in trusting himself unarméd into the enemy's camp, nearly proved fatal to him. He was taken prisoner, but Epaminondas restored him to liberty. The perfidy of Alexander irritated him, and he was killed bravely fighting in a celebrated battle in which his troops obtained the victory, B.C. 364 years. He received an honourable burial. The Thebans showed their sense for his merit by their lamentations; they sent a powerful army to revenge his death on the destruction of the tyrant of Phœæ; and his relations and his children were presented with immense donations by the cities of Thessaly. Pelopidas is admired for his valour, as he never engaged an enemy without obtaining the advantage. The impoverished state of Thebes before his birth, and after his fall, plainly demonstrates the superiority of his genius and of his abilities; and it has been justly observed, that with Pelopidas and Epaminondas the glory and the independence of the Thebans rose and set. *Plut. & C. Peloponnesiâcum bellum. a celebrated war which continued for 27 years between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Peloponnesus with their respective allies. It is the most famous and the most interesting of all the wars which have happened between the inhabitants of Greece; and for the minute and circumstantial description which we have of the events and revolutions which mutual animosity produced, we are indebted more particularly to the correct and authentic writings of Thucydides and of Xenophon. The circumstances which gave birth to this memorable war are these. The power of Athens, under the prudent and vigorous administration of Pericles, was already extended over Greece, and it had procured itself many admirers and more enemies, when the Corcyreans, who had been planted by a Corinthian colony, refused to pay their founders those marks of respect and reverence which among the Greeks every colony was obliged to pay to its mother country. The Corinthians wished to punish that infidelity; and when the people of Epidamnus, a considerable town on the Adriatic, had been invaded by some of the barbarians of Illyricum, the people of Corinth gladly granted to the Epidamnians that assistance which had in vain been solicited from the Corcyreans, their founders and their patrons. The Corcyreans were offended at the interference of Corinth in the affairs of their colony; they manned a fleet, and obtained a victory over the Corinthian vessels which had assisted the Epidamnians. The subsequent conduct of the Corcyreans, and their insolence to some of the Elians, who had furnished a few ships to the Corinthians, provoked the Peloponnesians, and the discontent became general. Ambassadors were sent by both parties to Athens to claim its protection, and to justify these violent proceedings. The greatest part of the Athenians heard their various reasonings with moderation and with compassion; but the enterprising ambition of Pericles prevailed, and when the Corcyreans had reminded the people of Athens, that in all the states of Peloponnesus they had to dread the most malevolent enemies, and the most insidious of rivals, they were listened to with attention, and were promised support. This step was no sooner taken, than the Corinthians appealed to the other Grecian states, and particularly to the Lacedæmonians. Their complaints were accompanied by those of the people of Megara and of Ægina, who bitterly inveighed against the cruelty, injustice, and insolence of the Athenians. This had due weight with the Lacedæmonians, who had long beheld with concern and with jealousy the ambitious power of the Athenians, and they determined to support the cause of the Corinthians. However, before they proceeded to hostilities, an embassy was sent to Athens, to represent the danger of entering into a war with the most powerful and flourishing of all the Grecian states. This alarmed the Athenians, but when Pericles had eloquently spoken of the resources and the actual strength of the republic, and of the weakness of the allies, the clamours of his enemies were silenced, and the answer which was returned to the Spartans was taken as a declaration of war. The Spartans were supported by all the republics of the Peloponnesus, except Argos and part of Achaia, besides the people of Megara, Bœotia, Phocis, Locris, Leucas, Ambracia, and Aœacorum. The Plataeans, the Lesbians, Carians, Chians, Messenians, Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Corcyreans, Dorians, and Thracians, were the friends of the Athenians, with all the Cyclades, except Eubœa, Samos, Melos, and Thera. The first blow had already been struck, May 7, B.C. 431, by an attempt of the Bœotians to surprise Plataea; and therefore Archidamus king of Sparta, who had in vain recommended moderation to the allies, entered Attica at the head of an army of 60,000 men, and laid waste the country by fire and sword. Pericles, who was at the head of the government, did not attempt to oppose them in the field; but a fleet of 150 ships set sail, without delay, to ravage the coasts of the Peloponnesus. Megara was also depopulated by an army of 20,000 men, and the campaign of the first year of the war was concluded in celebrating, with the most solemn pomp, the funerals of such as had nobly fallen in battle. The following year was remarkable for a pestilence which raged in Athens, and which destroyed the greatest part of the inhabitants. The public calamity was still heightened by the approach of the Peloponnesian army on the borders of Attica, and by the unsuccessful expedition of the Athenians against Epidaurus and in Thrace. The pestilence which had carried away so many of the Athenians proved also fatal to Pericles, and he died about two years and six months after the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. The following years did not give rise to decisive events; but the revolt of Lesbos from the alliance of the Athenians was productive of fresh troubles. Mitylene the capital of the island was recovered, and the inhabitants treated with the greatest cruelty. The island of Corcyra became also the seat of new seditions, and those citizens who had been carried away prisoners by the Corinthians, and for political reasons treated with lenity, and taught to despise the alliance of Athens, were no sooner returned home, than they raised commotions and endeavoured to persuade their countrymen to join the Peloponnesian confederates. This was strongly opposed; but both parties obtained by turns the superiority, and massacred, with the greatest barbarity, all those who obstructed their views. Some time after Demosthenes the Athenian general invaded Ætolia, where his arms were attended with the greatest success. He also fortified Pylos in the Peloponnesus, and gained so many advantages over the confederates, that they sued for peace, which the insolence of Athens refused. The fortune of the war soon after changed, and the Lacedæmonians, under the prudent conduct of Brasidas, made themselves masters of many valuable places in Thrace. But this victorious progress was soon stopped by the death of their general, and that of Cleon the Athenian commander; and the pacific disposition of Nicias, who was now at the head of Athens, made overtures of peace and universal tranquillity. Plistoanax the king of the Spartans wished them to be accepted; but the intrigues of the Corinthians prevented the discontinuation of the war, and therefore hostilities began anew. But while war was carried on with various success in different parts of Greece, the Athenians engaged in a new expedition; they yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Gorgias of Leontium, and the ambitious views of Alcibiades, and sent a fleet of 20 ships to assist the Sicilian states against the tyrannical power of Syracuse, B.C. 416. This was warmly opposed by Nicias; but the eloquence of Alcibiades prevailed, and a powerful fleet was sent against the capital of Sicily. These vigorous though impolitic measures of the Athenians were not viewed with indifference by the confederates. Syracuse, in her distress, implored the assistance of Corinth, and Gylippus was sent to direct her operations, and to defend her against the power of her enemies. The events of battles were dubious, and though the Athenian army was animated by the prudence and intrepidity of Nicias, and the more hasty courage of Demosthenes, yet the good fortune of Syracuse prevailed; and after a campaign of two years of bloodshed, the fleets of Athens were totally ruined, and the few soldiers that survived the destructive siege, made prisoners of war. So fatal a blow threw the people of Attica into consternation and despair, and while they sought for resources at home, they severely felt themselves deprived of support abroad, their allies were alienated by the intrigues of the enemy, and rebellion was fomented in their dependent states and colonies on the Asiatic coast. The threatened ruin, however, was timely averted, and Alcibiades, who had been treated with cruelty by his countrymen, and who had for some time resided in Sparta, and directed her military operations, now exerted himself to defeat the designs of the confederates, by inducing the Persians to espouse the cause of his country. But in a short time after, the internal tranquillity of Athens was disturbed, and Alcibiades, by wishing to abolish the democracy, called away the attention of his fellow-citizens from the prosecution of a war which had already cost them so much blood. This, however, was but momentary; the Athenians soon after obtained a naval victory, and the Peloponnesian fleet was defeated by Alcibiades. The Athenians beheld with rapture the success of their arms; but when their fleet, in the absence of Alcibiades, had been defeated and destroyed near Andros by Lysander the Lacedæmonian admiral, they showed their discontent and mortification by eagerly listening to the accusations which were brought against their naval leader, to whom they gratefully had acknowledged themselves indebted for their former victories. Alcibiades was disgraced in the public assembly, and 10 commanders were appointed to succeed him in the management of the republic.

This change of admirals, and the appointment of Callicratidas to succeed Lysander, whose office had expired with the revolving year, produced new operations. The Athenians fitted out a fleet, and the two nations decided their superiority near Arginusæ, in a naval battle. Callicratidas was killed, and the Lacedæmonians conquered, but the rejoicings which the intelligence of this victory occasioned were soon stopped, when it was known that the wrecks of some of the disabled ships of the Athenians, and the bodies of the slain, had not been saved from the sea. The admirals were accused in the tumultuous assembly, and immediately condemned. Their successors in office were not so prudent, but they were more unfortunate in their operations. Lysander was again placed at the head of the Peloponnesian forces, instead of Eteonicus, who had succeeded to the command at the death of Callicratidas. The age and the experience of this general seemed to promise something decisive, and indeed an opportunity was not long wanting for the display of his military character. The superiority of the Athenians over that of the Peloponnesians, rendered the former insolent, proud, and negligent, and when they had imprudently forsaken their ships to indulge their indolence, or pursue their amusements on the seashore at Ægospotamus, Lysander attacked their fleet, and his victory was complete. Of 180 sail, only nine escaped, eight of which fled, under the command of Conon, to the island of Cyprus, and the other carried to Athens the melancholy news of the defeat. The Athenian prisoners were all massacred; and when the Peloponnesian conquerors had extended their dominion over the states and communities of Europe and Asia, which formerly acknowledged the power of Athens, they returned home to finish the war by the reduction of the capital of Attica. The siege was carried on with vigour, and supported with firmness, and the first Athenian who mentioned capitulation to his countrymen, was instantly sacrificed to the fury and the indignation of the populace, and all the citizens unanimously declared, that the same moment would terminate their independence and their lives. This animated language, however, was not long continued; the spirit of faction was not yet extinguished at Athens; and it proved, perhaps, more destructive to the public liberty, than the operations and assaults of the Peloponnesian besiegers. During four months, negotiations were carried on with the Spartans by the aristocratical part of the Athenians, and at last it was agreed that to establish the peace, the fortifications of the Athenian harbours must be demolished, together with the long walls which joined them to the city; all their ships, except 12, were to be surrendered to the enemy; they were to resign every pretension to their ancient dominions abroad; to recall from banishment all the members of the late aristocracy; to follow the Spartans in war, and, in the time of peace, to frame their constitution according to the will and the prescriptions of their Peloponnesian conquerors. The terms were accepted, and the enemy entered the harbour, and took possession of the city, that very day on which the Athenians had been accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of the immortal victory which their ancestors had obtained over the Persians about 76 years before, near the island of Salamis. The walls and fortifications were instantly levelled with the ground, and the conquerors observed, that in the demolition of Athens, succeeding ages would fix the era of Grecian freedom. The day was concluded with a festival, and the recitation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, in which the misfortunes of the daughter of Agamemnon, who was reduced to misery, and banished from her father's kingdom, excited a kindred sympathy in the bosom of the audience, who melted into tears at the recollection that one moment had likewise reduced to misery and servitude the capital of Attica, which was once called the common patroness of Greece, and the scourge of Persia. This memorable event happened about 404 years before the christian era, and 30 tyrants were appointed by Lysander over the government of the city. *Xen. Græc. Hist.—Plut. in Lys. Per. Alcib. Peloponnesus, a celebrated peninsula which comprehends the most southern parts of Greece. It received its name from Pelops, who settled there, as the name indicates (ἠπειρος ἠνωτος, the island of Pelops). It had been called before Argia, Pelasgia, and Argolis, and in its form, it has been observed by the moderns, highly to resemble the leaf of the plane tree. Its present name is Moræa, which seems to be derived either from the Greek word μορεα, or the Latin morus, which signifies a mulberry tree, which is found there in great abundance. The ancient Peloponnesus was divided into six different provinces, Messenia, Laconia, Elis, Arcadia, Achaia propria, and Argolis, to which some add Sicyon. These provinces all bordered on the sea-shore, except Arcadia. The Peloponnesus was conquered, some time after the Trojan war, by the Heraclidæ or descendants of Hercules, who had been forcibly expelled from it. The inhabitants of this peninsula rendered themselves illustrious, like the rest of the Greeks, by their genius, their fondness for the fine arts, the cultivation of learning, and the profession of arms, but in nothing more than by a celebrated war, which they carried on against Athens and her allies for 27 years, and which from them received the name of the Peloponnesian war. Vid. Peloponnesiacum bellum. The Peloponnesus scarce extended 200 miles in length, and 140 in breadth, and about 563 miles in circumference. It was separated from Greece by the narrow isthmus of Corinth, which, as being only five miles broad, Demetrius, Cæsar, Nero, and some others, attempted in vain to cut, to make a communication between the bay of Corinth, and the Saronicus sinus. Strab. 8.—Thucyd.—Diod. 12, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 21. l. 8, c. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 6.—Herodot. 8, s. 40.

Pelopœa monia, is applied to the cities of Breece, but more particularly to Mycænæ and Argos, where the descendants of Pelops reigned. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 193.

Pelops, a celebrated prince, son of Tantalus king of Phrygia. His mother's name was Euryanassa, or, according to others, Euprytone, or Eurystemista, or Dione. He was murdered by his father, who wished to try the divinity of the gods who had visited Phrygia, by placing on their table the limbs of his son. The gods perceived his perfidious cruelty, and they refused to touch the meat, except Ceres, whom the recent loss of her daughter had rendered melancholy and inattentive. She ate one of the shoulders of Pelops, and therefore, when Jupiter had compassion on his fate, and restored him to life, he placed a shoulder of ivory instead of that which Ceres had devoured. This shoulder had an uncommon power, and it could heal by its very touch every complaint, and remove every disorder. Some time after, the kingdom of Tantalus was invaded by Tros king of Troy, on pretence that he had carried away his son Ganymedes. This rape had been committed by Jupiter himself; the war, nevertheless, was carried on, and Tantalus, defeated and ruined, was obliged to fly with his son Pelops, and to seek a shelter in Greece. This tradition is confuted by some, who support that Tantalus did not fly into Greece, as he had been some time before confined by Jupiter in the infernal regions for his impiety, and therefore Pelops was the only one whom the enmity of Tros persecuted. Pelops came to Pisa, where he became one of the suitors of Hippodamia the daughter of king Enomaus, and he entered the lists against the father, who promised his daughter only to him who could outrun him in a chariot race. Pelops was not terrified at the fate of the 13 lovers, who before him had entered the course against Enomaus, and had, according to the conditions proposed, been put to death when conquered. He previously bribed Myrtilus the charioteer of Enomaus, and therefore he easily obtained the victory. Vid. Enomaus. He married Hippodamia, and threw headlong into the sea Myrtilus, when he claimed the reward of his perfidy. According to some authors, Pelops had received some winged horses from Neptune, with which he was enabled to outrun Enomaus. When he had established himself on the throne of Pisa, Hippodamia's possession, he extended his conquests over the neighbouring countries, and from him the peninsula, of which he was one of the monarchs, received the name of Peloponnesus. Pelops, after death, received divine honours, and he was as much revered above all the other heroes of Greece, as Jupiter was above the rest of the gods. He had a temple at Olympia, near that of Jupiter, where Hercules consecrated to him a small portion of land, and offered to him a sacrifice. The place where this sacrifice had been offered was religiously observed, and the magistrates of the country yearly, on coming upon office, made there an offering of a black ram. During the sacrifice, the soothsayer was not allowed, as at other times, to have a share of the victim, but he alone who furnished the wood was permitted to take the neck. The wood for sacrifices, as may be observed, was always furnished by some of the priests to all such as offered victims, and they received a price equivalent to what they gave. The white poplar was generally used in the sacrifices made to Jupiter and to Pelops. The children of Pelops by Hippodamia were Pitheus, Troezen, Atreus, Thyestes, &c., besides some by concubines. The time of his death is unknown, though it is universally agreed that he survived for some time Hippodamia. Some suppose that the Palladium of the Trojans was made with the bones of Pelops. His descendants were called Pelopidae. Pindar, who, in his first Olympic, speaks of Pelops, confutes the traditions of his ivory shoulder, and says that Neptune took him up to heaven to become the cup-bearer to the gods, from which he was expelled, when the impiety of Tantalus wished to make mankind partake of the nectar and the entertainments of the gods. Some suppose that Pelops first instituted the Olympic games in honour of Jupiter, and to commemorate the victory which he had obtained over Enomaus. *Paus. 5, c. 1, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Diod. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Pindar. Pelox, one of the men who sprang from the teeth of the dragon killed by Cadmus. Paus. 9, c. 5.

Peloria, a festival observed by the Thessalians, in commemoration of the news which they received by one Pelorius, that the mountains of Tempe had been separated by an earthquake, and that the waters of the lake which lay there stagnated, had found a passage into the Alpheus, and left behind a vast, pleasant, and most delightful plain, &c. Athen. 3.

Pelorus (v. i. dis, v. ias-iodos), now Cape Faro, one of the three great promontories of Sicily, on whose top is erected a tower to direct the sailor on his voyage. It lies near the coast of Italy, and received its name from Pelorus, the pilot of the ship which carried away Annibal from Italy. This celebrated general, as it is reported, was carried by the tides into the straits of Charybdis, and as he was ignorant of the coast, he asked the pilot of his ship the name of the promontory, which appeared at a distance. The pilot told him it was one of the capes of Sicily, but Annibal gave no credit to his information, and murdered him on the spot, on the apprehension that he would betray him into the hands of the Romans. He was, however, soon convinced of his error, and found that the pilot had spoken with great fidelity; and therefore, to pay honour to his memory, and to atone for his cruelty, he gave him a magnificent funeral, and ordered that the promontory should bear his name, and from that time it was called Pelorus. Some suppose that this account is false, and they observe that it bore that name before the age of Annibal. Val. Max. 9, c. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 421; & 687.—*Ovid. Pelusia, a town of Phrygia.

Pelusium, now Tineh, a town of Egypt, situate at the entrance of one of the mouths of the Nile, called from it Pelusian. It is about 20 stadia from the sea, and it has received the name of Pelusium from the lakes and marshes (ῥυαὸς) which are in its neighbourhood. It was the key of Egypt on the side of Phœnicia, as it was impossible to enter the Egyptian territories without passing by Pelusium, and therefore on that account it was always well fortified and garrisoned, as it was of such importance for the security of the country. It produced lentils, and was celebrated for the linen stuffs made there. It is now in ruins. Mela, 2, c. 9.—Colum. 5, c. 10.—*Sil. Penates, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who presided over houses and the domestic affairs of families. They were called Penates, because they were generally placed in the innermost and most secret parts of the house, in Penissimum ædium parte, quod, as Cicero says, penitus insidet. The place where they stood was afterwards called penetratilis, and they themselves received the name of Penetrates. It was in the option of every master of a family to choose his Penates, and therefore Jupiter, and some of the superior gods, are often invoked as patrons of domestic affairs. According to some, the gods Penates were divided into four classes; the first comprehended all the celestial, the second the sea-gods, the third the gods of hell, and the last all such heroes as had received divine honours after death. The Penates were originally the manes of the dead, but when superstition had taught mankind to pay uncommon reverence to the statues and images of their deceased friends, their attention was soon exchanged for regular worship, and they were admitted by their votaries to share immortality and power over the world, with a Jupiter or a Minerva. The statues of the Penates were generally made with wax, ivory, silver, or earth, according to the affluence of the worshipper, and the only offerings they received were wine, incense, fruits, and sometimes the sacrifice of lambs, sheep, goats, &c. In the early ages of Rome, human sacrifices were offered to them; but Brutus, who expelled the Targuins, abolished this unnatural custom. When offerings were made to them, their statues were crowned with garlands, poppies, or garlic, and besides the monthly day that was set apart for their worship, their festivals were celebrated during the Saturnalia. Some have confounded the Lares and the Penates, but they were different. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27. Ver. 2.—Dionys. 1.

Pendalium, a promontory of Cyprus.

Peneia, or Pennis, an epithet applied to Daphne, as daughter of Peneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452.

Peneius, one of the Greeks killed in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 494.—A son of Hippalimus among the Argonauts.

Penelope, a celebrated princess of Greece, daughter of Icarus, and wife of Ulysses king of Ithaca. Her marriage with Ulysses was celebrated about the same time that Menelaus married Helen, and she retired with her husband to Ithaca, against the inclination of her father, who wished to detain her at Sparta, her native country. She soon after became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part with great reluctance from her husband, whom the Greeks obliged to go to the Trojan war. Vid. Palamedes. The continuation of hostilities for 20 years made her sad and melancholy; but when Ulysses did not return like the other princes of Greece at the conclusion of the war, her fears and her anxieties were increased. As she received no intelligence of his situation, she was soon beset by a number of importuning suitors, who wished her to believe that her husband was shipwrecked, and that therefore, she ought no longer to expect his return, but forget his loss, and fix her choice and affections on one of her numerous admirers. She received their addresses with coldness and disdain; but as she was destitute of power, and a prisoner, as it were, in their hands, she yet flattered them with hopes and promises, and declared that she would make choice of one of them, as soon as she had finished a piece of tapestry, on which she was employed. The work was done in a dilatory manner, and she baffled their eager expectations, by undoing in the night what she had done in the day-time. This artifice of Penelope has given rise to the proverb of Penelope's web, which is applied to whatever labour can never be ended. The return of Ulysses, after an absence of 20 years, however, delivered her from her fears and from her dangerous suitors. Penelope is described by Homer as a model of female virtue and chastity, but some more modern writers dispute her claims to modesty and continence, and they represent her as the most debauched and voluptuous of her sex. According to their opinions, therefore, she liberally gratified the desires of her suitors, in the absence of her husband, and had a son whom she called Pan, as if to show that he was the offspring of all her admirers. Some, however, suppose that Pan was son of Penelope by Mercury, and that he was born before his mother's marriage with Ulysses. The god, as it is said, deceived Penelope, under the form of a beautiful goat, as she was tending her father's flocks on one of the mountains of Arcadia. After the return of Ulysses, Penelope had a daughter, who was called Ptiolopthe; but if we believe the traditions that were long preserved at Mantinea, Ulysses repudiated his wife for her incontinence during his absence, and Penelope fled to Sparta, and afterwards to Mantinea, where she died and was buried. After the death of Ulysses, according to Hyginus, she married Telegonus, her husband's son by Circe, by order of the goddess Minerva. Some say that her original name was Arnea, or Amrace, and that she was called Penelope, when some river birds called Penelopes had saved her from the waves of the sea, when her father had exposed her. Icarius had attempted to destroy her, because the oracles had told him that his daughter by Periboea would be the most dissolute of her sex, and a disgrace to his family. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—*Homer. PENEUS, a river of Thessaly, rising on mount Pindus, and falling into the Thermaean gulf, after a wandering course between mount Ossa and Olympus, through the plains of Tempe. It received its name from Peneus, a son of Oceanus and Tethys. The Peneus anciently inundated the plains of Thessaly, till an earthquake separated the mountains Ossa and Olympus, and formed the beautiful vale of Tempe, where the waters formerly stagnated. From this circumstance, therefore, it obtained the name of Araxes, ab araxae, scinda. Daphne the daughter of the Peneus, according to the fables of the mythologists, was changed into a laurel on the banks of this river. This tradition arises from the quantity of laurels which grow near the Peneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—*Virg. PENINE ALPES, a certain part of the Alps. Liv. 21, c. 38.

PENTAPOLIS, a town of India.—A part of Africa near Cyrene. It received this name on account of the five cities which it contained, Cyrene, Arsinoe, Berenice, Ptolemais, or Barca, and Apollonia. Plin. 5, c. 5.—Also part of Palestine, containing the five cities of Gaza, Gath, Ascalon, Azotus, and Ekron.

PENTELICUS, a mountain of Attica, where were found quarries of beautiful marble. Strab. 9.—Paus. 1, c. 32.

PENTHESILÆA, a queen of the Amazons, daughter of Mars by Otrera, or Orithya. She came to assist Priam in the last years of the Trojan war, and fought against Achilles, by whom she was slain. The hero was so struck with the beauty of Penthesilæa, when he stripped her of her arms, that he even shed tears for having too violently sacrificed her to his fury. Thersites laughed at the partiality of the hero, for which ridicule he was instantly killed. Lycophron says that Achilles slew Thersites because he had put out the eyes of Penthesilæa when she was yet alive. The scholiast of Lycophron differs from that opinion, and declares, that it was commonly believed that Achilles offered violence to the body of Penthesilæa when she was dead, and that Thersites was killed because he had reproached the hero for this infamous action, in the presence of all the Greeks. The death of Thersites so offended Diomedes that he dragged the body of Penthesilæa out of the camp, and threw it into the Scamander. It is generally supposed that Achilles was enamoured of the Amazon before he fought with her, and that she had by him a son called Cayster. Dicys Cret. 3 & 4.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—*Q. PENTHEUS, son of Echion and Agave, was king of Thebes in Bœotia. His refusal to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus was attended with the most fatal consequences. He forbade his subjects to pay adoration to this new god; and when the Theban women had gone out of the city to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, Pentheus, apprised of the debauchery which attended the solemnity, ordered the god himself, who conducted the religious multitude, to be seized. His orders were obeyed with reluctance, but when the doors of the prison in which Bacchus had been confined opened of their own accord, Pentheus became more irritated, and commanded his soldiers to destroy the whole band of the bacchanals. This, however, was not executed, for Bacchus inspired the monarch with the ardent desire of seeing the celebration of the orgies. Accordingly, he hid himself in a wood on mount Cithæron, from whence he could see all the ceremonies unperceived. But here his curiosity soon proved fatal; he was descried by the bacchanals, and they all rushed upon him. His mother was the first who attacked him, and her example was instantly followed by her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, and his body was torn to pieces. Euripides introduces Bacchus among his priestesses, when Pentheus was put to death; but Ovid, who relates the whole in the same manner, differs from the Greek poet only in saying, that not Bacchus himself, but one of his priests, was present. The tree on which the bacchanals found Pentheus, was cut down by the Corinthians, by order of the oracle, and with it two statues of the god of wine were made, and placed in their forum. *Hygin. PENTHILUS, a son of Orestes by Ergone the daughter of Ægysthus, who reigned conjointly with his brother Tisamenus at Argos. He was driven some time after from his throne by the Heraclidæ, and he retired to Achaia, and thence to Lesbos, where he planted a colony. Paus. 5, c. 4.—Strab. 12.—Patenc. 1, c. 1.

PENTHYLUS, a prince of Paphos, who assisted Xerxes with 12 ships. He was seized by the Greeks, to whom he communicated many important things concerning the situation of the Persians, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 195.

PEPARÉTHOS, a small island of the Ægean sea, on the coast of Macedonia, about 20 miles in circumference. It abounded in olives, and its wines have always been reckoned excellent. They were not, however, palatable before they were seven years old. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 470.—Liv. 28, c. 5, l. 31, c. 58.

PEPHOS, a town of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 26.

Perasippus, an ambassador sent to Darius by the Lacedæmonians. &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Perœpe, or Percote, a city which assisted Priam during the Trojan war. Vid. Percote.

Perceus, a man acquainted with futurity. He attempted in vain to dissuade his two sons from going to the Trojan war by telling them that they should perish there.

Perœte, a town on the Hellespont, between Abydos and Lampacus, near the sea-shore. Artaxerxes gave it to Themistocles, to maintain his wardrobe. It is sometimes called Percœpe. Herodot. 1, c. 117.—Hom.

Perdiccas, the fourth king of Macedonia, B.C. 729, was descended from Lemenus. He increased his dominions by conquest, and in the latter part of his life, he showed his son Argeus where he wished to be buried, and told him, that as long as the bones of his descendants and successors on the throne of Macedonia were laid in the same grave, so long would the crown remain in their family. These injunctions were observed till the time of Alexander, who was buried out of Macedonia. Herodot. 7 & 8.—Justin. 7, c. 2.—Another, king of Macedonia, son of Alexander. He reigned during the Peloponnesian war, and assisted the Lacedæmonians against Athens. He behaved with great courage on the throne, and died B.C. 413, after a long reign of glory and independence, during which he had subdued some of his barbarian neighbours.—Another, king of Macedonia, who was supported on his throne by Iphicrates the Athenian against the intrusions of Pausanias. He was killed in a war against the Illyrians, B.C. 360. Justin. 7, &c.—One of the friends and favourites of Alexander the Great. At the king's death he wished to make himself absolute; and the ring which he had received from the hand of the dying Alexander, seemed in some measure to favour his pretensions. The better to support his claims to the throne, he married Cleopatra the sister of Alexander, and strengthened himself by making a league with Eumenes. His ambitious views were easily discovered by Antigonus, and the rest of the generals of Alexander, who all wished, like Perdiccas, to succeed to the kingdom and honours of the deceased monarch. Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, leagued with Antigonus against him, and after much bloodshed on both sides, Perdiccas was totally ruined, and at last assassinated in his tent in Egypt, by his own officers, about 321 years before the Christian era. Perdiccas had not the prudence and the address which were necessary to conciliate the esteem and gain the attachment of his fellow-soldiers, and this impropriety of his conduct alienated the heart of his friends, and at last proved his destruction. Plut. in Alex.—Diod. 17 & 18.—Curt. 10.—*C. Perdix, a young Athenian, son of the sister of Dædalus. He invented the saw, and seemed to promise to become a greater artist than had ever been known. His uncle was jealous of his rising fame, and he threw him down from the top of a tower and put him to death. Perdix was changed into a bird which bears his name. *Hygin. Perenna. Vid. Anna.

Perennis, a favourite of the emperor Commodus. He is described by some as a virtuous and impartial magistrate, while others paint him as a cruel, violent, and oppressive tyrant, who committed the greatest barbarities to enrich himself.

He was put to death for aspiring to the empire. Herodian.

Pereus, a son of Eliatus and Laodice, grandson of Arcas. He left only one daughter, called Neera, who was mother of Auge, and of Cepheus and Lycurgus. Apollod. 3.—Paus. 8, c. 4.

Perge, a town of Pamphylia. Vid. Perge, Liv. 38, c. 57.

Pergamus (Pergama plur.), the citadel of the city of Troy. The word is often used for Troy. It was situated in the most elevated part of the town, on the shores of the river Scamander. Xerxes mounted to the top of this citadel when he reviewed his troops as he marched to invade Greece. Herodot. 7, c. 43.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 466, &c.

Pergamus, now Pergamo, a town of Mysia, on the banks of the Cayus. It was the capital of a celebrated empire called the kingdom of Pergamus, which was founded by Philaterus, a eunuch, whom Lysimachus, after the battle of Ipsus, had entrusted with the treasures which he had obtained in the war. Philaterus made himself master of the treasures and of Pergamus, in which they were deposited, B.C. 283, and laid the foundation of an empire, over which he himself presided for 20 years. His successors began to reign in the following order: His nephew Eumenes ascended the throne 263 B.C.; Attalus, 241; Eumenes II., 197; Attalus Philadelphus, 150; Attalus Philomator, 139, who, B.C. 133, left the Roman people heirs to his kingdom, as he had no children. The right of the Romans, however, was disputed by a usurper, who claimed the empire as his own, and Aquilius the Roman general was obliged to conquer the different cities one by one, and to gain their submission by poisoning the waters which were conveyed to their houses till the whole was reduced into the form of a dependent province. The capital of the kingdom of Pergamus was famous for a library of 200,000 volumes, which had been collected by the different monarchs who had reigned there. This noble collection was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, with the permission of Antony, and it adorned and enriched the Alexandrian library, till it was most fatally destroyed by the Saracens, A.D. 642. Parchment was first invented and made use of at Pergamus, to transcribe books, as Ptolemy king of Egypt had forbidden the exportation of papyrus from his kingdom, in order to prevent Eumenes from making a library as valuable and as choice as that of Alexandria. From this circumstance parchment has been called charta pergamena. Galenus the physician and Apollodorus the mythologist were born there. Æsculapius was the chief deity of the country. Plin. 5 & 15.—Isid. 6, c. 11.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 29, c. 11. l. 37, c. 46.—Plin. 10, c. 21. l. 13, c. 11.—A son of Neoptolemus and Andromache, who, as some suppose, founded Pergamus in Asia. Paus. 1, c. 14.

Perge, a town of Pamphylia, where Diana had a magnificent temple, whence her surname of Pergæa. Apollonius the geometriean was born there. Met. 1, c. 14.—Strab. 14.

Pergus, a lake of Sicily near Enna, where Proserpine was carried away by Pluto. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 380.

Perlander, a tyrant of Corinth, son of Cypselus. The first years of his government were mild and popular, but he soon learnt to become oppressive, when he had consulted the tyrant of Sicily, about the surest way of reigning. He received no other answer but whatever explanation he wished to place on the Sicilian tyrant's having, in the presence of his messenger, plucked, in a field, all the ears of corn which seemed to tower above the rest. Periander understood the meaning of this answer. He immediately surrounded himself with a numerous guard, and put to death the richest and most powerful citizens of Corinth. He was not only cruel to his subjects, but his family also were objects of his vengeance. He committed incest with his mother, and put to death his wife Melissa, upon false accusation. He also banished his son Lycophron to the island of Corcyra, because the youth pitied and wept at the miserable end of his mother, and detested the barbarities of his father. Periander died about 585 years before the Christian era, in his 80th year, and by the meanness of his flatterers, he was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. Though he was tyrannical, yet he patronized the fine arts; he was fond of peace, and he showed himself the friend and the protector of genius and of learning. He used to say that a man ought solemnly to keep his word, but not to hesitate to break it if ever it clashed with his interest. He said also, that not only crimes ought to be punished, but also every wicked and corrupt thought. *Diog. in Vitâ.—Arist. 5, Polit.—Paus. 2.—A tyrant of Anabracia, whom some rank with the seven wise men of Greece, and not the tyrant of Corinth.—A man distinguished as a physician, but contemptible as a poet. Periarachus, a naval commander of Sparta, conquered by Conon. Diad.

Periboa, the second wife of Æneus king of Calydon, was daughter of Hipponous. She became mother of Tydeus. Some suppose that Æneus debauched her, and afterwards married her. Hygin. fab. 69.—A daughter of Alcaethous, sold by her father on suspicion that she was courted by Telamon, son of Æacus king of Ægina. She was carried to Cyprus, where Telamon the founder of Salamis married her, and she became mother of Ajax. She also married Theseus, according to some. She is also called Eriboea. Paus. 1, c. 17 & 42.—Hygin. 97.—The wife of Polybus king of Corinth, who educated Edipus as her own child.—A daughter of Eurymedon, who became mother of Nausithous by Neptuneus.—The mother of Penelope, according to some authors.

Peribomius, a noted debauchee, &c. Juv. 2, v. 16.

Pericles, an Athenian of a noble family, son of Xanthippus and Agariste. He was naturally endowed with great powers, which he improved by attending the lectures of Damon, of Zeno, and of Anaxagoras. Under these celebrated masters, he became a commander, a statesman, and an orator, and gained the affections of the people by his uncommon address and well-directed liberality. When he took a share in the administration of public affairs, he rendered himself popular by opposing Cimon, who was the favourite of the nobility; and to remove every obstacle which stood in the way of his ambition, he lessened the dignity and the power of the court of the Areopagus, which the people had been taught for ages to respect and to venerate. He also attacked Cimon, and caused him to be banished by the ostracism. Thucydides also, who had succeeded Cimon on his banishment, shared the same fate, and Pericles remained for 15 years the sole minister, and, as it may be said, the absolute sovereign of a republic which always showed itself so jealous of her liberties, and which distrusted so much the honesty of her magistrates. In his ministerial capacity Pericles did not enrich himself, but the prosperity of Athens was the object of his administration. He made war against the Lacedæmonians, and restored the temple of Delphi to the care of the Phocians, who had been illegally deprived of that honourable trust. He obtained a victory over the Sicyonians near Namæa, and waged a successful war against the inhabitants of Samos, at the request of his favourite mistress, Aspasia. The Peloponnesian war was fomented by his ambitious views [Viz. Peloponnesiacum bellum], and when he had warmly represented the flourishing state, the opulence, and actual power of his country, the Athenians did not hesitate a moment to undertake a war against the most powerful republics of Greece, a war which continued for 27 years, and which was concluded by the destruction of their empire, and the demolition of their walls. The arms of the Athenians were for some time crowned with success; but an unfortunate expedition raised clamours against Pericles, and the enraged populace attributed all their losses to him, and to make atonement for their ill success, they condemned him to pay 50 talents. This loss of popular favour by republican caprice, did not so much affect Pericles as the recent death of all his children; and when the tide of unpopularity was passed by, he condescended to come into the public assembly, and to view with secret pride the contrition of his fellow-citizens, who universally begged his forgiveness for the violence which they had offered to his ministerial character. He was again restored to all his honours, and if possible invested with more power and more authority than before; but the dreadful pestilence which had diminished the number of his family proved fatal to him, and about 429 years before Christ in his 70th year, he fell a sacrifice to that terrible malady which robbed Athens of 50 many of her citizens. Pericles was for 40 years at the head of the administration, 25 with others, and 15 alone; and the flourishing state of the empire during his government gave occasion to the Athenians publicly to lament his loss, and venerate his memory. As he was expiring, and seemingly senseless, his friends that stood around his bed expatiated with warmth on the most glorious actions of his life, and the victories which he had won, when he suddenly interrupted their tears and conversation, by saying that, in mentioning the exploits that he had achieved, and which were common to him with all generals, they had forgotten to mention a circumstance which reflected far greater glory upon him as a minister, a general, and above all, as a man. "It is," says he, "that not a citizen in Athens has been obliged to put on mourning on my account." The Athenians were so pleased with his eloquence that they compared it to thunder and lightning, and, as to another father of the gods, they gave him the surname of Olympian. The poets, his flatterers, said that the goddess of persuasion, with all her charms and attractions, dwelt upon his tongue. When he marched at the head of the Athenian armies, Pericles observed that he had the command of a free nation that were Greeks, and citizens of Athens. He also declared, that not only the hand of a magistrate, but also his eyes and his tongue, should be pure and undefiled. Yet great and venerable as his character may appear, we must not forget the follies of Pericles. His vicious partiality for the celebrated courtesan Aspasia subjected him to the ridicule and the censure of his fellow-citizens; but if he triumphed over satire and malevolent remarks, the Athenians had occasion to execrate the memory of a man who by his example corrupted the purity and innocence of their morals, and who made licentiousness respectable, and the indulgence of every impure desire the qualification of the soldier as well as of the senator. Pericles lost all his legitimate children by the pestilence, and to call a natural son by his own name he was obliged to repeal a law which he had made against spurious children, and which he had enforced with great severity. This son, called Pericles, became one of the 10 generals who succeeded Alcibiades in the administration of affairs, and, like his colleagues, he was condemned to death by the Athenians, after the unfortunate battle of Arginusæ. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Plut. in Vit.—Quintil. 12, c. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Elian. V. Periolympēnus, one of the 12 sons of Neleus, brother to Nestor, killed by Hercules. He was one of the Argonauts, and had received from Neptune his grandfather the power of changing himself into whatever shape he pleased. Apollod.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 556.

Peridia, a Theban woman, whose son was killed by Turnus in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 515.

Periegētes Dionysius, a poet. Vid. Dionysius.

Periōres, a son of Æolus, or, according to others, of Cynortas. Apollod.—The charioteer of Menœceus. Id.

Perigēnes, an officer of Ptolemy, &c.

Perigōne, a woman who had a son called Melanippus by Theseus. She was daughter of Synnis the famous robber, whom Theseus killed. She married Deioneus the son of Eurystus, by consent of Theseus. Plut. in These.—Paus. 10, c. 25.

Perilæus, an officer in the army of Alexander the Great. Curt. 10.—A tyrant of Argos.

Perilēus, a son of Icarus and Perilæa.

Perilla, a daughter of Ovid the poet. She was extremely fond of poetry and literature. Ovid. Fast. 3, el. 7, v. 1.

Perillus, an ingenious artist at Athens, who made a brazen bull for Phalaris tyrant of Agrigentum. This machine was fabricated to put criminals to death by burning them alive, and it was such that their cries were like the roaring of a bull. When Perillus gave it to Phalaris, the tyrant made the first experiment upon the donor, and cruelly put him to death by lighting a slow fire under the belly of the bull. Plin. 34, c. 8.—*Ovid. in Art. Perimēde, a daughter of Æolus, who married Achelous.—The wife of Licymnius.—A woman skilled in the knowledge of herbs and of enchantments. Theocrit. 2.

Perimēla, a daughter of Hippodamus, thrown into the sea for receiving the addresses of the Achelous. She was changed into an island in the Ionian sea, and became one of the Echinades. Vid. Met. 8, v. 690.

Perinthia, a play of Menander's. Terent. And. prol. 9.

Perinthus, a town of Thrace, on the Propontis, anciently surnamed Mygdonia. It was afterwards called Heraclea, in honour of Hercules, and now Erethi. Mela. 2, c. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 29.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—Liv. 33, c. 39.

Peripatetici, a sect of philosophers at Athens, disciples to Aristotle. They derived this name from the place where they were taught, called Peripaton, in the Lyceum, or because they received the philosopher's lectures as they walked (peripatantes). The Peripatetici acknowledged the dignity of human nature, and placed their summum bonum, not in the pleasures of passive sensation, but in the due exercise of the moral and intellectual faculties. The habit of this exercise, when guided by reason, constituted the highest excellence of man. The philosopher contended that our own happiness chiefly depends upon ourselves, and though he did not require in his followers that self-command to which others pretended, yet he allowed a moderate degree of perturbation, as becoming human nature, and he considered a certain sensibility of passion totally necessary, as by resentment we are enabled to repel injuries, and the smart which past calamities have inflicted renders us careful to avoid the repetition. Cic. Acad. 2, &c.

Periphas, a man who attempted, with Pyrrhus, Priam's palace, &c. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 476.—A son of Egyptus, who married Actæa. Apollod. 1, c. 1.—One of the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 449.—One of the first kings of Attica, before the age of Cecrops, according to some authors.

Periphātes, a robber of Attica, son of Vulcan, destroyed by Theseus. He is also called Corynetes. Hygin. 38.—Diod. 5.

Periphēsus, an ancient hero of Greece, to whom Solon sacrificed at Salamis, by order of the oracle.

Perisades, a people of Illyricum.

Perithōnes, a son of Egyptus, who married Electra. Apollod.

Peritanius, an Arcadian who enjoyed the company of Helen after her elopement with Paris. The offended lover punished the crime by mutilation, whence mutilated persons were called Peritani in Arcadia. Plut. Heph. 1, in init.

Peritas, a favourite dog of Alexander the Great, in whose honour the monarch built a city.

Peritonium, a town of Egypt, on the western side of the Nile, esteemed of great importance, as being one of the keys of the country. Antony was defeated there by C. Gallus the lieutenant of Augustus.

Permessus, a river of Ætolia, rising in mount Helicon, and flowing all round it. It received its name from Permessus, the father of a nymph called Aganippe, who also gave her name to one of the fountains of Helicon. The river Permessus, as well as the fountain Aganippe, were sacred to the Muses. Strab. 8.—Propert. 2, el. 8.

Pero, or Perone, a daughter of Neleus king of Pylos by Chloris. Her beauty drew many admirers, but she married Bias son of Amythaon, because he had by the assistance of his brother Melampus [Vid. Melampus], and according to her father's desire, recovered some oxen which Hercules had stolen away; and she became mother of Talæus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 284.—Propert. 2, el. 2, v. 17.—Paus. 4, c. 36.—A daughter of Cimon, remarkable for her filial affection. When her father had been sent to prison, where his judges had condemned him to starve, she supported his life by giving him the milk of her breasts, as to her own child. Val. Max. 5, c. 4.

Perocæ, a fountain of Bœotia, called after Peroe, a daughter of the Æopos. Paus. 9, c. 4.

Perola, a Roman who meditated the death of Hannibal in Italy. His father Pacuvius dissuaded him from assassinating the Carthaginian general.

Perpenna M., a Roman who conquered Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died B.C. 130.—Another, who joined the rebellion of Sertorius, and opposed Pompey. He was defeated by Metellus, and some time after he had the meanness to assassinate Sertorius, whom he had invited to his house. He fell into the hands of Pompey, who ordered him to be put to death. Plut. in Sert.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.—A Greek who obtained the consulship at Rome. Val. Max. 3, c. 4.

Perperone, a place of Phrygia, where, as some suppose, Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to Venus. Strab. 5.

Perranthes, a hill of Epirus, near Ambracia. Liv. 38, c. 4.

Perrhæbia, a part of Thessaly situate on the borders of the Peneus, extending between the town of Atrax and the vale of Tempe. The inhabitants were driven from their possessions by the Lapithæ, and retired into Ætolia, where part of the country received the name of Perrhæbia. Propert. 2, el. 5, v. 33.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 33, c. 34. l. 39, c. 34.

Persæ, or Persolis, one of the Oceanides, mother of Æetes, Circe, and Pasiphaë by Apollo. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 3.

Persæe, the inhabitants of Persia. Vid. Persia.

Perseus, a philosopher intimate with Antigonus, by whom he was appointed over the Acrocorinth. He flourished B.C. 274. Diog. Laert. in Zenon.

Perseë, a fountain near Mycenæ, in Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 16.

Persëis, one of the Oceanides.—A patronymic of Hecate, as daughter of Perseus. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 69.

Persëphônê, a daughter of Jupiter and Ceres, called also Proserpine. Vid. Proserpina.—The mother of Amphion by Jasus.

Persëpôlis, a celebrated city, the capital of the Persian empire. It was laid in ruins by Alexander after the conquest of Darius. The reason of this is unknown. Diodorus says that the night of about 800 Greeks, whom the Persians had shamefully mutilated, so irritated Alexander, that he resolved to punish the barbarity of the inhabitants of Persepolis, and of the neighbouring country, by permitting his soldiers to plunder their capital. Others suppose that Alexander set it on fire at the instigation of Thias, one of his courtisans, when he had passed the day in drinking and in riot and debauchery. The ruins of Persepolis, now Estakar, or Tekel-Minar, still astonish the modern traveller by their grandeur and magnificence. Curt. 5, c. 7.—Diod. 17, &c.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 14.

Perseus, a son of Perseus and Andromeda. From him the Persians, who were originally called Cephene, received their name. Herodot. 7, c. 61.—A king of Macedonia. Vid. Perseus.

Perseus, a son of Jupiter and Danaë, the daughter of Acrisius. As Acrisius had confined his daughter in a brazen tower to prevent her becoming a mother, because he was to perish, according to the words of an oracle, by the hands of his daughter's son, Perseus was no sooner born [Vid. Danaë] than he was thrown into the sea with his mother Danaë. The hopes of Acrisius were frustrated; the slender boat which carried Danaë and her son was driven by the winds on the coasts of the island of Serphos, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fisherman called Dicyes, and carried to Polydectes the king of the place. They were treated with great humanity, and Perseus was entrusted to the care of the priests of Minerva's temple. His rising genius and manly courage, however, soon displeased Polydectes, and the monarch, who wished to offer violence to Danaë, feared the resentment of her son. Yet Polydectes resolved to remove every obstacle. He invited all his friends to a sumptuous entertainment, and it was requisite that all such as came should present the monarch with a beautiful horse. Perseus was in the number of the invited, and the more particularly so, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the present which he expected from all the rest. Nevertheless, Perseus, who wished not to appear inferior to the others in magnificence, told the king that as he could not give him a horse, he would bring him the head of Medusa, the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. The offer was doubly agreeable to Polydectes, as it would remove Perseus from Serphos, and on account of its seeming impossibility, the attempt might perhaps end in his ruin. But the innocence of Perseus was patronized by the gods. Pluto lent him his helmet, which had the wonderful power of making its bearer invisible; Minerva gave him her buckler, which was as resplendent as glass; and he received from Mercury wings and the talia, with a short dagger, made of diamonds, and called herpe. According to some it was from Vulcan, and not from Mercury, that he received the herpe, which was in form like a scythe. With these arms Perseus began his expedition, and traversed the air, conducted by the goddess Minerva. He went to the Graia, the sisters of the Gorgons, who, according to the poets, had wings like the Gorgons, but only one eye and one tooth between them all, of which they made use, each in her turn. They were three in number, according to Æschylus and Apollodorus; or only two, according to Ovid and Hesiod. With Pluto's helmet, which rendered him invisible, Perseus was enabled to steal their eye and their tooth while they were asleep, and he returned them only when they had informed him where their sisters the Gorgons resided. When he had received every necessary information, Perseus flew to the habitation of the Gorgons, which was situate beyond the western ocean, according to Hesiod and Apollodorus; or in Libya, according to Ovid and Lucan; or in the deserts of Asiatic Scythia, according to Æschylus. He found these monsters asleep; and as he knew that if he fixed his eyes upon them, he should be instantly changed into a stone, he continually looked on his shield, which reflected all the objects as clearly as the best of glasses. He approached them, and with a courage which the goddess Minerva supported, he cut off Medusa's head with one blow. The noise awoke the two immortal sisters, but Pluto's helmet rendered Perseus invisible, and the attempts of the Gorgons to revenge Medusa's death proved fruitless; the conqueror made his way through the air, and from the blood which dropped from Medusa's head sprang all those innumerable serpents which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. Chrysaor also, with the golden sword, sprang from these drops of blood, as well as the horse Pegasus, which immediately flew through the air, and stopped on mount Helicon, where he became the favourite of the Muses. Meantime Perseus had continued his journey across the deserts of Libya; but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas king of Mauritania. He went to the monarch's palace, where he hoped to find a kind reception by announcing himself as the son of Jupiter, but in this he was disappointed. Atlas recollected that, according to an ancient oracle, his gardens were to be robbed of their fruit by one of the sons of Jupiter, and therefore he not only refused Perseus the hospitality which he demanded, but he even offered violence to his person. Perseus, finding himself inferior to his powerful enemy, showed him Medusa's head, and instantly Atlas was changed into a large mountain which bore the same name in the deserts of Africa. On the morrow Perseus continued his flight, and as he passed across the territories of Libya, he discovered, on the coasts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda, exposed to a sea-monster. He was struck at the sight, and offered her father Cepheus to deliver her from instant death, if he obtained her in marriage as a reward of his labours. Cepheus consented, and immediately Perseus raised himself in the air, flew towards the monster, which was advancing to devour Andromeda, and he plunged his dagger in his right shoulder, and destroyed it. This happy event was attended with the greatest rejoicings. Perseus raised three altars to Mercury, Jupiter, and Pallas, and after he had offered the sacrifice of a calf, a bullock, and a heifer, the nuptials were celebrated with the greatest festivity. The universal joy, however, was soon disturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, entered the palace with a number of armed men, and attempted to carry away the bride, whom he had courted and admired long before the arrival of Perseus. The father and mother of Andromeda interfered, but in vain; a bloody battle ensued, and Perseus must have fallen a victim to the rage of Phineus, had not he defended himself at last with the same arms which proved fatal to Atlas. He showed the Gorgon's head to his adversaries, and they were instantly turned to stone, each in the posture and attitude in which he then stood. The friends of Cepheus, and such as supported Perseus, shared not the fate of Phineus, as the hero had previously warned them of the power of Medusa's head, and of the services which he received from it. Soon after this memorable adventure Perseus retired to Seriphos, at the very moment that his mother Danaë fled to the altar of Minerva, to avoid the pursuit of Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Dictys, who had saved her from the sea, and who, as some say, was the brother of Polydectes, defended her against the attempts of her enemies, and therefore Perseus, sensible of his merit, and of his humanity, placed him on the throne of Seriphos, after he had with Medusa's head turned into stones the wicked Polydectes, and the officers who were the associates of his guilt. He afterwards restored to Mercury his talaria and his wings, to Pluto his helmet, to Vulcan his sword, and to Minerva her shield; but as he was more particularly indebted to the goddess of wisdom for her assistance and protection, he placed the Gorgon's head on her shield, or rather, according to the more received opinion, on her ægis. After he had finished these celebrated exploits, Perseus expressed a wish to return to his native country; and accordingly he embarked for the Peloponnesus, with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the Peloponnesian coasts he was informed that Teutamias king of Larissa was then celebrating funeral games in honour of his father. This intelligence drew him to Larissa to signalize himself in throwing the quoit, of which, according to some, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill a man with a quoit which he had thrown in the air. This was no other than his grandfather Acrisius, who, on the first intelligence that his grandson had reached the Peloponnesus, fled from his kingdom of Argos to the court of his friend and ally Teutamias, to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle which had obliged him to treat his daughter with so much barbarity. Some suppose, with Pausanias, that Acrisius had gone to Larissa to be reconciled to his grandson, whose fame had been spread in every city of Greece; and Ovid maintains that the grandfather was under the strongest obligations to his son-in-law, as through him he had received his kingdom, from which he had been forcibly driven by the sons of his brother Proetus. This unfortunate murder greatly depressed the spirits of Perseus: by the death of Acrisius he was entitled to the throne of Argos, but he refused to reign there; and to remove himself from a place which reminded him of the parricide which he had unfortunately committed, he exchanged his kingdom for that of Tirynthus, and the maritime coast of Argolis, where Megapenthes the son of Proetus then reigned. When he had finally settled in this part of the Peloponnesus, he determined to lay the foundations of a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Myrcena, because the pommel of his sword, called by the Greeks myrces, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown, yet it is universally agreed that he received divine honours like the rest of the ancient heroes. He had statues at Myrcena, and in the island of Seriphos, and the Athenians raised him a temple, in which they consecrated an altar in honour of Dictys, who had treated Danaë and her infant son with so much paternal tenderness. The Egyptians also paid particular honour to his memory, and asserted that he often appeared among them wearing shoes two cubits long, which was always interpreted as a sign of fertility. Perseus had by Andromeda, Alceus, Sthenelus, Nestor, Electryon, and Gorgophone, and after death, according to some mythologists, he became a constellation in the heavens. Herodot. 2, c. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16 & 18. l. 3, c. 17, &c.—*Apollon. PERSEUS, or PERSES, a son of Philip king of Macedonia. He distinguished himself, like his father, by his enmity to the Romans, and when he had made sufficient preparations, he declared war against them. His operations, however, were slow and injudicious; he wanted courage and resolution, and though he at first obtained some advantage over the Roman armies, yet his avarice and his timidity proved destructive to his cause. When Paulus was appointed to the command of the Roman armies in Macedonia, Perseus showed his inferiority by his imprudent encampments, and when he had at last yielded to the advice of his officers, who recommended a general engagement, and drawn up his forces near the walls of Pydna, B. C. 168, he was the first who ruined his own cause, and, by flying as soon as the battle was begun, he left the enemy masters of the field. From Pydna, Perseus fled to Samothrace, but he was soon discovered in his obscure retreat, and brought into the presence of the Roman conqueror, where the meanness of his behaviour exposed him to ridicule, and not to mercy. He was carried to Rome, and dragged along the streets of the city to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. His family was also exposed to the sight of the Roman populace, who shed tears on viewing in their streets, dragged like a slave, a monarch who had once defeated their armies, and spread alarm all over Italy, by the greatness of his military preparations, and by his bold undertakings. Perseus died in prison, or, according to some, he was put to a shameful death the first year of his captivity. He had two sons, Philip and Alexander, and one daughter, whose name is not known. Alexander, the younger of these, was hired to a Roman carpenter, and led the greatest part of his life in obscurity, till his ingenuity raised him to notice. He was afterwards made secretary to the senate. Liv. 40, &c.—Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.—Plut. in Paulo.—Flor. 2, c. 12.—Pro-Aert. 4, el. 12, v. 39.

Persia, a celebrated kingdom of Asia, which, in its ancient state, extended from the Hellespont to the Indus, above 2800 miles, and from Pontus to the shores of Arabia, above 3000 miles. As a province, Persia was but small, and according to the description of Ptolemy, it was bounded on the north by Media, west by Susiana, south by the Persian gulf, and east by Carmania. The empire of Persia, or the Persian monarchy, was first founded by Cyrus the Great, about 559 years before the Christian era, and under the succeeding monarchs it became one of the most considerable and powerful kingdoms of the earth. The kings of Persia began to reign in the following order: Cyrus, B.C. 559; Cambyses 529; and, after the usurpation of Smerdis for seven months, Darius, 521; Xerxes the Great, 485; Artabanus seven months, and Artaxerxes Longimanus, 464; Xerxes II., 425; Sordianus seven months, 424; Darius II., or Northus, 423; Artaxerxes II., or Memnon, 404; Artaxerxes III., or Ochus, 358; Arses, or Arogus, 337; and Darius III., or Codomanus, 335, who was conquered by Alexander the Great, 331. The destruction of the Persian monarchy by the Macedonians was easily effected, and from that time Persia became tributary to the Greeks. After the death of Alexander, when the Macedonian empire was divided among the officers of the deceased conqueror, Seleucus Nicanor made himself master of the Persian provinces, till the revolt of the Parthians introduced new revolutions in the east. Persia was partly reconquered from the Greeks, and remained tributary to the Parthians for near 500 years. After this the sovereignty was again placed into the hands of the Persians, by the revolt of Artaxerxes, a common soldier, A.D. 229, who became the founder of the second Persian monarchy, which proved so inimical to the power of the Roman emperors. In their national character, the Persians were warlike, they were early taught to ride, and to handle the bow, and by the manly exercises of hunting, they were inured to bear the toils and fatigues of a military life. Their national valour, however, soon degenerated, and their want of employment at home soon rendered them unfit for war. In the reign of Xerxes, when the empire of Persia was in its most flourishing state, a small number of Greeks were enabled repeatedly to repel for three successive days an almost innumerable army. This celebrated action, which happened at Therinopylae, shows in a strong light the superiority of the Grecian soldiers over the Persians, and the battles that before, and a short time after, were fought between the two nations at Marathon, Salamis, Platana, and Mycale, are again an incontestible proof that these Asiatics had more reliance upon their numbers and upon the splendour and richness of their arms, than upon the valour and the discipline of their troops. Their custom, too prevalent among the eastern nations, of introducing luxury into the camp, proved also in some measure destructive to their military reputation, and the view which the ancients give us of the army of Xerxes, of his cooks, stage-dancers, concubines, musicians, and perfumers, is no very favourable sign of the sagacity of a monarch, who, by his nod, could command millions of men to flock to his standard. In their religion the Persians were very superstitious; they paid the greatest veneration to the sun, the moon, and the stars, and they offered sacrifices to fire, but the supreme Deity was never represented by statues among them. They permitted polygamy, and it was no incest among them to marry a sister or a mother. In their punishments they were extremely severe, even to barbarity. The monarch always appeared with the greatest pomp and dignity; his person was attended by a guard of 15,000 men, and he had besides a body of 10,000 chosen horsemen, called immortal. He styled himself, like the rest of the eastern monarchs, the king of kings, as expressive of his greatness and his power. The Persians were formerly called Cephenes, Achamenians, and Artai, and they are often confounded with the Parthians by the ancient poets. They received the name of Persians from Perses the son of Perseus and Andromeda, who is supposed to have settled among them. Persepolis was the capital of the country. Curt. 4, c. 14, l. 5, c. 3.—Plut. in Artax. Alex. &c.—Mela, 1, &c.—Strab. 2, c. 15.—Xenoph. Cyrop.—Herodot. 1, c. 125, &c.—Apollod. 2.—Marcel. 23.

Persicum mare, or Persicus sinus, a part of the Indian ocean on the coast of Persia and Arabia, now called the gulf of Balgora.

Persia, a province of Persia, bounded by Media, Carmania, Susiana, and the Persian gulf. It is often taken for Persia itself.

Aulus Persius Flaccus, a Latin poet of Volaterra. He was of an equestrian family, and he made himself known by his intimacy with the most illustrious Romans of the age. The early part of his life was spent in his native town, and at the age of 16 he was removed to Rome, where he studied philosophy under Comutus the celebrated stoic. He also received the instructions of Palernon the grammarian, and Virginus the rhetorician. Naturally of a mild disposition, his character was unimpeached, his modesty remarkable, and his benevolence universally admired. He distinguished himself by his satirical humour, and made the faults of the orators and poets of his age, the subject of his poems. He did not even spare Nero, and the more effectually to expose the emperor to ridicule, he introduced into his satires some of his verses. The torva mimallonis imperant cornua bombis, with the three following verses, are Nero's, according to some. But though he was so severe upon the vicious and ignorant, he did not forget his friendship for Comutus, and he showed his regard for his character and abilities by making mention of his name with great propriety in his satires. It was by the advice of his learned preceptor that he corrected one of his poems in which he had compared Nero to Midas, and at his representation he altered the words Auriculas asini Mida rex habet, into Auriculas asini quis non habet? Persius died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 62, and left all his books, which consisted of 700 volumes, and a large sum of money, to his preceptor; but Cornutus only accepted the books, and returned the money to the sisters and friends of the deceased. The satires of Persius are six in number, blamed by some for obscurity of style and of language. But though they may appear almost unintelligible to some, it ought to be remembered that they were read with pleasure and with avidity by his contemporaries, and that the only difficulties which now appear to the moderns, arise from their not knowing the various characters which they described, the vices which they lashed, and the errors which they censured. The satires of Persius are generally printed with those of Juvenal, the best editions of which will be found to be by Hennis, 4to, L. B. 1695, and by Hawkey, 12mo, Dublin, 1740. The best edition of Persius, separate, is that of Meric Casaubon, 12mo, Lond. 1647. Martial.—Quintill. 10, c. 1.—August. de Magist. 9.—Lactant.—A man whose quarrel with Pupilius is mentioned in a ridiculous manner by Horace, sat. 7. He is called Hybrida, as being son of a Greek by a Roman woman.

Pertinax Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor after the death of Commodus. He was descended from an obscure family, and, like his father, who was either a slave or the son of a manumitted slave, he for some time followed the mean employment of drying wood and making charcoal. His indigence, however, did not prevent him from receiving a liberal education, and indeed he was for some time employed in teaching a number of pupils the Greek and the Roman languages in Etruria. He left this laborious profession for a military life, and by his valour and intrepidity, he gradually rose to offices of the highest trust in the army, and was made consul by M. Aurelius for his eminent services. He was afterwards entrusted with the government of Moesia, and at last he presided over the city of Rome as governor. When Commodus was murdered, Pertinax was universally selected to succeed to the imperial throne, and his refusal, and the plea of old age and increasing infirmities, did not prevent his being saluted emperor and Augustus. He acquiesced with reluctance, but his mildness, his economy, and the popularity of his administration, convinced the senate and the people of the prudence and the justice of their choice. He forbade his name to be inscribed on such places or estates as were part of the imperial domain, and exclaimed that they belonged not to him, but to the public. He melted all the silver statues which had been raised to his vicious predecessor, and he exposed to public sale all his concubines, his horses, his arms, and all the instruments of his pleasure and extravagance. With the money raised from these he enriched the empire, and was enabled to abolish all the taxes which Commodus had laid on the rivers, ports, and highways through the empire. This patriotic administration gained him the affection of the wealthiest and most discerning of his subjects, but the extravagant and luxurious raised their clamours against him, and when Pertinax attempted to introduce among the pretorian guards that discipline which was so necessary to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Rome, the flames of rebellion were kindled, and the minds of the soldiers totally alienated. Pertinax was apprised of this mutiny, but he refused to fly at the hour of danger. He scorned the advice of his friends who wished him to withdraw from the impending storm, and he unexpectedly appeared before the seditious pretorians, and without fear or concern, boldly asked them whether they, who were bound to defend the person of their prince and emperor, were come to betray him and to shed his blood. His undaunted assurance and his intrepidity would have had the desired effect, and the soldiers had already begun to retire, when one of the most seditious advanced and darted his javelin at the emperor's breast, exclaiming, "The soldiers send you this." The rest immediately followed the example, and Pertinax, muffling up his head, and calling upon Jupiter to avenge his death, remained unmoved, and was instantly dispatched. His head was cut off, and carried upon the point of a spear as in triumph to the camp. This happened on the 28th of March, A. D. 193. Pertinax reigned only 87 days, and his death was the more universally lamented, as it proceeded from a seditious tumult, and robbed the Roman empire of a more, virtuous, and benevolent emperor. Dio.—Herodian.—Capitol.

Pertunda, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the consummation of marriage. Her statue was generally placed in the bridal chamber. Varr. apud Aug. Civ. D. 6, c. 9.

Perusia, now Perugia, an ancient town of Etruria on the Tiber, built by Ocnus. L. Antonius was besieged there by Augustus, and obliged to surrender. Strab. 5.—Lucan. 1, v. 41.—Paterc. 2, c. 74.—Liv. 9, c. 37, l. 10, c. 30 & 37.

Pescennius. Vid. Niger.—A man intimate with Cicero.

Pessinus (untis), a town of Phrygia, where Atys, as some suppose, was buried. It is particularly famous for a temple and a statue of the goddess Cybele, who was from thence called Pessinuntia. Strab. 12.—Pans. 7, c. 17.—Liv. 29, c. 10 & 11.

Petälia, a town of Eubœa.

Petäus, a man killed by Perseus at the court of Cepheus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 115.

Petelia, or Petellia, a town. Vid. Petilia.

Petelinus lacus, a lake near one of the gates of Rome. Liv. 6, c. 20.

Peteon, a town of Bœotia. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 333.—Strab. 9.

Peteus, a son of Orneus, and grandson of Erechtheus. He reigned in Attica, and became father of Menestheus, who went with the Greeks to the Trojan war. He is represented by some of the ancients as a monster, half a man and half a beast. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Pans. 10, c. 35.

Petilia, now Strongoli, a town of Magna Græcia, the capital of Lucania, built or perhaps only repaired by Philoctetes, who, after his return from the Trojan war, left his country Melibœa, because his subjects had revolted. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 23, c. 20.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 402.—Strab. 6.

Petilia lex, was enacted by Petilius the tribune to make an inquiry and know how much money had been obtained from the conquests over king Antiochus.

Petili, two tribunes who accused Scipio Africanus of extortion. He was acquitted.

Petilius, a pretor who persuaded the people of Rome to burn the books which had been found in Numa's tomb, about 400 years after his death. His advice was followed. Plut. in Num.—A plebeian decemvir, &c.—A governor of the capital, who stole away the treasures entrusted to his care. He was accused, but, though guilty, he was acquitted, as being the friend of Augustus. Horat. 1, sat. 4, v. 94.

Petrosiris, a celebrated mathematician of Egypt. Juv. 6, v. 580.

Petra, the capital town of Arabia Petraea. Strab. 16.—A town of Sicily, near Hybla, whose inhabitants are called Petrici and Petrusae.—A town of Thrace. Liv. 40, c. 22.—Another of Pieria in Macedonia. Liv. 39, c. 26.—Cic. in Verr. 1, c. 39.—An elevated place near Dyrrachium. Lucan. 6, v. 16 & 70.—Cas. Cir. 3, c. 40.—Another in Elis.—Another near Corinth.

Petraea, one of the Oceanides. Herod. Th.—A part of Arabia, which has Syria at the east, Egypt on the west, Palestine on the north, and Arabia Felix at the south. This part of Arabia was rocky, whence it has received its name. It was for the most part also covered with barren sands, and was interspersed with some fruitful spots. Its capital was called Petra.

Petreus, a Roman soldier who killed his tribune during the Cimbric wars, because he hesitated to attack the enemy. He was rewarded for his valour with a crown of grass. Plin. 22, c. 6.—A lieutenant of C. Antonius, who defeated the troops of Catiline. He took the part of Pompey against Julius Cæsar. When Cæsar had been victorious in every part of the world, Petreus, who had retired into Africa, attempted to destroy himself by fighting with his friend king Juba in single combat. Juba was killed first, and Petreus obliged one of his slaves to run him through. Sallust. Catil.—Appian.—Cas. 1, Cir.—A centurion in Cæsar's army in Gaul, &c. Some read Petronius.

Petrinum, a town of Campania. Horat. 1, ep. 5, v. 5.

Petrocorii, the inhabitants of the modern town of Perigord in France. Cæs. 7, B. G. c. 75.

Petronia, the wife of Vitellius. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 64.

Petrônus, a governor of Egypt, appointed to succeed Gallus. He behaved with great humanity to the Jews, and made war against Candace queen of Æthiopia. Strab. 17.—A favourite of Nero, put to death by Galba.—A governor of Britain.—A tribune killed in Parthia with Crassus.—A man banished by Nero to the Cyclades, when Piso's conspiracy was discovered. Tacit. Ann. 15.—A governor of Britain in Nero's reign. He was put to death by Galba's orders.—Maximus, a Roman emperor. Vit. Maximus.—Arbiter, a favourite of the emperor Nero, and one of the ministers and associates of all his pleasures and his debauchery.

He was naturally fond of pleasure and effeminate, and he passed his whole nights in revels and the days in sleep. He indulged himself in all the delights and gaieties of life; but though he was the most voluptuous of the age, yet he moderated his pleasures, and wished to appear curious and reformed in luxury and extravagance. Whatever he did seemed to be performed with an air of unconcern and negligence; he was affable in his behaviour, and his witticisms and satirical remarks appeared artless and natural. He was appointed præ-consul of Bithynia, and afterwards he was rewarded with the consulship; in both of which honourable employments he behaved with all the dignity which became one of the successors of a Brutus or a Scipio. With his office he laid down his artificial gravity, and gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasure; the emperor became more attached to him, and seemed fonder of his company; but he did not long enjoy the imperial favours. Tigellinus, likewise one of Nero's favourites, jealous of his fame, accused him of conspiring against the emperor's life. The accusation was credited, and Petronius immediately resolved to withdraw himself from Nero's punishment by a voluntary death. This was performed in a manner altogether unprecedented, A.D. 66. Petronius ordered his veins to be opened; but without the eagerness of terminating his agonies, he had them closed at intervals. Some time after they were opened, and as if he wished to die in the same careless and unconcerned manner as he had lived, he passed his time in discoursing with his friends upon trifles, and listened with the greatest avidity to love verses, amusing stories, or laughable epigrams. Sometimes he manumitted his slaves or punished them with stripes. In this ludicrous manner he spent his last moments, till nature was exhausted; and before he expired he wrote an epistle to the emperor, in which he had described with a masterly hand his nocturnal extravagances, and the daily impurities of his actions. This letter was carefully sealed, and after he had conveyed it privately to the emperor, Petronius broke his signet, that it might not after his death become a snare to the innocent. Petronius distinguished himself by his writings, as well as by his luxury and voluptuousness. He is the author of many elegant but obscene compositions still extant, among which is a poem on the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar, superior in some respects to the Pharsalia of Lucan. There is also the feast of Trimalcion, in which he paints with too much licentiousness the pleasures and the debaucheries of a corrupted court and of an extravagant monarch; reflections on the instability of human life; a poem on the vanity of dreams; another on the education of the Roman youth; two treatises, &c. The best editions of Petronius are those of Burman, 4to, Utr. 1709, and Reinesius, 8vo, 1731.

Pettius, a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addressed his eleventh epode.

Petus, an architect. Vid. Satyrus.

Peuce, a small island at the mouth of the Danube. The inhabitants are called Peuca and Peucini. Strab. 7.—Lucan. 3, v. 202.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Peucestes, a Macedonian set over Egypt by Alexander. He received Persia at the general division of the Macedonian empire at the king's death. He behaved with great cowardice after he had joined himself to Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum.—Plut.—Curt. 4, c. 8.—An island which was visited by the Argonauts at their return from the conquest of the golden fleece.

Peucestia, a part of Magna Græcia in Italy, at the north of the bay of Tarentum, between the Apennines and Lucania, called also Metapia and Calabria. It received its name from Peucestes the son of Lycaon, of Arcadia. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 513.—Faus. 10, c. 13.

Peuolni, a nation of Germany, called also Basterna. Tacit. de Germ. 46.

Peucolæus, an officer who conspired with Dymnus against Alexander's life. Curt. 6.—Another, set over Sogdiana. Id. 7.

Peuxodorus, a governor of Caria, who offered to give his daughter in marriage to Aridaeus the illegitimate son of Philip. Plut.

Phacium, a town of Thessaly. Liv. 32, c. 13. 1. 36, c. 13.

Phacusa, a town of Egypt on the eastern mouth of the Nile.

Phæa, a celebrated sow which infested the neighbourhood of Cromony. It was destroyed by Theseus as he was travelling from Trézene to Athens to make himself known to his father. Some suppose that the boar of Calydon sprang from this sow. Phæa, according to some authors, was no other than a woman who prostituted herself to strangers, whom she murdered and afterwards plundered. Plut. in These.—Strab. 8.

Phæacia, an island of the Ionian sea, near the coast of Epirus, anciently called Scheria, and afterwards Coccyra. The inhabitants, called Phæaces, were a luxurious and dissolute people, from which reason a glutton was generally stigmatized by the epithet of Phæax. When Ulysses was shipwrecked on the coast of Phæacia, Alcinoüs was then king of the island, whose gardens have been greatly celebrated. Horat. 3, ep. 15, v. 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 719.—Strab. 6 & 7.—Propert. 3, el. 2, v. 13.

Phæax, an inhabitant of the island of Phæacia. Vid. Phæacia.—A man who sailed with Theseus to Crete.—An Athenian who opposed Alcibiades in his administration.

Phæasia, one of the Sporades in the Ægean. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Phædimus, one of Niobe's children. Apol. lod. 3, c. 5.—A Macedonian general who betrayed Eumenes to Antigonus.—A celebrated courier of Greece. Stat. 6.

Phædon, an Athenian put to death by the 30 tyrants. His daughters, to escape the oppressors and preserve their chastity, threw themselves together into a well.—A disciple of Socrates. He had been seized by pirates in his younger days, and the philosopher, who seemed to discover something uncommon and promising in his countenance, bought his liberty for a sum of money, and ever after esteemed him. Phædon, after the death of Socrates, returned to Elis his native country, where he founded a sect of philosophers called Elæans. The name of Phædon is affixed to one of the dialogues of Plato. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 11.—Diog.—An archon at Athens, when the Athenians were directed by the oracle to remove the bones of Theseus to Attica. Plut. in These.

Phædra, a daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë, who married Theseus, by whom she became mother of Acamas and Demophon. They had already lived for some time in conjugal felicity, when Venus, who hated all the descendants of Apollo, because that god had discovered her amours with Mars, inspired Phædra with an unconquerable passion for Hippolytus the son of Theseus, by the Amazon Hippolyte. This shameful passion Phædra long attempted to stifle, but in vain; and therefore, in the absence of Theseus, she addressed Hippolytus with all the impatience of a desponding lover. Hippolytus rejected her with horror and disdain; but Phædra, incensed on account of the rejection she had met, resolved to punish his coldness and refusal. At the return of Theseus she accused Hippolytus of attempts upon her virtue. The credulous father listened to the accusation, and without hearing the defence of Hippolytus, he banished him from his kingdom, and implored Neptune, who had promised to grant three of his requests, to punish him in some exemplary manner. As Hippolytus fled from Athens, his horses were suddenly terrified by a huge sea-monster, which Neptune had sent on the shore. He was dragged through precipices and over rocks, and he was trampled under the feet of his horses, and crushed under the wheels of his chariot. When the tragical end of Hippolytus was known at Athens, Phædra confessed her crime, and hung herself in despair, unable to survive one whose death her wickedness and guilt had occasioned. The death of Hippolytus, and the infamous passion of Phædra, are the subject of one of the tragedies of Euripides, and of Seneca. Phædra was buried at Trézene, where her tomb was still seen in the age of the geographer Pausanias, near the temple of Venus, which she had built to render the goddess favourable to her incestuous passion. There was near her tomb a myrtle, whose leaves were all full of small holes, and it was reported that Phædra had done this with a hair-pin, when the vehemence of her passion had rendered her melancholy and almost desperate. She was represented in a painting in Apollo's temple at Delphi, as suspended by a cord, and balancing herself in the air, while her sister Ariadne stood near to her, and fixed her eyes upon her; a delicate idea, by which the genius of the artist intimated her melancholy end. Plut. in These.—Paus. 1, c. 22. l. 2, c. 32.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 47 & 243.—Eurip. & Senec. in Hippol.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—Ovid. Heroid. 4.

Phædræa, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 35.

Phædrus, one of the disciples of Socrates. Cic. de Nat. D. 1.—An Epicurean philosopher.

—A Thracian who became one of the freedmen of the emperor Augustus. He translated into iambic verses the fables of Æsop, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. They are divided into five books, valuable for their precision, purity, elegance, and simplicity. They remained long buried in oblivion, till they were discovered in the library of St. Remi, at Rheims, and published by Peter Pithou, a Frenchman, at the end of the 16th century. Phædrus was for some time persecuted by Sejanus, because this corrupt minister believed that he was satirized and abused in the encomium which the poet everywhere pays to virtue. The best editions of Phædrus are those of Burman, 4to, Leyd. 1727; Hoogstraten, 4to, Amst. 1701; and Barbour, 12mo, Paris, 1754.

Phædyra, a daughter of Otanes, who first discovered that Smerdis, who had ascended the throne of Persia at the death of Cambyses, was an impostor. Herodot. 3, c. 69.

Phæmonioë, a priestess of Apollo.

Phænarète, the mother of the philosopher Socrates. She was a midwife by profession.

Phænias, a peripatetic philosopher, disciple of Aristotle. He wrote a history of tyrants. Diog. Laert.

Phænna, one of the two Graces, worshipped at Sparta, together with her sister Clita. Lacedæmon first paid them particular honour. Paus. 9, c. 35.

Phænnis, a famous prophetess in the age of Antiochus. Paus. 10, c. 15.

Phæssana, a town of Arcadia.

Phæstum, a town of Crete. Hom. Od. 3, v. 296.—Another of Macedonia. Liv. 56, c. 13.

Phæcton, a son of the sun, or Phœbus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was son of Cephalus and Aurora, according to Hesiod and Pausanias, or of Tithonus and Aurora, according to Apollodorus. He is, however, more generally acknowledged to be the son of Phœbus and Clymene. Phæcton was naturally of a lively disposition, and a handsome figure. Venus became enamoured of him, and entrusted him with the care of one of her temples. This distinguishing favour of the goddess rendered him vain and aspiring; and when Epaphus the son of Io had told him to check his pride, that he was not the son of Phœbus, Phaeton resolved to know his true origin, and at the instigation of his mother, he visited the palace of the sun. He begged Phœbus, that if he really were his father, he would give him incontestible proofs of his paternal tenderness, and convince the world of his legitimacy. Phœbus swore by the Styx that he would grant him whatever he required, and no sooner was the oath uttered, than Phaeton demanded of him to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus represented the impropriety of such a request, and the dangers to which it would expose him; but in vain; and, as the oath was inviolable, and Phaeton unmoved, the father instructed his son how he was to proceed in his way through the regions of the air. His explicit directions were forgotten, or little attended to; and no sooner had Phaeton received the reins from his father, than he betrayed his ignorance and incapacity to guide the chariot. The flying horses became sensible of the confusion of their driver, and immediately departed from the usual track. Phaeton repented too late of his rashness, and already heaven and earth were threatened with a universal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the disorder of the horses of the sun, struck the rider with one of his thunderbolts, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, consumed with fire, was found by the nymphs of the place, and honoured with a decent burial. His sisters mourned his unhappy end, and were changed into poplars by Jupiter. Virg. Phaetontides. According to the poets, while Phaeton was unskilfully driving the chariot of his father, the blood of the Æthiopsians was dried up, and their skin became black, a colour which is still preserved among the greatest part of the inhabitants of the torrid zone. The territories of Libya were also parched up, according to the same tradition, on account of their too great vicinity to the sun; and ever since, Africa, unable to recover her original verdure and fruitfulness, has exhibited a sandy country, and uncultivated waste. According to those who explain this poetical fable, Phaeton was a Ligurian prince, who studied astronomy, and in whose age the neighbourhood of the Po was visited with uncommon heats. The horses of the sun are called Phaetontis equi, either because they were guided by Phaeton, or from the Greek word (φαιθων), which expresses the splendour and lustre of that luminary. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 205.—Hesiod. Theog. 985.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 17, l. 2, fab. 1, &c.—Apollon. 4, Arg.—Horat. 1, od. 11.—Senec. in Medea.—Apollod.—Hygin. fab. 156.

Phaetontides, or Phaetontides, the sisters of Phaeton, who were changed into poplars by Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 346. Virg. Heliades.

Phaëtusa, one of the Heliades changed into poplars, after the death of their brother Phaeton. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 346.

Phæsus, a town of Peloponnesus.

Phagesia, a festival among the Greeks, observed during the celebration of the Dionysia. It received its name from the good eating and living that then universally prevailed. φάγεω.

Phalacrine, a village of the Sabines, where Vespasian was born. Suet. Vesp. 2.

Phalm, wooden towers at Rome, erected in the circus. Tuv. 6, v. 589.

Phalæcus, a general of Phocis against the Ætoliens, killed at the battle of Cheronæa. Diod. 26.

Phalæssia, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 35.

Phaianna, a town of Perrhæbia. Liv. 42, c. 54.

Phalanthus, a Lacedæmonian, who founded Tarentum in Italy, at the head of the Parthenia. His father's name was Aracus. As he went to Italy he was shipwrecked on the coast, and carried to shore by a dolphin, and from that reason there was a dolphin placed near his statue in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Virg. Parthenia. He received divine honours after death. Justin. 3, c. 4. Paus. 10, c. 10.—Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 11.—Sil. Ital. 11, v. 16.—A town and mountain of the same name in Arcadia. Pers. 8, c. 35.

Phalaris, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who made use of the most excruciating torments to punish his subjects on the smallest suspicion. Perillus made him a brazen bull, and when he had presented it to Phalaris, the tyrant ordered the inventor to be seized, and the first experiment to be made on his body. These cruelties did not long remain unrevenged; the people of Agrigentum revolted in the tenth year of his reign, and put him to death in the same manner as he had tortured Perillus and many of his subjects after him, B.C. 552. The brazen bull of Phalaris was carried by Amilcar to Carthage; but when that city was taken by Scipio, it was delivered again to the inhabitants of Agrigentum by the Romans. There are now some letters extant written by a certain Abans to Phalaris, with their respective answers, but they are supposed by some to be spurious. The best edition is that of the learned Boyle, Oxon. 1718. Cic. in Verr. 4. Ad. Attic. 7, ep. 12. De Offic. 2.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 663.—Juv. 8, v. 81.—Plin. 34, c. 8.—Diod.—A Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 762.

Phalarium, a citadel of Syracuse, where Phalaris's bull was placed.

Phalaris, a river of Bœotia, falling into the Cephissus. Paus. 9, c. 34.

Phalicon, a town of Thessaly. Polyæm. 4.

Phalæas, a philosopher and legislator, &c. Arist.

Phalærens Demetrius. Virg. Demetrius.

Phaleria, a town of Thessaly. Liv. 32, c. 15.

Phalæris, a Corinthian who led a colony to Epidamnus from Corcyra.

Phalæron, or Phalerum, or Phalera (orum), or Phalerus portus, an ancient harbour of Athens, about 25 stadia from the city, which, for its situation and smallness, was not very fit for the reception of many ships.—A place of Thessaly.

Phalærus, a son of Alcon, one of the Argonauts. Orpheus.

Phalæus, a son of Hercules and Heliconis daughter of Thestius. Apollod.

Phallus, festivals observed by the Egyptians in honour of Osiris. They receive their name from φαλλος simulacrum lignum membris virilitatis. The institution originated in this: After the murder of Osiris, Isis was unable to recover among the other limbs the privities of her husband; and therefore, as she paid particular honour to every part of his body, she distinguished that which was lost with more honour, and paid it more attention. Its representation, called phallus, was made with wood, and carried during the sacred festivals which were instituted in honour of Osiris. The people held it in the greatest veneration; it was looked upon as an emblem of fecundity, and the mention of it among the ancients never conveyed any impure thought or lascivious reflection. The festivals of the phallus were imitated by the Greeks, and introduced into Europe by the Athenians, who made the procession of the phallus part of the celebration of the Dionysia of the god of wine. Those that carried the phallus, at the end of a long pole, were called phallopophori. They generally appeared among the Greeks, besmeared with the dregs of wine, covered with skins of lambs, and wearing on their heads a crown of ivy. Lucian. de Deâ Syr.—Plut. de Isid. & Onir.—Paus. 1, c. 2.

Phalysius, a citizen of Naupactum, who recovered his sight by reading a letter sent him by Esculapius. Paus. 10, cap. ult.

Phanæus, a promontory of the island of Chios, famous for its wines. It was called after a king of the same name, who reigned there. Liv. 36, c. 43.—Virg. G. 2, v. 98.

Phanarsæa, a town of Cappadocia. Strab.
Phanas, a famous Messenian, &c., who died B.C. 682.

Phanes, a man of Halicarnassus, who fled from Amasis king of Egypt, to the court of Cambyses king of Persia, whom he advised, when he invaded Egypt, to pass through Arabia. Herodot. 3, c. 4.

Phaneta, a town of Epirus. Liv. 32, c. 28.

Phanocles, an elegiac poet of Greece, who wrote a poem on that unnatural sin of which Socrates is accused by some. He supported that Orpheus had been the first who disgraced himself by that filthy indulgence. Some of his fragments are remaining. Clem. Alex. Str. 6.

Phanodamus, an historian who wrote on the antiquities of Attica.

Phantasia, a daughter of Nicarchus of Memphis, in Egypt. Some have supposed that she wrote a poem on the Trojan war, and another on the return of Ulysses to Ithaca, from which compositions Homer copied the greatest part of his Iliad and Odyssey, when he visited Memphis, where they were deposited.

Phanus, a son of Bacchus, who was among the Argonauts. Apollod.

Phaon, a boatman of Mitylene in Lesbos. He received a small box of ointment from Venus, who had presented herself to him in the form of an old woman, to be carried over into Asia, and as soon as he had rubbed himself with what the box contained, he became one of the most beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with the charms of Phaon, and, among others, Sappho the celebrated poetess. Phaon gave himself up to the pleasures of Sappho's company; but, however, he soon conceived a disdain for her, and Sappho, mortified at his coldness, threw herself into the sea. Some say that Phaon was beloved by the goddess of beauty, who concealed him for some time among lettuce. Ælian says that Phaon was killed by a man whose bed he was defiling. Ælian. V. H. 12.—Ovid. Heroid. 21.—Palaphat. de Luc. 49.—Athen.—Lucian. in Sim. & Polistr.

Phara, a town of Africa, burnt by Scipio's soldiers.

Pharacides, a general of the Lacedæmonian fleet, who assisted Dionysius the tyrant of Sicily against the Carthaginians. Polyæn. 2.

Pharos, or Phero, a town of Crete.—Another in Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 30. Vid. Phæzæ.

Pharasmânês, a king of Iberia, in the reign of Antoninus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 33.

Pharax, a Lacedæmonian officer, who attempted to make himself absolute in Sicily.—A Thessalian, whose son, called Cyanippus, married a beautiful woman, called Leuconoe, who was torn to pieces by his dogs. Parth.

Pharis, a town of Laconia, whose inhabitants are called Pharicæ. Paus. 3, c. 30.—A son of Mercury and Philodamea, who built Phæaz in Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 30.

Pharmecleia, an island of the Ægean sea, where Julius Cæsar was seized by some pirates. Suet. Cæs. 4.—Another, where was shown Ciro's tomb. Strab.

Pharnabâzus, a satrap of Persia, son of a person of the same name, B.C. 409. He assisted the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, and gained their esteem by his friendly behaviour and support. His conduct, however, towards Alcibiades, was of the most perfidious nature, and he did not scruple to betray to his mortal enemies the man whom he had long honoured with his friendship. C. Nep. in Alc.—Plut.—An officer under Eumenes.—A king of Iberia.

Pharnâce, a town of Pontus. Plin. 6, c. 4.—The mother of Cinyras king of Pontus. Suidas.

Pharnâcês, a son of Mithridates king of Pontus, who favoured the Romans against his father. He revolted against Mithridates, and even caused him to be put to death, according to some accounts.

In the civil wars of Julius Cæsar and Pompey, he interested himself for neither of the contending parties; upon which Cæsar turned his army against him, and conquered him. It was to express the celerity of his operations in conquering Pharnaces, that the victorious Roman made use of these words, Veni, vidi, vici. Flor. 3.—Suet. in Cæs. 37.—Paterc. 2, c. 55.—A king of Pontus, who made war with Eumenes, B.C. 181.—A king of Cappadocia.—A librarian of Atticus. Cic. ad Att.

Pharnapêtes, a general of Orodes king of Parthia, killed in a battle by the Romans.

Pharnaepes, the father of Cassandra the mother of Cambyses.

Pharos, a king of Media, conquered by Ninus king of Assyria.

Pharos, a small island in the bay of Alexandria, about seven furlongs distant from the continent. It was joined to the Egyptian shore with a causeway by Dexiphanes, B.C. 284, and upon it was built a celebrated tower, in the reign of Ptolemy Soter and Philadelphus, by Sostratus the son of Dexiphanes. This tower, which was called the tower of Pharos, and which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was built with white marble, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles. On the top, fires were constantly kept to direct sailors in the bay, which was dangerous and difficult of access. The building of this tower cost the Egyptian monarch 800 talents, which were equivalent to above 165,000*l.* English, if Attic, or if Alexandrian, double that sum. There was this inscription upon it, King Ptolemy to the Gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors; but Sostratus the architect, wishing to claim all the glory, engraved his own name upon the stones, and afterwards filled the hollow with mortar, and wrote the above-mentioned inscription. When the mortar had decayed by time, Ptolemy's name disappeared, and the following inscription then became visible: Sostratus the Cnidian, son of Dexiphanes, to the Gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors. The word Pharus is often used as Egyptian. Lucan. 2, v. 636. l. 3, v. 260. l. 6, v. 308. l. 9, v. 1005, &c.—*Ovid. v. 108.—A watch-tower near Capree.—An island on the coast of Illyricum, now called Lesina. Mela, 2, c. 7.—The emperor Claudius ordered a tower to be built at the entrance of the port of Ostia, for the benefit of sailors, and it likewise bore the name of Pharos, an appellation afterwards given to every other edifice which was raised to direct the course of sailors, either with lights, or by signals. Tuv, 11, v. 76.—Suet.

Pharsalus, now Farsia, a town of Thessaly, in whose neighbourhood is a large plain called Pharsalia, famous for a battle which was fought there between Julius Cæsar and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. In that battle, which was fought on the 12th of May, B.C. 48, Cæsar lost about 200 men, or, according to others, 1200. Pompey's loss was 15,000, or 25,000 according to others, and 24,000 of his army were made prisoners of war by the conqueror. Lucan, 1, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs.—Appian. Civ.—Cæsar. Civ.—Sueton. in Cæs.—Dio. Cass.—That poem of Lucan, in which he gives an account of the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, bears the name of Pharsalia. Vid. Lucanus.

Pharte, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.
Pharus, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 322.

Pharusii, or Phaurusii, a people of Africa, beyond Mauritania. Mela, 1, c. 4.

Pharybus, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Ægean sea. It is called by some Baphyrus.

Pharycadon, a town of Macedonia, on the Peneus. Strab. 9.

Pharyge, a town of Locris.

Phasolis, a town of Pamphylia, at the foot of mount Taurus, which was long the residence of pirates. Strab. 14.—Lucan, 8, c. 251.—Cic. Agrar. 2, c. 19.

Phasiaca, a country of Asia, near the river Phasis. The inhabitants called Phasiani, are of Egyptian origin.

Phasias, a patronymic given to Medea, as being born near the Phasis. Ovid. Met. 7.

Phasis, a son of Phœbus and Ocyroe.—A river of Colchis, rising in the mountains of Armenia, now called Faas, and falling into the east of the Euxine. It is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, who entered it after a long and perilous voyage, from which reason all dangerous voyages have been proverbially intimated by the words of sailing to the Phasis. There were on the banks of the Phasis a great number of large birds, of which, according to some of the ancients, the Argonauts brought some to Greece, and which were called on that account phœnicians. The Phasis was reckoned by the ancients one of the largest rivers of Asia. Plin. 10, c. 48.—Martial. 13, ep. 62.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 19.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Paus. 4, c. 44.—Orpheus.

Phassus, a son of Lycaon. Apollod.

Phauda, a town of Pontus.

Phavorinus, a writer, the best edition of whose Greek Lexicon is that in fol. Venet. 1712.

Phayllus, a tyrant of Ambracia.—The brother of Onomarchus of Phocis, &c. Vid. Phocis. Paus. 10, c. 2.

Phea, or Phœia, a town of Elis. Homer. Il. 7.

Phœcadum, an inland town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 41.

Phœgeus, or Phlegæus, a companion of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 765.

—Another, likewise killed by Turnus. Id. 12, v. 371, &c.—A priest of Bacchus, the father of Alphesibœus, who purified Alcæmon of his mother's murder, and gave him his daughter in marriage. He was afterwards put to death by the children of Alcæmon by Callirhoë, because he had ordered Alcæmon to be killed when he had attempted to recover a collar which he had given to his daughter. Vid. Alcæmon. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 112.

Phellia, a river of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 20.

Phelloe, a town of Achaia near Ægira, where Bacchus and Diana each had a temple. Paus. 7, c. 26.

Phellus, a place of Attica.—A town of Elis, near Olympia. Strab.

Phemius, a man introduced by Homer as a musician among Penelope's suitors. Some say that he taught Homer, for which the grateful poet immortalized his name. Homer. Od.—A man who, according to some, wrote an account of the return of the Greeks from the Trojan war. The word is applied by Ovid, Am. 2, v. 7, indiscriminately to any person who excels in music.

Phemonœe, a priestess of Apollo, who is supposed to have invented heroic verses. Paus. 10, c. 6.

Phenœum, a town of Arcadia, whose inhabitants, called Phenœatae, worshipped Mercury. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

Pheneus, a town with a lake of the same name in Arcadia, whose waters were unwholesome in the night and wholesome in the daytime. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 165.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 332.—A son of Melas, killed by Tydeus. Apollod.

Pheræ, a town of Thessaly, where the tyrant Alexander reigned, whence he was called Pheræus. Strab. 8.—Cic. 2, de Offic.—Ovid. in lb. 321.—Val. Max. 9, c. 13.—A town of Attica.—Another in Laconia in Peloponnesus. Liv. 35, c. 30.

Phereus, a surname of Jason, as being a native of Phæræ.

Pheraules, a Persian whom Cyrus raised from poverty to affluence. He afterwards gave up all his possessions to enjoy tranquillity in retirement. Xenoph. Cyr.

Pherobolus, one of the Greeks during the Trojan war. Ovid. Her. 15.—A pilot of the ship of Theseus, when he went to Crete. Plut. in These.

Pherscrates, a comic poet of Athens, in the age of Plato and Aristophanes. He is supposed to have written 21 comedies, of which only a few verses remain. He introduced living characters on the stage, but never abused the liberty which he had taken, either by satire or defamation. He invented a sort of verse, which from him has been called Pherscratian. It consisted of the three last feet of an hexameter verse, of which the first was always a spondee, as for instance, the third verse of Horace's 1, od. 5, Grato Pyrrha sub antro.—Another, descended from Deucalion. Cic. Tus.

Pherecydes, a philosopher of Scyros, disciple of Pittacus, one of the first who delivered his thoughts in prose. He was acquainted with the periods of the moon, and foretold eclipses with the greatest accuracy. The doctrine of the immortality of the soul was first supported by him, as also that of the metempsychosis. Pythagoras was one of his disciples, remarkable for his esteem and his attachment to his learned master. When Pherecydes lay dangerously ill in the island of Delos, Pythagoras hastened to give him every assistance in his power, and when all his efforts had proved ineffectual, he buried him, and after he had paid him the last offices, he retired to Italy. Some, however, suppose, that Pherecydes threw himself down from a precipice as he was going to Delphi, or, according to others, he fell a sacrifice to the lousy disease, B.C. 515, in the 85th year of his age. Diog.—Lactant.—An historian of Ieros, surnamed the Athenian. He wrote a history of Attica, now lost, in the age of Darius Hystaspes.—A tragic poet.

Pherepates, a Persian set over Egypt by Artaxerxes.

Pherephate, a surname of Proserpine, from the production of corn.

Pheres, a son of Cretheus and Tyro, who built Phereæ in Thessaly, where he reigned. He married Clymene, by whom he had Admetus and Lycurgus. Apollod.—A son of Medea, stoned to death by the Corinthians, on account of the poisonous clothes which he had given to Glauce, Creon's daughter. Vid. Medea. Paus. 2, c. 3.—A friend of Æneas, killed by Halesus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 413.

Pheridas, a patronymic of Admetus son of Pheres. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 201.

Pheretima, the wife of Battus king of Cyrene, and mother of Arcesilaus. After her son's death, she recovered the kingdom by means of Amasis king of Egypt, and to avenge the murder of Arcesilaus, she caused all his assassins to be crucified round the walls of Cyrene, and she cut off the breasts of their wives, and hung them up near the bodies of their husbands. It is said that she was devoured alive by worms, a punishment which, according to some of the ancients, was inflicted by Providence for her unparalleled cruelties. Polyarn. 8. Herodot. 4, c. 204, &c.

Pherium, a town of Thessaly.

Pheron, a king of Egypt, who succeeded Sesostris. He was blind, and he recovered his sight by washing his eyes, according to the directions of the oracle, in the urine of a woman who had never had any unlawful connexions. He tried his wife first, but she appeared to have been faithful to his bed, and she was burnt with all those whose urine could not restore sight to the king. He married the woman whose urine proved beneficial. Herodot. 2, c. 111.

Phertusa, one of the Nereides. Apollod. 1.

Phiale, one of Diana's nymphs. Ovid. Met.

3.—A celebrated courtesan. Juv. 10, v. 238.

Phialia, or Phigalia, a town of Arcadia.

Paus. 8, c. 3.

Philius, a king of Arcadia. Id. Ib.

Philoeres, a people near the Palus Mæotic.

Mela. 1, c. 19.

Phidias, a celebrated statuary of Athens, who died B.C. 432. He made a statue of Minerva, at the request of Pericles, which was placed in the Pantheon. It was made with ivory and gold, and measured 39 feet in height. His presumption raised him many enemies, and he was accused of having carved his own image and that of Pericles on the shield of the statue of the goddess, for which he was banished from Athens by the clamorous populace. He retired to Elis, where he determined to revenge the ill-treatment he had received from his countrymen, by making a statue which should eclipse the fame of that of Minerva. He was successful in the attempt; and the statue he made of Jupiter Olympius was always reckoned the best of all his pieces, and has passed for one of the wonders of the world. The people of Elis were so sensible of his merit, and of the honour he had done to their city, that they appointed his descendants to the honourable office of keeping clean that magnificent statue, and of preserving it from injury. Paus. 9, c. 4.—Cic. de Orat.—Strab. 8.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plut. in Per.

Phidilè, a woman. Vid. Phidyle.

Phidippides, a celebrated courier, who ran from Athens to Lacedæmon, about 152 English miles, in two days, to ask of the Lacedæmonians assistance against the Persians. The Athenians raised a temple to his memory. Herodot. 6, c. 105.—C. Nep. in Mill.

Phiditia, a public entertainment at Sparta, where much frugality was observed, as the word (phiditia, from phido and parco) denotes. Persons of all ages were admitted; the younger frequented it as a school of temperance and sobriety, where they were trained to good manners and useful knowledge, by the example and discourse of their elders. Cic. Tus. 5, c. 34.—Paus. 3, c. 10.

Phidon, a man who enjoyed the sovereign power at Argos, and is supposed to have invented scales and measures, and coined silver at Ægina. He died B.C. 854. Arist.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.—An ancient legislator at Corinth.

Phidyre, a female servant of Horace, to whom he addressed 3, od. 23.

Phigalei, a people of Peloponnesus, near Messenia. They were naturally fond of drinking, and negligent of domestic affairs. Paus. 8, c. 39.

Phila, the eldest daughter of Antipater, who married Craterus. She afterwards married Demetrius, and when her husband had lost the kingdom of Macedonia, she poisoned herself. Plut.—A town of Macedonia. Liv. 49, c. 67. l. 44, c. 2 & 34.—An island called also Phila.

Phiadelpheia, now Alabaster, a town of Lydia. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Another, in Cilicia,—Arabia.—Syria.

Phiadelpheia, a king of Paphlagonia, who followed the interest of M. Antony.—The surname of one of the Ptolemies, king of Egypt, by antiphrasis, because he destroyed all his brothers. Vid. Ptolemæus II.

Phile, a town and island of Egypt, above the smaller cataract, but placed opposite Syene by Plin. 5, c. 9. Isis was worshipped there. Lucan. 10, v. 313.—Seneca. 2, Nat. 4, c. 2.—One of the Sporades. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Phileni, two brothers of Carthage. When a contest arose between the Cyreneans and Carthaginians, about the extent of their territories, it was mutually agreed that, at a stated hour, two men should depart from each city, and that, wherever they met, there they should fix the boundaries of their country. The Phileni accordingly departed from Carthage, and met the Cyreneans, when they had advanced far into their territories. This produced a quarrel, and the Cyreneans supported that the Phileni had left Carthage before the appointment, and that therefore they must retire or be buried in the sand. The Phileni refused, upon which they were overpowered by the Cyreneans, and accordingly buried in the sand. The Carthaginians, to commemorate the patriotic deeds of the Phileni, who had sacrificed their lives that the extent of their country might not be diminished, raised two altars on the place where their bodies had been buried, which they called Philenorum ara. These altars were the boundaries of the Carthaginian dominions, which on the other side extended as far as the columns of Hercules, which is about 3000 miles, or, according to the accurate observations of the moderns, only 1200 geographical miles. Sallust. de Bell. Jug. 19 & 79.—Sil. It. 15, v. 704.

Philonis, or Phileris, a courtesan. Vid. Philis.

Phileus, a son of Ajax, by Lyside the daughter of Coronus, one of the Lapithæ. Miltiades, as some suppose, was descended from him.—A son of Augeas, who upbraided his father for not granting what Hercules justly claimed for cleaning his stables. Vid. Augeas. He was placed upon his father's throne by Hercules. Apollod. 2.

Phlammion, a celebrated musician, son of Apollo and Chione.—A man who murdered Arsinoe, and who was slain by her female attendants.

Phlanthus, a son of Prolaus of Elis, killed at the Olympic games. Faus. 5, c. 3.

Phlarchus, a hero who gave assistance to the Phocians when the Persians invaded Greece.

Philémon, a Greek comic poet, contemporary with Menander. He obtained some poetical prizes over Menander, not so much by the merit of his composition, as by the intrigues of his friends. Plautus imitated some of his comedies. He lived to his 97th year, and died, as it is reported, of laughing, on seeing an ass eat figs, B.C. 274.—His son, who bore the same name, wrote 54 comedies, of which some few fragments remain, which do not seem to entitle him to great rank among the Greek comic writers. Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Quintil. 20.—Plut. de Irâ Coh.—Strab. 14.—A poor man of Phrygia. Vid. Baucis.—An illegitimate son of Priam.

Philène, a town of Attica between Athens and Tanagra. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 102.

Philêris, an immodest woman, whom Philocrates the poet lampooned. Mart. 7.

Philêros, a town of Macedonia. Plin. 11.

Philesius, a leader of the 10,000 Greeks after the battle of Cunaxa.

Philetærus, a eunuch made governor of Pergamus by Lysimachus. He quarrelled with Lysimachus, and made himself master of Pergamus, where he laid the foundations of a kingdom called the kingdom of Pergamus, B.C. 283. He reigned there for 20 years, and at his death he appointed his nephew Eumenes as his successor. Strab. 13.—Pans. 1, c. 8.—A Cretan general who revolted from Seleucus, and was conquered, &c. Polyan. 4.

Philetas, a grammarian and poet of Cos, in the reign of king Philip, and of his son Alexander the Great. He was made preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus. The elegies and epigrams which he wrote have been greatly commended by the ancients, and some fragments of them are still preserved in Athenæus. He was so small and slender, according to the improbable accounts of Ælian, that he always carried pieces of lead in his pockets, to prevent being blown away by the wind. Ælian. V. 11, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 1, el. 5. Propert. 3, el. 1.—An historian.

Philetus, a faithful steward of Ulysses, who, with Eumæus, assisted him in destroying the suitors, who had not only insulted the queen, but wasted the property of the absent monarch. Homer. Od. 20, &c.

Philidas, a friend of Pelopidas, who favoured the conspiracy formed to expel the Spartans from Thebes. He received the conspirators in his own house.

Philides, a dealer in horses in the age of Theophrastus. Plut. in Them.

Philinea, a courtesan, mother of Aridæus, by Philip the father of Alexander.

Philinus, a native of Agrigentum, who fought with Annibal against the Romans. He wrote a partial history of the Punic wars. C. Nep. in Annib.—Polyb.

Philippi, or Philippi, certain pieces of money coined in the reign of Philip of Macedonia, and with his image. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 284.—Liv. 34, c. 52. l. 37. c. 59. l. 39, c. 5 & 7.

Philippi, a town of Macedonia, anciently called Doros, and situate at the east of the Strymon on a rising ground, which abounds with springs and water. It was called Philippi after Philip king of Macedonia, who fortified it against the incursions of the barbarians of Thrace, and became celebrated for two battles which were fought there in October, B.C. 42, at the interval of about 20 days, between Augustus and Antony, and the republican forces of Brutus and Cassius, in which the former obtained the victory. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 284.—Plin. 7, c. 45.—Flor. 4, c. 7.—Paterc. 2, c. 7, &c.—Appian. 2, Civ. Bell.—Plut. in Anton.—Virg. G. 1, v. 490.—Suet. Aug. 2.

Philippides, a comic poet in Alexander's age.—A courier, called also Philippides.

Philippópolis, a town of Thrace, near the Hebrus, built by Philip the father of Alexander. Liv. 39, c. 53.—Of Thessaly, called Philippi.

Philippus I., son of Argæus, succeeded his father on the throne of Macedonia, and reigned 38 years, B.C. 640.—The second of that name was the fourth son of Amyntas king of Macedonia. He was sent to Thebes as a hostage by his father, where he learnt the art of war under Epaminondas, and studied with the greatest care the manners and the pursuits of the Greeks. He was recalled to Macedonia, and at the death of his brother Perdiccas, he ascended the throne as guardian and protector of the youthful years of his nephew. His ambition, however, soon discovered itself, and he made himself independent. The valour of a prudent general, and the policy of an experienced statesman, seemed requisite to ensure his power. The neighbouring nations, ridiculing the youth and inexperience of the new king of Macedonia, appeared in arms, but Philip soon convinced them of their error. Unable to meet them as yet in the field of battle, he suspended their fury by presents, and soon turned his arms against Amphipolis, a colony tributary to the Athenians. Amphipolis was conquered, and added to the kingdom of Macedonia, and Philip meditated no less than the destruction of a republic which had rendered itself so formidable to the rest of Greece, and had even claimed submission from the princes of Macedonia. His designs, however, were as yet immature, and before he could make Athens an object of conquest, the Thracians and the Illyrians demanded his attention. He made himself master of a Thracian colony, to which he gave the name of Philippi, and from which he received the greatest advantages on account of the golden mines in the neighbourhood. In the midst of his political prosperity, Philip did not neglect the honour of his family. He married Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus king of the Molossi; and when, some time after he became father of Alexander, the monarch, conscious of the inestimable advantages which arise from the lessons, the example, and the conversation of a learned and virtuous preceptor, wrote a letter with his own hand to retire from his usual pursuits, and to dedicate his whole time to the instruction of the young prince,

Everything seemed now to conspire to his aggrandizement, and historians have observed, that Philip received in one day the intelligence of three things which could gratify the most unbounded ambition, and flatter the hopes of the most aspiring monarch: the birth of a son, an honourable crown at the Olympic games, and a victory over the barbarians of Illyricum. But all these increased rather than satiated his ambition; he declared his inimical sentiments against the power of Athens, and the independence of all Greece, by laying siege to Olynthus, a place which, on account of its situation and consequence, would prove most injurious to the interests of the Athenians, and most advantageous to the intrigues and military operations of every Macedonian prince. The Athenians, roused by the eloquence of Demosthenes, sent 17 vessels and 2000 men to the assistance of Olynthus, but the money of Philip prevailed over all their efforts. The greatest part of the citizens suffered themselves to be bribed by the Macedonian gold, and Olynthus surrendered to the enemy, and was instantly reduced to ruins. His successes were as great in every part of Greece; he was declared head of the Amphictyonic council, and was entrusted with the care of the sacred temple of Apollo at Delphi. If he was recalled to Macedonia, it was only to add fresh laurels to his crown, by victories over his enemies in Illyricum and Thessaly. By assuming the mask of a moderator and peacemaker he gained confidence, and in attempting to protect the Peloponnesians against the encroaching power of Sparta, he rendered his cause popular, and by ridiculing the insults that were offered to his person as he passed through Corinth, he displayed to the world his moderation and philosophic virtues. In his attempts to make himself master of Eubœa, Philip was unsuccessful; and Phocion, who despised his gold as well as his meanness, obliged him to evacuate an island whose inhabitants were as insensible to the charms of money, as they were unmoved at the horrors of war, and the bold efforts of a vigilant enemy. From Eubœa he turned his arms against the Scythians, but the advantages which he obtained over this indigent nation were inconsiderable, and he again made Greece an object of plunder and rapine. He advanced far into Bœotia, and a general engagement was fought at Chæronea. The fight was long and bloody, but Philip obtained the victory. His behaviour after the battle reflects great disgrace upon him as a man, and as a monarch. In the hour of festivity, and during the entertainment which he had given to celebrate the trophies he had won, Philip sallied from his camp, and with the inhumanity of a brute he insulted the bodies of the slain, and exulted over the calamities of the prisoners of war. His insolence, however, was checked when Demades, one of the Athenian captives, reminded him of his meanness, by exclaiming, "Why do you, O king, act the part of a Thersites, when you can represent with so much dignity the elevated character of an Agamemnon?" The reproof was felt; Demades received his liberty, and Philip learned how to gain popularity even among his fallen enemies, by relieving their wants and easing their distresses. At the battle of Chæronea the independence of Greece was extinguished; and Philip, unable to find new enemies in Europe, formed new enterprises, and meditated new conquests. He was nominated general of the Greeks against the Persians, and was called upon as well from inclination as duty to revenge those injuries which Greece had suffered from the invasions of Darius and of Xerxes. But he was stopped in the midst of his warlike preparations; he was stabbed by Pausanias as he entered the theatre, at the celebration of the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra. This murder has given rise to many reflections upon the causes which produced it; and many who consider the recent repudiation of Olympias, and the resentment of Alexander, are apt to investigate the causes of his death in the bosom of his family. The ridiculous honours which Olympias paid to her husband's murderer strengthened the suspicion, yet Alexander declared that he invaded the kingdom of Persia to revenge his father's death upon the Persian satraps and princes, by whose immediate intrigues the assassination had been committed. The character of Philip is that of a sagacious, artful, prudent, and intriguing monarch: he was brave in the field of battle, eloquent and dissimulating at home; and he possessed the wonderful art of changing his conduct according to the disposition and caprice of mankind, without ever altering his purpose, or losing sight of his ambitious aims. He possessed much perseverance, and in the execution of his plans he was always vigorous. The hand of an assassin prevented him from achieving the boldest and the most extensive of his undertakings; and he might have acquired as many laurels, and conquered as many nations, as his son Alexander did in the succeeding reign, and the kingdom of Persia might have been added to the Macedonian empire, perhaps with greater moderation, with more glory, and with more lasting advantages. The private character of Philip lies open to censure, and raises indignation. The admirer of his virtues is disgusted to find him amongst the most abandoned prostitutes, and disgracing himself by the most unnatural crimes and lascivious indulgencies, which can make even the most debauched and the most profligate to blush. He was murdered in the 47th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign, about 336 years before the christian era. His reign is become uncommonly interesting, and his administration a matter of instruction. He is the first monarch whose life and actions are described with peculiar accuracy and historical faithfulness. Philip was the father of Alexander the Great and of Cleopatra by Olympias; he had also by Audaca, an Illyrian, Cyna, who married Amyntas the son of Perdiccas, Philip's elder brother; by Nicasiopolis, a Thessalian, Nicæa, who married Cassander; by Philinna, a Larissæan dancer, Aridanus, who reigned some time after Alexander's death; by Cleopatra the niece of Attalus, Caranus and Eutopia, who were both murdered by Olympias; and Ptolemy the first king of Egypt by Arsinoë, who in the first month of her pregnancy was married to Lagos. Demost. in Phil. & Olynth.—Justin. 7. &c.—Diod. 16.—Hist. in Alex. Dem. & Apoph.—Isocrat. ad Phil.—Curt. 1. &c.—Æschines.—Paus. Bœotic., &c.—The last king of Macedonia, of that name, was son of Demetrius. His infancy, at the death of his father, was protected by Antigonus, one of his friends, who ascended the throne, and reigned for 32 years, with the title of independent monarch. When Antigonus died, Philip recovered his father's throne, though only 15 years of age, and he early distinguished himself by his boldness and his ambitious views. His cruelty, however, to Aratus, soon displayed his character in its true light; and to the gratification of every vice, and every extravagant propensity, he had the meanness to sacrifice this faithful and virtuous Athenian. Not satisfied with the kingdom of Macedonia, Philip aspired to become the friend of Annibal, and wished to share with him the spoils which the distresses and continual loss of the Romans seemed soon to promise. But his expectations were frustrated; the Romans discovered his intrigues, and though weakened by the valour and artifice of the Carthaginian, yet they were soon enabled to meet him in the field of battle. The consul Lævinus entered without delay his territories of Macedonia, and after he had obtained a victory over him near Apollonia, and reduced his fleet to ashes, he compelled him to sue for peace. This peaceful disposition was not permanent, and when the Romans discovered that he had assisted their immortal enemy Annibal with men and money, they appointed T. Q. Flaminius to punish his perfidy, and the violation of the treaty. The Roman consul, with his usual expedition, invaded Macedonia; and in a general engagement which was fought near Cyncephale, the hostile army was totally defeated, and the monarch saved his life with difficulty by flying from the field of battle. Destitute of resources, without friends either at home or abroad, Philip was obliged to submit to the mercy of the conqueror, and to demand peace by his ambassadors. It was granted with difficulty. The terms were humiliating; but the poverty of Philip obliged him to accept the conditions, however disadvantageous and degrading to his dignity. In the midst of these public calamities the peace of his family was disturbed; and Perse, the eldest of his sons by a concubine, raised seditions against his brother Demetrius, whose condescension and humanity had gained popularity among the Macedonians, and who, from his residence at Rome as a hostage, had gained the good graces of the senate, and by the modesty and innocence of his manners, had obtained forgiveness from that venerable body for the hostilities of his father. Philip listened with too much avidity to the false accusation of Perse; and when he heard it asserted that Demetrius wished to rob him of his crown, he no longer hesitated to punish with death so unworthy and so ungrateful a son. No sooner was Demetrius sacrificed to credulity, than Philip became convinced of his cruelty and rashness, and, to punish the perfidy of Perse, he attempted to make Antigonus, another son, his successor on the Macedonian throne. But he was prevented from executing his purpose by death, in the 42d year of his reign, 179 years before the christian era. The assassin of Demetrius succeeded his father; and with the same ambition, with the same rashness and oppression, renewed the war against the Romans till his empire was destroyed and Macedonia became a Roman province. Philip has been compared with his great ancestor of the same name; but though they possessed the same virtues, the same ambition, and were tainted with the same vices, yet the father of Alexander was more sagacious and more intriguing, and the son of Demetrius was more suspicious, more cruel, and more implacable; and according to the pretended prophecy of one of the Sibyls, Macedonia was indebted to one Philip for her rise and consequence among nations, and under another Philip she lamented the loss of her power, her empire, and her dignity. Polyb. 16, &c.—Justin. 29, &c.—Plut. in Flam.—Paus. 7, c. 8.—Liv. 37, &c.—*Val. From the lowest rank in the army he gradually rose to the highest offices, and when he was made general of the pretorian guards he assassinated Gordian to make himself emperor. To establish himself with more certainty on the imperial throne, he left Mesopotamia a prey to the continual invasions of the Persians, and hurried to Rome, where his election was universally approved by the senate and the Roman people. Philip rendered his cause popular by his liberality and profusion; and it added much to his splendour and dignity that the Romans during his reign commemorated the foundation of their city, a solemnity which was observed but once every 100 years, and which was celebrated with more pomp and more magnificence than under the preceding reigns. The people were entertained with games and spectacles, the theatre of Pompey was successively crowded during three days and three nights, and 2000 gladiators bled in the circus at once, for the amusement and pleasure of a gazing populace. His usurpation, however, was short; Philip was defeated by Decius, who had proclaimed himself emperor in Pannonia, and he was assassinated by his own soldiers near Verona, in the 45th year of his age, and the 5th of his reign, A.D. 249. His son, who bore the same name, and who had shared with him the imperial dignity, was also massacred in the arms of his mother. Young Philip was then in the 13th year of his age, and the Romans lamented in him the loss of rising talents, of natural humanity, and endearing virtues. *Aurel. When the monarch had been suddenly taken ill, after bathing in the Cydnus, Philip undertook to remove the complaint when the rest of the physicians believed that all medical assistance would be ineffectual. But as he was preparing his medicine, Alexander received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was advised to beware of his physician Philip, as he had conspired against his life. The monarch was alarmed; and when Philip presented him the medicine, he gave him Parmenio's letter to peruse, and began to drink the potion. The serenity and composure of Philip's countenance, as he read the letter, removed every suspicion from Alexander's breast, and he pursued the directions of his physician, and in a few days recovered. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3.—Arrian. 2.—A son of Alexander the Great, murdered by order of Olympias.—A governor of Sparta.—A son of Cassander.—A man who pretended to be the son of Perse, that he might lay claim to the kingdom of Macedonia. Philitus, a musician of Miletus.—A Syracusan, who, during his banishment from his native country, wrote a history of Sicily, in 12 books, which was commended by some, though condemned for inaccuracy by Pausanias. He was afterwards sent against the Syracusans by Dionysius the younger, and he killed himself when overcome by the enemy, 356 B.C. Plut. in Dion.—Diad. 13.

Philo, an Arcadian maid, by whom Hercules had a son. The father, named Alcinedon, exposed his daughter, but she was saved by means of her lover, who was directed to the place where she was doomed to perish, by the chirping of a magpie, which imitated the plaintive cries of a child. Pass. 8, c. 12.

Philo, a Jewish writer of Alexandria, A.D. 40, sent as ambassador from his nation to Caligula. He was unsuccessful in his embassy, of which he wrote an entertaining account; and the emperor, who wished to be worshipped as a god, expressed his dissatisfaction with the Jews, because they refused to place his statues in their temples. He was so happy in his expressions, and elegant in his variety, that he has been called the Jewish Plato, and the book which he wrote on the sufferings of the Jews in the reign of Caius, met with such unbounded applause in the Roman senate, where he read it publicly, that he was permitted to consecrate it in the public libraries. His works were divided into three parts, of which the first related to the creation of the world, the second spoke of sacred history, and in the third the author made mention of the laws and customs of the Jewish nation. Philochorus, a man who wrote a history of Athens in 17 books, a catalogue of the archons, two books of olympiads, &c. He died B.C. 222.

Philoctetes, one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet, during the Peloponnesian war. He recommended to his countrymen to cut off the right hand of such of the enemies as were taken, that they might be rendered unfit for service. His plan was adopted by all the 10 admirals except one; but their expectations were frustrated, and instead of being conquerors, they were totally defeated at Egeopotamos by Lysander, and Philoctetes, with 3000 of his countrymen, was put to death, and denied the honours of a burial. Plut. in Lys.—A general of Ptolemy king of Egypt.—A comic poet.—Another, who wrote tragedies at Athens.

Philocrates, an Athenian, famous for his teachery, &c.—A writer who published a history of Thessaly.—A servant of C. Gracchus.—A Greek orator.

Philoctetes, son of Pœan and Demonassa, was one of the Argonauts, according to Flaccus and Hyginus, and the arm-bearer and particular friend of Hercules. He was present at the death of Hercules, and because he had erected the burning pile on which the hero was consumed, he received from him the arrows which had been dipped in the gall of the hydra, after he had bound himself by a solemn oath not to betray the place where his ashes were deposited. He had no sooner paid the last office to Hercules, than he returned to Melibœa, where his father reigned. From thence he visited Sparta, where he became one of the numerous suitors of Helen, and soon after, like the rest of those princes who had courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and who had bound themselves to protect her from injury, he was called upon by Menelaus to accompany the Greeks to the Trojan war, and he immediately set sail from Melibœa with seven ships, and repaired to Aulis, the general rendezvous of the combined fleet. He was here prevented from joining his countrymen, and the offensive smell which arose from a wound in his foot, obliged the Greeks, at the instigation of Ulysses, to remove him from the camp, and he was accordingly carried to the island of Lemnos, or, as others say, to Chryse, where Phimachus the son of Dolopion was ordered to wait upon him. In this solitary retreat he was suffered to remain for some time, till the Greeks, on the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, which were then in the possession of Philoctetes. Upon this Ulysses, accompanied by Diomedes, or, according to others, by Pyrrhus, was commissioned by the rest of the Grecian army to come and finish the tedious siege. Philoctetes recollected the ill-treatment which he had received from the Greeks, and particularly from Ulysses, and therefore he not only refused to go to Troy, but he even persuaded Pyrrhus to conduct him to Melibœa. As he embarked, the menes of Hercules forbade him to proceed, but immediately to repair to the Grecian camp, where he should be cured of his wounds, and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed, and after he had been restored to his former health by Æsculapius, or, according to some, by Machaon, or Podalirius, he destroyed an immense number of the Trojan enemy, among whom was Paris the son of Priam, with the arrows of Hercules. When by his valour Troy had been ruined, he set sail from Asia, but as he was unwilling to visit his native country, he came to Italy, where, by the assistance of his Thessalian followers, he was enabled to build a town in Calabria, which he called Petilia. Authors disagree about the causes of the wound which Philoctetes received on the foot. The most ancient mythologists support that it was the bite of the serpent which Juno had sent to torment him, because he had attended Hercules in his last moments, and had buried his ashes. According to another opinion, the princes of the Grecian army obliged him to discover where the ashes of Hercules were deposited, and as he had made an oath not to mention the place, he only with his foot struck the ground where they lay, and by this means concluded he had not violated his solemn engagement. For this, however, he was soon after punished, and the fall of one of the poisoned arrows from his quiver upon the foot which had struck the ground, occasioned so offensive a wound, that the Greeks were obliged to remove him from their camp. The sufferings and adventures of Philoctetes are the subject of one of the best tragedies of Sophocles, Virg. Æn. 3, v. 46.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Dicys Crat. 1, c. 14.—Senec. in Herc.—*Sophocl. Philodice, a daughter of Inachus, who married Leucippus.

Philolæus, a son of Minos by the nymph Paria, from whom the island of Paros received its name. Hercules put him to death, because he had killed two of his companions. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—A Pythagorean philosopher of Crotona, B.C. 374, who first supported the diurnal motion of the earth round its axis, and its annual motion round the sun. Cicero in Acad. 4, c. 39, has ascribed this opinion to the Syracusan philosopher Nicetas, and likewise to Plato; and from this passage some supposed that Copernicus started the idea of the system which he afterwards established. *Diog. Philolæus, a freedman of Cicero. He betrayed his master to Antony, for which he was tortured by Pomponius the wife of Cicero's brother, and obliged to cut off his own flesh by piece-meal, and to boil and eat it up. Plut. in Cic., &c.

Philomæche, the wife of Pelias king of Iolchos. According to some writers, she was daughter to Amphion king of Thebes, though she is more generally called Anaxibia daughter of Bias. Apollod. 1.

Philomæbrôtus, an archon at Athens, in whose age the state was entrusted to Solon, when torn by factions. Plut. in Sol.

Philomædus, a man who made himself absolute in Phocæa, by promising to assist the inhabitants. Polyæn.

Philomæla, a daughter of Pandion king of Athens, and sister to Procne, who had married Tereus king of Thrace. Procne separated from Philomæla, to whom she was particularly attached, spent her time in great melancholy till she prevailed upon her husband to go to Athens, and bring his sister to Thrace. Tereus obeyed his wife's injunctions, but he had no sooner obtained Pandion's permission to conduct Philomæla to Thrace, than he became enamoured of her, and resolved to gratify his passion. He dismissed the guards, whom the suspicions of Pandion had appointed to watch his conduct, and he offered violence to Philomæla, and afterwards cut off her tongue, that she might not be able to discover his barbarity, and the indignities which she had suffered. He confined her also in a lonely castle, and after he had taken every precaution to prevent a discovery, he returned to Thrace, and he told Procne that Philomæla had died by the way, and that he had paid the last offices to her remains. Procne, at this sad intelligence, put on mourning for the loss of Philomæla; but a year had scarcely elapsed before she was secretly informed that her sister was not dead. Philomæla, during her captivity, described on a piece of tapestry her misfortunes and the brutality of Tereus, and privately conveyed it to Procne. She was then going to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus when she received it; she disguised her resentment, and as, during the festivals of the god of wine, she was permitted to rove about the country, she hastened to deliver her sister Philomæla from her confinement, and she concerted with her on the best measures of punishing the cruelty of Tereus. She murdered her son Itylus, who was in the sixth year of his age, and served him up as food before her husband during the festival. Tereus, in the midst of his repast, called for Itylus, but Procne immediately informed him that he was then feasting on his flesh, and that instant Philomæla, by throwing on the table the head of Itylus, convinced the monarch of the cruelty of the scene. He drew his sword to punish Procne and Philomæla, but as he was going to stab them to the heart, he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomæla into a nightingale, Procne into a swallow, and Itylus into a pheasant. This tragical scene happened at Daulis in Phocis; but Pausanias and Strabo, who mention the whole of the story, are silent about the transformation; and the former observes that Tereus, after this bloody repast, fled to Megara, where he destroyed himself. The inhabitants of the place raised a monument to his memory, where they offered yearly sacrifices, and placed small pebbles instead of barley. It was on this monument that the birds called hoopoes were first seen; hence the fable of his metamorphosis. Procne and Philomæla died through excess of grief and melancholy, and as the nightingale's and swallow's voice is peculiarly plaintive and mournful, the poets have embellished the fable by supposing that the two unfortunate sisters were changed into birds. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 42, l. 10, c. 4.—*Hygin. Philophron, a general who, with 5000 soldiers, defended Pelusium against the Greeks who invaded Egypt. Diod. 16.

Philopœmen, a celebrated general of the Achaean league, born at Megalopolis. His father's name was Crangis. His education was begun and finished under Cassander, Ecdemus, and Demophanes, and he early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and appeared fond of agriculture and a country life. He proposed himself Epaminondas for a model, and he was not unsuccessful in imitating the prudence and the simplicity, the disinterestedness and activity, of this famous Theban. When Megalopolis was attacked by the Spartans, Philopœmen, then in the 30th year of his age, gave the most decisive proofs of his valour and intrepidity. He afterwards assisted Antigonus, and was present in the famous battle in which the Aetolians were defeated. Raised to the rank of chief commander, he showed his ability to discharge that important trust, by killing with his own hand Mechanidas the tyrant of Sparta; and if he was defeated in a naval battle by Nabis, he soon after repaired his losses by taking the capital of Laconia, B.C. 188, and by abolishing the laws of Lyturgus, which had flourished there for such a length of time. Sparta, after its conquest, became tributary to the Achæans, and Philopœmen enjoyed the triumph of having reduced to ruins one of the greatest and the most powerful of the cities of Greece. Some time after the Messenians revolted from the Achaean league, and Philopœmen, who headed the Achæans, unfortunately fell from his horse, and was dragged to the enemy's camp. Dionocrates the general of the Messenians treated him with great severity; he was thrown into a dungeon, and obliged to drink a dose of poison. When he received the cup from the hand of the executioner, Philopœmen asked him how his countrymen had behaved in the field of battle; and when he heard that they had obtained the victory, he drank the whole with pleasure, exclaiming that this was comfortable news. The death of Philopœmen, which happened about 183 years before the Christian era, in his 70th year, was universally lamented, and the Achæans, to revenge his fate, immediately marched to Messenia, where Dionocrates, to avoid their resentment, killed himself. The rest of his murderers were dragged to his tomb, where they were sacrificed; and the people of Megalopolis, to show further their great sense of his merit, ordered a bull to be yearly offered on his tomb, and hymns to be sung in his praise, and his actions to be celebrated in a panegyric oration. He had also statues raised to his memory, which some of the Romans attempted to violate, and to destroy, to no purpose, when Mummius took Corinth. Philopœmen has been justly called by his countrymen the last of the Greeks. Plut. in Vitâ.—Justin. 32, c. 4.—Polyb.—A native of Pergamus, who died B.C. 138.

Philostratus, a famous sophist born at Lemnos, or, according to some, at Athens. He came to Rome, where he lived under the patronage of Julia the wife of the emperor Severus, and he was entrusted by the empress with all the papers which contained some account or anecdotes of Apollonius Thyaneus, and he was ordered to review them, and with them to compile a history. The life of Apollonius is written with elegance, but the improbable accounts, the fabulous stories, and the exaggerated details which it gives, render it disgusting. There is, besides, another treatise remaining of his writings, &c. He died A.D. 244. The best edition of his writings is that of Olearius, fol. Lips. 1709.—His nephew, who lived in the reign of Helio-gabalus, wrote an account of sophists.—A philosopher in the reign of Nero.—Another to the age of Augustus.

Philotas, a son of Parmenio, distinguished in the battles of Alexander, and at last accused of conspiring against his life. He was tortured and stoned to death, or, according to some, struck through with darts by the soldiers, B.C. 330. Curt. 6, c. 11.—Plut.—Arrian.—An officer in the army of Alexander.—Another, who was made master of Cilicia, after Alexander's death.—A physician in the age of Antony. He ridiculed the expenses and the extravagance of this celebrated Roman. Plut.

Philotera, the mother of Mylo, &c. Polyb. 8.

Philotimus, a freedman of Cicero. Cic. ad Div. 3, c. 9.

Philotis, a servant-maid at Rome, who saved her countrymen from destruction. After the siege of Rome by the Gauls, the Fidenates assembled an army, under the command of Lucius Posthumius, and marched against the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city, as the conditions of peace. This extraordinary demand astonished the senators, and when they refused to comply, Philotis advised them to send all their female slaves disguised in matron's clothes, and she offered to march herself at the head. Her advice was followed, and when the Fidenates had feasted late in the evening, and were quite intoxicated, and fallen asleep, Philotis lighted a torch as a signal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The whole was successful, the Fidenates were conquered, and the senate, to reward the fidelity of the female slaves, permitted them to appear in the dress of the Roman matrons. *Plut. in Rom.—Varro de L. Philoxenus, an officer of Alexander, who received Cilicia, at the general division of the provinces.—A son of Ptolemy, who was given to Pelopidas as a hostage.—A dithyrambic poet of Cythera, who enjoyed the favour of Dionysius tyrant of Sicily for some time, till he offended him by seducing one of his female singers. During his confinement, Philoxenus composed an allegorical poem, called Cyclops, in which he had delineated the character of the tyrant under the name of Polyphemus, and represented his mistress under the name of Galatæa, and himself under that of Ulysses. The tyrant, who was fond of writing poetry, and of being applauded, removed Philoxenus from his dungeon, but the poet refused to purchase his liberty, by saying things unworthy of himself, and applauding the wretched verses of Dionysius, and therefore he was sent to the quarries. When he was asked his opinion at a feast about some verses which Dionysius had just repeated, and which the courtiers had received with the greatest applause, Philoxenus gave no answer, but he ordered the guards that surrounded the tyrant's table to take him back to the quarries. Dionysius was pleased with his pleasantry and with his firmness, and immediately forgave him. Philoxenus died at Ephesus, about 380 years before Christ. Plut.—A celebrated musician of Ionia.

—A painter of Eretria, who made for Cassander an excellent representation of the battle of Alexander with Darius. He was pupil to Nicomachus. Plin. 31, c. 10.—A philosopher, who wished to have the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taste of his ailments longer, and with more pleasure. Arist. eth. 3.

Philyllus, a comic poet. Athen.

Philyra, one of the Oceanides, who was met by Saturn in Thrace. The god, to escape from the vigilance of Rhea, changed himself into a horse, to enjoy the company of Philyra by whom he had a son, half a man and half a horse, called Chiron. Philyra was so ashamed of giving birth to such a monster, that she entreated the gods to change her nature. She was metamorphosed into the linden tree, called by her name among the Greeks. Hygin. fab. 138.—The wife of Nauplius.

Philyres, a people near Pontus.

Philyrides, a patronymic of Chiron the son of Philyra. Ovid. Art. Am.—Virg. G. 3, v. 550.

Phineus, a son of Agenor king of Phoenicia, or, according to some, of Neptune, who became king of Thrace, or, as the greater part of the mythologists support, of Bithynia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Boreas, whom some call Cleobola, by whom he had Plexippus and Pandion. After the death of Cleopatra, he married Idæa the daughter of Dardanus. Idæa, jealous of Cleopatra's children, accused them of attempts upon their father's life and crown, or, according to some, of attempts upon her virtue, and they were immediately condemned by Phineus to be deprived of their eyes. This cruelty was soon after punished by the gods. Phineus suddenly became blind, and the Harpies were sent by Jupiter to keep him under continual alarm, and to spoil the meats which were placed on his table. He was some time after delivered from these dangerous monsters by his brothers-in-law Zetes and Calais, who pursued them as far as the Strophades. He also recovered his sight by means of the Argonauts, whom he had received with great hospitality, and instructed in the easiest and speediest way by which they could arrive in Colchis. The causes of the blindness of Phineus are a matter of dispute among the ancients, some supposing that this was inflicted by Boreas, for his cruelty to his grandson, whilst others attribute it to the anger of Neptune, because he had directed the sons of Phryxus how to escape from Colchis to Greece. Many, however, think that it proceeded from his having rashly attempted to develop futurity, while others assert that Zetes and Calais put out his eyes on account of his cruelty to their nephews. The second wife of Phineus is called by some Dia, Eurytia, Danae, and Idothea. Phineus was killed by Hercules. Arg. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 15. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 10.—Orpheus.—Flacc.—The brother of Cepheus king of Ethiopia. She was, however, delivered by Perseus, who married her by the consent of her parents, for having destroyed the sea monster. This marriage displeased Phineus; he interrupted the ceremony, and, with a number of attendants, attacked Perseus and his friends. Perseus defended himself, and turned into stone Phineus and his companions, by showing them the Gorgon's head. Apollod. 2, c. 1 & 4.—*Ovid. Phlogias, a man of Cyzicus when the Argonauts visited it, &c. Flacc.

Phlegon, a native of Tralles in Lydia, one of the emperor Adrian's freedmen. He wrote different treatises on the long-lived, on wonderful things, besides an historical account of Sicily, 16 books on the olympiads, an account of the principal places in Rome, three books of fasti, &c. Of these some fragments remain. His style was not elegant, and he wrote without judgment or precision. His works have been edited by Meursius, 4to, L. Bat. 1620.—One of the horses of the sun. The word signifies burning. Ovid. Met. 2.

Phlegyas, a people of Thessaly. Some authors place them in Bœotia. They received their name from Phlegyas the son of Mars, with whom they plundered and burned the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Few of them escaped to Phocis, where they settled. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Homer. Il. 13, v. 301.—Strab. 9.

Phlegyas, a son of Mars by Chryse daughter of Halmus, was king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly. He was father of Ixion and Coronis, to whom Apollo offered violence. When the father heard that his daughter had been so wantonly abused, he marched an army against Delphi, and reduced the temple of the god to ashes. This was highly resented. Apollo killed Phlegyas and placed him in hell, where a huge stone hangs over his head, and keeps him in continual alarm, by its appearance of falling every moment. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—*Vind. Phliasia, a country of Peloponnesus, near Sicyon, of which Phlius was the capital.

Phlius, (gen. untis), a town in Peloponnesus, now Staphica, in the territory of Sicyon.—Another, in Elis.—Another, in Argolis, now Drepano.

Phloeus, a surname of Bacchus, expressive of his youth and vigour. Pint. in Symp. 5, qu. 8.

Phobëtor, one of the sons of Somnus, and his principal minister. His office was to assume the shape of serpents and wild beasts, to inspire terror into the minds of men, as his name intimates (φοβητωρ). The other two ministers of Somnus were Phantasia and Morpheus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 640.

Phobos, son of Mars, and god of terror among the ancients, was represented with a lion's head, and sacrifices were offered to him to deprecate his appearance in armies. Pint. in Erot.

Phocæa, now Fackia, a maritime town of Ionia, in Asia Minor, with two harbours, between Cumæ and Smyrna, founded by an Athenian colony. It received its name from Phocus the leader of the colony, or from phocæ, sea calves, which are found in great abundance in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants, called Phocæi and Phocæenses, were expert mariners, and founded many cities in different parts of Europe. They left Ionia, when Cyrus attempted to reduce them under his power, and they came after many adventures into Gaul, where they founded Massilia, now Marseilles. The town of Marseilles is often distinguished by the epithet of Phocæica, and its inhabitants called Phocæenses. Phocæa was declared independent by Pompey, and under the first emperors of Rome it became one of the most flourishing cities of Asia Minor. *Liv. 5, c. 30. 1. 37, c. 31. 1. 38, c. 39.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—Cæsar, 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, v. 165.—Strab. 12.—Horat. epod. 16.—Ovid. Phocæans and Phocæoi, the inhabitants of Phocis in Greece.

Phocilides, a Greek poet and philosopher of Miletus, about 540 years before the christian era. The poetical piece now extant called νοθητικον, and attributed to him, is not of his composition, but of another poet who lived in the reign of Adrian.

Phocion, an Athenian, celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. He was educated in the school of Plato and Xenocrates, and as soon as he appeared among the statesmen of Athens, he distinguished himself by his prudence and moderation, his zeal for the public good, and his military abilities. He often checked the violent and inconsiderate measures of Demosthenes, and when the Athenians seemed eager to make war against Philip king of Macedonia, Phocion observed that war should never be undertaken without the strongest and most certain expectations of success and victory. When Philip endeavoured to make himself master of Eubœa, Phocion stopped his progress, and soon obliged him to relinquish his enterprise. During the time of his administration he was always inclined to peace, though he never suffered his countrymen to become indolent, and to forget the jealousy and rivalry of their neighbours. He was 45 times appointed governor of Athens, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his talents as a minister and statesman, than that he never solicited that high, though dangerous, office. In his rural retreat, or at the head of the Athenian armies, he always appeared barefooted, and without a cloak, whence one of his soldiers had occasion to observe, when he saw him dressed more warmly than usual during a severe winter, that since Phocion wore his cloak it was a sign of the most inclement weather. If he was the friend of temperance and discipline, he was not a less brilliant example of true heroism. Philip, as well as his son Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpose; and Phocion boasted in being one of the poorest of the Athenians, and in deserving the appellation of the Good. It was through him that Greece was saved from an impending war, and he advised Alexander rather to turn his arms against Persia, than to shed the blood of the Greeks, who were either his allies or his subjects. Alexander was so sensible of his merit and of his integrity, that he sent him 100 talents from the spoils which he had obtained from the Persians, but Phocion was too great to suffer himself to be bribed; and when the conqueror had attempted a second time to oblige him, and to conciliate his favour, by offering him the government and possession of five cities, the Athenian rejected the presents with the same indifference, and with the same independent mind. But not totally to despise the favours of the monarch, he begged Alexander to restore to their liberty four slaves that were confined in the citadel of Sardis. Antipater, who succeeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, also attempted to corrupt the virtuous Athenian, but with the same success as his royal predecessor; and when a friend had observed to Phocion, that if he could so refuse the generous offers of his patrons, yet he should consider the good of his children, and accept them for their sake, Phocion calmly replied, that if his children were like him they could maintain themselves as well as their father had done, but if they behaved otherwise he declared that he was unwilling to leave them anything which might either supply their extravagancies, or encourage their debaucheries. But virtues like these could not long stand against the insolence and fickleness of an Athenian assembly. When the Piræus was taken, Phocion was accused of treason, and therefore, to avoid the public indignation, he fled for safety to Polyperchon. Polyperchon sent him back to Athens, where he was immediately condemned to drink the fatal poison. He received the indignities of the people with uncommon composure; and when one of his friends lamented his fate, Phocion exclaimed, "This is no more than what I expected; this treatment the most illustrious citizens of Athens have received before me." He took the cup with the greatest serenity of mind, and as he drank the fatal draught, he prayed for the prosperity of Athens, and bade his friends to tell his son Phocus not to remember the indignities which his father had received from the Athenians. He died about 318 years before the christian era. His body was deprived of a funeral by order of the ungrateful Athenians, and if it was at last interred, it was by stealth, under a hearth, by the hand of a woman who placed this inscription over his bones: Keep inviolate, O sacred hearth, the precious remains of a good man, till a better day restores them to the monument of their forefathers, when Athens shall be delivered of her frenzy, and shall be more wise. It has been observed of Phocion, that he never appeared elated in prosperity, or dejected in adversity, he never betrayed pusillanimity by a tear, nor joy by a smile. His countenance was stern and unpleasant, but he never behaved with severity; his expressions were mild, and his rebukes gentle. At the age of 80 he appeared at the head of the Athenian armies like the most active officer, and to his prudence and cool valour in every period of life his citizens acknowledged themselves much indebted. His merits were not buried in oblivion; the Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and honoured his memory by raising him statues, and putting to a cruel death his guilty accusers. Plut. & C. Nep. in Vitâ.—Diod. 16.

Phocis, a country of Greece, bounded on the east by Boeotia, and by Locris on the west. It originally extended from the bay of Corinth to the sea of Euboea, and reached on the north as far as Thermopylæ, but its boundaries were afterwards more contracted. Phocis received its name from Phocus, a son of Ornytion, who settled there. The inhabitants were called Phocæenses, and from thence the epithet of Phocæus was formed. Parnassus was the most celebrated of the mountains of Phocis, and Delphi was the greatest of its towns. Phocis is rendered famous for a war which it maintained against some of the Grecian republics, and which has received the name of the Phocian war. This celebrated war originated in the following circumstances:—When Philip king of Macedonia had, by his intrigues and well-concerted policy, fomented divisions in Greece, and disturbed the peace of every republic, the Greeks universally became discontented in their situation, sickle in their resolutions, and jealous of the prosperity of the neighbouring states. The Amphictyons, who were the supreme rulers of Greece, and who at that time were subservient to the views of the Thebans, the inveterate enemies of the Phocians, showed the same spirit of fickleness, and, like the rest of their countrymen, were actuated by the same fears, the same jealousy and ambition. As the supporters of religion, they accused the Phocians of impiety for ploughing a small portion of land which belonged to the god of Delphi. They immediately commanded that the sacred field should be laid waste, and that the Phocians, to expiate their crime, should pay a heavy fine to the community. The inability of the Phocians to pay the fine, and that of the Amphictyons to enforce their commands by violence, gave rise to new events. The people of Phocis were roused by the eloquence and the popularity of Philomelus, one of their countrymen, and when this ambitious ringleader had liberally contributed the great riches he possessed for the good of his countrymen, they resolved to oppose the Amphictyonic council by force of arms. He seized the rich temple of Delphi, and employed the treasures which it contained to raise a mercenary army. During two years hostilities were carried on between the Phocians and their enemies, the Thebans and the people of Locris, but no decisive battles were fought; and it can only be observed, that the Phocian prisoners were always put to an ignominious death, as guilty of the most abominable sacrilege and impiety, a treatment which was liberally retaliated on such of the army of the Amphictyons as became the captives of the enemy. The defeat, however, and death of Philomelus for a while checked their successes; but the deceased general was soon succeeded in the command by his brother, called Onomarchus, his equal in boldness and ambition, and his superior in activity and enterprise. Onomarchus rendered his cause popular, the Thessalians joined his army, and the neighbouring states observed at least a strict neutrality, if they neither opposed nor favoured his arms.

Philip of Macedonia, who had assisted the Thebans, was obliged to retire from the field with dishonour, but a more successful battle was fought near Magnesia, and the monarch, by crowning the head of his soldiers with laurel, and telling them that they fought in the cause of Delphi and heaven, obtained a complete victory. Onomarchus was slain, and his body exposed on a gibbet; 6000 shared his fate, and their bodies were thrown into the sea, as unworthy of funeral honours, and 3000 were taken alive. This fatal defeat, however, did not ruin the Phocians; Phayllus, the only surviving brother of Philomelus, took the command of their armies, and doubling the pay of his soldiers, he increased his forces by the addition of 6000 men from Athens, Lacedæmon, and Achaia. But all this numerous force at last proved ineffectual; the treasures of the temple of Delphi, which had long defrayed the expenses of the war, began to fail; dissensions arose among the ringleaders of Phocis; and when Philip had crossed the straits of Thermopylæ, the Phocians, relying on his generosity, claimed his protection, and implored him to plead their cause before the Amphictyonic council. His feeble intercession was not attended with success, and the Thebans, the Locrians, and the Thessalians, who then composed the Amphictyonic council, unanimously decreed that the Phocians should be deprived of the privilege of sending members among the Amphictyons. Their arms and their horses were to be sold, for the benefit of Apollo; they were to pay the annual sum of 60,000 talents till the temple of Delphi had been restored to its ancient splendor and opulence; their cities were to be dismantled, and reduced to distinct villages, which were to contain no more than 50 houses each, at the distance of a furlong from one another, and all the privileges and the immunities of which they were stripped, were to be conferred on Philip king of Macedonia, for his eminent services in the prosecution of the Phocian war. The Macedonians were ordered to put these cruel commands into execution. The Phocians were unable to make resistance, and 20 years after they had undertaken the sacred war, they saw their country laid desolate, their walls demolished, and their cities in ruins, by the wanton jealousy of their enemies, and the inflexible cruelty of the Macedonian soldiers, B.C. 348. They were not, however, long under this disgraceful sentence; their well-known valour and courage recommended them to favour, and they gradually regained their influence and consequence by the protection of the Athenians, and the favours of Philip. *Liv. 32, c. 18.—Ovid. 2, Am. 6, v. 15. Phocus, son of Phocion, was dissolute in his manners and unworthy of the virtues of his great father. Phœmos, a lake of Arcadia.

Phœnos, or Phœnicia, a country of Asia, at the east of the Mediterranean, whose boundaries have been different in different ages. Some suppose that the names of Phœnicia, Syria, and Palestine are indiscriminately used for one and the same country. Phœnicia, according to Ptolemy, extended on the north as far as the Eleutherus, a small river which falls into the Mediærranean sea, a little below the island of Aradus, and it had Pelusium or the territories of Egypt as its more southern boundary, and Syria on the east. Sidon and Tyre were the most capital towns of the country. The inhabitants were naturally industrious; the invention of letters is attributed to them, and commerce and navigation were among them in the most flourishing state. They planted colonies on the shores of the Mediterranean, particularly Carthage, Hippo, Marseilles, and Utica; and their manufactures acquired such a superiority over those of other nations, that among the ancients, whatever was elegant, great, or pleasing, either in apparel, or domestic utensils, received the epithet of Sidonian. The Phœnicians were originally governed by kings. They were subdued by the Persians, and afterwards by Alexander, and remained tributary to his successors and to the Romans. They were called Phœnicians, from Phœnix son of Agenor, who was one of their kings, or, according to others, from the great number of palm trees (φοινίκες) which grow in the neighbourhood. Herodot. 4, c. 42. l. 5, c. 58.—*Homer. Phœnissæ, a patronymic given to Dido, as a native of Phœnicia. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 529.

Phœnix, son of Amyntor king of Argos by Cleobule, or Hippodamia, was preceptor to young Achilles. When his father proved faithless to his wife, on account of his fondness for a concubine called Clytia, Cleobule, jealous of her husband, persuaded her son Phœnix to ingratiate himself into the favours of his father's mistress. Phœnix easily succeeded, but when Amyntor discovered his intrigues, he drew a curse upon him, and the son was soon after deprived of his sight by divine vengeance. According to some, Amyntor himself put out the eyes of his son, which so cruelly provoked him, that he meditated the death of his father. Reason and piety, however, prevailed over passion, and Phœnix, not to become a parricide, fled from Argos to the court of Peleus king of Phthia. Here he was treated with tenderness. Peleus carried him to Chiron, who restored to him his eyesight, and soon after he was made preceptor to Achilles, his benefactor's son. He was also presented with the government of many cities, and made king of the Dolopes. He accompanied his pupil to the Trojan war, and Achilles was ever grateful for the instructions and precepts which he had received from Phœnix. After the death of Achilles, Phœnix, with others, was commissioned by the Greeks to return to Greece, to bring to the war young Pyrrhus. This commission he performed with success, and after the fall of Troy, he returned with Pyrrhus, and died in Thrace. He was buried at Æon, or, according to Strabo, near Trachina, where a small river in the neighbourhood received the name of Phœnix. Strab. 9.—*Homer. Pholus, one of the Centaurs, son of Silenus and Melia, or, according to others, of Ixion and the cloud. He kindly entertained Hercules when he was going against the boar of Erymanthus, but he refused to give him wine, as that which he had belonged to the rest of the Centaurs. Hercules, upon this, without ceremony, broke the cask and drank the wine. The smell of the liquor drew the Centaurs from the neighbourhood to the house of Pholus, but Hercules stopped them when they forcibly entered the habitation of his friend, and killed the greatest part of them. Pholus gave the dead a decent funeral, but he mortally wounded himself with one of the arrows which were poisoned with the venom of the hydra, and which he attempted to extract from the body of one of the Centaurs. Hercules, unable to cure him, buried him when dead, and called the mountain where he remains were deposited by the name of Phloeus. Apollod. 1.—Paus. 3.—Virg. G. 2, v. 456. Æn. 8, v. 294.—Diod. 4.—Stat. 1.—Lucan. 3, 6 & 7.—Stat. Theb. 2.—One of the friends of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 341.

Phorbas, a son of Priam and Epithesia, killed during the Trojan war by Menelaus. The god Salmacis borrowed his features when he deceived Pollux, and threw him into the sea near the coast of Italy. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 842.—A son of Lapithus, who married Hymene the daughter of Epeus, by whom he had Actor. Pelops, according to Diodorus, shared his kingdom with Phorbas, who also, says the same historian, established himself at Rhodes, at the head of a colony from Elis and Thessaly, by order of the oracle, which promised, by his means only, deliverance from the numerous serpents which infested the island. Diod. 2.—Paus. 5, c. 1.—A shepherd of Polybus king of Corinth.—A man who profaned Apollo's temple, &c. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 414.—A king of Argos.—A native of Cyrene, son of Meinion, killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

Phorcus, or Phorcyus, a sea deity, son of Pontus and Terra, who married his sister Ceto, by whom he had the Gorgons, the dragon that kept the apples of the Hesperides, and other monsters. Hesiod. Theogn.—Apollod.—One of the auxiliaries of Priam, killed by Ajax during the Trojan war. Homer Il. 17.—A man whose seven sons assisted Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 328.

Phormio, an Athenian general, whose father's name was Asopius. He impoverished himself to maintain and support the dignity of his army. His debts were some time after paid by the Athenians, who wished to make him their general, an office which he refused, while he had so many debts, observing that it was unbecoming an officer to be at the head of an army, when he knew that he was poorer than the meanest of his soldiers.—A general of Crotona.—A peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, who once gave a lecture upon the duties of an officer, and a military profession. The philosopher was himself ignorant of the subject which he treated, upon which Hannibal the Great, who was one of his auditors, exclaimed that he had seen many dotting old men, but never one worse than Phormio. Cic. de Nat. D. 2.—An Athenian archon.—A disciple of Plato, chosen by the people of Elis to make a reformation in their government and their jurisprudence.

Phormis, an Arcadian hero who acquired great riches at the court of Gelon and Hiero in Sicily. He dedicated the brazen statue of a mare to Jupiter Olympius in Peloponnesus, which so much resembled nature, that horses came near it, as if it had been alive. Paus. 5, c. 27.

Phoroneus, the god of a river of Peloponnesus of the same name. He was son of the river Inachus by Melissa, and he was the second king of Argos. He married a nymph called Cerdo, or Laodice, by whom he had Apis, from whom Argolis was called Apia, and Niobe, the first woman of whom Jupiter became enamoured. Phoroneus taught his subjects the utility of laws, and the advantages of a social life and of friendly intercourse, whence the inhabitants of Argolis are often called Phoronei. Pausanias relates that Phoroneus, with the Cepheus, Asterion, and Inachus, were appointed as umpires in a quarrel between Neptune and Juno, concerning their right of patronizing Argolis. Juno gained the preference, upon which

Neptune, in a fit of resentment, dried up all the four rivers, whose decision he deemed partial. He afterwards restored them to their dignity and consequence. Phoroneus was the first who raised a temple to Juno. He received divine honours after death. His temple still existed at Argos, under Antoninus the Roman emperor. Paus. 2, c. 15, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Hygin. Fab. 143.

Phoronis, a patronymic of Io the sister of Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 625.

Phoronium, a town of Argolis, built by Phoroneus.

Photinus, a eunuch who was prime minister to Ptolemy king of Egypt. When Pompey fled to the court of Ptolemy, after the battle of Pharsalia, Photinus advised his master not to receive him, but to put him to death. His advice was strictly followed. Julius Cæsar some time after visited Egypt, and Photinus raised seditions against him, for which he was put to death. When Cæsar triumphed over Egypt and Alexandria, the pictures of Photinus, and of some of the Egyptians, were carried in the procession at Rome. Plut.

Photius, a son of Antonia, who betrayed to Belisarius his wife's debaucheries.—A patrician in Justinian's reign.

Phoxus, a general of the Phocæans, who burnt Lampsacus, &c. Polyæn. 5.—A tyrant of Chalcis, banished by his subjects, &c. Aristot. Pol. 5, c. 4.

Phraates I., a king of Parthia, who succeeded Arsaces III., called also Phriapatius. He made war against Antiochus king of Syria, and was defeated in three successive battles. He left many children behind him, but as they were all too young, and unable to succeed to the throne, he appointed his brother Mithridates king, of whose abilities and military prudence he had often been a spectator. Justin. 41, c. 5.

Phraates II., succeeded his father Mithridates as king of Parthia; and made war against the Scythians, whom he called to his assistance against Antiochus king of Syria, and whom he refused to pay, on the pretence that they came too late. He was murdered by some Greek mercenaries, who had been once his captives, and who had enlisted in his army, B.C. 129. Justin. 42, c. 1.—Plut. in Pomp.

Phraates III., succeeded his father Pacorus on the throne of Parthia, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tigranes the son of Tigranes king of Armenia. Soon after he invaded the kingdom of Armenia, to make his son-in-law sit on the throne of his father. His expedition was attended with ill success. He renewed a treaty of alliance which his father had made with the Romans. At his return in Parthia, he was assassinated by his sons Orodes and Mithridates. Justin.

Phraates IV., was nominated king of Parthia by his father Orodes, whom he soon after murdered, as also his own brothers. He made war against M. Antony with great success, and obliged him to retire with much loss. Some time after he was dethroned by the Parthian nobility, but he soon regained his power, and drove away the usurper, called Tiridates. The usurper claimed the protection of Augustus the Roman emperor, and Phraates sent ambassadors to Rome to plead his cause, and gain the favour of his powerful judge. He was successful in his embassy: he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the Roman emperor, restored the ensigns and standards which the Parthians had taken from Crassus and Antony, and gave up his four sons with their wives as hostages, till his engagements were performed. Some suppose that Phraates delivered his children into the hands of Augustus to be confined at Rome, that he might reign with greater security, as he knew his subjects would revolt as soon as they found any one of his family inclined to countenance their rebellion, though at the same time they scorned to support the interest of any usurper who was not of the royal house of the Arsacidae. He was, however, at last murdered by one of his concubines, who placed her son called Phraates on the throne. Val. Max. 7, c. 6.—Justin. 42, c. 5.—Dio. Cas. 51, &c.—Plut. in Anton., &c.—Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 32.

Phraates, a prince of Parthia in the reign of Tiberius.—A satrap of Parthia. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 42.

Phraortes, a son of Phraates IV. He, with his mother, murdered his father, and took possession of the vacant throne. His reign was short; he was deposed by his subjects, whom he had offended by cruelty, avarice, and oppression.

Phraortes, an officer in the army of Darius at the battle of Arbela.

Phragandæ, a people of Thrace. Liv. 26, c. 25.

Phraates, the same as Phraates. Vid. Phraates.

Phraortes, a general of the Parthian armies, &c. Strab. 16.

Phraortes succeeded his father Deioceus on the throne of Media. He made war against the neighbouring nations, and conquered the greatest part of Asia. He was defeated and killed in a battle by the Assyrians, after a reign of 22 years, B.C. 625. His son Cyaxares succeeded him. It is supposed that the Arphaxad mentioned in Judith is Phraortes. Paus.—Herodot. 1, c. 102.—A king of India, remarkable for his frugality. Philost.

Phrasicles, a nephew of Themistocles, whose daughter Nicomacha he married. Plut. in Them.

Phrasimus, the father of Praxithea. Apollod.

Phrasius, a Cyprian soothsayer, sacrificed on an altar by Busiris king of Egypt.

Phrataphernes, a general of the Massageteæ, who surrendered to Alexander. Curt. 8.—A satrap who, after the death of Darius, fled to Hyrcania, &c. Id.

Phriapatius, a king of Parthia, who flourished B.C. 195.

Phrotoium, a town near Thermopylæ. Liv. 36, c. 13.

Phrixus, a river of Argolis. There is also a small town of that name in Elis, built by the Minyæ. Herodot. 4, c. 148.

Phronima, a daughter of Etearchus king of Crete. She was delivered to a servant to be thrown into the sea, by order of her father, at the instigation of his second wife. The servant was unwilling to murder the child, but as he was bound by an oath to throw her into the sea, he accordingly let her down into the water by a rope, and took her out again unhurt. Phronima was afterwards in the number of the concubines of Polymnestus, by whom she became mother of Battus the founder of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 154.

Phrontis, son of Ometor, pilot of the ship of Menelaus, after the Trojan war, was killed by Apollo just as the ship reached Sunium. Hann. Od. 3, v. 282.—Paus. 10, c. 25.—One of the Argonauts. Apollod. 1.

Phruri, a Scythian nation.

Phryges, a river of Asia Minor, dividing Phrygia from Caria, and falling into the Helmus. Paus.

Phrygia, a country of Asia Minor, generally divided into Phrygia Major and Minor. Its boundaries are not properly or accurately defined by ancient authors, though it appears that it was situate between Bithynia, Lydia, Cappadocia and Caria. It received its name from the Phryges, a nation of Thrace, or Macedonia, who came to settle there, and from their name, by corruption, arose the word Phrygia. Cybele was the chief deity of the country, and her festivals were observed with the greatest solemnity. The most remarkable towns, besides Troy, were Laodice, Hierapolis, and Synnada. The invention of the pipe of reeds, and of all sorts of needlework, is attributed to the inhabitants, who are represented by some authors as stubborn, but yielding to correction (hence Phryx verberatus melior), as imprudent, effeminate, servile, and voluptuous; and to this Virgil seems to allude Æn. 9, v. 617. The Phrygians, like all other nations, were called barbarians by the Greeks; their music (Phrygii cantus) was of a grave and solemn nature, when opposed to the brisker and more cheerful Lydian airs. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 429, &c.—Cic. 7, ad Fam. ep. 18.—Flacc. 27.—Dio. 1, c. 50.—Plin. 1, c. 4.—Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 16.—Paus. 5, c. 25.—Herodot. 7, c. 73.—A city of Thrace.

Phryne, a celebrated prostitute who flourished at Athens about 328 years before the Christian era. She was mistress to Praxiteles, who drew her picture. Vid. Praxiteles. This was one of his best pieces, and it was placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. It is said that Apelles painted his Venus Anadyomene after he had seen Phryne on the sea-shore naked, and with dishevelled hair. Phryne became so rich by the liberality of her lovers, that she offered to rebuild, at her own expense, Thebes, which Alexander had destroyed, provided this inscription was placed on the walls; Alexander diruit, sed meretrix Phryne refecit. This was refused. Plin. 34, c. 8.—There was also another of the same name who was accused of impiety. When she saw that she was going to be condemned, she unveiled her bosom, which so influenced her judges, that she was immediately acquitted. Quintil. 2, c. 15.

Phrynionus, a general of Samos, who endeavoured to betray his country to the Athenians, &c.—A flatterer at Athens.—A tragic poet of Athens, disciple to Thespis. He was the first who introduced a female character on the stage. Strab. 14.—A comic poet.

Phrynia, a musician of Mitylene, the first who obtained a musical prize at the Panathenæa at Athens. He added two strings to the lyre, which had always been used with seven by all his predecessors, B.C. 438. It is said that he was originally a cook at the house of Hiero king of Sicily.—A writer in the reign of Commodus, who made a collection, in 36 books, of phrases and sentences from the best Greek authors, &c.

Phryno, a celebrated general of Athens, who died B.C. 590.

Phryxus, a son of Athamas king of Thebes by Nephele. After the repudiation of his mother, he was persecuted with the most inveterate fury by his stepmother Ino, because he was to sit on the throne of Athamas, in preference to the children of a second wife. He was apprised of Ino's intentions upon his life by his mother Nephele, or, according to others, by his preceptor; and the better to make his escape, he secured part of his father's treasures, and privately left Boeotia, with his sister Helle, to go to their friend and relation Æetes king of Colchis. They embarked on board a ship, or, according to the fabulous account of the poets and mythologists, they mounted on the back of a ram whose fleece was of gold, and proceeded on their journey through the air. The height to which they were carried made Helle giddy, and she fell into the sea. Phryxus gave her a decent burial on the sea-shore, and after he had called the place Hellespont from her name, he continued his flight, and arrived safe in the kingdom of Æetes, where he offered the ram on the altars of Mars. The king received him with great tenderness, and gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. She had by him Phrontis, Melias, Argos, Cylindrus, whom some call Cytorus, Catis, Lorus, and Hellen. Some time after he was murdered by his father-in-law, who envied him the possession of the golden fleece; and Chalciope, to prevent her children from sharing their father's fate, sent them privately from Colchis to Boeotia, as nothing was to be dreaded there from the jealousy or resentment of Ino, who was then dead. The fable of the flight of Phryxus to Colchis on a ram has been explained by some, who observe that the ship on which he embarked was either called by that name, or carried on her prow the figure of that animal. The fleece of gold is explained by recollecting that Phryxus carried away immense treasures from Thebes. Phryxus was placed among the constellations of heaven after death. The ram which carried him to Asia is said to have been the fruit of Neptune's amour with Theopane the daughter of Altis. This ram had been given to Athamas by the gods, to reward his piety and religious life, and Nephele procured it for her children, just as they were going to be sacrificed to the jealousy of Ino. The murder of Phryxus was some time after amply revenged by the Greeks. It gave rise to a celebrated expedition which was achieved under Jason and many of the princes of Greece, and which had for its object the recovery of the golden fleece, and the punishment of the king of Colchis for his cruelty to the son of Athamas. Diod. 4.—Herodot. 7. c. 197.—Apollod. Arg.—Orpheus.—Placcus.—Strab.—Apollod. 1. c. 9.—Pindar. Pyth. 4.—Hygin. Fab. 14, 188, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 18. Met. 4.—A small river of Argolis.

Phthia, a town of Phthiotis, at the east of mount Othrys in Thessaly, where Achilles was born, and from which he is often called Phthianus heros. *Horat. 4. od. 6. v. 4.—Ovid. Met. 13. v. 156.—Mela, 2. c. 3.—Propert. 2. el. 14. v. 38.—Cic. Tus. 1. c. 10.—A nymph of Achaia, beloved by Jupiter, who, to seduce her, disguised himself under the shape of a pigeon. *Ælian. V. H. 1. c. 15.—A daughter of Amphion and Niobe, killed by Diana. Apollod.

Phthiôtis, a small province of Thessaly, between the Pelagasic sinus, and the Maliacus sinus, Magnesia, and mount Cæta. It was also called Achaia. Paus. 10. c. 8.

Phya, a tall and beautiful woman of Attica, whom Pisistratus, when he wished to re-establish himself a third time in his tyranny, dressed like the goddess Minerva, and led to the city on a chariot, making the populace believe that the goddess herself came to restore him to power. The artifice succeeded. Herodot. 1. c. 59.—Polyan. 1. c. 47.

Phyons (untis), a promontory near Cyrene, now called Ras-el-um. Lucan. 9.

Phylææ, a town of Thessaly, built by Phylacus. Proteulacus reigned there, from whence he is often called Phylacides. Lucan. 6. v. 252.—A town of Arcadia. Paus. 1. c. 34.—A town of Epirus. Liv. 45. c. 26.

Phylæus, a son of Deion king of Phocis. He married Clymene the daughter of Mynias, and founded Phylææ. Apollod.

Phylarchus, a Greek biographer, who flourished B.C. 221. He was accused of partiality by Plut. in Arat.

Phylax, a king of Ephyre, son of Antiochus and grandson of Hercules.

Phyle, a well-fortified village of Attica, at a little distance from Athens. C. Nep. in Thras.

Phyleis, a daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

Phylæus, one of the Greek captains during the Trojan war.—A son of Augæas. He blamed his father for refusing to pay Hercules what he had promised him for cleaning his stables. He was placed on his father's throne by Hercules.

Phylira. Vid. Philyra.

Phylla, the wife of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and mother of Stratonicæ the wife of Seleucus.

Phyllia, a part of Arcadia.—A place in Thessaly.

Phylleus, a mountain, country, and town of Macedonia. Apollon. Arg. 1.

Phyllis, a daughter of Sithon, or, according to others, of Lycurgus king of Thrace, who hospitably received Demophoon the son of Theseus, who, at his return from the Trojan war, had stopped on her coasts. She became enamoured of him, and did not find him insensible to her passion. After some months of mutual tenderness and affection, Demophoon set sail for Athens, where his domestic affairs recalled him. He promised faithfully to return as soon as a month was expired; but either his dislike for Phyllis, or the irreparable situation of his affairs, obliged him to violate his engagement, and the queen, grown desperate on account of his absence, hanged herself, or, according to others, threw herself down a precipice into the sea, and perished. Her friends raised a tomb over her body, where there grew up certain trees, whose leaves at a particular season of the year, suddenly became wet, as if shedding tears for the death of Phyllis. According to an old tradition mentioned by Servius, Virgil's commentator, Phyllis was changed by the gods into an almond tree, which is called Phylla by the Greeks. Some days after this metamorphosis, Demophoon revisited Thrace, and when he heard of the fate of Phyllis, he ran and clasped the tree, which, though at that time stripped of its leaves, suddenly shot forth and blossomed, as if still sensible of tenderness and love. The absence of Demophoon from the house of Phyllis has given rise to a beautiful epistle of Ovid, supposed to have been written by the Thracian queen, about the fourth month after her lover's departure. *Ovid. Heroid. 2. De Art. Am. 9. v. 353. Trist. 2. 437.—Hygin. Fab. 59.—A country woman introduced in Virgil's eclogues.—The nurse of the emperor Domitian. *Suet. in Dom. 17.—A country of Thrace, near mount Pangæus. Herodot. 7. c. 13.

Phyllis, a young Boeotian, uncommonly fond of Cygnus the son of Hyria, a woman of Boeotia. Cygnus slighted his passion, and told him that, to obtain a return of affection, he must previously destroy an enormous lion, take alive two large vultures, and sacrifice on Jupiter's altars a wild bull that infested the country. This he easily effected by means of artifice, and by the advice of Hercules he forgot his partiality for the son of Hyria. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 372.—Nican. in Heter.

3.—A Spartan remarkable for the courage with which he fought against Pyrrhus king of Epirus.

Phyllodōce, one of Cyrene's attendant nymphs. Virg. G. 4, v. 335.

Phyllos, a country of Arcadia.—A town of Thessaly near Larissa, where Apollo had a temple.

Phyllus, a general of Phocis during the Phocian or sacred war against the Thebans. He had assumed the command after the death of his brothers Philomelus and Onomarchus. He is called by some Phayllus. Vid. Phocis.

Physcella, a town of Macedonia. Mela, 2, c. 3.

Physcon, a famous rock of Bœotia, which was the residence of the Sphinx, and against which the monster destroyed himself, when his enigmas were explained by Œdipus. Pict.

Physcoa, a woman of Elis, mother of Narcæus by Bacchus. Paus. 5, c. 16.

Physcon, a surname of one of the Ptolemies, king of Egypt, from the great prominence of his belly (φύσων, ventris). Athen. 2, c. 23.

Physcoa, a town of Caria, opposite Rhodes. Strab. 14.

Physcus, a river of Asia falling into the Tigris. The 10,000 Greeks crossed it on their return from Cunaxa.

Phytalides, the descendants of Phytalus, a man who hospitably received and entertained Ceres, when she visited Attica. Pict. in Thea.

Phyton, a general of the people of Rhegium, against Dionysius the tyrant of Sicily. He was taken by the enemy and tortured, B.C. 387, and his son was thrown into the sea. Diod. 14.

Phyzium, a town of Elis.

Pia, or Pialia, festivals instituted in honour of Adrian, by the Emperor Antoninus. They were celebrated at Puteoli, on the second year of the Olympiads.

Piasus, a general of the Pelasgi. Strab. 13.

Picœni, the inhabitants of Picœnum, called also Picentes. They received their name from picus, a bird by whose auspices they had settled in that part of Italy. Ital. 8, v. 425.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

Picentia, the capital of the Picentini.

Picentini, a people of Italy between Lucania and Campania on the Tuscan sea. They are different from the Piceni or Picentes, who inhabited Picœnum. Sil. It. 8, v. 450.—Tacit. H. 4, c. 62.

Picœnum, or Picœnus æger, a country of Italy near the Umbrians and Sabines, on the borders of the Adriatic. Liv. 21, c. 6. l. 22, c. 9. l. 27, c. 43.—Sil. 10, v. 313.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 272.—Mart. 1, ep. 44.

Piora, a lake of Africa, which Alexander crossed when he went to consult the oracle of Ammon. Diod.

Piotæ, or Pioti, a people of Scythia, called also Agathyræ. They received this name from their painting their bodies with different colours, to appear more terrible in the eyes of their enemies. A colony of these, according to Servius, Virgil's commentator, emigrated to the northern parts of Britain, where they still preserved their name and their savage manners, but they are mentioned only by later writers. Marcell. 27, c. 16.—Claudian. de Hon. Cons. v. 54.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 1.

Piotævi, or Piotōnes, a people of Gaul in the modern country of Poitou. Cas. 7, Bell. G. c. 4.

Piotævium, a town of Gaul.

Fabius Pictor, a consul under whom silver was first coined at Rome, A.U.C. 485.

Picumnus and Pilumnus, two deities at Rome, who presided over the auspices that were required before the celebration of nuptials. Pilumnus was supposed to patronize children, as his name seems, in some manner, to indicate, quod pellant mala infantia. The manuring of lands was first invented by Picumnus, from which reason he is called Sterquilinius. Pilumnus is also invoked as the god of bakers and millers, as he is said to have first invented how to grind corn. Turnus boasted of being one of his lineal descendants. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 4.—Varro.

Picus, a king of Latium, son of Saturn, who married Venilia, who is also called Canens, by whom he had Faunus. He was tenderly loved by the goddess Pomona, and he returned a mutual affection. As he was one day hunting in the woods, he was met by Circe, who became deeply enamoured of him, and who changed him into a woodpecker, called by the name of picus among the Latins. His wife Venilia was so disconsolate when she was informed of his death, that she pined away. Some suppose that Picus was the son of Pilumnus, and that he gave out prophecies to his subjects, by means of a favourite woodpecker, from which circumstance originated the fable of his being metamorphosed into a bird. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 48, 171, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 320, &c.

Pidoros, a town near mount Athos. Herodot. 7, c. 122.

Picytes, a man killed by Ulysses during the Trojan war.

Pisilus, a son of Neoptolemus king of Epirus, after his father. Paus. 1, c. 11.

Pisra, a fountain of Peloponnesus, between Elis and Olympia. Paus. 5, c. 16.

Pisria, a small tract of country in Thessaly or Macedonia, from which the epithet of Pisrian was applied to the Muses, and to poetical compositions. Martial. 9, ep. 88, v. 3.—Horat. 4, od. 8, v. 20.

—A place between Cilicia and Syria.—One of the wives of Danaus, mother of six daughters, called Actæa, Podarce, Dioxippe, Adyfe, Ocyete, and Pilarge. Apollod. 2.—The wife of Oxylus the son of Hamon, and mother of Ætolus and Laias. Paus. 5, 3.—The daughter of Pythas, a Milesian, &c.

Pierides, a name given to the Muses, either because they were born in Pieria, in Thessaly, or because they were supposed by some to be the daughters of Pierus, a king of Macedonia, who settled in Bœotia.—Also the daughters of Pierus, who challenged the Muses to a trial in music, in which they were conquered, and changed into magpies. It may perhaps be supposed that the victorious Muses assumed the name of the conquered daughters of Pierus, and ordered themselves to be called Pierides, in the same manner as Minerva was called Pallas because she had killed the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 300.

Pisria, a mountain of Macedonia. Paus. 9, c. 29.

Pierus, a mountain of Thessaly, sacred to the Muses, who were from thence, as some imagine, called Pierides.—A rich man of Thessaly, whose nine daughters, called Pierides, challenged the Muses, and were changed into magpies when conquered. Paus. 9, c. 29.—A river of Achaia, in Peloponnesus.—A town of Thessaly. Paus. 7, c. 21.—A mountain with a lake of the same name in Macedonia.

Pistias, a virtue which denotes veneration for the deity, and love and tenderness to our friends. It received divine honours among the Romans, and was made one of their gods. Acilius Glabrio first erected a temple to this new divinity, on the spot where a woman had fed with her own milk her aged father, who had been imprisoned by the order of the senate, and deprived of all ailments. Cic. de Div. 1.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Plin. 7, c. 36.

Pigres and Matyas, two brothers, &c. Herodot.—The name of three rivers.

Pigrum mare, a name applied to the Northern sea, from its being frozen. The word Pigra is applied to the Palus Mæotis. Ovid. 4, Post. 10, v. 61.—Plin. 4, c. 13.—Tact. G. 45.

Pilumnus, the god of bakers at Rome. Vid. Picumnus.

Pimpla, a mountain of Macedonia, with a fountain of the same name, on the confines of Thessaly, near Olympus, sacred to the Muses, who on that account are often called Pimpleæ and Pimplæades. Horat. 1, od. 26, v. 9.—Strab. 10.—Martial. 12.—ep. 11, v. 3.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 4, v. 26. Sylv. 2, v. 36.

Pindare, an island of the Ægean sea.—A town of Syria, at the south of mount Amanus. Plin. 5, c. 25.—Of Lycia. Strab. 14.

Pinarius and Potitius, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy. They were instructed by Hercules, who visited the court of Evander, how they were to offer sacrifices to his divinity, in the morning, and in the evening, immediately at sunset. The morning sacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening Potitius was obliged to offer the sacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time. This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered that for the future Pinarius and his descendants should preside over the sacrifices, but that Potitius, with his posterity, should wait upon the priests as servants, when the sacrifices were annually offered to him on mount Aventine. This was religiously observed till the age of Appius Claudius, who persuaded the Potitii, by a large bribe, to discontinue their sacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by slaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors observe, the Potitii were deprived of sight, and the family became a little time after totally extinct. Liv. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 269, &c.—Victor. de Orig. 8.

M. Pinarius Ruso, a pretor, who conquered Sardinia, and defeated the Corsicans. Cic. de Orat. 2.

Pinarus, or Pindus, now Delifou, a river falling into the sea near Issus, after flowing between Cilicia and Syria. Dionys. Per.

Pincum, a town of Mæsia Superior, now Gradisca.

Pindarus, a celebrated lyric poet of Thebes. He was carefully trained from his earliest years to the study of music and poetry, and he was taught how to compose verses with elegance and simplicity, by Myrtis and Corinna. When he was young, it is said that a swarm of bees settled on his lips, and there left some honeycombs as he reposed on the grass. This was universally explained as a prognostic of his future greatness and celebrity, and indeed he seemed entitled to notice when he had conquered Myrtis in a musical conquest. He was not, however, so successful against Corinna, who obtained five times, while he was competitor, a poetical prize, which, according to some, was adjudged rather to the charms of her person, than to the brilliancy of her genius, or the superiority of her composition. In the public assemblies of Greece, where females were not permitted to contend, Pindar was rewarded with the prize, in preference to every other competitor; and as the conquerors at Olympia were the subject of his compositions, the poet was courted by statesmen and princes. His hymns and pæans were repeated before the most crowded assemblies in the temples of Greece; and the priests of Delphi declared that it was the will of Apollo that Pindar should receive the half of all the first fruit offerings that were annually heaped on his altars. This was not the only public honour which he received; after his death, he was honoured with every mark of respect, even to adoration. His statue was erected at Thebes in the public place where the games were exhibited, and six centuries after it was viewed with pleasure and admiration by the geographer Pausanias. The honours which had been paid to him while alive, were also shared by his posterity; and at the celebration of one of the festivals of the Greeks, a portion of the victim which had been offered in sacrifice, was reserved for the descendants of the poet. Even the most inveterate enemies of the Thebans showed regard for his memory, and the Spartans spared the house which the prince of Lyncæ had inhabited, when they destroyed the houses and the walls of Thebes. The same respect was also paid him by Alexander the Great when Thebes was reduced to ashes. It is said that Pindar died at the advanced age of 86, B.C. 435. The greatest part of his works have perished. He had written some hymns to the gods, poems in honour of Apollo, dithyrambs to Bacchus, and odes on several victories obtained at the four greatest festivals of the Greeks, the Olympic, Isthmian, Pythian, and Nemean games. Of all these, the odes are the only compositions extant, admired for sublimity of sentiments, grandeur of expression, energy and magnificence of style, boldness of metaphors, harmony of numbers, and elegance of diction. In these odes, which were repeated with the aid of musical instruments, and accompanied by the various inflections of the voice, with suitable attitudes and proper motions of the body, the poet has not merely celebrated the place where the victory was won, but has introduced beautiful episodes, and by unfolding the greatness of his heroes, the dignity of their characters, and the glory of the several republics where they flourished, he has rendered the whole truly beautiful and in the highest degree interesting. Horace has not hesitated to call Pindar imitatable, and this panegyric will not perhaps appear too offensive when we recollect that succeeding critics have agreed in extolling his beauties, his excellence, the fire, animation, and enthusiasm of his genius. He has been censured for his affectation in composing an ode from which the letter S was excluded. The best editions of Pindar are those of Heyne, 4to, Gottingen, 1773; of Glasgow, 12mo, 1774; and of Schmidius, 4to, Witteberg, 1626. Athen.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Horat. 4, od. 2.—Ælian. V. 11, 2.—Paus. 1, c. 8. l. 9, c. 23.—*Val. Pindæus, a mountain of Troas.

Pindenissus, a town of Cilicia, on the borders of Syria. Cicero, when proconsul in Asia, besieged it for 25 days and took it. Cic. ad M. Caelium, ad Fam. 2, ep. 10.

Pindus, a mountain, or rather a chain of mountains, between Thessaly, Macedonia, and Epirus. It was greatly celebrated as being sacred to the Muses and to Apollo. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 570. — Strab. 18. — Virg. Ecl. 10. — Lucan. 2, v. 674. l. 6, v. 339. — Meta, 2, c. 3.—A town of Doris in Greece, called also Cyphas. It was watered by a small river of the same name which falls into the Cephissus, near Lileæ. Herodot. 1, c. 56.

Pingus, a river of Mæsia, falling into the Danube. Plin. 3, c. 26.

Pinna, a town of Italy at the mouth of the Marrinus, south of Picenum. Sil. 8, v. 518.

Pinthias. Vid. Phinthias.

Pintia, a town of Spain, now supposed to be Valladolid.

Pion, one of the descendants of Hercules, who built Pionia, near the Caycus in Mysia. It is said that smoke issued from his tomb as often as sacrifices were offered to him. Paus. 9, c. 18.

Piônia, a town of Mysia, near the Caycus.

Piræus, or Pyrsæus, a celebrated harbour at Athens, at the mouth of the Cephissus, about three miles distant from the city. It was joined to the town by two walls, in circumference seven miles and a half, and 60 feet high, which Themistocles wished to raise in a double proportion. One of these was built by Pericles, and the other by Themistocles. The towers which were raised on the walls to serve as a defence, were turned into dwelling-houses, as the population of Athens gradually increased. It was the most capacious of all the harbours of the Athenians, and was naturally divided into three large basins called Cantharos, Aphrodisium, and Zea, improved by the labours of Themistocles, and made sufficiently commodious for the reception of a fleet of 400 ships, in the greatest security. The walls which joined it to Athens, with all the fortifications, were totally demolished when Lysander put an end to the Peloponnesian war by the reduction of Attica. Paus. 1, c. 1. — Strab. 9. — C. Nep. in Them. — Fior. 3, c. 5. — Justin. 5, c. 8. — Ovid. Met. 6, v. 446.

Piranthus, a son of Argus and Evadne, brother to Jasus, Epidaurus, and Pegasus. Paus. 2, c. 16 & 17. — Apollod. 2.

Piræno, a daughter of Danaus.—A daughter of Cebalus, or, according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two sons, called Leches and Cenchrus, who gave their names to two of the harbours of Corinth. Piræne was so disconsolate at the death of her son Cenchrus, who had been killed by Diana, that she pined away, and was dissolved, by her continual weeping, into a fountain of the same name, which was still seen at Corinth in the age of Pausanias. The fountain Piræne was sacred to the Muses, and, according to some, the horse Pegasus was then drinking some of its waters, when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Paus. 2, c. 3. — Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

Pirithous, a son of Ixion and the cloud, or, according to others, of Dia the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him son of Dia by Jupiter, who assumed the shape of a horse whenever he paid his addresses to his mistress. He was king of the Lapithæ, and, as an ambitious prince, he wished to become acquainted with Theseus, king of Athens, of whose fame and exploits he had heard so many reports. To see him, and at the same time to be a witness of his valour, he resolved to invade his territories with an army. Theseus immediately met him on the borders of Attica, but at the sight of one another the two enemies did not begin the engagement, but, struck with the appearance of each other, they stepped between the hostile armies. Their meeting was like that of the most cordial friends, and Pirithous, by giving Theseus his hand as a pledge of his sincerity, promised to repair all the damages which his hostilities in Attica might have occasioned. From that time, therefore, the two monarchs became the most intimate and the most attached of friends, so much, that their friendship, like that of Orestes and Pylades, is become proverbial. Pirithous some time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only the heroes of his age, but also the gods themselves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only one of the gods who was not invited, and to punish this neglect, the god of war was determined to raise a quarrel among the guests, and to disturb the festivity of the entertainment. Eurythion, captivated with the beauty of Hippodamia, and intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride, but he was prevented by Theseus, and immediately killed. This irritated the rest of the Centaurs: the contest became general, but the valour of Theseus, Pirithous, Hercules, and the rest of the Lapithæ, triumphed over their enemies. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and the rest saved their lives by flight. Vid. Lapithus. The death of Hippodamia left Pirithous very disconsolate, and he resolved with his friend Theseus, who had likewise lost his wife, never to marry again, except to a goddess, or one of the daughters of the gods. This determination occasioned the rape of Helen by the two friends; the lot was drawn, and it fell to the share of Theseus to have the beautiful prize. Pirithous upon this undertook with his friend to carry away Proserpine and to marry her. They descended into the infernal regions, but Pluto, who was apprised of their machinations to disturb his conjugal peace, stopped the two friends and confined them there. Pirithous was tied to his father's wheel, or, according to Hyginus, he was delivered to the furies to be continually tormented. His punishment, however, was short, and when Hercules visited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained from Proserpine the pardon of Pirithous, and brought him back to his kingdom safe and unhurt. Some suppose that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus. *Vid. Theseus. Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 4 & 5. — Hesiod. in Scut. Her. — Homer. Pirus, a captain of the Thracians during the Trojan war, killed by Thoas king of Ætolia. Homer. Il. 4.

Pirustæ, a people of Illyricum. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Pisa, a town of Elis, on the Alpheus at the west of the Peloponnesus, founded by Pisis the son of Perieres, and grandson of Æolus. Its inhabitants accompanied Nestor to the Trojan war, and they enjoyed long the privilege of presiding at the Olympic games, which were celebrated near their city. This honourable appointment was envied by the people of Elis, who made war against the Pisians, and after many bloody battles took their city and totally demolished it. It was at Pisa that (Enomachus murdered the suitors of his daughter, and that he himself was conquered by Pelops. The inhabitants were called Pisæi. Some have doubted the existence of such a place as Pisa; but this doubt originates from Pisa's having been destroyed in so remote an age. The horses of Pisa were famous. The year on which the Olympic games were celebrated, was often called Pisæus annus, and the victory which was obtained there was called Pisæa ramus olivæ. Vid. Olympia. Strab. 8.—*Ovid. Pisæe, a town of Etruria, built by a colony from Pisa in the Peloponnesus. The inhabitants were called Pisani. Dionysius of Halicarnassus affirms that it existed before the Trojan war, but others support that it was built by a colony of Pisæans, who were shipwrecked on the coast of Etruria at their return from the Trojan war. Pisæe was once a very powerful and flourishing city, which conquered the Baleares, together with Sardinia and Corsica. The sea on the neighbouring coast was called the bay of Pisæe. *Virg. Pisander, a son of Helleophon, killed by the Solymi.—A Trojan chief, killed by Menelaus. Homer. Il. 13, v. 601.—One of Penelope's suitors, son of Polyctor. Ovid. Heroid. 1.—A son of Antimachus, killed by Agamemnon during the Trojan war. He had had recourse to entreaties and promises, but in vain, as the Grecian wished to resent the advice of Antimachus, who opposed the restoration of Helen. Homer. Il. 11, v. 123.—An admiral of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He abolished the democracy at Athens, and established the aristocratical government of the 400 tyrants. He was killed in a naval battle by Conon the Athenian general near Caudis, in which the Spartans lost 50 galleys, B.C. 394. Diad.—A poet of Rhodes, who composed a poem called Heraclea, in which he gave an account of all the labours and all the exploits of Hercules. He was the first who ever represented his hero armed with a club. Paus. 8, c. 22.

Pisætes, or Pisæi, the inhabitants of Pisa in the Peloponnesus.

Pisaurum, now Poggia, a river of Picenum, with a town called Pisaurum, now Pesaro, which became a Roman colony in the consulship of Claudius Fulcher. The town was destroyed by an earthquake in the beginning of the reign of Augustus. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Catull. 82.—Plin. 3.—Liv. 39, c. 44. l. 41, c. 77.

Pisænor, a son of Ixion and the cloud.—One of the ancestor of the nurse of Ulysses. Homer. Od. 1.

Pisæus, a king of Etruria, about 200 years before the foundation of Rome. Plin. 7, c. 26.

Pisæus, a general of the Argives in the age of Epaminondas.—A statuary at Athens, celebrated for his pieces. Paus.

Pisidia, an inland country of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, Pamphylia, Galatia, and Isauria. It was rich and fertile. The inhabitants were called Pisidae. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—Strab. 12.—Liv. 37, c. 54 & 56.

Pisidione, a daughter of Æolus, who married Myrmidon.—A daughter of Nestor.—A daughter of Pelias.—The daughter of a king of Methymna in Lesbos. She became enamoured of Achilles when he invaded her father's kingdom, and she promised to deliver the city into his hands if he would marry her. Achilles agreed to the proposal, but when he became master of Methymna, he ordered Pisidione to be stoned to death for her perfidy. Parthen. Erot. 21.

Pisæe, a native of Thespia, who gained uncommon influence among the Thebans, and behaved with great courage in the defence of their liberties. He was taken prisoner by Demetrius, who made him governor of Thespia.

Pisistratidæ, the descendants of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens. Vid. Pisistratus.

Pisistratides, a man sent as ambassador to the satraps of the king of Persia, by the Spartans.

Pisistratus, an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, who early distinguished himself by his valour in the field, and by his address and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himself the favourite of the populace by his liberality, and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he resolved to make himself master of his country. Everything seemed favourable to his views; but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs, and who had lately instituted his celebrated laws, opposed him, and discovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public assembly. Pisistratus was not disheartened by the measures of his relation Solon, but he had recourse to artifice. In returning from his country house, he cut himself in various places, and after he had exposed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accused his enemies of attempts upon his life, because he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppressed; he claimed a chosen body of 50 men from the populace to defend his person in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unsuspecting people unanimously granted his request, though Solon opposed it with all his influence; and Pisistratus had no sooner received an armed band, on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he seized the citadel of Athens, and made himself absolute. The people too late perceived their credulity; yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conspired together against him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His house and all his effects were exposed to sale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private dissensions of the friends of liberty proved favourable to the expelled tyrant, and Megacles, who was jealous of Lycurgus, secretly promised to restore Pisistratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens, if he would marry his daughter. Pisistratus consented, and, by the assistance of his father-in-law, he was soon enabled to expel Lycurgus, and to re-establish himself. By means of a woman called Phya, whose shape was tall, and whose features were noble and commanding, he imposed upon the people, and created himself adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the streets of the city, and, showing herself subservient to the artifice of Pisistratus, she was announced as Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and the patroness of Athens, who was come down from heaven to re-establish her favourite Pisistratus, in a power which was sanctioned by the will of the gods, and favoured by the affection of the people. In the midst of his triumph, however, Pisistratus felt himself unsupported, and some time after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops, were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens, where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after, he was drawn from his obscure retreat, by means of his son Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their master and sovereign. Upon this he sacrificed to his resentment the friends of Megacles, but he did not lose sight of the public good; and while he sought the aggrandizement of his family, he did not neglect the dignity and the honour of the Athenian name. He died about 577 years before the Christian era, after he had enjoyed the sovereign power at Athens for 33 years, including the years of his banishment, and he was succeeded by his son Hipparchus. Pisistratus claims our admiration for his justice, his liberality, and his moderation. If he was dreaded and detested as a tyrant, the Athenians loved and respected his private virtues and his patriotism as a fellow-citizen; and the opprobrium which generally falls on his head may be attributed not to the severity of his administration, but to the republican principles of the Athenians, who hated and exclaimed against the moderation and equity of the mildest sovereign, while they flattered the pride and gratified the guilty desires of the most tyrannical of their fellow-subjects. Pisistratus often refused to punish the insolence of his enemies; and when he had one day been violently accused of murder, rather than inflict immediate punishment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the Areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accusations of his enemies were groundless, and that his life was irreproachable. It is to his labours that we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of Homer, and he was the first, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens, in the order in which they now stand. He also established a public library at Athens; and the valuable books which he had diligently collected, were carried into Persia when Xerxes made himself master of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias, the sons of Pisistratus, who have received the name of Pisistratidæ, rendered themselves as illustrious as their father; but the flames of liberty were too powerful to be extinguished. The Pisistratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of tyrant or sovereign was insupportable to the Athenians. Two of the most respectable of the citizens, called Harmodius and Aristogiton, conspired against them, and Hipparchus was dispatched in a public assembly. This murder was not, however, attended with any advantage, and though the two leaders of the conspiracy, who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotism, were supported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmness and prudence, and for a while preserved that peace in Athens which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue, Hippias was at last expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponnesus; and he left Attica, when he found himself unable to maintain his power and independence. The rest of the family of Pisistratus followed him in his banishment, and after they had refused to accept the liberal offers of the princes of Thessaly, and the king of Macedonia, who wished them to settle in their respective territories, the Pisistratidæ retired to Sigœum, which their father had, in the summit of his power, conquered and bequeathed to his posterity. After the banishment of the Pisistratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often sacrificed the most powerful of their citizens, apprehensive of the influence which popularity and a well-directed liberality might gain among the fickle and unsettled populace. The Pisistratidæ were banished from Athens about 18 years after the death of Pisistratus, B.C. 550. Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, c. 59. l. 6, c. 103.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Val. Max. 1, c. 2.—A son of Nestor. Apollon.—A king of Orchomenos, who rendered himself odious by his cruelty towards his nobles. He was put to death by them; and they carried away his body from the public assembly, by hiding each a piece of his flesh under their garments, to prevent a discovery from the people, of whom he was a great favourite. Plut. in Par.—A Theban attached to the Roman interest while the consul Flaminius was in Greece. He assassinated the pretor of Bœotia, for which he was put to death, &c.

Piso, a celebrated family at Rome, which was a branch of the Calpurnians, descended from Calpus the son of Numa. Before the death of Augustus, 11 of this family had obtained the consulship, and many had been honoured with triumphs, on account of their victories in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family the most famous were—Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people about 149 years before Christ, and afterwards consul. His frugality procured him the surname of Frugi, and he gained the greatest honours as an orator, a lawyer, a statesman, and an historian. He made a successful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his son, who had behaved with great valour during the war, with a crown of gold, which weighed 30 pounds. He composed some annals and harangues, which were lost in the age of Cicero. His style was obscure and inelegant.—Caius, a Roman consul, A.U.C. 687 who supported the consular dignity against the tumults of the tribunes, and the clamours of the people. He made a law to restrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magistrates.—Cneus, another consul under Augustus. He was one of the favourites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty. He was accused of having poisoned Germanicus; and when he saw that he was shunned and despised by his friends, he destroyed himself, A.D. 20.—Lucius, a governor of Spain, who was assassinated by a peasant, as he was travelling through the country; the murderer was seized and tortured, but he refused to confess the causes of the murder.—Lucius, a private man accused of having uttered seditious words against the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death saved him from the hands of the executioner.—Lucius, a governor of Rome for 20 years, an office which he discharged with the greatest justice and credit. He was greatly honoured by the friendship of Augustus, as well as of his successor, a distinction he deserved, both as a faithful citizen and a man of learning. Some, however, say that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, because he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem, De Arte Poetica, to his two sons, whose partiality for literature had distinguished them among the rest of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leisure hours. Plut. in Cæs.—Plin. 18, c. 3.—Cæus, a factious and turbulent youth, who conspired against his country with Cædiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæsar.—Cæus, a Roman who was at the head of a celebrated conspiracy against the emperor Nero. He had rendered himself a favourite of the people by his private as well as public virtues, by the generosity of his behaviour, his fondness of pleasure with the voluptuous, and his austerity with the grave and the reserved. He had been marked by some as a proper person to succeed the emperor; but the discovery of the plot by a freedman who was among the conspirators, soon cut him off, with all his partisans. He refused to court the affections of the people and of the army, when the whole had been made public; and instead of taking proper measures for his preservation, either by proclaiming himself emperor, as his friends advised, or by seeking a retreat in the distant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own house, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death.—Lucius, a senator who followed the emperor Valerian into Persia. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A.D. 261, by Valens, &c.—Licinianus, a senator adopted by the emperor Galba. He was put to death by Otho's orders.—A son-in-law of Cicero.—A patrician, whose daughter married Julius Cæsar. Horat.—Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Val. Max.—Liv.—Sueton.—Cic. de Offic., &c.—Plut. in Cæs., &c.—One of the 30 tyrants appointed over Athens by Ly-sander.

Piæniæ villa, a place near Baie in Campania, which the emperor Nero often frequented. Tacit. Ann. 1.

Pisirus, a town of Thrace, near the river Nestus. Herod. 7, c. 109.

Pistor, a surname given to Jupiter by the Romans, signifying baker, because when their city was taken by the Gauls, the god persuaded them to throw down leaves from the Tarpeian hill where they were besieged, that the enemy might from thence suppose that they were not in want of provisions, though in reality they were near surrendering through famine. This deceived the Gauls, and they soon after raised the siege. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 380, 394, &c.

Pistoria, now Pistoja, a town of Etruria, at the foot of the Apennines, near Florence, where Cataline was defeated. Sallust. Cat. 47.—Plin. 3, c. 4.

Pisus, a son of Aphareus, or, according to others, of Perieres. Apollod. 3.—Paus. 5.

Pisuthnes, a Persian satrap of Lydia, who revolted from Darius Nothus. His father's name was Hystaspes. Plut. in Art.

Pitæno, a town of Æolia in Asia Minor. The inhabitants made bricks which swam on the surface of the water. Lucan. 3, v. 305.—Strab. 13.—Vitruv. 2, c. 3.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 357.—A town of Laconia. Pindar. Od. 6, v. 46.

Pitaræus, an Athenian archon, during whose magistracy Epicurus died. Cic. Fat. 9.

Pithecoïssa, a small island on the coast of Etruria, anciently called Enaria and Enarina, with a town of the same name, on the top of a mountain. The frequent earthquakes to which it was subject obliged the inhabitants to leave it. There was a volcano in the middle of the island, which has given occasion to the ancients to say that the giant Typhon was buried there. Some suppose that it received its name from υἱὸν τοῦ τυφῶνος, monkeys, into which the inhabitants were changed by Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 90.—Plin. 3, c. 6.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Strab. 1.

Pitheus. Vid. Pitheus.

Pitho, called also Swada, the goddess of persuasion to the Greeks and Romans supposed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. She was represented with a diadem on her head, to intimate her influence over the hearts of men. One of her arms appears raised, as in the attitude of an orator haranguing in a public assembly, and with the other she holds a thunderbolt, and fetters made with flowers, to signify the powers of reasoning and the attractions of eloquence. A caduceus, as a symbol of persuasion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demosthenes and Cicero, the two most celebrated among the ancients, who understood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouse and animate their various passions.—A Roman courtesan. She received this name on account of the allurements which her charms possessed, and of her winning expressions.

Pitholæus and Lycophron, seized upon the sovereign power of Phæze, by killing Alexander. They were ejected by Philip of Macedonia. Diod. 16.

Pitholeon, an insignificant poet of Rhodes, who mingled Greek and Latin in his compositions. He wrote some epigrams against J. Cæsar, and drew upon himself the ridicule of Horace, on account of the inelegance of his style. Sueton. de cl. Rh.—Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 21.—Macrob. 2, sat. 2.

Pithon, one of the body-guards of Alexander, put to death by Antiochus.

Pithys, a nymph beloved by Pan. Boreas was also fond of her, but she slighted his addresses, upon which he dashed her against a rock, and she was changed into a pine tree.

Pittacus, a native of Mitylene in Lesbos, was one of the seven wise men of Greece. His father's name was Cyrradius. With the assistance of the sons of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppression of the tyrant Melanchrus, and in the war which the Athenians waged against Lesbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to single combat Phrynon, the enemy's general. As the event of the war seemed to depend upon this combat, Pittacus had recourse to artifice, and when he engaged, he entangled his adversary in a net, which he had concealed under his shield, and easily despatched him. He was amply rewarded for his victory, and his countrymen, sensible of his merit, unanimously appointed him governor of their city with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence, and after he had governed his fellow-citizens with the strictest justice, and after he had established and enforced the most salutary laws, he voluntarily resigned the sovereign power after he had enjoyed it for 10 years, observing that the virtues and innocence of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a sovereign. His disinterestedness gained him many admirers, and when the Mityleneans wished to reward his public services by presenting him with an immense tract of territory, he refused to accept more land than what should be contained within the distance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the 82nd year of his age, about 570 years before Christ, after he had spent the last 10 years of his life in literary ease, and peaceful retirement. One of his favourite maxims was, that man ought to provide against misfortunes to avoid them; but that if they ever happened he ought to support them with patience and resignation. In prosperity friends were to be acquired, and in the hour of adversity their faithfulness was to be tried. He also observed, that in our actions it was imprudent to make others acquainted with our designs, for if we failed we had exposed ourselves to censure and to ridicule. Many of his maxims were inscribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to show the world how great an opinion the Mityleneans entertained of his abilities as a philosopher, a moralist, and a man. By one of his laws, every fault committed by a man when intoxicated, deserved double punishment. The titles of some of his writings are preserved by Laertius, among which are mentioned elegiac verses, some laws in prose, addressed to his countrymen, epistles, and moral precepts called admonitions. Diog.—Aristot. Polit.—Plut. in Symp.—Paus. 10, c. 24.—Elian. V. H. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 6, 2, 5.—A grandson of Porus king of India.

Pitthea, a town near Trozene. Hence the epithet of Pittheus in Ovid. Met. 15, v. 296.

Pittheus, a king of Trozene in Argolis, son of Pelope and Hippodamia. He was universally admired for his learning, wisdom, and application; he publicly taught in a school at Trozene, and even composed a book, which was seen by Pausanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus king of Athens, and he himself took particular care of the youth and education of his grandson Theseus. He was buried at Trozene, which he had founded, and on his tomb were seen, for many ages, three seats of white marble, on which he sat, with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his subjects or settled their disputes. Paus. 1 & 2.—Plut. in These.—Strab. 8.

Pitruianus, a mathematician in the age of Tiberius, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2.

Pitulani, a people of Umbria. Their chief town was called Pitulum.

Pityæa, a town of Asia Minor. Apollon.

Pityæus, a town of Pisidia. Strab.

Pityus (notis), now Pitchinda, a town of Colchis. Plin. 6, c. 5.

Pityusa, a small island on the coast of Argolis. Plin. 4, c. 12.—A name of Chios.—Two small islands in the Mediterranean, near the coast of Spain, of which the larger was called Ebusus, and the smaller Ophiusa. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Plus, a surname given to the emperor Antoninus, on account of his piety and virtue.—A surname given to a son of Metellus, because he interested himself so warmly to have his father recalled from banishment.

Placentia, now called Placenza, an ancient town and colony of Italy, at the confluence of the Trebia and Po. Liv. 21, c. 25 & 56. l. 37, c. 10.—Another, near Lusitania, in Spain.

Placidianus, a gladiator in Horace's age, 2, sat. 7.

Placidia, a daughter of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus king of the Goths, and afterwards Constantine, by whom she had Valentinian III. She died A.D. 449.

Placidius Julius, a tribune of a cohort, who imprisoned the emperor Vitellius, &c. Tacit. H. 3, c. 85.

Planasia, a small island of the Tyrrhene sea.—Another, on the coast of Gaul, where Tiberius ordered Agrippa the grandson of Augustus to be put to death. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.—A town on the Rhone.

Plancia, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piso, and was accused with him of having murdered Germanicus, in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the empress Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her person. She had long supported the spirits of her husband, during his confinement, but when she saw herself freed from the accusation, she totally abandoned him to his fate. Subservient in everything to the will of Livia, she, at her instigation, became guilty of the greatest crimes, to injure the character of Agrippina. After the death of Agrippina, Plancia was accused of the most atrocious villainies, and, as she knew she could not elude justice, she put herself to death, A.D. 33. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 26, &c.

L. Plaucus Munatius, a Roman, who rendered himself ridiculous by his follies and his extravagance. He had been consul, and had presided over a province in the capacity of governor; but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the most servile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meanest stage dancer, and in a comedy he personated Glaucis, and painted his body of a green colour, dancing on a public stage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had tied behind his back the tail of a large sea fish. This exposed him to the public derision, and when Antony had joined the rest of his friends in censuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deserted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendship and attention. It was he who proposed, in the Roman senate, that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated 1, od. 7, to him; and he certainly deserved the honour, from the elegance of his letters, which are still extant, written to Cicero. He founded a town in Gaul, which he called Lugdunum. Plut. in Anton.—A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it, rather than to expose their persons to danger.

Phanagon, a courtesan of Miletus, in Ionia.

Plataea, a daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 1, &c.—An island on the coast of Africa in the Mediterranean. It belonged to the Cyreneans. Herodot. 4, c. 157.

Plataea, and æ (arum), a town of Bœotia, near mount Cithæron, on the confines of Megaris and Attica, celebrated for a battle fought there between Mardonius the commander of Xerxes king of Persia, and Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, and the Athenians. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men, 3000 of which scarce escaped with their lives by flight. The Grecian army, which was greatly inferior, lost but few men, and among these 91 Spartans, 52 Athenians, and 16 Tegeans, were the only soldiers found in the number of the slain. The plunder which the Greeks obtained in the Persian camp was immense. Pausanias received the tenth of all the spoils, on account of his uncommon valour during the engagement, and the rest were rewarded each according to their respective merit. This battle was fought on the 22d September, the same day as the battle of Mycale, 479 B.C., and by it Greece was totally delivered for ever from the continual alarms to which she was exposed on account of the Persian invasions, and from that time none of the princes of Persia dared to appear with a hostile force beyond the Hellespont. The Plataeans were naturally attached to the interest of the Athenians, and they furnished them with 1000 soldiers when Greece was attacked by Datis the general of Darius. Plataea was taken by the Thebans, after a famous siege, in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and destroyed by the Spartans, B.C. 427. Alexander rebuilt it, and paid great encomiums to the inhabitants, on account of their ancestors, who had so bravely fought against the Persians at the battle of Marathon, and under Pausanias. Herodot. 8, c. 50.—Faut. 9, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex. &c.—C. Nep., &c.—Cic. de Offic. 1, c. 18.—Strab.—Justin.

Platanus, a river of Boeotia. Paus. 9, c. 24.

Plato, a celebrated philosopher at Athens, son of Ariston and Perictiona. His original name was Aristocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeness of his shoulders. As one of the descendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illustrious, and opulent family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnastic exercises, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the study of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteness of judgment and warmth of imagination which have stamped his character as the most subtle and flowery writer of antiquity. He first began his literary career by writing poems and tragedies; but he was soon disgusted with his own productions, when, at the age of 20, he was introduced into the presence of Socrates, and when he was enabled to compare and examine, with critical accuracy, the merit of his compositions with those of his poetical predecessors. He therefore committed to the flames these productions of his early years, which could not command the attention or gain the applause of a maturer age. During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and if he was prevented by a momentary indisposition from attending the philosopher's last moments, yet he collected from the conversation of those that were present, and from his own accurate observations, the minutest and most circumstantial accounts, which can exhibit, in its true colours, the concern and sensibility of the pupil, and the firmness, virtues, and moral sentiments of the dying philosopher. After the death of Socrates, Plato retired from Athens, and to acquire that information which the accurate observer can derive in foreign countries, he began to travel over Greece. He visited Megara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindest reception from his fellow-disciples, whom the violent death of their master had likewise removed from Attica. He afterwards visited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philosophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation of its professors, Philolaus, Archytas, and Eurytus. He afterwards passed into Sicily, and examined the eruptions and fires of the volcano of that island. He also visited Egypt, where then the mathematician Theodorus flourished, and where he knew that the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy and metempsychosis had been fostered and cherished. When he had finished his travels, Plato retired to the groves of Academus, in the neighbourhood of Athens, where his lectures were soon attended by a crowd of learned, noble, and illustrious pupils; and the philosopher, by refusing to have a share in the administration of affairs, rendered his name more famous, and his school more frequented. During forty years he presided at the head of the academy, and there he devoted his time to the instruction of his pupils, and composed those dialogues which have been the admiration of every age and country. His studies, however, were interrupted for a while, whilst he obeyed the pressing calls and invitations of Dionysius, and whilst he persuaded the tyrant to become a man, the father of his people, and the friend of liberty. Virg. Dionysius II. In his dress the philosopher was not ostentatious; his manners were elegant but modest, simple without affectation; and the great honours which his learning deserved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato resided, during the celebration, in a family who were totally strangers to him. He ate and drank with them, he partook of their innocent pleasures and amusements; but though he told them his name was Plato, yet he never spoke of the employment which he pursued at Athens, and never introduced the name of that philosopher whose doctrines he followed, and whose death and virtues were favourite topics of conversation in every part of Greece. When he returned home, he was attended by the family which had so kindly entertained him; and, as being a native of Athens, he was desired to show them the great philosopher whose name he bore: their surprise was great when he told them that he himself was the Plato whom they wished to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and, indeed, to sobriety and temperance in the use of food, and to the want of those pleasures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, some have attributed his preservation during the tremendous pestilence which raged at Athens with so much fury at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Plato was never subject to any long or lingering indisposition, and though change of climate had enfeebled a constitution naturally strong and healthy, the philosopher lived to an advanced age, and was often heard to say, when his physicians advised him to leave his residence at Athens, where the air was impregnated by the pestilence, that he would not advance one single step to gain the top of mount Athos, were he assured to attain the great longevity which the inhabitants of that mountain were said to enjoy above the rest of mankind. Plato died on his birthday, in the first year of his age, about 348 years before the christian era. His last moments were easy and without pain, and, according to some, he expired in the midst of an entertainment, or, according to Cicero, as he was writing. The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of a dialogue, except 12 letters. He speaks always by the mouth of others, and the philosopher has nowhere made mention of himself except once in his dialogue intitled Phædon, and another time in his apology for Socrates. His writings were so celebrated, and, his opinion so respected, that he was called divine; and for the elegance, melody, and sweetness of his expressions, he was distinguished by the appellation of the Athenian bee. Cicero had such an esteem for him, that in the warmth of panegyric, he exclaimed, Errare mehercule malo cum Platone quam cum istis vera sentire; and Quintilian said that, when he read Plato, he seemed to hear not a man, but a divinity speaking. His style, however, though admired and commended by the best and most refined of critics among the ancients, has not escaped the censure of some of the moderns; and the philosopher has been blamed, who supports that fire is a pyramid tied to the earth by numbers, that the world is a figure consisting of 12 pentagons, and who, to prove the metempsychosis and the immortality of the soul, asserts that the dead are born from the living, and the living from the dead. The speculative mind of Plato was employed in examining things divine and human, and he attempted to fix and ascertain, not only the practical doctrine of morals and politics, but the more subtle and abstruse theory of mystical theogony. His philosophy was universally received and adopted, and it has not only governed the opinions of the speculative part of mankind, but it continues still to influence the reasoning, and to divide the sentiments, of the moderns. In his system of philosophy he followed the physics of Heraclitus, the metaphysical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. He maintained the existence of two beings, one self-existent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-existent creature, god and man. The world was created by that self-existent cause, from the rude undigested mass of matter which had existed from all eternity, and which had even been animated by an irregular principle of motion. The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a stubborn intractability and wildness congenial to matter, and from these, consequently, could be demonstrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant passions and appetites of men. From materials like these were formed the four elements, and the beautiful structure of the heavens and the earth; and into the active but irrational principle of matter, the divinity infused a rational soul. The souls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational soul of the world, which had previously given existence to the invisible gods and demons. The philosopher, therefore, supported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-existence of the human mind, which he considered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain satisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive, with their corporeal senses, the types of immutable things and the fluctuating objects of the material world; but the sudden changes to which these are continually obnoxious, create innumerable disorders, and hence arise deception, and, in short, all the errors and miseries of human life. Yet, in whatever situation man may be, he is still an object of divine concern; and, to recommend himself to the favour of the pre-existent cause, he must comply with the purposes of his creation, and, by proper care and diligence, he can recover those immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All science the philosopher made to consist in reminiscence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions of those perfect and immutable essences with which the human mind had been conversant. From observations like these, the summit of felicity might be attained by removing from the material, and approaching nearer to the intellectual world, by curbing and governing the passions which were ever agitated and inflamed by real and imaginary objects. The passions were divided into two classes: the first consisted of the irascible passions, which originated in pride or resentment, and were seated in the breast; the other, founded on the love of pleasure, was the concupiscent part of the soul seated in the belly, and inferior parts of the body. These different orders induced the philosopher to compare the soul to a small republic, of which the reasoning and judging powers were stationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the senses were its guards and servants. By the irascible part of the soul men asserted their dignity, repelled injuries, and scorned danger; and the concupiscent part provided for the support and the necessities of the body, and when governed with propriety, it gave rise to temperance. Justice was produced by the regular dominion of reason, and by the submission of the passions; and prudence arose from the strength, acuteness, and perfection of the soul, without which all other virtues could not exist. But, amidst all this, wisdom was not easily attained; at their creation all minds were not endowed with the same excellence, the bodies which they animated on earth were not always in harmony with the divine emanation; some might be too weak, others too strong, and on the first years of a man's life depended his future consequence; as an effeminate and licentious education seemed calculated to destroy the purposes of the divinity, while the contrary produced different effects, and tended to cultivate and improve the reasoning and judging faculty, and to produce wisdom and virtue. Plato was the first who supported the immortality of the soul upon arguments solid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. He did not imagine that the diseases, and the death of the body, could injure the principle of life and destroy the soul, which, of itself, was of divine origin, and of an uncorrupted and immutable essence, which, though inherent for a while in matter, could not lose that power which was the emanation of God. From doctrines like these, the great founder of Platonism concluded that there might exist in the world a community of men, whose passions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miseries which arise from ill conduct, might aspire to excellence, and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exercise of the rational and moral powers. To illustrate this more fully, the philosopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains with acuteness, judgment, and elegance the rise and revolution of civil society; and so respected was his opinion as a legislator, that his scholars were employed in regulating the republics of Arcadia, Elis, and Cnidus, at the desire of those states, and Xenocrates gave political rules for good and impartial government to the conqueror of the east. The best editions of Plato are those of Francof. fol. 1602; and Bipont. 12 vols. 8vo, 1718. Plato Dial., &c.—*Cic. de Offic. 1. De Div. 1, c. 36. De N. D. 2, c. 19. Plavia, a river of Venetia, in Italy.

Plautius Ilex, was enacted by M. Plautius the tribune, A.U.C. 664. It required every tribe annually to choose 15 persons of their body, to serve as judges, making the honour common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe.—Another, called also Plautia, A.U.C. 675. It punished with the interdictio ignis et aquae, all persons who were found guilty of attempts upon the state, or the senators or magistrates, or such as appeared in public, armed with an evil design, or such as forcibly expelled any person from his legal possessions.

Plautianus Fulvius, an African of mean birth, who was banished for his seditious behaviour in the years of his obscurity. In his banishment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus, who, some years after, ascended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his prosperity; Severus paid the greatest attention to him, and, if we believe some authors, their familiarity and intercourse were carried beyond the bounds of modesty and propriety. Plautianus shared the favours of Severus on the throne as well as in obscurity. He was invested with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces; and, indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. His table was served with more delicate meats than that of the emperor; when he walked in the public streets he received the most distinguishing honours, and a number of criers ordered the most noble citizens, as well as the meanest beggars, to make way for the favourite of the emperor, and not to fix their eyes upon him. He was concerned in all the rapine and destruction which were committed through the empire, and he enriched himself with the possessions of those who had been sacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himself still greater, Plautianus married his favourite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla the son of the emperor, and so eager was the emperor to indulge his inclinations in this and in every other respect, that he declared he loved Plautianus so much that he would even wish to die before him. The marriage of Caracalla with Plautilla was attended with serious consequences. The son of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable in her manners, commanding in aspect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to punish her haughty and imperious behaviour as soon as he succeeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and to save his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conspired against the emperor and his son. The conspiracy was discovered, and Severus forgot his attachment to Plautianus, and the favours he had heaped upon him, when he heard of his perfidy. The wicked minister was immediately put to death, and Plautilla banished to the island of Lipari, with her brother Plautius, where, seven years after, she was put to death by order of Caracalla, A. D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a son who died in his childhood, and a daughter, whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dion. Cass.

Plautilla, a daughter of Plautianus the favourite minister of Severus. Vid. Plautianus.—The mother of the emperor Nerva, descended of a noble family.

Max.* 4, c. 6.—Caius, a consul sent against the Privernates, &c.—Aulus, a governor of Britain who obtained an ovation for the conquests he had gained there over the barbarians.—One of Otho's friends. He dissuaded him from killing himself.—Lateranus, an adulterer of Messalina, who conspired against Nero, and was capitally condemned.—Aulus, a general who defeated the Umbrians and the Etruscans.—Caius, another general, defeated in Lusitania.—A man put to death by order of Caracalla.—M. Sylvanus, a tribune, who made a law to prevent seditions in the public assemblies.—Rubellius, a man accused before Nero, and sent to Asia, where he was assassinated.

M. Accius Plautus, a comic poet, born at Sarsina, in Umbria. Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meanest poverty, by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himself, he entered into the family of a baker as a common servant, and while he was employed in grinding corn, he sometimes dedicated a few moments to the comic muse. Some, however, confute this account as false, and support that Plautus was never obliged to the laborious employments of a bakehouse for his maintenance. He wrote 25 comedies, of which only 20 are extant. He died about 184 years before the christian era; and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this stanza, which deserved to be engraved on his tomb:

*Postquam morte captus est Plautus,
Comœdia luget, scena est deserta;
Deinde risus, ludus, jocusque, & numeri
Innumeri simul omnes collacrymabant.*

The plays of Plautus were universally esteemed at Rome, and the purity, the energy, and the elegance of his language were, by other writers, considered as objects of imitation; and Varro, whose judgment is great, and generally decisive, declares, that if the Muses were willing to speak Latin, they would speak in the language of Plautus. In the Augustan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expressions of a Terence, was censured for his negligence in versification, his low wit, execrable puns, and disgusting obscenities. Yet, however censured as to language or sentiments, Plautus continued to be a favourite on the stage. If his expressions were not choice or delicate, it was universally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures; the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more interesting, the characters more truly displayed, and the catastrophe more natural. In the reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were still acted on the public theatres; and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater censure can be passed upon his successors in dramatic composition, than to observe, that for 500 years, with all the disadvantages of obsolete language and diction, in spite of the change of manners, and the revolutions of government, he commanded and received that applause which no other writer dared to dispute with him. The best editions of Plautus are that of Gronovius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1664; that of Barbou, 12mo, in 3 vols. Paris, 1759; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1760; and that of Glasgow, 3 vols. 12mo, 1763. *Varro, apud. Pléiades, or Vergilides, a name given to seven of the daughters of Atlas by Pleione or Æthra, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a constellation called Pleiades, near the back of the bull in the Zodiac. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married Sisyphus king of Corinth, had some of the immortal gods for their suitors. On that account, therefore,

Merope's star is dim and obscure among the rest of her sisters, because she married a mortal. The name of the Pleiades is derived from the Greek word πλειάδων, to sail, because that constellation shows the time most favourable to navigators, which is in the spring. The name of Vergiliz they derive from ver, the spring. They are sometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Hesperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas. Hygin. G. 1. v. 138. l. 4. 233.—Seven poets, who, from their number, have received the name of Pleiades, near the age of Philadelphus Ptolemy king of Egypt. Their names were Lycophron, Theocritus, Aratus, Nicander, Apollonius, Philicus, and Homerus the younger.

Pleione, one of the Oceanides, who married Atlas king of Mauritania, by whom she had 12 daughters, and a son called Hyas. Seven of the daughters were changed into a constellation called Pleiades, and the rest into another called Hyades. Ovid. Fast. 5. v. 84.

Plemyrium, now Massa Oliveri, a promontory with a small castle of that name, in the bay of Syracuse. Virg. Æn. 3. v. 693.

Plemneus, a king of Sicily, son of Peratus. His children always died as soon as born, till Ceres, pitying his misfortune, offered herself as a nurse to his wife as she was going to be brought to bed. The child lived by the care and protection of the goddess, and Plemneus was no sooner acquainted with the dignity of his nurse, than he raised her a temple. Paus. 2. c. 5 & 11.

Pleumosi, a people of Belgium, the inhabitants of modern Tournay. Cæs. G. 5. c. 38.

Pleuratus, a king of Illyricum. Liv. 26. c. 24.

Plexippus, a son of Thestius, brother to Althæa the wife of Ceneus. He was killed by his nephew Meleager, in hunting the Calydonian boar. His brother Toxæus shared his fate. Vid. Althæa and Meleager.—A son of Phineus and Cleopatra, brother to Pandion king of Athens. Apollod.

C. Plinius Secundus, surnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He distinguished himself in the field, and, after he had been made one of the ægurs at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleasures of literature; the day was employed in the administration of the affairs of his province, and the night was dedicated to study. Every moment of time was precious to him; at his meals one of his servants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts, in a memorandum book. Even while he dressed himself after bathing, his attention was called away from surrounding objects, and he was either employed in listening to another, or in dictating himself. To a mind so earnestly dedicated to learning, nothing appeared too laborious, no undertaking too troublesome. He deemed every moment lost which was not devoted to study, and from these reasons he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and wherever he went, he was always accompanied by his amanuensis. He even censured his nephew, Pliny the younger, because he had indulged himself with a walk, and sternly observed, that he might have employed those moments to better advantage. But if his literary pursuits made him forget the public affairs, his prudence, his abilities, and the purity and innocence of his character, made him known and respected. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Vespasian, and he received from them all the favours which a virtuous prince could offer, and an honest subject receive. As he was at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet, which was then stationed there, Pliny was surprised at the sudden appearance of a cloud of dust and ashes. He was then ignorant of the cause which produced it, and he immediately set sail in a small vessel for mount Vesuvius, which he at last discovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The sight of a number of boats that fled from the coast to avoid the danger, might have deterred another, but the curiosity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldness, and though his vessel was often covered with stones and ashes, that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coast. The place was deserted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night, the better to observe the mountain, which, during the obscurity, appeared to be one continual blaze. He was soon disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow prevented him from returning to Misenum. The eruption of the volcano increased, and at last the fire approached the place where the philosopher made his observations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but though he was supported by two of his servants, he was unable to escape. He soon fell down, suffocated by the thick vapours that surrounded him, and the insupportable stench of sulphureous matter. His body was found three days after, and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Misenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the christian era, and the philosopher who perished by the eruptions of the volcano, has been called by some the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he composed, none are extant but his natural history in 37 books. It is a work, as Pliny the younger says, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itself. It treats of the stars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, minerals, trees, flowers, and plants, besides an account of all living animals, birds, fishes, and beasts; a geographical description of every place on the globe, and a history of every art and science, of commerce and navigation, with their rise, progress, and several improvements. He is happy in his descriptions as a naturalist; he writes with force and energy, and though many of his ideas and conjectures are sometimes ill-founded, yet he possesses that fecundity of imagination, and vivacity of expression, which are requisite to treat a subject with propriety, and to render a history of nature pleasing, interesting, and, above all, instructive. His style possesses not the graces of the Augustan age; he has neither its purity and elegance, nor its simplicity, but it is rather cramped, obscure, and sometimes unintelligible. Yet for all this it has ever been admired and esteemed, and it may be called a compilation of everything which had been written before his age on the various subjects which he treats, and a judicious collection from the most excellent treatises which had been composed on the various productions of nature. Pliny was not ashamed to mention the authors which he quoted; he speaks of them with admiration, and while he pays the greatest compliment to their abilities, his encomiums show, in the strongest light, the goodness, the sensibility, and the ingenuousness of his own mind. He had written 160 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read, and so great was the opinion in his contemporaries of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Lutinus offered to buy his notes and observations for the enormous sum of about 324*l.* English money. The philosopher, who was himself rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The best editions of Pliny are that of Harduin, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1723; that of Frantzius, 10 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1728; that of Brotier, 6 vols. 12mo, Paris, 1779; and the Variorum 8vo, in 8 vols. Lips. 1778 to 1789. Tacit. Ann. i. c. 69. l. 13, c. 20. l. 15, c. 53.—Plin. ep. &c.—C. Cæcilius Secundus, surnamed the Younger, was son of L. Cæcilius by the sister of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his uncle, whose name he assumed, and whose estates and effects he inherited. He received the greatest part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he distinguished himself so much by his eloquence, that he and Tacitus were reckoned the two greatest orators of their age. He did not make his profession an object of gain like the rest of the Roman orators, but he refused fees from the rich as well as from the poorest of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himself for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He published many of his harangues and orations, which have been lost. When Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Pliny was created consul by the emperor. This honour the consul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric, which, at the request of the Roman senate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. Some time after he presided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office and with the power of proconsul, and by his humanity and philanthropy the subject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the persecution which had been begun against the christians of his province was stopped, when Pliny solemnly declared to the emperor that the followers of Christ were a meek and inoffensive sect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themselves by the most solemn oaths to abstain from vice, and to relinquish every sinful pursuit. If he rendered himself popular in his province, he was not less respected at Rome. He was there the friend of the poor, the patron of learning, great without arrogance, affable in his behaviour, and an example of good breeding, sobriety, temperance, and modesty. As a father and a husband his character was amiable; as a subject he was faithful to his prince; and as a magistrate his country shared, among the rest, his unbounded benevolence; and Comum, a small town of Insurbria, which gave him birth, boasted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books which he collected there. He also contributed towards the expenses which attended the education of his countrymen, and liberally spent part of his estate for the advancement of literature, and for the instruction of those whom poverty otherwise deprived of the advantages of a public education. He made his preceptor Quintilian and the poet Martial objects of his benevolence, and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility; and while he observed that he was rich in the possession of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowry for his beloved daughter, 50,000 sesterces, about 300*l.* "I would not," continued he, "be so moderate, were I not assured, from your modesty and disinterestedness, that the smallness of the present will render it acceptable." He died in the 52nd year of his age, A. D. 113. He had written a history of his own times, which is lost. It is said that Tacitus did not begin his history till he had found it impossible to persuade Pliny to undertake that laborious task; and, indeed, what could not have been expected from the panegyrist of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himself inferior to him in delineating the character of the times? Some suppose, but falsely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illustrious men, universally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos. He also wrote poetry, but his verses have all perished, and nothing of his learned work remains, but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and 10 books of letters, which he himself collected and prepared for the public, from a numerous and respectable correspondence. These letters contain many curious and interesting facts; they abound with many anecdotes of the generosity and the humane sentiments of the writer. They are written with elegance and great purity, and the reader everywhere discovers that affability, that condescension and philanthropy, which so egregiously marked the advocate of the christians. These letters are esteemed by some equal to the voluminous epistles of Cicero. In his panegyric, Pliny's style is florid and brilliant; he has used, to the greatest advantage, the liberties of the panegyrist, and the eloquence of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is distinguished by that affectation and pomposity which marked the reign of Trajan. The best editions of Pliny are those of Gesner, 8vo, Lips. 1770, and of Lallemant, 12mo, Paris apud Barbou; and of the panegyric separate, that of Schwartz, 4to, 1746, and of the epistles, the Variorum, L. Bat. 1669, 8vo. Plin. Ep.—Vossius.—Sidonius.

Plinthine, a town of Egypt on the Mediterranean.

Plistarchus, son of Leonidas, of the family of the Eurysthemidæ, succeeded on the Spartan throne at the death of Cleombrotus. Herodot. 9, c. 10.—A brother of Cassander.

Plisthanus, a philosopher of Elis, who succeeded in the school of Phædon. Diag.

Plisthènes, a son of Atreus king of Argos, father of Menelaus and Agamemnon, according to Hesiod and others. Homer, however, calls Menelaus and Agamemnon sons of Atreus, though they were in reality the children of Plisthènes. The father died very young, and the two children were left in the house of their grandfather, who took care of them and instructed them. From his attention to them, therefore, it seems probable that Atreus was universally acknowledged their protector and father, and thence their surname of Atreidæ. *Ovid. Rem. Am. v. 778.—Dictys. Plistinus, a brother of Faustulus, the shepherd, who saved the life of Romulus and Remus. He was killed in a scuffle which happened between the two brothers.

Plistonax and Plistonax, son of Pausanias, was general of the Lacedæmonian armies in the Peloponnesian war. He was banished from his kingdom of Sparta for 19 years, and was afterwards recalled by order of the oracle of Delphi. He reigned 58 years. He had succeeded Plistarchus.

Trav. 94.

Plistus, a river of Phocis falling into the bay of Corinth. Strab. 9.

Plotæ, small islands on the coast of Ætolia, called also Strophades.

Plotina Pompeia, a Roman lady who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the procession with her husband when he was saluted emperor, and distinguished herself by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendless. She accompanied Trajan in the east, and at his death she brought back his ashes to Rome, and still enjoyed all the honours and titles of a Roman empress under Adrian, who by her means had succeeded to the vacant throne. At her death, A.D. 122, she was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours, which, according to the superstition of the times, she seemed to deserve, from her regard for the good and prosperity of the Roman empire, and for her private virtues. Dion.

Plotinopolis, a town of Thrace, built by the emperor Trajan, and called after Plotina, the founder's wife.—Another in Dacia.

Plotinus, a Platonic philosopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, and after he had profited by all the instructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge, and to visit the territories of India and Persia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the east, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor, nearly terminated the life of the philosopher. He saved himself by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philosophy. His school was frequented by people of every sex, age, and quality; by senators as well as plebeians, and so great was the opinion of the public of his honesty and candour, that many, on their death-bed, left all their possessions to his care, and entrusted their children to him, as a superior being. He was the favourite of all the Romans; and while he charmed the populace by the force of his eloquence, and the senate by his doctrines, the emperor Gallienus courted him, and admired the extent of his learning. It is even said that the emperor and the empress Salonina intended to rebuild a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philosopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he presided over a colony of philosophers, the validity and the use of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed, through the envy and malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philosopher, at last become helpless and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for a while maintained him. He died A.D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his last and most violent efforts to give up what there was most divine in him and in the rest of the universe. Amidst the great qualities of the philosopher, we discover some ridiculous singularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he observed, that to see a painting of himself in the following age, was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. These reasons also induced him to conceal the day, the hour, and the place of his birth. He never made use of medicines, and though his body was often debilitated by abstinence or too much study, he despised to have recourse to a physician, and thought that it would degrade the gravity of a philosopher. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They consist of 54 different treatises divided into six equal parts, written with great spirit and vivacity; but the reasonings are abstruse, and the subjects metaphysical. The best edition is that of Picinus, folio, Basil, 1580.

Plotius Crispinus, a stoic philosopher and poet, whose verses were very inelegant, and whose disposition was morose, for which he has been ridiculed by Horace, and called Aretalogus. Horat. 1, sat. 1, v. 4.—Callus, a native of Lugdunum, who taught grammar at Rome, and had Cicero among his pupils. Cic. de Orat.—Griffus, a man made senator by Vespasian. Tacit. Hist. 3.—A centurion in Caesar's army. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 19.—Tucca, a friend of Horace and of Virgil, who made him his heir. He was selected by Augustus, with Varius, to review the Æneid of Virgil. Horat. 1, sat. 5, v. 40.—Lucius, a poet in the age of the great Marius, whose exploits he celebrated in his verses.

Plusion, a surname of Jupiter at Sparta, expressive of his power to grant riches. Paris. 3, c. 19.

Plutarchus, a native of Chæronea, descended of a respectable family. His father, whose name is unknown, was distinguished for his learning and virtue, and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was also as conspicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. Under Ammonius, a reputable teacher at Delphi, Plutarch was made acquainted with philosophy and mathematics, and so well established was his character, that he was appointed by his countrymen, while yet very young, to go to the Roman proconsul, in their name, upon an affair of the most important nature. This commission he executed with honour to himself, and with success for his country. He afterwards travelled in quest of knowledge, and after he had visited, like a philosopher and an historian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he retired to Rome, where he opened a school. His reputation made his school frequented. The emperor Trajan admired his abilities, and honoured him with the office of consul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greatest tranquillity, respected by his fellow-citizens, and raised to all the honours which his native town could bestow. In this peaceful and solitary retreat, Plutarch closely applied himself to study, and wrote the greatest part of his works, and particularly his Lives. He died in an advanced age at Chæronea, about the 140th year of the christian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife, called Timoxena, four sons and one daughter. Two of the sons and the daughter died when young, and those that survived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honour to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character, the historian of Chæronea was the friend of discipline. He boldly asserted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and submissive deference to magistrates, as necessary to preserve the peace of society. He supported that the most violent and dangerous public factions arose too often from private disputes and from misunderstanding. To render himself more intelligent, he always carried a commonplace book with him, and he preserved with the greatest care whatever judicious observations fell in the course of conversation. The most esteemed of his works are his lives of illustrious men, of whom he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful skill and impartiality. He neither misrepresents the virtues, nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with precision and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many descriptions he is inferior to no historian. In some of his narrations, however, he is often too circumstantial, his remarks are often injudicious; and when he compares the heroes of Greece with those of Rome, the candid reader can easily remember which side of the Adriatic gave the historian birth. Some have accused him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have censured him for his superstition; yet for all this, he is the most entertaining, the most instructive, and interesting of all the writers of ancient history; and were a man of true taste and judgment asked what book he wished to save from destruction, of all the profane compositions of antiquity, he would perhaps without hesitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatises, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his misguided philosophy and erroneous doctrines render some of these inferior compositions puerile and disgusting. They, however, contain many useful lessons and curious facts, and though they are composed without connection, compiled without judgment, and often abound with improbable stories and false reasonings, yet they contain much information and many useful reflections. The best editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. folio, 1599; that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo, 1572; the Lives by Reiske, 12 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1775; and the Moralia, &c., by Wytténbach. Plut.—A native of Eretria, during the Peloponnesian war. He was defeated by the Macedonians. Plut. in Phoc.

Plutia, a town of Sicily. Cic. in Verr.

Pluto, a son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as such he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis, Hades, or Ades, Clytopolom, Agelastus, Urcus, &c. As the place of his residence was obscure and gloomy, all the goddesses refused to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his solicitations. As he once visited the island of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he saw Proserpine the daughter of Ceres gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horses. To make his retreat more unknown, he opened himself a passage through the earth, by striking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily; or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephissus in Attica. Proserpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and she became the wife of her ravisher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally represented as holding a sceptre with two teeth; he has also keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and dismal countenance, and for that reason no temples were raised to his honour, as to the rest of the superior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not sprinkled on the altars, or received in vessels, as at other sacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracusans yearly sacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had disappeared with Proserpine. Among plants, the cypress, the narcissus, and the maiden-hair were sacred to him, as also everything which was deemed inauspicious, particularly the number two. According to some of the ancients, Pluto sat on a throne of sulphur, from which issued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the Harpies hovered round him, Proserpine sat on his left hand, and near to the goddess stood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with snakes. The Parcae occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the symbols of their office, the distaff, the spindle, and the scissors. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet which rendered the bearer invisible, and gave it to Pluto. Perseus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. *Hæstod. Plutus, a son of Jasion, or Jasius, by Ceres the goddess of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologists with Pluto, though plainly distinguished from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddess of peace, and on that account, Pax was represented at Athens as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks spoke of him as of a sickly divinity. They represented him as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately; he was lame, because he came slow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity than he approached mankind. *Lucian. in Tim.—Paus. 9, c. 16 & 26.—Hygin. Pluvius, a surname of Jupiter as god of rain. He was invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up with continual heat, and was in want of refreshing showers. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 26.

Plynteria, a festival among the Greeks, in honour of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word seems to be derived from ἀγλαύρα, lavare, because, during the solemnity, they undressed the statue of the goddess and washed it. The day on which it was observed was universally looked upon as unfortunate and inauspicious, and on that account no person was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purposely surrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day, was deemed very unfortunate; but, however, the success that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwise. It was customary at this festival to bear in procession a cluster of figs, which intimated the progress of civilization among the first inhabitants of the earth, as figs served them for food after they had found a dislike for acorns. Pollux.

Probitius, a lieutenant of Pompey in Spain.

Podalirius, a son of Æsculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himself under him such a master of medicine, that, during the Trojan war, the Greeks invited him to their camp, to stop a pestilence which had baffled the skill of all their physicians. Some, however, suppose that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a physician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machaon, in 30 ships, with soldiers from Cechalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was shipwrecked on the coast of Caria, where he cured of the falling sickness and married a daughter of Damotas the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honours. *Dictys Cræ. Podarces, a son of Iphiclus of Thessaly, who went to the Trojan war.—The first name of Priam. When Troy was taken by Hercules, he was redeemed from slavery by his sister Hesione, and from thence received the name of Priam. Vid. Priamus.

Podares, a general of Mancinea, in the age of Epaminondas. Paus. 8, c. 9.

Podarge, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horses of Achilles by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the swiftness of her feet.

Podargus, a charioteer of Hector. Homer.

Pœas, son of Thaumacus, was among the Argonauts.—The father of Philoctetes. The son is often called Pœantia protes, on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 45.

Pœcile, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικιλότης) of paintings which it contained. It was there that Zeno kept his school, and the stoics also received their lessons there, whence their name (ἀ στωα, a porch). The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others were those of the siege and sacking of Troy, the battle of Theseus against the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Ænoe in Argolis, and of Anticus the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon, was to have his picture drawn more conspicuous than that of the rest of the officers that fought with him, in the representation which was made of the engagement, which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. *C. Polemocrates, a queen of Thrace, who fled to Brutus after the murder of Cæsar. She retired from her kingdom because her subjects had lately murdered her husband.

Polsimon, a youth of Athens, son of Philostratus. He was much given to debauchery and extravagance, and spent the greatest part of his life in riot and drunkenness. He once, when intoxicated, entered the school of Xenocrates, while the philosopher was giving his pupils a lecture upon the effects of intemperance, and he was so struck with the eloquence of the academian, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the dissipated life he had led, and applied himself totally to the study of philosophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time he never drank any other liquor but water; and after the death of Xenocrates he succeeded in the school where his reformation had been affected. He died about 270 years before Christ, in an extreme old age. Diog. in Vitâ.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 254.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.—A son of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition against Parthia. After the battle of Actium, he was received into favour by Augustus, though he had fought in the cause of Antony. He was killed some time after by the barbarians near the Palus Mæotis, against whom he had made war. Strab.—Dion.—His son, of the same name, was confirmed on his father's throne by Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was also added to his kingdom by Claudius.—An officer in the army of Alexander, intimate with Philotas, &c. Curt. 7, c. 1, &c.—A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures still extant. He was master to Perseus the celebrated satirist, and died in the age of Nero.

—A sophist of Laodice in Asia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was often sent to the emperor with an embassy by his countrymen, which he executed with great success. He was greatly favoured by Adrian, from whom he extracted much money, in the 56th year of his age he buried himself alive, as he laboured with the gout. He wrote declamations in Greek.

Polemonium, now Vatija, a town of Pontus, at the east of the mouth of the Theosmodon.

Polias, a surname of Minerva, as protectress of cities.

Poliœna, a town of Troas on Ida. Herodot. 6, c. 28.—Another of Crete. Thucyd. 2, c. 85.

Polisia, a festival at Thebes in honour of Apollo, who was represented there with grey hair (πολις), contrary to the practice of all other places. The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and sacrificed. From that time the sacrifice of labouring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

Poliostes (destroyer of cities), a surname given to Demetrius son of Antigonus. Plut. in Demet.

Polisma, a town of Troas, on the Simois. Strab. 13.

Polistrátus, an Epicurean philosopher born the same day as Hippoclidés, with whom he always lived in the greatest intimacy. They both died at the same hour. Diog.—Val. Max. 1.

Pollíon, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Pyrrhus in his father's presence. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 526, &c. His son, who bore the same name, followed Æneas into Italy, and was one of the friends of young Ascanius. Id. 5, v. 564.

Pollitorium, a city of the Latins destroyed by the Romans, before Christ 639. Liv. 1, c. 33.

Pollinea, a prostitute, &c. Juv. 2, v. 68.

Polla Argentaria, the wife of the poet Lucan. She assisted her husband in correcting the three first books of his Pharsalia. Stat. Sylv. 1 & 2.

Pollentia, now Polenza, a town of Liguria in Italy, famous for wool. There was a celebrated battle fought there between the Romans and Alaric king of the Huns, about the 403rd year of the christian era, in which the former, according to some, obtained the victory. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 48.—Suet. Tib. 37.—Sil. 8, v. 508.—Cic. 11, Fam. 13.—A town of Majorca. Plin. & Mela.—Of Picenum. Liv. 39, c. 44. l. 47, c. 27.

Polles, a Greek poet whose writings were so obscure and unintelligible that his name became proverbial. Suidas.

Pollio C. Asinius, a Roman consul under the reign of Augustus, who distinguished himself as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favoured the cause of Antony against Augustus. He patronized, with great liberality, the poets Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the first who raised a public library at Rome, and indeed his example was afterwards followed by many of the emperors. In his library were placed the statues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only person who was honoured there during his lifetime. He was with J. Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon. He was greatly esteemed by Augustus, when he had become one of his adherents, after the ruin of Antony. Pollio wrote some tragedies, orations, and a history, which was divided into 17 books. All those compositions are lost, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the 80th year of his age, A.D. 4. He is the person in whose honour Virgil has inscribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Augustus and Antony during his consulship. The poet, it is supposed by some, makes mention of a son of the consul born about this time, and is lavish in his excursions into futurity, and his predictions of approaching prosperity. Paterc. 2, c. 86.—Horat. 2, od. 1, sat. 10, l. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 3 & 4.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Quint. 10.—Annus, a man accused of sedition before Tiberius, and acquitted. He afterwards conspired against Nero, &c. Tacit. 6, c. 9. l. 15, c. 56.—Vellius, one of the friends of Augustus, who used to feed his fishes with human flesh. This cruelty was discovered when one of his servants broke a glass in the presence of Augustus, who had been invited to a feast. The master ordered the servant to be seized; but he threw himself at the feet of the emperor, and begged him to interfere, and not to suffer him to be devoured by fishes.

Upon this the causes of his apprehension were examined, and Augustus, astonished at the barbarity of his favourite, caused his servant to be dismissed, all the fish-ponds to be filled up, and the crystal glasses of Pollio to be broken to pieces.—A man who poisoned Britannicus, at the instigation of Nero.—An historian in the age of Constantine the Great.—A sophist in the age of Pompey the Great.—A friend of the emperor Vespasian.

Pollius Felix, a friend of the poet Statius, to whom he dedicated his second Sylva.

Pollupex, now Final, a town of Genoa. Pollutia, a daughter of L. Vetus, put to death after her husband Rubellius Plautus, by order of Nero, &c. Tacit. 16. Ann. c. 10 & 11.

Pollux, a son of Jupiter by Leda the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Castor. Vid. Castor.—A Greek writer, who flourished A.D. 186, in the reign of Commodus, and died in the 58th year of his age. He was born at Naucratis, and taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote a useful work called Onomasticon, of which the best edition is that of Hemsterhusius, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1706.

Poltis, a king of Thrace, in the time of the Trojan war.

Polus, a celebrated Grecian actor.—A sophist of Agrigentum.

Polusca, a town of Latium, formerly the capital of the Volsci. The inhabitants were called Pollustini. Liv. 3, c. 39.

Polyænus, a native of Macedonia, who wrote eight books in Greek of stratagems, which he dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, while they were making war against the Parthians. He wrote also other books which have been lost, among which was a history, with a description of the city of Thebes. The best editions of his stratagems are those of Masvicius, 8vo, L. Bat. 1690, and of Murisina, 12mo, Berlin, 1756.—A friend of Philopœmen.—An orator in the age of Julius Cæsar. He wrote in three books an account of Antony's expedition in Parthia, and likewise published orations.—A mathematician, who afterwards followed the tenets of Epicurus, and disregarded geometry as a false and useless study. Cic. in Acad. Quest. 4.

Polyænus, a mountain of Macedonia, near Pindus. Strab.

Polyarchus, the brother of a queen of Cyrene, &c. Polyarch. 8.

Polybidas, a general after the death of Agesipola the Lacedæmonian. He reduced Olynthus.

Polybins, or Polybus, a king of Corinth, who married Peribœa, whom some have called Merope. He was son of Mercury by Chthonophyle, the daughter of Sicyon king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children, to adopt and educate as her own son, Cædipus, who had been found by his shepherds exposed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus son of Bias king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adrastus, who had been banished from his throne, and who had fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66.—Paus. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Seneca, in Cædip. 812.

Polybins, a native of Megalopolis in Peloponnesus, son of Lycortas. He was early initiated in the duties, and made acquainted with the qualifications, of a statesman, by his father, who was a strong supporter of the Achæan league, and under him Philopœmen was taught the art of war. In Macedonia he distinguished himself by his valour against the Romans, and when Perseus had been conquered, he was carried to the capital of Italy as a prisoner of war. But he was not long buried in the obscurity of a dungeon. Scipio and Fabius were acquainted with his uncommon abilities as a warrior and as a man of learning, and they made him their friend by kindness and attention. Polybius was not insensible to their merit; he accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and was present at the taking of Carthage and Numantia. In the midst of his prosperity, however, he felt the distresses of his country, which had been reduced into a Roman province, and, like a true patriot, he relieved its wants, and eased its servitude by making use of the influence which he had acquired by his acquaintance with the most powerful Romans. After the death of his friend and benefactor Scipio, he retired from Rome, and passed the rest of his days at Megalopolis, where he enjoyed the comforts and honours which every good man can receive from the gratitude of his citizens, and from the self-satisfaction which attends a humane and benevolent heart. He died in the 82nd year of his age, about 124 years before Christ, of a wound which he had received by a fall from his horse. He wrote a universal history in Greek, divided into 40 books, which began with the wars of Rome with the Carthaginians, and finished with the conquest of Macedonia by Paulus. The greatest part of this valuable history is lost; the five first books are extant, and of the 12 following the fragments are numerous. The history of Polybius is admired for its authenticity, and he is, perhaps, the only historian among the Greeks who was experimentally and professedly acquainted with the military operations and the political measures of which he makes mention. He has been recommended in every age and country as the best master in the art of war, and nothing can more effectually prove the esteem in which he was held among the Romans, than to mention that Brutus the murderer of Cæsar perused his history with the greatest attention, epitomized it, and often retired from the field where he had drawn his sword against Octavius and Antony, to read the instructive pages which describe the great actions of his ancestors. Polybius, however great and entertaining, is sometimes censured for his unnecessary digressions, for his uncouth and ill-digested narrations, for his negligence, and the inaccurate arrangement of his words. But every where there is instruction to be found, information to be collected, and curious facts to be obtained, and it reflects not much honour upon Livy for calling the historian, from whom he has copied whole books almost word for word, without gratitude or acknowledgment, haudquam spernendus auctor. Dionysius also, of Halicarnassus, is one of his most violent accusers; but the historian has rather exposed his ignorance of true criticism, than discovered inaccuracy or inelegance. The best editions of Polybius are those of Gronovius, 3 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1670; of Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo, 1764; and of Schweighæuser, 7 vols. 8vo, Lips. 1785. Plut. in Phil. in præc.—Liv. 30, c. 45.—Paus. 8, c. 30.—A freedman of Augustus. Suet.—A physician, disciple, and successor of Hippocrates.—A soothsayer of Corinth, who foretold to his sons the fate that attended them in the Trojan war.

Polybœa, a daughter of Amyclas and Diomedes, sister to Hyacinthus. Paus. 3, c. 19.

Polybœtes. Vid. Polyperetes.

Polybotes, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who crushed him under a part of the island of Cos, as he was walking across the Ægean. Paus. 1, c. 2. Hygin. in præf. fab.

Polybus, a king of Thebes in Egypt in the time of the Trojan war. Hom. Od. 22, v. 284.—One of Penelope's suitors. Ovid. Heroid. 1.—A king of Sicily.—A king of Corinth. Vid. Polybius.

Polyceon, a son of Lelex, who succeeded his brother Myles. He received divine honours after death, with his wife Messene, at Lacedæmon, where he had reigned. Paus. 4, c. 1, &c.—A son of Butes, who married a daughter of Hyllus.

Polycarpus, a famous Greek writer, born at Smyrna, and educated at the expense of a rich but pious lady. Some suppose that he was St. John's disciple. He became bishop of Smyrna, and went to Rome to settle the festival of Easter, but to no purpose. He was condemned to be burnt at Smyrna, A.D. 167. His epistle to the Philippians is simple and modest, yet replete with useful precepts and rules for the conduct of life. The best edition of Polycarp's epistle is that of Oxon, 8vo, 1708, being annexed to the works of Ignatius.

Polycaste, the youngest of the daughters of Nestor. According to some authors she married Telemachus, when he visited her father's court in quest of Ulysses.

Polychares, a rich Messenian, said to have been the cause of the war which was kindled between the Spartans and his countrymen, which was called the first Messenian war.

Polyceia, the mother of Thessalus, &c.

Polycles, an Athenian in the time of Demetrius, &c. Polyæn. 5.—A famous athlete, often crowned at the four solemn games of the Greeks. He had a statue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 1.

Polyclêtus, a celebrated statuary of Sicily, about 232 years before Christ. He was universally reckoned the most skillful artist of his profession among the ancients, and the second rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had represented a body-guard of the king of Persia, was so happily executed, and so nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a most perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was acquainted with architecture. Paus. 2 & 6.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Another, who lived about 30 years after.—A favourite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.

Polyclitus, an historian of Larissa. Athen. 12.—Ellian. 16, c. 41.
